Even if Hanno regains his powers, I suspect he won't ever be able to trust them again – what if it's the Hierarch passing judgement instead of the Seraphim?

Frivolous

While we're waiting for the next chapter – I was rereading old chapters and came across this, from Calamities II, spoken by Rafaella, the Valiant Champion:

=====

"Life is adventure," the girl philosophized in broken tradertalk. "Kill many things back home. Much slaughter of other claimants."

=====

So basically Rafaella killed the other claimants to the Name of Valiant Champion, just as Catherine did the other claimants to the Name of Squire. I thought that maybe killing other claimants was something only villains did, but apparently not.

No one commented on it in the comments of Calamities II, but I bring it up now because I'm not sure now if heroes are actually that heroic, if they feel they have to go all Highlander on each other and murder the competition.

I wonder how many other living heroes killed fellow claimants to get their Name.

=====

In relation to that – Hanno says that he cannot judge, and he gave up all agency in the matter to the Seraphim before they fell silent. Catherine says that justification only matters to the just, and her standard shows the sword outweighing the crown.

Hanno must be moral at all times. He refuses to accept any compromise he feels is immoral, even if it endangers his long-term goals.

Catherine has no line she will not cross if it means achieving her long-term goals, except maybe the deaths or betrayal of the Woe and Callow.

Hanno is failing to live up to his own ideals. He is waning. His significance is not changing.

Catherine is living up to her own ideals, mostly. She's having trouble with Hakram and vice versa, but that's all. She is waxing and gaining greater significance.

If this were a competition, I'd say Evil is winning. I'm just not sure why. Is it because Evil is more dynamic and proactive? Is it because Good and Evil aren't that different from each other? Is it because Evil is smarter, or more flexible?

Mental Mouse

If anything its because Cat is smarter and more effective than Hanno is.

That said, "Evil is winning because it's more powerful [in any respect]" is an invitation for Providence to come in and upset the scales.

Liliet

Catherine ABSOLUTELY has lines she refuses to cross. In Book 4 we started a theme of "if I'm not seeing a way to make things better, I have to give up and abdicate". She's been grossed out by Black Knight's and Grey Pilgrim's actions since, and she has repeatedly taken steps to hold herself to higher standards than she did previously – see the Scribe recruitment thing. Catherine crosses a line, then crosses it back and redraws it so she doesn't have to again. And yes, technically that does mean that what Hanno is saying is true – but what Hanno is saying is true for Hanno himself as well when taken to an extreme. He severely underestimates how rigid Cat's lines really are.

Wrt Raphaella, one version I can't rule out is that "much slaughter of other claimants" might refer to competitions a la hunting in the Brocelian – it was happening around her, but she wasn't the one doing the killing.

Sinead

On the subject of Cat's redefining of boundaries, I have to say that while it would need to be refined as a published story (and possibly broken into two books), I really liked Book 4 in the context of the series themes. It gave Cat the means to go Full Traditional Evil and have a Redemption = no rest for the wicked and change her course. She really holds her lines now (even if they form a shape that focuses on systemic goals over Justice) because she witnessed first hand what the end results of Traditional Evil is. Her lines are solid, just not where Hanno thinks they should be.

Liliet

mm!

Shveiran

WRT Rafella, I don't really see anything surprising in the idea that claimant to a Name of the Champion line got into honor duels to fix the issue, either. This is Levnat we are talking about.

I also don't think that's quite enough to see that this is either standard or common or that there are no difference between Good and Evil, so it is a very minor point.

Liliet

Yeah, both possibilities seem equally plausible AND don't seem to reflect much on Good as a whole.

308924810a

So, I'm not even sure that Evil Names necessarily have to slaughter the other Claimants, they just need to win out over them: See Robber's description of the competition between goblins to figure out which of them would join the legions, where at first they're killing each other, then Robber gets disgusted with that and sets up a game where they bet the outcome. That sounds a lot like someone who isn't allowed to say they're Named describing their conflict with other Claimants as a hint. Or maybe like the sort of event that is defined by the same stories as the conflict between claimants, either creating those stories, or being created by the influence those stories have on probability.

if the important factor that people win out over the other claimants, there may or may not be a requirement to win out over others in a competition with a discrete end point. But regardless of the specific mechanics I bet some Claimants for Chancellor have won by means of politically outmaneuvering foes without necessarily killing them.

Some Proceran names might be decided by competitions of piety, or a bet, or a joust, or a formal melee, or by a group of people setting out on a particular quest to retrieve something, defeat a specific evil, or bring down a particular threat, and only one succeeding(whether the others die or return in disgrace). While Levantine Names might also be decided by a quest in the above format, or by competition to see who can bring down the biggest monster or survive the harshest conditions, or loot the most wealth(from ancient tombs? from Procer?)(for the Brigand Names), or by Colosseum-style games in which only one survives, regardless of whether they were killed by other Claimants, Levante is unstructured/adventurer-style about their heroism enough that I could even imagine them doing the same sort of free-for-all-death-match-unless-the-claimants-choose-rules-for-themselves.

But I think based on her Domain(a colosseum that can isolate those fighting in it from the world and provide her an advantage), she probably killed the other Claimants for her name in colosseum combat.

308924810a

edits:

- 1) free-for-all deathmatch-unless-the-claimants-choose-rules-for-themselves that happens in Praes.
- 2) But I think based on the Valiant Champion's Domain

Mental Mouse

> Yet Cordelia Hasenbach had, once, been on the verge of being Named. The Heavens themselves had measured her being and not found it wanting.

It seems that Hanno doesn't know that Cordelia was offered Names from both sides. And he appears to share the common misconception about where Names come from.

laguz24

No, she had the base for a name which is the same for both above and below which is "the belief that they are right and the will to see it done." It just favored above over below, I'm pretty sure if more heroes rejected their names at first, below would offer them one, and vice versa.

Chapter 63: Dynamism

"Not quite what I imagine my father meant, when he said I should find a talent that would set me apart from my brothers."

– Basileus Ioannes Trakas of Nicae, the Patricide

"Rocks," Masego said, wrinkling his nose. "Bogs. More rocks."

He turned to glance at me, a gesture he rarely bothered with these days.

"Why is it that you want to reconquer these lands again?"

At least the Princess of Hainaut wasn't there, as I suspected she would have been less than enchanted by Zeze's stark description of her principality. He wasn't wrong, mind you. I'd visited the great valley – in reality more like a dozen or so smaller valleys whose boundaries melded into each other's – before but it'd been closer to the capital, through the west and the heartlands. There was a reason the eastern parts of the great valley were more lightly settled than the rest: they were a damned dreary and inhospitable place. No doubt the Dead King had worsened things by killing everything that crawled or grew in the region, but somehow I doubted there'd been all that much to kill in the first place.

"Strategic reasons," I replied.

It wasn't like the fields and mines of Hainaut were going to turn the tide of the fight against Keter, even if we got both in a usable state again. Which we wouldn't, as I didn't expect there'd be any people moving back into the highlands aside from soldiers and camp followers after we took back the grounds. It was mostly the advantage of holding the shore against the dead instead of our defensive line in the lowlands that was the attraction, one made even more appealing by the Gigantes offer to set down great wards along the shoreline to keep out the undead.

"You'd think forcing people to live here would lower morale, not improve it," Masego muttered.

"Says the Wastelander," I snorted back.

The principality of Hainaut might not be a green garden of luxury, but at least it wasn't filled with murderous monsters and afflicted with weather that changed on a whim. Hierophant turned to look at me in genuine surprise, as if he could not quite believe what he'd just heard.

"The Wasteland has all the best libraries," he reminded me.

"People don't usually live in those, Zeze," I pointed out.

"I know," Hierophant sadly replied. "I asked."

It said a lot about him that I had no trouble believing that. I was just lucky Warlock must have talked him out of asking the Sahelians, back in the day. And he must have, for Masego would have asked on his own and I had absolutely no doubt that Tasia Sahelian would have given Zeze access to the infamous Wolof spell repositories for the cheap, cheap price of marrying her only daughter. My blind friend shifted about, his shining glass eyes turning in their sockets and studying something behind him before returning.

"Company?" I asked.

"The Grey Pilgrim has it-"

There was a soft flash of Light, gone in a heartbeat, and the air filled with the scent of incinerated flesh. Ghoul, probably, if it could still smell like that. Skeletons had their own distinctive stink when burnt.

"- handled," Masego finished. "Interesting. I do believe he changes the properties he assigns Light nearly at will, Catherine. It's not unheard of, but that sheer verisimilitude certainly is."

"Having angels around for a few decades will let you pick up all sorts of tricks, I imagine," I shrugged.

The Peregrine's tread was light, but he wasn't trying to hide as he made his way up the rocky path to join us. That made it easy to pick on, for people with senses like ours.

"Light is the divine facet of faith," Tariq Fleetfoot mildly said as he came to stand by our sides. "It has few limits save those that mortal hands impose on it."

Masego look highly interested.

"So if I obtained fae hands in sufficient amounts-"

"You'd still be missing the faith," I interrupted, hoping to distract him before he gave offence.

Back when we'd been younger, tripping him over small details had usually been enough to distract him.

"It wouldn't be hard to insert into a captured fae, Catherine," Masego chided me. "It's not fundamentally different from any other kind of delusion."

I might have made a small tactical mistake there, I mentally conceded. Tariq cleared his throat, but though he did not look amused he didn't look all that angry either. Masego glanced at him through the dark eyecloth, entirely unabashed.

"Mathematically speaking, the chances of your particular interpretation of the Gods Above being correct of all-"

I cleared my throat. I did it twice as loud, when he kept trying to kindly explain to Tariq that basic applications of mathematics indicated that his entire life was probably a lie.

"How are the preparations going, Hierophant?" I asked.

He cocked his head to the side, burning eyes swivelling about to study the distance.

"Indrani is nearly done installing the columns," he said. "We'll be ready to proceed with the Respite ritual in about a quarter hour."

"I'll leave you to it then," I said. "I know you like to make sure the alignments are as precise as possible."

He smiled happily at me, which even now was enough to make me feel a little guilty.

"I appreciate it," Masego said, then glanced at the Pilgrim.

He nodded at the man.

"Comparative Numerics, by Marcellus the Elder," Hierophant suggested. "It's all quite simple, really, when you consider the-"

"I think I see 'Drani spinning a pillar about," I lightly interrupted.

Eyebrows widening in dismay, the man who even without magic to call on remained one of the finest mages in Calernia stomped away to prevent his partner from 'misaligning the constrictive forces'. His grumbling wafted up to us on the breeze even when he disappeared behind the rocks below.

"Quite a bracing young man," Tariq evenly said.

I winced.

"He means no harm," I said.

"If I believed he did, we would be having a very different conversation," the Peregrine said. "I've no qualms entertaining doubts, Catherine. Indeed, in different circumstances I suspect an evening talking with the Hierophant would make for fascinating conversation."

He'd not said 'safe' or 'religiously acceptable in any way', so I'd give him that.

"But," I said.

"But at the moment, perhaps a reminder that a certain moderation of words is in order would not go amiss," Tariq gently suggested. "Others of faith might have more of a temper, and I do believe he's been in three screaming matches with the Blessed Artificer since he arrived."

"I'll speak with him," I sighed. "But you know the Blessed Artificer situation isn't his fault alone, or entirely driven by either's character."

Their Names were clearly nudging them forward there, turning every small irritation into a slight and every disagreement into an argument. The fundamental nature of the Roles behind them were too opposed for there to be any hope of cordiality there: the Hierophant was a vivisector of all things divine, while the Blessed Artificer forged in what the Peregrine himself had called 'the divine facet of faith'.

"I am aware," Tariq said. "I have known rivals as well, Catherine, and not forgot the taste of it – and never did the enmity between my Bestowal and another's run as deep as it does between those two."

I glanced at him with interest.

"Anyone I'd have heard about?" I asked.

"They died," the Peregrine serenely said, "long before you were born."

Yeah, I just bet they did. It was good, now and then, to be reminded that the wrinkly old man in the grey robes had a body count in Named probably rivalling that of the Calamities. I'd yet to see a Revenant manage more than to mildly inconvenience the Grey Pilgrim, and it sure as Hells wasn't for lack of trying. My gaze drifted downwards, following the curve of the rocky slope. We'd left the Twilight Ways in the driest part of this little mess of bogs, as the ritual would need solid grounding, but the marshlands were spread out in every direction with only a few hills rising from them on occasion in mounds of mud and rock. The bog water was foul-smelling and filthy, but the Concocter had already confirmed it'd not been poisoned or cursed so the worse we'd had to deal with was a few bands of undead.

The entire region seemed to be crawling with them, which boded ill for the Prince of Hannover's army. A decisive victory at Juvelun wouldn't have left this many warbands out and about, so it was starting to look like Keter had bled the Iron Prince raw for that little town. Worse, it would have salvaged large enough a force that Prince Klaus would have to handle it before linking up with my incoming reinforcements. And worse than worse was that we still had little idea of where the Iron Prince's host was, what kind of a force it was facing and exactly where the missing Luciennerie army would be relative to us, Papenheim or whoever the Hells it was he was scrapping with.

Time was of the essence if I wanted to rescue an army instead of broken remnant. Fortunately, Masego was finally back on the front at my side and he'd provided a solution for our current troubles. He called it a 'respite' ritual, though the name was catchy enough I figured he probably wasn't the one to have come up with it. It was that very ritual that we'd crossed back into Creation to enact, with as light a presence as we dared. Only Named had come, all of them save Adjutant and our two youths.

Most our finest killers were out and about, combing through the mire to make sure that nothing snuck up on us and interrupted the ritual, but we'd clearly draw some enemy attention. Undead were starting to converge, which meant we needed to hurry. Thankfully, we were nearly ready. Roland had already sent word that the secondary arrays were ready – and Masego hadn't even felt the need to check on his work afterwards, which had nearly seen me gape – and now that Indrani had finished setting up the seventh ring of pillars on our little hill there was not much left to do but the sorcery itself.

Hierophant had come loaded with artefacts that were effectively just receptacles filled with magic he could wrest for that purpose, but just in case I'd assigned the Summoner to stay at his side. We were fencing with rituals against Trismegistus himself, no matter how certain Masego was of his formulas I wanted him to have an additional source of magic at hand. I'd not phrased it to the Summoner that way of course. He was witnessing the Hierophant's work personally so he could give me his opinion on it later, though of course I'd requested that if something went amok he lend his magic to my court mage to solve the trouble.

It was known in the right circles I'd been Queen of Winter once upon a time, he really should have known better than not to look twice at that phrasing.

"Eastern winds, when will you blow

And return my love to me?

His lack falls like winter snow,

Cruel torment made decree."

The Rapacious Troubadour did have a lovely voice for an unrepentant monster, even when it was put to use singing horrid noble crap from back home. Archer's inexplicable fondness for the Lay of Lothian's Passing, a traditional ballad about the rise and fall of the love of Sir Lothian and his ladylove Eveline, remained a genuine puzzle to me even after years of knowing her. Mind you, it was a common enough personality defect back in Callow as well. The only reason I'd ever sat through the renditions of it at summer fairs had been that there were some pretty nifty fight scenes against Praesi – under Black, singers had prudently changed the word to 'enemy' instead – and Baroness Fallon, the scheming noblewoman trying to trick Lothian into marriage.

"You ever notice how it's always barons and dukes that go bad in stories, but almost never counts?" I mused.

That was unfair, as in my experience most nobles were terrible regardless of their relative position of their rung in the social ladder.

"Baronial titles are at the bottom of the Callowan peerage, I believe," Tariq said, "while ducal ones are beneath only royalty. I expect both of those positions tend to... excite ambition."

Technically there were knights and lords beneath barons, but I got his point. Neither of those kinds of lesser nobles tended to ever be trouble for anyone aside from the greater nobles they were sworn to.

"I expect the Dukes of Liesse aren't going to be trouble for my successors at least," I darkly muttered. "So there's that."

Tariq, to my surprise, looked amused for a heartbeat before mastering himself.

"I know you care little for my opinion in this, and rightfully so," the Grey Pilgrim said, "but your choice of successor is to be commended, Queen Catherine. Vivienne Dartwick will make an exceptional queen."

I shot him a curious look. Tariq's reluctance to be in the vicinity of anything even remotely akin to rule meant that he usually kept his piece when it came to this sort of thing – for example, I suspected he would very much prefer Rozala Malanza reign over Procer rather than Cordelia Hasenbach – so I was surprised he'd even admit to having an opinion on the matter of Callowan succession.

"She has the right qualities," I warily agreed.

"And she will chase your shadow for the rest of her life, scouring her clean of the weaknesses that many crowned heads accrue," the Pilgrim said. "Unlike many before her, I doubt she will ever cease to strive her utmost to do good: doing so would be a betrayal of not only herself but the trust you extended her."

My lips thinned and I looked away. It wasn't that I was unaware that Vivienne and I had a complicated relationship, or that it pulled at us both in ways that were usually to our betterment – if not necessarily through healthy means. To have the darker aspects of that bond dragged out in the light of day by a man who might be an ally but was definitely not a friend was not a pleasant experience. The Grey Pilgrim's eyes had always seen too much for comfort.

*"Lothian strove and mighty slew,
A score wicked enemies
Seven lords he cut in two
And settled great enmities."*

Poor dumb Lothian. When intriguing baronesses trying to get your lands offered to let you repay your family debts by valour on the battlefield, they weren't actually trying to let you off – they were just baiting you into getting in over your head so they could bail you out and leverage you with a life debt on top of the rest. I'd occasionally wondered over the years if the enduring popularity of the ballad – and play, there were like ten different versions of the story including the one in inexplicable Old Miezan – in Callow was due to the cultural resonance of a martial noble covered in glory out east getting fucked over by a more high-ranking one the moment he returned to the kingdom.

For all that we deservedly complained about the Praesi and the Procerans, my people had always been capable of being terrible to each other without anyone else's help.

"I fear I have given offence," the Grey Pilgrim finally spoke into the silence.

"No," I said. "Only discomfort. And not unearned, in the greater scheme of things."

There was a pregnant pause.

"I sometimes forget that your Woe love each other," Tariq admitted. "It is unusual, in a band of villains. Yet these are changing times. I meant my words as a compliment, however short of that they might have fallen. You found a protector for your home, and set her on a path that promises distinction."

"Then I will endeavour to remember your words as they were meant," I said.

There, and to think some people said I wasn't diplomatic. The old man ruefully smiled.

"It is a bad habit," the Pilgrim admitted.

Thinking the worse of us? It was, and often tiring to deal with, but he was hardly the worst of his kind when it came to that particular sin. That he faced and fought it already made him among the finest of their number when it came to address it, so I would not whine. Besides, I held no illusions about the truth of villainy on Calernia. Though in time it might be sanitized, turned into something worth embracing, at the moment it was the side that counted cannibals and rapists among its ranks. I would not moan about the distrust of villains when I hardly trusted any of them myself. As a woman of refined tastes, I preferred my hypocrisies to be at least somewhat deniable.

"There are worse to have," I said. "I've dabbled in a few myself, Peregrine."

"The mistaken comparisons to others I have known is certainly one such habit," the old man said, "but as it happens I meant another. I was leading up to making a request, you see. Yet, as young Indrani once made clear to me, it is not for me to pull and prod at you: straightforward honesty will always fetch better result."

Huh, I thought, glancing from the corner of my eye. When exactly was it that those two had had that purported conversation? I didn't mind, but Archer had never mentioned it to me.

"I like to think so," I finally said, a little taken aback. "I'm listening, Pilgrim, though I make no promises."

As far as I was concerned, Razin and Aquiline were once more his problem. I'd only agreed to keep an eye on them as a temporary favour, not to forever be their guardian devil. They were way too much of a headache for me to be inclined to renew that promise anyway.

"I would request that you keep your distance from the White Knight, when our armies are joined," Tariq said.

I frowned. This again? I'd thought that the old snickering rumours about Hanno and I being more than simply friendly were dead and buried. Hells, we weren't even friendly anymore.

"I've told you before that--"

"And I believe you," the Grey Pilgrim calmly interrupted. "This is unrelated, Catherine. Before I left the army, I glimpsed in the Sword of Judgement the beginnings of a crisis of faith."

I fixed the old man with a steady look.

"This not the time for the White Knight to stumble," I bluntly said.

Even when he disagreed with me, even when we did not get along, his participation to the Truce and Terms alone leant it an amount of legitimacy that we badly needed. I wasn't going to pretend that one of the first things we hammered into heroes hesitating to sign up was 'the Sword of Judgement is part of this'.

"On that we must disagree," the Pilgrim frankly said. "This is precisely the right time for the White Knight to stumble."

I blinked. Right, fucking hero logic. It had all the hallmarks of madness, except for the part where it worked.

"You're going to have to walk me through that one," I admitted. "In my experience, when one of yours doubts they either die or lose their Name."

"We are all tested, sooner or later," Tariq said. "Often this begins with a loss of potency, brought about by doubt or fear, but should we rise to meet that test we do not simply resume what we were: we rise above it."

My eyes narrowed. That came uncomfortably close to 'iron sharpens iron' in some ways, which made it all the more distressing coming from the eldest living hero on Calernia. Mind you the test as he described it wouldn't necessarily be another person, which in the central philosophy of the Praesi highborn it always was. To the old guard of the Wasteland, even fighting off an invasion was just a setting for another duel against your rivals.

"I'm not too clear on what it is that Hanno has to doubt," I frankly said. "He's been mostly getting his way, except when it'd cost too much to others if he did. He's an intelligent man and reasonable enough for one of your lot, so he shouldn't be expecting much more of us wicked sinners."

"His thoughts are his own, and not mine to divulge," the Pilgrim said, "yet I will speak to my own. Hanno of Arwad is split between the man he wants to be and the man fate demands he should be."

That did not sound like a particularly pleasant place to be in. I stayed silent, waiting for Tariq to elaborate, and he did not disappoint.

"He is the Sword of Judgement by choice," the Grey Pilgrim said, "but he is the White Knight through the workings of fate."

"There's not supposed to be a difference between the two," I pointed out.

"Yet there is," the old man said. "The Sword of Judgement is growing increasingly unable to stomach the deals the White Knight has been forced to make to ensure that we survive this war. And soon that disparity will come to a head."

I studied him for a bit, parsing his words. By 'Sword of Judgement' I figured he was actually referring to Hanno's comfortable embrace of his role as the designated hatchetman of the Seraphim. It did tend to be what he defaulted to being when in conflict, I'd noticed, even now that Judgement had grown quiet. What was meant by 'White Knight', though, was a little more nebulous to my eye.

"Hanno the man who believes in Judgement," I tried, "and Hanno the man who is an officer of the Grand Alliance."

The Pilgrim gently smiled at me.

"The latter is a mortal tie, Catherine," he said. "It would not bind him. It is, rather, Hanno the man who has sworn his faith to the Seraphim and Hanno the man who leads the heroes of our age."

"I will not mistrust, said she,

And never shall I despair

Tenderness will set me free,

To lovers the world is fair."

I mulled that over a while. Tariq was, in essence, telling me that the while Hanno might have been a good fit for the Name of White Knight in certain circumstances they were not the current ones. He fits the Name but not the Role, I tried out. At least not the Role the war has forced on him. He commanded obedience, through charisma and respect, but I could see how an argument could be made that Hanno didn't particularly want to be in charge of heroes, or really of anything at all. He tended to see leadership as a burden, and only took it up when he perceived it at as his duty to do so. Which, given that this war was vaguely crusade-shaped and he was the White Knight, must have been a lot more often than he was comfortable with.

Throw in the Hierarch silencing the entire Choir of Judgement for what was, as far as I knew, the first time in recorded Calernian history? I could see why Hanno was having some troubles coming to terms with who he was turning into. Which tended to be a costly kind of doubt, for Named.

Our time at the Arsenal looks different seen through those eyes, I thought. What I'd seen as inflexibility and even obstructionism on his part took instead the shape of the White Knight considering the troubles in the Highest Assembly as a Cordelia's sphere of trouble to deal with and not for him to meddle in, much like the Red Axe had been his sphere of responsibility where we should not have trespassed. That seemed overly simplistic to me, but then I was in a pretty unique situation wasn't I? I'd accumulated influence until I'd come to sit on every council as both Queen of Callow and representative for the villains. I'd not really seen a difference because to me there really wasn't.

Frankly, I still thought he was wrong. The moment the Red Axe had tried to kill a Proceran prince of the blood it had become problem that involved more than just heroes whether he liked it or not. But seen from that perspective, both Cordelia and I would have overreached and meddled in his sphere when he'd been scrupulously careful about never touching ours. And I just bet if things had gotten bad after we obeyed those invisible lines and Hasenbach had said she needed his help, he would have given it without hesitation, I ruefully thought. Because he would have been invited to step beyond his sphere, while on the other hand the First Prince and I had simply worked around him to get what we needed.

It was that fucking hero mindset, I silently cursed. He didn't see something like the rebellious whispers in the Assembly as a real problem, because in his experience if he kept doing the right thing and trouble came then continuing to do the right thing would get him through that as well. Why compromise and dirty his principles, when the moment it all went to shit he could instead make an inspiring speech to the rebels and Creation would bend over backwards for it to work? There were godsdamned good reasons I was still trying to keep Named from being able to be rulers, even if my failure there was all but writ in the stars. There'd been blind spots all around, I finally admitted to myself, and they'd neatly fit into our worst expectations of each other.

Merciless Gods but that felt like something the Intercessor would have arranged. Surely even she couldn't manipulate us this precisely, though. Right? I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. It was always the necessary degree of paranoia that was difficult to gauge with the Wandering Bard, not whether or not it was necessary at all.

"All right," I said. "Say I buy that. What does it get the Heavens for their favourite knight to doubt his place in Creation?"

"Times are changing," Tariq softly said. "And while I have grown distressed by the echo of truth there has been to the words of your once-teacher, I will not shy away from the truth: though it can be said that Good triumphed in the Age of Wonders, in this dawning Age of Order is it Evil that has seized the lead."

"It doesn't have to be a competition," I began, then bit my tongue.

I sighed.

"It does," I admitted. "It does have to be competition, that's how we were made. But it doesn't have to be the kind of wars it's turned into, Tariq. The ones that shatter cities and break nations. It can be made, if not civil, then at least civilized."

"I do not know if I believe that," the Grey Pilgrim quietly replied.

I winced at the blunt admission.

"But I recognize that you believe it," Tariq Fleetfoot continued. "And in that I can put my trust. The truth is, Catherine, that I am an old man. Set in my ways. And I will try to change them to better ones, so long as there is breath yet left in this carcass, but I have fought Evil for many years and it has taken its toll. I am not certain there would be a place for someone like me, in the world you seek to make."

The Grey Pilgrim mirthlessly smiled.

"That is, in a sense, the highest compliment I can pay your dream," the Peregrine said. "But I will not be alone in this, Black Queen. I am not alone in this. Consider Hanno of Arwad, the man as you know him, and tell me that if he had been born two centuries past he would have been the kind of hero we would still raise shrines to."

"He would have made mincemeat of most Old Tyrants," I agreed. "Your point?"

"That there are no longer Old Tyrants to fight," the Grey Pilgrim honestly replied. "And so we must change with the times, or become relics. His struggle is not his alone, Catherine. We must, all of us, reconcile the wild heroics of my youth to what would be allowed in the world to come – as young Hanno must now reconcile the unalloyed purpose the Seraphim taught him and the demands made of a White Knight in a greying world."

"You think he's going to set the path," I slowly said. "Carve the groove others will flow into."

"I do," Tariq said. "And so I ask you to leave him to his test, that he might find an answer that is his and his alone."

Which meant, beyond the all the flowery talk, that he didn't want me getting my hands anywhere near Hanno while he transitioned into... whatever it was that lay ahead. I doubted it'd be a new Name, but perhaps a second flowering of his current one was not out of the question. I forced myself to step out of my own perspective and consider what was being asked of me. Meddling in Hanno's 'test', if he was really undergoing such a thing, could potentially yield advantages for me. It seemed possible to at least nudge him in a direction that wasn't adversarial to my own. On the other hand, wasn't that very kind of meddling something providence was bound to punish me over? Villains that thought they were the cleverest thing since Traitorous tended to end up in some pit or another, one that they'd even dug themselves most of the time.

It'd be damned easy to misstep and become the proverbial devil on Hanno's shoulder, or worse the enemy he defined himself through. It might come to that anyway, I honestly admitted to myself. We were both prominent Named as well as representatives of a larger amount of Named. Yet so long as the enmity was one of means and ideals rather than, you know, demons and calling down Choirs I could deal with it. And I was honestly inclined to believe that the less I was involved the friendlier the end result would be: I doubted the Heavens would take kindly to my meddling with the tempering of their designated champion. If he was truly that, I reminded myself. I would not take the Grey Pilgrim's opinions as facts, no matter how wizened and wise the old man was.

"Our duties will still see us working together," I eventually said.

It was tacitly accepting his request, and neither of us pretended otherwise. Aside from all other considerations, antagonizing the Peregrine over something he believed to be this important would have been a blunder.

"Adjacency," the Grey Pilgrim replied, "is not intrusion."

Fair enough. So long as I didn't actively meddle, he wouldn't consider it meddling. Pretty fair terms, though admittedly these days Tariq wasn't in a position to ask much of me that I didn't want to give.

"I'll look forward to the ending, then," I said.

"So will I," the Peregrine smiled. "I expect that light will burn bright, Black Queen, and come just when the night has grown darkest."

That old trick again, huh? Kairos had liked to always have a fresh enemy to make, but Tariq had a favoured trick of his own: to keep a journey ongoing and undefined, so that providence might lead it to end at precisely the right time. It'd bit him in the ass at the Graveyard, but the old man was pretty much the patron saint of timely arrivals so I could see how leaning into that groove would have paid off for him over the years. That Hanno's journey here would be a metaphorical one wouldn't matter, as far as the Pilgrim was concerned.

Fate, to his kind, was a book writ from ending to start.

It was not an answer I shared. Fate is a tug of war, I'd once heard a madman say, and for all that madness he had not been wrong. By our own hands we would make or break this world, and if either gods or Gods disagreed then let them bite their tongue bloody.

"Let me die then, Lothian said

I choose doom, end in honour

Many seasons my heart bled

As my oath kept me from her."

The song, beautifully played as it had been, ended abruptly after the last note preceding Sir Lothian's getting himself killed in battle before he was forced to marry Baroness Fallon. The Rapacious Troubadour, like us, had felt the power gathering. Below us sorcery flared as at last began the ritual we'd been awaiting. Our respite. Chords of magic, thick and burning, began to flow along the trajectory the columns had set as the smell of ozone filled the air and a dim pressure began to mount. The dead god on his throne in Keter had blinded us, here in Hainaut, but his hollow miracles were not beyond us.

Hierophant laughed, exulting as the ritual took, and ripped open an eye in the sky.

nick012000

Now I'm wondering what exactly this ritual was supposed to do. Reopen the area to scrying rituals? That's useful, but it's not exactly a game-winning trump card, is it?

Storm

Except it very much is. Putting aside that this is just one of several contingencies, reestablishing scrying will allow them to coordinate with the other army, and outmaneuver the dead armies wandering about. Remember how Kairos was as able to dance circles around two massive coalition armies in book 5 with the power of scrying? This helps make Cat's ambush ambush story feasible.

Sir Nil

Don't look down on the benefits of modern communication in warfare, though if I had to hazard a guess, the ritual was called Respite, which I feel could mean setting up a zone where DK's magic won't work, including his necromancy and scry blocking. So they could have just set up a huge safe zone in the middle of DK territory.

dadycool

Cat: Where are you?

Iron Prince: We were (some place) two weeks ago.

Cat: Yeah, but where are you now?

Iron Prince: We were on our way north two weeks ago.

shikkarasu

Too Crows-damned real.

Shveiran

This is funny, but from a practical stand-point, they don't need to scry him to have a conversation: Hierophant has proven before that he can scry an area, and the Iron Prince will have mages and the Witch of the West to assist with that. They can take an aerial survey and check the terrain, removing the issue of giving precise directions entirely.

Sylfa

Even if they couldn't get anything but words through it would be way more useful than that.

How many troops remain, are you marching or dug in, how many miles did you march each day and in what direction, did you go around the mountain to the south or north on day 4, etc.

Cat has maps and knows how far an army could march in a day, even just "2 weeks north" would give her a much more accurate position than you're assuming, then she sends out a team of heroes and let providence take them the last bit of the way.

But scrying is a way to look and hear remotely, it's why you need a mage on either side so they can scry each other to have a discussion. You can use that to get more than just audio, for instance they both know where they are so they can point it out on a map. Assuming they can't just scout them out directly instead.

nimelennar

When, and I quote, "Time was of the essence if I wanted to rescue an army instead of broken remnant," finding out exactly where that army is may well be the game-winning trump card.

Daniel

Perhaps something like a reconnaissance satellite, giving them an overview of the entire strategic situation? Not a game winning trump card, but really really useful in a war of this scale.

Stormblessed

The interesting thing about these later chapter, this book as a whole, and the context this chapter gives to earlier chapters in this book, is that for what feels like the first time in the series, neither side is right. For a very very long time, especially because we look through Cat's eyes, that Cat's philosophies are the "correct" ones. But I'm pleased that finally in this book (and the last to an extent) we've reached a point where Good isn't Stupid or made of Straw.

sengachi

Evil got forged in the fires of the Age of Wonders. It chewed up Dread Emperors and Warlocks and Chancellors for fuel until what came out was the Calamities. A more rational, thoughtful form of Evil walked out of that furnace and it changed the world.

Cat just put Good through the same furnace. Learn the same lessons Evil did and improve what you are ... or perish.

Liliet

Well, finally we reached the point where it's being made explicit that Good isn't Stupid or made of Straw. It hasn't been for a long time.

Even William had a point in retrospect, when you look at the consequences the Praesi occupation ended up wrecking before being withdrawn. He was still terrible, but he was more right than Cat had been willing to credit him for at the time.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes, Tariq made excellent points during the Tenth Crusade, and from his point of view he was completely justified. If a crusader was the protagonist of the story, we would have cheered him and looked down on Cat.

Liliet

I still like to think I wouldn't have but it would be more of an academic exercise of the "I fully understand why the side I cheer for makes the decisions it does but I still feel like it's a tragedy that everyone can't just get along".

...and tbh at the point where Cat started actively suing for peace I do think I'd be arguing that it should be accepted and any reason why it isn't is a Tragic Fatal Flaw in "our" side.

Liliet

(i missed a word)

(of the "I fully understand why the side I cheer for makes the decisions it does but I still feel like it's a tragedy that everyone can't just get along" sort)

Clint

I'd imagine the Heroes tell less amusing stories about Dread Emperor Irritant, and the tens of thousands of innocents who died each time the Heroes agreed to a truce with the shoemaker who spoke so humbly about peace.

Liliet

Mm.

hakureireimu

Who is this "we"? Speak for yourself.

Salt

We almost certainly would have. If this was a Heroic Protagonist oriented story, the background buildup and context wouldn't have been all about Catherine Foundling and her motivations.

It would've been several books about a younger Pilgrim compromising with quite literally dozens upon dozens of Villains who said exactly the same things that Catherine did, initially behaved as reasonably as she did, with the exact same motivations, and him getting stabbed in the back every single time.

The interludes wouldn't have been about humanizing the Calamities so much as humanizing the Saint, with the background stories being about how she lived her entire life fighting battles as brutal as the war on Keter, eventually building up into "no truce with the enemy" in her old age after killing hundreds of Villains who would routinely mass murder, torture, and rape.

In a Heroic protagonist centered story, Cat would've initially been just one more in a very long line of Villains claiming to be working for some greater good, and most of the initial comments would've been angrily ranting about how frustratingly stupid it is for Tariq to even consider trusting yet another Villain, after the last 37 stabbed him in the back.

Jairo Lugilde

I love this comment

Crash

The issue with William was never that he didn't have a point. It's how he went about it and how he justified his point.

Calling orcs ruthless beasts and rapists when you really mean "Callowans paid a heavy price during occupation" isn't a good way to have people believe (in) you.

Liliet

Oh that's 100% true.

Dread Emperor Irritant I

"Not quite what I imagine my father meant, when he said I should find a talent that would set me apart from my brothers."

– BASILEUS IOANNES TRAKAS OF NICAE, Voter

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Insanenoodlyguy

"Times are changing," Tariq softly said. "And while I have grown distressed by the echo of truth there has been to the words of your once-teacher, I will not shy away from the truth: though it can be said that Worm triumphed in the Age of Voting, in this dawning Age of Boosting is it A Practical Guide to Evil that has seized the lead."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

Hey neat, there's one in the top 5 that's new to me.

With an author named cliffhanger, well this should be good, or at least amusing in badness.

nimelennar

Which one is this? I can't seem to find anything on TWF by an author named "Cliffhanger." Certainly none of the top 5.

Liliet

Can you not? Please?

There was a period of time when people were just writing "vote!" or "boost!" and that was so nice

origamiflame

Honestly I'm not sure why you're so against it. It achieves the same purpose in the end, and some have fun with it right?

Liliet

Because I didnt immediately process what it was and read it and then seeing the modified into LOLJOKE lines is like biting into a donut and finding barf inside.

ruduen

Huh. I'll be honest, I didn't expect the Interludes to end until they hit the climax of this particular sequences of events. Still, it's good to have confirmation that someone else recognizes what's happening to Hanno's Name.

I do wonder what would happen if Cat ends up in a position where she's force to influence his decisions – through requiring action of some type, rather than because she wants to influence his name. I wonder if that's something the Heroes would hold against her.

Do the TopWebFiction thing!

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/boost>

dadycool

Um,...did Masego just start cackling as his mad experiment went exactly as he expected it to? Can we please see it as literally anything else? I don't want another experiment to turn on him, especially with DK's involvement.

No, Cat, you can't go poking a cocoon to try and make a carnivorous butterfly. You know damn well that it would only bite you later.

caoimhinh

Masego has a tendency to cackle like a madman when his grand and flashy rituals activate, remember? He has done that ever since Book 2.

There are a few occasions it happened. Sometimes it's just him grinning wildly.

But for me, one deserving particular notice is the first time it happened, all the way back in Book 2 chapter 31:

"Lines of flame rose from the ground into the sky from all over the city, too numerous to count. The threads of fire linked into a single point high above the demon and I finally understood what Masego had been doing. He'd broken his ritual, piece by piece, and taken the wild flames that would have exploded from the hearths as his own. Usurpation is the essence of sorcery, Apprentice had once told me, paraphrasing some Dread Emperor. He'd usurped his own work, and was now bringing its full strength to bear against our enemy. From the point where all the flames had gathered an enormous pillar of flame descended, enveloping the demon in the blink of an eye. I'd half-expected the spell to disappear after a moment, but it kept on going. There was a strange sound coming from our mage's direction, and I realized with a start it was a laugh. Masego was grinning madly as he convulsed in laughter, the glare of the flames reflecting on his glasses as he peered over them at his work. His hands were thrusting forward, unmoving as the fire raged and waves of heat scorched stone and distorted the air.

How long we stood there, watching the son of the Sovereign of the Red Skies proving the truth of his lineage, I did not know."

TeK

In his defence, would you not?

caoimhinh

Heck, I have cackled like a madman for stuff far less badass than setting a demon on arcane fire or screwing with a god through a large scale ritual.

Masego is 120% entitled to his mad laughter in such moments.

Liliet

EXACTLY

Liliet

I can't imagine myself doing anything other than grinning.

In either direction.

dadycool

Thank the gods ever burning and the Sisters in Shadow. I'm glad this is a recurring theme, especially one cultivated and indulged basically his whole life. And if this is even half as badass as that one with the demon, it'd be more suspicious if he DIDN'T cackle like a madman. Now my only concern is that that sort of thing sounds like an Age of Wonders kind of thing, which is invalid without Tyrant.

Burlyraven

Ah yes, point the barrel of the gun that is Heiropant at the enemy and fire away. He's a large enough caliber that he'll hit something and amuse us all in the doing.

It's kind of interesting to hear GP recognizing that Hanno is coming up on a delicate time as well. Hanno getting a heroic upgrade is definitely the more likely scenario, and Cat should steer clear for the reasons the chapter lists, but there were enough questionings of GPs analysis by both, and enough references to Evil coming out on top that I think corruption arc for Hanno is still on the table. The only problem is that I think Cat might even fight against Hanno's corruption. If Hanno joins team Evil, it leaves a void in leadership for Good. Even worse, it might bring into question whether Cat engineered his fall in the first place. If we're really looking for long cons from the Bard, sacrificing a heavy hitter to bring about the implosion of the Terms is a pretty big one.

Insanenoodlyguy

Even better if the corruption involves him sleeping with Cat, because I want the full force of angry glares from an old man to be something she inevitably fails to avoid.

Skaddix

I do want to see that but that is more cause we need payoff on the Cat x Hanno thing and Hanno's Love Life in general since we have had so much speculation about it from characters.

mindsword2

I've been assuming Hanno is Ace. Another "opposite" of Cat.

ohJohN

I don't remember exactly, but I thought in one of his early interludes it's briefly mentioned that he was sleeping with one of the heroines in the crusade?

Liliet

Nope, it wasn't! The only mention of Hanno's love life was when him entertaining "impure" thoughts about some girls was brought up in his origin extra chapters.

It appears he's not ace, just... chaste.

Dome Zasrekh

Anyone remembers the Ashen Priestess? xD

Liliet

Cat would 100% fight against Hanno's corruption, and frankly I don't see any room for it. This isn't DnD where committing a non-Good or non-Lawful act fells the paladin. To switch teams you need to persistently and systematically start doing bad shit (which I cannot imagine Hanno doing) or explicitly and deliberately go over to the other banner (which I also cannot imagine Hanno doing). What's really on the table for Hanno as an alternative is loss of Name (as he falls out of the Role without starting to match another – seriously, no villain groove for this guy) or death (as he stumbles upon a bad kind of story).

2xMachina

The problem tho, in here, Good is defined as following the rules of the Gods, while Evil is following your own desires.

If Hanno decides that, since Judgement is not around, he will Judge, he very well will turn to camp Evil.

Liliet

> The problem tho, in here, Good is defined as following the rules of the Gods, while Evil is following your own desires.

It's not though.

Good is defined as helping other people and Evil as harming them, same as everywhere.

Gippart

Then why is Cat a villain even though her greatest desire is peace, while the Grey Pilgrim is a hero who will obliterate a town of innocents without questioning another method for the greater good?

Good characters do unnecessary harm constantly in this series.

The image that most people have of heroes and villains is definitely that simple. But the reality is far more complex. It's still about help/harm, selfless/selfish, and mercy/cruelty; but since morality was defined and baked into this world at its creation, it is more about Above/Below.

And while Below may not care much about methods, but Above requires subservience above all else. The parallel stories at the beginning of this book prove that indisputably.

One (villain) believed he was on his own and had to kill everyone in the village to save the country. One (hero) believed the Gods would not abandon the people and prayed for assistance and saved everyone through miracles and providence.

Liliet

> Then why is Cat a villain even though her greatest desire is peace because she became a student to a villain because the property is transitive and below's side accepts everyone and is ever hungry for more because her teacher was born to the worship of below and his only way out of the villainous side was if he abandoned his homeland and parentage forever because Evil as a political side is not the same as Evil as a philosophy does this answer your question?

Shveiran

It doesn't answer his other points, though.

Which, I'll admit, are not perfect.
The Valiant Champion and the Red Wizard and Brigand kind of prove, to me, that worship is not all there is to it.
Nor the acceptance of an outside force that defines morality, since, well, again, we saw a lot of heroes that basically do what they think is right.

Yet Tancred's story (or Sabah's for that matter) IMO show that neither it is about doing good and harm.
Sure, the boy spilled a lot of blood, but he did so to prevent a tragedy.
And we know that kind of reasoning IS compatible with Good. Leaving Saint and Pilgrim aside, there is a litteral Choir that has that as core tenent.

So... yeah. I feel like the difference between what make a Hero or a Villain is less and less defined.
Ultimately, it sounds like it's a narrative matter?
Like, Sabah could have been born cursed and become a edgy "I'm monstuous yet I must do good yet it is hard to contain the darkness within" kind of Hero, but instead she was born in Praes and there wasn't a grove for that.
So she became the Cursed, a Villain Named, because that's what mosnters do in Praesi culture.

And maybe Tancred is the same. In Procer, the religion is very organized and rooted in the culture, and thus to renounce Above's guidance is a villanous act. So he became a Villain.

Elsewhere, maybe that wouldn't have been enough.

Liliet

> Ultimately, it sounds like it's a narrative matter?
Like, Sabah could have been born cursed and become a edgy "I'm monstuous yet I must do good yet it is hard to contain the darkness within" kind of Hero, but instead she was born in Praes and there wasn't a grove for that.

> So she became the Cursed, a Villain Named, because that's what monsters do in Praesi culture.

Yup!

I actually got to thinking about this enough I wrote a new reddit theorypost about all this.

Salt

You're both half right, as far as what the story was about from the start. IIRC EE did clarify regarding this in earlier comments

> Evil Roles usually let people do whatever they feel like doing – that's because they're, in that sense, championing the philosophy of their gods. Every victory for Evil is a proof that that philosophy is the right path for Creation to take. Nearly all Names on the bad side of the fence have a component that involves forcing their will or perspective on others

> Good Roles have strict moral guidelines because those Names are, in fact, being guided: those rules are instructions from above on how to behave to make a better world. Any victory for Good that follows from that is then a proof of concept for the Heavens being correct in their side of the argument"

> The Gods Above and Below do roughly correspond to "lower case" good and evil, as far as entities that far removed from mortals can be understood. That neither side of the equation intervenes directly means there's a lot of room for interpretation in the respective philosophies they preach, but the bare bones are there.

Which I'm interpreting to mean that generally Above/Below and Heroes/Villains as a result generally do align with traditional ideas of good and evil (if not necessarily all the time), but the wager is less about good and evil so much as divine guidance vs self determination being superior, whatever superior means as far as Above and Below are concerned

Liliet

yeah, good and evil just emerge as a result of how they apply their philosophies

> The Gods Above and Below do roughly correspond to
"lower case" good and evil, as far as entities that far removed from mortals can be understood. That neither side of the equation intervenes directly means there's a lot of room for interpretation in the respective philosophies they preach, but the bare bones are there

ohJohN

It pretty explicitly is, if we're talking capital-letters Good/Evil, Above/Below, or however you want to phrase the dichotomy that generally places heroes and villains on opposing sides in the shatranj game of the Gods. From the prologue:

The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made.

Lowercase good/evil still have their traditional meanings but, while there's frequent overlap, Names are aligned based on the capitalized words.

Liliet

> The Gods Above and Below do roughly correspond to
"lower case" good
and evil, as far as entities that far removed from mortals can be understood. That neither side of the equation intervenes directly means there's a lot of room for interpretation in the respective philosophies they preach, but the bare bones are there

Liliet

Hmm, I'm going to go ahead and link an essay I wrote a bunch ago on this very question.

308924810a

-“I expect that light will burn bright, Black Queen, and come just when the night has grown darkest.”- Calling it now, EE tends to foreshadow nearly every major event in their books through one-off lines of dialog and jokes between characters that make references to things that haven't happened yet, Someone is going to use the judgement corpse before things are done.

Also can anyone point me to the exact arguments that convinced EE that trying to ban Named Rulers was futile? I can sort of understand why Cat would want to do it(no more using countries as high-casualty props in conflicts between individuals, and forcing the Praesi to confront the dysfunctionality of their current system or get squashed by the continent when they try to rely on a Named ruler to brute force functioning as a state.), but I only managed to find posts by the author saying they'd been convinced by commentors, not why.

Miles

Rule is an aspect, Names are granted for Ambition, and obtaining/seizing power is the first step in any large undertaking- especially when trying to change things.

Sinead

I hadn't heard anything about being convinced that it would be a bad idea. Unless it's just a point that the Mandate of Rule for the majority of government in Calernia is derived from having a Name, so they would be dealing with a governmental crisis seemingly imposed on them when the system would have seemed to have worked (as the final crusade would have worked).

Named are living Icons of their culture, so it's unsurprising that they do end up in positions of leadership. It would seem as foreign meddling to have an external accord banning these people from existing, and trying to drive them out by extinction would just be oil on a fire.

hakureireimu

The people wouldn't go for it.

caoimhinh

You would need to go back all the way to when Catherine first mentioned that she planned to ban Named rulership through the Liesse Accords.

If I recall correctly, that would be Book 5 Chapter 24: Theft.

And even then, that chapter wasn't the only place where commentors debated the subject. I think there were arguments both in favor of it and against it, for reasons in-story and at a meta-level, and that happened across various chapters.

In my case, I argued against it on the basis that such a thing would simply be impossible to implement. While it is true that not all rulers become Named, some people come to Names simply for becoming rulers of their country, rather than being Named who become rulers or acting rulers who later on came to a Name, in countries such as Praes, Name and title are the same thing because that's the culture and/or story attached to that position.

Every single person who gets the throne of Praes gets the Name of Dread Emperor, and Anaxares got the Name of Hierarch shoved down his throat because the leaders of the League of Free Cities elected him as such. Thus, it wouldn't matter that the person who got the Name stepped down the throne, because then they would simply lose their Name and their successor would get it.

To eliminate Named rulers would require vast, in-depth, and drastic changes in the culture and social structure of nations, so that's simply not feasible. To eliminate the Name of Warlord, for example, a massacre of Orcs was required along with the destruction of their cultural heritage.

Also, even assuming that it was signed, it would be highly unlikely that some monarch would abdicate right after obtaining a Name. Odds are it would be related to rulership, and even if not, considering the state of mind of newly Named people as we have seen in the series, it's unlikely a fresh Named would simply let go of it, so they would then disobey the Accords.

Other reasons were provided by other readers, and Amadeus even cited some reasons during his talk with Cat during chapter 57: Hearing that I hadn't read in the comments before.

I remember a few of the points on both sides of the discussion, but it would be hard for me to recall them all, or even to express them as accurately as the original commenters. I think you can find quite a few in chapter 24: Theft, though.

Konstantin von Karstein

As Amadeus said to Cat, a freshly Named Good King or Dread Emperor would never abdicate and instead prepare for war. So each time a new ruler ascend on the throne you would risk a war.

Even worse, the Levantine Blood legitimate its power by descending from Named. Names are the basis for nobility in the Dominion. Tariq was beloved and considered as the voice of Heaven in Creation, the Blood would never accept that close.

Liliet

> Someone is going to use the judgement corpse before things are done.

I high key don't think that follows in any way.

> but I only managed to find posts by the author saying they'd been convinced by commentors, not why.

Wait, what? Where???

I was arguing that there's no way it can work, because as long as Good King is a Role (and it is! it's not going to stop being any time soon, only if there are none matching it for a long time) you're going to have all your good kings get that Name and the only option for them to refuse it is to either stop being king or stop being good, either of which would be super counterproductive – and meanwhile on the side of evil, an up and coming Tyrant isn't going to be stopped by some treaty saying they cannot, they're just going to fight the treaty. Which would quickly destabilize the Liesse Accords to the point of complete disintegration – either of them would on their own, but both together are just absurd.

jworks17

There is precedence for a ruler denying a rule based Name though- Cordelia denied becoming the... Warden of the West I think? She did so because of the obvious blunder that would be, and I think that thinking really is central to the idea behind the Accords.

Why would one Good King or Tyrant destabilize the Accords when the large majority of Named back them? What is one Tyrant when facing dozens of Named, bound by common purpose? The Accords holds inherent value for Heroes and Villains, or so the author has hinted at between the Pilgrim and Black Knight dialogue, and the only Names that would truly be hurt by them are the most extreme of Above and Below and the ruling Names.

Now I don't think the author ever expands on it, but it can be easily inferred why the taking ruler Named out of their Rolls sets the Accords on shaky grounds. If the organization that forms at Cardinal has the ability to unseat rulers, that is a staggering amount of power wielded by Cardinal- they could institute puppet rulers all over the world! Cat has made it clear that she wants the Accords to be a thing that survives her, and what if that power was left in the wrong hands?

I don't think the Accords would destabilize because of Good Kings and Tyrants, I think the Accords would destabilize because of the undeniable power that would give its partitioners over the rest of Calernia. What sovereign nation would allow an organization that can upend the highest seats of power on a whim?

Liliet

> There is precedence for a ruler denying a rule based Name though- Cordelia denied becoming the... Warden of the West

Because Augur worked super hard to give her that pivot. Because a five second shift in timing would have had her accept the Name before Hanno got there, and she wouldn't have gotten a choice at all.

Her circumstances were an exception to the rule.

> Why would one Good King or Tyrant destabilize the Accords when the large majority of Named back them? What is one Tyrant when facing dozens of Named, bound by common purpose?

Named vs armies does not have Named necessarily consistently win. It will, at the very least, CONSISTENTLY DESTABILIZE things.

The problem is that trying to dethrone every sufficiently competent/popular ruler – these are components for a Name! – is the exact opposite of productive.

Javvies

As I understand it, the theory behind prohibiting Named rulers is that as Named, they are inherently going to be drawn into the Above/Below conflicts, and as rulers, they'd end up dragging their country and people with them, escalating their conflicts from a small/tactical scale personal conflict between a Villain and a Hero or band of five to a larger national and strategic one between armies, which is antithetical to the goal of reducing non-Named involvement and losses and collateral damage caused by Named conflicts.

Liliet

But the Liesse Accords are already about reducing/removing that kind of conflict escalation. Cardinal as neutral ground, rules of every side of the continent going to the same school together – what has been happening so far is no guideline for how things will be after. Cat's going for overkill and shooting herself in the foot in the process.

burlindw

The thing about the judgement corpse makes sense to me. I don't think it's been explicitly stated, but in a narrative driven world it makes sense that there would be a concept along the lines of Chekhov's Gun. If an ancient artifact of untold power gets unearthed in the middle of a war; its Role is to be used.

Liliet

Or to be a mcguffin everyone keeps fighting over. By now imho its definitely a mcguffin.

Liliet

More broadly, the Name/Role system as written renders the proposition absurd at its core. Rulership structures form by the same criteria and as a result of the same events as Names and Roles – you can have rulers that are not Named, but they'll be inheriting it from dynasty founders who had been. Procer is an inheritor of a large scattering of tribes that had lived in that part of the continent before Triumphant threw them in a blender, and we know at least about the Lycaonese that they had been ruled by Iron Kings once. Fairfaxes in Callow originated from Eleanor Fairfax, and while we don't know for a fact about Albans, it seems a reasonable guess that again, the original local tribes that later formed a kingdom had been founded around Named rulers. Praes was founded by a Named and subsequently ruled by inheritors of the Role, Levant was founded by Named and – you get the picture. Bellerophon is interesting because its Named founder died before she finished the process of founding, and they ended up following her ideas in an... unexpected direction. The Empire Ever Dark in its current form was shaped by the Sisters.

So far, whenever we learn the origin story of a nation? There's either a Named or all the way to a deity there.

This process won't stop. Whenever there is a serious political perturbation on Calernia, it will end up with a Named leading a nation, because that's what happens – leaders get Names, Named attract followings, it's almost tautological. Accords can survive for longer than a generation if they're set up to accomodate that process, not try to fight it.

Tek

Damn, I wish my existential crisis came with a magical power up in the end.

Or at least, the end.

Sinead

Thinking about the Age of Wonder vs. the Age of Order, do we see the wager settled as an alloy of the two original positions of Above and Below?

-Presume that Above and Below respectively that Creation needs to be guided and ruled over vs left to flourish

– Under the Age of Wonders, you have your heroes struggle against the villains, honing themselves and growing stronger until they triumph. They are guided down a specific path, but still take part in a grand competition. This is Above's system, but have undercurrents of Below's method with growth and cultivation

-The Age of Order is seen as Below's agents building the stable framework to still contain and guide how Named conflicts form, and create a feedback system with the cultures engaged within it.

The Age of Wonders is a reactionary engagement, while the Age of Order is a more deliberate and methodical engagement that (IMO) takes the best that have arisen from the Age of Wonders and trim off the worst. Essentially expand and refine Black's Reforms and Conquest into a continent wide stability that aims to benefit everyone that meaningfully contributes to it.

Sinead

Just want to append to this, but what if Cat's birthday gift to Hanno is a crucial moment of advice/connection that allows him to resolve this current crisis?

Shveiran

I'd file that under "meddling"

Sinead

I would as well in some regards, but I think the spirit of it is different.

I am more looking at it as "Catherine as a person who does value people (why would Hanno's rejection of her in the aftermath of Arsenal hurt so much otherwise), trying to help an acquaintance not self destruct. Something similar to her joining Archer and Concocter for Beastmaster's wake.

Bard used the stress on Christophe as a lever in Arsenal, and possibly with some influence over Hanno during this crisis (see her trying with William in a comparable crisis).

I see an element of Hanno's crisis being the weight of the crown he essentially wears. Having his closest peer give an honest effort of support is to me the opposite of meddling in the traditional sense.

Shveiran

I may have been unclear: I'm sure Catherine can interact with the process in a way that actively tries to help Hanno solves the crisis.

Pilgrim just asked her NOT TO, because what Hanno needs is to find an Heroic solution to a Name problem, and

Catherine is very unlikely to provide that however well-meaning she is: her philosophy is a different one, so she is much more likely to nudge him toward an answer that makes him lose his Name without finding one.

See Vivienne: I'd say that she grew as a result of Catherine's interacting with her morality, but she fell outside her Name and did not earn a new, heroic one. Because, well, she isn't one herself. She is a Villainess. If she persuades you to see things her way, even if she means well, you may no longer fit the heroic grove because what she convinced you of doesn't, and if the question was at the core of your Name, well...

Sinead

Ok, that's fair. I was looking at it more from an extension of faith, as Cat had her epiphany of looking at the Red Axe trial through the lens of spheres of influence, and getting a better picture of what his perspective is. Combined with Bard's comment on festering wounds with regards to roles (regarding mirror knight yes, but could be extended to others), I could see an honest "set aside the hats and sit down and talk" as just a good thing to do.

Then again, I also don't believe crisis of faith should be entirely internal like this either, so that's part of my bias as well.

caoimhinh

On an interesting and perhaps related event, Book 3 was the last one where we saw Heroic Interludes and Villainous Interludes.

Book 4 started with the Tenth Crusade, which was a bullshit and political thing moved by various factors (and the participants went there for a plethora of REALLY wrong reasons) that muddled the line between what was right and wrong. There was no longer any Interlude marked as Heroic or Villainous, just Interludes.

That was the beginning of the period where Good wasn't good and Evil wasn't evil, as the Crusaders were invading Callow full of hypocrisy and the wicked Arch-Heretic of the East was simply defending her homeland while calling for peace at every chance she got.

So one could argue and say that the Crusade was the start of the "alloying" and that's shown on a Meta-level.

dadycool

Wow, I hadn't realized that. With your comment about the Crusade, I feel like Cat was basically saying throughout the book "Stop! Please stop! I'm begging you, don't make me escalate this! Why are you denying me? I'll have to find an even worse ally! Well, I guess I'll have to go over your head and get a Smackdown Hammer from the one being that has a good track record against these 'Crusades'. Oh gods, he's going to rip them in half. Uh,...I'm gonna have to find the most bizarre, off-the-wall allies I can find to have ANY weight to throw around. Time to look down. Yay, I can finally look down on people!"

Liliet

Note: there were non-heroic non-villainous interludes starting from Book 2, namely those from Catherine's camp.

Liliet

> guided and ruled over vs left to flourish

it's guided vs ruled over actually guided by above's rules vs ruled over by mortals who make up their own rules and compete for it

Sinead

That's what I get for paraphrasing a bit I last read several months ago.

I think the general principal still stands. I'm of the opinion that some of the general philosophies espoused by Above and Below (Above's objective virtues to live up to vs Below's brutal trial and error approach) can be held when we cannot hold the full objective truth (in general, "what is the right thing to do?" can be an impossible question. Within the guide, those revelations warp many that see them. Use of the mortal instruments to approximate objective virtues is the best we can do.) Within the context of the Guide, I think that can be one of the long term effects of reforms such as what Black championed in Callow. This isn't to say that Black is actually a saint, but that even a pragmatic approach aiming for long term widespread stability and prosperity across social strata will tend to Above over time.

Liliet

Oh Black is 100% Above's kid stolen away by the fact his homeland worships Below, it's adorable how much of a hero he is while being staunchly loyal to the opposite side. A classic story, actually.

Sinead

That is true. It's more that given the atrocities on his record, I am always wary to drop the label of "Good" on him for fear of it being taken out of context.

Liliet

Eh, I feel like Tariq the Plaguebringer has really opened the door there.

But yeah I know what you mean ._.

Sinead

I think the difference between my reluctance with the two is really a personal background baggage issue. Amadeus brings the image of an imperialist army that crushes all dissent in it's path, and a more systemic issue that gets it's hooks in and holds on. His approach at the systemic level, while highly effective creates a system that handles people as so many numbers. The flip side of this could be a great thing, by I reckon that that form is mostly found in what Cat is trying to develop with the Accords. I would classify Amadeus as "Great and Terrible" in all senses of the word.

Tariq is a weary prophet (The impression I have is that while Mercy doesn't bring options to him, they do allow him to properly assess the utility of his decisions. This isn't perfect, since I think Cat being hidden from angelic sight like a domain hindered his ability to do an assessment at Prince's Graveyard). Throw him in the situation where he is handling a counter Crusade aiming to undercut the Grand Alliance through it's stomach (chevauchées are brutal), which would likely just keep going if Amadeus was the only one to disappear. I suspect if he only targeted the Legions with the plague (while they were between towns), he wouldn't have had the same guarantees that it wouldn't have broken out of hand. Black is brutal enough that he probably would have just used the plague as another weapon against Procer, and Below would probably demand it's due.

Tariq is equally Great and Terrible in all senses of the word

I love both these characters so very much.

To be honest, I liked pretty much every character in this story.

Liliet

I can see what you mean wrt him being an Imperialist but he's too much of an SJW for me to really feel that tbh and yeah same!!! i know right??? the only character i dont particularly personally care about is Neshamah. The Dead King is the least interesting character! And he's more interesting than some of the most interesting characters in some books I like.

Great and Terrible indeed. Amadeus is all the sayings about "fear the wrath of a gentle man", "be afraid when a good man is pointing a gun at you", "nothing's as scary as a man convinced he's doing what's right" etc. Well-Intentioned Extremist and so on and so forth.

I love him more than Tariq because my favorite fictional character trait is competence, and Tariq is. Not.

Sinead

I am not sure if I see what your perspectives are as to Tariq being incompetent is. I read him as being an old hero of the Age of Wonders that is difficult to switch when faced with an opponent with a system that has grown and refined itself over 40 years to deal with metaphysical threats that he represents to it's goals, while he aimed to nip those issues in the bud. The difference between an ember and a bonfire.

Unless your issues are with the extra chapters? I guess my thing with those is that I am not sure some of those tell the story that was intended (thinking of the time skip with his nephew where I feel that not enough key details were used to emphasise that Tariq tried to convince him.)

Liliet

My issues are with Tariq's incredible naivete and blindness when it comes to how other people think. Behold, an Aspect that lets him see into other people's hearts, only manages to boost him to like, average normal person levels. Not even average normal wise old person levels, just average normal person.

Did you notice how his bringing up information Cat considered unsettling for him to know was completely mistimed, misaimed and had the opposite effect on the conversation from what he intended?

Tariq is good at three (3) things – healing, storyweaving and manipulating Light. And that's pretty nice to have in a story, too, but he's not really... smart.

beleester

I don't think Amadeus believes he's doing the right thing, so much as he believes he's doing what's necessary for his side (which is not the right side, it's the Dread friggin' Empire) to win.

Amadeus, especially in the early books, talks a lot about how the "game" is rigged. How heroes get unfair advantages in the form of providence, sudden divine intervention, heroic second winds, last-minute rescues, and so on, while villains don't get anything without having to pry it out of someone's cold dead hands. His motivation for trying to get a lasting victory for Praes is basically spite – he wants to show that he can win even with the heavens stacking the deck as hard as they can against him.

And yes, he can be gentle and even good in an "enlightened self-interest" sort of way, but that's not really his "heroic motivation." It's not what makes him terrifying. He's never thinking "I'm doing this for my friends" or "I'm doing this for the greater good" when he's trying to find strength. If anything it's the opposite – when the Calamities are hurt, he shows cracks and starts to turn away from his plans. Amadeus is happiest when he's outplanned the heroes and totally rubbing it in their face.

Liliet

> for his side (which is not the right side, it's the Dread friggin' Empire) to win.

The problem is, his definition of "winning" is "ensuring better standard of life for the commoners".

Juff

Typo Thread:

verisimilitude (i don't think this is the right word. versatility?)

certainlyis (missing space)
Masego look > Masego looked of broken remnant > of a broken remnant Most our finest > Most of our finest himself, no (either add "and" or change to 😊 time, he (like above, "so" or 😊 kept his piece > kept his peace (it's "say your piece" and "hold your peace", and imo this is closer to the latter) your repay > you repay address it > addressing it
This not > This is not participation to > participation in was' the > was 'the
that the while > that while as a Cordelia's > as Cordelia's become problem > become a problem Order is it Evil > Order it is Evil meddling something > meddling

Ceaseless Watcher, turn your gaze upon this wretched thing.

Juff

uh, the faces are supposed to be semi colons

ohJohN

I think it works – Masego is talking about Tariq changing the properties of Light, so I took it to mean "he did a surprisingly good job of mimicking some mundane phenomenon with Light." With the preceding paragraph talking about the smell of burning ghoul, presumably that phenomenon was fire. Maybe the implication is that, while most wielders can burn with Light, Tariq has gone a step further and essentially transmuted it into fire?

sengachi

Grey Pilgrim is just such a wise and intelligent character. It's always fascinating listening to him talk. Especially when his thoughts and designs are just a little skew to our PoV perspective or the audience perspective, but still close enough to make sense.

mamm0nn

So, in between the Barrow Sword, the Troubadour and one of the various other intelligent and cunning Villains, who will be the one that Pilgrim should've really gone to and tell them not to meddle? My money is on the Barrow Sword, for he has met Hanno and the Troubadour is still too undefined and unseen to be a villain this relevant. If we see more of him in the chapters to come I'll take back and change that statement.

caoimhinh

To be fair, the Barrow Sword is nowhere near Tariq right now. That guy is with Hanno in the Iron Prince's army.

Cat is likely to have more influence on Hanno than Ishaq, and also more likely to listen to reasonable petitions.

Zach

I doubt the Barrow Sword could manipulate Hanno. Barrow Sword strikes me as a relatively "immature" villain who isn't exactly a skilled manipulator, and we saw Troubadour getting manipulated by Catherine a while back during the villain meeting.

There aren't really many villains on Hanno's level involved in this war beyond the Woe.

mamm0nn

Much as she may still underestimate herself, despite not being completely oblivious to her power, saying that Cat can manipulate or fool you doesn't make you a chump. She's been walking circles around Pilgrim too and he certainly isn't easy to fool.

And we've seen Barrow Sword being more cunning than he lets on in the Villain Interlude.

Insanenoodlyguy

Troubadour is the wrong kind of meddler. You don't need to tell him to back off, because if anything, he'll increase the chances of this going well. He's the kind of villain who is about to succeed, but then says just the wrong thing, or the right thing but the wrong way, and Hanno reflects on something or remembers something and comes out of this better than ever. Cat would know when to shut up and let a breakdown happen, and is thus far more dangerous.

mamm0nn

True. I never said that either of them would succeed or fail, just that they are more likely targets to meddle.

Then again, would Pilgrim with his Hero mindset really care about the political and the Truce and Terms issues of thinking about the Villain that tries to meddle with Hanno's crisis as a convenient sacrifice to be struck down once they reach that part of the story? For all that the heroes might be just, especially the ones like Pilgrim can see Villains as sacrifices rather than people in that context.

Insanenoodlyguy

More likely to meddle, far less likely to succeed. Cat might actually do it instead of helping it along.

Crowley

Typo thread below, feel free to add.

certainlyis-> certainly is not forgot-> not forgotten the worse we'd had-> the worst we'd had
And worse than worse was that-> worse than that Most our-> Most of our let your repay-> let you repay your Woe love each other-> you Woe love each other that the while Hanno->that while Hanno
as a Cordelia's->as Cordelia's

ninegardens

Heyyyy Tariq. Good job.
Good I love that wizened old bastard. Great advice, respectfully given, and reasonably taken... and just as Hanno was a fool for ignoring Cat's advice on matter's of Villiany, Cat would have to be very foolish indeed not to heed GP's advice here (which, I will note, she isn't).

Javvies

We should have expected Tariq to notice Hanno's crisis and for him to want to keep Cat from interfering.
Even though Tariq ought to realize that Cat doesn't want Hanno to fail on her and is skilled enough with Story-fu to know that her trying to adjust Hanno's path would almost certainly backfire horribly.
Tariq is, after all, a longstanding Heroic Mentor figure.

I'm far more worried about Bard somehow finding out and interfering. Any more than she already has, just by setting into motion the various chains of events that contributed to Hanno's current state.

Xinci

Bit strange for Masego to talk about faith like that after he got understanding of it as a metaphysical concept from studying souls. Though I suppose that could be what he meant when he said it wasn't any different from any other delusion, Just bindings and tricks of perspective, I suppose.

Salt

Well, the last few chapter titles kind of spoil the theme here.

Theism/Ietism/Dynamism are basically (less commonly well known) specific subsets of the good old monism vs dualism argument, and the chapter titles roughly correlate to the belief of a specific character in each chapter.

Theism and ietsism are arguably types of dualism in the sense of believing in an unexplainable transcendent reality, although the latter doesn't believe in a specific deity so much as leaving the nature of said non-mundane reality open till possibility.

Dynamism technically has multiple meanings depending on context, but typically is talking about monistic belief systems that boil everything (from physical matter to phenomena of the mind) to forces and the ability of all aspects of reality to be acted upon by forces.

Realistically I think it's just the author subtly-not-so-subtly commenting on some of the core differences in belief systems between characters like Hanno/Pilgrim and Hierophant, specifically regarding how they see and understand metaphysical concepts like "faith".

Not sure if ietsism vs dynamism is a better fit than classic dualism vs physicalism, but it's fairly similar either way regardless.

Daniel E

So here's something to stew on; Perhaps Hanno's issue is actually the Hierarch's death sentence coming to pass in some form. The Choir is still there of course, but some fundamental aspect of them has changed due to being sentenced to death with an Aspect.

agesbe

I feel like that would cheapen the issue he's having, which is well spelled out in this chapter and supported by the interlude we saw from his perspective.

Frivolous

I've been reading older chapters.

1. Tariq is speaking from experience when he talks about crises of faith. He had his own in Peregrine III and IV. The Choir of Mercy stopped talking to him when he killed his brother Bakri out of anger and resumed talking to him when he killed his nephew Izil to reduce suffering.

I wouldn't be surprised if it was Tariq himself who wrote the Two Hundred Heroic Axioms.

2. I've been collecting chapters wherein Cat's new Name surfaced, even briefly, and the context for those events.

a. Convenience – when commiserating with Cordelia over the burdens of queenship. No Named involved.

b. Joust – single combat against the Revenant Aubrey Caen, once Knight Errant. Catherine felt more athletic and was able to predict the Revenant's moves.

quote – It was not a knight I was becoming, I thought. My old friend had not come out for the fight, but for what it stood for: me, standing in judgement over others. Delivering it sword in hand. And it had earned weight, that the Knight Errant had once been Named.

c. Zwischenschach – Cat uses Speaking to command Silver Huntress.

I wonder how many more such we'll see before Cat's Name surfaces for real.

beleester

Book 5 epilogue: Catherine says that if Praes causes trouble for the war effort, she will "get the east in order the hard way."

Frivolous

Yeah; I should have included that one. That was the spark that started her Name burning again. First cause, you could say.

Thanks, beleester.

Mental Mouse

> "But at the moment, perhaps a reminder that a certain moderation of words is in order would not go amiss," Tariq gently suggested.

Funny how he calls that on Masego, and then promptly starts chatting about Vivienne in such unsettling terms...

Chapter 64: Candidate Moves

"To rule is to drag a lion by the whisker."

– Helikean saying

Truth was, even now Masego hadn't found a way to genuinely break the rituals that the Dead King used to prevent scrying in the territories he held. For two years the Arsenal had tried, after we made it clear to some of the finest magical minds of Calernia that regaining that capacity would be militarily invaluable, but no working counter-ritual had come of it. We had brought together exceptional people, but our enemy was more than just that: he was the Hidden Horror, the exception itself. So Hierophant, for all that he'd suffered a god riding his mind for most of a year and studied the wards at Lyonceau – where the Tyrant had borrowed from the Dead King's work, among other things – had not been able to overturn the weight of the millennia's bearing down on us. Zeze was brilliant, but there were some things beyond brilliance.

So Hierophant had stolen a mystery from an entity that could win.

The clouds in the sky spun like a whirlpool, swallowed by the great eye that our ritual had opened high above. Even for me, the empty howling void was an unsettling sight. Sorcery burned loud and bright, the stone pillars we'd driven into the ground buzzing like hornets as they fought the enchantments that blanketed most of Hainaut and suppressed scrying. Hurrying, I limped my way down the rocky slope towards a box of burnished bronze and electrum that stood taller than me. Nestled against the hill, anchored with enchantments so it would not move so much as a hair's breadth, the arcane patterns of electrum on the sides were now glimmering with eerie light. The bronze was warm enough that I could feel the heat just from passing my hand close, and it would only get warmer.

The front of the box was the most complex part of it: a harsh, labyrinthine electrum pattern that usually closed together like a puzzle box but had now been carefully pried open. Slender gaps had been bared in the pattern by the manipulations, their rims covered with small bronze-inscribed runes, and through them I glimpsed that within the box there was a cube of pure white marble. Without my noticing it Roland had returned from his work on the hill to our east, and now stood by Masego's side close to the box. The sight was almost amusing, Hierophant being at least a head taller for all that the Rogue Sorcerer's longcoat and layers made him seem larger, but the intent focus both displayed had me reluctant to disturb them with even a snort.

"Roland?" Masego asked, burning eyes on the box.

"Almost there," the Rogue Sorcerer replied, his own gaze on a slender baton of obsidian in his hands where I glimpsed a few burning marks. "Five, four, three, two–"

As soon as the Proceran mage got to three Hierophant raised his arm, wresting sorcery from a small cube he held in his fist, and a circle of golden runes flared around his fingers.

"Discharge," Masego warned.

Sorcery pulled towards us for half a heartbeat, as if the currents had reversed, and the flow was sucked into the box where I saw terrible fires bloom before the moment passed and the eye in the sky screamed anew. To the west of us, a hill blew up in a thundering rain of rock and mud.

"Our bleed margin is much too high," Roland said. "We won't make it to four instances."

"Three will be enough," Hierophant replied, leaning over the box.

With his bare hands – he'd known fires hotter than this, and even now their reflection burned in his eyes – he began to manipulate the top of the box, extracting what looked like a large gear before turning it briskly. Within the box, the marble cube turned to match and presented a fresh and unmarred face to the open gaps. The gear was pushed back down after adjustment, and within twenty heartbeats another discharge followed. The hill to the east of us blew up, but I had closer perils to worry about: the stone pillars anchored on this hill were vibrating so quickly and intensely it seemed only a matter of time before they shattered.

"Masego," I asked, shouting over the din. "How safe are we on the hill?"

He turned towards me, offering a boyish grin.

"Not at all!" he shouted back, and raised his arm.

A fresh cube held in his fist, golden runes formed in a circle as Roland protested with a shout that the build-up was not yet done.

"Discharge," Hierophant cackled.

Cackling wasn't usually a good sign, in my experience, so I wrapped myself up in Night the moment before the sorcery could be pulled in. The magic blew in, pillars popping as it passed them – ah, they'd somehow been built so the shards would go up instead of all around – and hammered into the cage. Some bits of stone fell on my Night-cloak, but nothing I couldn't handle so I risked a glance at Roland. Whose obsidian baton was cracking, the burning runes on it going wild.

"Oh merde," I heard him curse, throwing away the baton.

It blew up in a great gout of flame maybe three feet above his head, liquid drops of obsidian hissing against mud and stone as they were sprinkled everywhere. Masego, though, ignored it all.

He was trying to vent the contents of the box, where the fires had somehow gotten caught. He opened fresh gaps on two sides before the glimmer of the electrum patterns turned into a glare. The tall mage finally stepped back.

"It's done?" I called out.

"In a manner of speaking," Zeze calmly noted, continuing to move away. "I would recommend taking cover, Catherine."

"You little-" I began, throwing myself behind a jutting stone just in time for a great crunching sound to resound.

Oh dear. That had sounded like the box crumpling inwards. Then there were a pulse of flame and metal shrapnel as the box blew up while I hid under my cloak. I waited ten full heartbeats before popping out for a look, and I saw with a dry swallow that the explosion had outright melted the top of the hill. The Grey Pilgrim had gotten off first, right? That was, uh, going to be tricky to explain to the Dominion otherwise.

"Anybody dead?" Roland called out, popping out from behind his own rock.

"A pointless question. It would require necromancy before-" Masego replied.

"I think everyone's fine," I interrupted before he could really get started. "Did it work?"

"Of course it worked," Hierophant said, sounding offended. "Who do you take me for?"

"Ask me that question again when I don't have melted rock all over my nice cloak," I grunted. "You're not fishing for a nice answer otherwise."

I broke cover, brushing myself off, and the three of us came to look at the results. The marble cube was seared on three sides, but it'd not just been fire thrown at rock. It'd been a sculpture, in a sense: the central valley of Hainaut and some of the outskirts, as seen from the sky. Each of the three facets had captured that sight for the blink of that great eye above and seen it seared onto the marble. There were imprecisions, of course. The Dead King's rituals had muddled it up some. But that was the entire point of having several discharges, as there'd be very few places on our 'map' where the imprecisions had taken all three times.

"So this is what the world looks like through a Choir's eyes," I said.

"Not exactly," Roland told me. "Think of angels as seeing the world through a lens. What you can witness seared here is what we mortals would see when looking through that same lens."

"Humans don't have the parts necessary to observe Creation as a Choir would," Masego absent-mindedly noted. "Even soul scaffolding wouldn't be sufficient, it would require complete essence reconstruction. As Duchess of Moonless Nights we would have been able to replace the marble with your mind and allow you to look directly, as the damage would have repaired itself, but as you currently are you would not survive the experience."

I still remembered how much of a pain just stealing Ashkaran from echoes in Arcadia had been, so I suspected that he was downplaying the difficulties involved when he simply called it 'damage'.

"Good to know," I muttered. "I believe we can work with this, Masego. We'll need magnifying glass for some of the details, but I can already make out the bare bones."

Such as they were, which was pretty worrying. I limped back and forth between the facets, narrowing my eyes at what I saw. If I correctly understood where we were, then at the moment we were... north-west of what had to be the Iron Prince's army. Unfortunately, that put us in the wrong place. Ahead of the Prince Klaus' column was a large force of undead, but not so large he shouldn't be able to defeat it on the field. Behind it, though, was what had to be the missing Luciennerie army. By the looks of it it'd divided into three smaller forces: one was headed south towards the Cigelin Sisters, but the other two columns were marching straight towards where the Iron Prince was going to have to give battle.

That put them square to the south of us, and went some way in explaining why this part of Hainaut was swarming with warbands. Worse, it looked like my allies had left part of their forces behind: to the west of Juvelun there was something that looked like a camp. Hard to tell numbers without using something to magnify the details, though, which could wait until we'd gotten back to camp. I straightened, casting one last lingering look at the marble. For all that what I'd learned had not exactly good news, that I knew it at all was a great coup. If we'd gone about this blindly, the damage could have been... significant.

"Good work," I said. "Both you."

"It was," Masego replied, clearly pleased I agreed with his own assessment.

"The Pilgrim and the Artificer will handle wiping all trace of what we did here with Light," I said. "As for us, though, we're done here. Let's load up our rock on a cart and head back."

"I'll be glad to," Roland admitted, casting a wary look at the mire. "I suspect we're about to have a great deal more company."

"Ain't that always the way, with us?" I snorted. "It's all about staying that one step ahead, Roland."

Well, that or you died.

—

Adjutant had transcribed seared stone into what looked like a halfway decent overview of central Hainaut in less than an hour with only one hand to use. A useful reminder that, even when crippled in a wheelchair Hakram could do the work of several people in a fraction of the time it would have taken them with objectively superior results. Masego was making noises that the prosthetics would soon be sufficiently attuned to the orc's body for surgery, so he might even be out of that chair soon – though he'd have to learn to walk all over again, and likely keep using crutches for months. I'd used the span of time where he worked to have a wash in the river we'd camped near in the Twilight Ways, so it was feeling quite refreshed that I returned to my tent.

Our venture of the morning had been rather productive, but now that we had the bird's eye view of this campaign it was time to decide exactly how we were going to fight it. My initial notion had been to lay an ambush for the Luciennerie army, but I wasn't sure how viable that would really be at the moment. I had a bottle of wine opened and sent for what was definitely not a war council: Indrani, Masego and Akua. Hakram was already at my side so there was hardly a need for an engraved invitation there. I rather wished Vivienne could have been there, as it'd been too long since all of the Woe had gathered, but she had duties of her own.

Besides, without wanting to sound grim would have been gambling on my part to have my successor and I in the same theatre of war.

"You know, when I blow up mud hills I don't get commended," Indrani complained the moment she drifted in. "It's all 'that was valuable ammunition, Archer', or 'stop using our trebuchets outside battles'."

"Your point?" I asked, cocking an eyebrow.

She slid into a seat on the other side of the table, Akua and Masego following her into the tent with long strides, speaking in Mthethwa – something about 'complexity returns', whatever those were – and settling further down, Zeze taking the place at Indrani's side as if it were his natural one. I hid a smile.

"It's favoritism, is my point," Indrani said, jabbing an accusing finger at me.

"You're right," I admitted.

The surprise on her face was quite delightful.

"I do like him better than you," I breezily added.

She gasped in half-genuine offence.

"Hakram, jot that down," I mused. "We can look into having it made a royal decree."

I didn't go quite as far as jokingly offer Masego to blow up any hill he liked, because I was worried he might actually take me up on that offer. And, like, I did have a lot of hills in my demesne in Marchford but they weren't exactly a renewable resource so while I wasn't outright saying 'never blow up my hills' I'd at least want a reason first. I felt like that was a justifiable stance to take, all things considered.

"I'll see about having the list ranking us in the order you like most made official," Hakram idly said.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"She doesn't have that," Indrani said, narrowing her eyes at me.

"Of course I don't, number si- I mean, Indrani," I replied with a smile.

I winked, botching it just because I knew it being half-assed would piss her off even more.

"Come on," Archer complained. "There's no way I'm last."

"That you think that is why you are, my dear," Akua gently smiled.

I did admire how genuinely benign she could look while purposefully turning the knife in the wound, it was pretty impressive,

"That sounds very useful," Masego said, sounding approving.

"Could I have a transcript, along with the criteria for ranking?"

"I'll think about," I lied.

Adjutant cleared his throat, a call to order before this ended up into a pleasant waste of several hours. Archer avenged herself on me by pouring herself a cup of wine and filling it up to the rim, like a savage, while Akua considered me with golden eyes. A dress in red and white today, which while unable to decide whether it was a ballroom gown or a tabard remained quite flattering no matter the attached interpretation.

"I heard through the grapevine that your adventure back on Creation was a success," Akua said.

"Heh," Archer snickered, elbowing Zeze. "She called you a plant."

"It was a metaphor," he revealed to her. "... I think. I don't believe even Wolof ever got the spell to work for a living person."

"They haven't," Akua assured him. "Corpses only. Am I to take it, then, that this is to be a council of strategy?"

It was a rhetorical question, we both knew, but one that'd push us into the meat of this meeting. She did like to provide these helpful light touches, though when Hakram was there she was much more careful about their use – I got the feeling she was being exceedingly careful about never stepping on his toes. Likely she figured that trying to step into the position of my right hand was a fool's errand, which to be frank it was. Akua was a lot of things, many of which were technically curses, but socially blind wasn't one of them.

"We have a bit of trouble," I said. "The Iron Prince is a long way from shore, and the tide's getting rowdy."

"Have even ever been on a boat?" Indrani skeptically asked.

"A fishing boat, yes," I smugly replied.

Only when it'd been docked and to get handsy with a boy, but she didn't need to know that.

"By custom she's also high admiral of Callow unless the title is otherwise assigned," Hakram noted. "Which makes her the finest sailor of all assembled here by far."

"I've helmed sailing ships on the Wasaliti at least twice a summer ever since I was-" Akua began, tone irritated, then her face blanked and cleared her throat. "Yet I believe there will be no ships involved here beyond the metaphorical, so-"

I met Indrani's eyes across the table, sharing triumphant grins. It was always a rare treat to bait out of her a genuine reaction. Back when we'd started she'd often fake those to fit in better, but these days when she tried we could usually tell.

"Why are we here, then?" Masego asked me, cutting through Akua's verbal retreat. "Most of us don't have military training, or at least not military officer training. Would you not be served better by a war council of your highest commanders?"

"I already know what needs to be done," I honestly said. "Might have to move the numbers around a bit, but there's not a lot of room for manoeuver when it comes down to it."

I leaned forward over the 'map' Hakram had put together from the seared stone, tapping a finger on the representation of Klaus Papenheim's army. The part of it on the march, at least.

"We need to reinforce those as they give battle to the undead ahead of them," I said.

"No need to explain this for my benefit," Masego frankly said. "I will only pretend to listen to regardless."

Well, at least he was being honest about it.

"I want to know," Indrani piously said. "Because I care about you, and I'm a good friend."

"A valiant effort, number six," Akua murmured. "If stunningly transparent."

"That's rich coming from you, Shifty Spectre," Archer muttered back. "I bet if I shone Light at you it'd go straight through."

"Since Indrani requests it, a quick summary," I said.

I glanced at Hakram, who kicked Zeze under the table. Good man.

"This," I said, as I put down my finger on the Iron Prince's army, "is the other Grand Alliance army in Hainaut. We want to save it, because if we don't we're fucked for the year – if not for much longer than that."

I moved my finger slightly west on the map, maybe a day's march away from Klaus' army.

"This is an undead force, which has to be at least twenty thousand and probably more," I said. "The Iron Prince is marching on it, and will probably beat it in an open battle, but it represents a trap."

I moved even further west, still at the same height. There three forces could be made out, but I ignored the one headed south towards the Cigelin Sisters. That one was General Abigail's problem, or if she got lucky her prey: should the Sisters fall before those reinforcements arrive, Abigail of Summerholm would be in a very good position to simply smash that army when it arrived before her. It was always pleasant to be reminded that, for all his advantages over us, the Dead King had limits to his sight as well.

"This is an army that used to be far to the west, in Luciennerie, but marched east to surprise us here in the valley," I said. "It's large, at least a hundred thousand, and odds are it's going to hit the Iron Prince's army just the day after it fought a battle against the undead force I mentioned previously. That would be bad."

Not only had the Prince of Hannover left part of his army behind, which meant he'd be understrength – I was guessing casualties had been rough taking Juvelun so he'd been forced to leave behind troops to protect a large amount of wounded – but the dead would strike after our very mortal enemy had finished fighting another battle, with all the casualties and exhaustion that involved. No, if the Luciennerie columns actually reached Prince Klaus' army then it would be a disaster.

"We are here, more or less," I finished, pointing to a spot on the map.

Northwest of the Iron Prince and the undead he would soon fight, north of the Luciennerie columns. I'd hoped the Twilight Ways would allow us to steal the march on those, but the Dead King hadn't kept a sedate pace. Splitting into several columns would weaken him against an ambush, but it had also allowed the large army to march quicker. When you had the kind of numbers Keter could boast of, often timing was more important than formations.

"That does not seem like the right place to be," Masego assessed. "We should perhaps move towards the Iron Prince, who we are meant to save."

A conclusion I'd not dragged him towards, though I had perhaps gently taken him by the hand and walked him there.

"Which we'll do," I said. "But it can't be only that. If we just reinforce Prince Klaus with all we have, the advancing columns will hit us not long afterwards. That's not a battle I want to give, not right now."

If we got there in time to reinforce our allies, which it was a coin toss we would, then we'd have numbers on our side for the first battle. We'd still take losses, though, and tire our men. Then for the battle that followed we wouldn't have the numbers, and we'd have all the damage done by our first fight weighing us down. I honestly believed we'd be able to win that battle too, but the costs would be hard to bear. We'd want to have that fight when we were prepared and well-rested, not buried in blood and dust. As it happened I knew exactly where I wanted to fight that decisive battle: the city of Hainaut, the very capital of the principality.

Which meant I had to prevent the Luciennerie columns from reaching that battlefield, and there honestly weren't twenty ways to do that.

"Which is why-"

"I see," Masego sagely nodded.

I paused. Was he just going to say that at regular intervals in the hope I'd figure that meant he was listening? I glanced at Archer, who offered me winsome smile. Ugh. She hadn't been listening either, had she? Gods, those two had gotten even worse now that they were together. It was like they'd crossbred their character flaws into one single great malevolent chimera.

"Hakram," I sighed.

Masego yelped as he was kicked under the table, and though Indrani smiled mockingly and tried to move back her chair she found that shadows had mysteriously kept it stuck where it was. She glared at Akua.

"Praesi treache- ow, Hakram that was my knee you prick!"

"I've no idea what you could possibly mean, darling," Akua smiled, sipping at a wine glass she'd never poured.

"Which is why we will be fighting a holding action against the enemy columns," I said, "while the majority of our army reinforces Prince Klaus. At the moment, I'm inclined to field only the Order and the Second Army. We'll take a few Named as well, but once more the majority will be headed towards the Iron Prince."

"Ah," Masego frowned, "I must have missed something. Or is the plan truly to fight the largest enemy army with the small force you mentioned, while the rest all gathers to fight together a smaller army that the Prince of Hannover could likely beat alone?"

"No," I mused, "that's a fairly apt summation actually."

He frowned further.

"How many bottles have you had?" Zeze severely asked.

Indrani cackled in laughter, while even Hakram cracked a smile. Only loyal – treacherous – reliable – well, relatively speaking – Akua did not descend into opportunistic mockery.

"We slow the enemy by a day, perhaps two, and then retreat as the Prince of Hannover will during the time we bought him," she noted. "It seems achievable. Where is it that you intend to make our stand afterwards, Catherine?"

I tapped a finger on the capital, meeting her eyes.

"Bold," Akua noted.

"Symbolic," I said. "And, aside from that kind of consideration, it's finest set of fortifications in the valley. Our best bet by far."

Abigail would have the Cigelin Sisters secured by then, taking the pressure off of our defensive line, and from behind city walls we'd be able to supply ourselves through the Twilight Ways. If not necessarily for long, given the difficulties of feeding so many people by convoys. Neshamah was after our extermination, so he'd come for us in Hainaut sure as dawn – he might not ever again get this good an opportunity to wipe out our full forces in this front. The great army that'd chased after Prince Klaus from Malmedit would be drawn into this as well, and at the capital of the fallen principality we would roll the dice on the outcome of this campaign.

"It's a delaying action we'll be fighting, Zeze," I added for his sake. "The objective here isn't to win the battle, it's to slow down the enemy while losing as few people as possible and making it away safely."

"I see," Masego said, and I narrowed my eyes.

It seemed like he meant it this time, though, so I let it go.

"I am still unsure why you gathered us here," he then admitted.

"'cause we're all going to be with her in that scrap," Indrani casually said. "So she wants to hear us first. What we need, which Named we want to keep. That about right?"

"It is," I said. "I've an idea or two to slow down the enemy while avoiding a bloody fight, but I'll be relying on all of you. I'll likely be on the field, which means Hakram will be holding command over our Named in my absence while General Hune and Grandmaster Talbot will handle the manoeuvring."

"How many Named do we get to keep?" Indrani asked.

"Four, five tops," I said. "Aside from the people here, of course."

"Then we should bring the Blessed Artificer," Archer bluntly said. "I know she's not exactly the favourite of anyone at this table, but-"

"Large-scale workings, even in something as limited as Light, will be of great use," Masego calmly interrupted. "I agree. I would request the Summoner, myself. His branch of sorcery is highly flexible, and unlike Roland there would be no complications in wresting his magic for use of my own should there be need."

Why was it that the most useful Named so often ended up being the most unpleasant ones? Still, just because I personally disliked both people mentioned did not mean they'd not been brought up for good reasons. The Summoner, in particular, was someone I'd been inclined to bring in. While tiresome he wasn't too difficult to handle, he really was just that damned useful to have around.

"Who will be leading the Named reinforcing Prince Klaus?" Akua asked.

"Unless one of you requests him, it will be Roland," I said.

The shade cocked her head to the side.

"Not the Grey Pilgrim," she observed.

"I have a use for him, as it happens," I smiled. "Unless one of you objects?"

None did. I doubted Tariq would be hard to talk into it, if he needed to be convinced at all. This sort of stand was right up his alley, and while the Forsworn Healer brought similar strength in healing – superior when it came to groups actually – to the table, there were few Named who could boast of sharper bite than the Peregrine. That made three down, so we still had room for some. I glanced at Hakram.

"I would keep the Apprentice," Adjutant gravelled. "She has been of use, and I have a particular idea in mind."

That had a promising ring to it. Both this talk of idea and Hakram no longer talking of having the young girl along through his teeth.

"Do you now?" I muttered. "Done, then. I'll look forward to it."

My eyes moved to Akua, who had laid her chin on her palm and seemed deep in thought. She worked differently than I did, I'd noticed, when it came to laying schemes. I preferred to have someone to speak with, as I'd found that the back-and-forth and other set of eyes usually helped me find angles, but silence was her own way. I sometimes wondered how much of that had been that, as a girl, there simply would have been no one she could afford to trust with her thoughts.

"I take it you do not have a precise role in mind for me already?" Akua asked.

"No," I said. "I expect I'll be moving between places putting out fires, and I had a thought you might be the solution to my inability to be in two places at once, but that's not set in stone. If you have a proposal, I'm all ears."

"Very forward," Indrani said, not disapprovingly.

I ignored her.

"I have a notion, perhaps," the shade mused. "It have been considering the nature of our enemy, and how best it might be struck at."

"So you have someone in mind," I said.

"I do," Akua Sahelian smiled. "I've a use for the Rapacious Troubadour, my heart."

I blinked. That, uh, had not been the name – Name – I was expecting. But that actually made it easier to claim five Named, since neither the Apprentice nor the Troubadour were considered major battlefield assets. Mind you, if the Doom of Liesse has a use for a singer I doubt it'll be because she has a hankering for a tune, I thought.

"You have him, then," I said. "Which makes five."

We had our roster, our plan and our enemy. There'd be a war council later to hammer all the details together, but as far as I was concerned the essentials were settled.

And just like that, to war we went.

Djinn O'Cide

Just for the record, in any number of older books on chess, the process of deciding what move you should make consists of considering some number of "candidate moves", analyzing each of them in turn, and then choosing the one which you decide is best.

The method really hasn't changed, but the terminology has. Speaking of a "candidate move" pretty much implies that you're at least 60 years old. (Basing that on the fact that I'm 53, and the language seems old-fashioned to me.)

TeK

That, actually, does make sense. Do we know how old EE is?

mamm0nn

For all that he's the enemy, the story sure likes to stroke the Dead King's ego about his great sorcery and skill and troop size. Might this all be an elaborate self-written biography of his last great stand?

Ahad Mahmood

EE is the dead king confirmed

Vlatko

I disagree. There are several Grandmasters or International masters between the ages of 20-35 streaming on Twitch who use the term “candidate moves” when describing their thought processes.

KingJulius

Perhaps a resurgence of the term then? It is possible it fell out of vogue in the chess world for a while. I don't know enough to offer that as more than a suggestion though.

LD1977

Kotov invented or at least popularized this term, but I heard it used by modern top GMs. What else could possibly replace it? It is perfect.

I am 43 years old (candidate master).

Javvies

Uh-oh.

Akua has a plan involving Rapacious Troubadour. I think this will end badly for him, but hopefully he'll be particularly useful before the Dead King puts him much higher on the priority list for targeting.

Ah, the Woe, or most of it, together and bantering. Wonderful.

Insanenoodlyguy

I can't help but wonder if Akua just found her escape plan. Giving a Ghost Wizard access to a soul -eater just seems like a recipe for “make an out for my inevitable execution during the downtime”

308924810a

Seconded, she's fought Cathreine for the soul of the Dread Empire twice, there needs to be a third and final time.

Barthumphries

If that happens then Akua will win. Because they tied, then Catherine won and put her in the mantle, and now it's Akua's turn to win.

lightdefender

Pretty sure patterns of three are “loss, tie, win”. The order you give is wrong. It’s also been stated that Cat and Akua had their pattern of three, and won’t get another one.

Liliet

Well we’ll just have to see won’t we 😊

dadycoool

Too bad Cat’s being so detailed on-screen with her plan. It’ll never work now.

nimelennar

Cat, Hakram, and Akua all have unspecified “uses” for the Named they selected. There’s enough unspoken plan here that it has a good chance of working.

boballab

Since when has one of Cat’s plans gone worked as she planned it? The worst thing an enemy can do is disrupt one of her plans because she thrives in the chaos caused by that disruption where her opponent does not.

dadycoool

Prince’s Graveyard. She kept everyone in the dark, including us, until the plan came to complete fruition. It worked so well that she realized how addicting it feels.

boballab

Her plan didn’t work as designed, the final crown was not supposed to be the Grey Pilgrim but her “loyal” minion the former Prince of Winter. Instead it worked out better because she brought back the Grey Pilgrim earning brownie points with the Heroe’s.

Big Brother

We had our roster, our plan and our enemy. There’d be a war council later to hammer all the details together, but as far as I was concerned the essentials were settled.

And just like that, to vote we went.

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/boost>

Insanenoodlyguy

"I'll see about having the list ranking webnovels in the order you like most made official," Wandering Inn idly said.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"She doesn't have that," Defiance of the Fall said, narrowing her eyes at me.

"Of course I don't, number si- I mean, Defiance of the Fall," I replied with a smile.

I winked, botching it just because I knew it being half-assed would piss her off even more.

"Come on," DotF complained. "There's no way I'm last."

"That you think that is why you are, my dear," Metaworld Chronicles gently smiled.

Adrian

Great chappy, but could probably use a second run through editing wise

Burlyraven

Okay, all of the purposes I could see Akua having for the Rapacious Troubadour are equally insane, and more than a few get into the kind of rule 34 territory that makes me want to bleach my brain. Needless to say, I'm rather excited to see how this goes.

caoimhinh

I bet the Rapacious Troubadour is gonna be lusting after Akua. He has a thing for souls, after all.

RoflCat

I believe the last time we got his POV during an interlude he's expressed very strong 'interests' in Akua seeing as she's not a typical shade.

edrey

well. if i compare with Lord of the rings, the battle in the capital should be like the abyss of helm and the bridge is like Moria's mines, so if the elves appear i won be surprised. and for Akua and the troubadour, the only thing a i can imagine is tricking the DK and making him lose a soul shard. lots of information there.

Frivolous

Doubt that's the reason. Eating Neshamah's soul shard would likely result in him possessing the Troubadour, just as he did Masego.

Liliet

Ah, but that's the trick: Masego was really fucking hard to subdue or even get to because he's powerful as shit.

Troubadour, now...

mamm0nn

"I glanced at Hakram, who kicked Zeze under the table. Good man."

Wait, but how? With what legs? What?

For all this talk about Akua's choice and perhaps the troubles brewing from it, perhaps the Adjutant's 'plan' for Apprentice might be the hidden knife. She's still a hero and he a now embittered falling villain.

And finally:

Cat: This is a stealth mission! We are to swoop in and ambush the Dead King's forces before they are even aware that we're there!

Opens up a massive eye in the sky that rocks the anti-scrying magics in the entire principality and blows up entire hills, which is no doubt seen and felt from both the undead and the Iron Prince's army camps.

Cat: Zeze, how subtle are we!?!

Masego: What!?

Cat: I SAID, ARE WE BEING SUBTLE!?

Masego: NO WAY ANYONE CAN KNOW THIS MASSIVE EYE IN THE SKY IS MADE BY US, THEY'LL NEVER SEE US COMING!!!

Ritual ends

Cat: Alright, now let's have Artificer clean up this place with Light to leave no traces. This is a stealth mission after all, we wouldn't want to leave traces of our presence behind for DK to find. He doesn't know we're here yet, guys.

AceOfSword

I think the main purpose for the cleanup of the ritual with Light is to make sure the Dead King can't determine what they did exactly. You wouldn't want him reverse engineering it and adapting his anti-scrying measures.

mamm0nn

They used the vision that the Choirs used for this trick. Though it's silly that DK's scrying hasn't managed to block their unchanging and mostly brute force means of gazing all when he's able to somehow keep up with the latest secret tech scrying methods, it does suggest that DK simply cannot block that type of scrying.

And if the means of looking itself cannot be blocked, then the means of receiving it cannot be stopped by wide area blanketing spells instead because it's both just as brute force in practice and a guided receiving rather than fanning out energy to receive.

Liliet

Hakram had one (1) leg, a fully sufficient number for kicking

Morgenstern

And he has prosthetics; this very chapter talked of having him out of the chair again in the future, because the prosthetics are adapting nicely.

Liliet

I thought he didn't have the prosthetics yet, but that makes more sense actually.

DoOd

He doesn't, it's said the prosthetics will be sufficiently attuned for surgery soon.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Re: Hakram kicking Zeze: remember when he needed an extra hand to choke out Scribe? I choose to believe it's like that.

shikkarasu

I'm still waiting for him to jump out of that chair and be murdering someone before he realises that he is using Ghost Limbs again. Bonus Points if it is in response to Catherine Speaking at him and telling him to Stand.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hell yeah. Phantom limb syndrome is pretty sucky in our world, but in the Guideverse it's a boon.

NerfContessa

You Made My Evening

Laughing sooo hard...

Juff

Typo Thread:

it it clear > it clear millennia's > millennia were a pulse > was a pulse magnifying glass > magnifying glasses the Prince Klaus' column > the Prince's column (or remove the) exactly good > exactly been good
"Both you." > "Both of you."
wheelchair Hakram > wheelchair, Hakram
Besides, without (extra space in front) grim would > grim, it would impressive, > impressive.
to listen to > to listen to it it fought a > it fights a our very mortal enemy (should this be ally) me winsome > me a winsome
we bought him > we buy him it's finest > it's the finest
It have been > I have been
"I do," (something seems to be missing between this and the previous paragraph)

Frivolous

So Hierophant had stolen a mystery from an entity that could win.

=====

"Not exactly," Roland told me. "Think of angels as seeing the world through a lens. What you can witness seared here is what we mortals would see when looking through that same lens."

=====

Question: Are we to take it, then, that the 'entity that could win' that Hierophant had stolen a mystery from was an angel?

Also: I feel really suspicious about what Hakram and Akua have in mind, especially Hakram. This better not be a complicated kamikaze plot.

Liliet

Probably Mercy, seeing how they're at hand 😊

Frivolous

Wait, no, I think that it must not be an angel, or at least not Mercy, because if it was, then Tariq would have simply asked Mercy and Mercy would have answered.

Or maybe Mercy couldn't answer, because to do so would make Tariq's head explode?

What do you all think? Mercy, or something else?

Liliet

I mean Masego cribbed his technology from watching angels, he didn't literally summon an angel. Mercy presumably cannot share their perspective with mortals directly in the way Masego requires here.

shikkarasu

Mercy is often unreliable, whispering to Tariq when he did not ask and refusing to answer when he does. If Mercy wanted them to know, (and were permitted to by the ineffing rules the the Divine) Mercy would have told Tariq immediately.

Zeze may have copied the angels watching the Trial or, more likely I feel, copied what he witnessed just before God V Warlock 2018.

"Wekesa closed his eyes just in time. It'd been only the smallest possible sliver of attention from Above, he realized." Zeze would have seen what it was like for a God to glance upon creation. The special effects are similar: swirling clouds and a mask/eye appearing in the sky, flashing blindingly and with terrible power.

...which also means that this was a very painful ritual to invent. He had to recreate the force that killed his fathers. "He screamed, but did not flinch."

Liliet

Oh.

Ooof.

Big Brother

You have to remember, Masego has seen an /actual/ Godhead as well, when he lost his fathers.

Earl of Purple

Well, I don't know about anyone else, but I like all the named Names. And I hope we get more on the Rapacious Troubadour. He's not really a martial Name, and I like non-martial Named. Do we know if he has the Gift?

Dresden 67

He mentioned back in Interlude: Reprobates that his arcane powers were minor compared to the Hierophant, so I presume he does.

origamiflame

To be fair, almost everyone's arcane powers are minor compared to the Hierophant.

Frivolous

Was anyone else singing along to or listening to Eye in the Sky by The Alan Parsons Project while reading this?

Masego sings: I am the eye in the sky looking at youuuuuu.

Tariq sings: I can read your mind.

Catherine sings: I am the maker of rules. Dealing with foooooools, I can cheat you blind.

Masego sings: And I don't need to see any more, to know that.

Tariq sings: I can read your mind, I can read your mind, I can read your mind, I can read your mind.

Also: I'm so happy, Masego has finally learned to recognize when a metaphor is used in conversation! A great sign of his progress as part of the Woe.

Clint

And so Akua's transition into a full member of the Woe is complete. The five of them gathered for a council of war and the five of them each chose a Named to join them.

That seems ominous. I hope Cat's still questioning Akua's plans and motivations and then wiping her memory of it – and that Akua hasn't figured out how to work around such a possibility.

Liliet

Cat couldn't do that for all this time because she lost her ability to Speak alongside the skeleton of Squire frozen into Winter.

Now she can Speak again, but I frankly doubt she's doing that to Akua. She's got easier observation methods.

shikkarasu

Not that I think Cat is doing this, but I would not be surprised if she had a similar degree of control over Akua still. Before it was mentioned that Akua being made of Winter was part of what allowed Cat such precise control (similar to how Alaya needed to thread in her Rule to achieve similar results). These days Akua is made of Night, which is nominally Catherine's to command.

That said, I expect that they are working toward a similar duality to the Sisters, even if Akua doesn't know it. If that's true then one cannot be much more powerful, if at all, compared to the other.

Frivolous

Catherine/Akua duality as per Andronike/Komena? That's a fascinating and inspired idea.

Or rather, Komena/Andronike. Cat and Komena resemble each other more, as do Andronike and Akua. Heh, their names even start the same way – C/K and A/A.

Congratulations, shikkarasu.

Jkyoulost

I feel like you're selling Cat short a little. She's First Under the Night still and Akua is a shade that derives her existence by being a parasite on Cat's connection to the Night, given to her by the Sisters. Between Andronika and Cat I'm sure they have plenty of ways to creatively use Night to pick through Akua's mind.

hakureireimu

Cat is 100% on the Akua redemption arc.

superkeaton

Hah, they blew up hills making radar, or a rough equivalent. That's great!

Tom

> Adjutant had transcribed seared stone into what looked like a halfway decent overview of central Hainaut in less than an hour with only one hand to use. A useful reminder that, even when crippled in a wheelchair Hakram could do the work of several people in a fraction of the time it would have taken them with objectively superior results.

He totally used Rampage for this.

Also I think GP is gonna die in this holding action. Coming up to the end so tension must rise, White Knight is having a crisis and could conceivably power up a lot, especially if Good has recently lost a major player and therefore can add additional weight to their side....

Matthew Wells

We still have a whole book left...

Aotrs Commander

Ahahahahahahaha!

Now that's what I call SCRYING!

(Note to self: Learn how to do that...)

aran

If it's so well-fortified, I'm kind of confused why she expects to just walk in and use those fortifications. Neshamah has occupied the whole province and dug in to the point of literally hollowing out entire hills; wouldn't he also garrison the city?

Chapter 65: Cross-Check

"Victory lies in understanding the intentions of the enemy. Therefore, a general with no intentions cannot be beaten."

– Isabella the Mad, Proceran general

"So what is this place called again?"

"Maillac, my queen."

I idly glanced at the man who'd replied to my question. Sir Brandon Talbot, Grandmaster of the Order of Broken Bells, had not been much changed by the war. I was often surprised by that. His once-long hair had been cut short but the beard and the strong build remained just the same as when I'd first met him, sitting in a cell where Juniper had tossed him. Many of the great officers of the Army of Callow and other hosts strained under their burden of their position, but on the contrary Brandon Talbot had taken rather well to this war. It helped, I suspected, than this was all simpler the kinds of war he'd known before – be it the Folly, where he had fought to maintain Praesi rule under my banner, or the Tenth Crusade when he'd followed a homegrown villain against invading heroes.

There was no one alive who could bring horrors to bear that would rival the Dead King's, but for all the madness this was the kind of war that my people were most comfortable waging: black and white, no truce with the Enemy. I sometimes envied that he was not in a position to truly grasp the kind of ugly dealings necessary to keep something like the Grand Alliance afloat. A great good too often came at the costs of a hundred petty evils, like a saint standing on a pedestals devils had paid for.

"Gods, and to think someone believed it a sound notion to build a village here," I said. "They must have been drunk."

The dark-haired nobleman – one of the few of the breed I caught myself occasionally liking – let out a small amused noise.

"Some of the land north of Harrow is not so dissimilar, I am told," Brandon Talbot said. "I was taught as a boy that the people there are usually poor but skilled hunters and fishermen. As bowmen they have a high reputation in certain parts, though the Deoraithe are a hard shadow to escape in that art."

"Not much left to hunt or fish here," I replied. "Usually isn't, after the Dead King had a go."

If the Second Army was to make a stand against a wildly larger amount of enemy soldiers without getting butchered and overwhelmed, picking the ground it was going to make that stand on was crucial. We'd dug through maps and records as well as the officers from Hainaut that Princess Beatrice had leant me before picking the abandoned village of Maillac, and for all that the place was a hole in the ground for our purposes it was perfect. See, for all that undead had less trouble with difficult terrain than living soldiers they didn't actually get to ignore that terrain. Swamps, bogs, or other combination of mud and scrub water and crawling things were easier for undead to go through because unlike people they wouldn't get cold or tired or sick – or even attacked by animals, usually.

But in no way did that mean a swamp was something easy for undead soldiers to march through.

The skeletons still wore armour, still weighed heavy, and as a rule tended to be significantly less deft and agile than living soldiers besides. Marching through a mire would wreak havoc on their lines and they'd be damned slow going through mud – or, if they weren't, would be so lightly armoured that our priests would scythe through them like wheat with volleys of Light. It was a comparative advantage the undead had, not an absolute one. And that meant that a place like Maillac made for very good grounds to defend: the village had stood on a relatively large peninsula surrounded by swamplands in every direction but the southeast, and with few trees in the immediate area that would obscure line of sight when the dead came from the west.

We wouldn't be able to fit the entire Second Army on the peninsula that locals apparently called 'the Boot' – seen from a high hill in the distance it looked vaguely boot-like, I'd been told after asking – as ten thousand soldiers would be much too many, but we could fit at least half and then position the rest on the broader solid grounds behind the peninsula, which were thankfully rather difficult to access. To the north and south there were rock formations and deep water, both of which would screw with enemy advance even worse than the swamps. That meant that open grounds around the Boot would be the best approach for the dead, short of circling rather far around.

Which sounded like a good idea for them, at first glance, as it would allowed them to attack us from solid land an attempt an encirclement of our army divided between the Boot and the broader shore. I almost hoped they made the mistake of attempting that, though, as the amount of time it would take them to both gather large enough forces and circle around us meant my army would get to delay the dead long enough for Prince Klaus to get away and then escape ourselves without even giving battle. While I might have chosen Maillac as a battle site first and foremost, I wouldn't complain if we got to evacuate it without first having fought said battle.

Not that we'd be so lucky. I'd stripped ten thousand legionaries and my finest horse from the rest of the army before dangling them like juicy bait out here in the wilds, the Dead King wasn't going to miss the opportunity to bloody us a bit. Still, I'd not come this far by leaving things to chance.

"I can see little use for the Order in the battlefield you have chosen us, Your Majesty," Sir Brandon admitted. "Yet it is not your habit to act without purpose, so I must presume there is one."

"The swamp would be hell on the horses, and you're much too heavy," I agreed. "But I don't actually intend for you to fight here, Talbot."

Blue eyes brightened with understanding.

"We are to go a'raiding, then," the Grandmaster smiled.

"And I with you," I agreed. "We'll be taking the Twilight Ways. Once the Second Army has begun setting up here, you and I are going to make such a nuisance out of the Order in these parts that Keter will have to come and give us a fight."

"To vex the Enemy is always a pleasure," the bearded knight said, sounding pleased. "Even more so if we confound him into an even greater defeat."

I looked at him, for a moment, and glimpsed the part of his kind that my people had loved for so long. That fearless, hardy breed of nobles that'd known sword and spear just as well as dances and laughed as the charged under the banners of the Fairfaxes and the Albans to turn back the invaders of the east and the west. War wasn't a trade to him, I thought, not like it was to the Legions and so many in the Army. War was part of who he was, just as much as his name or his blood. War isn't just what we do, Catherine, it's what we are, Juniper had once told me. She'd been speaking of her own people, that night, but so often I found that Praes and Callow were more deeply intertwined than either care to admit.

"I mean to do more than just vex," I said. "Half the world still sits up when our war horns are sounded, Talbot. I mean to brand that fear anew in the legions of the dead."

His fist struck his breastplate over his heart, the thump pleasantly solid to the ear.

"We are at your command, Queen Catherine," the knight said.

For a few years yet, I thought. It would be enough.

I would make it enough.

—

Sapper-General Pickler, whose notion of the decorum due to her rank usually varied between 'sounds like Commander Waffler's problem' and 'if I'm not covered in dust I'm no doing this right', crouched down on the shore and dipped a crooked green finger in the mud. After taking a long sniff, she licked it and hummed.

"So?"

"Rich silt," Pickler told me. "Good material. Mind you, mudbricks in this humid a locale would be foolish. There's clay, though, and we can use that for fired bricks. The trees in this dump aren't for much of anything, though. I'll need companies out foraging for decent firewood if we're going to be cooking bricks."

It was in moments like this that I was awe at what something like the War College actually stood for, what it achieved. That little exchange we'd just had alone was something that'd be impossible to have in most armies of our age. See, there were engineers in the ranks of Procer and the Free Cities with knowledge much like Pickler's. Neither goblins nor Praesi had a monopoly on such things. But none of these had the rest. Pickler had been taught about mages, so she understood that we couldn't just use spells to make her fired bricks: we'd half-kill our mages with exhaustion before we were anywhere done. Pickler had been taught about defensive tactics, so she knew how quickly I'd need the bricks and that if I didn't get enough making any was a waste of time: that meant making many fires, and firewood.

Pickler had been taught about limited manpower logistics, too, and so combining all these teachings in a few moments she'd put together a proposal. One tailored to the rough amount of people I'd be able to spare, and how many would be needed to achieve what needed to be done in our current time strictures. In effect, several companies of regulars on rotation with attached mages for Twilight Ways access.

Most of the contemporary armies of my allies and enemies had all this knowledge, in practice, but none of them had it concentrated in the same person. Maybe a few exceptional fantassin captains might have most of these competences, or rare Helikean generals, but those individuals would be rare. My father had made the War College into a place that could make entire companies of those rare individuals every year. There were many who still thought the Conquest had been an outlier, an anomaly made possible only by the genius of the Black Knight and the Marshals of Callow. Those people were fools. The Conquest had been won in stone classrooms a decade before armies lined up on both sides of the Fields of Streges.

"You'll have them," I said. "How much can you fortify in two days?"

"The Boot will be walled up, and we'll have platforms for those of my ballistas you didn't hand off to your toy general," Pickler replied, a tad peevishly. "We'll have to use palisades for the part stretching between the end of the boot and the deep waters to the south. We won't be able to put up anything else in time."

I slowly nodded, fixing the picture in my mind's eyes. The peninsula was where I wanted clay walls the most, since it would be suffering the brunt of the enemy assault. Palisades to the south would get rough, given that Keter usually was capable of toppling those by throwing enough corpses at them – to say nothing of constructs or Revenants – but we weren't trying to make an invincible citadel out of this chunk of swamp. Favourable fighting grounds would have to be enough.

"And the northern grounds?" I pressed.

The peninsula on which Maillac was built looked like a boot fitted to a particularly fat foot, but it wasn't jutting out of perfectly straight dry – well, dryer anyway – land. To the south a wavy shoreline connected to the top edge of the boot kept going for about two hundred feet before jutting rocks and deep water made the grounds impractical to pass. As Pickler had said, we'd cover that stretch with palisades. But from the uppermost top edge of the boot the shoreline instead went straight for maybe forty feet before jutting upwards for a hundred feet and curving east into the second mass of rocks and deep water that were the reason I'd picked Maillac as our battlefield in the first place.

It meant there was a stretch of water between the Boot and the shore, which to make things even worse wasn't even particularly deep. Skeletons coming through the mire would use it as a ramp to flood our northern flank, it was pretty much a given.

"If we had a week I'd sink a stone wall and drain it," Pickler replied with a sigh that rattled through her teeth, "but we don't. The mud is too soft there, Catherine, and unlike the Boot or the deeper shore there's no solid layer to steady a palisade on."

I grimaced.

"So we make a fort deeper in and dig in for a rough fight," I summarized.

"I can make fortified nests for scorpions, with an eye to firing on anything that emerges from the water," my Sapper-General said. "But anything beyond that would take more time and hands than we have to spare."

She sounded almost apologetic, which was rare for her.

"These are imperfect grounds," I said. "I didn't expect you to wave a magic wand and make them into an impenetrable fortress. Already you're doing wonders, Pickler."

And I wasn't lying for her benefit there: that in the span of a mere two days my sappers would be able to turn this defendable stretch of swamp into a makeshift fortress was beyond impressive. When I'd made the decision to use only the Second Army and the Order as delaying forces, I'd been able to make that decision comfortably because I'd known almost half of the sapper corps remained with me instead of manning the siege engines that by now General Abigail would be using to reduce the Cigelin Sisters. I relied on my sappers a great deal, which I knew they took pride in, but I would not let the burden of unrealistic expectations crush them.

"I want to do more," Pickler admitted, to my surprise. "There won't be another war like this in my lifetime, Catherine. This is the one I'll get to fight, the one I'll get to make my teeth on."

She clicked her teeth, the flash of needle-like row betraying what had to be genuine irritation. Goblins were easier to read than humans, in some ways – most didn't bother to hide their body language the way a deceitful human would, since most of my race never learned goblin body subtext.

"I work with imperfect tools, the way all my predecessors have," Pickler said, "but it... irks, that I know we could be better. That we could match Keter blow for blow, if we had the time and the coin."

I hid a fond smile. Leave it to my Sapper-General to be irked by being on the lesser side in an arms race with the Hidden Horror. Even most heroes, those chosen few blessed with the belief of promised victory, usually limited their ambition to survival and eking out a win when it came to the Original Abomination. Yet Pickler of the High Ridge tribe had been forged of goblin steel tempered in Wasteland fire, kept sharp by the whetstone of the Uncivil Wars. When faced with dreadful might, the Sapper-General of Callow's nature was not to cower but to crave to surpass it.

"War's not over," I said. "One day it will take us to the gates of the Crown of the Dead itself, Pickler."

I offered her a smile.

"On that day, I expect you will find your coffers filled to burst and few requests beyond acquiescence," I said.

"Gobbler grant me breath until then," Pickler of the High Ridge tribe grinned, all teeth and malice, and offered a quick bow. "I'll get started on the work, Your Majesty."

I nodded back, mind already moving. The Order of Broken Bells was already mustering for the raids, picking out targets with General Hune and Hakram, and now my Sapper-General had assignments and hands to see it through. It was time, then, to see to the... irregulars.

—

I'd begun with Masego because I'd figured it would be less unsettling to look at than whatever it was that Akua wanted the Rapacious Troubadour for, but alas it seemed that hubris had come around to bite me in the tit. That Hierophant would be standing atop a flat floating stone was sadly not unexpected, nor were the smaller rocks circling around him with visibly shifting runes carved into them. That the Grey Pilgrim would be stand with him there, though, head cocked to the side as if he were listening to someone talking as he corrected some of the runework, very much was.

"- being very helpful," I heard Zeze say, tone appreciative. "I could talk to Catherine about remuneration, if you'd like, or draw from Arsenal discretionary funds."

Well, that was nice of him.

"A kind thought," Tariq drily replied, "but the Ophanim require no compensation for their help."

Wait, had he been talking about paying the Choir of Mercy? Godsdamnit, Masego, we definitely didn't have room for that in the budget. I cleared my throat as I got closer, as it seemed both of them were too involved with their work to be paying attention to their surroundings.

"Catherine," Hierophant greeted me. "Come to have a look?"

"You might say that," I replied. "Pilgrim, always a pleasure to see you."

I did not bother to specify that I'd not actually expected to see him, though, as it was pretty much implied by his mere presence here.

"And you," the old man said, sounding amused. "We have been lending a hand to the Lord Hierophant, you see, as his work has proved to have... surprising provenances."

"I figured out how angels smite people," Zeze said, sounding very pleased with himself. "More or less. When the Ophanim tried to kill us all at Lyonceau I got a good look."

"That was not their intent at all," Tariq sighed. "The death of the Tyrant of Helike – a necessity, I'm sure you'll agree – was all that was sought."

"By smiting," Masego helpfully specified. "Which I am now reproducing, only without the angels."

"Are you now," I faintly said. "How lovely."

I looked to the Pilgrim, expecting an elaboration but receiving only a blithe shrug.

"It's not an inaccurate description," Tariq said. "They're very interested in seeing if it works."

"Are they now," I said, tone grown even fainter. "That's nice."

"Now," Masego said, "I know what you're thinking."

He tried to lean against a rotating stone but mistimed it and almost stumbled off the floating stone, the Pilgrim discreetly pulling at his robes so he wouldn't.

"I doubt that," I noted, "but go on."

"If a Choir does not power the smiting, what does?" Hierophant enthusiastically asked.

"The bone-deep existential dread of all who witness your works?" I suggested.

"Too narrow, but you're along the right path," Masego encouraged me.

I glanced at Tariq.

"I thought you Light-wielding types had objections to blasphemy," I said.

And this felt, like, maybe two or three steps past simple blasphemy. I'd say we were uncovering fresh new heretical horizons, but that was always a hard claim to make for anyone remotely familiar with Praesi history.

"Smiting is being used as a purely technical term here, with no religious connotations," the Grey Pilgrim serenely replied.

Tariq, you shit, I uncharitably thought.

"Besides, if this endeavour succeeds it may be possible to reproduce it purely using Light," the old man airily continued.

Meaning that Zeze's brain was being utterly terrifying, as usual, but that in this particular case it might lead to a skill usable for heroes down the line – and Crows, wasn't that particular prospect worth a fucking shiver or two? – so he was willing to not only refrain from objecting but actively help. I narrowed my eyes at the smiling old man, knowing Goods might just be getting the better bargain here. There was no guaranteed that Hierophant would ever be able to pass this down to anyone else on my side, so the knowledge might very well die out. The Choir of Mercy, though, would not forget a damned thing.

And the Ophanim were not, in my experience, shy about handing out this sort of knowledge to their favourites.

"How fortunate," I replied with a grunt. "What is it you're using, Masego?"

"I had thought to use Night, at first," the dark-skinned mage idly said, "but Sve Noc did not seem willing. So instead we will draw on Arcadia for power and use runework to give the power shape."

I blinked.

"And that'll work?" I asked

"Should it not, I expect the result will be a large explosion followed by temporary instability in the weave of Creation on a local level," Tariq noted.

"We can use that too," Masego happily told me. "So there's really no downside."

I closed my eyes and breathed out. Well, he wasn't exactly wrong. Mind you, Zeze tended to be very reasonable even when suggesting utter lunacy so that wouldn't be a first. And this seemed like a functioning weapon, if an unstable and dangerous one. I opened my eyes.

"This won't hurt our own?" I asked.

"No," Masego replied, tone serious. "Precautions were taken. It will not kill your soldiers."

"Then all hail the mighty smiters," I drily said. "Have fun, you two, and try not to bring down Arcadia Resplendent on our heads."

Which might have been a tad hypocritical of me to say, I mentally acknowledged as I limped at and left them to their work, since I was the one who kept stealing lakes from there.

—

I caught a few bits of the song on the wind before I saw either of them, the almost mournful tone of the Troubadour's voice matching the sad strums of his cithern. The tent was wide open, leaving the song to take to the sky unhindered.

"- we of steel,

Forged in the east

As turns the wheel

And carrion feast."

I knew precious few Praesi songs, unless you counted Legion ones, but this one I'd heard of before. The Tyranny of the Sun, it was called, an old war song from the days of the Sixty Years War. It'd been banned since, but banning a song only rarely succeeded at stamping it out. Making it forbidden tended to raise interest, if anything. The few Praesi tunes I'd heard – Count the Nights, Upon All the World and Burning Kiss – tended towards the boastful or the romantic, not the almost wistful beat of this one. It was, I suddenly recalled, a favourite of my father's. Given that this had to be a request if Akua's, I almost smiled at the thoughts.

Neither of them would be particularly pleased to hear they had something in common, even something as small as a liking for a song.

I found the both of them seated inside. The Rapacious Troubadour was sprawled indolently in a chair, long crooked fingers dancing across his cithern as he smiled. Dark-haired and pale, the man would have been handsome if not for the too-red lips and insincere eyes. Though he wore armour when battle was at hand, he rarely bothered without immediate danger to move him: his tunic and cloak were of tasteful cut and good make, in shades of purple, while both trousers and boots were leather. He'd been looking at Akua with something like hunger in his gaze when I entered, though he immediately averted his eyes. Ah, but is it the looks or the soul that draw your attention?

The shade herself had claimed a small table and a folding chair, leaning forward with quill and parchment in hand – which bared an interesting expanse of smooth skin, given the generous neckline of her red dress patterned with what looked like peacock feathers in blue. I'd seen enough of Akua actively trying to appeal to suspect she wasn't even trying to be enticing at the moment. She was just good-looking enough that even at work it looked like she was posing for a painting.

"Dearest," the devil in question said, raising her head to smile at me. "How kind of you to visit."

The Troubadour eased into an interruption of the song, the notes fading naturally, and then offered me a short bow.

"Your Majesty," Lucien greeted me. "Ever a pleasure."

"Is it now?" I mused. "Good to know."

"Do not bully my singer," Akua chided me. "He has been singing the loveliest songs."

"The Tyranny of the Sun?" I asked, cocking an eyebrow.

"Somewhat maudlin, I know," she smiled, "but it has such a pleasant melody."

I smiled at her, knowing something she did not and amused by the secret.

"Got anything out of it?" I asked, glancing at her parchment.

A magical formula, by the looks of it. I could recognize certain parts of it from our lessons – wait, no, this was a ritual but it was meant to be used with Night. It just looked like sorcery because she was basing its workings on Trismegistan principles. I leaned in, frowning as I took a closer look. The scale of the power used would be large, since she was using the notations that meant every number mean should be multiplied by a thousand, but the duration would be... short? Maybe just a few breaths. And I wasn't recognizing the end of her formula at all, there wasn't even a boundary strength or an allowed variance.

Mind you, for all my lessons I was still essentially a drunken monkey trying to decipher the works of one of the greats of our age so my incomprehension should not be a surprise.

"I believe so," Akua smiled. "It occurred to me, my heart, that the strengths of Night lie in its flexibility. Yet this comes at the price of a weakness, namely that it is only ever second best in all the many things it can accomplish."

If even that, I thought. I called it the power of a thief for a reason. She wasn't wrong, though, and if anything she was underselling it: given equal Night and Light on both sides of a struggle, Light would win ten times out of ten. Entities wielding Light and Night weren't necessarily bound to that outcome, mind you, but in a straight fight it had to be said that Light always won. Considering that the prevailing theory was that Light had been made by the Gods Above when Creation was first built and that Night was only indirectly the work of the Gods Below, that made a great deal of sense to me.

"Let's say I agree," I replied. "What follows?"

"A great deal of power that could benefit from a... more defined method of channeling," Akua said. "One more deeply aligned with Creation."

I studied her for a moment, then discreetly flicked my eyes towards the Rapacious Troubadour. Her smile widened.

"Huh," I said. "Is that... wise?"

She read between the lines, catching on to my very delicate question of 'are you sure using the soul-eating villain as a Night-channel isn't going to fuck us over?'.

"It is my ritual," she easily replied. "It remains in my hands from beginning to end."

Meaning that the Rapacious Troubadour would be a ritual component more than an active participant. Ah, I was already slightly more comfortable with this. Still not exactly eager, but damned few of the tricks we needed to win this war were anything that could reasonably be called safe.

"And you're sure you'll get results," I said.

"I have proved the underlying principles," Akua said, and leaned back as if to offer me a closer look at her notes.

Yeah, that would serve no real purpose. I had an almost decent handle on basic Trismegistan spell formulas these days – might not be able to make one, but was reliably able to pick out which part did what – but taking a gander at the kind of work that lay behind crafting an entirely new ritual, one working and Night and somehow involving a Named, would be absurd. I did not have the knowledge to parse the knowledge necessary to grasp the principles behind the basics of what was involved there.

"I'll take you to your word," I easily said. "But what is it your ritual will do, exactly?"

She gestured for me to come closer and whispered the answer in my ear. I drew back with a startled look.

"You're sure?" I asked.

"The effects could be inferior to my expectations, but there will be effects," Akua calmly said. "Of that there can be no doubt."

I let out a low whistle.

"Well, here's hoping it takes fully," I said. "It would make a real difference, and not just in the coming battle."

"I expect Trismegistus will mend the weakness eventually," the shade shrugged. "Yet for now we have the element of surprise, so a success can be reasonably hoped for."

Mhm. She'd not used that name as a coincidence: it was a veiled reminder that there was a reason Praesi magic was called Trismegistan sorcery. We were using his own methods against him, which meant our advantage was likely to be quite temporary.

"I'll dare hope for it, then," I said. "Did I glimpse correctly that you'll be using a song?"

"Indeed," Akua said, sounding pleased. "Do you have a particular preference? Lucien has proved to have a remarkable repertoire at his disposal."

I glanced at the smiling man in question. Yeah I figured he would, what with all the godsdamned souls he'd eaten.

"It's your ritual," I said. "Let it be your song as well."

"You do me honour," the golden-eyed beauty said. "As it happens, I did have a thought."

"Oh?"

"Stars From the Sky," Akua said in Mtethwa. "It is ancient, but remains sung for good reason."

"Never heard of it," I replied, "but I'll look forward to mending that."

She inclined her head.

"I will endeavour," Akua Sahelian smiled, "not to disappoint."

Kel

First!

ruduen

Do the topwebfiction thing!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Huh. I'm... kind of curious about the distinctions between technical smiting and divine smiting. Of course, I don't think Masego even minds adding to the Heroes' arsenal, as long as he's contributed to the sum knowledge in the world.

Liliet

Probably the fact it doesn't require angels' will, and only that.

And Masego would probably be confused at Catherine even considering that as a possible downside for a moment. Aren't they allies with heroes now? What is he not following?

caoimhinh

Masego would be like:

"Are we planning to murder Heroes again? Nobody tells me these things!"

KageLupus

If I remember right, "smiting" is the act of scouring creation clean in an area. It destroys everything in that area including more abstract concepts like memory. I am basing that on White Knight not being able to Remember what happened in an area that was smited. Smitten? Smote.

If I had to guess at the metaphysics of the act, smiting seems to flood a part of Creation with enough energy that Creation itself warps, and when the effect ends what you are left with is a big circle of barren rock. The Ophanim clearly have enough energy to throw around to accomplish that, and it sounds like Zeze is going to use Arcadia as a battery for his ritual. I would assume that if the same could be done using Light it would have to be on a much smaller scale or by a very powerful Named. Imagine something like the second sun that Tariq summoned, but localized in a much smaller area.

Liliet

> If I had to guess at the metaphysics of the act, smiting seems to flood a part of Creation with enough energy that Creation itself warps, and when the effect ends what you are left with is a big circle of barren rock.

I think smiting might be distinct from the angelic erasure, because that one explicitly RESTORES the fabric of Creation where it has been damaged by demons and the like. It's been noted to be the reason why Callow still, like, exists after so many creative Dread Emperors. And isn't a wasteland, unlike.

Of course if Masego is managing to reverse engineer the process of factory resetting select parts of Creation that's even more awesomer somehow :0

Konstantin von Karstein

What makes the memories disappear and restore the fabric of Creation is the presence of the Angel itself, not the act of smiting. I suppose that at First Llesse the Angel of Contrition would have had the same effect even without smiting.

Someperson

I admit I'm morbidly curious what sort of effects a Night-based smiting would have.

Like, I get the crows are probably still mad at Masego for turning down their offer and ruffling their feathers, but isn't the opportunity to learn angelic smiting techniques a pretty big boon for them? Because the Ophanim aren't necessarily the only ones who could benefit from that sort of knowledge in the long run.

Alex K

Sounds like we are going to hear a new song in the upcoming battle. That's always a treat 😊

Xinci

Hm, logically if Angels smiting is just rearranging the properties of Creation to their default/pure state, then the main factors are the power reservoir its being drawn from and the values of the factors being reinforced. So if the runes are right and they have access to a power source they could mimic it with Light. Hm...useful for crafters like Adanna perhaps.

It sounds like Akua is kind of mimicking spell singing while also applying the properties of boundaries we saw with Warlock? The closer something is to Creation the easier it is to trick things into happening, so shes aligning it to something pure(a cascade effect?) using the Troubadour as a conduit. Hm I guess the properties of Named souls do seem useful for that kind of thing. Wonder if you could substitute the Named for another properly scaffolded soul.

Liliet

> It sounds like Akua is kind of mimicking spell singing

I don't think so! Spell singing seems to rely on different principles / properties of Creation than the Trismegistan stuff. Her ritual happens to involve spells and singing, but I would guess it's as opposite from what the Gigantes do as it gets. Don't forget spell singing is known for ridiculous power/scale engaged just by the song itself, while Akua is going to be using Night as the power source.

caoimhinh

An underlying common principle might be there.

The Gigantes use different methods than Trismegistan sorcery, true. But this ritual which Akua is developing might be touching on one of the basics of Gigant's thaumaturgy. Like... I don't know, (Forgive my tortured metaphor) a basketball player and a baseball player both using their hands and eyes to throw a ball. Different styles, objectives, and specific rules at play, yet underneath that there are some deeper laws affecting both, like gravity.

Remember that the song is just a method, the actual power comes from the second soul that the Gigantes forge out of astral energies (which really, really sounds like the concept of Nascent Soul from Xianxia Cultivation novels to me)

The key to this ritual, in my opinion, is souls. Which is why Akua requires the Rapacious Troubadour. Night will be the source of strength, but the method of channeling will be the ritual using the Rapacious Troubadour's song, which we could speculate is related to the souls he consumes.

My guess for the effect of the ritual is that it will target Revenants' souls or at the least the constructs of Necromancy binding souls to undead bodies. Which would really be a game-breaker in this war.

Liliet

Oh yeah I forgot about the second soul.

Still, I doubt there's only one underlying principle for using songs to channel magic, any more than there's only one underlying principle for using gestures to channel magic, or using rituals to channel magic. It's just a medium with its own strengths and weaknesses.

caoimhinh

Yeah, that's why I say she might be tapping unto one that is common for both, not that she is grasping at the only truth or something too major.

Dakota

I have a feeling it is going to be more flashy than that the song she picked makes me think of the wonderful trick that earned the warlock his nickname

Salt

Using Arcadia for the smiting is probably going to work slightly differently than the angels smiting though. Arcadia is creation beta, with somewhat different properties, and it's pretty likely that some of those different properties would bleed through.

You could probably expect it to be significant in raw force but more rigid and easily deflected or dealt with, especially with the right story behind it, not dissimilar to Arcadia vs Creation proper in general. There would also probably be a pushback from Creation, since you're replacing a factory reset with a patch that takes you back to a beta build, so it probably will be a bit weaker than an actual Choir smite if it does work.

Which is probably also why the Pilgrim is predicting an explosion and temporary instability in the fabric of Creation if it fails. He doesn't know if you actually can overlay Arcadia onto Creation proper that way, or if Creation will violently reject the attempt and, uh, blow up as a result

shikkarasu

Oh, ye Gods. I think Arcadia is perfect for this. Consider: Zeze is telling Arcadia that its story -its role- is 'Angel Smites Evil.' All the while Arcadia is getting line notes from actual Angels. With sorcerous musical accompaniment this will be the finest performance since The Fall of the Tyrant of Helike two years ago.

Mental Mouse

I agree with Liliet that Masego probably isn't imitating the Gigantes on this one. If he got to watch the Gigantes themselves at work, that would be a different story... but the Gigantes almost certainly know this, and are not likely to permit the Hierophant anywhere in the vicinity while they do their thing.

jesdynf

I saw that.

"Let us see, at long last, if we can turn back the tyranny of the sun."

– Extract from the coronation speech of Dread Emperor Benevolent the First

Javvies

Holy fuck, Masego!

Emulating Seraphim Smiting? That's going to be unpleasant for the Dead King's armies.

I'm not sure how I feel about it potentially being reproducible exclusively as a Light-working, though.

Ah, Pickler, never change. Storming Keter is going to be a masterpiece for you. But I suspect Cat will want to involve you in designing and building Cardinal, which might be an even bigger endeavor, albeit probably with fewer explosions.

I'm curious about what Akua's going to do with Rapacious Troubadour, and even more certain that it's going to end badly for him.

caoimhinh

It's strange that Masego says that he watched the Ophanim. But it wasn't they who were actually smithing someone over and over back at Lyonceau.

The Seraphim were the ones striking there. The Ophanim only choked Kairos. True, they were planing to smite him, but didn't.

Whereas the Choir of Judgement carried out the action repeatedly in front of Masego and he was already leaving the place when the Choir of Mercy decided that a stronger approach to kill Kairos was necessary and was halted by Catherine.

Earl of Purple

You think he didn't leave to get somewhere with a better view? Ground zero isn't the best place to observe something like this. It's everywhere you look, so wherever you look you'll miss something. And you might not survive witnessing the detonation.

caoimhinh

Could be... though it was said that he and the others evacuated the place, nothing else.

But I mean, he was right there when the Choir of Judgement smited the Hierarch repeatedly, and the Choir of Mercy did NOT strike, Cat prevented them from that.

So, it would make way more sense if Masego were saying that he got a good look at the Seraphim doing the smiting. Since not only was he there to closely observe it done in succession and detail, but the Ophanim explicitly didn't do any huge smiting that day, they killed Kairos in a softer, more controlled way. They offed him by choking and then by throwing controlled jabs that made his blood boil and organs fail slowly while he kept monologuing.

This still revives the question of why the Seraphim were able to smite the Hierarch alone but apparently the Ophanim could not smite Kairos without putting the bystanders in danger, hence why Cat had to stop them.

Eleron Pfoutz

The Ophanim are the Choir of absolute Mercy. And if the best way to ease suffering is to eliminate its source and its victims in one fell swoop...

Shveiran

LOL wut?

Andrew Smith

Didn't Kairos die to a mass of light and he survived as long as he did by using his wish aspect and then giving a dying monologue.

They tried to choke the Hierarch and story wise at least they were smiting Kairos and in fact did better at it as time went on.

What I took was that smiting just Kairos he could block so they decided to do a stronger smite that would hit the entire temple because blocking that was beyond Kairos

Earl of Purple

No, Hierarch used Mend to survive the masses of Light blasting his body away, each blast bigger than the last- until he stepped through the blast to wherever the Choir lives. Kairos they tried to choke.

Andrew Smith

Mercy to start with tried to choke Hierarch before Kairos Lied and so they were forced due to Story rules to Smite him first before they could help out Judgement in their stalemate of power.

Rereading it not only do the Ophanim keep increasing how much power they use on Kairos they try to just area smite because he had no defence against such a smite but cat did and stopped them. They also refined their attempt at smiteing while in progress.

So i could Imagine that gave far more information that the just repeated strikes which the seraphim were doing. Unlike the constant pressure of Mercy on Kairos

Earl of Purple

I stand corrected, thank you.

Ben

The Ophanim were going to strangle the Hierarch, but they seemed inclined to take a slightly less restrained approach with Kairos. The Hierophant had to actually take steps to prevent the Ophanim's attack from killing everyone in attendance as collateral damage—Cat actually chides the Ophanim, saying that if they want to burn Kairos, go for it, but she's not going to let them "burn half the rulers of the continent with him."

Cicero

I'm looking forward to this battle.

Burlyraven

I'm loving all the interactions in this chapter.

Talbot seems to be growing almost fond of working under Cat. At first he just wanted to fight for Callow and was willing to bear price that was obeying a Villain, but now it seems he genuinely enjoys and takes pride in his place in things.

Pickler is yet another goblin who should have a Name, but in her case it's more a case of why the hell does she not have a Name yet? We even get to see her almost directly compared to Masego, and I struggle to see a difference in their drives to succeed.

Masego's little project is utterly terrifying. Setting aside all the listed concerns, his whole story is about him becoming a god, but replicating divine power by siphoning off of another dimension is taking sixteen steps forward on that path. I'm ready to see his nuke in action, but I'm worried about the aftermath.

Finally, I wonder if Akua's attempting to turn Night into anti-magic? That's the impression I'm getting from the emphasis on Night being a thief's tool and the name of that song.

dadycool

Now that analysis of Akua's actions is interesting. Light already resists magic, so Night absorbing it doesn't feel particularly off the mark.

Liliet

Named aren't made by drive to succeed, they're made by stories. There's no story about Pickler.

Burlyraven

Stories are made from the drive of the Named carving a groove into reality. Plus, arguably, Pickler and Masego have nearly identical stories. They are both savants head and shoulders above prodigies in a society devoted to their specialty, and they have an obsession to be the best and always do better. Pickler would be knocking down the gates to the Heavens and/or the Hells with a little more oomph behind her actions.

Liliet

> Stories are made from the drive of the Named carving a groove into reality.

Especially newborn baby Sabah.

No, Names are made from Roles, which are cultural archetypes. Masego is specifically a mage, an apprentice of the warlock, then a thief of miracles. Pickler is an engineer, which we specifically know doesn't really have a defined groove because those usually get gnome'd, or be precise murked by people who don't want to get gnome'd.

Names aren't made from exceptions, they're made from rules. They're rules about how exceptions work, but they're still rules. If you're doing a new thing, to get a Name out of it you need to get people telling stories about you.

Nobody's telling stories about Pickler. She's an unsung hero, much like all the nameless Callowan and Lycaonese soldiers holding the line – those don't all get Names either.

Darkening

The problem with that is that we've had Robber already defined as being a goblin cultural archetype as the perfect paragon of a man in goblin culture, which means he should have a Name by that definition.

Liliet

It has to be a complete story. "A macho man" is not a complete story. "The Lone Ranger" is.

Big Brother

Remember, this was expressed REALLY early on in one of Black's first lessons for Cat: Names are born from Cultural Archetypes. Goblin culture is really f*cking secretive. Would you be able to tell what a goblin Name is like, if it's a Name born from an essentially unknown culture that'll change it's ENTIRE LANGUAGE because a couple words were translated?

Nah, I say Pickler and Robber are already Named, just no one outside of goblin society knows it. We've already been told several times that Robber is OLD for a male goblin, past the usual life-span for them, and Villainous names have been shown to extend life indefinitely unless killed. Pickler's probably a goblin variant of Engineer, and Robber... Honestly I'm not sure. Heckler? Scout? There's also no way of knowing if goblin Named would ever enter into a Band of Five that had another race besides goblins in it.

Only Named goblin I can think of was the Squire-claimant that Cat out down permanently in Liesse, an that was very much out of character for how every other goblin in story has acted.

Darkening

Yeah, that goblin was very odd, with the orange skin and the extremely unusual choice to try for a praesi Name. Wonder if we'll ever find out what Chider's deal was. Probably not.

Liliet

> We've already been told several times that Robber is OLD for a male goblin, past the usual life-span for them

You might be mistaking him for Ranker, Black's old friend who was wayyyy too old and Black had no idea how.

Robber is only now approaching goblin middle age. It's somewhat unusual for a male goblin to survive that long, but it's not past their natural lifespan; in fact,

Robber is visibly aging in sync with his actual age, which Cat comments on.

We have WoG that there are no Engineer type Names on Calernia.

And yeah Chider was definitely unusual.

(Maybe Robber has a heroic Name and that's why he ages normally? ^^)

pagesbe

Didn't Ranker explicitly go through rituals to extend her life? I could have sworn that was mentioned at some point.

Liliet

Ranker was a Matron who have lifespan extensions, but she's old even for them, and while some characters theorized it could be Black extending her life through alchemy, in his own POV he has no idea how she's doing it. (And never asks because privacy and boundaries because Amadeus is precious)

caoimhinh

You have been pushing for that for a lot of chapters. But Named are not forged only of stories. Stories are one factor, but they aren't the only one and also aren't necessary if other factors are present, and you don't need others to talk about you to get a Name.

I don't recall where if it was said that Sabah had the Name of Cursed since birth. It was said that she had the curse since birth, because her whole bloodline has it, it's an ancient curse, as stated in Extra Chapter: Beast, a Warlock put a curse on her bloodline a few centuries back, but when was it ever said she had the Name since birth?

Some Names and Roles are easier to identify and say "that person stepped into this archetype" but others aren't so clear cut. Like, remember when you kept saying that Names always had a job-related structure?

To quote you: "Names are common nouns. Amadeus was a knight. Vivienne was a thief. Malicia is an empress. Hanno is a knight. Antigone is a witch. Tariq is a pilgrim. Hakram is an adjutant. Masego is a hierophant. Cat was a squire. Indrani is an archer. Roland is a sorcerer. Kairos *was a tyrant. William was a swordsman...

There is grammar to this language, people."*

Yet we also have Names such as Red Axe, Blade of Mercy, Painted Knife, and Sword of the Free, which do not accommodate to that.

So, keep in mind that just because we observe a general trend, it doesn't mean that it is an absolute rule.

Some Names don't require much on the person, simply satisfying certain conditions, such as killing the previous Dread Emperor to get the Name. We could speculate this is because the person "steps into the Role" by claiming the Tower, but the fact that the people didn't require a story on their backs, fame, or powerful will to claim the Name was likely the cause that so many Dread Emperors were the laughing stock of Calernia for centuries before Malicia took the throne.

But there are also new Names that don't have cultural backgrounds, and instead are paving a new ground, like Hakram becoming Adjutant. He's the first orc to get a Name in centuries, it's a new Name, and he got it far before he got any renown or story behind him, Catherine was just starting as a Squire back then.

Sabah transitioned from Cursed to Captain not because there was a cultural archetype or story she was following, but because of her own personal story.

Vivienne too, got her Name of Thief without any recognition or cultural significance, but rather because of her own personal quest. This was significant because the moment she concluded that "quest" she no longer identified herself as Thief and lost the Name (at least this is her and Cat's interpretation of the matter, given how she lost the Name despite having restored her faith in herself).

Consider William's Name of Lone Swordsman and how he got it. He didn't have a story backing him for that Name, though his personal story got him the attention of the Choir of Contrition, which in turn made him a Named (though his Name and Role weren't really connected to his story).

Some Names are formed by fame and repetition in people's mouths, like Cat almost becoming Black Queen because that was how everyone was calling her, Warden of the West almost becoming a Name rather than just a title due to Cordelia, or how Akua transitioned from Heiress to Diabolist by making it so she was known for being a Named diabolist.

So do not reject possibilities so easily. All is possible in this story.

TL:DR: In summary, there are multiple factors that can be involved in getting a Name, these factors include willpower, bravery, fame, a story setting, cultural significance or background, and a personal quest for discovery or meaning. HOWEVER, the lack of one or more of these factors does not mean a Name can't be obtained. Also, you can be a claimant to a Name by having one of the above characteristics, remember Book 1, where there were 4 claimants for Squire and Cat had to kill them all to get it. One of them was a Goblin, too. And I would argue that the Sapper-General of Callow, the foremost goblin fighting in the war against the Hidden Horror, lead inventor of the new generation of siege engines that were developed for the Tenth Crusade and the War on Keter, daughter of the first Goblin Lady of Praes, and the most influential female Goblin in all of Callow, has A LOT of more renown and story-backing than what Chider ever had or dreamed to have.

If she has the drive and the event comes when she has to face great battles where she must push her skill and life to the limit for the sake of victory, she could very well get a Name.

Liliet

> Stories are one factor, but they aren't the only one and also aren't necessary if other factors are present, and you don't need others to talk about you to get a Name.

No, actually, stories are the one factor completely and absolutely necessary. Why do you think otherwise? We have WoG saying Catherine cannot be the Grey Knight because there's no cultural impetus for this kind of Name in Calernia. I think I could rustle up some more but that's the first one that comes to mind that explicitly says that.

As for Sabah,

> I raised an eyebrow. "Your Name was easier?"

>

> "I was born into mine, back when I was the Cursed," she grunted. "By the time I became the Captain, no one was dumb enough to challenge me for it."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/05/13/chapter-seven-sword/>

> To quote you: "Names are common nouns. Amadeus was a knight. Vivienne was a thief. Malicia is an empress. Hanno is a knight. Antigone is a witch. Tariq is a pilgrim. Hakram is an adjutant. Masego is a hierophant. Cat was a squire. Indrani is an archer. Roland is a sorcerer. Kairos was a tyrant. William was a swordsman...

>

> There is grammar to this language, people."

>

> Yet we also have Names such as Red Axe, Blade of Mercy, Painted Knife, and Sword of the Free, which do not accommodate to that.

Ok yeah that's a very good point. There are Names that only work as nicknames. There's still more to it, but I'll grant you that this one was not a very accurate statement.

> But there are also new Names that don't have cultural backgrounds, and instead are paving a new ground, like Hakram becoming Adjutant.

Adjutant absolutely has a cultural background, though. Sure it wasn't a Name before, but the word "adjutant" referred to a specific, whole idea of what someone is like already. It was already a Role – imagine a simplistic play, or improv, or something like that, where people get assigned roles – you can imagine one named "the adjutant", right?

I'll grant you that this matches Robber the macho goblin as well, in theory, so that's a good point there actually. Still, there's a lot of wiggle room for exactly how defined that archetype is, and whether or not there's a single word that can encompass it (not every Role has a Name to it).

I will reiterate that a Name absolutely requires a story, there is however a lot of flexibility to what "a story" means in the setting.

It's pretty clear why Robber wouldn't have a Name, even though it wouldn't be weird if he had one, either. I feel like "the macho goblin" is kind of weak-ass compared to Hakram the perfect adjutant – Robber might be a teeny tiny bit overhyped in the fandom.

As for

"the Sapper-General of Callow, the foremost goblin fighting in the war against the Hidden Horror, lead inventor of the new generation of siege engines that were developed for the Tenth Crusade and the War on Keter, daughter of the first Goblin Lady of Praes, and the most influential female Goblin in all of Callow," how many people actually know (and care in any way) about her existence???? The upper military echelons, yes, and I'm sure the average Grand Alliance soldier would vaguely know there's someone like that doing something, but until there's a story spreading around that people actually care to tell and listen to, there's not a Name to it.

I'll not deny it's possible, but it needs to be known for a new Name to come into being.

(Much easier for an existent Name – no-one needs to even know you match the groove, it's already there and you don't need to form a new one)

Nah

As far as possible Names for Robber go, Sardonic Lackey or Vicious Scout both sound a hell of a lot more likely than Macho Goblin, which would be nearly as bad as Snarky Lesser Footrest.

Liliet

Honestly, that's the thing about Robber: he has a lot of stuff going on, between the macho goblin-ness, the scouting, the relationship with Catherine, the complicated relationship with his native culture and the like. They are additive for the purpose of the readers liking him, but they don't add up to a single coherent Role as they work in-universe.

pagesbe

And how many people knew about the Thief's existence before she got her Name? If the number of people was higher than the number of people who know about Pickler, I'd be somewhat surprised. Clearly Vivienne was well known enough for Assassin to warn her off, but she didn't seem to have built up any kind of legend about herself.

Liliet

If Thief were a new groove, if there had never been a Named Thief before Vivienne, this would have been relevant.

But the groove was already there. There were already stories about great thieves; Vivienne didn't need it to be known that she fit one to slip into it.

I go into greater explanation of how it works here:

(check out also the post linked at the start of that one)

Mental Mouse

> Especially newborn baby Sabah.

Sabah certainly had a groove, just not one that she herself had created. Rather, the warlock who'd cursed her family had laid out a story-groove to catch and trap the family's children (probably one per generation). The "family curse" is a classic story even in our own world – indeed, it's one that I have personally experienced, courtesy of heritable mood disorders.

Liliet

I don't think the warlock laid the groove. I think that warlock high key didn't intend to give the targets of the curse power, but the curse itself fit an existing groove well enough that it came with a Name even to newborns.

That groove you mentioned, yeah.

Mental Mouse

Well, "warlock lays a curse on the victim's descendants" is surely a Story in-world.

Liliet

Exactly what I'm saying. His goal wasn't to give them a Name, but it was an inevitable side-effect.

agumentic

You can etch a new groove/cultural archetype into reality with your own actions, but beyond will, they also need to greatly affect both the world and the minds of people living in it. So, if Pickler builds great machines which break Keter's walls before the assembled armies, she could get a name Machinist or whatever, but just inventing normal siege engines is not going to cut it.

Lady Serpentine

Pickler's certainly making a stir with copperstones; "First person to successfully put Light in an engine, her methods proven against the Dead King" is probably better known.

edrey

Stars from the sky, i think is related to the second terriblis, i dont remenber the chapter but it was about plucking stars from the sky was greater honor than born under it. Using Night with that song is really poetic in certain way

Djinn O'Cide

While the title of this chapter is probably another chess reference, which you can Google if you'd like, I prefer to think of it as an ice-hockey reference, where you pick your stick up off the ice, hold it in both hands, and smack the guy on the other team with the shaft.

It's a penalty, unfortunately, but usually worth it anyway...

origamiflame

I knew I'd have to wait to see what Ubuas up to, but I do appreciate the buildup

dadycoool

It feels so good to see Pickler do a dozen calculations in her head in the time it takes to analyze that little bit of mud.

Poor Cat, having to deal with Masego and Tariq working together to puzzle out a Smiting. I could barely breathe as the implications were beginning to dawn on her.

Some Smartass

It's honestly for the best that some of the ways decisions made in this war bite people in the ass are to the heroes' advantage. They'll try to flip the table less if they can get their licks in.

Juff

Typo Thread:

their burden > the burden simpler the > simpler than the pedestals > pedestal other combination > other combinations scrum water > scum water land an attempt > land and attempt wilds, the > wilds; the
as the charged > as they charged either care to > either cared to I'm no doing > I'm not doing was awe > was awed reduce the Cigelin Sisters (missing words) filled to burst > filled to bursting be stand with > be standing with Goods might > Good might no guaranteed > no guarantee work?" I asked > work?" I asked.

limped at and > limped away and request if > request of at the thoughts > at the thought if nor for > if not for every number mean > every number working and Night > working in Night you to your > you at your

Liliet

As always, I couldn't fucking BREATHE for the Masego part of the chapter.

People who thought Akua was going to betray Cat using the Troubadour: technically this doesn't disprove the theory categorically. That said, we have the Unspoken Plan Guarantee now...

caoimhinh

We have various Unspoken Plan Guarantees now, hahahaha.

Insanenoodlyguy

the question is, while coming up with this plan, what OTHER plans did she also come up with?

Sinead

I just realised that from someone's comment on Akua and Cat actively flirting with each other that Akua's basically Killianx10,000 in terms of Cat's attraction/issues with them.

Cat couldn't handle Killian just sacrificing a few people on death row to just advance her own ambitions, while Akua has the entirety of Leisse. Combined with being talented mages that love showing off to Cat with their own knowledge (not saying that it's uncommon, but it is a parallel).

Liliet

omfg yes

ninegardens

I... am really worried that these two rituals (with very different fuel sources) are going to interfere with one another in some way...

Or, (against the hidden horror) potentially give Nessie some way to strike back at Akua.

Also, it sounds like she is planning to usurp control of the dead?

Liliet

I like to think that neither Masego nor Akua are braindead, which is to say it would be a bit too stupid for the tone guide is taking here for them to fail at basic coordination, especially when Cat knows about both.

Like, that's a dramatic plot twist that would be appropriate in some narrative contexts, but really really not this one.

Note also the Unspoken Plan Guarantee for what Akua's doing.

Lady Serpentine

Masego and Akua know each other, like each other okay, and are probably the two foremost practitioners of sorcery on the continent – they know to coordinate.

Crowleu

Loved reading Masego reaching for new horizons of heresy. His lunacy in the last chapters has been delightful, Papa Warlock would be proud. Aqua scheming something once again, not sure if i'm anxious or looking forward to it.

With all this buildup for a small battle, leading to a retreat and a following last stand, I can't help but feel something will go wrong. Hope to be proven wrong

Also, I keep hoping after the retreat we get a few interludes with Abigail at the Cigelin Sisters. Abigail and Scribe were the duo I never thought i needed until it occurred.

Typo thread below, feel free to add.

would allowed-> would allow an attempt an encirclement->and attempt an encirclement as the charged under-> as they charged under

I was awe-> I was in awe

no guaranteed-> no guarantee working and Night-> working with Night

308924810a

I still think Akua is about to pull a betrayal.

propater

My feeling exactly. The shape of this might suggest an usurpation of the Troubadour's body to regain independence from Cat.

Liliet

Nice. We'll see who's right ^^

agumentic

Yeah, I am not feeling it. Some betrayal-shaped move from Akua might happen in the future as she trashes about on which slope to follow (even if I don't think she will have it in her to really follow through), but this story doesn't feel like it's going to happen now. Akua already had several opportunities to simply break free, after all, and choose her current life instead.

Darkening

Cat's finally going to get to live her dream of fighting zombies in a swamp in real life! Maybe Evil Twin will be there 😊

agumentic

Thanks for reminding me that I really want Inner Cats to show up again when Cat's name finally crystallizes.

caoimhinh

She will be like "We have come a long way, eh?"

Darkening

The real question is what her inner cats will look like. Will Evil Cat still look like a grizzled merc, with Good Cat as some kind of priestess, or will Evil Cat just be her, with Good Cat as some kind of Good Queen of Callow like she got offered the one time?

Liliet

Evil Cat being just her sounds contrary to the theme of Evil Cat. Don't forget the last time Cat met her she was also solidly a villain.

Evil Cat is likely to be a Dread Empress, imho.

Trebar

Evil Cat is her as Dread Empress, ruling the entire continent of Calernia with an iron fist so that peace can finally be obtained, but then taking a Red Letter from the Gnomes as a declaration of war and so escalating once again.

shikkarasu

Within every Queen there are two cats....

superkeaton

The Maiden and the Troubador, except the maiden is an undead mass-murderer and the singer is a soul-stealing addict.

jesdynf

I will admit I really love the Pilgrim /leaning into the madness/ to walk away with an unalloyed victory over Catherine nobody has to resent.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, Cat's not the only one who can leave people unsure whether to be impressed or appalled!

Daniel E

Even if the ensuing battle is meant as bait/setup, an old-fashioned 'heroic last stand' will be fun, and we have yet to see what Adjutant & Apprentice's project is. Oh, and before I forget; Gods be with you, Boots the horse. I'm rooting for you.

sengachi

Loved the tactical stuff in the beginning, it reminded me just how much this story excels in military world-building.

Masego's scene had me laughing out loud. But also the implications of being able to smite with Light along and no choir involved is, uh, super freaking relevant for Hanno's character arc and I am riveted to this seemingly humorous scene's implications.

Akua is, as always, incredibly hot and it's always amusing to see Catherine notice that a lot. It's more interesting though to see that Cat's finally had a modicum of magical theory drummed into her head.

Now to see how all the pieces you've so masterfully set up play out. The mundane defenses and artillery, some secular smiting of ... I'm going to guess Revenants?, and whatever the hell Akua is going to do.

sengachi

Adding a separate comment about this because I haven't seen anyone else mention it-

Does anyone else think that the ability to smite without a choir's involvement might be super important in Hanno's coming character arc about learning who he is and what his Role is in the absence of the Choir of Justice?

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but he's got to get out of his funk before he can ride that story.

beleester

Nah, it sounds like it's the sort of thing that becomes a reward for snapping out of his funk. As soon as he decides to step up, he's like "Show me how that smiting thing works – I have some smiting to do."

shikkarasu

Show me, for I must Judge.

IDKWhoitis

When a Praesi mage sings about "Stars from the Sky" why am I thinking of meteors and other magical explosives being flung about that leaves the mind shrieking in existential horror?

IDKWhoitis

Because I don't see Praesi wishing upon a star, well, not beyond "Please hit him...Please, please, please..."

Moodprint

Here is my 2 cents on the topic of goblins being Named. I am convinced some of them are. We have seen Robber sneak in to heavily warded places and survive impossible situations. We have seen Pickler build new extraordinary inventions, and make fortresses out of mudbanks.

I am also convinced that goblin Names work a little different than the ones we are used to, and that we will never see a confirmed goblin Named. Names are a product of stories and culture. The whole thing about goblin culture is secrecy. It is only logical that the goblins as a society would do anything to keep their Names and Named a secret from outsiders, and I can imagine that goblin Names would come with special powers that help them hide their Names from outsiders. Because that is what fits goblin stories.

I have always suspected goblin names (smaller case n) to look so similar to the Names we see, to act as camouflage. Robber is a goblin name.. or Name?

Mental Mouse

Yeah, I've been rereading, and Black himself was the one who called out that point in-story, soon after Robber showed up.

shikkarasu

What I find incredibly interesting is that it wasn't Chider who had the hiding Aspect, but Rashid the Forgettable. It could always be that Name-hiding is more of a non-Aspect part of Goblin Names and Chider was aiming for a Human Name (Squire), or that Chider was trying to make a point and choosing not to hide(as was her almost character arc), but I still find myself thinking about that detail.

Moodprint

I think Chider was a special case. I think that goblin Names all have some kind of Name-hiding. Just like Villain Names come with the ability to stop age, and hero Names come with the plot-amor providence guidance thing. Its a general theme for those Names. goblin society is so focused on secrecy, it makes sense for goblin Names to have an affinity for secrecy.

Goblin Names would also explain goblin fire.

Mental Mouse

The hiding capability appears to be a skill rather than a distinctive power – other Named will have similar ability.

beleester

Chess note: "Cross-check" is responding to a check with another check – making a move that simultaneously gets your king out of danger and checks the enemy king.

cainerahlld777

Evening Etcetera, I believe that you've used this chapter intro previously.

Just a heads up.

Chapter 66: Blind Pigs

"I climbed the Tower at seventeen, Chancellor, and for ten years I have held it. So before you bare your knife at my back, ask yourself this – would you really be the first to try?"

– Dread Emperor Nihilis I, the Tanner

Flat and open grounds sat before us, the earth black and musky.

The sun peeked out solemnly from behind the cover of clouds, a wet and lazy breeze licking at the skin as the summer heat saw droplets gather and slither down the armour of my knights. Hidden near the edge of a thicket of oak and poplars, we watched as in the distance as a warband of armed corpses shambled forward. They were taking the same eastward trail that a hundred other like them had, over nights and days. There'd been no need of a tracker to find that well-beaten track. There was a name, I idly remembered, for this place. There was a village not too far, a mark on a map where men had lived and a lord had ruled. It slipped my mind, despite my best efforts, but I did not grieve myself the lapse. We had fought a dozen skirmishes in as many different places since morning, and by now they were beginning to meld into each other.

"Seven hundred or thereabouts, my queen," Sir Brandon Talbot said. "And our outriders are adamant the closest warband is the better part of an hour away."

I laid a hand on the neck of Zombie the Sixth, feeling him breathe in and out slowly. The stallion was a pale brown Salamans zancada, a breed favoured by both leisure racers and the light cavalry that Arlesites were so fond of. A gift from Princess Beatrice Volignac, and not an inexpensive one. I supposed I did qualify as light horse nowadays, since all I wore for armour was a breastplate with tassets and upper vambraces over an aketon – and the Mantle of Woe, over it all. It was a waste to give such a fine horse to a rider as ferociously average as myself, in my opinion, especially when I usually preferred riding dead horses to live ones. Yet it would have been unmannerly to refuse it, and while the Order had remounts they were from lesser breeds so I didn't even have a good reason to do so.

I fully expected Zombie the Sixth to die before the end of the day, though, which would properly earn him his name would solve the issue anyway. I'd seriously debated killing him and raising him before Hakram got me to admit it would be somewhat unpolitic of me.

"Then we take them," I said. "Have the horns sounded, Grandmaster Talbot."

"It will be my pleasure," the bearded knight replied with a hard grin.

He pulled one-handed on the reins of his purebred Liessen charger, leading away the large horse at a trot and shouting out his orders. The knights carrying long banners, both the Order's own cracked bronze bells on black as well as my own Sword and Crown, brought the silver-banded horns hanging around their necks to their lips and blew. One, twice, thrice. The deep call echoed across the grounds of Hainaut, giving that age-old order my people knew the way they dawn: all knights, charge. I watched, hidden in the shade of a tall poplar tree. The dead had enough Binds among them that they began to mobilize before the Order had even begun to emerge from the cover of the trees, but the warband had been spread out in a loose column for the march. They would not gather quickly enough. Split into four wedges of five hundred, two on each side of the path, my knights lowered their lances and broke into a gallop.

My staff of yew resting against Zombie's neck, my sword still sheathed, I waited with the remounts and the squires in the woods as the Order fell on the dead like packs of wolves. It was with a twinge of satisfaction that I watched lowered killing lances, engraved with hymns to the Heavens, scythe through the thin ranks of the enemy as large armoured horses trampled the surprised undead. All four wedges broke through the enemy lines, not allowing themselves to be drawn into melee but instead punching straight through. In good order, they gathered again and wheeled around to charge anew from fresh angles. Most undead were incapable of so much as denting the armour of my knights, and this column was low on javelinmen: maybe a score wounded and fewer dead were all it took before most the Binds were dead and the warband dissolved into a disorderly mass of corpses.

From there the knights of the Order of the Broken Bell went at it with cold and practiced efficiency, using the tactics developed over years of fighting Keter. A wedge skimmed the edge of the mass of the dead, drawing the enemy forward, only for two others to flank it with deadly charges. Before a protracted melee could ensue, all three wedges withdrew and the fourth wedge of unengaged knights went forward to serve as fresh bait for a repeat of the manoeuvre. Binds would have punished such a repetition, but skeletons simply did not learn from their mistakes. It was grim and bloody work that followed, but repetitive and the danger involved was not as great as might look: unless pulled down from their mount, few of my knights were truly at risk unless the enemy got lucky.

It had all been going quite well, which was why I half-expected it when horns sounded from the woods on the other side of the open grounds. There would be squires and horses in that opposite thicket as well, though I could hardly see any of them, and it must be one of their number that was blowing the call for danger – two short, sharp sounds. My staff left Zombie's neck and I spurred him forward without a word, ignoring the squires asking after me. Talbot had named 'officers' among them, lead squires, so it was not my job to hold their hand. My horse's long and certain stride took us out of the woods and slightly downslope onto the battleground even as I kept an eye on the currents there. Talbot was in command, and he'd prudently ordered two wedges to draw the skeletons away while assembling the other two to head back to the squires.

Quick as he'd been, the enemy was quicker still. Panicked horses, the remounts of a thousand knights, were led hastily out of the woods by mounted squires in mail even as screams and the sound of fighting came from deeper in. I led Zombie into a hasty gallop, trampling a skeleton that tried to stand in my way in a crunch of steel-clad hooves, and broke into the shaded thicket even as another pack of squires fled it. They parted around me, and I glimpsed shame on some of those faces. Given what I glimpsed deeper in, though, there was truly none to be had. It was a man, if one long dead. The shoddy hide armour – little more than a vest – he wore over tattered shirt and trousers did nothing to distinguish him from the zombies Keter threw at soldiers by the hundreds, but the long blood-red hair and ancient claymore were... distinctive.

He padded forward on bare feet, blood dripping from the edge of his great sword as a smile accentuated the vertical tattooed red stripes around his mouth. The Drake, we'd taken to calling him. Against a Revenant of that calibre there was nothing my soldiers could do but die.

"Retreat," I ordered the remainder, voice laced with power.

The squires scattered to the four winds, save for one who'd been too close – the Drake approached and the girl swung down her sword at his head, but the Revenant easily stepped around it. Zombie's stride had not slowed and my staff rose as I gathered Night around the tip, but even that was too slow. In a single casual stroke, the Drake swung down and blood sprayed as he carved through the squire and the horse beneath her. I grit my teeth, letting loose a spinning javelin of Night at the Revenant that caught him in the ribs and shredded flesh and bone. The impact smashed him into a tree, making it crack, and the hide armour was smoldering around the edges. It wouldn't do shit to this particular horror, though, I well knew. I passed the falling halves of the dead squire, unsheathing my sword as I began gathering Night again, but already flesh and bone had knitted themselves back together.

The Drake, laughing, cracked a shoulder and wrenched himself free of the tree.

"Black Queen," the Revenant nonchalantly greeted me. "Yours, then?"

Five times I'd tried to kill that murderous cockroach, and never managed it. Once I'd so thoroughly incinerated his corpse that all that'd been left had been a single hand, and still he'd walked out of that battlefield on two feet. Whatever it was the Dead King had done to this one, it'd made him durable beyond reason. Even wounds inflicted with Light came back in a matter of moments. His capacity to recover from damage might genuinely surpass what my body had been able to do at the peak of my time holding Winter.

"Drake," I coldly replied, deadwood staff levelled at him. "They were. Burn."

A howling gout of blackflame erupted from the tip, swallowing him whole before beginning to spin on itself at my direction. I heard bits of crazed laughter through even the roar of the dark fire as I used my knees to guide Zombie away from the blaze. Fuck, this one was always a pain to contain. I had enough hard-hitting ranged tricks that if I could catch him at a distance he wasn't a major threat, but I'd yet to find anything that could actually put him down for good and not for lack of trying. Time to pull out my forces and find a softer target. Zombie slowed on the turn and I leant to the side to better slam the butt of my staff against the ground, drawing deep on Night and hastily shaping it. Thin threads of darkness skittered along the ground, running up trunks and binding trees as they hooked themselves deep.

The Drake leapt out of the flames, naked and burnt but already healing, just in time for me to wrench with my will and smash him down into the ground with a dozen bound trees. I heard bones break and organs pulp, his broken body stuck under the massive weight. That ought to slow him for a span, until I could get something sterner in place.

"That-" the Revenant began, then paused to spit out a thick glob of blood, "-that was unkind."

Of all the dead Named in Keter's service he might just be the chattiest, and the Dead King did seem to have left him most of his will and wits. It made him more flexible – the same tactics rarely worked twice against him – but it also meant he fell more easily into distractions. Getting him talking tended to work, especially if it was about himself.

"I've been curious," I idly asked, drawing on Night. "How long did it take, before you turned?"

One more working to keep him stuck there for a bit then I'd retreat. The sooner I got my knights away from him the better. It might be worth coming back afterwards to have a crack at destroying him, though, I silently considered. Better here and now than at Maillac.

"Fifty three years," the Drake amiably replied. "Would that I had bent at forty, that last decade was... inventive."

I knew from experience that impaling him wouldn't work for long – his healing was so aggressive that it shredded whatever went through him by sheer pressure – and that quartering only held him so long. He'd been physically strong even by Named standards, I suspected. It was burying alive that'd worked best so far, so I got to it methodically. Shaping Night into large blades I manipulated to cut a rough cube into the ground, I then shaped another working and ripped out the loose earth as if with great claws. I'd need to drag him into the hole before burying him, though, so best get the strings spun out already. I wasn't always quick enough to snatch him when I wove them on the fly. Still, thank the Gods I'd caught him in the woods instead of on an open field. He was much harder to deal with without terrain to use. I spun out five threads, then threw in a sixth just to be sure and thickened them, then –

Darkness fell over the woods, pure and inky black. Shit, I thought, immediately releasing all my workings. Mantle's here too. Was this an ambush? I threw myself off my horse, ripping my boots out of the stirrups, and felt Zombie kick about in a panic. I slapped his rump with the side of my staff so he'd know to run before spinning it about, smashing it into the ground. A tremor of Night shivered across the forest floor, sending the earth I'd loosened flying in a rain that should obscure Mantle's vision just as she'd obscured mine. My consistent inability to see through her darkness while it did not impede her was one of the many reasons I fucking hated dealing with that particular Revenant. Still, this made it two from the nebulous roster that our heroes liked to call the Scourges. It really was beginning to smell like ambush to my nose.

I'd begun to count in the back of my mind the moment things went dark and I kept it up even as I threw up an obscuring veil of Night around myself and ducked behind where I remembered to be a tree. The tree blew up a moment later, though I heard no noise and only knew because I felt the shiver and wood shards ripping into my cloak. I slid further down, closer to the roots, as something whizzed near my head, knowing a helmet would have made no difference if a curse hit but still chastising myself for the lack of it anyway. Cocky gets you killed, Catherine, I reminded myself. You don't grow back limbs anymore. The last three beats separating me from the count of sixteen passed agonizingly slowly, but when the timing struck I was ready.

The darkness winked out, revealing the Drake halfway through a leap in my direction with his claymore raised high and his crimson hair trailing behind, but I wove a thread of Night around his foot and without missing a beat I tossed him in the direction the strike on my tree should have come from. I knew I'd got it right when something ripped through my thread a moment later. Mantle had been some sort of priestess when she lived, and in death those gifts had turned towards the use of curses. Most of them worked against Night, which meant her specialty was shredding my own workings while being twice my size and heavily armored. I liked fighting Mantle even less than I did the Drake, and with her addition to the roster this was starting to look a mite risky. If it'd been a more vulnerable pair I would have embraced an occasion to try knocking off a first-class Revenant before the Dead King could put them to even sharper use, but this wasn't a good match up for me at all.

It was, to be frank, suspiciously bad. If Tariq or Masego had been around to counter Mantle it might have been tempted to roll the dice anyway, but as things stood... No, I wouldn't let pride get in the way of good sense here. Our objectives for this raid were either already achieved or beyond reach, so it was time to get the Hells out of here.

I opened a gate into Arcadia about six feet behind me and twenty feet high, making it broad and linked to water: the deluge pouring out served as my cover as I forced myself up and limped away. A wave of heat followed by the hiss of vapour told me the nature of Mantle's answer, but I did not stop to glance back. I wouldn't outrun either of them, given my limp, and just fleeing into Twilight wasn't acceptable when the Order would be relying on me to return there. So when I opened a gate into the Twilight Ways, it wasn't to go in: it was to allow something out. The ghostly blue wyvern that squeezed its way through lowered its wing so I could go up it and slid me onto its back by angling it. My water portal, though, could only buy me so long.

I felt it get shredded, and a heartbeat later a wide net of crackling shadow flew towards us. On the ground I glimpsed the Drake hastening towards us, so swift-footed his claymore dragged behind him.

"Up," I ordered the wyvern, already drawing on Night.

I detonated the air in front of the net thrice, in a broad line, but though my enemy's working wavered it did not break. That was fine, since all I'd wanted was to slow it. The Summoner's wyvern-thing shot up just in time to avoid the net, batting its wings to pierce through the summit of the trees, but we weren't done yet. Dark grey clouds began to form above us in a ring, and I held on for dear life I shouted for the wyvern to bank away. It did, narrowly, and only the tip of its tail touched the clouds. I'd seen this one before and... wait, what? The tail was just fine. Fuck, I thought as I glanced down and saw the Drake flying through the air towards us. It'd been a trick, she'd been buying time to throw him.

I loosed two spinning missiles of the same make as earlier, hoping to knock him back down, but he batted one aside – the claymore was enchanted, it didn't even get a scratch – and spun on himself to narrowly avoid the other. If we'd kept going straight we would have avoided him, but Mantle's bluff had paid off. Gods but I hated fighting clever opponents. There was no way I was allowing myself to be forced to engage the Drake up close, much less atop a moving magical construct, so with a grimace I glanced down at the woods and breathed out before taking a leap. Hopefully the wyvern would slow down the Revenant some. I wove a veil around myself on the way down, which proved to be a sound precaution when a spray of shard-like pieces of darkness tore through the air coming from below.

I flared out my cloak to slow my fall some, letting them pass below, and only then broke the veil to form tendrils of shadow that anchored themselves on one of the rapidly approaching trees. Using those I threw myself towards the open grounds, just in time for the tendrils to be torn through by Mantle as above me the wyvern-thing screeched. A glance told me the Drake had ripped into its belly and it was quickly falling apart. The dead priestess had never unmade the second gate I'd opened, though, the one the construct had come through, and a heartbeat later she was made to pay for that oversight. A ring of dark clouds that'd been forming ahead of me – the genuine acidic version this time, I was guessing – suddenly dispersed out as Archer made her presence known.

I heard a cry of anger, but I couldn't see what was going on from up here. Still, given that Indrani was involved it was safe to assume that Mantle was having a bad time.

I had other priorities anyway, to be honest, though before shaping a way to slow my descent I still took the time to form a thread of Night, snatching the Drake's foot after he leapt off the shattering wyvern-construct and throwing him deeper into the woods. It had little room for manoeuvre, afterwards, so I brute-forced the landing by smashing the ground beneath me and then using the blowback to slow my fall. I swallowed a scream as my bones rattled and my bad leg burned with pain, but I landed on my feet and only stumbled after taking three slow steps forward. I swallowed a curse and a moan of pain, picking up the sword I'd dropped to sheathe it and forcing myself up by leaning on my staff. In the back of my mind I finally felt my last portal get shredded.

Not that it mattered. From the woods ahead of me, where the Order was gathering to retreat, I saw three arrows arcs upwards in quick succession. Archer was a prodigy at sidling, she'd be able to slip in and out of this battlefield more or less at will and shoot from her pick of places. The last of the undead had gone off to chase my knights in the distance, so unless the Revenants caught up we were safe to retreat. Best hurry just in case. I wasn't looking forward to limping all the way, but – huh. Zombie the Sixth nonchalantly trotted up to my side, seemingly unworried by the skirmishing that'd taken place since we last saw each other. The purebred zancada slowed at my side, as if inviting me to saddle up again.

"Good horse," I praised, genuinely impressed.

Might be I'd still get some use of him living after all. I slid a boot into a stirrup and dragged myself back into the saddle, speeding away back into the woods. With Archer harassing the enemy we ought to be able to retreat in relative peace, I figured, but there was no point in wasting time.

We still had a few raids in us before exhaustion set in.

—

"There's a saying in back home, Catherine," Adjutant gravelled in Kharsum. "It goes 'a hunter cannot carry a cookpot'."

I leaned back into my seat in the tent that soldiers had raised for me in the heart of the Boot, along with those of a few other high officers. Sipping at a mug of tea, I was wishing I'd taken up Indrani on her offer of a massage even though odds were that would have devolved in more strenuous activity. After most of a day riding and fighting, my entire body felt like one throbbing bruise and no quantity of herbal brew was going to fix that.

"I mean, depends on the hunter," I mused. "But I'm guessing I'm missing some of the nuances."

Hakram was seated in his wheelchair, but all the same he was looking rather different: he had, after all two legs again. The prosthetic leg looked grim, all grey iron and leather, but it was him who'd chosen the appearance – he'd turned down the appearance of flesh or even a more polished casing in metal. It was still closed enough I couldn't see the enchanted strands of copper that'd been tied to his muscles, fooling his body into thinking there was still a flesh leg to use, but the articulations around the ankle could be glimpsed. Now and then he moved the foot, as if to check that he still could. He couldn't actually walk on this, not yet. There was still need of an operation on the hip to fix the cut bones there and shore it up so the pressure wouldn't damage his side.

This was a first step, and the operation had been done in part so see if there would be any trouble with his body acclimating to the prosthetic. Masego would have preferred starting with the arm, but Hakram had been adamant otherwise. I could see both sides. Zeze wanted to minimize the risk, as if disease or spellrot took the arm would be much easier to heal, while Adjutant knew that starting with the arm instead of a leg meant at least two more months before he could begin trying to walk with crutches. Masego had insisted on leaving time for recovery between the surgeries so the body would be strained as little as possible and the chances of rejecting the limbs were lowest. Still, in the end it was a choice that was Hakram's alone to make.

So long as he knew the risks, it was not my or anyone else's place to gainsay his decision.

"It is a figure of speech," Hakram said. "Those specific words for hunter and cookpot were picked because they sound like those for swift and slow, respectively. It means even victory weighs you down, if you're not careful."

Cookpot, huh. We both knew it wasn't just mutton that ended up in there. Ah, implied cannibalism. That backbone of ancient orcish wisdom.

"Not the most promising of segues after I asked you to summarize our scouting reports," I drily noted. "Shall I take it things aren't exactly looking up?"

"This isn't the war to fight, if you're looking for pleasant turns," Hakram snorted. "And my people are still taking in reports as we speak, so take all this with a grain of salt."

My brow rose.

"Wow," I said. "It must be really bad if you're prefacing this much."

"You did exactly what you set out to achieve," Adjutant gallantly set. "Which was provoke the columns headed towards the Iron Prince into battle here."

"So we drew them in," I warily said. "That was the plan. What's the issue?"

"You drew them in," Adjutant repeated.

I blinked.

"And?"

"You drew them all in," Adjutant clarified. "As far as we can tell there's not a single warband, battalion or even individual construct east of us that's not headed towards Maillac as quick as its legs can carry it."

I paused, glancing down at the mug of tea that was inexplicably not aragh. A shameful oversight, that.

"Well," I faintly said. "Klaus and our reinforcements should be winning their battle handily, at least."

I'd been a little worried that even the raids by the Order of Broken Bells wouldn't be enough to convince Keter to keep its eye on us, that the Dead King would write off the losses and still try to concentrate his forces against the Prince of Hannover while we bled him, but it seemed like my seasoned pessimism had come all the way around and somehow become a different kind of naïve optimism. It was almost like doing magic, I thought, except for the part where every part of this was terrible.

"I have mastered a new and terrible art," I mused, going fishing through faded lessons on Old Miezán. "Fortunomancy, I believe it would be called."

"That would be luck magic," Hakram commented. "Which would be useful, and I believe is actually practiced in some parts of southern Procer under a different name. You're looking for infelicitomancy, which would be the branch of sorcery entirely about bad luck."

"Thank you, Adjutant," I gravely replied. "I would offer you my blessing for your service in this matter, but I fear a lightning strike would not be far."

"They never are, when Masego's around," he agreed. "Though considering we're about to be swimming up to our necks in undead, perhaps we could do with a few more."

I grimaced, because that was too true for words.

"What kind of numbers are we looking at?" I asked.

"Depend on how long we fight," Hakram said. "The first skirmishers will arrive by Early Bell, we reckon, but the first assault shouldn't come until midday. Maybe twenty thousand, for that first wave?"

We could handle twenty thousand. Even if you discounted the Order of Broken Bells entirely, it was only a two to one numbers advantage for the dead while my people were properly dug-in and ready. The trouble would be that this wasn't the whole battle, it was just the first fucking wave. It'd get worse, much worse. And unlike the skeletons my people would tire the longer it lasted.

"Do we have an opening for retreat?" I asked.

That would be the key. If we were at genuine risk of being surrounded and wiped out – or close enough – during a retreat into the Twilight Ways then I'd have to call an early retreat. Which might be the point, I thought. The Dead King's calling my bluff, and if I retreat now he'll hack at Klaus' back while having lost less than a day's worth of march.

"Between the second and the third wave, there should be a beat of four to six hours before the enemy can gather sufficient strength to be a threat," Hakram gravelled. "If we use our pharos device it should be enough."

Given our very limited stock of those I was always reluctant to use them, but this was a dire situation and the Iron Prince would have several of them with his army anyway. I'd swallow the loss, considering the circumstances.

"Second wave?" I asked.

"Thirty to forty thousand," Adjutant said. "At least. Constructs in significant numbers. And while I cannot be sure, I'd be surprised if most of the Revenants with the columns couldn't make it in there in time as well."

So, to make it out without being badly mauled then we would need to beat two armies outnumbering us significantly in the same day, and beat them badly enough that the losses inflicted meant the enemy would not have the numbers to press us significantly while we retreated back into the Twilight Ways. We would, no doubt, also be facing the latest batch of horrors from Keter and some of the Dead King's finest Revenants. I set down my mug of tea, my hand surprisingly steady considering what lay ahead of us.

"Well," I smiled, hard and toothy. "You know our policy when it comes scraps like this, Adjutant. I see no reason to change it at so late an hour."

He laughed.

"Let them take a swing?" Hakram Deadhand asked, baring sharp fangs.

"Let them take a swing," I softly agreed. "There are still graves we have yet to fill."

Revenant

This feels like it could get bloody.

Eduardo Diaz Torres

This feels like where she gets her name, I mean this has all the classic Catherine battle, strategy and status bingo card ticked off.

Rey d`Tutto

Agreed. I wonder what her first Aspect will be?

caoimhinh

Sentence

DoubleLuft

I'm guessing Cat comes into her first aspect during this battle. It would make sense if it's related to overseeing Named, since she's up against a group of Revenants.

Blind swine is a checkmate pattern, two rooks on the seventh rank: black's king is blocked in by his own rook in the normal castling position.

caoimhinh

Also:

A pair of rooks on the opponent's second rank is referred to as "pigs" as they tend to devour pawns and pieces, and "blind pigs" if they cannot find the mate.

Liliet

Bless you chess people for explaining these.

caoimhinh

A bit of an expansion on the term:

Once it's been set, it's almost impossible to defend against the Blind Swine Checkmate Pattern, because the two rooks coordinate and cover each other along that rank (and there might be support by another piece). Once they are in position, it's pretty much impossible to prevent the checkmate, though it is still possible to delay it by putting pieces in the way. Those pieces will then be devoured one after the other as they are mere futile attempts to stop the inevitable. So long as the player stays focused and doesn't waste their chance, this pattern will guarantee victory.

This kind of situation could be an analogy to the Dead King's current state: he is delaying by sending waves after waves of his troops to stop the Grand Alliance Armies.

Sure, he has A LOT of reserves he can throw at them, and a single mistake could end this for the GA, but at a Meta level, we know that this is heading towards the Dead King's defeat.

Cicero

Isn't it more a comparison to Cat's situation?

She's blocked herself in with her own pieces into facing multiple threats from the Dead King. Including at least two waves that Cat will have to face. It's a bad situation for her, but... if she manages to escape the trap she will have gain significant material over the Dead King?

shikkarasu

As with all S-Tier references, you could easily read it 2+ ways. The two Revenants forced Cat to effectively concede by covering one another in her first Raid.

On the other hand, the multiple waves of Dead could be seen as two Rooks cornering Cat and eating up her many lines of defence slowly and inexorably, leaving her little to no time to retreat unless she can somehow remove one from the board at heavy cost.

Lastly, Cat and Klaus are the two Rooks and something incredibly valuable must be sacrificed by DK in order to get one off of the board. They are 'blind' because they cannot directly reinforce one another.

Liliet

NICE 😊

Bet DK thinks he's got the other side in this position though 9.9

Darkening

Ah, cool, I was thinking it was that saying about, even blind pigs find a truffle now and then or however it goes. Good to know it was keeping to the chess theme.

Mental Mouse

> "even blind pigs find a truffle now and then"

Given that AIUI they find them by smell, I would expect them to.

Burlyraven

Okay, is the Drake a nod to Deadpool? He definitely feels like a nod to Deadpool.

Also, yeah, that intro quote had me prepared for the Dead King to call Cat's bluff, but wow. Sending the entire army against Cat's force is quite the reaction.

Sir Nil

This has last stand story vibes all over it. I feel like DK is only doing this because he's sure that Cat is too 'practical' to rely on a last stand story, especially when she isn't a hero.

Sir Nil

Oh goddamnit I didn't mean to reply.

Lady Serpentine

"Of the twelve assassins to strike only the Drake Knight survived, and not even that potent blood allowed him to grow back the arm he lost.", from the description of the Seven Slayings; Laurence de Monfort also confirmed her slaying of a more recent Drake Knight whose blood drove him to madness.

Mental Mouse

Wolverine can also regenerate from a scrap (at least once from a few cells!), but at least the Drake doesn't have adamantium bones and claws!

superkeaton

Cat, only you could turn success into a detriment.

caoimhinh

It's Providence trying to bite her in the ass for getting a bit of success.

It still hasn't learned that Cat only comes out swinging harder when it tries that.

sengachi

Honestly given how most heroic stories work in the face of adversity and how Cat's got a Name growing in, I'd say Providence knows exactly what it's doing.

Liliet

When you keep relying on "too crazy to not work", sooner or later you're going to run into what the "crazy" part refers to.

Oshi

Finally! This is what I've been waiting for!

Everything else was farce. This is the crucible. Let's see what it forge makes.

dadycool

Damn, that horse is a Revenant. She turned it into a zombie immediately in her own mind and fully intended to turn it into one at the first excuse. If her forces decide to name it themselves, then her doom, or at least something really really bad, will be imminent. It wasn't the horse's nonchalance that decided it for me, but her appreciation of it. She's the Sorceress of Bad Luck, after all.

Liliet

Remember, their camp has enchantments to detect/deter undead. Including animals.

mamm0nn

Abigail the Second, the horse that somehow survives everything, and I mean everything, and becomes legendary for doing so. Let's just hope this horse isn't that Corruption demon come back for revenge, trying the same trick twice.

Javvies

Drake is a major problem. I mean, turned into ashes and a hand? And then walking away from the battlefield? That is serious levels of regeneration.

Yep, that raid was a trap.

All of them? That could be problematic. On the other hand ... it definitely has Story potential. Both good and bad.

Hakram will hopefully be walking soon. Good news.

caoimhinh

Yeah, regenerating from just a hand wasn't something I expected to see in any Named in this series.

I still think Cat's group should design some technique that throws Revenants into the Twilight Ways. Good luck surviving when the whole dimension is actively trying to destroy you.

Or use Goblin Fire on that guy.

Cat shouldn't forget her roots XD.

Mental Mouse

> I still think Cat's group should design some technique that throws Revenants into the Twilight Ways.

I was wondering about that too, but that's also risky, because it potentially gives DK a channel to attack Twilight directly. Twilight's hostility to undead is based only on Plgrim's shaping of the Crown it was based on, and given a strong point-of-presence like that, DK might actually be powerful enough to argue with (or subvert) the Crown directly.

King Julius

I know she is worried about going down in history as the Goblin Fire Queen but honestly, this seems like the right use for it. A fire that burns through magic for days on end should prevent his regeneration. At least for long enough for Masego to study the properties and devise a way to end it for real.

Big I

If she pulls this off it'd be the sort of thing that gets you into the history books IRL, like "Hannibal beats the Romans" sort of thing. Two battles, in a single day, 10,000 vs (at least) 60,000? That's impressive. If she pulls it off.

caoimhinh

True. And let's not forget:

Cat's camp is preparing at least two ~~nukes~~ heavy-hitting and large-scale ~~untested, and risky experimental~~ state of the art rituals of ~~highly blasphemous vanguardist~~ branches of sorcery.

It's gonna be a battle for the history books, one way or the other.

beleester

To be fair, the undead armies seem to rely on quantity over quality. The alliance planned to fight at 2-1 odds for this offensive. Klaus took Juvelun from an army twice his size, in a fortified position, and nobody seemed to think it was surprising.

However, 4-1 odds for the second wave, backed by a pair of the DK's best revenants, is definitely heroic odds.

sengachi

I think they'll be lucky if it's only two of the Scourges.

Shveiran

Agreed. We are going to see the full set before the end of the book. We need named Revenants to give a face to the struggle, after all.

TeK

I closed my eyes and took a deep breath, my fingers closing around the handle of the knife at my hip. I'd always known I'd need to cross some lines, to get ahead in the Empire. Gods, I'd as good as renounced any chance of getting into the Heavens after I died just by claiming a Name on the wrong side of the fence so this was positively trifling in comparison. Like felling a tree to make a cart, I told myself, the words coming as cold comfort.

"Will it be painful?" I asked, opening my eyes. "For the horse, I mean."

"It won't even wake," Black replied.

I'd seriously debated killing him and raising him before Hakram got me to admit it would be somewhat unpolitic of me.

Oh, how far we've come.

Juff

Typo Thread:

distance as a warband > distance a warband name would > name and would the way they dawn (something's wrong here.)
most the Binds > most of the Binds as might look > as it might look it must be one > it must have been one as used my > as I used my might just be > might just have been did seem to have > seemed to have remembered to be a > remembered was a it might have been tempted > it might have been tempting life I shouted > life as I shouted sound precautions > sound precaution

I heard a cry (extra space)
It had little > I had little devolved in more > devolved into more after all two > after all, two part so see > part to see Depend on how > Depends on how genuine risked > genuine risk the loos > the loss make in there > make it there comes scraps > comes to scraps

mamm0nn

Considering this story isn't one about heroes and Cat is going to fight an army of about six to one after winning the opening bid, I can only see folly where others see a badass move. If we're talking Story then the first wave may be the Tie while the second wave will be her defeat, and when not thinking that the pattern of three is everywhere then those numbers are still going to really screw her over.

Earl of Purple

Everyone is a Hero when fighting the Dead King. And that's not how Patterns of Three go, it's always the draw in the middle.

The problem is the Dead King has a lot of experience in winning anyway. I trust Cat and the army of Callow.

mamm0nn

Pattern of three: Yeah, I know. She won with this first skirmishing, the first wave will be the tie and the second wave will be her defeat.

And with her army of Callow, she never faced these kind of numbers before. Not even remotely. The battle before Marchford was less than twice her number while she had the hills and fortifications, against an army containing mercs that would rout fast. The battle of the Camps she was outnumbered less than 1 on 2 as well, against levies that would rout. And most other battles like against the fey, being outnumbered wasn't the case. I don't recall situations where she fought numeric superiority without the enemy being weaker on average with routing as a likely outcome for victory. But never has she faced numbers like these against a foe that won't rout until DK says so.

Liliet

Patterns of three that make you go from victory to defeat are a very specific rival thing. Cat doesn't have that with DK currently and she isn't going to get it for one specific battle, that's not how rivalries work in this 'verse.

Holefinder

Am I missing something here? To retreat in the 4 to 6 hour gap between the second and third waves, both the first two waves have to be mostly destroyed. With any coordination at all (easily achievable with just a few Bind commanders), the first two waves can just park right next to them until undead reinforcements come, ready to attack the moment Cat begins a retreat. Either Cat begins retreating, and the undead gain so much numerical superiority that they butcher half her army, or she holds off on retreating, and the remaining waves catch up and butcher even more of her army. How the hell is waiting for them to "take a swing" a good idea?

mamm0nn

Add to that how this is essentially pissing away those soldiers that she can't miss grinding away on bones that the Dead King can spare, and it really doesn't make much sense indeed. Maybe it will make more sense in the chapters to come, but right now there seem to be motivations that we are not aware of, or there's some lacking wits on Cat's part.

lordcirth

I think they are planning to smash the first wave with the Ritual of Smiting and probably other fun "contingencies".

Tom

> With any coordination at all (easily achievable with just a few Bind commanders), the first two waves can just park right next to them until undead reinforcements come, ready to attack the moment Cat begins a retreat.

The geography around the Boot is very swampy and will slow any assault, as detailed in the previous chapter in the three paragraphs starting with: "The skeletons still wore armour, still weighed heavy, and as a rule tended to be significantly less deft and agile than living soldiers besides." The third of those paragraphs explicitly states that Cat would be pleased if the dead decide to wait.

Plus Cat's had Pickler putting up some light fortifications to slow attacks even more. So if the dead wait until Cat is beginning a retreat to attack, they have to wade through molasses to get there, by which point they're likely only bloodying whatever Cat puts in place as a rearguard rather than wearing down Cat's army all day. That means less living people get killed, and that makes Nessie sad.

> the undead gain so much numerical superiority that they butcher half her army,

In medieval warfare, two front lines go at each other, and everyone behind the front lines on both sides has to wait their turn; this limits the usefulness of numerical superiority (the Battle of Thermopylae is the most famous example of this: a very small number of people were able to hold off a very large number for several days because they were able to pick a site for the battle where the front lines for both sides could only be very narrow, so only a few people could fight at a time). So if the undead have enough bodies to attack Cat's whole front line in early waves, they might as well attack then, because extra bodies behind the dead's front line are just waiting their turn until the front line is re-dead anyway. If the dead wait and mass their forces, they might be able to attack Cat's army while taking fewer losses, because once a front line breaks it's much easier to rout. But massing their forces isn't going to significantly increase the rate at which they can kill on the front line, and the dead don't particularly care about their losses as long as they maximize the number of living people killed.

> How the hell is waiting for them to "take a swing" a good idea?

Cat's goal is to delay the dead so that she doesn't meet up with Klaus's army only to be immediately pincered by two massive undead armies in a crappy location. That would probably mean annihilation of both of the larger armies, which would be much worse than even losing all 10,000 Cat diverted for this delay tactic. Cat can reasonably expect Nessie to send early waves into the grinder, because Nessie's goal is to kill as many people as possible, and Nessie doesn't have much concern about his losses.

lavantant

Man youre right sounds like shes gonna need a hero to come save her

Maybe a big strong hero, fighting for her sake, a white knight, so to speak

If only there was such a hero that is currently going through a crisis and would have a good story about fighting a greater evil being worth teaming up with a waning one.

Daniel E

Gotta say, I feel like X-men level regeneration is really pushing my suspension of disbelief for Named powers. At least with the Pale Knight, his apparent invulnerability is a pseudo-believable mystery, given his Name & history. This new guy just seems silly. On a lighter note, I'm also hopping on the 'Cat earns her new Name here' bandwagon. Seriously hoping her first Aspect is either 'Badgers' or 'Sarcasm'.

LarsBlitzer

"Seriously hoping her first Aspect is either 'Badgers' or 'Sarcasm'."

Yessss, feel your sarcasm, let the contempt flow through you. GIVE yourself to the Snark Side!

Liliet

We already have Assassin.

Daniel E

That doesn't make it any less silly, nor can I recall confirmation of Assassin having such a power.

sengachi

Assassin has literally been killed, fully killed dead, twice on screen (once at Liesse and once in Vivienne's memories iirc) and apparently killed off screen enough times that Cat thinks the idea idea of their most recent reported death sticking is a joke. However their aspect works it's possibly even more ridiculous than Drake's.

Besides, we should remember Drake is a monstrous Named. I imagine a number of more extra Dread Emperors and Black Knights had some fairly ridiculous powers in the same vein (especially in conjunction with some ill advised transformation). They often get powers meant to serve as overpowered obstacles with a trick to overcoming them, rather than balanced powers meant to serve as steadily growing extensions of someone's character development. And whatever Drake was once, now he's a monster of the Dead King, the same progenitor who made those ridiculously durable flesh golem ghoul things Hanno fought in that one interlude at the capital. So while this is a truly absurd level of regeneration, it strikes me as a reasonable peak example of the bullshit we've seen from the Dead King's worst nightmares so far.

tynam

Great analysis.

And the flip side of having bullshit monster boss powers in this setting is that you've declared yourself a bullshit boss monster fight; you've locked yourself out of strategic victory in exchange for the tactical advantage. It's an invitation for a heroic named with exactly the right power to win the boss battle.

Neshamah can put powers like that on revenants precisely because they're ultimately expendable.

Liliet

Assassin has some kind of power to survive being killed, which is precedent for scope of effect.

As for silliness, can I just remind you that the setting includes a country called "The Dread Empire" ruled by a "Dread Empress Malicia" with its army called "Legions of Terror"? Just to regain perspective for a few moments. Silly is one thing Guide has never done anything with other than eat whole :3

Daniel E

I dunno, I always viewed that kind of stuff as 'embracing the trope', as it were. Something about 'super regeneration power' just stands out to me.

Liliet

Well, by now it's gotten proper "horror movie monster" tint, hasn't it!

MageMej

As a delaying action against the Drake, could Cat maybe create a horizontal doorway to Twilight Ways for the Drake to fall through and then create the exit doorway into creation just above the entry doorway such that the Drake will keep falling infinitely through twilight and creation much like what you can do in the game Portal?

Sinead

If you are doing that, make it a box of portals so that there is no way "out" of the loop. It would be the same idea as trapping light in a box of mirrors.

Of course there would be no way to verify the effectiveness of this tactic, and it's unknown if the Dead King could do anything with a Revenant in the Twilight Ways to reduce the effectiveness of the Ways

sengachi

I'd frankly be worried about giving the most indestructible Revenant access to the Twilight Ways, and through him the Dead King.

If the Twilight Ways couldn't kill him faster than he regenerates and couldn't eject the Dead King from the driver's seat Yeah I wouldn't risk seeing what the man responsible for the very notion of sorcery as usurpation could do with up close access to the Coalition's single greatest war asset.

NerfContessa

Hmmm, how does the song go?

Is there a white knight, upoon a fiiery steed, Late at a ight I toss (goblinfire) I turn (undead) and dreeeam of what I need

I need. A hero!

Thank you, thank you,...

where to buy costume lingerie gastonia north carolina

Can someone recommend Nipple Tassels, Breast Covers and Nipple Pasties? Cheers xox

Chapter 67: Isolani

"Kill a man and they will call you a murderer. Kill a hundred and it is a massacre, slaughter a thousand and it will be war. But kill a hundred thousand, a million? That carnage is the sole province of gods. Ancient Keter revealed this truth for all to see: apotheosis is simply bloodshed beyond mortal ken."

– Kayode Owusu, Warlock under Dread Emperors Vindictive I and Nihilis

I slept through the beginning of the Battle of Maillac's Boot.

Adjutant's prediction of the first enemy skirmishers arriving by Early Bell proved to be somewhat optimistic, as the first skulkers were caught half past Midnight Bell instead. Ghouls out front instead of skeletons, a sure sign that something with brains was planning out the offensive – they were significantly better at keeping out of sight. Pickler's wall on the peninsula was done and the palisade raised to the south but the fort guarding the northern shore had not yet been finished and so it was there that the ghouls tried to slip in. They got caught by goblin legionaries, fangs and claws proving no match for knives and crossbows when they came attached to a pair of eyes that could see in the dark.

It was only the first of the enemy's probes at our defences under cover of night, which my commanders had well known. Watches were doubled and magelights brought out as lone ghouls turned into packs swimming through the muck and skeletons began to march at the bottom of the swamp. An assault on the palisade was handily thrown back, though worryingly enough the ghouls had been more interested in clawing at the wood than climbing up to assault my soldiers. The Boot itself was only tried more cautiously, ghouls revealing themselves several times in the distance in an attempt to bait out fire from our engines.

Pickler's boys had better discipline than that, thankfully, so despite their efforts the enemy were kept in the dark about our range and the nature of our engines. One of Hune's legates, who went by the name of Paltry, had been in command at the time and he'd requested the Order of Broken Bells to send patrols along the shoreline just in case. They found no enemies, however, and the dead bade their time with only a few more minor attacks under cover of dark. The first genuine assault came halfway past Early Bell, and even if I'd not already been breaking my fast while reading reports the ruckus of it would have woken me.

I hastily scarfed down the rest of my eggs – weren't as good now that Hakram wasn't the one cooking them, no one else got the seasoning quite right – and snatched up my staff before limping out in to the cold morning light, running into the secretary from the phalanges that Adjutant had sent to speak to me. An assault on the palisade, the young woman told me, by skeleton mages and ghouls.

"Reinforcements were already being sent in when I left," she said, tucking back a curl of dark hair just a little too long to be allowed under Army regulations.

The adjunct secretariat weren't part of the Army of Callow, though, I reminded myself. They were Hakram's and no one else's, though he'd often drawn on my armies for recruitment.

"The assault will have been driven back by the time we can arrive, Your Majesty," she continued, "so the Lord Adjutant suggests that you finish your breakfast instead of-"

"I left a mug of tea in there," I mused, "have it brought to the palisade, would you?"

I tore open a gate into Twilight and stepped through, the warmer breeze of that journeyer's realm a pleasant change from the clime of Hainaut. While limping my way there would have taken me too long and there was no denying it, I had a shortcut at hand. Wasn't hard to make it there, the starlit compass guiding my steps, and I limped out of a portal to the sight of a dozen crossbows and twice as many swords pointed at me. I smiled approvingly at the sight, eyes scanning our surroundings for a threat.

"At ease," I said.

I'd aimed to come out at ground level, since there might be fighting on the palisade walkway, but there was no sight of the dead there. Wasn't hard to hazard a guess as to why, given that the Grey Pilgrim was up there and healing a captain whose eyes and cheek looked like it had quite literally been bitten off. I left him to that for the moment, instead looking for an officer among the crowd just now beginning to put away their weapons. There was a sergeant, stout orc lad with dark green skin and the kind of vivid scar across his nose that his people highly prized as display of strength.

"Sergeant, your name?" I asked.

"Alvar, ma'am," the lieutenant hastily replied, throwing in a formal salute.

His example was followed by the rest of the line, as if they were only now remembering they were in front of a queen.

"Sergeant Alvar, report," I ordered.

"At least two hundred ghouls and a tenth of mages, ma'am," the orc said. "Ghouls came out first, to draw fire from our mages and crossbows, then the skeletons popped out to lob fireballs and rot curses at the palisade. The Grey Pilgrim popped up to smash them, though, took barely a moment."

My eyes narrowed. Had Keter narrowed in on here being the weak point of my defences, then? Ten mages wasn't a large amount, in the greater scheme of things, but the generals of the Kingdom of the Dead were not usually prone to tossing their like into the grinder without purpose. Mages were a lot harder for the Dead King to get his hands on than footmen, and in some ways they formed the backbone of his armies.

"How'd the palisade hold up?" I asked.

"Our sappers say the wardstones dulled the curses but the fireballs scorched the wood some," Sergeant Alvar said. "If this place weren't so wet the wood might have caught fire."

"Lucky us I picked this miserable hole to fight in, then," I drily said. "We've got swamp water enough to drown the work of a hundred mages."

"Wouldn't mind fighting on a sunny Free Cities beach one of these days, ma'am," a soldier called out. "Just saying."

"You and me both, soldier," I snorted. "But if the Enemy was smart enough to head there, wouldn't it be smart enough to avoid fighting us in the first place?"

That got a few appreciative laughs along with blades on shields. Bravado was always a hit with my rank and file, and it wasn't like they'd not earned the right to brag. What other army of our age could boast campaigns to match those of my Army of Callow? I clapped Sergeant Alvar's shoulder and sent the soldiers back to their duty, as from the corner of my eye I saw that Tariq was done healing my captain. Good, hadn't wanted to get in the way of that. If the man could get treatment from the finest living wielder of Light instead of one of our own priests, far be it from me to spoil that. Fine healers as the priests of the House Insurgent were, they weren't the Peregrine.

It wasn't a long walk, even hobbling, and I wasted no time. When the freshly-healed captain began to head my way I shook my head, having already gotten as much of a report as I needed to. Tariq didn't even look like he was out of breath, ever spry for his lengthening age. I broke the silence first.

"My thanks for healing my people," I acknowledged.

"Would that I could do more," the Pilgrim said.

In most people I would have called it a courtesy, a formula, but when it came to the old man I suspected it was entirely sincere.

"The tide's pulling in," I said. "Our foe took the bait."

"So I've heard," Tariq murmured. "Scourges, too?"

"Drake and Mantle," I said. "But there'll be more Revenants."

There always were.

"More of the Scourges as well," the old man said. "A third to round them out, that is the Enemy's way. Varlet or the Archmage."

Right, heroes insisted on calling Tumult the 'Archmage', as if that description didn't also fit quite a few of our own finest practitioners. I'd grant them that the Revenant in question had an uncannily broad arsenal of sorcery to call on, but his particular fondness for large-scale workings that caused chaos in the ranks meant my own people's name for him seem more apt in my eyes.

"I'd say we've seen no sign of Varlet," I sighed, "but that's rather the point with that one, isn't it?"

The Thief of Star had been like Vivienne back in the day, befitting the common root of their Name: unnaturally skilled in stealth and infiltration, but not all that difficult to deal with in an open fight. The Varlet, as we called that grey-cloaked thing, had clearly been more on the assassin end of the sneaky Named scale. It would have been a fucking headache to deal with even if it didn't drench everything it used in particularly lethal poisons. At least we shouldn't be dealing with the Hawk anytime soon. After she'd handily lost an archer's duel against Indrani the Dead King had sent her out east instead, to be Rozala Malanza's headache instead of mine.

"They will come for you, Queen Catherine," Tariq quietly said. "You have become one of the keystones of the Grand Alliance, since the Peace of Salia. Your death would damage it deeply."

"They always come," I shrugged. "I yet draw breath anyway, and I'll not tremble at the shadow of dead Named."

"I meant no offence," the Pilgrim said, "only that wherever you make your stand, foes will be drawn."

"I planned with that in mind," I assured him. "Which brings me to a request."

"I'm listening, Black Queen, though I make no promises," the old man said, faintly smiling.

I somehow got the impression he was having a laugh at my expense, though I couldn't quite pinpoint how.

"I want you to stay here, during the battle," I said. "I know you like to wander and that the real blow might just fall elsewhere in our defences, but your presence would anchor this flank."

"In matters of war, I am at your disposal," Tariq frankly said. "I have never led armies, while your skill in such endeavours is well-known."

I nodded my thanks, but before I could speak I caught movement from the corner of my eye. Ah, I thought. Timing's about right I suppose. A dark-haired young woman hastily made her way up the ramp, the skeletal hand she wore as a pin revealing her rank among the phalanges, and with a relieved expression pressed a steaming mug of herbal tea into my hands.

"Just in time," I smiled as she bowed. "Thank you."

The Grey Pilgrim cast me a look that did not know whether it wanted to be impressed or disbelieving.

"Always one step ahead, Tariq," I lied, and sipped at my tea.

—

The dead had begun massing in significant numbers halfway past Morning Bell.

Skirmishes had kept happening along our defence lines – mostly the Boot and the palisade so far – even as I sat in on a meeting of the Second Army's general staff, letting the well-oiled machinery that General Hune had turned them into go through the necessary motions. The Second was my force that'd stayed closest to the original mould of the Legions of Terror, both because of Hune's personal leanings and because a lot of its high officers were originally from the Legions of Terror. And not the Fifteenth, which had come up with me, but those legions that'd joined me after the Folly. The rank and file were much like that of other hosts in my service, a backbone of legionaries bolstered by larger numbers of Callowan recruits, but the culture among the officers here was still very much that of the Legions. It was at once familiar and discomfoting, like seeing an old friend in a nephew's face.

Indrani helped me put my armour on, something that still felt half-wrong. I'd likely never return two wearing full plate, much as I occasionally wished I could, but I'd managed to strike a balance between protection on compromise. Over an aketon I kept to a cuirass and upper vambraces, with a long tasset and a pair of good greaves. An open-face barbute with slightly gilding evoking a crown over my brow finished the set, without even a gorget to link the breastplate and the helm. Any more weight than what I wore and my limp would start becoming a hindrance. The Mantle of Woe closed over my shoulders, hood down and with an affectionate kiss on the side of the neck Archer left me to my duties while departing for hers.

A bare hour before Morning Bell, under bleary morning light, the dead began their advance. I'd drifted towards the miraculous wall built by my sappers on the shores of the Boot so that I might have a better look at the enemy's offensive, and the walkway there did not disappoint. Wherever the water was low and mud shallow, skeletons in arms could be glimpsed marching through the mire. Where the bottom was deeper sometimes all that could be seen was the tip of spears and helms, dragged forward against the muck. The attack came in three prongs, I saw the advance continued. The largest of the forces was coming for the Boot, straight at us, but another was headed south towards the palisade.

The third looked ready to skim the 'sole' of the Boot so it could dip down into the shallows between the peninsula and the northern shoreline, which had me grimacing. Our fort there was finished but I'd been hoping the roundabout route to there would convince the enemy to focus their efforts on the better-defended Boot instead. The enemy general was not unskilled, then. Still, I saw no reason to leave my position at the moment. With the Pilgrim bolstering the palisade and the Blessed Artificer at the fort, or flanks should be solidly anchored for now. It was only when the opposition got serious about cracking our defences that the real trouble would start.

"Ma'am, it looks like the enemy's in range of our mages."

I glanced at the captain addressing me, a young woman by the name of Jules Farrier – no relation to the man who'd once been the commander of my Gallowborne, I'd asked – and cocked an eyebrow.

"It's your command, captain," I said. "I'm only here to keep an eye on things. The order's yours to give."

"Yes ma'am," she stiffly replied.

I left her to it, eyes still on the dead approaching through the swamp. Captain Farrier had been right, now that the skeletons were reaching swamplands where the depth left their upper body visible it was time for the fireballs to begin. All along the baked brick wall that Pickler had raised, incantations rose and fire bloomed. It was a work of art, the fireball formula that the War College taught. Masego liked to rag on in, but he was coming at it from the wrong direction. He saw one spell being used for a variety of purposes improperly when he knew a spare formula more apt to each purpose, but then he was the Warlock's son. The former Apprentice. Even among highborn mages, nine tenths would not get an education to equal his. The Legion formula was, on the other hand, simple enough that every mage in the service could learn it yet flexible enough that it could be adapted to dozens of different situations. Fighting skeletons, fire itself was only of limited use. Scorching bone and armour accomplished little.

Yet the formula could be tinkered with so that the fireball grew dense, the impact more powerful, and that made a dent into the Bones.

Like a wave of fire the spells went out, smashing into the skeletons and splashing into the scum water with hissing vapour. The enemy's advance staggered, but we had too few mages and there were too many enemies: they could not be stopped like this, only slowed. It was still enough to set up a good killing field for our siege engines, our copperstone ballistas beginning measured fire into clumps of skeletons. Given how many undead we'd be facing before day's end, we couldn't afford to just shoot at every shadow.

It would have been easy to see the casualties mount on the enemy side without them even getting close enough to swing at our walls and take it as the herald of overwhelming victory. I knew better.

For one, it was telling that even in such small numbers – there couldn't be more than three thousand divided between the three offensive – we couldn't outright dam the tide. More and more skeletons were slipping through our fire with every heartbeat, coming ever closer to the walls. But beyond that I knew well that in war there were precious few absolute advantages, mostly comparative ones. Our advantage here and now, the walls and the terrain and the preparations, they weren't something to sneer at.

But they were needed to make up for the overwhelming numbers and tirelessness of our enemy in the first place, to make this battle more than a ceremonious suicide, so those initial beats of the battle when our advantages came into play and the enemy's hadn't weren't to be counted on. This was going to get ugly when the bolts ran out, when the magics fizzled and my people were exhausted from hours of hard fighting. Anything before that was just our attempt to inflict enough damage on the enemy we got to survive the hard part. By either luck or fate, the first skeleton to make it to the bottom of our wall started scaling it not even a foot to my left. Liming to the edge of the rampart, I pointed my staff downwards and offered a rueful smile.

"Bad luck," I told it, and let loose with Night.

—

It was mostly luck that I was in the fort when the attack hit.

The fighting at the walls had remained steady but the peril was not great: between the concentration of mages and the rotations of fresh soldiers, we were keeping the dead at bay handily. I'd gotten a report that it'd been trickier at the palisade, but between a company of heavies being brought out and the Grey Pilgrim intervening they'd kept it under control. The assault from the shallows had been comparatively easier, the numbers of the attackers having been thinned by fire from the Boot before they got there. It was the sole front where I'd never gone, though, so I'd elected to have a look. More for morale purposes than because the fight needed me, but morale would count for quite a bit in the coming hours.

The fort itself was of classical Legion layout, square with a forward palisade and a bastion deeper in. Gates on four sides so that legionaries could quickly deploy and in our case two smaller barricades had been added on the sides so that scorpions could be raised on heights and pointed at the shallows. There was some fighting on the shores when I stepped out of a gate within the fort, but nothing all that threatening – the dead were just keeping up the pressure by tossing corpses at our shield wall defending the shore. The Blessed Artificer had stepped in to bring down a great lighting strike of Light at enemy mages, but not involved herself since. I could only approve, given the finite nature of what she could contribute to a fight, and told her as much.

"It seems callous not to use all that I can," Adanna of Smyrna admitted. "There have been deaths, and some of these I might have prevented."

My opinion of her character went up a notch.

"They know the risks of their trade," I replied, not hiding my pride. "They're Army of Callow, they understand sometimes you have to bleed early to win the fight."

The dark-skinned heroine looked unconvinced, but not even her remarkable amount of gall would allow her to argue with a queen about her own soldiers.

"If you sa-"

Her answer was interrupted by crashes and shouts coming from the shoreline, both our heads whipping about. I couldn't see it all from where I stood, even with the front gates open, but I could see that some sort of large snake construct had just emerged from the shallows and was now unhinging its jaw.

"Later," I cut in, already limping forward.

Legionaries parted for me as I made my way out of the fort, even when they were hurrying out as reinforcements, and I hastened to take a better look. I cursed in Kharsum. A new kind of construct, by the looks of it: much smaller than the great snakes used in the sieges of Twilight's Pass, but built along the same lines. More a carrier of troops and battering ram than anything else, but no less dangerous for it. Half a dozen had hit the beaches simultaneously and were now pouring out skeletons into the gaps of my shield wall. These were made for the swamps of Hainaut, I thought. An answer to both the difficulties of the terrain and our growing advantage at range. We hadn't been the only ones to prepare for this campaign.

"Hazaak," the Blessed Artificer snarled, raising a short copper spear.

She'd caught up to me without my even noticing. Not to be outdone, I drew deep on Night even as Light bloomed around the short spear. Where the Artificer struck with burning might, a great crackling spear of roiling Light falling on one of the snakes, I instead took a more measured approach: shadows slithered along the ground and suddenly thrust up, threading through the open maws of three of the constructs and forcefully snapping them shut.

"Priests, on the three bound," I calmly said, pitching my voice so it'd be heard.

The House Insurgent dutifully obeyed, Light begin to tear at the wiggling great snakes in sharp spears even as Adanna reached for another of her instruments. I began to shape a great ball of blackflame so ram down the maw of one of the remaining snakes when I caught sight of flicker of movement to my left. Instinct had me redirecting my fire there and I caught the Revenant in the stomach, scorching its thin frame as it stumbled on the ground. It looked like any other Bone, little more than a corpse in ancient armour, but none of those would have withstood the quantity of blackflame I'd just tossed at it.

"Revenant," I noted. "Won't be the only one."

Already I was weaving a follow-up, threads binding the legs of the down Revenant together as I prepared a larger mass of blackflame above its body – which exploded, a curse tearing through them.

"Mantle," I snarled, eyes flitting about.

I found her in the water, only the upper half of her armoured form above the mire. The dull, black plate steel plate set with emeralds and silver inscriptions couldn't be confused for anyone else, not the thick green cloak whose hood obscured the visor of her helm. Another snake went up in a pillar of white flames, the Artificer striking without hesitation, but during my heartbeat of distraction the Revenant on the ground had broken its bonds. With surprising fluidity it struck out at the heroine, shortsword arcing for her neck, but my hand was steady and my aim true – my own blade caught it in time, an inch from biting into Adanna's unprotected flesh.

Gods, would it kill the woman to wear some fucking armour?

"I will take the fallen priestess," the Blessed Artificer mildly said. "I take offence the use her powers have found."

"Be my guest," I grinned. "I'll handle our little friend here."

The Revenant withdrew its blade and took a step back, but it'd forgotten this wasn't a duel and it was behind my godsdamned lines: two big orc heavies smashed into its back with their greatshields, making it stumble, and I took the opening. I struck high and in a heavy chop, which it caught with its blade and deftly slid so my momentum dragged me into its guard, but before it could rotate its wrist and disarm me my deadwood staff smashed into the side of its head. Though beyond paid it still stumbled, and with a grunt I drew back my blade to strike again – weaving Night along the length. With a clean cut I sent its helmeted head rolling, even as Adanna was wreathed with blinding light.

I shielded my eyes with my hood, offering a grin to the two heavies that'd come to help.

"This one counts as half-yours," I told them. "Tell your lieutenant you're up for commendation."

Both grinned back like big ugly green cats, returning enthusiastic calls of Warlord, but even as I bumped shoulders against them in a friendly manner I was already taking in the few bits of fighting I'd missed. Mantle had ripped up my working on the snakes, though I'd been too distracted to notice, but the fight with the Artificer wasn't going well for her at all. She'd already been forced to pull out a globe of smooth, mirror-like darkness I'd only ever seen her use when hard pressed. Meanwhile, between the Artificer and the House Insurgent there were only two great snakes left and the mages were focusing their efforts on plugging the breaches so that the heavies could fill them. With a triumphant cry Adanna crushed a glass baton in her fist and a rain of Light spears fell on the globe of darkness, shattering it with a keening scream. Under it there was no trace of Mantle, who must have legged it when the attack began going south.

I glanced at the Blessed Artificer appreciatively.

"You're definitely worth keeping around," I said. "She's a tricky opponent, for me."

Adanna of Smyrna straightened proudly.

"It is my duty to—"

In the distance, to the south, a few goutts of red went up. Signal spells, asking for reinforcements. Shit, they must have hit the palisade as well.

"Later," I amusedly told the Artificer, opening a gate and stepping through it.

—

The first thing I heard stepping out of the Twilight Ways had an involuntary shiver going up my spine.

"Shine," the Grey Pilgrim coldly said.

I shielded my eyes with the flat of my blade, but not quite quickly enough the terrifyingly bright light I glimpsed did not blind me. I cursed, head ringing and eyes burning, and almost stumbled into a soldier. I must have come out near a formation. It was too long for comfort before I could see again, but when I did what my restored vision showed was a mixed bag. On one hand, there was a gaping hole in the palisade about ten feet wide. Broken logs had been brought forward to plug it, but the undead were trying to push through the opening and only narrowly being held back by a hasty shield wall. On the other hand, the smoking skeleton at Tariq's feet that was still holding a familiar claymore could not be anything but the Drake.

It looked like getting a blast of the Peregrine's most powerful aspect from up close was too much for even that monster's regeneration to take, because while some specks of flesh were reappearing on the bones it was nothing more than that.

"Your Majesty," Tariq mildly greeted me. "If you would handle the breach, I am not yet finished with this one."

"Hey, I'm not one to argue with a smoking corpse," I shrugged as I began to gather Night. "Do as you will."

I was in no way inclined to keep to subtle means when dealing with an outright breach, so this time I simply began to gather a few dozen great balls of blackflame above the undead trying to mash through my shield wall. Impatiently I struck at the ground with my staff, the balls smashing downwards and exploding in great gouts of black fire. Immediately the pressure slackened and my soldiers pushed the enemy back, enough that sappers were able to bring out panels and began repairing the breach. I tossed another great gout of fire at the dead to push them back in the water long enough for the holes to be plugged, then let the captains in charge to handle the rest. I glanced at Tariq, who'd nailed the remains of the Drake to the ground with nails of Light and was now opening a gate into the Twilight Ways beneath him. That might actually do the trick, I mentally conceded. A sudden contortion had the skeleton's skull snap upwards and something that glinted in the light flew. A tooth?

I immediately wove Night to catch it, even as Tariq kicked the skeleton into Twilight and the bones turned to dust, but someone else beat me to it. One of my soldiers, a young man who grinned at his own swift reflexes. He twitched, a heartbeat later.

"No," I snarled.

The soldier smirked at me and winked, then ran for it. I sent a javelin of Night into the back of his knee, my soldiers crying out in dismay at the sight of one of theirs getting shot in the back. But though the soldiers stumbled the shredded flesh grew back in a heartbeat. The Pilgrim's beam of Light incinerated armour and muscle alike, but it wasn't enough. Still burning with pale flames as he deftly avoided the Night harpoon I threw at his back, the reborn Drake threw himself over the edge of the palisade and into the mass of undead. I went up the ramp and took out my anger on the undead in a storm of black flames, but the bastard was in the wind. Again. My fingers clenched around my staff until the knuckles went white.

My soldiers gave me a wide berth, but Tariq was less wary of the dark mood laid bare on my face.

"It's not the last of him we'll see today," the Grey Pilgrim simply said. "And we know the trick, now."

I made myself breathe out, reaching for calm, and looked up at the sky. The sun had risen higher than I'd expected, we must be close to Noon Bell by now. Gods, barely noon and the fighting was likely to last until dark. Above the Boot, streaks of yellow went up. Constructs sighted. I squared my shoulders.

"Next time," I agreed, and opened a gate.

As always, there was to be no rest for the wicked.

JR

first!

Burguul, Black Spiral Dancer

No rest for the wicked indeed.

Javvies

That is a nasty – and ridiculous trick for Drake. And ridiculously overpowered. Is he fucking whatshisname, the 40k fallen Astartes who just turns you into him if you kill him? Except worse.

Blessed Artificer isn't wearing any kind of armor? What the hell is wrong with her?

erebus42

You'd think someone who's basically a Smithing cleric would have a better appreciation for armor. Idk though maybe she's pulling an Exiled Prince and feels it's "unheroic"- and we all know how that worked out for him.

caoimhinh

To be fair, she is more of a scholarly-type. She is not really a smith, the "Artificer" part of her Name comes closer to an enchanter than a smith or a heavy mechanic-kind of craftsman.

Adrian_V

Funny you mention Adanna, i was thinking she will be the one to kill the Drake by making an artifact toilet just for him, or 1 that opens and instant gate for a few seconds (enough for him to fall in)

caoimhinh

Well, most Named have a theme in their clothing and equipment, and some aren't flexible in that regard. Mages and Priests wear robes while fighter types wear some sort of armor. You will never see Masego wearing plate armor, and Tariq literally can't wear anything without it becoming gray for some reason or the other.

What I found funny was that Cat complained of Adanna having an unprotected neck, but so does Cat, and her excuse is that the limp would bother her, yet she can always get rid of the pain with Night.

P.S: a friend told me that there's a guy called Drake Merwin from a saga of books (the Gone Series) whose power was regeneration even from the smallest part of him, given to him by some sort of alien evil being. Maybe this Drake is a reference to that guy?

Liliet

> and Tariq literally can't wear anything without it becoming gray for some reason or the other.

Is that a textual fact or just a very reasonable theory? I don't remember.

shadw21

Textual fact from his thoughts back in the Perigrine extra chapters I believe. Specifically whatever robes he wears I think, but I think he was wearing those most of the time anyways. They always turned a particular shade of grey during his journeys to wherever by the time he got to his destination, no matter what color they originally were.

Liliet

Oh my god.

Oh my god.

Thank you.

Liliet

> and her excuse is that the limp would bother her, yet she can always get rid of the pain with Night.

Night is a limited resource, and Cat wears SOME armor. Notably she added a helmet since the last outing where she wondered why the fuck she wasn't wearing one XD

Practicality

IIRC Indrani called her out on it, that the sisters could have easily healed the limp, but Cat said something along the lines of needing the reminder.

(i believe it happened during a tavern scene after Indrani slugged Cat and told her that a year ago she would have easily caught that.)

Liliet

Ah yeah, but that doesn't mean she can do it any time for free NOW. And canceling the pain with Night is not the same thing – it's an ongoing expense.

KageLupus

I don't think the issue is that Night is a limited resource, but that it only masks the pain so that Cat can move around without the limp bothering her. But it still causes her trouble. It is like walking on a sprained ankle. You can do it, but it will make the ankle worse in the long run.

Liliet

Both are issues!

JBeari

Not to be combative, but I'm pretty sure it was addressed earlier on in the series when she was still Squire.

Basically it being the same reasoning as not using a magical weapon, that in a crucial moment it will fail you and cause your downfall. Like she gets used to not feeling pain, but then a pivotal moment when she can't use Night anymore and trips up at the sudden resurgence of the pain.

Im starting to doubt myself now though. I could sworn that that happened, right?

'Ladi Williams

No, you are right. She said she wants to remember the pain to keep her grounded and humane...but more importantly Providence would ensure she runs into a hero who would counter the hight she's using to keep the limo from bothering her at the very worst possible time for her...which would surely spell her doom.

caoimhinh

I mean, she is not wearing the gorget, the part that protects the neck, because supposedly it would add her too much weight.

Even as far as Book 1, the importance of that particular piece of equipment has been remarked upon, with Cat even mentally mocking enemies when she kills them by slicing their throats or stabbing their necks.

Liliet

Yeah I'm... wondering about that one.

Currently my guess is that the breastplate and the helmet both actually provide protection for her neck, she just doesn't wear the piece that would connect the two and remove gaps.

Shveiran

I'm kind of an armor enthusiast, and I must say I don't see a contradiction here: Cat used to mock people not wearing a gorget or an helmet when she was the Squire, sporting full plate armor made in goblin steel and still being able to outrun an athlete with ease.

Now she is wearing a breastplate and a bit of limb protection, plus an helmet. That is obviously better than a tunic for the purpose of protection, but it is still a far cry from a suit of plate. I don't think she is wearing a suit of chainmail underneath (since that would be the heaviest piece by far) but that still means that her joints are vulnerable. So is (possibly) the back of her leg and her feet (depending on the kind of armor she is wearing there, but again, considering she isn't wearing plate I doubt these areas at least are not exposed), her groin, her face (she seems to be wearing a barbute, so a stab in the opening is a possibility) and her hands, since gauntlets were not mentioned.

I believe she is well aware of this, but it is simply a matter of not being strong enough to be able to wear full plate armor and not be so drained she can't cast effectively or slowed down so much she isn't fast enough to dodge what armor doesn't protect against. This is as much armor as she can afford to wear, and yeah, it leaves dangerous areas exposed to nameless skeletons, but it is as much as she can use without dying to a revenant because she is too slow.

This could change when she gets her name, I guess? Though I'm starting to believe it won't. She has been far from the front lines for a while now, and that is where she gained most of her fame.

shikkarasu

At least she didn't go the way of A-Dress-Is-Not-Armour and Should-Have-Ducked.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Cat's got some hypocrisy in her, she knows it and we know it. Cat says she keeps it b/c it reminds her of... it was either mortality or her mistakes or both. Anyway, she would justify it with something that sounds good to her... but Adanna would probably justify it as well and she probably thinks it's reasonable too. We all sound so reasonable to ourselves and others simply seem so unreasonable – we have reasons for doing unreasonable things, others are just unreasonable. Crash course in fundamental attribution error 😊

Christian Oaks

Not everyone has sense beaten into them, and Adanna seems to be one of those who went without.

grzecho2222

In same version of the myth, drake/wyrm Gorenicz can reborn/grow copies of himself from his teeth, also Iason had fought same kind of super warrior that grew from dragon teeth sown in the field of Ares

Ash

typo:

Though beyond paid it still stumbled -> pain

NerfGlaistigUaine

"But kill a hundred thousand, a million? That carnage is the sole province of gods... apotheosis is simply bloodshed beyond mortal ken"

Boy, you underestimate our ken. No one does inhuman like humans.

caoimhinh

More than being "only inhumans would be able to do such things" is rather like "doing that makes you a being beyond mortals".

<https://external-preview.redd.it/0sV-y9ptK7h4KuziZtwicWczEI9XarQRfWUfHPVKJvw.png?auto=webp&s=38ebcd8ff673935d05133371a9a55d7929a0178b>

caoimhinh

Seems like the image link has to come through Imgur for it to be shown in miniature in the message rather than an external link?

Well, whatever.

NerfContessa

Indeed, my fittingly named friend and coworker, indeed.

Also, regenerate as long as his tooth is left AND possession by tooth is insanely op.

If that had been a hero he would likely still be alive, so I am guessing villain who fell for. The Invincible ploy.

erebus42

As much as I love these battle scenes (this story's use of truly integrated fantasy war making is always amazing to read) I'm dying to see the results of Masegos' and Akuas' projects.

Burlyraven

Man, that is a nasty trick of the Drake's. Just an instant of contact with a tooth – supposedly through armor – and the victim is instantly killed, consumed, and replaced. Something that powerful feels like it has to be an Aspect, not DK tampering, and it's somewhat terrifying to think about what the original Named might have been like in that case.

Also, this defense is feeling all too easy and almost chipper. Cat's dark mood sticking around might be the best case scenario, because I can think of a few stories that tend to go poorly when the defenders are bragging and scoring win after win. This is even accounting for the deaths stacking up.

dadycoool

Yeah, the "Bad luck" and "Nice job, boys" are some red flags. Not big ones, like "Whoo, we did it!" but they're having too good a time to last.

That trick really is nasty. Only thing for it is to get him all alone and toss him in the Twilight Ways, I guess.

TeK

And that would be the last we see of him.

Matthew Wells

No Revenant could survive that!

hakureireimu

I read it as the soldier ate an idiot ball and grabbed it with his hand. So through gloves or open hand, not armor.

grokkingstuff

Imagine the practice the Dead King had, keeping the Bard alive & contained. Keeping the Drake for 50 years must have been a piece of cake 😊

JRogue

If it is an Aspect, then, conceivably, Cat can Take it.

Wouldn't that one time use be awfully handy to have?

Lox

Adanna of Smyrna straightened proudly.

"It is my duty to Boost!"

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

NerfGlaistigUaine

Isolani: Isolated queen's pawn. An isolated pawn is a pawn that doesn't have any friendly pawns in the adjacent files. This means the pawn is in a very vulnerable and weak position. An isolated queen's pawn is special because it provides control of the center, opens up better development, and can create a good position to launch a kingside attack, while retaining the normal disadvantages of an isolated pawn. Which fits really, b/c Cat's force is isolated and vulnerable but she's using it to launch a strong offensive to gain control of the board.

Also, while isolani can be beneficial, if things progress to endgame in the same position then an isolated pawn is just a huge vulnerability and weakness.

Feel free to correct me here, I haven't played chess seriously since high school so I might have gotten some stuff wrong.

Liliet

THANKS!!!!

LD1977

Isolani is any pawn, not just on d file.

Also it does not provide any prerequisites for a kingside attack.

The main reason it is allowed is to have better piece play, and one of the goals is to force the other player to capture a piece protected by it (for example on e5 is the pawn is on d4), therefore unmaking the isolated position of the pawn.

The only real advantage of an isolani is mostly in the endgame, when you have an isolani on a or h file which is also free to advance, therefore distracting the opponent's King or tying down a light piece.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Er, you sure? B/c I did a quick Google search after reading your comment and pretty much everyone (wikipedia, chess stack exchange, chess24, etc.) says it's isolated queen's pawn (d file) not just isolated pawn. And there are tons of discussions on advantages/disadvantages of isolani and most suggest having it endgame is a bad thing. Can I ask where you're getting your information from? It seems to disagree with, well, every source I know.

LD1977

Well I have read a lot of chess books and studied chess deeply. I have also known a lot of grandmasters use the term for any isolated pawn.

The reason d pawn is mentioned most often is that its isolation happens in many openings, therefore it is in fact the most typical case. Opening books have always been the most popular, so authors probably first shortened the term into isolani while talking about isolated d pawn.

Now, as we agree, isolated d pawn is a structural weakness that is a liability in the endgame. However, this is ideally balanced by free piece play (the real compensation), a bit quicker development and the outpost on e4/e5. I have personally always found that playing against it is easier than having it, but I am a medium level player (around 2150 ELO), so transitional advantages probably mean less than structural ones 😊 I do hold my own well against masters, but IMs/GMs are a bit too hard.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Oh cool! You're a lot more qualified than I am then to talk about chess strategies – I was only an amateur and ~1900 ELO at best. Thing I'm confused about is you say isolani is good for endgame and then in this response you say it's structurally bad but has quicker development and outposts – which would be opening/mid-game stuff. Seems like you're saying it can lead to better endgame but not better in endgame (unless it's also passed pawn)? B/c by endgame, when all you've got is pawns and one or two material, seems isolani would be a weakness all other things even. Also, I was taught that having those outposts made a kingside attack more viable though, is that wrong?

One thing I have to outright disagree about is I'm pretty sure the agreed upon definition of isolani is the isolated queen pawn specifically. I think your GMs are just more liberal in their vocab.

NerfContessa

Dang, up till 17 years ago I was a pretty successful amateur, somehow I had a confounding play style which made me win near all my first games with people over 200pts ahead of me.

Later I sadly found out it was simply an actual flaw. I didn't plan enough moves ahead and so better players wasted their brain power anticipating moves that never came.

Suggs, but that's the reason I stopped playing chess at age 24.

LD1977

Maybe I haven't emphasized enough. Isolated but free pawn on the wing is useful in endings because it ties down opponent's pieces far from the other wing, while isolated d pawn is not as good because it usually does not tie down the opponent far from the real action.

True, could be that in literature isolani is specifically d-pawn. I checked too 😊 probably people are a bit less strict when just talking and I just remembered that. I am way too lazy to go through the books I have handy to try to find an exception.

Having an outpost is useful, however these outposts are normally challenged so just having a piece there is not the real point. What actually happens is that you try to use the development advantage to force the opponent to take the Knight on e5 → you recapture dxe5 → now you have a pawn on e5 that is not isolated anymore (plus ideally it hits Knight on f6 that has to move, therefore weakening h7) + you keep the more active pieces → this together can spark a kingside attack.

This is why the defender should never ever take on e5, but definitely try to exchange pieces gradually to defuse the initiative while keeping the d4 isolani alive (it gets weaker with exchanges).

Anyway, in the context of the Guide, I am not sure there is a higher symbolic here. Author probably just means to emphasize the weakness of an isolated army.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Makes sense, but that's very different from your initial response. What you left out was quite important to your message. You know a lot about chess (besides getting meaning of isolani wrong 😊), but your communication could use a bit more work, no offense.

As for message, I like to give EE the benefit of the doubt.

sengachi

I love the rapport Catherine has with her soldiers. She has earned that. And the moment when two of her soldiers helped bring down that Revenant, without a second thought? She earned that too, paid for it a dozen times over.

LD1977

Yea but this Revenant died a bit too easily, no?

Adam

Cat is a formerly supernatural priest of an eldritch horror and most Revenants were only "normal" Named even before being diminished in death. The pain in the butt Revenants are ones who were abnormally powerfull in life and then were augmented by Trigemestus. An unnamed revenant will easily die to the Black Queen, Queen of Lost and Found, Last of the Winter Court, daughter and apprentice of one of the Calamities. Remember that all of the present Named are heavy hitters of the combined army brought together from the entire continent.

sengachi

No that's the thing. She. Earned. This.

Remember how easily Warlock tore through the Bumbling Magician at the beginning of the story? That's Catherine's power level, skill, and narrative status now. From the very beginning it was established that there are tiers of Named, from those who make narrow escapes and eek out victories against simple mortals ... and those like the Saint of Swords and Warlock, against whom such Named might as well be ordinary mortals.

And Catherine has clawed her way up those ranks throughout the entire story, to the point where this, all of this, feels earned. She gets to just roflstomp a lesser Revenant and not have it feel cheap because we know exactly what it took to get here and can cheer it on as a reward well earned.

And with the soldiers coming to her aid, that's the thing. Her Story right here, and her Role, clearly isn't "Catherine the Lone Powerhouse". What this battle is serving as a testament to is all the work, blood, and sweat she's put in earning the loyalty and crafting the skill of those who follow her. When a low tier undead Named forgets it's not an a duel and gets summarily tackled by two of Catherine soldier's brave enough to get into a fight between the Black Queen and a Named, that's not just an asspull. That is something Catherine has paid for, from the very moment she slit that rapist's throat to join the War College as Black's apprentice to the moment just before where she stood next to her soldiers on the battlements and joked that the Dead King should fear them.

Easy battles are only a bad thing in a story when they're not the glorious culmination of work we can be proud of.

Besides, Catherine has emphasized so many damn times this chapter that this part of the fight is an easy prelude to the real grinding toll of it later that I think we'd know better than to call any aspect of it 'too easy'.

Liliet

[illegible]

> Easy battles are only a bad thing in a story when they're not the glorious culmination of work we can be proud of.

this this this this this

Guide does a very excellent thing where it doesn't suffer from seasonal power decay/escalation – characters enter each new arc of the story with all the power-ups from the end of the previous one, and the environment does not reshuffle itself offscreen to match. And it achieves this effect partially through this – fights that aren't trivial in the setting, but are roflstomped by the main character because goddamn it it's book six and she never stopped escalating.

It escalates the scope and the goalposts instead – Catherine could roflstomp all Revenants present and it still wouldn't win her the fight by itself, and she still cannot roflstomp all of them, because the Dead King is bringing out the good silverware for this.

Because at the end of the story, the Dead King will earn his names twice over, and how the fuck can Catherine achieve that if she cannot roflstomp his minions?

Shveiran

I regret I only have one like to give.

KageLupus

Nah, the Revenant was just some random dead Named that the DK threw their way. Chances are it was mainly meant to be a distraction for the Mantle and any damage it inflicted would be extra. Don't forget, Cat has spent years honing herself in combat against Named specifically. She has enough experience with it that anything less than a Scourge or other Big Deal is well within her ability to take down.

Gibborim

Cat is obnoxiously good at killing named and not every named the Dead King has raised can be a heavy hitter. I'm sure he has taken his share of Squires, Apprentices, and Random Assholes.

LD1977

All true.

I just expected that even a weak Revenant has two aspects it can call on (I vaguely remember that getting turned into Revenant might damage/destroy an aspect), so just cutting its head off seems kind of too easy peasy.

sengachi

I mean some of them might have none. Heck some Revenants may have only been claimants.

Remember the Squire murderfest in the first book? It's not hard to imagine all those kids being thrown into a war with the Dead King (and dying), and they probably had the juice to at least merit "more Revenant than basic zombie" status". So yeah, some of the Revenants may only have a Name trick or three, and not even an aspect yet.

Dredcor

The destroyed/damaged aspect bit was specifically when the Dead King didn't want them to have a specific Aspect, so he would intentionally destroy it.

Though it was also mentioned that the Revenants only have Shadows of their names remaining. Though that might have been specific to names like White Knight which recurr.

Liliet

One needs an opening to use an Aspect. If being killed after using all your Aspects was the only option, Named would be immortal through never using their Aspects at all.

Darkening

I mean, I doubt Scorched Apostate had more than 1 aspect at the very most, and he got turned into a revenant. I'm sure any number of rookie named have died to the dead king. Hell, Cat's said in the past that a lot of heroes sort of make a point of keeping an aspect in reserve so that they can pull a sudden reversal of an opponent if they need it.

LD1977

True, true. I figured guys that go on a Crusade are more often the big boys, but yes they could be greenies with a single aspect too. I mean we saw some pretty bad mofos so far, even before the whole Scourge group.

Darkening

I mean, there's already an apprentice involved in the current war with Keter. It's kind of an all hands on deck situation, even the rookies get dragged along lol.

The folks that came after Cat at the battle of camps certainly weren't especially impressive individually at the time, they'd probably have gone to war against Keter as well, given most of them are currently.

Adrian V

Mmm for a moment i thought it trying to kill the Pilgrim with the tooth, this was cooler xD

I am loving Cats exits, what is she? Batman? xD

How many of the scourges have appeared or been mentioned?
Including the one that was destroyed by the drow.

vernal.ancient

I think we've seen Pale knight, Mantle/Tumult, Drake, and Hawk, with Varlet being mentioned but not seen. I want to say there's been a Wolf mentioned as well? That would make six, which seems appropriate; a Five-Man Band plus Sixth Ranger. Although considering that heroes and villains aren't entirely in agreement, I suppose Wolf and Varlet could be the same Revenant. Wolves are stealthy hunters and Varlet is an assassin

vernal.ancient

Or, wait, Mantle might be separate from Tumult/Archmage. I dunno, I'm getting the different revenants mixed up in my head now

Shveiran

I don't think the Pale Knight is actually a Scourge. It is definitely in that league, don't get me wrong, but I don't think he is one of the official formation.

As far as I can tell they are:

Tumult/archmage

Drake

Mantle

Hawk

Varlet

... though I'm not one-hundred percent sure there are five of them. I have this feeling they were six? If so, I think one is still in the dark.

Dredcor

I know the Stitcher or whatever they were called was a Scourge before, but they got killed by the drow.

Darkening

I believe they said there were ten. Though one died to the drow, so they're down to 9, so the Pale Knight will slot in nicely to round them out again.

ohJohN

From the recent "Interlude: Ietsism":

TL;DR It's a fuzzy category applied by the Grand Alliance forces for convenience, so there's no real canonical answer, but by consensus ~10 Revenants are uncontroversially considered Scourges.

vernal.ancient

Ah, thanks! That makes sense. I was thinking the Scourges were a villainous Band of Five, and got confused when I counted at least seven

Shveiran

Good find, thanks.

Juff

Typo Thread:

out in to > out into
There was a sergeant (later said to be a lieutenant) rank a file > rank and file seem more apt > seemed more apt Thief of Star > Thief of Stars return two > return to protection on compromise (sounds odd) slightly gilding > slight gilding hood down and > hood down, and I saw the advance continued (sounds odd) or flanks > our flanks rag on in > rag on it enemy we got > enemy before we got Liming (not sure what this should be) Light begin > Light beginning so ram > to ram of flicker > of a flicker down Revenant > downed Revenant plate steel plate > steel plate offence the use > offence at the use beyond paid > beyond pain only to great snakes > only two great snakes by blade > my blade
then let the > then left the

Xinci

I do wonder if exposing the Drake to the Twilight ways would work due to its essence subsuming his Domain. Kind of like a Demon contaminating another being and turning it into an extension of its essence, perhaps the Domain with the greater authority may override the other.

Liliet

No Domain was mentioned regarding Drake. Most Named don't have those.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but most Named can't regenerate from a scrap like that. A Domain would cover that capability.

I do note that Pilgrim didn't even try to use Twilight until the Drake was beaten down to 0 HP, which makes sense – as I said before, if it still had its full power and maybe a DK shard, it might well be able to attack Twilight itself.

Liliet

I got the impression that it's more about mobility – he needs to not be able to dodge the gate to Twilight.

And Domain is generally known to be another layer of reality that the person can interpose at will. Saint's was an exception and there isn't even a consensus that it was a Domain at all. Normally Domains are like what Skein and Catherine had, or Rafaella's – battlefield control in a very literal sense. Regeneration is not particularly related.

Most Named cannot regenerate from a scrap, but a lot of Named can regenerate period. We've seen a lot more unique and extreme abilities, for example Hanno's Recall. Plenty of Named have tricks that can be described as "we haven't seen any Named be able to do this [to such an extreme degree]". It's kind of a Named thing.

Mental Mouse

IIRC it was either Saint herself or Pilgrim who described Saint's "I am a sword" power as a Domain... but one which she'd focused on herself, to give her near-invulnerability. Drake's regeneration has that same feel to it – an absolute capacity focused on a single capability, and limited to his own person.

Liliet

Saint's Aspect that produced the Domain effect was Decree. The nature of the Aspect was that she could make anything come true, and used it for making herself a sword. It's not about an absolute capacity, Saint just... misused her Domain power for that.

shikkarasu

"Laurence Du Montfort is a Sword" was a self imposed limitation. By refusing to Decree anything else she focused it into a Demesne. She stated that using the Aspect for anything else would make it 'less pure.' Tariq confirmed that it was not a true Demesne for the first decade or so, but it became one.

(speculation begins)

I can't find it in me to agree to calling it a misuse. Just like she was not being arrogant when she wore no armour and used an unremarkable sword. These self imposed limitations strengthened her Narrative. She does not need anything more than a length of sharpened steel, because She Is A Sword. It's why Cat didn't dare fight her fairly.

I imagine it is a large part of why she became the Saint of Swords after her fight with Ranger.

(speculation ends)

Liliet

Ah I don't disagree, it wasn't a misuse in the "shouldn't have done that" sense, it was a misuse in the same sense that Cat getting a resurrection at Liesse was an abuse of the narrative mechanics.

And the way I read it was the other way around – it was always going to be a Domain, with the ability to Decree anything in it, but Laurence chose to focus it on herself, so her Domain was an odd kind.

Mental Mouse

But she did so by limiting the effect to herself, thus taking an already-powerful Aspect and focusing it for extra power.

Shveiran

I guess a Domain could do this if it was over something related. Like, I hold Domain over my body or something like that.

Yet I'd argue that if that was the case Drake would be much harder to hurt as well.

I think it's simpler to just say he's like old style Wolverine?

Liliet

Mhm.

Dredcor

I think it is very likely that being undead makes him harder to deal with.

I give it good odds that when he was still living, burning him down to the skeleton would kill him.

But he is undead now, so no need for flesh to keep "living", and thus his regeneration will continue to work even when he is naught but a skeleton.

Otherwise how would he have been zombified, since he would be impossible to kill without reducing his body to nothing?

Gibborim

I'd imagine that the process was to pin him down with Revenants then drag him to Keter for the DK to personally subsume his life force/soul.

caoimhinh

Well, he did mention it took 40 years to turn him into a Revenant, no? With the last 10 years being "inventive", implying a great deal of suffering as he wished he had surrendered before it got to that point.

That makes me think that he really was just that hard to kill even when living.

Dredcor

I think that's how long it took to break him.
A.k.a. make him a willing servant of the Neshamah.

I assume he was very much dead before that.

Mental Mouse

And In fact I just hit the reference on my reread:

> "You hold dominion," I said.

> "Only over the one thing," the Saint grinned. "But that's usually enough."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/09/chapter-11-ballon/>

At first I was like "Tariq, why you burn an aspect so early in battle?"

Then: "Oh. The Drake.
... never mind then, carry on."

caoimhinh

When I read the part of "I glanced at Tariq, who'd nailed the remains of the Drake to the ground with nails of Light and was now opening a gate into the Twilight Ways beneath him. That might actually do the trick, I mentally conceded."

I thought "fucking finally, throw that bastard in! What's taking you so long?".

Also, it seems like the thought of using a gate to Twilight to destroy the Drake simply hadn't crossed Cat's mind. Seriously, she requires only a second to open those gates.

saithorthepyro

I think the fact that Tariq had to nail the Drake to the ground first before even trying to get him sent through one indicates it might not be that easy to do.

Gibborim

And if Tariq couldn't do it quickly, on the fly, I doubt Cat could catch a decent Revenant with it either. Cat has more power adjacent to Twilight, but Tariq is who the realm was molded in the image of.

caoimhinh

Cat has been shown to open Gates to Twilight quicker than anyone else. She can do it literally on the fly, as fast as snapping her fingers.

Tariq likely can slip into Twilight easily (as can Indrani, for example) but it seems it takes him a short while to open the Gate.

Shveiran

Sure, but on the fly is kind of uncertain, isn't it? I mean, now that I think about it, I don't think she has ever used the portals to make someone fall into Arcadia, always to make someTHING fall out of them.

So maybe she can't quite do it fast enough that it is an effective attack? You know, I can clap my hands three times rather quick, but it's easier to hit someone swinging a bat than it is for me to clap my hands over their nose.

It could be easy to dodge, is what I'm trying to say.

Wonder

Oh dear , Drake Deadpool is such a fun nemesis for Cat to contend with.

That phalange who brought Cat's tea to her in time to look like providence was just so super.

It got me thinking of a possible aspect for Cat;

Making providence her bitch .

The aspect gives people who Cat has given a task a healthy dose of providence to successfully execute the dread plans of the Black Queen Arch-Heretic Catherine Foundling.

Mental Mouse

We've seen variations of that in Captain's Obey and even Hakram's Find.

Shveiran

I can't quite see it with regards to Obey. Could you expand on that?

KageLupus

Obey was something like "I can complete this seemingly impossible task because I was given an order to do so."

Imagine the same effect but external instead of internal.

Cat would give an order to someone and they would get a push when completing it, but the effect would come from her instead of the person being ordered.

That said, I don't think any of Cat's aspects are going to focus on that side of things. Anything related to ruling or leading has always been kind of incidental to Cat's plans for the world. She took command of the army and then became Queen because it was the most direct way to get what she wanted.

But if Names are a reflection of who a person is than I am expecting hers to be much more about fighting and managing other Named. Cat can make a plan and give soldiers orders without needing any extra power, but dealing with other Named is where she is going to need Aspects to help out.

Mental Mouse

When Captain used it to fulfill an order, she gained physical power, but I'm pretty sure she also got a share of “unstoppability” – her story became “Captain has been given an order, and so she shall fulfill it come what may”.

shikkarasu

Hot take: This phalange is the first (that I can remember) woman with curly dark hair to appear that has not been almost immediately confirmed to be the Bard. Cat doesn't recognise her. I don't trust her.

Dredcor

Right after talking about the Varlet using poison the Phalange comes up with a cup of tea? Super sus.

Mental Mouse

At this point, I'm pretty sure Cat would be able to casually detect tampering with the tea or the courier, and if Cat didn't, the Pilgrim would. And she did gate ahead while ordering the tea delivered to her destination. Wouldn't be surprised if the rank-pin provided more than mundane authentication as well.

Ferro

Drake: Really, sowing the dragon's tooth as a regen mechanism?

Daniel E

Man, I feel terrible for that poor SoB at the end; got his mind and/or soul ganked by Drake. Reminds me of what Agent Smith did in the last Matrix.

JBeari

Man, I just got hit with the obvious realization that Cat is not the good guy in this story, and actually I'm questioning if she's even the “right” guy in this story, all of a sudden. That line where she proclaims that her army is proudly willing to sacrifice for the cause was giving me some major fash vibes, like Trump talking about his handsome generals or something.

I mean, she already knows that at least one of her highest ranking officers actively hates serving but is only there out of fear of what Cat will do if she leaves. Seems insane and insanely out of touch for a “hero of the common people” protagonist to say something so confidently that is highly debatable at best. Hell, I can imagine a new spin off story focusing on a character like Cat that gets a Name to represent the common soldier against a power hungry and deluded tyrant named Catherine Foundling.

Even worse is if she's not deluded, but correct. That's some Starship Troopers “I'm doing my part” levels of facism to get that sort of unquestioning loyalty and willingness to sacrifice themselves.

Made me also wonder, why exactly is Cat looking forward to getting a new Name? I thought she really appreciated the idea that she was able to shrug off the influence the gods have over her via her name, and she hated the idea of not being in control of herself when she was Winter. Seems a bit contrived to suggest that her revulsion of being manipulated against her will is specifically only for Fae stuff and not a general character trait. Don't know too many people irl who hate authority but only highly specific types of authority and are all about every other kind.

I might not be remembering something correctly but on reflection it seems a really abrupt change from "Gods are bad and Names are bad because Gods control Names" to "I cant wait to get my name, hello personification of my Name that is a symbol of the influence someone else has over me, I missed you so much."

JBeari

Although, having said that, I can imagine some clever 11th hour twist that reveals that the only reason she was excited was because she can use the super powerful moment of being Named as a sacrifice to fuel some huge victory, like Heisenbach did when she rejected her name but instead got the all the respect and political power she needs to stay in charge and wipe the slate of the ill advised Crusade clean.

Tbh, that would be a really cool and meta twist and now I'm cautiously optimistic about that. Anime style massive powerups make for really awesome moments, but kinda bad overall stories in my opinion.

Mental Mouse

> That line where she proclaims that her army is proudly willing to sacrifice for the cause was giving me some major fash vibes, like Trump talking about his handsome generals or something.

Nope. Even in America with all our national obsession with personal freedom, the Armed Forces know that being a soldier means being ready to die for the cause – and that willingness to die for the cause is what sets a soldier apart from mere civilians. And Cat is a near-demigod leading her troops in a war against an existential threat to not just the people, but the nations and the very lands. We've already seen how cowardice is treated in the Army, and that wasn't even Cat handling that. As for Abigail... as I've said before, she tells herself she's a coward, but she's no such thing. Where Abigail is thinking to herself "if I run they'll hang me", an actual coward would just be running already... not leading a charge. Bravery isn't about not being afraid, it's about feeling the fear, and going ahead anyway.

And Cat has chased off a couple of Names that were just "the story of the moment", which would have bound her into lesser Roles and stories – and which couldn't form fast enough to keep up with her own transformations. This time, the forming Name is Hers, the representation of everything she has become. And this Name probably isn't going to be some cliché like Black Queen, it'll be a new Name, never seen before.

JBeari

I understand that the bravery and service is how the Armed Forces market themselves, but let's not kid ourselves that all or even most of the members are ready to die to the national anthem while an eagle flies overhead because they just believe in America and the mission so much.

True, the types of wars that America starts are pretty different from this story. I imagine an existential threat with someone who is so obviously Evil is a lot better for morale than knowing you were sent to die alone in the desert because some oil tycoon wanted to save 50 cents on the price per barrel, or that the defense contracting industry needs to slaughter foreign civilians in the name of democracy so they can put together a pretty PowerPoint on why they should be funded even more.

Granted. But you would still say that everybody that died because the artificer was saving her power wasn't at all bitter that they didn't get help that could have saved them? You'd say that everyone in her army that's died so far has done so with a satisfied smile because they believe in the cause so much?

Seems really far fetched. Real world history mostly shows us that no matter how strong morale is, soldiers still would prefer to live over a brutal and agonizing death. Or that they would have friends they made in the army that traumatize them to the core when they have to watch them get ripped to shreds on the front lines.

War is rarely so neat as the propaganda tries to sell it as. To my point, the exception to that comes from the really fucked up societies that teach people that some ideal (usually racism) is worth more than any human life, and that it's an honor, the only honor one can have, to die for dear leader.

Either way, not a good look for our warlord friend here.

Not that I blame the story or the author, mind you. This plot thread is a very old trope that's been sold to people especially hard in recent times to justify a bunch of atrocities in real life, so it's not difficult to accidentally slide into it if you're not paying attention. My comment isn't a criticism of the story, rather an interpretation that I wanted to share since it seemed novel and that might interest people to hear it.

Mental Mouse

Certainly the US's modern wars are a lot closer to Procer's prior adventures than to the Dead King fight – basically our last "moral" war was WW2. But even in the age of corporate war and state-sponsored terrorism, the essence of being a soldier is fighting and potentially dying at someone else's orders, and the grunts don't get to pick and choose.

That's much of what makes the bond among veterans, and among those who aren't outright broken and/or alienated by combat, it can actually strengthen a soldier's loyalty to downright obsessive levels; essentially, any doubt would call into question the value of their prior sacrifices, so no doubt can be permitted or tolerated.

Tom

> Man, I just got hit with the obvious realization that Cat is not the good guy in this story

Actually we got a view from Kairos's perspective via his Wish aspect that indicates that she's definitely "the good guy":

> The Queen of Callow still bore one of the strongest wishes he had ever seen, pulsing with her heartbeat: peace, peace, peace. It was like watching a flower bloom anew with every beat. Even now it was all he could do not to laugh until his throat bled, for what an exquisite jest it was that one of Below's finest servants in the long history of Calernia was at heart one of Above's!

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/10/14/interlude-wicked/>

Jack

Damn, I feel really bad for that last dude. I thought he was gonna be a hero (small h hero) who saved the Pilgram from an enemy's last ditch spite attack.

Instead he got ganked.

The orcbros with the greatshields were pretty cool though. Always nice to see a regular guy get a hit in on Named combatants.

Zim the Vixen

“It was mostly luck that I was in the fort when the attack hit.”

I am kind of wondering if Cat’s luck is some kind of... providence?

Mental Mouse

Some of that. Cat has become the Mistress of story-wrangling, able to tap into both villainous and heroic stories. She’s not quite making Creation dance to her tune, but she can manage the rhythms of story and “luck” as she used to control the rhythm of a mere fight.

mavant

Kayode understands Royalty. Reach Heaven through violence.

aran

AND THEN A SKELETON POPPED OUT

Chapter 68: Opposition

“No matter how long you glare at the sun, it will not blink first.”

– Taghreb saying

I missed using a shield.

It didn’t really fit with my fighting style anymore – digging in when you had a bad leg was a good way to trip and stumble into a very stupid death – but there’d been something both comforting and satisfying about having a large slab of metal to put between myself and the enemy. Now I had to keep my eye on the enemy at all times, to gauge and parry and manoeuvre without rest. Just taking the hit and then smashing my foes had been both simpler and, honesty compelled me to admit, viscerally satisfying in a way that all this finesse and calculation wasn’t. I knew a thing or two about pulling strings, these days, but I suspected that deep down it was the lessons of the Pit that’d always stay engraved in bones: blood and sinew, the vicious satisfaction of just decking someone in the face.

Still, it felt good to engage sword in hand. I slapped aside the skeleton's blow – strong but slow, and so very predictable – and smashed its bare skull with the pommel of my sword, a shiver of Night accompanying the crack of bone breaking. The necromancy keeping it animate broke and the pile of bones collapsed, leaving me free to cast a glance around. The enemy had successfully scaled the wall in the centre stretch after making a ramp out of dead, wet ghouls that fireballs couldn't touch but the other two attempts at the extremities of the Boot's 'sole' had failed when the Light of House Insurgent incinerated the attempts in a way that magefire could not.

Now even here, where we'd been taken by surprise, the last of the dead were being put down as I watched. It'd not been a major setback, all in all, with perhaps only two hundred skeletons and ghouls making it up here before they were surrounded and contained, but it'd had the potential to turn dangerous. If the enemy had kept pouring troops there, it could have turned into a beachhead. Yet I found, even as my soldiers began to cheer our temporary victory, that my heart did not lift. My eyes remained on the silhouettes in the distance, the utterly still ranks of the dead standing just outside of the range of our ballistas.

Even though this had been a weak foothold, and made in a place where my army would have rather sharp teeth in its counterattack – our defences were geared around holding the peninsula first and foremost, since we'd known it would likely face the worst of the assaults – it had been a foothold. The first the enemy had managed to keep since they'd begun their attacks this morning. Yet the enemy general had not reinforced his attacking force after sending that first wave of three thousand or so, leaving the three prongs to fail and be wiped out. Most of the enemy army had never engaged, and was watching us in silence even now. Waiting, patient as only the soldiers of the grave could be.

"What are you up to now?" I murmured, leaning against my staff.

The general I was facing this time was canny in the way that the intelligence behind the Second Battle of Lauzon's Hollow hadn't been. That thing with the ghoul ramps? It'd been an adaptation to the fact that, as long as Archer had unravellers to use as arrows, she was a hard counter to Keter's usual tactic of using large constructs as siege ramps and troop transports. The artefacts were too precious to be used on ghouls, especially when they were being used by the hundreds here. In fact the only constructs we'd seen used so far had been the great snakes that'd beached near the fort, and those had stayed under the water until the very last moment.

We are being tested, I thought, eyes watching the rows of the dead. Three thousand of the most expendable among the undead gathering to face us as Maillac's Boot had just been tossed at my defences like scraps off a plate, just to test the strengths and weakness of our arrangements. And you sent a handful of a Revenants out, I then thought, to probe what kind of Named there are on our side too. It was a good thing, I grimly thought, that I'd always intended to keep Masego and Akua back as long as possible. Even just the awareness of their presence might have been enough to forewarn my enemy some.

The cheers washed over me and I painted a smile on my face, raising my sword in victory to roars of approval, but the joy did not reach my eyes. I wasn't so sure we'd truly gotten the better out of this round, not in the way that mattered, and that unsettled me. Still, I could hardly bemoan about what looked like a win to most of my soldiers. I went around and gave praise and encouragement where they should go, limping along the rampart to harden the spine of my soldiers before the next assault. Time passed and the sun kept rising in the sky, the hour slowly edging away from Morning Bell and towards Noon Bell, and though the quiet on the fronts was pleasing to my soldier it had dread slowly settling in my stomach.

We'd been seen through.

Under the excuse of having a drink of water – the sun was hammering down hard, and we were all baking in our helmets – I left the wall and settled further in, having discreetly sent for General Hune. I stood in the shadow cast by the ogre, pulling at a canteen, and wiped my mouth as I nodded back to her greetings.

"They're not attacking," I bluntly said.

I wasn't saying anything she or anyone with eyes didn't already know, but the two of us knew the danger represented by that sentence. We'd been counting on our enemy hitting us as soon as it could assemble a wave, trying to grind us down through constant battle, but instead the opposition had called a halt after a single major assault.

"They must be waiting for the second wave to arrive," General Hune said. "That complicates matters, Your Majesty."

It fucking well did. For one, we wouldn't be dealing with twenty thousand undead and then later that day thirty – or perhaps even forty – thousand more. The opposition was gathering for a single sweep, an overwhelming wave. That was... problematic. It wasn't like we'd not considered the possibility that the enemy would try to besiege us instead of battle on our terms, but we'd never meant to actually stay here long enough for it to be an issue. The plan had been to break the first two waves and then evacuate before the third could arrive, using the pharos device to open a large enough amount of gates for it to be feasible, but this changed things. The moment we actually used the device, now, then the enemy would begin its attack. Whoever the leading commander on the other side was, they'd clearly grasped the core weakness of my position: an evacuation through the Twilight Ways when under assault meant that at least my rearguard was going to get slaughtered.

Facing fifty thousand dead, though, and all the horrors Keter had to unleash? Shit, we'd maybe lose a third of the ten thousand soldiers of the Second Army on our way out. There'd be a point in the battle where three thousand or so soldiers would be trying to squeeze through the gates while surrounded on all sides and without the support of the rest of the army. Juniper had run war games, and when that tipping point was reached what ensued was... grim, to say the least. Fuck. If the dead had been intending on standing there and doing nothing as we left I would have waved them on my way out and called it a day, but there was no way they'd be willing to do me that favour.

"Your opinion?" I asked.

"We must prepare for a fighting retreat into the ways and use the pharos device the moment our forces are in place," General Hune replied without hesitation. "Within the hour at most. The second wave will begin arriving soon, and it will only get worse from there."

I hummed noncommittally. I got from her words that the ogre general was seeing this as a choice needing to be made between two fighting retreats: one begun now, while the enemy was not yet fully gathered, or one begun later when it had. There would be no extracting ourselves from this without losing a few fingers. Much as I did not like to consider it, I honestly wasn't sure she was wrong. We'd made plans for the enemy showing restraint, so it wasn't like we were going into this blind – officers had been briefed, we'd even planned out which parts of the defences should be abandoned first – but we'd never really considered that the enemy would just toss three thousand expendables at us and then just... stand there.

Even our worst case had the enemy pulling out after effective losses of half its number, choosing to bolster the second wave rather than waste the rest of its numbers on a fruitless assault.

"We could attempt to break out towards the east," I finally said.

"I will obey that order if it is given," General Hune blandly replied.

I cocked an eyebrow.

"But," I said, invitation implicit.

"It is my opinion that we would find ourselves in the same situation as now in a day, only without the fortifications and retreat plan," Hune said. "Even going on the offensive and attempting to smash the first wave before the second arrives would be a superior option, to my eye. We would incur losses, but should we then retreat to our fortifications our original plan could then be resumed, if at a disadvantage."

I grimaced. Taking a swing at the dead in the swamp wasn't really something I wanted to do unless there was no other option: the undead would be better at fighting in the muck, and it wasn't like Keter had even been shy about poisoning water. No, an attack of my infantry into that mire was a dead end. And yet I had some difficulty resigning myself to making a decision that would be, in essence, writing off a third of the Second Army. The thought had me clenching my fingers, even though the cold thing that lay at the heart of me knew that I'd give the order if I had to, but I would not bend my neck to this ending before first attempting otherwise.

"We'll attempt to force them into an attack first," I said. "My people have been working on a project that might leave them no other option – and even if they manage to withstand it, we'll first be able to thin the herd before retreating."

General Hune's eyes narrowed.

"Then Your Majesty agrees that a retreat is in order," she said.

"I do," I admitted. "And you'll need to inform your officer cadres we might be headed there. But first I want to see if the dead can be strong-armed into wasting themselves on our walls."

"And might you do that?" the ogre skeptically asked.

"By making it clear it's the least wasteful option left to them," I replied with a hard smile.

It was time to for Masego to come out.

—

"I've not managed to increase the effective range," Hierophant admitted, "not laterally, at least."

"Which still leaves vertically," I grunted. "If the Summoner makes a flying beast and we strap your platform to the back, can you cast?"

He mulled over that for a moment.

"Yes," Masego finally said. "I cannot promise the same degree of precision that the solid ground would allow for, however."

"If there's one good thing about our situation, Zeze," I said, "it's that even if you miss, you'll hit."

"That sounds like a blatant logical contradiction," he noted, "but I will take your word for it."

"Kind of you," I drily replied. "I'll be handling the Summoner, so ready your affairs and wait for us on the Boot."

The Summoner's reaction to the order was mixed: on one hand, he had cowardly tendencies and preferred not to put himself in great danger. It'd already spread through the ranks that some of the Scourges were here. On the other hand, I'd made it clear that this was a crucial task I'd attend to as well and that'd flattered his self-importance. Still, there was no arguing with a direct order from me when it came to battlefield affairs. The wyvern-construct still had that unearthly glow, but it looked much more sharply defined now. I could make out the shift of muscles when it moved, and there was an animal cunning in its eyes. It was also smart enough to be terrified of Hierophant, which was plain good sense.

The Summoner had warned me that it might get unruly when Masego tied a flat circular stone atop its back, but instead the construct did not dare move a muscle. It behaved around Hierophant the same way a deer would around a lion – frozen and hoping the predator wasn't hungry today. We took flight without much fanfare, to sparse cheers from my soldiers. I wove an anchor for my feet on the wyvern's back and added a transparent bubble to shield me from the winds. The Summoner led us towards the enemy ranks, as I'd asked him to, but stayed high in the sky. We'd yet to see buzzards in the area so our flight was not contested, though I doubted that would last forever.

We circled slowly atop the front ranks of the enemy, Masego wresting magic from a few spare artifacts so he might steady himself atop the circular stone. A bubble rather similar to mine formed around him, and I shouted for the Summoner to halt the construct's flight and make it stay in place. Long, deft fingers began to trace runes in the air as I risked a glance downwards. The dead were splayed out for what must have been the better part of a mile but none were paying attention to us at the moment. Safety through heights? It was true that without buzzards around Keter would find it hard to contest our presence up here. We were high up enough that neither arrows nor javelins were a worry, and magic would be seen long before it became a threat.

"Abyss and firmament," the Hierophant said, and though his voice was quiet it rippled. "I take the shape of the star and the depth of the pit, borrowing laws high and low."

Below us, moving as a single entity, seventeen thousand undead heads turned to gaze up at us.

"That can't be good," I muttered.

"I have woven curses into hymn, stuffed a heart with straw," the Hierophant called out, voiced cadenced. "That which is hollow I have raised onto the dais, revered as glorious under three skies and revered by nine corners."

From below a tide of darkness rose, but I realized after a heartbeat that it was not a ritual. It was a few thousand curses, thrown at us together from as many hands. I clenched my staff closely, hoping to the Hells that Masego was done with that incantation soon.

"Behold," the Hierophant said.

I winced, covering my ears at the horrid grind that lay behind the word. The Sisters murmured uneasily in the back of my mind.

"Behold," the Hierophant said, "all ye with eyes, for I have made a god of clay and it is an idol of wrath."

The sky screamed. There was no other word for it. The air wavered and shrieked and twisted, an alien gleam filling my vision as I pulled down my hood to shield my eyes. As if a god had breathed out in front of us, the wyvern banked wildly and had to struggle not to fall – the Summoner screamed, voice shrilly – but after less than a heartbeat the pressure was all gone. I first glimpsed Masego, panting as he stood surrounded by fading runes, and only after making sure he was fine did I glance down. Gods, I thought. There was a smoking crater in the swamp, maybe a hundred feet wide, and though water was streaking back in it looked like the... smite had baked the very mud. How many undead had been vaporized with that, I wondered. Two, three hundred? Likely more, and a great wave was going through the swamp that toppled more than a few soldiers. Of the curses that had been rising to hit us, there was no trace. Much like, I thought, a child throwing a pebble into the path of falling mountain would not be able to pick it out afterwards.

"Can you do that again?" I asked, tone calm.

"I believe so," Masego noted. "Though not many times."

"Then do it," I ordered with a hard smile.

Power began to gather again, and below us I found exactly what I'd wanted: advancing as one, the dead were headed towards the Second Army. Decisive, I silently praised the enemy general. The moment they'd realized that it was possible we'd just stay up here and hammer them into nothing, they'd abandoned the notion of sieging my army and begun to close the distance. If the dead were too close to my own troops, after all, it'd be risky to keep using this. Still, they weren't out of the woods yet. I wove Night over my ears and dug my feet in, as Masego's voice swelled in incantation again, wondering how many shots we'd get in before he was too exhausted to continue.

The answer, as it turned out, was six.

It didn't matter, as by then the enemy was committed to an assault on all our defences and all that pulling out would accomplish was allow us to smash the undead army as it retreated. We flew back to the Boot, and though I was wary the whole way back there was no ambush. Bo buzzards came out of nowhere, no Revenants were tossed up in the sky. It made sense, I admitted to myself, since we weren't fighting a field army here so much as a bunch of warbands and marching columns tossed in our direction when we popped out. I supposed it was a testament to how fucking unpleasant of an adversary the Dead King was that even when luck allowed us to get one over him I still ended up unsure it wasn't a ploy on his part.

"Your service in this campaign has been exemplary," I told the Summoner after he dismissed his wyvern.

Much as I disliked the man personally, he'd ended up consistently useful. Being unpleasant didn't mean he shouldn't get praised, just that it'd irk me to dole it out.

"I am pleased to have my worth recognized by my queen," the Summoner replied, smirking. "I hope to continue to be of service after these trifles, of course."

My eyes narrowed. The little shit had been born and raised and Procer, as far as I knew, but he had been insisting he was Callowan for some time. The offer of 'continued service' was pretty straightforward, meaning he wanted to settle in Callow after the war and probably expected a lordship to be tacked on to sweeten the deal. Considering he wasn't all that difficult to deal with and his ambitions seemed relatively limited, I wasn't necessarily opposed to that. So long as it was a court title with no lands attached. Mind you, that wasn't my decision alone to make. I wasn't foisting him off on Vivienne without giving her a say in the matter.

"I look forward to it," I mildly said, "and will pass along your sentiments to Lady Dartwick."

"It would be an honour," the Summoner said, "to make her acquaintance."

Yeah, that one definitely wanted to settle in Callow after the war. I wasn't sure I could blame him, considering short of Praes it'd probably end up one of the nations that least minded villains. So long as he stayed loyal to crown and country, it was not an inaccurate assessment for him to figure he'd not only be tolerate but actively protected. If he was loyal then he would be considered as an asset, and Vivienne was of a practical bent when it came to protecting Callowan interests. Some of the decisions I had made she would not ever repeat, but that did not mean she was naïve – just that she was not as good as ignoring the whispers of her conscience.

I escorted Masego to a healer's tent so he might rest, ignoring his protests, and only then went to join the battle. His exhaustion was not a threat to his health, but the healers were unlikely to let him out of a bed in his state and Zeze's fathers had drilled into him the paramount importance of not ignoring what your healer told you. It'd been with the addendum that priests were fumbling ignorant cheats and this rule mostly applied to mage healers, but I liked to think the years had mostly weaned Masego out of that instilled disdain.

There was no lack of enemies for me to fight anywhere along the defensive lines, but it was on the Boot that I stayed. Even as swarms of skeletons and ghouls assaulted the walls and my soldiers stubbornly held on the walls, retreating only when officers pulled on their whistles and fresh troops were rotated in, I smothered a smile. This was hard fighting, but it was also a victory of sorts: the enemy and I had stared each other down across this swamp, and with Masego's help it had been the enemy that blinked first. Now it was bleeding away its strength failing to take our walls, and though it was not without casualties on our side the advantage was decisively ours.

For every soldier we lost they lost four, and our wounded weren't left to die – they were pulled back, brought to the healer tents. I moved along the wall, sticking to wherever the fight was hardest, and through thrice the enemy earned a foothold atop the wall thrice that foothold was clawed back. As the time passed, though, the lack of Revenants entering the fray began to weigh on me. The opposing general was keeping its trump cards away from us, unwilling to risk them before what was likely to be the decisive stretch: the assault of the second wave. Still, this round went well for us. When it became undeniable that any more lingering would lead to a complete wipeout the enemy broke away, limping back into the swamps under the fire of our mages and the House Insurgent.

I headed towards my general's tent when the last of the dead walked out of range, intent on hearing casualty reports. Though the official reports were still incomplete, Hune already had estimates when I found her: at least five hundred dead and seven hundred wounded. Even for a well-prepared defensive action, I found the numbers astonishing and told her as much. Her general staff preened, but she was unmoved.

"It is only initial reports, Your Majesty," General Hune said. "We will see if the real figures remain so flattering."

"I expect they will," I said. "The Second Army had yet to fail a single expectation I set out for it."

Not that I'd set out many, but a little praise could go a long way. Officers gossiped with officers, and that gossip had a way of trickling down to the ranks. After that, though, I headed to my own tent. I'd been fighting sporadically since early morning and drawing on Night regularly, so I was damn exhausted. Since Archer was keeping an eye out for necromantic constructs, still on her perch, it was one of the phalanges that helped me out of my armour. It was now almost an hour past Noon Bell, I learned, and I recalled that we believed the second wave would begin arriving slightly before Afternoon Bell. That still left me at least an hour and change to nap, which I hoped would refresh me when the next round of fighting came.

Gods knew that my leg ached like a bloody wound, at the moment, and staying on my feet would only make it worse. I crawled into bed with strict instructions to wake me if there was another assault, but otherwise leave me to my slumber for at least an hour. Clutching a blanket, I spent the first few moments wondering what my enemy's plan were and if I would find sleep at all, but before I knew it exhaustion had triumphed over worry: I fell into a deep, dark slumber.

—

I woke up tasting my sweat against the roof of my mouth, likely stinking all the way up to the Heavens. Most of my affairs were already packed, in deference to the rapidly approaching need to evacuate this place, but there was still a bowl of water for me to rinse myself up a little. It was hardly a wash, but what would be the point? I was headed back into the thick of it anyway, and the afternoon soon would be no more kind than the morning one had been. I'd woken before any of the phalanges could wake me, and found a pair of them standing guard outside my tent.

"I'll need one of you to help me back into my armour," I said. "And reports, meanwhile."

As it turned out, during my hour of sleep I'd missed little. The enemy had pulled back even further than before, and while General Hune believed that the vanguard of the second wave might have begun to arrive early there'd been no way to be sure. Sending scouts into that swamp, even our nimblest goblins, would just be throwing away lives. I decided to speak with Hune before returning to the fronts, to get a read on when she believed we should pull the trigger on the pharos device, and inquired as to her whereabouts as I fastened the Mantle of Woe over my armour.

"She is in her tent, Your Majesty," the young phalange told me.
"Speaking with her staff tribune, I believe."

Good, at least I knew the way. Though my limp was not quick it was steady, and with my sword back on my belt I made my way to the tent. I was a mere thirty feet away from it when a splash of red in the sky to the south caught my attention. A signal spell, I thought. An attack on the palisade? An assault would have been seen coming, though, and I would have heard of it. Unless it was a strike by Revenants, I thought, but it seemed a bold and unnecessary gambled on the enemy general's part. Perhaps a force had been snuck out under an obfuscation spell. Regardless, with the Grey Pilgrim there and reinforcements no doubt already on their way I had little to worry about.

Two guards were standing outside of Hune's tent, but their stances were natural. It wasn't that that gave it away. It was the scent. I'd known enough battlefields that I would recognize the scent of fresh blood anywhere. Stomach dropping I hurried forward, tapping one of the guards gently with my staff only to see the armoured orc topple – already dead, just propped up to look as if still alive. The scent of blood was even thicker inside the tent, I smelled as I forced open the flap, but it was my ears that I was relying on and it saved my life. I heard the spin of the throwing knife that should have buried itself in my left eye and hastily ducked down, just in time to see a grey-cloaked figure turn away from me.

The Varlet. I'd recognize the cloak anywhere.

And just as I drew on Night, spinning up a work, I saw the Varlet dance around a blow of the tall, roaring Hune – made silent by some aspect, for all her shouting – and flicker forward to carve open my general's throat.

Anomandris

Ouch. Poor Hune...

Although this would never happen to Abigail.....

dadycool

If this keeps up, Cat will be forced to make her the most relevant person on the battlefield.

NerfContessa

Or,. You know,. Raise. Hune in case she doesn't survive, with night if not with magic.

I'm sure a dark ogre will work as well as a normal one.

Cat HAS to start to invest night some time soon.

Darkening

We've yet to see Night zombies display the kind of intelligence Winter zombies did. All of Cat's new Zombie horses don't have the intelligence her fey horse did, RIP. So raising Hune is probably pretty pointless, and even if it did work, having undead assets in important positions in a campaign against the Dead King is just, a laughably bad idea, since he'd eventually find a way to hijack them.

NerfContessa

True.

Changing my. Point to "save her using night and granting her night to continue living".
Night ogres now that's the stuff...

Liliet

I think it's possible to save her using night without her requiring night to continue living.

Shveiran

I don't, myself. We were told repeatedly that Night is a "thief" power, and there are things it is bad for. Usually it was in the context of direct confrontations ("it wasn't a soldier's power") but I don't think it is any closer to a healer power.

It is possible Hune doesn't need anything more than a stopgap measure until a priest can get on the scene, so yeah, I'm on board with a "cauterizing wounds with Night flames" sort of scenario, but anything more than that... You can't do surgery with a sword, you know? You need a scalpel, or you'll make a mess and kill your patient just as surely as if you did nothing. Maybe more.

shikkarasu

Someone really needs to harvest a priest or a talented mage-healer. Imagine the Secrets that could be stolen...

Liliet

IIRC Cat can "freeze" wounds with Night so they don't get worse. That's how she survived a neck stab that one time.

IDKWhoitis

Abigail would have been avoiding her own tent, in one part because healthy dose of paranoia, and another 3 parts of avoiding responsibilities and Catherine (not sure in which order there)

Frivolous

Abigail is going to absolutely freak when she learns she might become an assassination target by Scourges.

I predict a round of running in circles and screaming, unless Catherine is present, in which case all the running and screaming might just be internal.

RoflCat

Clearly she'll isolate herself in paranoia, away from any potential assassin in disguise because we got those before.

And the Revenants will be wary instead, because by picking an isolated place, she also actually picked an open place, meaning it's very hard to sneak upon her, like an arena as if she's ready for a duel and gonna get her Name through fighting the assassin.

Not to mention an open area without cover = Archer is going to destroy you.

So instead the assassin will just back off, clearly not willing to give Catherine a commander-type Name, especially one with reputation for some highly effective strategic choice.

Frivolous

I think your analyses of the tactics and of Abigail are correct.

This means Abigail, if she should ascend to command of the 2nd Army, will declare: "Tents are Verboten! Everyone sleeps and eats out in the open! Including me!"

"I don't care if I have to dress and undress where everyone can see me! I'd rather be embarrassed than dead!"

shikkarasu

She will reveal herself just as the tide is turning against the army thinking "Gods -above, below and wherever else- can noone think in this army? If I don't do something soon I'll get killed anyway."

The people will remember Cat's switch with Thief that one time and assume that Abigail used an undead doppleganger or something. Soon they will start whispering Squire when she passes by...

NerfContessa

I'd actually love that, just as much as the above.

But Abigail is so. Far sadly only comedy gold.
So IF she. Lucks into a name,. Why not the bumbling general/p

Javvies

Except that she's not actually bumbling. At anything.

She's highly competent, and more importantly, insanely lucky.

She wants to avoid responsibility as much as possible, sure, but she wants to do so in such a way that she survives and can safely go back home to Callow and retire and live comfortably on her pension.

It's her efforts to avoid responsibility and get forcibly retired (but in such a way that she keeps her pensions and other perks of retiring at rank) that keep failing in ways that we readers (and Cat) find hilarious, and end up making her viewed as more popular and successful by others.

Plus, above all else, Abigail is a survivor first – even if it means taking on responsibilities that she doesn't want to.

She's like Ciaphas Cain – both think of themselves as cowards out for their own survival and wellbeing ... but their actions belie their internal self deprecation. In part because they have earned a reputation that helps and protects them, and they want to protect the reputation that protects them.

Ultimately, it's their own self interest that drives them into doing things that they say they don't want anything to do with, and doing those things to high standards of performance.

To everyone else, Cain is a Hero of the Imperium; Abigail is madly successful heroic/Icon General of Callow (currently not actually Named or empowered by Above), so a small h hero, in the positive icon sense.

Let's remember, the Story/Narrative is as much about how you and your actions are perceived as anything else.

And Procer and Levant have been introduced to Abigail and the survivor of the decapitation stroke on the Third Army, who rallied and held the lines against a surprise attack immediately following the decapitation strike. Since then, she's been mentored by Cat, had command of the section where Robber and his cohort ganked a lot of the Dominion's Binders, and then rolled over most of the rest who were deployed and their escorts with a seemingly perfectly timed deployment of a detachment of the Order of Broken Bells.

Since then, she's been further mentored by Cat – some/may would call her a protege of Cat – and had success in the war against Keter.

Oh, and now Cat has assigned Scribe as her assistant.

Exactly none of Abigail's Story says bumbler or fool, or a comic relief type Name. Her Story would tend towards a cunning and/or trickster type leadership Name, IMO.

Liliet

Let's not forget that Cat's first thought upon seeing the situation in Sarcella was that Nauk improved as a commander since she last saw him.

shikkarasu

Oh, I missed that!

Liliet

I expect the other way around – Abigail presents a much more together face to people who aren't Catherine.

Twilight Glimmer

Calling it! The Varlet will escape and be killed accidentally by Abigail off screen.

'Ladi Williams

I sincerely hope cat can save hune...she is still alive...the assassin is on the way to kill her.

EE pls find it somewhere in your heart to save hune.

Darkening

It kinda reads like it already carved through her throat right there at the end, but it's entirely possible it's just mid swing and we'll get an interruption at the beginning of next chapter. Or maybe Ogres have such thick necks it won't have struck deep enough. I mean, there can only be a relative handful of Named on the continent with experience fighting ogres given how much of a minority they are, so it's likely this assassin has no idea about ogre physiology lol.

Adrian V

She is an ogree, there is a lot of throat there i imagine, i am more worried about poison but again hopefully her non human physiology can help i hope. I give it 50/50 chances goign either way depending of how skilled the healers are and if they are close enough (including GP who could certainly save her).

Again depends mostly on the poison, without it i would give her 80% chances of surviving.

Shveiran

This is a top-notch Named Assassin. The kind that has poisons that can kill Named. Remember Assassin almost killing the Ashen Priestess?

Ogre or no, if she was poisoned she is a goner unless a Named Healer intervenes.

Liliet

If only there was one of those around...

Named or not, the effectiveness of a poison is proportionate to body mass. It'll take longer for her to die of poison measured to kill humans quickly.

Frivolous

I have to wonder whether what ogre anatomy is like. Cat's POV and the other POVs have never mentioned it.

Humans have carotid arteries. What do ogres have? Does the Varlet have any experience assassinating ogres?

If ogre anatomy in the throat has even minor differences from the human, then different techniques might be necessary to quickly kill an ogre that way.

Javvies

Uh-oh.

That's not good.

Aren't there supposed to be wards against infiltration and this kind of thing happening?

Hune is probably a goner, but if there's a healer close enough, maybe she could be saved, if not combat ready for a while. It will, however, complicate the withdrawal, and the especially battle that appears to be kicking off earlier than expected, depending on just how many officers Varlet has managed to take out. On the other hand, it's a Legion/Army of Callow force, not a Proceran or Levantine one, and so while decapitation strikes hurt, especially in terms of skill, training, and experience, there's a clearly defined hierarchy and chain of command/succession, which mitigates the damage. Sadly, I don't think there's an Abigail to replace Hune the way Abby replaced Nauk, but Cat is present this time.

Frivolous

And yet Keter must be aware that the army it is facing is Callowan. Keter must know that Hune is replaceable.

So why did it try to kill Hune? Just because it can? It seems a waste of the Varlet's actions.

Alternatives to Hune: Varlet could have killed the Summoner. Varlet could have gone on a mass murder spree through the priests of the House of Light.

So why Hune? There must be a reason. Keter is never stupid. Keter always has a strategy in mind.

Dredcor

Named are usually pretty resilient to assassination attempts, so I very much doubt the Varlet would have much luck going for the Summoner.

The Priests definitely would have kicked up a fuss. Too public. Increased chance a Named would intervene and that would put the Varlet in danger.

The General's tent isn't going to have many visitors, so easy in-and-out assassination. Minimize the risks.

Mammon

That the Callowan officers aren't an Achilles Heel that makes the army topple or fall apart when taken out, they're still not just insignificant.

Fewer officers means the ones that remain will be overworked more and become more prone to mistakes, there has to be either a hole in the ranks or the ranks have to be shuffled mid-battle with all the confusion that it entails, and in both cases the new officers have to be brought up to speed and get used to being in command at all.

Plenty of opportunities for the army to make mistakes or be sloppy. Even when they're the Legions of Terror, Callowan edition.

haihappen

I think the goal would be to delay/disrupt the evacuation planning/organization such that the all-out attack can wipe out the Army.

No going after Masego, which is rather exhausted after the smite-y business, would make sense if the Dead King's goal is to obliterate the army. Named alone cannot turn back the undead tide, unless there is a story there, and DK knows how to avoid them. That is also a reason he is not trying to eliminate them: backing Villians, or worse, Heroes into a corner is a sure way to trigger a story, especially if they are beaten badly enough.

308924810a

Is she replaceable? I mean, the legions of Terror are built to tolerate officer assassinations, but the armies of callow have been short on new officers for years.

IDKWhoitis

Aspects, even dead ones, trump Wards. Viv had something similar that could suppress a paranoid Akua's Wards, so it's not beyond belief here.

I feel like due to a repeating pattern, Catherine is going to name the 2nd Army something. What will the name be? I don't know, but something tenacious and stubborn.

Mental Mouse

The cognomens are a reward for not just excellence, but distinctive excellence. They also apply specifically to the Legions, while the 2nd Army is a coalition that happens to include a Legion or two.

King Julius

Generally, yes. But one of the Callowan armies was given a Cognomen by Cat earlier. Third Army under Nauk (now Abigail) is Dauntless.

stevenneiman

I would imagine that there are wards and other defenses, but remember that Revenants are only a small step down from Named, and basically no defense is absolute against Named specialized to deal with it.

Sir Nil

Well DK is doing Cats own trick. Back when she and Winter took out all of the lower command of the Procer army. Even if there is always someone else to take command, if you clear everyone on a link then the chain is broken regardless.

Sir Nil

Also Hierophant's chant was beautiful. He knows he has done nothing but create imitation miracles but he has done so much with them regardless.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Behold," the Hierophant said, "all ye with eyes, for I have made a god of topwebfictions and it is an idol of boosts."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

caoimhinh

It is an idol of votes.

Frivolous

That was a great poem Masego chanted to do the smiting. Very nice and evocative.

I'm surprised Varlet tried to kill Hune first. Or maybe not so surprised; maybe Keter decided that killing Catherine had too low a probability of success.

Mental Mouse

Going after Catherine or Masego would just lose the Revenant. Hune is one of their best commanders, so a very relevant target, and not Named, so an achievable target.

Frivolous

The epigraph for Opposition is funny in relation to the happenings therein; the sun doesn't blink, and neither do the dead, yet Keter did "blink" first.

Or does that mean that Catherine is the sun of this story? Because that would be very interesting.

ninegardens

So... just from a pacing and storytelling perspective, can I just say how much I love how EE has emphasized Hune's presence over the course of this present war Arc?

Like... not as a main character, but as a character that is consistently relevant.

Also, with the number of healers around, I'll put... 1 in 5 odds on Hune's survival?

Not great, but not nothing either.

dadycoool

Gods, FUCKING Dammit. We knew this was going far too well, and now yet another of her War College friends is dead. Now I'm afraid for Pickler's life, considering there's already an assassin in a Command Tent.

On the plus side, Abigail is continuing her meteoric rise up the chain of Callowan Command through bloody conquest of not being in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Matthew Wells

Hune has never been Cat's friend. A loyal subordinate, but not a friend.

Big I

Cat and June were never friends. Work colleagues at best.

Xinci

Hm such a injury may not kill her, depending on how Ogre physiology affects blood pressure. Cat could also potentially at least seal the injury with Night if she had time though given the nature of the Varlet I somewhat doubt that will happen.

The 3 skies and 9 corners reminds me of something important...yet I cannot remember. Regardless this reminded me quite a bit of that Mask that did the same miracle as the Ashen Priestess. Though I suppose thats logical given the experiences he has taken the laws from.

Liliet

...that's Providence out the wazoo, for Catherine to arrive in the nick of time to save Hune's life.

And considering how this world works, that's actually far more likely than Catherine arriving a second too late, so yeah actually Hune has decent odds on surviving this.

Shveiran

Mhm, she's not an hero though. Arriving just too late would fit wit her being a Villain, you now? Narrative tension though drama and tragedy rather than through an heroic intervention.

Hune kind of makes a good target for that, in a certain way. In universe, Cat's inability to save her may derive from her being a Villain and Providence taking a nap.

From a meta perspective, her death is a setback that doesn't derail the story, reinforces the "unjust disparity between Good and Evil" theme, and reminds us that even when you win you lose good people without removing someone that is essential to the story.

You know, like Nephele or Ratface or Anne Kendal or Tancred. I liked them, and their death stung, but they were not essential to the plot in the way that Hanno or Cordelia are.

Liliet

Ah, but heroic stories are not unique to heroic Names. Catherine has taken advantage of them in situations far less clear cut than FIGHTING THE DEAD FUCKING KING.

shadw21

Book 2 Chapter 47 is such a fine example of Catherine playing the part of the hero, to the point of getting an offer/conscription attempt to be a Heroic Queen under the wings of a Choir.

Liliet

There's also an excellent moment at the Battle of Camps when Tariq and Laurence are mildly disturbed by it being audibly clear that Catherine is going to come back at the last moment to rescue her forces.

Shveiran

All true.

And yet this wouldn't be the first instance where she doesn't quite get that Providence Boost.

We shall see! I'm far from certain my own speculations will be correct.

shikkarasu

I don't think I have ever been right among all my predictions in this story. That will not stop me theorizing, though. It's half the fun.

Kennator64

Previous chapter, the stunt with the assistant and the tea when she meets the pilgrim. He notices it, and EE likes their foreshadowing. I'm betting providence with hune taking a hit but not dying, probably getting a scar or some such as is the running gag this cycle.

Kelkekol

N000000000000000000000000!!!! ~~~~~

Dredcor

Yeah, it was only a matter of time until the assassin Named killed someone important.

Juff

Typo Thread:

us as Maillac's > us at Maillac's my soldier > my soldiers had even been > had ever been voiced cadenced > voice cadenced voice shrilly > voice shrill of falling > of a falling Bo buzzards > No buzzards her dismissed > he dismissed only be tolerate > only be tolerated undeniable than > undeniable that plan were > plans were morning one had been > morning had been unnecessary gambled > unnecessary gamble

sutortyrannus

I don't know if it's been said, but I want you to know that your consistent effort is appreciated.

Burlyraven

I don't think Hune is dead from this. I struggle to name the role she's played in Cat's story, but it's definitely of the breed that doesn't die this casually. I'm not a massive fan of Hune, so I'm not emotionally invested, really, but I think Hune has enough proxy story weight to survive, a concept which is potentially further bolstered by her by being of a rare race.

Mammon

Cat: Is continuously paranoid

Sees a literal red omen in the sky that nothing is wrong.

Cat: Nah, everything is fine. I can ignore that, others will handle it.

Below us, moving as a single entity, seventeen thousand undead heads turned to gaze up at us.

"That can't be good," I muttered.

And as one, the seventeen thousand skeletons made a "Boop!" sound, producing a powerful wave of sound that tore apart all in its way. I could barely get out a "Spooky..." before I felt my skin being flayed off my skin and my consciousness start to fade.

Mammon

Whoops, I meant

Sees a literal red omen in the sky that SOMETHING is wrong

Liliet

I mean to be fair, if Cat had gotten distracted onto that instead of continuing to Hune's tent things would have been WORSE

shikkarasu

Huh, Archer is keeping an eye on the terrain, Hune is in command, and someone just shot a Panic!Flare in the sky. Obvious trap is obvious, I better check on Hune instead.'

Liliet

Also, ironically for such a meta story, Cat doesn't actually have protagonist syndrome. Things get resolved in a suitably epic and dramatic fashion without her there all the time. That's literally what other Named are for. Not everything is Cat's job, only a specific set of things is. And it's already wayyyy too large.

gwennafran

Honestly, I'll be so pissed if one of the oldest character's gets killed off, simply so the Meme General is a step closer to be Marshal. Because it's a meme...

Shveiran

I don't think that's what this is?

Hune isn't Marshal, she is a General. Abigail is already a General, and if she ever gets to be a Marshal it will be because Juniper died, not Hune.

You could say that Hune is a potential rival to that promotion, but honestly... she really isn't? She is very good at her job, but her ethic is a professional one. She isn't loyal to either Catherine or Callow, nor is she even a Callowan to begin with, and those are rather big issues when you are being considered as the person in charge of all the swords.

I'm not a huge fan of Abigail myself (I mean, she gets a laugh, but her meteoritic rise without ever screwing up kinda detracts from the story themes, in my opinion) but if she was chosen over Hune as Marshal it would only make sense. Competence and seniority are not the only requirements for the job. It is honestly debatable whether they are the most important ones compared to loyalty to the cause.

gwennafran

We were told in a recent chapter Cat considers Hune more competent than Abigail. If Juniper dies, Hune would be next in line. Not Abigail. Hune being killed off, would be a step closer to marshal for Abigail.

vernal.ancient

Reread Shveiran's comment. They did not say Abigail was more competent than Hune. They said competence is debatably less important in determining the next marshal than being a loyal Callowan, which is backed up by several of Cat's musings about how Abigail would be a good marshal for Vivienne on the grounds of being loyal, Callowan, and unambitious. Restating your position without addressing the other person's arguments doesn't make you right; it shows at best you didn't actually pay attention to what they said, and at worst that you can't actually argue their points but refuse to admit it

Frivolous

Further interpretation of Masego's chant:

There are many antonyms or near-antonyms in the chant:

abyss, firmament.
star, pit.
high, low.
curses, hymn.
stuffed, hollow.

I feel the spell Masego cast had something to do with encouraging or forcing polar opposites to combine, resulting in the terrible sensory effect that made Summoner scream. I wonder if he made Above and Below momentarily unite.

Note that even Sve Noc didn't like what Masego was doing. What could make a lesser god murmur uneasily? I bet the Ophanim had the same reaction, or worse.

laguz24

I do not believe that he forced them to work together but he stole the shape of one side and the power of another, which one provided which is up for debate.

Mental Mouse

Masego was treading the paths of the gods, which is good reason for them to be uneasy.

Mike E.

As a former military person, this interaction had me LOL:

"We could attempt to break out towards the east," I finally said. "I will obey that order if it is given," General Hune blandly replied.

When you get that sort of response from a subordinate, there is an implicit opinion of your decision being stated.

NerfContessa

And any eblven remotely competent and confident commander (or c3^^) will know it should be taken as a "I trust you sir, but please reexamine that order, maybe its not really... The ideal 9ne".

While insecure, incompetent and idiotic (or I3^^) commanding officers will write the subordinate up for insubordination or something similar.

Liliet

The entire point of this response is that point 2 has no probable cause.

An insecure, incompetent and idiotic commanding officer will take it as a "yes, sir".

Abhijit Shukla

"and flicker forward to carve open my general's throat"

Hune's not dead yet. Don't write her off.

Daniel E

I'm not at all convinced that this is the end of Hune. Although beloved side characters who have never had a PoV Chapter are prime material for a pointless demise (I am absolutely still salty about Zombie the Third), said deaths have never occurred as a cliff-hanger. Even money that she survives.

On a lighter note, Masego successfully created the power of an Aspect using a ritual. Should be no wonder why everybody keeps saying he'll be a match for Gods in a few years; Queen of Summer – "Maybe if you had a few more years, but you are yet too young". Doddering Sage – "That boy of yours is going to be a right terrors in a few years".

TeK

Don't worry, I am sure Zombie will get her own Extra Chapter.

Daniel E

Wouldn't change the fact that she died stupidly 🤔 Still, a PoV would be hilarious.

TeK

"No matter how long you glare at the sun, it will not blink first."

I am fairly sure this is a statement that some Dread Emperor took as a challenge. And won

JJR

Dread Emporer Irritant did it when he knew an eclipse was due probably.

Traitorous pretended to be doing it, but actually the sun was Traitorous in disguise as part of a plot to kill his Chancellor.

Darkening

Well, whether Hune lives or not, I think we're going to down a scourge in a few minutes here. Cat is going to unleash holy hell on this revenant.

Frivolous

I wonder if any Revenants were caught in Masego's smiting. I wonder how many Revenants, or even Scourges, were destroyed.

Also, are tents a liability in a war against the Dead King? Because if it isn't actually raining, then I suspect they are. They make assassination and hidden murder too easy.

It might be wisest for the Alliance to do away with tents altogether.

We can see from how Hune was silenced that hearing is not a good gauge for danger in a war with magic and especially against the Dead King.

Liliet

Random point: Cat misses being a tank ♥

Shveiran

Being a tank is just so much fun.

Liliet

Some people are born to be tanks.

Some of those people are slender five-foot-nothings, but watch that stop them.

Mental Mouse

Being small let you fit better into the giant robot. 😊

Chapter 69: Book Draw

“Courage is not a virtue, is it a bridle forced onto fear.”

– Stygian saying

It was an almost comical sight until the blood sprayed. Hune was at least twelve feet tall, and even unarmoured she was massive – the Varlet would not have been able to reach her throat without leaping if the ogre hadn’t leaned down to strike it. But she had, and the serrated dagger opened her throat before I could do more than draw on Night.

“No,” I hissed.

I struck out furiously, a jet black spit of darkness tossed out in a heartbeat, but the Varlet’s grey cloak swirled as it slipped behind a stumbling Hune smoothly and used her mass for cover. I had to disperse my own attack, already moving deeper in, but my general screamed hoarsely as the blade bit into her again from behind. Fuck, one poison I might have been able to slow but two? Past subtlety, I wove hooks into the tent’s ceiling and ripped the whole thing down on where I believed the Varlet to be.

Success, at least for a heartbeat – a shape swallowed up by the canvas and wooden frame struggled to get out, even as Hune fell to her knees. The ogre rasped out a breath, her limbs trembling.

The slit throat would kill her even if the poison didn't, so I began weaving Night into the surrounding flesh to halt the bleeding. Just a time-buying measure, but it was a start. General Hune turned burning eyes towards the shape cutting its way out of the canvas, and in a croaking voice forced out a few words in a tongue I did not know. She choked on blood after that, but whatever it was she'd said it... reverberated. I felt a shiver of power – not Light, not Night, but something... older. Deeper. Like cool and dark water from a lake so deep its bottom had never known the light of day. Even as the Varlet's blade finally cut its way through the canvas the Revenant was brutally smashed into the ground by some invisible force.

Bones cracked and the dagger was shattered, but in the moment that followed Hune's face paled.

"Stop that," I snarled. "It'll kill you before I can-"

Not one to waste time, I laid a hand on her exposed wrist as even when she was on her knees her neck was too high for me to reach. I pushed Night into her veins, looking for the poisons, and within a breath I'd found it. Clenching my teeth, I steadied my stance and grasped the substance tight – I'd have to rip it out, if she was to live. Instead, the moment Night touched the poison the substance erupted. It turned into some sort of virulent acid, and I withdrew my power with a sympathetic scream of pain as I felt the poison hollow her out from the inside. I opened my eyes in time to see the tall ogre spasm violently, once, and her eyes roll up to show the whites. Like a great tree, she toppled forward.

General Hune was dead before she hit the ground.

The Varlet, though smashed, was snapping tits limbs back into place and crawling out of the pile of canvas. Snarling, I formed a ball of blackflame large as a horse and smashed it down onto the Revenant. It would keep, at least for a bit. Instead it was my general I limped towards, feeling sick in my stomach. I'd killed her, trying to meddle with that poison. If I'd held my hand, a healer in sorcery or Light might have attended to her instead and... Damn me, I silently swore. Damn this. The closest I'd ever come to what I was considering was Warlock seeing to Nauk, and that'd gone wrong in distressing ways. But it was my hand that'd killed Hune Egelsdottir, in the end, and that meant I owed. I drew deep of Night, deeper than was wise with a battle still to be fought, and knelt to lay my hand against the side of the fallen ogre's neck. The last wisps of life were already fading, but the soul would not be far.

"Rise again," I murmured, the power singing in my blood.

It coursed through the large body, muscles twitching, and rose to snatch the soul. I held it, for a moment, and that was enough to draw attention. Something unspeakably larger than I found my threads settling around the soul of Hune, and its disapproval was as a physical law. I remembered, dimly, once seeing the ogre kneeling before a bowl on a Callowan field. She'd spoken prayers, and the bowl had emptied. I withdrew the Night, the backlash still shaking my bones, and bowed my head in acknowledgement. My interference here was neither needed nor welcome, for wherever it might be that Hune Egelsdottir was headed she was in favour.

Below, for all its horrors, always paid back its dues in full.

I set aside the torrent of emotions that would only distract me, eyes returning to the Varlet at the exact moment that the grey-cloaked thing emerged from my black flames. It was an artefact, that cloak, which seemed to have a bit of resistance to everything but brute force. The hood was up but in the shadow of it I still glimpsed calm red eyes and an ornate half-mask of jet and silver. There was an air of elegance to it, and to the Varlet's demeanour as well: it moved like a courtier, if a very deadly one. Unfortunately for the Revenant, I was also entirely out of patience with its existence. It produced a long curved knife, though its stance implied it was about to run for it. Not that it mattered.

"There'll be none of that," I coldly said.

In my hand a golden chalice filled with red sand appeared as I drew out an artefact from the Night. I tipped over the sand and the red was caught in the breeze, to seemingly no effect. The Varlet stepped back, just as the first red grain touched the blackflame.

"Surge."

The black fire roared out, exploding in a column that rose high in the sky and swallowing up the Varlet whole. It'd been a warrior's aspect, meant to strengthen a body or a blade temporarily, but the property of strengthening had been rather broad in nature. It'd been the better of the artefacts I got out of the Revenants slain at Second Lauzon, though it was still relatively weak. Still, feeding a stolen aspect into one of the most dangerous uses of Night saw me get my due: the aspect that'd maintained a bubble of silence containing us ended, and I suddenly heard the bustle of hundreds of soldiers converging towards us. I paid them little attention, slowly limping forward.

The Varlet struggled against the flames, trying to slip out, but I made them follow. Leaving my sword sheathed, I idly spun my staff and used the motion to guide the black flame into a tightly-packed sphere that caught the Revenant and lifted it from the ground. I grit my teeth, feeding more power into a working I was finding increasingly difficult to control – the aspect had made the fire wilder somehow, more willful as much as more powerful. A heartbeat later the sphere was... snuffed out, suddenly, as the power of an aspect flared and gutted out. The cloak fluttered down, but when I threw a javelin of Night at it I saw it was empty.

The Varlet landed in front of me, and I finally got a good look at it. Though the corpse was severely burned, there were still a few dark tresses of hair and the remains of an elegant doublet in the scorched ruin I had made of this one. It struck out with yet another knife – straight and thin, a stiletto this time – but I caught its wrist with my free hand. It was stronger, but what did that matter? Before it could power through and sink the blade into a junction of my armour near the belly, I left my staff to stand and plunged my free hand into his chest. The Revenant twitched, freezing, as I went looking for an aspect to rip out. Three left, I felt.

One that was like an ever-shifting fang, another like utter stillness and the last... a hundred eyes, never blinking? I snatched the fang, hand withdrawing to find my fingers clutching a long wyvern's fang so thoroughly covered with overlapping runes that there was no trace left of the original untouched paleness. Harm, I grasped in the same moment I stole it. So long as something drew breath, this aspect would birth something capable of killing it. Endless possibilities flickered through my mind but the Varlet was already drawing back so I simply picked one close to the surface. The fang went back into the Revenant's body with a wet squelch.

It screamed, its ability to impose stillness gone as the poison coating the fang destroyed yet another aspect.

The Revenant flailed at me, which forced me to draw back, and tossed a knife so I ducked in a way that painfully pulled at my bad leg. By the time my gaze went back up, the Varlet was nowhere in sight. Fuck. If I'd been able to choose the aspect I harmed it would have been the eyes, they were the obvious pick of the stealth one, but it'd not been that discriminating a weapon. I smacked the butt of my staff against the ground, Night shivering out as I looked for a trace of the Scourge, but I found nothing. I almost snarled, my anger flaring hot. Another loss, another one I'd known for years gone and what did I have to show for it? I forced myself to breathe out, suddenly aware of the hundreds of soldiers looking at me.

The ranks parted for an officer, a tall dark-skinned woman in her forties with a fleshy face and eyes of a tinge that bordered on amber. She wore her armour like the veteran that she was, and I gave her a jerky nod as she approached.

"Legate Zola," I said, keeping my voice calm.

"Your Majesty," Legate Zola Osei replied, her lightly accented voice pleasant to the ear. "You have avenged our loss."

My eyes went to the unmoving form of Hune, toppled down unceremoniously. We'd never been friends, she and I, and I'd not been blind to the fact that she'd only stayed with me because the ogres wanted someone well-placed in the camp of every possible winner of the conflicts in the east. But she had been with me for a long time, since the start almost, and that... mattered. How many of those were left, these days? With every battle, there were few less.

"No," I grimly replied, "I haven't. But by the day's end, perhaps we will have given her a fitting pyre."

The legate saluted, fist over heart, and to my surprise more than a few of the soldiers around us did the same. My voice must have carried further than I'd expected.

"You have seniority among the Second Army's legates, if I recall correctly," I said.

"I do," Legate Zola quietly replied.

I closed my eyes, breathed out and centred myself. Grief, however complex its nature, could wait until tomorrow.

"Then you have command, General Zola," I said, opening my eyes. "Confirm your replacement legate quickly, and have the announcement sent to all the appropriate officers."

There was no argument. I looked around, and for one dreadful heartbeat I recognized no faces. Some were young, some were old, and they came from places that spanned half of Calernia's length, but there was not one among them that I knew. I lead an army of strangers, I thought. And no amount of salutes or cheering could obscure that bitter truth. I mastered the spasm of unease, forcing myself to move so it would not show as much on my face. My eyes drifted down and I caught sight of the Varlet's grey cloak, laying abandoned on the ground.

"Someone take that and throw it into a warded chest," I ordered.

It was sooty and rumpled up, but not broken. If Hierophant found no trap woven into its fabric, I might gift it to Indrani so that at least one smile came out of this fucking horror of a day. I limped away, feeling like screaming. Breathe in, breathe out.

There was still a battle to win.

—

When they came for us again, it was without holding back. There were no tactics to speak of, no elegant manoeuvres and clever traps. On the other side of the murk stood over forty thousand of the walking dead, while the bloodied remains of my ten thousand stood behind walls and palisades like rocks awaiting the tide. And to the sound of rippling drums, a deep rumble that had my soldiers shivering even when they stood behind wards protecting them from the fear-inducing sorcery, the enemy began its advance.

I awaited them on the wall, cold-eyed and patient.

Through scum water and mud, endless ranks of skeletons marched in silent ranks as magic rippled in the distance, Keteran rituals birthing columns of billowing black smoke that rose into the sky like pillars trying to support the very heavens. The deafening screeches and buzzing of swarms filled the stagnant air, clouds of insects so thick they seemed solid shifting around cacophonous flocks of dead birds. Vermin scuttled through the swamps, rats and other crawling things, a tide that swum and skittered around the footsteps of steel-clad dead. Hulking shapes stirred out of the water, snakes long as streets and crocodiles large as houses, each bearing in their belly more of the hungry dead. Ghouls prowled the host in howling packs, passing below great skeletons bearing large ladders of black iron, and among it all a single great banner flew from an iron mast taller than the tallest of trees: ten silver stars set on a deep purple, perfectly circling a pale crown. It looked like the Dead King had deemed this battle worth the flying of his banner.

It was, I would not deny, a fearsome sight. An army like this would have been a terrible foe even with twice our numbers, well-rested and behind walls of stone. Instead the legionaries of the Second Army stood on baked mud and wood, clutched their weapons as they looked at the ripples in the water that the dead's approach was enough to cause. The cacophony of screeches and buzzing filled the air even as the smoke began to obscure the sky, the great pillars forming a ceiling above us. The noonday sun fell into shade, and as the hideous drums of Keter sounded the shivers settled into the bones of my men. This was not a battle that a reasonable woman would ask them to win. They were tired and few and a very long way from home.

Hune Egelsdottir was dead and the army she'd led for years was still reeling from the loss.

As always, Keter's blade had struck true. I looked at them, and now behind grim faces I glimpsed the first seeds of defeat. Not yet sprouted, but there nonetheless. Their general was dead, and though the way of the Legions and the Army after them was to that every officer could be smoothly replaced there was still something missing at the heart of the Second Army. Hune had led these soldiers from the moment there'd been a banner for them to fight under, and that was not a shallow bond. If I wanted them to win today, the fire gutting out in their bellies had to be lit anew. I sunk deep in the Night and called it close to me, let it swim through my veins and thread into my voice so that whatever I spoke would carry to every ear.

Limping, tired, I climbed up to the edge of the rampart and turned to face my men.

"I am told," I said, and before the third word was finished not soul in the army spoke, "that there has only ever been one legion in the long history of Praes that ever dared to take the cognomen now borne by the First Legion: Invicta."

I smiled meeting the eyes of the soldiers around me.

"Undeclared, it means," I told them. "It was a heady boast to make even when it was conferred in the shadow of the surrender at Laure – a feat the Tower only ever achieved twice, over many years of striving."

And not striving gently.

"Yet that's always the way that it's been: the deed is done, the laurel bestowed," I said. "We do not give out a steel avenue before the victory has been won. Even in our bragging, we remain humble."

I laughed in contempt, and at the sound I saw a subtle current go through my men.

"Today is not such a day."

Then went still, and the weight of so many eyes turned on me was almost crushing.

"I already know who you are," I said. "I know it because I knew you, back when you were a mere two thousand – half of you snatched from gallows, the rest having never reddened your blade."

The Fifteenth had tasted of war before it was even fully grown, hadn't it? Our roster had still been half empty when we first knew battle.

"All over the world," I said, "wise lords and clever princesses dismissed the thought of you. A bastard legion, they said. A stillborn mistake. And then you won at Three Hills."

I let silence set in for a moment.

"Luck, they argued," I idly said, then paused. "So you won at Marchford."

A battle that'd seemed apocalyptic, long before I'd known the true meaning of the word.

"Again and again they sneered," I said, "and always through the blood and mud you rose. Dormer. Liesse – twice! – and even the green fields of Summer. You broke the back of a dozen princes at the Camps, then humbled the other half at the Graveyard."

And the First Army had, in time, laid down its arms and left the fronts. Not so with the Second: under Hune they had neither withdrawn nor flinched no matter what came calling.

"I have never set an expectation that the Second Army did not surpass," I told them, meaning every word, "not across a dozen ruinous fields of war. In all things, in all strife, your excellence has prevailed."

My gaze swept the soldiers assembled before me, that tapestry that made up the east of the Whitecaps – orc, goblin, Praesi and Callowan – and I honestly could not bear to lie to them. To embellish with some patriotic turn of phrase, to speak of the good of mankind. Not when they had already given so much, and asked so little in return.

"And the truth is," I quietly said, "I have asked of you more than a queen has the right to ask."

I gestured towards the swamplands behind us, towards the encroaching nightmare.

"This day, this place, are beyond the duty of your oaths," I admitted. "You stand halfway across the world, surrounded by death and smoke on all sides, after having already won too many wars under my banner. You have already paid for peace in blood, and yet here you are again: down in the mud, standing alone as horror comes."

My fingers clenched around my staff.

"So I the cognomen I grant you now is not for victory this day," I said, "for have you not already won me victories enough? I name you Excellens, in the old Miezani, to acknowledge what you already are: surpassing excellence, a neck that was never made to bend."

Indifference would have had a bite, here, but that was not what I saw in them. It was... hesitation. Uncertainty as to the nature of the gift they had been handed, what it meant.

"I quibble not over this honour," I said, "because it is your due. A settling of accounts. I would have been ashamed to keep it back any longer."

But now that I had ended the matter, ceased using it as a bludgeon to get them to fight, I could talk to them without the... pretence. The insincerity.

"And freed of this, without right or call, I ask you once more," I said. "Fight, and win."

My voice rose.

"Even though the day is dark and the enemy is great, even though all the world would call it folly to even try, I still ask you," I said. "Fight, and win."

What I saw in their faces then, I did not have a name for. It was not pride, but it was not far from it. It was not bitterness, but it was not far from it. Maybe it was a little of both, over the years grown together like ivy and oak: inseparable.

"I can give you the word, you know, but it was never mine," I told them. "It was always yours, and in the end the only people who can decide what it means will be you. Now, for good or ill, is the moment where that decision will be made."

In the distance, behind me, I felt the ground tremble under the drums of Keter. Silence and a sea of faces beheld me.

"So what," I softly asked, "will it be?"

The silence stayed. I breathed out, slowly. It had been all I had to give, save for strength of arms, and that they already had of me. I watched them, and my eye caught sight of a pair of tall orcs. Heavies, in dirtied armour. I'd seen them before, I thought, when fighting on the shore. One of them met my eyes, dark to brown, and struck his sword against his shield. It rang out, somehow piercing the cacophony of horror marching against us. It sounded, I thought, like a plea. The answer came further down the line, from another face I recognized – a Taghreb soldier I'd once joked with on the march, who had promised his wife a house in Keter. The sword went against the shield, ringing out again. It was a fair-haired girl, after, the Liessen looks writ strong in her face.

And the sound rose, one sword at a time.

With it the answer to my question came. Fight, the Second Army said. Fight, the Second Army screamed. Fight, the Second Army thundered, until the very air shook with it.

"Once more," I quietly said, as the clamour washed over me and drove back even Keter's screeching for a heartbeat. "Once more."

And I would ask again, I knew that just as they did. And perhaps that on day they would refuse me at last. But today, they would fight.

With the song of ballistas unleashing death, it began.

—

It was all screams and blood and steel. After a while, I could barely tell the difference between one fight and another. I stood ankle-high in mud, sword in hand and hoarsely shouting as a tide of vermin and ghouls crawled through the muck and toppled the tight ranks of a shield wall.

"Hold," I shouted, staff scattering black flame among the mass. "Hold."

They held and they died, unflinching, until the Blessed Artificer scoured herself raw unleashing a cage of Light that bought us a reprieve. The cloudy sky – black smoke had swallowed it all up like a hungry maw – lit up in the distance with red, a warning of danger, and I ripped myself clear of the muck to limp away.

Gate.

The palisade exploded in a shower of shards, wards shattered as skeletons poured through the gap and our mages desperately struggles to bind fresh wardstones. I charged into the stream of dead, a line of heavies following me as we desperately scrabbled with steel and Night to plug the breach long enough for the Pilgrim's light to incinerate the lizard abomination climbing the wall and a volley of fireballs to buy us just long enough for the sappers to bring down logs in the way.

"Half a cadence," I exhorted. "That's all we need to buy them."

My sword bit into flesh, a ghouls drawing back with an ugly shriek, but a javelin went through the eye of the sergeant to my left and two more were butchered by blades after skeletons entangled them. Through the hole in our wards, a deafening swarm of insects began to pour through. I screamed, tossing a ball of blackflame into them, and Tariq deftly leapt atop a falling log. Light poured out of him in waves as he broke the dead beyond the breach and our wards came back on, cutting off the swarm.

The threat had passed. I was needed elsewhere.

Gate.

Even burning, the snake allowed dead to charge up to the summit of the wall. A massive undead crocodile's jaw ripped at the baked mud, bricks flying every which way, but an arrow hit right between its eyes – an unraveller, too long to be a mortal archer's work – and it dropped lifelessly. I kicked the Bone back down the wall, letting it drop onto another skeleton trying to climb out of the muck, and swept the bottom of the bricks with blackflame.

"Priests concentrate on the ramp," I screamed. "We need to keep them below."

Light came in streams, scything through the skeletons trying to claim a beachhead atop the wall, and when a massive bird made of ghostly blue sorcery struck at the burning snake construct the entire damned thing collapsed as the magical construct exploded.

"Summoner, there you were," I laughed. "Good man. We sweep the top, no holds barred."

With power and steel we scattered the enemy, and the moment the crisis was averted-

Gate.

"Keep them in the funnel," I screamed.

The hole in our wards at the centre of the camp was made to look like a great black whirlwind, for it had filled with black smoke and screeching birds. Our mages were fighting back the attack, some sort of devouring spell, but birds were still slipping through. A pack of a dozen slipped out of the roiling smoke, headed towards us, but hellfire lashed out in a cloud of brimstone and Hierophant disappeared them with a slash of his hand.

"It is the smoke," Masego shouted back over the din. "It hides the ward-breaking formula, prevents us from attacking it."

"I have this," the Apprentice claimed, eyes hard as she incanted in a resounding voice.

From her hands glimmering red light poured out, crossing into the black whirlwind and becoming part of it. She kept up the spell, the red glow lending a hellish tint to the Enemy's work but also revealing all the secrets held within.

"Superb," Masego praised her with a grin, glass eyes glinting so warmly it singed the edges of the eyecloth. "And now that your work is revealed, Trismegistus, all that awaits is Ruin."

The aspect rippled out, tearing through a spell only he could see, and suddenly the hole filled up. The birds were instantly incinerated, but the smoke stayed – I'd already seen men dying in agony after inhaling it, so with a working of Night I sucked it all into a great ball and passed it off to Masego.

"Do what you will with it," I said.

Gate.

Iron ladders dug into the walls of the fort, skeletons swarming the top of them, and even as my staff slammed into one's side and dropped it below I saw one of the scorpion nests get overwhelmed – goblins killed, engines smashed. The Artificer had taken a wound driving back the Drake, and I was getting tired: we were taking back the fort, but the shore... Three long calls of the horn sounded, and with disbelief I heard the hooves of the Order of the Broken Bells as they counter-charged the dead pouring out of the shallows.

"With me," I shouted, gesturing at the closest line. "Those ladders are ours."

The dead fought hard to keep us away from the iron ladders, and one of those great skeletons nearly made me fall off the wall before Adanna carved it in two, but between the two of us and the honest muscle of my soldiers we trashed all four of the damned things. Below us the Order of the Broken Bells withdrew as reinforcements for the mauled shield wall on the beach began to pour out of the fort, but with the knights here the danger had ebbed low.

Gate.

No, gates.

I'd not been the one to open them this time. There must have been almost a hundred, all large and stable even through Keteran counter-rituals. The pharos device had been used, I realized, likely at Hu- General Zola's order. Or maybe Adjutant's. Neither would have pulled the trigger early, though. Gods, we must have fought for so long delaying any longer would have exposed us to the risk of fighting the third wave as well. Yet we were still hard-pressed by the enemy on all sides, I saw and retreat would be... costly. Maybe if they were coming at us mindlessly, but they had enough Binds to keep them clever enough that they'd do more than mindlessly rush the positions we'd prepared to enable our retreat. I cursed. This was going to get...

The low strum of a cithern went through all of us, as if played straight into our ear. The dead, for a heartbeat, froze. They began to move again, and did not cease even when the melody began in earnest. It was I who froze, though when the singing began.

*"Long have I walked the shore
Known ruin, drunk bitter wine
Brewed in dying light of yore
Before triumph did resign."*

I had expected the Rapacious Troubadour to sign, but it was a woman's voice. One I knew well. And it angered me, just a little, that Akua Sahelian was apparently just as good at singing as she was at damn near everything. It passed, though, as much because of the gentle sadness of the song as what it was accomplishing. I could see it already, though the detail might have been hard to pick out for some.

Not a single Bind was moving.

*"In shaded Wolof I knew Rest beneath the sycamore
Yet as the western wind blew
My heart cried out for more."*

The orders came down, by my hand and that of others. We would not waste the opportunity: full retreat into the Twilight Ways began.

*"Born grieving, I will die
Holding naught in my hand
So why not reach out and Pluck stars from the sky?"*

Stand by stand we began our retreat, funneling the dead into killing zones as the House Insurgent unleashed Light and we drew back to one holdfast after another. Already our supply train was passing through the gates, we only needed to last a little longer...

*"I have known kings, petty men
Of pettier kingdoms still Clutching tight their stolen wen
Using them up to their fill*

*And the poets weep, when did
We become a people ruled?
The empire folly undid
Was raised by people subdued*

*Born grieving, I will die
Holding naught in my hand
So why not reach out and Pluck the stars from the sky?"*

The shores were empty, the palisade and fort abandoned and what engines had gone unsmashed being dragged through the gates. The Order would go through next, leaving behind an ever-narrowing square of infantry.

*"So let me dance with ghosts,
Beautiful, hungry devils
Let me face great hosts
In dark and bloody revels*

I will tread the isle blessed

*I will burn the fields of red
And should arrant come the west
The river will be fed*

*Born grieving, I will die
Holding naught in my hand
So why not reach out and
Pluck the stars from the sky?"*

The fighting grew increasingly furious, the dead rushing at us in blind waves as our last redoubts wavered. But they were almost done, we could see the light in the horizon: the endless ranks of skeletons had ended, ground into nothing by the unflinching valour of the Second Army. And we retreated inch by inch, back to the gates as the Doom of Liesse sweetly sang.

*"I have shared a bed with doom
Danced with death as a lover
Long have I dreamt of my tomb,
And no dream lasts forever*

*But now that the night has come
I raise my hand to the sky
And one last time I succumb
To that old, beloved cry*

*Born grieving, I will die
Holding naught in my hand
So why not reach out and
Pluck the stars from the sky?"*

The last gate closed behind the last living soldier, and so ended the Battle of Maillac's Boot.

"So why not reach out and Pluck the stars from the sky?"

ErraticErrata

Chapters are coming out early today, as it looks like I won't be having access to internet later today. Both are a little more raw than I'd prefer, but it'll have to do. (I will also take a moment to note that I despise the changes WordPress have made to the platform, everything is needlessly complicated now.)

Extra chapter's titled Colossal I, the first of two, and it's from a POV that's not been used before. It can be found in the Extra Chapter tab, as usual.

jypehama

Wildbow has been expressing pretty heavy frustration with the WordPress changes too.

Maybe some can be reversed or worked around through settings but eh.

Unrecovered

It could be said that it's a bad place to catch up, yet I'd argue that there are no "good" place except last chapter of the last book. Also, don't know about "raw", seem fine to me 😊

laguz24

Also, Hune lived life and left with all debts paid.

Crash

Sad to see her go, as she was one of my favourite secondary characters.

But then, what a way huh? In so much favour even Cat had to bow her head and let her go.

The little bit with her army was an eulogy in itself. The Queen asks for the impossible, the Second Army delivers without complaint. Not with the shouts of joy and pride but with the drum of swords against shields and the resignation/pride of soldiers who know the odds and are willing to do it anyway.

"I will obey that order if it is given"

Daniel E

Hey, I'm actually early to the comments this time, though apparently for bad internet reasons 😞 Anyways, looks like I lost my bet about Hune, though at least she got more of a sendoff than the others. Gotta say, this chapter felt... not rushed, but compressed. A full narration a la Helms Deep would have been too much, but I think there was definitely room for a bit more oomph here, especially if we'd had multiple PoVs. Or at least some insight into whatever powers Hune used at the end (and the entity / resistance that Catherine encountered when trying to Raise her).

Earl of Purple

That was a Miracle from the Gods Below. The last curse they offer all that serve them, so long as the servant pays for it with sacrifice and dedication. Warlock used his to wipe out the Ashuran navy; Kairos used his to slay the Age of Wonders, and Hanno's mother used hers to blast the Ashuran committee who didn't dig out her husband. The resistance came from the Gods Below, or possibly a very powerful servitor entity, but either way the same entity/s that gave Kairos a round of applause.

I'm curious if the language she used was the same Dark Speech that Amadeus apparently used to ask a gargoyle-devil to bite the High Lord of Nok back when Cat visited Malicia in the Tower. I'm not sure we've heard of it since.

Mental Mouse

Also, that curse was probably why Cat couldn't raise Hune – Hune had already gotten a post-mortem shot in, so she couldn't also continue fighting as a Night undead.

mamm0nn

It's probably not that she couldn't, rather than that she felt that she shouldn't and thus didn't. If some corpses would be off-limits to necromancers then we would've heard something about it, at the very least by those of Below boasting about it or there being some difference to trying to raise those of Above with angels resisting.

This kind of protection probably would've been more a message to necromancers and an intimidation tactic that would dissuade the novices and those not willing to get on Below's bad side, but I don't think it would've stopped Cat if she went through with it. For all that it was Hune's due, the gods Below preach no servitude absolute and consider even betrayal to them as worthy worship.

And so it was more a powerful entity asking Cat 'Hey, could you not?' than actual resistance.

Liliet

Yeah, sounds like it.

Cat got a frown and a request to leave Hune alone, and she acquiesced because it did seem like Hune's preference, in context.

Thanatoss

Mamm0nn it is incorrect.

Hunes SOUL was taken by gods below and was beyond reach (even seconds after her death, that is why Cat surrendered).

You are not making distinction between BINDS nad BONES.

Hune's soul was taken so yes you can reanimate her body as undead Ogre Zombie but you can not bind her soul, no necromancer probably not even Dead King could. Dying Curse

(what she used) effectively bound her soul forever to Below and we can tell she wanted it this way.

shikkarasu

“Something unspeakably larger than I found my threads settling around the soul of Hune, and its disapproval was as a physical law.” Cat had a grasp on Hune’s soul and decided not to fight whatever God had previous claim. I would not sell her so short as to say she could not wrest Hune’s soul back. Cat could have made Hune a full on revenant with that soul and has no issue telling Angels and Gods to take a hike, but she is considerate to the pacts of her allies.

Sir Nil

It was likely something related to Below. We’ve seen White Knight’s mother pull off something similar with the blood curse. It is likely that so long as you keep some form of offering to Below your entire life, they would do something that paid it back. Catherine said that Hune did offerings, and of all the people who deserves repayment, it was definitely one of the generals of the greatest army to currently walk Calernia.

Liliet

This is a specific known thing actually – the “last curse” that Below offers its followers. The scale is presumably proportionate to offerings while alive, but everyone gets something as they die. Kairos mused while he was dying about how he could have wrangled more years of life out of his last wish if he wanted, but he wanted something else instead.

Daniel

Does the Dead King get one?

Liliet

He probably already got his lmao

Flameburst

Likely not, because he actively disassociated himself from above and below.

Shveiran

That is a disturbing thought.

dadycool

It was indeed very dense. It also did feel like there were parts cut, like around the speech, but the "Gate. Gate. Gate." part felt true to the battle sensation. You only get flashes of what happened, things that stuck out to you for whatever reason.

Sparsebeard

I was sure one of the "Gate" would end up bolded.

CredulaPostero

That. Song. Just wow. I like all of your writing, but this is the first time I have spent less time focusing on the chapter than the included poem.

Javvies

The Ogres have their own secrets, it seems.

A poison tailored for a massively negative reaction with Night? That's not good.

And Cat didn't even get to finish and confirm the kill on Varlet? At least she managed to damage it, and remove two of its Aspects, so the engagement wasn't a total loss. Mostly a loss and a net loss, however.

That's one hell of a trick Akua pulled off with Troubador.

On the upshot, this escapade pulled away and distracted a lot of the undead armies.

And between Akua's trick and the pharos devices, they'll have been able to pull most of the army out at the time.

So ... they accomplished what they intended to ... but at a high price.

Liliet

I think that wasn't a secret, just a regular last wish that Below's followers get. And in true Below's follower fashion, Hune used hers to clobber the guy who killed her.

NerfContessa

Raw 8ndeed, yet not in a bad way.

Hectic, fast and yet somehow 0aced slowly in alternating gates and song.

Love it.

Xinci

Cat had some Alexander the Great vibes when naming them Excellens. Well Akua just had a swan song so, I suppose she has somewhat prepared herself for the inevitable. Also it does indeed look like the pure form of the Night is what Villains draw from when they do Necromancy and stuff. Though I suppose it may just be the pool of power that Below first had? Similar to how Light is presumably Aboves first pool of power.

Mental Mouse

No, Night is specifically the power granted to Sve Noc and the Drow, but Cat has used it for necromancy before. It does seem likely that the various powers of Below are similar, but they have subtly different "signatures". By now DK has had plenty of time to get a read on Night's characteristics, but it's not clear if the Varlet's trick poison was specific to Night, or would have responded similarly to any Below power, or even to any magical energies at all.

The more interesting question is, what aspect was it that Cat destroyed? "Ability to impose stillness?" When has the Varlet used that? She did at least take those deadly poisons out of commission along with it.

caoimhinh

Probably the thing that made it so no sound came out of Hune even as she shouted with all her strength. It's not the first time EE uses "stillness" as something related to silence, as that time Catherine visited the capital of the Winter Court she was given use of the Still Courtyard and noted that name was because of the absolute silence that reigned there.

dadycool

Whew, that was exhausting. The fight in the Command Tent, the rousing speech, the so, so, so long Battle of Maillac's Boot.

Hune's fate seems fitting, given the chapter content. She's paid her dues and they will be honored. After all that, anyone would deserve that rest.

Very nice speech.

Gate. Put out the fire. Gate. Put out the fire. Repeat ad nauseam until that demon started to sing. That was honestly exhausting to read, just sympathetically. Heh, "Why is Akua so effortlessly good at everything she does? It must be demonic work."

Liliet

Yep ♥

caoimhinh

Well, she did mention something like that back when they were in the Everdark.

“You are preaching to the choir, my heart,” Akua intervened. “Admittedly the choir is made of damned souls, but let us not pretend talented singers are usually headed for the Heavens.”

Shveiran

Thank you. That was awesome.

hue hue

Greetings from Brasil

caoimhinh

Greetings from Colombia

The Quietist

I wouldn't worry this is genuinely one of my favourite chapters in a while...

Mr Mouse

For having been born east of the river I became instead a man to pluck stars from the sky. Is that not a higher virtue?

Sinead

I find it interesting that the implication being that Cat didn't honour the Second before now due to a means to compel it. I see some of this being Cat feeling guilt over Hune's death, but I never got the impression of the Second defining itself as a specific Legion within the Callowan war machine rather than just being an exemplar of the doctrines and training.

Then again, with everything filtered through Cat, we the readers may miss details that would state otherwise.

Liliet

I think, like with Nauk and Third, it didn't occur to Catherine to grant a cognomen before the first commander – the one that defined what the army was like – died. And if she wasn't trying to compel them to fight, she would have gotten to this later, not earlier – you know, because of the whole “ongoing battle literally right now" thing. She didn't grant the Third army theirs before Sarcella was done.

The "I've been holding this back from you" thing is a rhetorical trick, so they'd feel like this was something long owed rather than something given hastily as a bribe. Which it was but couldn't feel like, see. Hence hedging the truth.

Sinead

While I am not saying it isn't a form of a bribe, I feel that the purpose of a cognomen (especially in a world where Roles and Names matter) is to capture lightning in the bottle in a pivot. Much like how Names are carved in a cultural psyche, the cognomen is to capture and lionise the soul of the Legion at a pivot. Unfortunately for Cat, her pivots come from "impossible victories", which means that the laurals are always given in the light of a funeral pyre.

I guess it's more that I do not see any fault in what Cat has done. Anything earlier than this would have been a blatant political grab instead of just recognition of what that Legion had become.

Liliet

Oh 100%, me neither. That's what I'm saying here, I was just analyzing how it happened the way it did.

The cognomen itself was 100% earned. The timing was a last-minute save.

Sinead

Ahhh yes, aggressive agreement once again!

On one hand, I get Cat feeling like she has failed those in her charge, with scenes like this. However they always leave me wondering if I have missed something that makes the sense of failure more objective than self flagellation.

And a last minute save is always a pivot.

I wonder if the ogres have any opinions of the various eastern factions. I get the feeling that the ogres feel that no one is really on their side to really trust them, but I wonder if the fact that Crown and Sword is a banner of those that seek to break the old patterns and forge something new is noted by them. Perhaps they won't get swept in the wake of Cat's vision, but at least a recognition that one faction is potentially more favourable to them than the other.

Would they see Cat's attempt to save Hune as a weakness or pure selfishness (since my understanding is that if she had just left Hune to die, she could have destroyed Varlet), or as someone who tries to do the best by her people?

Liliet

I think ogres aren't a hive mind!

Sinead

Fair point to my wording.

I was more thinking about cultural values (since we don't have any insights into Ogrian society and culture). While I like how Hune went out, I am saddened that we don't get much more insight into what they are like as a people through Hune. One thing I like about this series is that we get a good sense on how these societies function and shape it's members. Even goblins (who do not share information with outsiders) still have a sense of what some of the social dynamics are through both dialogue and goblin POV.

From the goblins we know that the 'cultural mores' are that in a similar situation, one should ignore fallen allies and focus on the enemy (since everyone is expendable for the good of the Tribe). Even if you have goblins like Robber who do not deal well with losing people.

The last part only occurred to me because as shown with Cat's interaction with Below in this chapter, people can be OK with the trade-off of their lives for the enemies. And from that perspective, Cat failed to press an advantage as much as she could have.

Liliet

We know ogres are very few, so they are probably mostly generic-Praesi, I would guess. The rest of the values seems so far to be "fuck you all" lmao (not that this is unPraesi of them...)

Sinead

True. An enslaved population probably wouldn't keep their own culture very well (and if they were brought over by the Miezens, they were probably a shattered culture like the Orcs were, since they were also sent back to the homeland).

It really boils down to, "I am fascinated by every culture EE has shown us on screen and want as much as I can."

Liliet

Oh mood

308924810a

I think the core of the Ogre position is that they aren't especially on anyone's side because they can't take the risk of being especially against someone. They're already suffering from reduced lifespans and increased rates of birth defects due to inbreeding. I think the only way to get the Ogres on-side would be to both offer them improved protections against the High Lords, and to draw in new Ogre immigrants to Praes to refresh their population. A feat that'd essentially require making Praes an intercontinental trading power to pull off.

Big I

Spectacular chapter, but the best part for me was Akua's song. I can just imagine Terribilis listening to it as he rose against the crusader kingdoms in the Wasteland.

The song also seems, to me at least, to be foreshadowing an eventual attempt to betray Cat by Akua. The part about "now that night has come" really made me take notice, and that it's followed by a verse about still trying to "pluck the stars from the sky" said something to me.

I wasn't expecting a happy ending to Akua and Cat, but this seems to setting the stage for some real Shakespearean, bitter sweet vengeance.

Liliet

...I. I just.

Akua: requests the Troubadour.

Akua betrayal crowd: SHE'S ABOUT TO BETRAY CAT USING HIM

Akua: does the exact opposite of betrayal

Akua betrayal crowd: ...THIS IS FORESHADOWING OF HER INEVITABLE BETRAYAL LATER ON

I'm not even saying yall are necessarily wrong per se, but that's one hilarious 180.

Shveiran

Same. I mean, I get it: on one hand, you can never really trust the Diabolist, right?
But by now... I really don't think she'll ever betray Cat, you know?

... Which, now that I think about it, might be just why many say it'd be a perfect twist.

...carry on, then. Don't mind me.

Liliet

You absolutely cannot ever really trust the Diabolist. Not because she'll betray Cat, she won't, but because she's a DUMBASS. Trust in intentions and trust in judgement are two very different things; Akua might have the purest desire to improve ever and she can still do a stupid thing at any point because Praesi logic is backwards and she's been traumatized and retraumatized multiple times over and is now actively rewriting reality in her memories to make her logic fit (the "all villains are ambitious" speech).

Shveiran

It's not that you are wrong, per se, but by this logic you can trust pretty much no one, can you?

Liliet

It's a matter of degrees!

Said Cat, staring at Hierophant's back and sighing.

Shveiran

Well, yes.

I'm just saying that this seems like a high bar to set for trusting someone, you know?

Like, even the most skilled individual can make a mistake and get something wrong, or they can lack information or be tricked. And even if they don't, they could clash with someone more skilled and be defeated. Or, more relatably, they could disagree with you on what is actually right or important and make a choice you wouldn't have.

Now, of course, I don't mean to argue that everyone is equally unreliable and undeserving of trust; that would be absurd.

It's just... trust is not about being certain of what someone will say or do, you know? It's about UNCertainty, if you would. About faith.

It's about acting AS IF you were certain when you know you can't be, not really.
That's why it's hard, and that's why it is a precious thing.

Liliet

It's a balance though!

Like... if you trust a small child with driving a car, nobody is going to have a good time. At some point you take a step back and say "this trust has boundaries riiiight here and we both need them for our wellbeing". And for different people these boundaries come up a different amount. For Akua... well, the boundaries don't come up a lot right now, when she's explicitly Cat's personal subordinate and tolerated by others exclusively within the limits of that role. But take the "Headmistress Akua of Cardinal" or "Dread Empress Akua" scenarios people like to throw around in the comments section, or even just another "Akua has to pretend to be Cat to cover for something" and NO THE BOUNDARY IS RIGHT THERE YOU ABSOLUTELY CANNOT TRUST AKUA WITH THOSE THINGS. KEEP THE CHILD AWAY FROM THE WHEEL.

Shveiran

Wow, that got preachy. Sorry, didn't mean to sound condescending; I just thought it was a point worth making.

Liliet

No, this is a really interesting discussion!

I just tried to make a joke to, uh, avoid sounding preachy myself?

I'm just saying, Cat trusts Masego like she trusts very few people, but she will not give him explicit blanket permission to blow up any hills he wants. As an example.

Adrian_V

FREAKING!GREAT!CHAPTER!$%&%$&(/())#$%&/&/

Ahem after recovering fromt he overdose of AWESOME that this was it almost too much to say i loved it.

Mmmm i am 99% sure 1 of Cat's future aspects will involve empowering her troops, people, band, whatever group she is with. Definedtly inspiring loyalty too.

Mental Mouse

That might be the same as her “thresher” capacity, of pulling people (even powerful people) into her wake. Taking those as one aspect...

The second would clearly be her “theft of power” ability.

But her third characteristic power would clearly be her “overturn the board” thing – can a power to break stories be enclosed in an Aspect?

Shveiran

She gotta get at least one that allows Speaking though. the theory was, it would be a sentence-based thing, like a judge or an overseer.

Mental Mouse

Speaking, despite being bolded in text, isn't actually an Aspect – it's a generic Villain (Named?) power. Malicia's trump is being able to combine it with her Rule Aspect to silently (and tracelessly) lay commands on people.

Shveiran

It is an ability that derives from a number of aspects, which are however related to ruling. Black had Conquer (a staple of the Black Knight according to Amadeus, he said it somewhere in Book I), and most rulers have Rule.

Cat didn't have that, but she was the Squire of the Black Knight, and my read was that she could speak because of that.

Masego and Indrani are both pretty powerful Villains, for instance, but they never Spoke.

Though I guess this is speculation, admittedly. I don't think it was actually confirmed in the text?

The8ofspades

Speaking is connected to authority: you can only ever Speak to people you have some form of command over.

Masego and Indrani, despite being powerful villains, have always been followers. they've never really led anything. Therefore, no Speaking

Juff

Typo Thread:

tits limbs > its limbs
wold > would red gain > red grain bustled > bustle laying abandoned > lying abandoned no broken > not broken was to that > was that not soul in the army spoke > not a soul in the army spoke (also, i think was speaking read better) steel avenue (is this correct?)

Then went still > They went still
So I the cognomen > So the cognomen that on day > that one day desperately struggles > desperately struggled a ghouls > a ghoul nearly mad me > nearly made me to sign > to sing

doominator10

Tits limbs is a rather amazing typo

Frivolous

Just some idle trivial comments:

For Masego to praise Apprentice's spell-work as superb is a terrifying compliment. How often does the freaking Hierophant ever find another's work that admirable? Very very rare, I think.

Promising your wife a house in Keter seems somewhere between hubristic and horrible, given Keter is literally a Hell-hole. It's not like anyone would want to vacation there. The cultural life is DOA. No opera, no good restaurants, no art festivals.

I think that Taghreb's wife should have asked for a house in Sallia or Cardinal instead.

mamm0nn

Actually Praes does have quite a bit of culture, and while it may not be the same for the people as it is for the High Lords, we haven't been described the people's lives as awful and empty. Quite likely they do have all the things you described, and as Praes is rich there's probably quite some trickle-through that would make them poorer than Procer but richer than Callow and Levant.

Frivolous

I suspect you mean Ater, not Keter.

The Taghreb in the story above promised his wife a house in Keter.

Matthew Wells

But living in Keter has the benefit of getting to attend Rumena's stand-up shows when it finally retires.

Mental Mouse

"Roasts for hire!"

Darkening

Huh, wasn't there a plan for Apprentice too, in addition to Masego's smiting and Akua's song? Surprised that didn't get pulled out at any point. Well, that just means we get to use it another day I suppose lol. That wasn't what I expected Akua's ritual to do, but binding any undead with a soul so that they can't lead the mindless masses is a pretty great move.

Liliet

Might have happened offscreen, or just been this – the contingency that she can do this kind of thing when necessary.

308924810a

So I guess Akua isn't betraying them now? Unless this song is going to end with them finding out that Akua didn't retreat with the rest of them.

I'm forced to consider the alternate character interpretation that Akua might have been genuinely trying to reach out to Catherine before each of their conflicts, but due to her own hierarchical biases, Catherine's apparently-weak position, and Cat's political situation/anti nobility bias inherited from Black, there was never much chance of an accord.

Liliet

There's a non-contradictory not-about-to-betray-Cat Akua interpretation that doesn't involve her early bullshit being anything other than what it looked like.

TL;DR she was an abused kid who genuinely could not conceive of any way of being for herself other than what her mother left open, so even in rebellion she followed the pre-defined script. But that script had footnotes along the lines of "serve the victor" which became relevant to her after she died, and that path finally led her out... so to speak. Now she's genuinely loyal to Cat in part BECAUSE of Praesi values, in part because she likes what Cat has going on and is naturally a lot more empathetic than she'd been beaten into acting like, and in part because she's still an abused kid whose "finding my own path" gland is stunted in development.

She has nothing to betray Cat for, because going back is actively worse than dying under Cat's banner and she can't quite come up with a third option.

Mental Mouse

And she's fated for that Doom which will itself be a thing of legend... which is itself a proper ending for a villainous story.

Liliet

Yep! If you start listing reasons for Akua to stick with Cat, you can come up with like a dozen easily. Most of them will be fairly weak on their own, but the problem is that there is no counterweight. Akua was never taught self-determination. Betraying Cat would be a self-destruct-out-of-spite option, and when the destruction is a given, all of those other reasons do outweigh spite by much.

Konstantin von Karstein

What purpose served the song? The deads stopped for a short moment, but appart from that was it even slightly useful?

'Ladi Williams

The song stopped the "binds" who were the brains behind the dead army.

Without them...the dead army just reverts to a mindless horde without any tactical formation.

Which made it easy to funnel them into killzones and allowed the second army to withdraw without / with little casualties.

'Ladi Williams

Interestingly...contrary to what most comments propose...the song strikes me as Akua having accepted her fate and decided that since she's damned and has no hope for redemption...."Now night has come"

Why not reach for the sky and pluck the stars from the sky... Do one deed that she would be remembered for regardless of the fact that it does not buy her redemption.

I foresee Cat still killing her but being heartbroken as she does bcos Akua has genuinely bcom a good person. She's now one of my favorite characters.

Thank you EE for a beautiful journey you have taken us on.

Casey Glick

Cat is not going to kill Akua. But she is grooming Akua to sacrifice herself freely in the darkest hour, merely to save other people and not for any redemption of her own. Akua is capable of redemption, and the very act of redemption shall be Callow's Long Price.

Liliet

> I foresee Cat still killing her but being heartbroken as she does bcos Akua has genuinely bcom a good person.

That's what Vivienne was foreseeing, I think.

There are a lot of possible outcomes here, I feel. Cat kills Akua despite or even because of heartbreak (hurting Akua emotionally has been Cat's self-harm avenue for a while now), Akua sacrifices herself freely when it is necessary without even being asked (this is tbh something of a copout on the theme of punishment and atonement, but it can be hypothetically argued she earned that copout by following the path as far as she did), Cat never actually kills Akua but leaves her trapped in a Hell of her own making – of genuine regret and contrition and willing servitude forever.

Sinead

While I do hope Akua does end up in a "trapped in a Hell of enteral repentance" as it does go against Redemption in Death, what could be an interesting twist is Redemption in Death if/when the "Scouring of the Shi- I mean Praes happens. Then again, I have always loved Saruman's death scene, and think one could harken back to that with Akua in reverse: Below's greatest artificer (for what else could one call the Doom?) sent to rest, but where to?

Below's "take everything in equal measure" and Above's "we take everything and give nothing" can probably be traced back to the fact that debt and "balancing the ledger" cannot always work. Akua's threading the needle here as instrumental in breaking the Tower would be something of a way to do Redemption in Death. The redemption is not in the act of dying, but in what the exchange of her life for an end goal bought in turn.

Liliet

Scouring of the Shire is 100% excellent and everyone who suggests otherwise is wrong. Anyway I really think Akua needs to have as little to do with Praes as possible in the rest of her arc, she's been poisoned enough by the place. Keep the victim and the abuser apart, etc.

Sinead

That is a fair point to keep Akua away from Praes. I was more thinking what Redemption through Death would not feel like a cop out, and Akua breaking the Tower would work for me personally. Your mileage may vary.

I think the best arc is of course Akua living past the epilogue as a memory of the Age of Wonder that is a warning and teacher. There are jokes about Headmistress Akua at Cardinal, but I think that it could be a way for Akua to grow forward. The Doom was essentially her carving her own wounds across the world, so being able guide others along with herself would be something worth seeing.

I have liked the idea of the Choir of Compassion taking her under thier wing, but I think there is a pattern of the Choirs taking in those who need them the most, and I feel that Akua is making a point of going at it her own way. So perhaps she would become an exemplar that others sworn to Compassion could recognise (thinking of Tariq's pointing to Lawrence as an exemplar beyond the Choir of Endurance's own followers).

Liliet

Headmistress Akua is a terrible idea because she should not be in charge of children, ever. She is not equipped for it. She has no reasonable role models for dealing with children. She has at least SOME role models for being in charge of adults, but LET'S NOT TRY IT OUT.

Akua the school ghost though? That's 100% valid.

OMFG I would love Akua sworn to Compassion so much. It fits her arc, too!

Sinead

I more mean Headmistress Akua in the sense of "teacher/ Authority figure" that's more than just a teacher on sorcery. Agreed that she shouldn't be in charge of children.

I just want to see every named Choir at least once, and I think Compassion for one such as Akua would be interesting.

Is it Just? No, because there can be no justice for a crime like the Doom

Is it Mercy? To an extent, as she acts in her best capacity to right her wrong

Is it Contrition? Not exactly because Contrition takes the jagged edges and uses them to excise rot from the world

Is it Endurance? For Akua definitely, but Endurance is a shield for others before and during catastrophe, and doesn't seemed focused on After.

Is it Compassion? I would say so because it is acknowledgment that one is contrite, and that one is doing their best to shape a world where such a wound will never happen again. It's the blunting of the edge of Contrition that keeps it from bleeding out the body. Look at Will who kept on being a terrible person simply because there was no way for him to redeem himself, so why _try_.

I am of the opinion that Angels come to those that need them, and I would find it interesting if in light of Tariq observing what a tragedy Akua's story is that the Heavens do extend a Compassionate hand. To me that is the final part that would get Akua to stick to the long road without failing.

Liliet

I just think authority figure is something Akua should not be within the next hundred years or so. She cannot handle autonomy, let alone authority. Just, her decision making process is badly damaged by her upbringing.

Shveiran

I can get behind this reasoning, but I have an hard time imagining Akua as a second to someone that is not Catherine. And I am still afraid she'll not stick around in the aftermath. She is just too large. If she is part of the system, teh system is based on her and not itself, and won't survive her absence.

Liliet

I disagree!

Akua is very good at making herself small, and being subordinate comes naturally to her. It doesn't come naturally to her pride, but as long as it's what she's trying to do, she can do it perfectly.

Shveiran

You are arguing about her skill, and I agree. What I am uncertain is about whether someone else would take her as a second, and who could she possibly want to serve as second for.

Sinead

Good point.

I guess in my head, what I am picturing is that Akua would be a living lesson of someone who knows the end result of plucking the stars from the sky. That brings the start to the surface and now everyone is dying in nuclear hellfire.

The Doom of Liesse isn't just a lesson in what not to do, she is a living lesson that can interact with and refute similar lines of thought because she has actually held them once upon a time.

What this might boil down to is what we are looking for in authority figure. There is a solid argument that all Names arise from trauma, so you will pretty much never get a stable individual to become Named, let alone the additional forces now pulling at their psych. An individual that walked the path of Named to being in some ways one of the greatest wildfire of a Name to be put down in generations, who then walks the path of trying to do the best she can to make amends could be a strong instrument in advising other Named. Not in her current state, but perhaps in the coming decades.

To me, this can be seen as an authority figure in that she has advice that she can give based on her experiences to help others. You may define this as one element of an advisory role instead of a straight authority figure, but I hope this clarifies what I am trying to get at with regards to saying authority. She is an authority on what she can talk to is more what I am picturing, not a authority of a system.

While I use "Headmistress Akua", I would probably be wrong to use that name even in reference to what I picture as an end state for her. It was just the first that came to mind to try and combine the role of a teacher that can teach both technical methods of sorcery as well as the "You have thought so much about if you could do this, that you never stopped and asked if you should do this." role. Not exactly someone in charge of children.

Liliet

Yeah I think advisory role is very good for Akua!
She also loves showing off her competence.
Honestly she loved being Catherine's whispering shade from day 1 of Cat bringing her out for that and we all know it.

Just, not being actually the decider. Not any time soon.

Midnight Binary

Never headmistress, but perhaps the position of Librarian would work suitable. Not directly in authority over the students, except in the context of books, but at the same time always available to be an alternate source of advice.

Mental Mouse

Note that DK's heraldry features stars surrounding his crown....

mamm0nn

The Varlet, though smashed, was snapping tits limbs back into place

Sometimes we get a little gem of a typo like this. I don't even want to visualise it, but for some reason I'm thinking finger-snapping tits casting regeneration when I first read this.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I like this chapter. I think it's... nice.

Sparsebeard

The song ends after the last gate closes... did Akua just sacrifice herself?

Liliet

Oh.

Uh.

Good catch.

Liliet

[after half an hour] actually, not only can Named "sidle" without opening gates (and I think our beautiful snake counts for this purpose), but Akua also can open gates of her own with Night.

beleester

Or Akua just walked through a gate and kept singing. I mean, you may as well finish the song, once you're all away safely.

Liliet

Nah, Akua would time it so the song ended just before the last soldier walked through if she was going through the gate. The song is for the Binds, continuing it inside is just uncool and might give people an impression she has ever cared about a thing in her life.

Thanatoss

This was GREAT chapter.

But

We all wait for that NAME.

I hope all Cat's new Aspects will be so overpowered even Mirror Knight's and Saint's ones will pale before them.... Would be cool of Cat became something close to Ranger if not I will die inside.

Liliet

Cat is already something close to Ranger without the Name..

Mental Mouse

As I've said above, we do in fact see three mighty powers which have been characteristic of Cat for her entire career:

- 1) The "thresher" ability by which she sweeps the powerful into her wake, from individual Named up to entire armies.
- 2) The Take (in variations) meta-power, to claim an opponent's power, and turn it against even its original owner.
- 3) The "flip the board" power, to refactor a situation and reassemble it to her advantage.

Liliet

Ohhh yesss you're entirely correct.

I can see the first one functioning as a Charisma boost "now everyone listen to me" Aspect.

The second... there'd have to be a new twist, right? Cat has already had Take, and she has a take lite with Night. Would it be Take 2.0? There'd have to be at least a power-up right?

The third... how would that function? Something Seek-like, allowing Catherine to quickly find leverage for aforementioned flipping? A forcible temporary switch of attributes, making the flipping more literal?

Speculate with me! 😊

Jarl Zarl

Something occurred to me for the first one that could be a nice callback. What if Cat got "Lead" for that Aspect? I think it'd function differently from Black's in that like you said it's probably more of a Charisma and morale boost rather than Black's primarily physical one but I think tying it to her father would be a nice touch

Jarl Zarl

For the second ... we've been getting beats of her Name liking it when she stands in judgement over Named. That's making me wonder if it might be something along the lines of Roland's Confiscate. I don't have a verb in mind but something where she removes someone's power as a punishment. Perhaps also the ability to bestow that power on someone more deserving? That'd further support her bringing out the best in her followers/making them stronger part of her role as a thresher.

For the third I don't have much unfortunately, perhaps a Domain of some sort?

Darkening

'Sentence', perhaps, allowing her to bestow punishments fitting the situation? Hm.

daegone823

I think she will gain this after Hano comes into his name. This will truly cement her place not a sovereign ruler but as the leader of the terms. She will not be present but whispered about. At the moment where a dispute is incurred or a habitual rule breaker stirs up enough trouble she will appear.

The Dark Judge- A priestly named that allows the user to pass judgement on individuals. Similar to the pilgrim who is drawn to service other heroes in there time of need. The Dark Judge will be drawn to all conflicts between named to pass judgments so that there conflicts are "fair"(as determined by the terms).

She is allowed ton :

Forgive: used to redeem the actions of a named offering a chance at redemption. This power manifest as the ability to momentarily revive a named in order to complete one last action.

Compel- allows the control of a named similar to the diabolist unique control of demons. This is a passive ability by which the words of the judge are not just spoken but unavoidable to follow.

Punish- If a named has broken the terms or has intended on rebuking the judgment, they are destroyed. The power of this aspect relies on the judge's indifference to good and evil. Simply choosing the most

Casey Glick

What about "Inspire"? People follow Cat because they want to, not purely because she's a good commander who gives them victories. Cat fights for her people, and her friends, and she pulls people into her wake who genuinely want to become better:

- * Every member of the Woe (Masego learns to be a better person around others, Archer forms long-term friendships, Vivienne grows beyond her anger into a true leader, Hakram becomes the first Orc Named in centuries.

- * Amadeus himself

- * Callow, her Legions, the people, the nobles, the Order of the Broken Bells, who have learned that they can do what's right for their country.

- * Rosala, the Proceran Nobility, and Cordelia putting aside some of their pettiness to work with their former enemies.

- * The Blood of Levant, who, in response to her, and in understanding of her, have set aside generations of blood feuding

- * Grey Pilgrim,

Casey Glick

What about "Inspire"? People follow Cat because they want to, not purely because she's a good commander who gives them victories. Cat fights for her people, and her friends, and she pulls people into her wake who genuinely want to become better:

- * Every member of the Woe (Masego learns to be a better person around others, Archer forms long-term friendships, Vivienne grows beyond her anger into a true leader, Hakram becomes the first Orc Named in centuries.

- * Amadeus himself

- * The Heroes and the Villains, who start working together, first under the Truce and Terms, and then for the future Liesse Accords.

- * Everybody who likes the idea of the Liesse Accords (and of course those who agreed to form Arsenal)

- * Callow, her Legions, the people, the nobles, the Order of the Broken Bells, who have learned that they can do what's right for their country.

* Rosala, the Proceran Nobility, and Cordelia putting aside some of their pettiness to work with their former enemies.

* The Blood of Levant, who, in response to her, and in understanding of her, have set aside generations of blood feuding

* Grey Pilgrim, (almost) Saint, and White Knight, who have all learned some value of compromise. Roland who gets swept into their wake.

* Sve Noc herself

* And the entire culture of the Drow, now turned to striving for excellence and not just fighting for power and dominance.

In basically every interaction, Cat has been responsible for people becoming better. Better versions of themselves, better human beings, more aligned in their goals. Almost nobody remains her permanent enemy, and the rest have all been Inspired.

'Ladi Williams

I think take is too literal for the new name.

Cat is prolly going to get simple sounding names that she can use to fit many situations.

I can't seem to think of anyone right now.

not my fault...it's the alcohol

Why is "take" her only aspect that remains? Why can't night duel the others? Or Isit bcos it's closely related to thievery?

Liliet

I mean it's not like Cat doesn't learn things, power up in desperate situations or break shit. Take is just the most distinct and "herself" power that she ever had.

'Ladi Williams

I think take is too literal for the new name.

Cat is prolly going to get simple sounding names that she can use to fit many situations.

I can't seem to think of anyone right now.

not my fault...it's the alcohol

Why is "take" her only aspect that remains? Why can't night duel the others? Or Isit bcos it's closely related to thievery?

Andrew Smith

The short version is Night is able to do a similar thing to Take though it might be both stronger and weaker since I think Take was limited to one aspect at a time(or close to it), though she could use it multiple times. Where with night she basically makes one use artefacts out of the aspects.

So yes it is the power of thievery though she could do similar things to other aspects with night most likely but really she is only able to do things similar to aspects none of them are aspects

Mental Mouse

The “story-flip” is another meta-power, or perhaps a meta-meta power.

Really all of them are meta-powers, but there’s something of a progression here. Thresh influences people without even registering as a magical touch, and only those with their own story-fu can even spot it much less resist it. The aspect-Yoink effect has always been OP, because a metapower to grab other people’s powers is intrinsically so. I’m not even sure it rates a power-up for Cat’s next instar, but she might get more control or flexibility. And the third effect... (I’ll call it Refactor for the moment) that’s even more meta, and more OP. From ground level it looks like some unholy amalgamation of divination, influence, and luck, but ultimately it’s manipulating the story itself.

Liliet

Yeah I don’t think the thresher effect is going to be an Aspect directly. Like I said, I think Cat’s going to get a Charisma effect that reflects her charismatic nature as a thresher that’s a lot less meta and a lot more useful.

And the third effect – yeah, I think it should be something grounded too. Maybe something perception enhancing, to match Bard’s whatever?

Mental Mouse

Well, ISTR the Bard’s story-ability actually is an Aspect. But her Aspects are all shenanigans, I suspect Cat’s new set will be likewise.

Liliet

Bard’s Aspect is not the entirety of her story ability, just the ability to be aware of all stories going on at once (or, well, any one of them).

Mental Mouse

There is that... thinking about it, I'm coming to agree with you that the "thresher" thing is probably a direct part of her Role, rather than an aspect. And the table-flipping, perhaps likewise, though I still think an Aspect could represent at least part of that.

But that leaves a slot or two open.... A support Aspect (descended of, e.g., Struggle or even Rise) would seem natural to her.

Liliet

She's probably going to have an Aspect for Judge / Sentence / whatever, punitive against Named specifically (but also against whatever the fuck she wants, just weaker in that context). A perception Aspect is just a thing of a dream, and it's not like Cat isn't associated with knowing things she shouldn't...

Mental Mouse

Hmm. The thing is, she doesn't usually have special ability to judge or punish people, she has just used the tools at hand to do so: Legal authority as a Named or a Queen, the authority granted to her over Drow and the Night, or simply the capacity to kick somebody's ass. The Take/power-theft capability would certainly serve against Named or similar, but falls under the same heading of "yeah, she has the ability to do that".

Liliet

Yep, Aspects are shortcuts for what a person can normally do. Villainous Aspects normally are, anyway.

Gnoch

The song was absolutely amazing. I was inspired to make a recording: <https://audiomack.com/gnoch/song/pluck-the-stars>

Axel Rafael

Gnocchi, your rendition Gave life to this song. Thank you ♥

I have a suggestion, though. Is it possible to use different notes for the singing melody? Something Higher and sweeter?

And for the "bridge", to use pizzicato?

Sorry if it's intrusive. Just got excited 😊

It's Nice to see music enthusiasts in this Community. Especially since the songs are such an amazing part of this webnovel (seriously, I got chills every time Hakram fought with his Poet Double Axe Style 😭)

Gnoch

Thank you 😊 I definitely appreciate the feedback!

My voice isn't that practiced towards either high or sweet, and I was definitely going more towards "melancholy lament" – both of the state of Praes after Triumphant's fall (May She Never Return), and Terribilis II's full knowledge that things aren't going to end well for him anyway, so he might as well strive for the impossible. I'll see if I can get my sister to record some vocals, though! She's a soprano.

I do have a fingerstyle pattern that works, but I'm not too practiced, and it's either do that or sing – not both at the same time. Haven't figured out how to do pizzicato on my guitar.

Which bit did you mean by the bridge? I'd classify the song more as verse-verse-chorus on repeat.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

You really brought this piece to life, dude. Be proud of yourself!

Shaerick 68

Beautiful song, EE

Sorone

I am blind and so use text-to-speech for using computers.

Listening to the poem/song at the end of this chapter very nearly drove me to tears. Well done indeed. I'm not sure that it would have been nearly so effective had I simply read it.

hierenius

This chapter is giving me the fucking chills. that song and the death scene

Shveiran

That speech was amazing.

The best part is that... well, it wan't, not really, you know? I mean, it is a good speech, but it isn't the words that move you. This story is long, it's consistent, and it has a lot of depth; so when she says those words, you don't just hear them: you are reminded of the whole voyage since the first chapters. And it feels amazing.

Grif

"Book Draw" also known as a "Theoretical draw". This refers to an endgame position known to result in a draw if both players make perfect play (play optimally)

In other words, assuming Cat and her opposition don't make any mistakes, this is a tie. But if there's one thing Cat's good at it's forcing people to make mistakes by throwing sharpeners in the middle of their plans.

Fan of Fans

I just gotta share my admiration of EE's imagination, work ethic, and incredible skill at character and story development. Magic origin and practice, battle strategy and action, hierarchy/power/leadership, and some of the most intense interpersonal relationship explorations I have ever read. OMFG. If someone develops – forgive me – a Top 10 Chapters across these wonderful books, I think Book VI, Chapter 69 might be worthy of nomination. And if I were a streaming service CEO seeking original content and was pitched PGTE. Such a no brainer...I truly hope EE is rewarded beyond his wildest dreams (and Patreon). So deserving.

My second paragraph of admiration and gratitude goes out to the loyal, dedicated Commenters following PGTE. Some of you have been around a long time (Liliet, caoimhinh, Mental Mouse, Shveiran, forgive me if I have left you off the shortlist...) some of you have not. ALL of you (well, most of you) are just so fookin' insightful and thoughtful and entertaining – to sit across from you in a pub and listen to you "discuss amongst yourselves" would just be beyond my wildest dreams. Beverage of your choice would be on me. But who knows – maybe it would ruin...the story. All of which is probably way too smarmy a way to say Thank YOU for what you contribute to my PGTE experience. Sincerely, Quite Truly, Dear...

Chapter 70: Solved Game

"Beware of they who laud war, for one who loves the locust cannot love the crop."

– Extract from the transcript of the 'Sermon of the Shores', as spoken by Sister Salienta

Usually the Twilight Ways were a beautiful place, but this time they were as a sea of the wounded and dying.

We did what we could. What few mages were still capable of casting spent themselves raw in the healer tents, the healers among the House Insurgents moved wearily from one half-corpse to another and I demanded the same of every Named that could still move. Tariq, looking himself a step into the grave, moved tirelessly even and he grew more and more wan. Masego – borrowing the last gasps of the Summoner's sorcery – taught the Apprentice emergency surgery on the most brutal of the beds, snatching the slightest sparks of life and fanning them back to a flame. Even Akua, though some refused her help and I had to surround her with a protective detail. I went as well, of course. With Night little more could be done than delaying death, but that served a purpose.

Every hour meant one more priest Light was no longer burning up from the inside, one more mage whose limbs ceased trembling enough for them to be able to cast. I couldn't save them, for Night would ever be the power of a thief, but I could steal them enough hours that someone else might be able to. Time grew clouded, the kind of mist where one could get lost for a lifetime going around in circles, and I went from blood to blood. Soldiers with faces chewed off, with limbs ripped and bones that'd pierced through the skin. And the screams, Gods, the screams. I pulled out poison and curses, slowed the flow of blood to a crawl and forced hearts to keep beating, Night coming to my hand sharp and steady.

I lost myself to the beat, knowing that General Zola and Adjutant would see to the needs of the Second without me.

It was only when the power grew sluggish in my hands, when my weave slipped and I almost drew poison into a young goblin's heart instead out of his veins, that I forced myself to stop. Night didn't heal in the intuitive manner that Light did so any mistake on my part was likely to kill the wounded involved. I limped away after passing my patient to a priest who couldn't be older than seventeen – I have taken a generation of my people to war, I grieved, harvested them like a farmer reaping wheat – and leaning heavily on my staff. My leg throbbed so harshly I felt like I might weep, and now that I had released Night my vision was swimming. One of the phalanges, who'd been following me like loyal hounds all night, came close to offer me an arm to lean on. I gestured curtly for her to leave me be.

I forced myself to ignore the moans and weeping from the tents, the soldiers that would not be saved because we did not have enough left in us to save them. The wind kept carrying them to my ear, though, and so further and further away I went. I found a grassy hill, past the outskirts of the camp, where I slowly slumped into the cool blades of grass. Faintly I saw the phalanges beginning a watch around me, but they were not obvious and I made myself not notice them. I leaned in the grass, staff at my side, and looked up at the twilit sky of this strange realm we still understood so very little. I rested my eyes but did not sleep. I was, somehow, too tired for it. I couldn't be sure how long I stayed like this, but eventually I heard footsteps coming up the hill. Not Hakram, I thought, and immediately felt guilty. If the phalanges had not gotten in the way there was nothing to worry of, so my eyes remained closed.

I was only when they lowered themselves into the grass by my side and groaned in pain that I recognized who it was. Tariq's joints were, I had gathered, sometimes even worse than my own bad leg. Not even the favour of angels could entirely protect one from the ravages of time: the Grey Pilgrim was as perfectly hale as one of his advanced age could be, but he was still very much that age. Heroes didn't get to cheat aging the way my side did, forever frozen at the apex of our growth and power.

"The Apprentice has retired as well," the Peregrine said. "Though the Hierophant continues. He is a young man of remarkable willpower."

I half-smiled.

"He is more mind than body," I said. "Always has been."

I suspected it would appeal to him a great deal, to become entirely an intellect and be stripped of all the weaknesses and needs of the flesh. The smile faded soon enough, though. I could not hear the wounded from here, the wind prevented it, but I could imagine it so vividly only concentration kept their cries from reaching my ears.

"There is no other army like this," the Grey Pilgrim eventually said. "I have seen many battles, Queen Catherine, but none ever spared so much thought to keeping its own alive."

I would not claim to be the spirit behind that, not when all I had done was imitate the Legions of Terror while being in the position to recruit priests as well.

"There's always too many dead," I tiredly replied. "Always, Tariq. Even when we win."

The old man laughed, and while amusement would have infuriated me there was not a trace of that in the sound: there was enough grief in the sound to drown a dozen men.

"There are some foes that cannot be won against, Catherine," the Grey Pilgrim said. "All we can do is worry our hands to the bone and bury the dead, hoping we saved as many as we could have."

This isn't a plague, I thought. It's not the banal malevolence of the world that killed them, Tariq. I brought them here. I led them to this place, so far from every home they ever knew, so they could die for strangers. For a greater good. And so they'd come, and so they'd fought, and so they'd died. In droves, scared and in pain. Some of their bodies, those we'd not been quick enough to burn, we would see again standing under the banners of Keter.

"I used to hate you a little," I quietly said, "for that night in Callow. The one where you refused to help me as we stood at the crossroads of the things to come."

The old man did not speak, but even with closed eyes I felt him bend as if under a great weight.

"But," I continued, "I think I understand it better now, why the thought of sitting the Tattered Throne so terrified you."

All hail Queen Catherine Foundling, they'd said as they put the crown on my head. First of Her Name, anointed Queen of Callow. I was a warlord on a queen's seat, my boots still dusty from the road and my sword reeking of blood, but in that room where Fairfaxes and Albans had ruled they'd anointed me. And my people had followed me into horror ever since, unflinching. And my legend, my story – my lie – it was a young one. I had been a glimpse of spring after a long winter, and so more hopes than I deserved to bear had been set on my brow. Tariq Isbili's legend was old, older than even this old man, and it was dyed in the bone of what it meant to be of the Dominion of Levant. My people had, in the years after the Folly, followed me into the dark without flinching.

Levant would have followed the Peregrine into anything at all, even if it shattered them to follow.

"Even your kindness bruises," Tariq finally replied, after a long silence passed.

I inclined my head in concession, as he was not wrong.

"One day I'll ask too much of them," I said, my tone announcing the subject was at a close.

I was not certain what scared me more: that on that day they would refuse me at last, or that they wouldn't. In a rough pang, I missed Vivienne. She would have understood, I thought. In a way that no one else could, not even the rest of the Woe.

"Or one day they'll asks too much of you," the Peregrine replied, tone strangely gentle.

We left it at that, the two of staying in silence in the grass, until at last I fell asleep.

—

I woke to a warm meal and mug of tea, Adjutant's wheelchair wedged into the slope of the hill at my side and the Grey Pilgrim nowhere in sight. Hakram let me shake off the last dregs of sleep at my own pace, only beginning to speak once I'd dug into the porridge and warmed my bones with the herbal brew.

"General Zola has the casualty reports," he said.

It was almost enough to put me off eating, but I'd found after a few mouthfuls that I was positively starving. I still set down the spoon, blowing at the steam coming off my tea.

"How bad?" I quietly asked.

"One thousand nine hundred and seventy four dead."

He'd not cushioned the blow, which I appreciated. My fingers clenched around the mug, the too-warm ceramic burning my skin. I pushed through the pain. Almost two thousand dead. A fifth of the Second Army had died at Maillac's Boot.

"Permanent wounded?"

"Seventy one," Adjutant said. "Between Masego and the Peregrine there was little that could not be mended. Mind sicknesses, mostly, come from head wounds that themselves were healed."

I breathed out, relieved. In this, at least, we had been exceptional. It was rarer than rubies for an army to be able to walk away with so many fatalities but so few casualties. I drank down tea, still digesting the scope of what we'd lost. It wasn't the outright one third that just retreating through the gates without preliminaries would have cost us, and we'd certainly mauled the armies that'd assailed us badly – something that we wouldn't have accomplished with a premature retreat – but a fifth of losses was not something to be shrugged off. The Second Army as it was right now, should it be made to fight the battle we'd just fought, might fold before the second wave even arrived.

As an independent force, it was now too dangerous to let it fight a peer army. It'd need to be paired with another set of troops, preferably one that could soak up most of the deaths for my soldiers. And we'll have lost veteran officers, I thought. Sappers and mages and other specialists I can't replace. The heart of the Army of Callow and its component armies remained the infantry trained in the Legion methods and those I could still recruit, but all the specialized troops that allowed the Army to maul superior forces were either difficult or outright impossible to replace. Like the goblin munitions that'd allowed me to seize so many victories from the jaws of defeat, they were slowly running out.

"We got bled deep," I finally said.

"And made our foes pay high price for every drop," Adjutant gravelled back. "Every corpse we put to final rest at the Boot is one that we won't be facing at the capital."

It was true, though I still felt like arguing. Instead I polished off the rest of my porridge, that eternal legionary's fare. The tea was not far behind. Hakram's continued silence did not go unnoticed. I glanced at him, finding his face hard to read, and frowned.

"So what is it that you decided to sit on until I got through my..." I trailed off, unsure how much time had passed and so what meal this was.

"Early breakfast," he provided. "And it is not necessarily a problem, Catherine, though the situation will require careful handling."

My frown deepened.

"Not army-related," I decided, "or at least not principally. So this related to my other authority."

High officer of the Grand Alliance, representative for the villains under the Truce and Terms.

"Someone came into a Name during the battle," Hakram said.

Huh. I supposed it'd been brutal enough a grinder to provide that spark, given the right materials to work with.

"Brandon Talbot?" I guessed.

He stood at the alignment of a couple of stories, if you looked at it the right way. Old blood, valiant in battle, about as principled as a nobleman could be while still being a nobleman. Back in Callow there was still a lot of faith bound to what he represented, in certain parts. I'd not caught scent of anything forming there, but sometimes the final stretch of coming into a Name could be quite sudden.

"No," Adjutant said. "Though from the Order of the Broken Bells. A young man who was unhorsed during the countercharge near the shallows and made it back to the ranks on foot after that flank retreated, gathering other survivors to him."

Huh. Fair enough, I supposed. Crows knew it wasn't always the old names that got the nod from Above or Below.

"What are we looking at?" I asked.

"Sixteen, from Laure. Raised at an orphanage before being recruited into the Order three years back," Hakram said. "I'm still finding out which. His name is Arthur Foundling."

I froze in surprise. Foundling. It'd been a long time since I'd last heard that surname tacked on to anyone but me. Yet I had no sole claim to it, as Creation had just deemed it right to remind me. An orphan, huh. I wasn't sure whether that had me wistful or troubled. Then one last detail sunk in.

"Sixteen," I slowly repeated. "That means he's still..."

"A squire," Adjutant gravelled. "The Squire, as of yesterday."

I softly laughed, though there was little mirth to the sound. It seemed Above and Below had at last decided that I'd strayed far enough from the last Name I'd held that another had been allowed to fill those worn old boots. Fuck, I thought. A Squire. That complicated things. Not necessarily immediately, but certainly down the line. It wasn't even directly relating to me: while I didn't even know which way the boy was leaning at the moment, either way I had no intention of falling into the trap of offering more than cursory mentorship. Yet a squire, as Malicia had once told me, must one day become a knight. And my people, we liked our knights. Sang songs about them, told stories. Followed them into battle.

Sometimes we even put crowns on their heads.

Sixteen, I considered. Vivienne was older, but not by that much. If this Arthur Foundling became the figurehead or even the genuine leader of a force within the Kingdom of Callow, marriage to cement her place on the throne wouldn't necessarily be impossible. I might be looking too far ahead, worrying about things that might never come to pass, but my succession was not something I intended to leave to chance. I clenched my fingers. If he became a threat... God forgive me, but I'd killed boys of sixteen before. It might not come to that, I reminded myself. Yet this stank of the Heavens staking their claim on my home again, and I did not like the shape of it at all.

"What did the phalanges dig up on him?" I asked.

"His past is a dead end, but we have people in the Order," Hakram said. "Popular with the other squires, considered reckless by the knights. The knightess he squired under died at the Boot, and there's been talk of him swearing the oaths to Brandon Talbot instead."

"Not happening," I flatly said.

I liked the grandmaster, but he'd also been part of the Regals – an ill-fated noble faction at my court – before I dismantled them. House Talbot had ruled Marchford as counts once, and had been distinguished among the upper tiers of the Callowan nobility for their wealth and ancient blood. Even stripped of lands and riches, Sir Brandon still had deep connections with parts of the kingdom's nobility that'd never taken to my rule. And might object to my handpicked successor taking the throne after me, highborn or not.

"The chatter did not come from Talbot himself, who instead noted that being Named places him foremost under the authority of the Truce and Terms," Hakram clarified.

Mhm. Admirably restrained of him, though I wasn't sure if his hopes would truly toe that line. Talbot knew where my bottom line lay, though, and what the consequences of crossing it would be. That'd keep him in check for a while.

"Personal life?" I asked.

"He was involved with another squire, who died in the retreat," Adjutant said. "The other boy was highborn – House Bickham, landed knights formerly sworn to Dormer. Poor and only nobility for a generation prior to the Conquest."

I grimaced, both at the generous heaping of grief that Fate had seen fit to offer Arthur Foundling and an inconvenient detail just revealed.

"Do we know if he keeps to only men?" I asked.

"Unsure," Hakram admitted.

"Find out," I ordered. "It would close some doors."

Like the possibility of Vivienne wedding him, should it come to that. Dynastic marriages along those lines had happened before, but they had poor reputations for a reason and issue would be, well, an issue.

"Vivienne," Adjutant slowly said, seeing right through me. "That's putting the cart two towns ahead of the horse, I'd argue."

"We're far from a situation where it would even be considered," I agreed, "but I want all angles accounted for."

He nodded. I sighed, stretching my arms.

"I'll have to take his measure in person as well," I said. "And speaking of measure."

I glanced at him with a quirked eyebrow.

"General Zola has proved competent in discharging her duties, though not exceptional," Adjutant said. "Some minor mistakes, all of them swiftly corrected."

"She's been in command for less than a day and got promoted halfway through a battle after her predecessor got assassinated," I flatly said. "She'll settle into the rank, Hakram."

"I'm not impugning her abilities," the orc calmly replied. "I'm trying to temper your expectations, Catherine. She promises to be a solid commander with a good grasp on logistics, but she will not be Hune. She'll be another Bagram, not the kind of rare talents we picked up early in our career."

My fingers clenched. Hune's reputation was not as widespread as Juniper's – the Marshal of Callow had been the face of the military under my reign, and been visibly tied to my campaigns since the first days of the Fifteenth – but it could not be denied she had been highly talented. It had not been without reason she'd been the second highest officer in the Army of Callow. I jerkily nodded.

"I'll keep that in mind," I said. "And I do have a curiosity, actually."

I tapped my temple lightly instead of asking the question outright. That Zola Osei had Soninke highborn eyes – more amber than golden, but then the gold was relatively rare – had not escaped my notice.

"Sister of the current Lord Osei, sworn to High Lord Dakarai of Nok," Hakram said. "Not an old line, but they've been in favour for some time and married well. She was on the losing side of the succession conflict after her father died, and she enrolled in the Legions to avoid assassin blades. Used to be General Afolabi's supply tribune, it was us that promoted her to legate."

The last part didn't particularly surprise me, all things told. One of the great enticements we'd had for the officers of the legions we absorbed after Akua's Folly was that the Army of Callow was so starved for veteran hands that any officer that went over was nearly guaranteed to go up at least a rank. The Legions of Terror in the decade leading to the Uncivil Wars had been relatively slow to promote, too, so the temptation had been even stronger.

"Dakarai is Sepulchral's main supporter, so we'll have to keep an eye on that tie," I said. "She might not be in a position to cause us trouble, at the moment, but that doesn't mean her alliance won't try to get hooks into the Army of Callow."

While I was broadly inclined to back Sepulchral over Malicia, I had no illusions about the kind of viper I was dealing with. I'd known Abreha Mirembé when she was still merely High Lady of Aksum, and back then she'd already been shockingly coldblooded even by Praesi standards. Having an eye on the Tower would not improve her character in the slightest.

"It will be looked into," Adjutant said. "We inherited the work the Eyes put in her, but I will get in touch with Scribe when feasible to see if she might have additional insights."

"Good," I said, groaning as I dragged myself up.

My rest had been, as always, all too short. I stilled, though, when I caught sight of Hakram's face. I liked to think I knew him the way few people did – he was, even now, perhaps the person I was closest to in all of Creation – and I'd certainly gotten better at reading him over the years. Earlier he'd delayed giving me news on purpose, but now his silence was different. He was, I thought, hesitating.

"There's something else," I said.

"It is not news," Hakram said. "Not like the others."

I slowly nodded.

"And yet?"

He licked his chops, still uncertain.

"Masego says that the leg prosthetic has taken well," Hakram said. "He still requires a few days of observation, but he is considering accelerating the timetable for further cuttings."

"The hip," I said.

"I could walk," he said. "By the time we get to Hainaut. Not well, not quickly, and only with crutches but..."

"You could walk," I finished with a soft smile.

He nodded, almost as if at a loss for words.

"I just wanted you to know," Adjutant said.

We took our time going down the hill, between his wheelchair and my limp, but I found the silence between us lighter than it had been in some time.

—

I needed to take exactly one look at Arthur Foundling to know he was going to be a hero.

The boy was almost offensively heroic in appearance, like some higher power had taken the mould of 'young hero' straight out of Callowan culture and poured materials into it. Dark-haired and blue-eyed, with an angular face and strong shoulders, I could already see he was going to grow into a handsome man. He knelt before me after being ushered into the tent, sheathed sword scraping at the ground from the haste of his movement. With a touch of amusement, I saw his jaw twitch from a suppressed wince. Still, after a moment of taking him in I decided he looked... gaunt. Tired. Grieving. He'd lost a mentor and a lover the same day, Adjutant had told me. Under the composure, I suspected there laid a roiling ball of pain and anger.

"Rise," I said.

The young man did, this time careful not to drag his sheath on the ground. He looked unsure, jaw locked tight. He had, I realized in a moment of bone-deep sympathy, likely not been taught the etiquette involved in a royal audience.

"Which orphanage raised you?" I casually asked.

He started in surprise.

"Er," Arthur Foundling got out, "It was Queen Mary's Home for Errant Boys, Your Majesty."

I laughed out in disbelief.

"Wait, you're from Queenie's?" I said. "They try to make all their wards into scribes and priests. Gods, do they still have that crabby old sister? I can't remember her name—"

"Sister Jessica's still alive, as far as I know," the squire said, in the tone of someone trying very hard not to speak ill of the clergy. "She, uh, did not approve of my joining the Order."

I wondered how he'd react if I told him that said Sister Jessica had once rapped me on the knuckles thrice with a stick for having thrown a snowball in her face. I'd actually been aiming at this little shit who'd kicked in the wall of our fort three streets up, but I'd missed him and she'd opened the door just then. She'd had a pretty sharp hand for an old lady, it'd stung for several days. Hells, she must be pushing seventy by now.

"Our matron at the House would have sent me to the cathedral for remedial moral education if she'd known I wanted to go to the War College," I drily told him.

I'd never found out who it was at my orphanage that was the spy – honestly, knowing Black there'd probably been several – for the Empire, but it'd not been her. My orphanage had been founded and founded by Praes, but the matron herself had not answered directly to any Praesi. The dark-haired boy looked at me hungrily at my words, like he was drowning and I'd just tossed him a rope.

"It's true, then?" Arthur Foundling said. "Your Majesty. That you came from Tit – from the House for Tragically Orphaned Girls?"

"You can call it Tittering House," I snorted. "Nothing I haven't heard before."

The boy's orphanage down the street – not Queenie's, which was in another quarter entirely, but the Laure Shelter for Forsaken Boys – had coined the nickname, warranting the reprisal of theirs being called Flaccid Shelter.

"You really did," the boy said, tone almost awed. "I mean, the stories said, but they say so many things..."

Fuck, I thought. I'd known, on parchment, that there would be similarities. That they might pull on my heartstrings some. Yet I'd honestly believed it'd be easy to ignore, to set aside. Instead I was looking at a boy who might grow up into a threat to the legacy I meant to leave behind and seeing a shade of myself at sixteen, all bruised knuckles and fresh out of the orphanage gates.

"It's true," I said. "But it's not me we're here to talk about."

His face locked up tight. I wondered, idly, if that was what I'd looked like when Black was talking to me back in the day. Always straddling hopeful and afraid, guarding my own thoughts so fiercely I might as well have worn them on my sleeves.

"I know about the Truce and Terms, Your Majesty," Arthur Foundling said.

"No," I bluntly replied. "You just think you do. Unless I'm very mistaken, you're leaning the way of the Heavens–"

"I'm not a heretic," the boy said, sounding miffed.

"– which means you're going to be in an inconvenient situation," I finished, cocking an eyebrow at the interruption.

His face blanked again, but he did not apologize. I could appreciate a spine, so long as he understood when he was overstepping.

"As a heroic Named, you representative under the Terms will be the White Knight," I said.

He did not well hide his surprise. I got where he was coming from, of course. A Callowan hero grown in the wilds would not have considered themselves bound to me save perhaps in enmity, but this one had been a squire in my own knightly order for three years. He wouldn't be seeing this in terms of hero and villain – I was both his queen and an older Named, in his eyes I would have been the natural authority. Perhaps not one entirely trusted or obeyed, but undeniably an authority.

"You're the Queen of Callow, though, Your Majesty," he hesitantly said.

"Yes, and unless you intend to renounce your oaths as a knight of the Order of Broken Bells-" I paused there, and he empathically shook his head, "then I still remain your commander. Hence the inconveniences. For now the troubles are minor, but once we rejoin with our sister host I will have to speak with the White Knight about this."

My eyes narrowed and I studied the boy.

"You have intentions," I said.

The Squire paled, his limbs stilled, but he did not deny it. He would not have come into a Name if there had not been something burning in his belly, and we both knew it.

"I thought I knew where my life was headed," he bitterly said. "And now Sir Alexis is dead and..."

His lips thinned and he held his tongue.

"You've been looked into," I gently said. "We know about your lover."

"I had hoped to keep that grief my own," Arthur Foundling said.

And for a moment, as his face grew solemn, I glimpsed the make of a Knight in him. The potential was there. Whether it made him a boon or a danger, though had yet to be decided.

"That possibility went up in smoke," I honestly said, "the moment when you became the Squire. You have eyes on you now, Arthur Foundling. Your actions will have repercussions."

"I just wanted to be a knight," he tiredly replied. "To bring back the banners that the Praesi buried and you left in their grave, Your Majesty."

Now was not the time, I thought, to have a conversation about the difficulties inherent to assembling a large mounted force – particularly one made up largely of lesser nobility whose allegiance to me would vary between shaky and nominal – in the Callow I'd come to rule after the Doom of Liesse. Maybe one day, if the boy was destined to be anything but a man on a horse very good at righteously killing people, but not today. I was all the more wary of teaching him the way Black had once taught me because I rather wanted to. I remembered what it was like, standing in those shoes and feeling both more capable and more lost than you'd ever been before.

Part of me itched to pass those lessons on the way they had been passed to me, and that was a dangerous thing.

"I left them there for a reason," I said, "but that is a conversation for another day."

I drummed my fingers against the side of my staff thoughtfully. Best to carefully control the amount of time I spent around this one.

"Adjutant will go over the details of the Truce and Terms with you," I said, "so that you may fully understand your rights and responsibilities. Until then, you remain a squire in the Order of Broken Bells."

He pressed his fist against his heart in acknowledgement.

"You won't be swearing squire oaths to another knight until I have, at the very least conferred with the White Knight over the matter," I added. "Your position is already too complicated for my tastes."

"Yes, Your Majesty," he acknowledged.

"Good," I said. "Then you are dismissed, Arthur Foundling."

He bowed, but after straightening hesitated instead of leaving. I cocked an eyebrow again.

"The stories," the boy said, "they say you used to be the Squire as well."

"I was," I agreed, cocking my head to the side.

"So you had them too," Arthur said. "The dreams, I mean."

Huh. Name dreams already.

"I had dreams," I said, "but likely not the same as you."

Although, Hells, I'd been the last Squire hadn't I? Was he going to get Name dreams from my years bearing the Name? I was still alive, but Black had been as well when I'd gotten glimpses of his life. Unless he was going to get dreams from a Squire that'd been headed Above's way, and I'd only gotten my father's career in my sleep because he'd been the last Squire headed into a Name sworn to Below. I didn't actually have an answer to that. Crows, it would have been effectively impossible to get answers about this a few years ago: heroes and villains hadn't exactly sat down for pleasant chats about the nature of Names, back before the Truce and Terms.

They still didn't, honestly compelled me to admit, but at least the thought was no longer so glaringly absurd.

"So you didn't dream about the sword, then?" the Squire asked.

"Which sword?"

"The broken one," he hesitantly said. "The pieces are in far places, but always deep below water."

I kept my face calm, though I felt a surge of both fury and indignation. Fucking Hashmallim, I cursed. Fucking Choir of Contrition and their grubby meddling hands. I'd snapped the Penitent's Blade in dozens of pieces and scattered some of them as far as the Tyrian Sea, I wasn't going to let that damned sword get reforged. Someone wielding it anew had my death written all over it. I was going to have to talk to Hierophant about the practicalities of expressing my displeasure there.

"I knew that sword before it was snapped," I said. "It is best left scattered, Arthur Foundling, lest you want Contrition to sink its hooks into your soul."

He didn't look like he entirely believed me, but my warning hadn't gone into deaf ears either: the young squire had looked distinctly unenthused at the notion of being bound to angels. This time he took his leave for good, leaving me to lean against my desk with a conflicted look on my face. The Squire seemed like a good kid, honestly. A little rough around the edges, but it was nothing he couldn't grow into.

I hoped I wasn't going to have to kill him, before this was all over.

—

On the first day the Second Army rested. On the second it marched, and on the fifth we found the other column.

From there, I knew, there was only one place to go: the capital, where it would all be won or lost.

Cicero

Awesome!

Do it Cat, do it!

Make him your Squire!

Take the high risk high payoff bet!

Darkening

As much as I'd enjoy seeing Cat in a Mentor role to someone, that sounds like a great way for some tragic confrontation down the road where he kills her. Or one of the other dozen ways mentors die to further their charges' paths. Cat's waaaay too cautious for that. We saw a lot of that thought process back with the Scorched Apostate, though she was getting dangerously invested in him. She's probably not eager to have another potential protege killed in her care.

Adrian V

The thing is that the danger is both ways, either the mentor dies or the disciple does, i think the way to manage is that she is A mentor not THE mentor, meaning she is only 1 of many teachers, she can stack the the odds by making it more than 1 disciple so is more of a class.

In a way it could be a prelude to Cardinal too

Liliet

The best way to manage that is that her path and his path diverge the minute he's out of basic training. That's how you get "oh hey if that isn't my old mentor I haven't seen in five years!" narratives instead of "my mentor could do this task instead of me, if only they were still around" narratives. That's how Amadeus is still alive – his Role and Cat's just don't overlap anymore.

And, uh, Cat IS already planning on abdicating.

Liliet

P.S. Append an "IMHO" to the above comment.

SpaceDorf

My first thought was a Squire would be the best thing to happen for Hanno getting his Shit together.

And I am looking forward to Cat putting a Ribbon on the Squire saying „I am so sorry for the Axe thing, I got you something nice“ second thought. Arthur ? for real.

Sword Dreams ?

Contrition should be lucky the Mold did not break under all the Bullshit they tried to cram in.

afterthoughts : there should be a Providence Bingo

Tenthyr

Catherine is probably, among the other stuff pointed out, EXTREMELY wary of actions that might shape her name out of the path it's already forming along. A relationship with Arthur would be exactly the sort of thing that might break her name just like how the Bard tried to break it/ make Catherine the new Bard.

goliath1303

Where did you get that Bard was trying make Cat her successor/replacement? I remember that as Bard attempting to use their opposition to shape Cat's name into being her rival. I also remember Bard wanting out of her Role/Name. I don't remember her plan ever being to use that opposition to shape Cat into the new Bard though.

Gibborim

She works so hard to keep the hooks of fate out of her flesh. There is only one word for swallowing whole like that:

Mistake.

Liliet

You do realize you're gleefully quoting the person whose example she is fighting with the urge to follow, right?

Tattletale

We all know that tempting fate is the best kind of temptation.

shikkarasu

But of course. I won't speak for anyone else, but every bit of Amadeus we see in Cat makes me squee uncontrollably. She loves her dad so much, even if he isn't related to her, even if he is a mass murderer and also a dick. And he's so proud of her, even if she sasses him relentlessly and also stabbed him that one time.

It's the little things that warm your heart, even in the depths of Winter, or the middle of the Night..

Liliet

Yeah I just really dislike the "mistake" quoting that people do. Amadeus is significantly less clever than he convinces himself he is, his reason for victories is the Power of Friendship, not how rationalist he is. And he doesn't oversell himself in-universe, really, he knows that on some double-checking level, but the fandom's treatment is just... really grating.

shikkarasu

He had a power base, the kind that make it almost hard to fail. I agree it's more Praes-worthy than praise-worthy, but I can't blame anyone for latching on to good, smug quips. It's that or monologuing, really.

Liliet

but it's not always smug? amadeus has used it in relation to himself too

shikkarasu

True. I did not mean to imply otherwise, I was just getting a little flippant in the latter half of that comment. 😊

Liliet

the issue is that that's my problem. people ALWAYS use it in a smug way and lose like. most of the nuance)=

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Guess you could say that's a...

Mistake.

caoimhinh

Being clever is most of the reason for his success, actually.

Being genre-savvy, he avoided falling into the classical villain troupes, he went for pragmatic measures rather than grandstanding and flashy schemes, he took on to reforming the army and trusted on the skill of experienced officers rather than in the hosts of Hell. He knew when to step back and when to advance, could tell when he was being led into a story trapping, and always kept playing the long game.

He doesn't oversell himself, because he is a wise and prudent man whose self-awareness of his limitations has led him to make decisions that most of his predecessors would have disdained and turn him into one of the most dangerous men alive.

Sure, Amadeus surrounded himself with talented individuals and gave them the chance to rise and prove their worth to the world (what he did for the Orcs, Ogres, and Goblins for example), but it's not really that much Power of Friendship so much as tactical use of their respective strengths and clever strategies making not only the Calamities but the Legions of Terror a whole different kind of entities than their predecessors.

Liliet

Huh.

I think this analysis is inaccurate. Ask me if you want details.

Emily

I might be coming to the comment to late...but I'd like details.

In particular it's been noted many times how he built an amazing institution of the legion of terror and didn't rely on old school villain conquering, those tactics aren't just friendship.

Liliet

Calamities.
Grem One-Eye and Ranker.
Malicia.

Amadeus gathered talents around himself in a way no other actor in Praes could compete with. He had a solid idea at the center of it, yes, but he couldn't have fleshed out all details perfectly by himself – he is NOT that intelligent and competent at everything. What he's competent at is being the axis of the wheel: he trusts people and gets people to trust him, and so a whole becomes more than the sum of its parts. You have Alaya of Satus working on the same side as the greatest geniuses of orcs and goblins; you think they would have found their way to each other without Amadeus in the middle? You think they would have let each other have their back without him in the middle as a guarant? The Empire was dysfunctional because of the dog eat dog mentality, the entire system was geared towards "balance of power" through people pulling each other down in the crab bucket.

Amadeus built a crab pyramid, and Hye Su ensured Alaya of Satus never had her bodyguards overwhelmed early on even though they hated each other's guts.

Amadeus wasn't just a reformer – he brought together a generation of reformers, and it was all built on personal trust, because there was no institutional trust for them to lean into. He gathered an army – let me just quote the canon.

> Amadeus of the Green Stretch was the son of corpses now buried, born of a land tread by soldiers under different banners with every season. Duni, he was, his skin the pale shame of old defeats that Praes had deemed filth even in name, and never did he forget it. It was not the Tower's promises that whispered in his sleep but the footsteps of his youth, the wheel of unending defeats seen from the side with cold eyes. In indignation he had become squire, and so sharp a blade found it that it slew his rivals and knighted him in black. To the banner he'd raised the disgraces of the Wasteland had flocked, be they green of skin and red of hand, Named hunted from above or every sharp mind and soul of steel that knew contempt but no captain. His was a company of the hungry and the lost, sworn to bleed for those unworthy of that blood. And so Amadeus of the Green Stretch asserted this: Praes is a mould that must be broken.

Amadeus is an ideologue. A charismatic leader; a standard-bearer. Entire armies trusted him because he meant every word he said in his speeches.

And he trusted people back. He managed to work with Malicia for forty years because he freely believed she was more competent than him, and when she kept secrets he let her keep them. He gave people power and free reins; he won the throne and gave it to someone else. This is utterly antithetical to the Wasteland worldview, and this is key: the contrast. What might seem obvious on context of more pro-social societies, in the Wasteland was a revolution by itself: Amadeus gave everyone as much as they wanted and was available, not the bare minimum they needed per his plans. Remember the Ehioze measure of orc rations? Amadeus did the opposite of that, on everything.

He didn't build a machine the size of an empire, it would have broken halfway through under its own weight. He planted a garden.

His approach to Catherine is very characteristic of him. He gave her everything she needed for her plans and then some, and she ended up fighting to keep him alive even when he didn't want her to, because he's a very good ally to have.

He's been a very good ally to have to everyone who's ever been his ally, that's why there were so many people Tariq was baiting/antagonizing with his soul ripping plan.

And it's Power of Friendship and Power of Trust, in a very primal way, because again – there was no pre-established body of wisdom for him to draw on. Empire's institutional approach has always been the opposite of his.

This is probably not a fully sufficient explanation of everything, so do ask about whatever I managed to gloss over/assume!

LM

So a couple things:

First, a hell of a chapter, as always. Great politics, and I'm loving that names and the way they shape fate are becoming central to the story again.

Second, Jesus Christ. With the fatality rate in Callow, combined with the percentage of gay folks (it's gotta be 50% by this point), and the lack of serious male-female relationships, when do people have kids they must have quintuplets. Otherwise the population has to have absolutely cratered. Or maybe children form out of the air on the steps of orphanages.

But seriously. Name two alive named characters and the name of their biological child. I'll wait.

Seriously.

Katherine: Orphan, bisexual, dates women when not single, possibly infertile to to literally being made out of darkest evil, no kids.

Maseago, Adopted, asexual, no kids

Cornelia H: single, unknown preferences but unmarried as a ruler is a huge deal, no kids
Thief: single, unknown preferences, again unmarried as a ruler, no kids
Harkem: Straight, but unmarried and no known kids
Black: unmarried, may eventually end up with Malacca. No kids Malacca: asexual? May love black. No kids
Squire: Gay, orphan, too young to have children
Archer: bi, single, no kids
Akra (the shade, I can't spell): gay and also dead
Pilgrim: Asexual, no kids
Capitan: straight but dead and I think no kids
Klaus: no wife no kids.
Kingfisher prince: straight, no wife no kids
White Knight: no idea on sex, no kids. I think he or kingfisher had a wife once?
Tyrant: only attracted to Chaos, no kids

The list goes on, but there's only one thing in common....

Konstantin von Karstein

Some corrections: Cordelia is straight, she told herself that one of her guard (a man) was not bad but that it would make a scandal.

Thief is straight, Cat said she couldn't get in her pants because of it.

I think Malicia is lesbian, but I am not sure.

Akua was straight, she slept with her second in command before Second Liesse.

Tariq is straight, he was in love with one of the Champion's Blood.

All those people are a bit too busy to have kids or adopt. The Woe were busy preventing Callow from collapsing, and there was a giant war on the horizon that every single one of the people you mentioned could see. Having kids would be a major mistake.

Shoji

Also, I believe that Captain (the cursed werewolf, right?) was married to a Praesi bureaucrat and had two children.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yep, it's true. But she married well before the Uncivil Wars.

shikkarasu

Correct.

Also:

Malicia – confirmed to be sleeping with her spymistress.
No known interest in men.
Akua – possibly ‘twice bloomed’, or she might just be messing with Cat. There’s really no way to be sure.
Klaus – two dead sons
Kingfisher – Proposed to Cordelia, but mostly as a political move. No known interest in men. 1 night stand with the Queen of Callow.
Wekessa – Men only, married with adopted son
Tikoloshe – Up for anything, and by ‘anything’ I mean anything, and by ‘up’ I mean [REDACTED]. Married with adopted son.
Ranger – non-committed relationship with Black. Kids unlikely, but she does what she wants. Long distance Bromance with the Dead King, but that might just be the boredom talking.

Shveiran

I don’t really get the surprise.
I mean, most Named spend their (usually short) lives travelling from dangerous adventure to more dangerous adventure. That’s really, really not a good match for having children.
There is a reason why marrying and having kids is usually referred to as “settling down”: to do it right, you usually have to settle down!
For crying out loud, Sabah was a member of a highly successful band and avoided all political roles and she still left two orphans on their own. Named and families mix only to fuel future tragedies. If you are Named and love kids, don’t fucking have them!

Morgenstern

This.

Mental Mouse

> Tikoloshe – Up for anything, and by ‘anything’ I mean anything, and by ‘up’ I mean ...

... Magic: The Gathering! Seriously, Tikoloshe made it clear that he was not just about sex. Any kind of desire at all, and after a few thousand years, he’d explored a lot of the more subtle interests of humanity.

Liliet

Cordelia is bisexual???? She has mentioned both men and women as interests in the past???

Konstantin von Karstein

I am pretty sure she mentioned an interest for men, I don't know concerning women.

Liliet

Yes, yes she has.

Cordelia did, though lending an arm was as far as she intended to ever indulge the flirtation. She'd had discreet liaisons over the years, with men and rather more rarely women, but becoming involved with one in her service would be... uncouth in many ways.

shikkarasu

I think a good rule of thumb for this kind of story is "bisexual until stated otherwise". It also happens to be my favourite way to write/flesh out characters.

Liliet

Same. Frankly I suspect it's a lot more true about irl people than the current culture has them assume.

Darkening

Captain very much had a husband and kids that she worked very hard to keep completely disconnected from her professional life. Kingfisher prince doesn't have a wife because he's hung up on Cordelia. The, brigand's blood noble from Levant had a son fighting in the battle of the camps with her I believe? Black's with Ranger and I suppose it's possible she's infertile due to being a half breed or maybe she's have to do some weird nature thing given the connection between the forest resenting the elves and them being infertile in universe. Klaus had a wife and two kids, they're just dead now. It does seem a bit odd that there's no married people anywhere in the major cast, but I imagine that has a lot to do with it being simpler to write unattached people.

Shveiran

I think it's just the result of having a major cast that leads this kind of lives. the only odd ducks are a few of the un-Named, political characters.

Tom

It's because being Named is tough on your family life. Everyone around you ends up dead by your hand or by the hands of people trying to kill you.

Plus simply having encountered Kairos is probably a 100% effective form of birth control for anyone who suspects their offspring could become Named.

RoflCat

I'm pretty certain Named basically can't have children while remaining a Named unless a Story allows it.

origamiflame

I mean, with this you completely disregard Levant and the whole... Bloodline of names sorta deal?

Liliet

Captain???

Matthew Wells

Villains creating new Named usually kills them, so it's probably a wise decision on Cat's part.

Sykomantis

Recent studies (not sure when or which, too lazy to look up) have shown that homosexuality has persisted from an evolutionary stand point because the straight, opposite sex siblings of homosexuals actually end up having MORE children, on average, than random chance can explain. Something about how if their homosexual sibling can attract the same sex then the straight, opposite sex sibling will be REALLY good at attracting that sex as well.

AbraKadabra

Sounds like bullshit to me. Being attracted to people does not make them attracted to you... Trust me, I tried. 😊 There is definitely some evolutionary advantage somewhere, but this is not it.

Sykomantis

To reiterate what I actually said, SUCCESSFUL (as in ABLE TO ATTRACT someone of the same sex into participating in a same sex relationship) homosexuals' siblings tend to have more children ON AVERAGE (as in there being a normal distribution for number of children had by the siblings of homosexuals whose median/mean is higher than the total population's at a statically significant level). At the evolutionary level I'm talking about here, this is sufficient to explain why the HUGE selection pressure of NOT BEING ABLE TO HAVE CHILDREN EVER didn't die out completely: because in a species that usually has few offspring to begin with, having more than other members on average is a dominant strategy for keeping your genes in the gene pool, especially when those genes make you attractive to a certain sex, regardless of your own.

Abrakadabra

And this explanation is Bullshit, because it disregards those homosexuals WHO are unsuccessful in attracting people. Some people Just fails at it and that is that. And the siblings fair no better.

Mental Mouse

I'm not sure I buy that – finding a partner was historically not as hard at it is in modern times after we've abandoned arranged marriages! I could believe that some of the people they unsuccessfully tried to court might still be in the family's orbit, though....

A more likely mechanism is that a bachelor uncle or spinster aunt represents an extra pair of hands to help support the breeders, which makes a big difference for their nephews and nieces.

Sykomantis

<https://www.theguardian.com/uk/2004/oct/13/highereducation.research>

It's old but feel free to read for yourself

Sceptic

Thank you! The progressive sensibilities of guideverse seem like bullshit to me. Aside from what you mentioned, women in armies. Women in medieval armies? How does a woman hold up in a shield wall? How do they find all these women that are even interested in being soldiers? How do countries that have women in armies replenish their populations after wars? For that matter, how the hell does anyone stand up to Orcs in a war? Aren't they all 300 pounds, raised for war and stronger than humans pound for pound as well? How do farmers stand up to that? Bullshit. Progressivism is possible only in post-scarcity societies.

Bcurly

The beautiful thing about a formation like a shield wall is that it's more about the overall strength of the army rather than individual martial ability. A shield wall of men and women will hold up almost as well as one of pure men, and the manpower increase will likely be worth it in places with low manpower, like Praes, or who need every soldier they can get their hands on, like callow or procer. As for how levies stand up to orks, simply they don't. We see multiple times soldiers from procer getting slaughtered by legionnaires.

Javvies

A few things.

One, even in real life, female warriors were a thing. Culturally dependent, really. Some cultures, they're functionally unheard of or extreme rarities, in others, they are significant. Sure, not 50%, but they are extant in real life human history.

Two, we don't know to what extent magic, magical, and/or alchemical manipulations have altered human baselines relative to real life. Or, for that matter, simple environmental evolutionary pressures and population bottlenecks pushing up baseline norms because the weak didn't survive.

Also, interbreeding with magical creatures – which we know was a thing. And it's possible that the children of Named inherit and pass down some level of enhancement beyond mundane norms.

Three – let's remember, the presence of magic and Names change a fuckton of cultural norms. Plus non-human, and their sexual dimorphism differences.

Four – I'm fairly certain that the human gender balance in armies is not even across the board, but varies by role and specialty. Ie, I'd expect that in the Legions/Army of Callow that the human troops who are heavies are more likely to be men, whereas mages are more likely closer to an even split.

All that being said, it does feel like heterosexual relationships, or even interests, are relatively uncommon amongst the notable characters.

However, since we also know that there are miracles that can allow two women to have children, homosexuality doesn't mean you aren't having children and passing down your genes, as normally happens in real life.

AbraKadabra

The intrresting thing that in real life there was a number of woman warriors and leaders, for example there were The celts. Queen Buodica for example, WHO fought The romans. The roman soldiers were actually aghast that The woman amongst The celts did not sit at home as is right and proper for roman woman.

On a side note I Just cannot fathom why some progressives idolizing romans, when they were a slaving, militaristic, genocidal, empire On top of what they tought of woman, which they passed On to later ages...

Mental Mouse

Okay, looks like it's time to link this again....
We Have Always Fought.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

When Talbot is new-ish he mentions there are miracles available to allow same-sex couples to conceive together. I'm sure there's an Evil equivalent as well.

Morgenstern

You do realize that _characters in novels_ VERY seldomly have kids, until they fall into the Papa/Mama Bear trope? Because PARENTS do not usually _go on adventures_. That's why NAMED don't usually have all that many kids, least of all official ones, during their active years. NOT because the whole population of the country they stem from has this or that personal preference. Just because gays, bis, asexuals, and victims of friggin trauma are more prominent in this book does not make a population fallout... I find it highly endearing to see more of my actual real life represented here, while in real life people simply IGNORE how many of us there _actually are_, _IRL_.

Morgenstern

Malicia: Was a rape victim for YEARS in the last Emperor's harem before she killed him. Seemed rather interested in Black before she got abducted. She was probably straight or at least bi, but got traumatized so much that the thought of being with a man again, sexually, simply doesn't come up...

Liliet

Uhhhhhhhhhhhhh no.

She was decidedly not straight, that's not how being a lesbian works. I'd hear you if she was asexual, but she's been sleeping with her spymaster for forty years.

Abrakadabra

You are very sure, but I think in Malicia's case it is unwarranted.

Liliet

She's. Literally. A. Lesbian.

She MIGHT have been bisexual before being traumatized out of it. Straight? THAT'S NOT HOW IT WORKS

Abrakadabra

You realize I DID. NOT. SAY. THAT. I hope...

Liliet

Uh.

What did you say, then? What exactly am I unwarrantedly sure in?

Abrakadabra

And why would they care about that? It is not their business what you do in your bedroom, you know. Most people are not interested at all. Except creepy people, WHO likes to peek, but not many of those around.

Liliet

In addition to what other people have pointed out, HAVE YOU EVER HEARD OF MONASTERIES IRL. So so so many people never getting married and having kids! However did population sustain itself???

Shveiran

Comparing the impact on repopulation of small celibate communities that usually involved a greater number of non-initiated (and thus not oath-bound to celibacy) members to that of armies slaughtering each other is simply disingenuous.

While I am completely in favor of writing fantasy in a way that is inclusive because it is written for a modern audience that greatly benefits from the larger representation, introducing equality of gender and widespread acceptance of every sexual orientation in a world that still works in a way that it's similar to the medieval age does raise issues concerning realism.

The division of roles between genders and the belief that heterosexual families were the only true way were not (or rather not just) the product of prejudice and close-mindedness. They tied in to actual problems, like the rate of children death and the absence of the very concept of welfare – including pensions.

They were not just cultural mores that can be edited out by introducing a new culture; they were the answer to a problem rooted in survival and biology.

I can elaborate, if you wish to discuss the issue.

To reiterate, I am not arguing that representation should be sacrificed to realism, here.

If anything, the Guide positively convinced me that we should write in a more inclusive way, and provoked a radical change in my own approach to writing fiction.

I am merely saying that when we build a fictional world that is inclusive, we need to either add a meaningful explanation to how these changes are sustainable or risk that world being pointed at as unrealistic.

With regard to the Guide and this issue, the best explanation I can come up with is that most children on Calernia have access to magical healing and that every gay person dies young, is very rich, or has access to the House of Light miracles that allow two people of the same gender to have a child.

Which... well, I really don't think is canon.

Liliet

First, most children (and childbearing parents) in Good countries have access to priestly healing, which changes the demographic situation significantly.

Second, it's been mentioned that the proportion of men and women participating in warfare is much more equal when it comes to nobility – you know, the people who DO have access to every welfare ever invented and have exactly as many children as they want to. The gender ratio among footsoldiers is much more skewed, and in Callow IIRC the draft applies to specifically male teenagers, same as historically. It's just that anyone can sign up for money on top of that.

Third, every instance of gay marriage we've heard of concerned the elite – rulers and mages and the like, who yet again can afford any miracles they like. And adopt.

With these points in mind, I have no idea what changes are unexplained from there.

The Sanity Faerie

"Third, every instance of gay marriage we've heard of concerned the elite". That's not true. The significant majority were, but that's because the practical guide mostly talks about the elite. There was a sausage-seller that Adjutant chatted with (male, married to a man, had a child). It was part of the storyline where he winds up cutting off his own hand in support of Thief.

Liliet

Oooh, you're right! That happened, I forgot!

Nice.

I think my first point addresses that sufficiently though – child and childbirth mortality would be A LOT lower in Guideverse.

Abrakadabra

Yep. You are right about that. The whole thing actually start with economic reasons. Medieval cities are not self sustaining from a population standpoint. The cities and towns are dependent on villages to maintain their population. The rural people constantly moved into towns and so maintaining the population of the towns. Which means that gays in small villages did not find partners, and moved to towns. Which means that towns are richer in gay people, which leads to a cultural separation, a divide between the townies and villagers. Over time, towns become more inclusive, while villages become more closed. Which is a self perpetuating cycle. Even today, villages are places where there are more children born, and towns and especially cities are dependent on the migration of people to maintain their population. In the middle ages every sickness reaped far more life in towns than in rural places, because smaller population density.

Joseph Perry

Don't let Ranger near him. She may have a convection.

Peter

An Empress needs her Knight after all.

caoimhinh

Ohh... interesting.

Crash

Switch that for Heiress Vivienne Dartwick, and we'll be set.

Juff

Typo Thread:

even and he > even as he
I was only > It was only sitting the Tattered > sitting on the Tattered
I had been > It had been they'll asks > they'll ask
So this related > So this is related same say > same day there laid a > there lay a out, "It > out, "it founded and founded by > founded by you representative > your representative

doominator10

I think it's 'founded and funded by'...

SpeckofStardust

So I started laughing at the same time cat did, after all a Squire that got its name due to fighting the undead in a swamp. Also hello death flags.

Naeddyr

oh my fucking god erraticerrata do you have any words in your defense

ChillyPepper

Only her murdering the White Knight and Black Knight left, then we have a whole dream.

Javvies

Hakram will probably be walking soon. Good news.

Ooh. That's hella complicated, even before the Hashmallin started lining Squire Arthur up to take up Willy's broken angel feather sword. Don't remembe what it's called offhand. Stay away from Angels and the Choirs, kid. But especially Contrition ... what the hell would they be able to leverage him with the way they did Willy.

LarsBlitzer

There are all sorts of levers and hooks the Choir could use to get Arthur to play along with the story they have in mind. Prophetic dreams are only the tip of the iceberg, they can get terribly insistent as time wears on. Granting the use of a Gift of Light to use in the nick of time to save the day, only to take it away when the stakes are lower to hammer the point home that but for the Grace of the Choir the Gift can be lost when he needs it most. It's not below Above to put a thumb on the scale or sneak a card from their sleeve in order to make Arthur's story hit the proper plot points.

caoimhinh

Remember that Angels of Contrition do not so much leverage people so much as mind-rape them into fanatics to their cause. That was why William's summoning of a Hashmal was so dangerous, it would have brainwashed every person in the vicinity into becoming crusaders for Above.

Javvies

That's when the/a Hashmallin physically manifest into Creation. They can't do that on a whim. To mindfuck a Contrition Hero, the Contrition Hero needs a significant sin to be made contrite about.

Lone Swordsman got mindfucked by Contrition, but he'd killed his sister, which was his primary act that they used to break him.

I don't think Arthur has the same sort of sins in his past that Willy did. They'd still need something to leverage Arthur.

I think that the bigger the sin(s), the easier it is for Contrition, and the more free will the subject gets to keep, or rather, the less damaged and less constrained the subject of the Hashmallin's attentions.

caoimhinh

To manifest into Creation physically and affect the common people, yeah, they need some pretty good excuse like an invitation through a ritual or summoning by their anointed. But to get in contact with a Hero? Nope. Not at all. They don't even need to be sought, they come to you uninvited, and unexpected. We actually have several examples in the story that prove that.

William was a ravaging man wandering the woods when the Hashmallim got him, Tariq was simply doing his own things for helping people when he started hearing the whispers of the Choir of Mercy, and Iason (the Stalwart Paladin) was fighting and about to get killed by Catherine when the Choir of Endurance intervened to bestow power into him.

And now Arthur has been Squire for half a day, and the dreams are already showing him an artifact of the Hashmallim.

We have evidence that they can mindfuck common people into their service, so a Hero doesn't need to be especially inclined to them or vulnerable to be mindfucked. They just need to get to him.

Liliet

We don't actually have evidence of that last thing you said.

William was mindfucking HIMSELF when Hashamallim came to him and helped along. Like yeah they helped but they reinforced what he was ALREADY THINKING. Tariq was already doing the Mercy thing, and you'll notice that when he took a break from that, the angels just quietly weren't there until he was back. Iason the same, and Hanno was stubbornly seeking them out more than anything.

Javvies

I don't think a Choir, in this case Contrition, can do that much without either (a) being physically manifested, or (b) the Hero accepting their offer.

They can make offers, and do things like sending enticing/ ploTHOOKED Name Dreams to Heroes who haven't yet accepted them, but unless the Hero accepts the Choir as a patron/ guide, the Choir can't do much else.

Also, I suspect that Choirs have an easier time and more leeway with making offers to those more closely aligned with their concepts ... and I doubt Arthur is particularly closely aligned with Contrition, unlike Willy.

Of course, most Heroes would readily accept an offer of patronage/guidance from a Choir, without much consideration.

Honestly, I half think Cat should tell the kid that the sword he's being sent dreams about is the one that she broke after Willy tried to use it to summon a Hashmallin to mindfuck Liesse. I suspect that would very quickly kill any interest he he might yet have in trying to restore it, Name Dreams about it or not.

Big Brother

It was the Penitent's Blade.

Rey d`Tutto

Gorgeous.
Complex Complications.

dadycoool

Whew, it's not very often that Cat's stores of Night run out, but that kind of fight and the delicate work she'd been doing would do it.

Adjutant's post-battle reports are always nice to hear, even if they have unpleasant information.

Wow, genderbent Cat anyone? Working within the ruling government to restore something fundamentally Callowan that was lost? From the sister orphanage to her own? I wonder if Hanno will assign Arthur (Pendragon?) to Cat, for multiple reasons including liking what kind of Story he sees about it. Squires typically go to knights for apprenticeship, but she's a Warlord, so maybe she counts? Especially since she's been avoiding the Mentor role too hard to last.

caoimhinh

Yeah, he is walking one of Catherine's story grooves (and she has many, one of which is currently being walked by Abigail, with an orc adjutant to boot). though it is admittedly the shallowest one among them. The similarities are sticking on a superficial level, but they are contrary in a lot of things.

Arthur is more like "the Squire that Catherine did not become".

MagnaMalusLupus

While that may be superficial in origin, Cat herself almost fell into the groove of Good while doing what she saw as best for Callow. It would be wonderfully poetic for young Arthur to follow the reverse path of being Good to start with and then stumbling into Cat's groove after seeing Good trying to manipulate him.

Morgenstern

Second that. I'd love to see him reconsider the "heretic" thing this orphanage probably drilled into him, or for it to be revealed it's just what to say that has been drilled in, but not quite his own thoughts. After all, he seemed to be looking to Cat for guidance... totally forgetting her ever getting named "Archheretic of the East", it would seem. =P

Liliet

Cat didn't run out of Night, she just ran out of mental endurance and capacity for fine control.

dadycoool

True, same way mages don't run out of magic and priests don't run out of Light.

Liliet

Yeah. "Light stops burning them up from inside" and "their hands stop trembling". There are circumstances for mages where power can straight up be insufficient, but not in healing it looks like, and not for priests anyway.

Tenthyr

God, contrition really are vultures. And clearly have a grudge against Cat. Hopefully Arthur will go to the white Knight and together they'll find their place in the new age Catherine is pushing them all into

Komplode

Also King Arthur retrieved his sword from a lake, the contritions sword being scattered in different lakes and contrition could be the parallel to the lady in the lake?

Komplode

Sry didn't mean to reply here my phone wiggled out

Frivolous

Can't. Not safe. By his very existence and Name of Squire, Arthur Foundling endangers the life of Hanno of Arwad. Actually working with Hanno would compound the danger.

The only pragmatic choice is to keep Arthur far away from Hanno, inasmuch as that is possible given Arthur answers to Hanno.

The situation exactly parallels Amadeus and Catherine's, which was why Wekesa and Eudokia were so mad at Cat and wanted to kill her.

Javvies

Not necessarily.

There are multiple possible Heroic Names that Squire can lead into. At least, Callowan Names.

White Knight is certainly one, but I believe there are other viable Knight Names, in addition to the various Paladin Names.

This, of course, presumes that he doesn't end up going for a different Name, or a new Name.

And Hanno, what with Recall, can almost certainly provide a number of possible Names that Arthur can aim to transition into, and tips on how to get certain Names or avoid getting other Names.

Frivolous

I thought Squires always became White Knights or Black Knights. I thought it was the Heirs and Heiresses who could transition to other Names.

On second thought, I guess you're right. Masego as Apprentice was thought to become Warlock, but he didn't. He became Hierophant instead. So maybe something else could happen to Arthur.

KalDurak

Didn't Black lose his Name after Tariq caught up with him? That leaves another possible path for the Squire.

mamm0nn

Nope, it has been pretty directly and absolutely stated that the Squire becomes either Black or White. No Grey, no Stalwart, no Mirror. One or the other, absolute.

Of course this may be early day Squire lore for when Cat was still beholden to it and the story shouldn't be too complicated or leading to a narrative confrontation, but when EE doesn't come with such a retcon, nope. This isn't like the Apprentice who usually becomes a Warlock but isn't bound to it, it's either Black or White.

SpeckofStardust

I mean at one point Cat almost transitioned into the good queen or some such back when she pulled the sword out of the stone so that as already has been disproven.

Shveiran

True. But she didn't do it as the Squire. She entered in that groove by being the successor of the (de facto) king of Callow. Who just happened to be the Knight she was Squiring under.

She didn't (almost) transition into Good Queen or Black Queen through her path as the Squire. She nearly did because her story changed and allowed her close to the boundary of those Names.

That's a different thing. It's like an apprenticeship in an office, where it is a given that unless you screw up and get fired (or, you know, die) you will be promoted to a higher position in the office (or become a Knight) because through the apprenticeship you learned the job.

It is possible that, during your apprenticeship, another society could offer you a job, and that you'd accept it. But while you may have been noticed because of your current apprenticeship, this new development is not the natural consequence of your apprenticeship. You are changing path.

The story of a Squire is the story of someone that dies young or becomes a Knight. The fact that it is possible to change your story before that happens doesn't mean that the grove doesn't heavily push in that direction.

Liliet

I think actually that was a Squire groove too, though not, like, a MANDATORY one. Note how Catheirne is looking at Arthur as a threat to Vivienne's reign.

Shveiran

Well, yes, but that is because the OG Good Queen Fairfax the first was a White Knight, wasn't she? It's not a Squire grove, is a White Knight grove. So yeah, it's Squire adjacent, but only because a Squire becomes a Knight.

he certainly is a threat to Vivienne reign: he is Named, idealistic, a Knight that wants to bring back the Knightly Orders, and (in time) a war hero. Meanwhile Vivienne is mostly in her spot because Catherine chose her.

I think she is good, don't get me wrong, but I think Callowans like her mostly because they... dislike her less than Catherine? Because she is less controversial, not because they know she is amazing? If a young, charming, veteran Heroic Named starts saying maybe he should be in charge... he could be a threat, you know?

At the very least, he'll be a banner for a political block much more than the Summoner or Talbot could ever be.

Liliet

Rebel Knight, not White Knight.

And I don't know why, but it sure seems like an existing pattern judging from Akua's reaction back then!

And that's why Cat needs to bind him to her faction tightly enough he'll be a boon to Vivienne instead of a rival.

MagnaMalusLupus

Ah, but that sort of blatant manipulation is exactly the sort of thing a Choir (almost definitely Contrition) would latch onto: "See? Your grand ideal of returning Callow to its former glory is being ground away and perverted by the machinations of Evil. See how deadly the lure, the ease of the path of giving in. You have stumbled from the path. Repent."

Liliet

That's... really not how it works for Named in Guideverse.

Andrew Smith

It like Cat said Callow's people like their Squires and makes kings of them or in simple terms there is story's about that happening. so it would have some of the same kind of weight as what happens when you through a hero off a cliff.

Similar to how if I remember WoE said that cat was most fitting a grey knight name but there was no cultural basis for it

Liliet

WoE absolutely did not say she fit that Name, only the 'no basis' thing.

Andrew Smith

Yeah lookin it back up the her. fitting that name was in the question part not the answer

Frivolous

I think we should differentiate between the story Catherine used to wrest a resurrection from Contrition and the plan Contrition had for Cat to become Queen of Callow.

Cat used the sword in the stone story to force a resurrection. That's one thing.

The vision Contrition gave her of her wearing a crown of light? That might not have had anything to do with the sword in the stone thing. That might have been a separate thing, based on Cat having a lot to be sorry for, and Contrition offering a Redemption.

mamm0nn

At first Liessen it wasn't a story of becoming Queen, rather than her following the groove of a Story. Anyone could've followed it, queenship is irrelevant in that regard. And as her 'father' the 'king' from whom she'd inherit it was Amadeus, it's pretty clear that there's no issue with the 'queen' also being the Squire or a Knight of either alignment.

The Contrition promise of her becoming a good queen were for her to come back presumably as the White Knight, Hanno hadn't been introduced to the story at that point so he didn't really exist even if chronologically he did, so this too isn't contradicting.

At third Liessen again it was a sword and a certain fate it promised, but then she was no longer the Squire. So even if there would be different circumstances here, which there weren't, then there's not even an issue of her being the Squire which she's not.

Frivolous

I don't think Contrition's plan for Cat was to become White Knight. I think she was supposed to become a Good Queen.

I come to this conclusion because she was envisioned as wearing a crown of light. Not the typical apparatus of a Knight.

Remember that a few nations have rulers who are always or often Named. Praes has Dread Empresses. The Free Cities have the Hierarch. Callow has Good Kings and Queens.

Some may point out that Squire does not transition to Good Queen. My response is that anyone who climbs the Tower becomes Dread Empress or Emperor, regardless of their prior Name. The same might go for most who becomes Queen of Callow.

Yes, that does mean that Vivienne might become a Good Queen once Catherine abdicates.

Liliet

Can you quote that “either black or white” statement?

Frivolous

I’ve been researching that. Best so far is this, from Archer, chapter 24 of book 2:

“Squire isn’t a fundamentally villainous Name,” Apprentice replied. “It’s also the transitional Name leading into being the White Knight.”

Liliet

That does not append “but not any other Knight Name”.

Imagine the following sentence: “Squire isn’t an inherently villainous Name. It’s also the transitional Name leading into being the White Knight, also Green Knight, Rebel Knight and half the variations of Knight known to date, also occasionally Paladin, Good King, Good Queen, Shining Prince... sorry, what was I talking about again?”

Liliet

Like it’s natural to read it as “You know White Knight? Yeah, this is the transitional Name that leads into that.”

caoimhinh

Yeah, there’s a mirroring there.

Although, being Heroes, Arthur being Squire to Hanno wouldn’t end with Arthur killing his mentor, as a story of Evil Mentor and Disciple would. Hanno would be in danger of fatally falling in battle or sacrificing himself to save his Squire.

There’s the possibility that Arthur won’t become White Knight. We have seen that there’s Mirror Knight, Errant Knight, and Red Knight, though no mention of them being Squires before getting their Knight Name has been done. Then again, Hanno was never a Squire, he jumped directly into being the White Knight.

Another thing is, Hanno might stop being White Knight and get into another Name that fits his own calling as the Sword of Judgement, as Pilgrim noted that Hanno's inner conflict was between his calling and the responsibilities of his position, the desires of his Role versus the bindings of his Name, so the conflict might have ended with Hanno making Sword of Judgement his Name. And the absence of the White Knight might have been a trigger for the Squire to emerge.

V Kyrius

Also Hanno and Arthur aren't really the same Role. Arthur is a Callowan Redeemer. Hanno is more concerned with Judgment and doesn't care about nationality. I think Christophe training Arthur would be fun lol. Christophe also has king arthur stuff or lancelet more specifically. I should note we all know of 4 Transitional Names with Arthur so he can even get started on his own team and Pascale is young enough to be in that group as well or even someone like Blade of Mercy.

Oshi

If Cristophe is allowed near even 1 other named I would check them for fleas before they are allowed back into polite society. That asshole can't teach because he is broken into a role that is the opposite of what is needed here.

medailyfun

I guess Cat would want to have a transitional Evil Named in the group, but they're not present (yet?). I had commented about Cat missing opportunities to induce Squire/Apprentice/Conjurer/other minor Callowan or Praesi Names before new Apprentice actually appeared. But it looks Cat still don't think about forcing the Names.

Dresden 67

He's more likely to become the Knight Errant if anything, we saw a Revenant by that Name recently.

MagnaMalusLupus

While we have seen the Name it doesn't match Arthur's dream; he wants to restore knights to Callow, which makes the Name Squire, a knight-in-training, very appropriate. A knight errant was a knight with a duty that they were sworn to fulfill. I would see that sort of Name coming to a regular knight who swears an all-encompassing oath that they feel is their sworn duty, not an idealistic reformer.

Mental Mouse

Funny thing, Hanno is himself facing a developing Name-crisis. He might well vacate the post.

Even if he doesn't... well, "Squire always becomes the White Knight or Black Knight" is one of those classic story-grooves, but Cat's own career has been all about screwing with those traditional stories.

Give young Arthur some story-fu training, and I can easily believe he could at least get say, "Shining Knight", which would resonate with other Callowan-accessible names. That said, if he instead becomes the "Good Knight", we're gonna have to start throwing peanuts at EE... 😊

mavant

Perhaps an alternative candidate for carrying the Severity.

The8ofspades

Unlikely: he's dreaming of the penitent's blade. If he ever gets any magic sword, it'll be that one, not the severance.

MagnaMalusLupus

I think that's unlikely at this point. If he learns the story of the Penitent's Blade, and how it was used to try and brainwash his countrymen into Contrite zealots (preferably from someone in the side of Good so that Contrition can't use the source to discredit the message) I think he'll reject that blade in particular. I don't think Severance is likely either, though, as that screams a bit too much of Judgement. I still think that whatever happens with Hanno will lead to him being the wielder of that particular god-killer.

erebus42

Perhaps. It's always good to have a back up lying around, especially when the apparent primary is such a prick

Big I

My bet: Hanno takes Arthur as his squire, Arthur becomes White Knight, and if Hanno survives he transitions into another name (Lone Swordsman maybe? Or a new one like Sword of Judgment).

Big I

Outside bet: Cat becomes Grey Pilgrim.

Jason Ispwitch

Nah. She's ending up with a Name about Names. Hanno, now... it's possible that Arthur could be the shortest-duration

(living) Squire ever, if something like the following takes place:

Hanno takes Arthur under his wing.

Hanno continues to question his role, even as he mentors the Squire.

The Grey Pilgrim goes out in a blaze of glory.

Hanno becomes the new Grey Pilgrim.

Arthur becomes the new White Knight.

(Possibly with the transitions guided by Cat in her new name.)

All probabl too neat and tidy for our brilliant author, 😊

Mental Mouse

Hmm, Hanno could certainly change his Name, but I really don't think he has a plausible path to Grey Pilgrim.

mamm0nn

Let us all appreciate the intricacies of Tariq becoming the Black Queen, first under the Night.

medailyfun

Pink Queen, first under the Dawn

Abhijit Shukla

Well played.

The Sanity Faerie

It would certainly solve his "getting old" issues.

Komplode

"Renewed shall be blade that was broken" (lotr) wonder if Arthur is an unwitting Fairfax or descendent of another royal lineage of callow.

That's at least a hint at Aragorn's sword reforged, as Aragorn dreamed of it before it was reforged I believe?

And King Arthur is a pretty (if not the most) famous legend as well.

Komplode

Also King Arthur retrieved his sword from a lake, the contritions sword being scattered in different lakes and contrition could be the parallel to the lady in the lake?

ohJohN

I think Cat took some wind out of his Arthurian sails by already having pulled that exact sword from a stone 😊

It is interesting that mythological Arthur (at least in The Once and Future King) worked towards harnessing and redirecting the actions of the powerful towards the common good and long-term stability – much like what Cat is attempting with the Accords – and in the process established a chivalric order, like this Arthur wants to do.

Frivolous

Very tricky. Arthur Foundling by being a hero and the Squire is dangerous to both Catherine and Hanno. He's dangerous to Vivienne and a lot of other people. Quite a feat for a 16 year old.

That Arthur looks almost offensively heroic on the same day that he became Squire probably means that he always looked like that, without his new Name changing his appearance to fit his self image. Which makes me wonder if Above chose him in part because of his good looks.

I like that he's gay. Poor guy, losing his knight and his boyfriend on the same day, and then getting introduced to Catherine Foundling.

The Hashmallim are being very foolish giving Arthur dreams about the Penitent's Sword so early. I get that they want revenge on Catherine, but they should have waited. Later on, they might have escaped Catherine's attention, but now she knows they're meddling,, and she's bitch slapped them before. She probably wants to do it again now, and she likely can, especially if she gets Masego to help.

Yes, we have Iron Orc! So happy Hakram is getting back on his feet.

I wonder which capital is being referred to in the last line.

caoimhinh

Yep, that's why Amadeus just killed them and got done with them instead of leaving the problem to grow. Then again, Amadeus is a pure Evil Villain, albeit a pragmatic one, while Catherine is an Anti-villain and a good person at heart, also she is notable for taking choices other people wouldn't have even considered, so everything is possible right now. Besides, Catherine has never been the villain of the stories she is in, except for the most superficial of ways as in "she has an Evil Name", even when having a Crusade and a dozen Heroes rallied against her, she was still embodying a Hero's story, as noted by Pilgrim and Saint of Swords during the Battle of the Camps.

Catherine is so dangerous because the stories she embodies are Heroic Stories, although of course she is unwilling to take the gamble of falling into possible story trappings.

Also, the capital Catherine was talking about in the end is the capital of Hainaut, which is the objective of this campaign. They probably won't be storming Keter until next book.

Liliet

> Amadeus is a pure Evil Villain while Catherine is an anti-villain > this very chapter Grey Pilgrim praises Catherine for the focus on the wounded that Catherine then remarks to herself is entirely triage protocols of the Legions of Terror + access to priests

agumentic

As is the theme with Amadeus, the "good" and "practical" are often the same. Especially if you interpret "practical" liberally.

Liliet

"Practical for what?" is the key question here 😊

Alex Straughan

The Hashmallim situation is shady but they may just want in the fight against the dead King. Without their sword/feather, which is in Callow, I imagine they are weakened. Waiting for the Squire to grow in power/wiles would be the smarter play if their #1 goal was killing Cat.

Not that I think they don't want Cat dead, just that this seems more like them being desperate to join the crusade while also taking a shot at Cat as well.

Mental Mouse

I doubt a lost feather would weaken them... more to the point, I doubt it's the Choir itself sending the Name dreams! I had a definite sense that the Name dreams were a more-or-less automatic function of in-world Plot Mechanics. In this case, there is a sword potentially available, therefore he dreams of it.

That said... there's another Sword handy. In fact, really handy right now, because it's actually in Twilight where the army is (and will surely be returning occasionally in the future).

nick012000

Hmm. Now I'm wondering if this is the Heavens trying to get her to adopt a son to become her heir – perhaps creating a tradition that would solidify Named rule over Callow on an ongoing basis via bonds of mentorship, similar to how the tradition of Named rule via usurpation in Praes.

Burlyraven

This is feeling like a double bluff to get Cat to take Arthur as her Squire. If she leaves him alone, his story pushes him to reforge the blade and kill her, and distancing herself actually increases the odds of that along a few paths. If she mentors him, however, she runs the heavy risk of death, but it would also potentially allow her to shape him into a Name that plays well with the future she wants. Plus, it's not like mentorship is an absolute death sentence, just nearly so.

There's also Hanno's delicate condition to consider. First, he might disagree with Cat being associated with the boy in any fashion. Second, while it's more unlikely, he may object to the boy at all; i.e., because he's coming up on either a power up or a fall, Hanno might see a Name that can lead into his as an existential threat, even with his easy-going personality. Basically, it might not even take effort on Cat's part to turn Arthur to the dark side.

Also, all of these points get altered greatly if the boy is bisexual, as that then potentially puts him on a non-violent path to the throne, so that definitely seems like something to define.

caoimhinh

The Heavens do love to stack their odds in their favor and have pieces that can fit multiple jobs. They are known for being the main wielders of Providence and hence the magic of getting Coincidence and Causality on your side.

ninegardens

His Existence is a danger to the White knight- this is true.

But at the same time, it ain't so hard to think of him as being a back up white knight. For Hanno's survival this is bad... for the sake of the crusade....

Is tricky. Hanno dying is bad, but Hanno dying and getting a story boost out of it, and then Arthur ALSO getting a story boost out of it is.... maybe net positive? A trade that Hanno would lean in on? Remember, unlike Cat, who dodges stories, Hanno is one that tends to lean in on stories (if he can groove them the right way).

And if he's already feeling uncertain in himself... taking a squire might be exactly what HE THINKS he needs to clear his vision.

V Kyrius

He is 16 year old Callowan Hero. Even if Hanno died he wouldn't be next in line for one he is too young and has no experience for two being Callowan means he simply isn't going to get enough votes to take over and someone like Christophe would bash his head in.

Shveiran

Yeah. I mean, a new White Knight would be a net positive (a powerful Named determined to help in the campaign and that respects the Chief Villainess enough to be cordial to her) but Arthur is not a possible replacement for Hanno as Representative under the Terms.

He is way too young and inexperienced for that.

ninegardens

Oh yeah, I ain't saying is good for the Truce and Terms. I'm not saying its good FOR things, I'm just saying that the story bumps you get out of the MULTIPLE story beats this Squire has lined up are non-trivial.

WuseMajor

Honestly, I think they need to have a chat with the Pilgrim. Mentors "die" in stories so the Mentee has to step up and demonstrate their awesomeness... but Tariq has been a Mentor to who knows how many Heroes over the many decades of his life and he's /Still Alive/.

So, he must know a few ways to "technically die" and end up out of action, without actually dying permanently.

One of the big things about the Squire is that they get a Mentor, so fate is GOING to be shoving people at that role until someone bites. Better that they put someone in place knowing what to expect and with as many tricks for surviving the heroic sacrifice as possible, instead of leaving it up to Heaven and Fate to decide.

Konstantin von Karstein

Tariq is already supposed to mentor the Mirror Knight, but he could give advice to Cat or whoever will be Arthur's mentor.

Gerionar

You are saying that the Mentor should mentor mentors on how to mentor (and not dying)?

Konstantin von Karstein

Indeed 😊

mamm0nn

Hakram: Cathrine, it seems that the White Knight is either dead or soon to die. A squire has just risen, and he's quite the boyscout.

Cat: A Foundling? Gods, I've forgotten I'm not the only one.

Hakram: Cat, this means that Hanno might-

Cat: He's not that much younger than Vivs, maybe we should marry those two. Surely she won't fall back into self-doubt and a lack of self-worth when we literally decide her love life for her.

Hakram: Cat, do you not want to discuss the practicalities of this so that we blindly walk into Hanno's crisis and/or dead so you can ride it into a darkest hour scenario for you to struggle and stab your way back to dawn again?

Cat: Nuns and snowballs!

Hakram: Sigh Ignorance it is.

Xinci

You have to admit a foundling named Arthur is insanely appropriate for a heroic story in Callow. Anyway what a tempting fruit, Cats got a chance to possibly further influence those following her groove. But on the other hand...mentorships tend to get you burned. I am honestly rather curious if she could learn anything from the Perrigan to manage a mix of Black and Tariqs style of mentorship, maybe coupled with some kind of group training that would eventually be at cardinal.

Liliet

Perrigan?

nimelennar

Peregrine?

Liliet

So I'm going to step back from the doomsaying and Cat's paranoia and suggest the following:

1. If I'm correct, Arthur is the first new Callowan hero to emerge under Catherine. This is kind of a big deal, even if the Truce and Terms immediately make it into a nightmare of subordination and that's what Catherine is thinking about. It means that the transition period when Callow went dormant waiting for where Catherine's story goes is over, and they're getting new heroes again – ones that work FOR Catherine and not opposed to her!

2. Arthur's role has absolutely nothing to do with Hanno's. Callowans have a staggering variety of Knight Names, and while White would have fit him, Hanno's taken that one in an ENTIRELY different Role.

3. Mentorship is not automatically a death sentence, and refusing mentorship is a trap of its own. Tancred died in a very immediate sense because Cat refused to take him under his wing – she walked away to do things on her own while other people watched over him, and, well, yeah. Sometimes to make the story go the way you want it to, you have to accept a risk. I understand that Cat's traumatized by Amadeus's "seriously you gotta kill me", but I think taking a Squire under her wing is the right thing for her to do in this instance. It'll give her control over a very dangerous situation, and SHE WANTS IT LOOK SHE WANTS IT. IT TUGS ALL HER STRINGS. Like... come on. Cat. Just take the gift. It'll legitimize the shit out of whatever you want to do if you get this new baby Squire doing it.

4. SQUEEE CAT'S BACKSTORY IS RELEVANT AGAIN

Shveiran

With all the reservation stated below, I too really hope she mentors him, yeah. That would be awesome.

I'm such a sucker for mentor stories with intelligent characters.

Liliet

~~also it's about time Cat pulled another heroic sacrifice story that ends with her perfectly alive and going "holy shit, that worked????"~~

Liliet

*take him under her wing

Sinead

I am not saying that Cat may be over reaching in her paranoia, I still think the hesitance in immediately sweeping Arthur under her wing is fine considering that the issues between her and Hanno arose because Hanno saw her as overstepping her boundaries. Her trying to thread the needle on this is not a bad first step. Hell, I don't exactly see her not taking Tancred as a protege a mistake because Cat didn't have a whole lot to teach him about his Role. To me the mistake wasn't about the not taking him as a mentor (the kid needed to sleep while she did her work), but instead the fact that she let her guard drop in enemy territory.

I am not saying that jumping directly into a mentorship role doesn't have it's risk (and acknowledge the point that Cat's view of mentorship as a death sentence is from rather brutal scarring from the Praesi system), but immediately calling her hesitance a mistake to me is a bit much.

Liliet

I do agree that Catherine not jumping in with both feet immediately is a prudent choice in context, given the complexity of the chain of command.

But I think she's overdoing it somewhat.

Liliet

And with Tancred the problem was the symbolism of what she did. Object level, yes, she dropped her guard in enemy territory. Meta level, she flinched away from extending her protection to him.

Sinead

That's fair. I had read the arc at the time as "I am a war priest not a mage, you are better off learning from those other than myself" even though there was that monologue of if she stepped into a mentor role. At the time I read it as "I cannot handle your education fairly as well as everything else" as a well reasoned response and missed the symbolic nature of the decision.

Heck this is a good arc to address the fact that Cat's experience makes any succession role == death and murder (Squire -> Black Knight, climbing the Tower, etc.)

Liliet

Yup.

She has Apprentice/Warlock as a counterexample, but considering Wekesa is now dead, it's not a very good one.

Shveiran

You know, I just love how... brazen EE has made Contrition.

"LOL, there is a new Named with your old Name in town, he could destroy your legacy simply by being who he is, you can't mentor him or risk dying, he is one of yours so killing him is a danger in itself, the White Knight can't mentor him in the middle of a war with fucking Keter or he risks the narrative trap himself, and Hanno is the only one you can keep this house of cards up with, AND ON DAY FUCKING ONE WE ARE GOING TO SEND THE BOY VISIONS TO REFORGE THE MAGIC SWORD OF YOUR FIRST NEMESIS. Whose inheritance also happens to be completely at odds with what you are trying to build, from his Good-vs-Evil Eyes to his Racist Toes."

I mean, there is being a little shit, and then there is...this.

Also, I'm really worried about Hakram. It has been said often that prosthetics can be hijacked by necromancers, and now he is going to become a cyborg so close to both the Dead King and Catherine.

I really, really don't want Catherine to be forced to kill him after he starts moving according to a will not of his own.

Liliet

I am thoroughly skeptical towards

1) the idea that the sword reforging is meant to kill Catherine. It feels like a prophecy trap kind of thing, where if Catherine tries to stop it it'll bite her in the back in the most ironically horrible way Fate can come up with, but if she ignores it and lets what happen happen doing the right thing instead, it'll pass her by;

2) the idea that Contrition somehow "engineered" this sequence of events as an actor that can be assigned qualities like "brazen". It fell into place because there was story room for it, Choirs don't have agency in that sense and don't have THAT much influence on new Names forming;

3) the idea that he somehow endangers Hanno in any way other than literal (same as any other kid hero). Very, VERY different story tracks.

Liliet

And it was only Hakram's necromantic prosthetic that could be hijacked by necromancy, because it was necromantic. I'm pretty sure his current fitting is not necromantic in nature.

Shveiran

Isn't it?

I think that's just the branch of magic needed to link artificial limbs to living bodies.

After all, if making the limb in stone would bypass the issue, why would warlock ever have made a prosthesis vulnerable to enemy spellcasters for a Named? Especially one that would be a high priority target for the Truebloods – you know, the guys with a lot of arcane spellcasters on the payroll?

Liliet

I don't think stone would have worked. Hakram is getting a steampunk style prosthetic, it requires high tech of the kind the Arsenal can generate, but Warlock on his own... honestly probably saw no reason to bother to, for some random guy following a kid he disliked in the first place.

Shveiran

I'll believe EE left a Chekov's gun unfired when the series is over XD

Liliet

Chekhov's Gun only applies to a loaded one.

Shveiran

Yes, and? There were multiple mentions of the necromancers-can-control-artificial-limbs, most notably in Book II. If it never comes up, they are probably better edited out.

Liliet

Quote?

Sinead

Right when he got the hand it was mentioned, but I was always under the impression that coming into his Name nullified the issue as he is Hakram Deadhand. Cannot find the passage where I got that impression though.

Book 2 Chapt 11

"...The naked bones were just as dextrous as when they'd been hidden under my adjutant's flesh and muscle, though they were now animated by necromancy instead of more natural means. He got no sensation from the skeleton hand, he'd told me, though he could roughly gauge how much pressure he was putting on something when holding it. I could feel the threads of magic that kept it moving according to his will, feel how they dug into his body and used his soul as fuel to maintain the enchantment. I was fairly sure I could tie my own threads to puppet the bones if I tried, which meant any decent necromancer could likely do the same...”

Liliet

Yup, I also remember it being mentioned ONCE. I also remember the same being mentioned for undead! Cat at Liesse 1 which was super adorable bc she was like “Masego holds my strings BUT WHAT MAKES ME WORRIED IS ANOTHER NECROMANCER COULD TAKE THEM OVER”. Best cousins.

Anyway, the third time something similar was brought up – and the time it actually fired – was Cat’s anti-fae soul scaffolding post-Dormer. Masego had warned her that they’re a vulnerability, but Cat forgot about that entirely in her plan against Diabolist and got controlled.

That gun has already fired! And I don’t remember any more mentions of prosthetics specifically being a vulnerability to make there be another one.

Shveiran

It was also mentioned after the battle of Marchford, where Black and Catherine discussed the issue of her leg.

He said that, technically, she could regain full functionality by cutting off the leg and replacing it with a magical prosthetics, but that such an action would carry this risk.

Mental Mouse

High magic, please. I’m pretty sure robotics would have the Gnomes saying “never mind letters, just nuke them from orbit”.

Liliet

Magitec, emphasis on “magic”, the “tec” part mostly referring to the fact the joints can move and hold shape and the like because that’s how the mechanical parts are shaped.

The magic isn’t necromancy, anyway.

Frivolous

I expect that the choirs have zero understanding of tact or timing. That's for favored humans like Tariq or Hanno to explain to them, and perhaps why favored humans exist, so that the choirs don't bungle.

Perhaps Tariq does for the Ophanim what Catherine does for Sve Noc. Maybe he acts as a limit for angelic ambitions and tells them when a plan is foolhardy.

Clearly it's foolhardy here. The Hashmallim bungled their approach to Arthur.

I actually feel pity for the Hashmallim now. Catherine and Masego and Akua are much much more skilled and powerful than they once were.

If Akua could scheme to capture an angel when she was still Heiress, she and Masego and Catherine can do something absolutely nightmarish to Contrition when they work together. And Masego will happily write a report on it while listening to the sounds of angels screaming in agony.

Darkening

While yes, they probably have the capacity to pull something like that off, I imagine it would be highly alienating to Tariq and a number of other heroes and the other rulers would likely view a captive angel as unhappily as Cat and Levant are viewing Cordelia's Angel Nuke, so it's unlikely they'll go that far.

Frivolous

First, you might not have to capture an angel to teach it a very painful lesson.

Masego was present when Anaxares crashed the Seraphim party. He probably took notes.

Second, would the heroes who are not already tied to Contrition care? Hanno didn't seem to mind when Catherine cursed at Endurance.

It's not like villains care if a demon or a devil gets ganked. I'm not sure heroes have much friendliness towards angels apart from their rare confidants like Hanno and Tariq, and then only towards their patron choir.

Third, the Liesse Accords only ever mentioned making illegal the bringing angels to Creation. No one ever talked about forbidding the punishing of angels, probably because it was inconceivable.

Dominic Corbin

Float the possibility to Masego and he will want to do it JUST so he can write the report

ninegardens

So, aside from everything else, can I just say:

This is the kind of chapter I read for.

I get that the war is a thing. That the battle chapters matter, and that chapters like this only WORK between battle chapters.... but the beats of Tired Cat, Tariq conversation, Hakram debriefing, and Arthur (with the dread return of Penitent blade!) is just like, absolute gold.

I did NOT expect that blade to return. And Tariq is a treasure. I love that he was such an antagonist before, and such an ally now, and that didn't happen via changes to his character. Don't get me wrong. Tariq grows and evolve (slightly), but I love that him playing different roles in the story is the result of consistent characterization and changing context, and that's cool.

Liliet

YES YES YES YES

Sugar Roll

I like this new Squire but I won't get attached until he gets his own POV chapter. For all we know, he might die in the next few chapters. I'm not falling for that again.

Burnsy

I've only had this gay heroic squire for one chapter, but already I love him.

Genuinely, as a queer reader, I really appreciate how often and casually LGBT+ characters just... show up in this story. It's really refreshing, and honestly ruined a lot of other fantasy for me because... why am I reading this, there's not even any gay people in it.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, same for me 😊 I am always disappointed when there's no gay character in a story, EE spoiled us 😊

I really hope he will not be killed in the next chapter, and that he will survive till the end of the book 😊

Gerionar

Actually I have a hard time finding "normal", heterosexual couples with traditional gender roles among the cast. Most of the named characters are either single or their partners are never mentioned. This goes double if they are also Named, with good reasons. They have the occasional fling or friends with benefits, but they tend to be rather careful as seen with Cat or Hakram. The other extreme is the asexual love between Indrani and Masego. I think Captain is the only Named we know of who was in a heterosexual marriage, although with reversed roles.

The side characters often also don't fit the mold. Masego's parents were gay. Akua's parents had reversed roles with her mother being the boss. The other Calamities either had no love life we know of, or, in Malicia's case, were hinted at to have homosexual preferences.

Uncle Klaus's is one of the few examples of a "normal" marriage, although that failed for different reasons. I think Vivian's parents might fit, as do the parents of the Fisher King. But by now we are pretty far away from the main cast. Yet we still assume (and are let to believe) that heterosexual couples and traditional gender roles are the norm in the Guideverse,... at least among the human population. Orcs, goblins, dwarves,... and especially drow are a completely different matter.

ninegardens

Black and Ranger?

They aren't together all the time, but when they are, by the sounds of it they are a classic (dysfunctional) relationship. Doesn't meant Black is "Hetrosexual Classic (TM)", but still feels like its kinda in the region you're describing.

Liliet

The power dynamics are still reversed. Female mentor is an asshole towards a kind of submissive younger guy is not a classic heterosexual relationship by any means.

Shveiran

On the other hand, we get so much representation in other media that it feels kind of silly to complain, you know what I mean?

Besides, there are heterosexual characters: the Rogue Sorcerer, the Kingfisher Prince, the Pilgrim, the Saint of Swords, the Mirror Knight...

...Uh, that's a lot of heroes.

Crash

You're certainly assuming, but we have not been "led to believe heterosexuality to be the norm".

There is no reaction of any kind to people's sexual preferences, regardless of what they may be. You expect heterosexuality, because that's the world we live in where that is the "norm".

We have no reason to believe this applies to Guideverse.

Compy

Its not going to happen but I'd love for buddy boy Squire to become the Grey Knight as he's permanently caught between trying to do the Righteous White Knight thing and the Actually Achieving Meaningful Goals Black Knight thing. Basically Cat 2.0 I guess.

Darkening

Sadly we've got Word of God that grey knight won't be a thing because there isn't an extant cultural idea of it out there in the setting.

Konstantin von Karstein

There is not yet

Darkening

Well, we'll see what the Liesse Accords do for society.

Shaerick 68

Man, they must be putting something in the water in Calernia.

superkeaton

Poor lad. This is going to be tricky for everyone involved.

Sinead

I wonder if Arthur could be a leader that helps Callow thread the needle between the knighted nobility of Old Kingdom to the modern system. A thing to keep in mind with this (in my opinion) is that the classic tropes "Knight in Shining Armour" is true in Callow in a way that it never was in history, meaning that there can be seen an actual merit to the system. However, the knight system as it currently stands is at odds with the military doctrine of the Army of Callow. I wonder if it is possible to combine those systems in any way to make something synthesis of the virtues of both systems as far as training goes, if not the path of nobility. Instead Knighthood would be a military equivalent of additional training within the Callowan War College (in my head this comes across as the equivalent of graduate studies which amuses me as much as it saddens me because war is terrible).

I guess what it comes down to is that I hope that this doesn't end with Vivienne being deposed or fighting a civil war against nobility and instead you have the resurgence of the Callowan knighthood adapt and embrace some of the changes that has come from the 25 years after the Conquest.

Basically, I think it would be neat if between Cat, Vivienne, and Arthur, you have the resolution of the issue of Vivienne not having a massive military support that really consolidates the Callowan succession in a way that isn't just "political marriage" (as those are only symbolic and are relatively weak ties compared to actual cultural changes).

Another thought that has struck me from the quote of "I am not a heretic" is the fact that there are a few Crow banners within the Callowan legions, and I wonder if the Crows will gain any prominence in Callow as war deities from having the First Under Night as a war leader through the Uncivil Wars* and the (hopefully) Last Crusade.

*Even if Cat wasn't First Under Night for the start of these wars, her legend prior to becoming First Under Night made it possible for the Crows to gain prominence in a way that they wouldn't have in different circumstances

Liliet

I mean, right now the knight military doctrine and the Legions military doctrine are working to complement one another in a way that neither could achieve in its own. The Legions very much don't have their own heavy cavalry, and knights fill that gap.

Sinead

True, and it could be that just taking a "cavalry forces" approach works well enough. My reasoning for an advance track of the War College is because there is status with knighthood that should be refined through basically putting Knights through officer school to justify in Legion eyes the difference in status within society. Then again, could the structure of the Knight hierarchy be structured as comparable to Legion structure, nullifying some of the conflicts of two different systems? The knightly orders become the same as a Legion standard, and the differences between the two systems are just the logistics of infantry vs. cavalry.

Granted, in this case, one would be assigned equipment, not bringing their own, which would break a lot of the influence nobles have over the system.

I guess what it comes down to in my head is that while I suspect Arthur will in time be a savvy leader and can be trained to stand his own against the influence, his rise to power being military after a generation of war would deepen the damage that Cat's own freeing of Callow has done to the nation. I honestly feel that Vivienne is the better choice, especially when she has plans to take advantage in the breaks in the political status quo to put in trade deals that could end military conflicts East of the Whitecaps.

Liliet

I don't think Arthur's going to take over the throne unless Catherine and Vivienne fuck up REALLY majorly somehow. What Catherine needs to groom him for is a role as Vivienne's SECOND.

He needs to learn from both of them and from the government and military structure they've made, so when he gets to really accomplishing his dream he does so intelligently and with mind to context.

Sinead

Hmmmm, I've been writing poorly.

I don't really see "Arthur overthrows Vivienne" as a thing that PGtE would do, because I think that really undermines the value of the series. I was more meaning in the sense of a trajectory of such a story taking shape from the pressures of the Nobles.

What would be interesting if he does become Vivienne's successor is that do we not just establish a trend to be the Good aligned version of the Tower, with the idea of the throne of Callow being a meritocracy, not a noble bloodline.

Cat's spiritual claim to Callow throne (in the eyes of story) is in part derived from Amadeus' rule and general use of a meritocracy where he could (as Callow existed under some form of Legion rule). Yes she has other claims from her own successes (as acknowledged into the best by her interactions with Edward VII), but the basis of her 'bastard claim' to the throne starts as being the heir to Amadeus work in Callow, and rising to be his chosen successor.

If we follow Cat with Vivienne, and potentially Arthur (if he becomes her successor), along with the general culture of meritocracy that will have been placed within Callow over generations, do you start having the role of the Crown as essentially a constitutional monarch? The Accords grows out of a means to restrict Named, and as the birthplace of the concept of the Accords, along with Cat's own wishes of Non-Named rulers, the Crown of Callow may be more limited than any of the Named crowns of the Age of Wonders.

Besides, Callow is basically Great Britain anyways, with the Deoraithe being all the Pictish/Celtic occupants before the various invasions.

Completely random thought I just noticed: the Deoraithe are the mythical Invasion of Ireland in reverse: the Sidhe came in and drove Men out instead of the other way around.

Liliet

Nice.

Frivolous

Heroes without the correct Role don't make good rulers. Look at how hard a time Hanno has had with acting as the hero representative for the Truce and Terms. Too many moral and ethical compromises can weaken the connection to Above.

Arthur might be young enough, and the Name of Squire malleable enough, especially if he gets the aspect of Learn, to adapt to the needs of government work, but it's an iffy thing.

Liliet

You're putting the cart before the horse.

People without the correct education and mindset do not make good rulers. People who have not had a history that would give them skills and knowledge necessary for a ruler, do not make good rulers.

The Role follows from that, not the other way around.

If Arthur is taught, he'll learn. What is Name and Role are right now is thoroughly irrelevant except as a hint of how he'll act about being taught, and what use he'll put the learning to.

(One can make a guess about the differences in attitude between a heroic Squire, a Bloody Berserker and a Warlock, for example)

Out of these, heroic Squire is actually an excellent choice for a future ruler, and apparently one with a lot of precedent: not only is it immediately where Cat's mind went upon hearing the Name, there was also Akua's reaction back during First Liesse: she connected the Sword in the Stone with Cat's Name specifically.

(Because the Role is about learning from your elders and social responsibility, it makes good material for teaching a kid to rule)

Frivolous

My point was that a Good King or a Good Queen might make a good ruler, because their Name and Role allow for the compromises a ruler has to make.

A White Knight, on the other hand, does not, because a Knight isn't supposed to rule. Trying to rule could cause what Hanno is now suffering, indecision and the fraying of their Name.

Also, cart does come before horse sometimes. Anaxares had negative interest in ruling before he became Hierarch.

Liliet

What does a White Knight have to do with this? Squire can transition into a ruler Name if that's where their Role takes them.

Also, Eleanor Fairfax had been a Rebel Knight before becoming queen. Is there a categorical difference between White and Rebel here?

Liliet

P.S. And what a splendid ruler Anaxares of Bellerophon was! It's almost like one's Name does not have a direct causal impact on ruling competence!

Liliet

P.S. Thief

Daniel E

Hmm. We now have the Squire, Apprentice, and a mysterious Ranger-type (Silver Huntress) assembled for the Gods Above. However, I am completely at a loss for Above's equivalent of a novice Adjutant.

Mental Mouse

They would show up in response to serving Arthur... I note that the house of light in Callow had no qualms in pitching conversion to Hakram, so another orc might well have taken up their offer despite the general awkwardness.

Aotrs Commander

Incidentally, if anyone were to have thought that 20% sounds kind of low for casualties (especially if you play lots of wargames or something...!), I'll just note that a 50% casualty rate was so rare in history as to be marked as a catastrophic defeat, like Battle of Cannae or 1st-day-Somme bad. 20%, then, is Pretty Bad.

Though as, Cat says, having so few non-fatal casualties (which normally outnumber the fatal ones) is a stunning achievement for the Legions of Terror.

Crash

The Hashmalim are tempting him with a broken sword under the waters, he is and orphan and his name is Arthur? Really?

Fucking hells.

Mental Mouse

Pulling together some of my comments at the top level:

1) Arthur? Yeah, that's a little on-the-nose there.

2) The Name-dreams are not necessarily coming from Contrition as such – for Cat and Black, they acted more like an automatic function of Plot Mechanics. Pulling a sword out of lakes might just be the closest story-match available, so that's what the dreams focus on.

However, as it happens, there is another sword available for Arthur, namely King Edward's! Indeed, that's currently a lot closer than the Penitent's Blade, and won't require reassembly. Arthur happens to be in Twilight already, but even if he doesn't pick it up this trip, he's with an army that's likely to come back here again.

3) Aside from the chance of Hanno transitioning to another Name (given he's already in crisis), that business about "Squires always become the White Knight or Black Knight" was received wisdom from the past – and Cat has already been carving new grooves, indeed nearly developing a science of doing so (not to mention picking up massive story-fu powers).

Gray Knight might not be happening, but if Cat exerts herself and/or young Arthur learns some story-fu of his own, I could easily believe Shining Knight.

Mental Mouse

Addendum: It occurs to me that Arthur probably won't even be able to find King Edward's grove until he's earned an audience, and even then he might still have to earn the right to actually take the sword.

nimelennar

Since no one has brought this up yet, we have another term relevant to chess in the title of the chapter.

A "solved game" is one where, assuming both players play perfectly, you know the outcome before the game starts. For instance, Tic-Tac-Toe is a solved game, because if both players play perfectly, it will always end in a draw.

Chess, from the starting position, is not a solved game. There is a debate about whether it ever will be; although the "position repeated three times" rule and the "50 moves without capturing a pawn" rules for declaring a draw ensure that there are a finite number of possible games of chess, it is a ridiculously high finite number.

However, when you get down from the original 32 pieces to no more than 7, all possible endgames have been solved. You can look at a board with seven pieces on it, and know who will win (or if the game will end in a draw), if both sides play perfectly. Or, at least, you can look that board up in an endgame database and find out.

As for why this is relevant to the story... Cat just lost a lot of people, and the Dead King is being forced to make a move. Enough pieces have been removed that the end is conceivably knowable at this point, if someone could see the entire board.

Onos

Queen Mary's Home for Errant Boys, huh? That is fucking marvelous. Colloquially known as Staggering Shelter perhaps?

Chapter 71: Eschatology

"An enemy may suffer a hundred defeats yet avoid being defeated; seek not victories, only victory."

– Extract from the 'Ars Tactica', famed military treatise of Dread Emperor Terribilis the First

I'd barely set foot back in Creation and already I was itching to return to the Ways.

The Second's outriders had run into a patrol of Prince Klaus', bringing back the uplifting news that the Iron Prince had crushed the dead in a decisive engagement. Soldiers had named it the Battle of the Pools, as it'd been fought near a dry bog where the mud had hardened and stagnant water remained trapped in pools. Way I heard it told, Old Klaus had baited the dead into open grounds with bold skirmishing by Dominion slingers and then forced a clash of shield walls while his cavalry went to hit the flanks. It'd been a close-run thing even so, before the reinforcements I'd sent under Princess Beatrice were found by the White Knight and led into a charge that hit the enemy in the back and completed the encirclement. That'd secured a full wipe of enemy forces, which had numbered more than thirty thousand. It was the kind of clean successes that came rarely in this war.

It'd brought some cheer back to the Second Army, as had the prospect of soon being reunited with the rest of the coalition forces. Klaus Papenheim's reputation as one of the finest military commanders of our age had been proved as well-deserved once more, considering he'd led his beleaguered army in securing two major victories against numerically superior enemy armies – and the first time the dead had even been entrenched! I'd expected that it was a triumphant war camp we'd link up with, perhaps even with ale rations having been let loose in celebration of the victory. Instead, as the Second Army began to cross back into Creation, the word that trickled back to me was that of a somber, tense camp. The fantassin companies with the Iron Prince were, I was told, on the verge of mutiny. They were refusing to march until officers that had been arrested were returned to them.

There'd been trouble, it seemed, within the other column. I got the lay of the land before crossing, wary of putting forward my foot without a good idea of what it was I was headed into. Apparently the Battle of Juvelun, where Prince Klaus had pushed the undead out of the eponymous village where they'd dug in, had been a rough affair for the fantassins and gotten Prince Etienne of Brabant killed. The dead had retreated from the defeat with some semblance of order and began to muster further into the valley for a counter-attack, which had forced the Iron Prince to strike at them before they could mass enough to prove a threat. Except part of his army had balked at the order. The mercenaries felt they'd been ill-used and might be once more, while the Brabantine conscripts weren't eager to march out tired into another bruising engagement when they'd lost their prince in the last one.

There had been stirrings of unrest, so the Iron Prince had arrested or slain the potential mutineer officers and promptly forced a march against the enemy before the situation could further worsen. It'd worked, at least to the extent that this kind of measure could work. They'd fought, for lack of allies or other options, but the moment the dust had settled the mutineer sentiment returned – only twice as hardened, as they'd been browbeaten last time and were wary of a repeat. The conscripts had been settled somewhat, temporary Lycaonese officers having been forced on them while their formations got mixed – to prevent cliques sticking together – and separated in different parts of the camp. It'd not entirely worked, though, as some clever soul had found a loophole in Proceran desertion laws. It was, technically, no such thing if you signed on with a fantassin company sworn to the same fight. There'd been an influx of fresh 'recruits' after word was spread, which had only raised tensions.

Still, while I saw the sense in some of the grievances voices my sympathy was significantly dampened by the fact that the fantassins had effectively slowed Prince Klaus' march west to a crawl for several days before refusing to march entirely. What little time we'd managed to gain on the enemy through bloody losses and use of the Twilight Ways had been effectively lost. Even if we began the march on Hainaut city this very evening, we wouldn't arrive there more than a few days before the dead. I'd been hoping for a significantly larger margin so that we might repair the defences of the capital as much as possible before Keter besieged us there. Even now, every heartbeat wasted limping through the muddy camp grated at my sensibilities. Each beat saw the dead grow closer, saw our lead narrow and our hopes of victory dim.

The chatter died when I hobbled into the pavilion. I leaned on my staff, step after step, and felt the eyes of all assembled fall on me. I saw the Iron Prince first, at the end of the long table: the white-haired general had risen to his feet and he offered a short bow, to which I returned a nod. The Heavens had their men as well, a tired-looking Hanno of Arwad on his feet besides Tariq. Their greetings were silent and I returned them just as quietly. The last man at the table seemed like he'd aged a decade since I'd last seen him, as if some capricious god had kicked the vigour out of his bones, but the dark hair and elaborate moustache of Prince Arsene of Bayeux could not be mistaken. He did not seem pleased to be here, I decided, as was only fitting.

Old Klaus had raised him to his war council with the understanding that the Alamans would be able to handle his own people, even the fantassins, and in that duty he had failed most utterly. Little of this reflected well on him, in either our eyes or those of the officers he'd stood for. The Prince of Bayeux had been able to keep his soldiers and reputation off the chopping block in this war, until now, but it seemed that at last the blade had pricked the skin. He wasn't going to get out of this without losing a few feathers, I thought, though it was not my place to go pulling at them.

My eyes then swept to the rest of the men and women in the pavilion, of which there had to be at least forty. None of them were seated, though neither were they shackled as I'd half-expected them to be. There were a few Lycaonese guards around, but not many – I supposed there would have been no point, with the likes of Tariq and the White Knight in the pavilion. The arrested officers did not look like they'd been mistreated, the only bruises I found being faded, and though they were visibly filthy I saw no trace of sickness among them.

"Your Majesty," the Prince of Hannover greeted me. "Your return is a pleasant turn."

"So was the news of the victory at the Pools, Your Grace," I replied.

Only two of my guards followed me in, looming silently behind. I turned a steady eye to the assembled prisoners, noting several bowed.

"Yet this was not," I mildly added, "how I expected my time to be spent after our hosts joined again. The request I received was rather mild on details, in truth. If one of you would elaborate?"

"Your Majesty," the Prince of Bayeux spoke up, calling my attention with a bow of his own. "If I may?"

"Do."

"At the behest of these officers in the service of the Grand Alliance, I carry a plea for your judgement," the prince said.

He had a nice speaking voice, I thought. Practiced, but the smoked honey in there was a natural gift. Didn't make me like what I was hearing from in the slightest. I cocked an eyebrow.

"It was my understanding that the Prince of Hannover, who held command, already passed judgement on them," I said.

"This is true," Prince Arsene agreeably said. "However, no formal trial was held and as both the supreme commander in Hainaut and high officer of the Grand Alliance your authority supersedes his."

Meaning they didn't like what Old Klaus had decided, so they were coming to me in the hopes of a milder sentence. If not an outright amnesty.

"In principle that is correct," I noted, then glanced at Hanno. "White Knight, a question if you don't mind?"

Hanno slowly nodded.

"Did these officers refuse to obey a direct order from their lawful commander?" I plainly asked.

The White Knight looked like he'd wanted to grimace but held back.

"They did," Hanno admitted.

"Then the matter is settled," I coldly said, eyes returning to the prisoners. "Hang them all."

There was moment of utter surprise in the room, until the officers began to clamour. I picked our pleas, in Chantant and Arlesite, but also curses and insults. Some even tried to argue, yelled that there had been a mistake, but all I saw when I looked at them was three days lost. The deaths that the time pissed away would cost us. I mutilated the Second Army for you, you fucking vultures, I thought. And now you want to mutiny and wiggle your way out? I'd slit the throat of every last one of you and not lose a wink of sleep over it. The yelling continued with no sign of abating, even the guards tried to restore order, and I lost what little patience I had left.

"Shut up," I Spoke.

With a snap their mouths closed, like puppets whose strings had been pulled. I felt the gazes of both heroes in the tent move to me in surprise, which surprised me in turn. The Pilgrim, at least, should have known I could now Speak again. I had disciplined the Silver Huntress using the talent. Yet after a glance their way, I saw that it was not the Speaking itself that'd startled. His mouth had wavered. Just for a heartbeat, I figured, but for the barest of moments my words had had an effect on the Grey Pilgrim. It was me who was astonished, as I'd not tried to exert my will against him in the slightest. The rules behind Speaking were opaque even to me, but usually it only worked on people weaker than you. Even then it wasn't a guarantee, some sort of claim to authority over them tended to make it easier. And I'm not much stronger than the Grey Pilgrim, I thought, if I am at all.

What that implied...

I withdrew any strand of will lingering against the four men at the table, freeing them of struggle. The Prince of Hannover looked wary, but Prince Arsene was outright gasping. He rasped out a breath.

"Your Majesty," he got out. "This is a mistake. You did not..."

"I see no reason to change my judgement," I mildly said. "Mind you, it was never formally requested or given. If this talk of appeal was revealed to be only a tasteless jape..."

I shrugged.

"Then I would walk out of this tent and leave this in the trusted hands of Prince Klaus Papenheim," I said. "I imagine you could appeal to him for mercy, were he in the mood to grant it."

I glanced at the prince in question, raising a questioning brow. He gave a discreet nod, to my mute surprise. So he was willing to find a use for this lot that didn't involved feeding crows. Fine. They were his, and his to deal with as he wished.

"Perhaps," Prince Arsene said, "that would be best."

I watched him, saw how now that his breathing was in order he was once more mastering himself. Saw how he was looking around trying to look for an angle, for a way to still come out on top. And maybe on another day I would have said nothing. Let it go. Procer would be Procer, and not even the end of times would make saints out of princes. Instead I found my fingers drumming against my leg the first few beats of Stars From the Sky, and I ground my teeth. I could almost smell the mud and blood and ash, hear the screams as the Second Army retreated foot by foot under bloody onslaught.

"Say it," I quietly ordered.

The dark-haired prince blinked in confusion. I met his eyes, unsmiling.

"Your Majesty, I do not und-"

"Say it," I repeated, and my tone was cold as ice.

His lips thinned.

"It was," Prince Arsene of Bayeux got out, "a tasteless jape."

I let silence linger a moment so that the embarrassment could properly sink it.

"Don't ever waste my time like this again," I said.

I turned and limped out of the pavilion without speaking another word.

—

It wasn't a formal war council in the sense that we wouldn't be tactics or arrangement tonight. When it came to that, the crowd of captains and commanders involved would require a far larger tent than this. Instead it was the keystones of the various forces within the Grand Alliance army defending Hainaut that'd been assembled for the talks. For the Dominion stood Lord Razin Tanja and Lady Aquiline Osen as well as the commander the Lord of Alava had sent to lead his warriors, Captain Nabila. For the Principate three royals had come: Old Klaus for the Lycaonese, Princess Beatrice of Hainaut and Prince Arsene of Bayeux for the Alamans. For the Firstborn, both General Rumena and Ivah had shown up. Rounding up the hosts, Calm-faced General Zola stood for the Second Army while I held claim on both Callow and Below.

As the heroes had sent both the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim, I'd also called for the Barrow Sword to stand for villains – as far as I was concerned he'd proved himself as a lieutenant during his tenure as part of the Iron Prince's army, and I fully intended to keep using him in that capacity. In other circumstances such a gathering of the prominent would have led to an inevitable amount of chatter and hobnobbing, but not this evening. All of us felt the cold breath of Keter against the back of our neck and it had cut through the usual practices. Already skirmishing with undead warbands was starting, a sure sign it was time to get the Hells out of here and into the Twilight Ways before we had another battle on our hands. One we might not win, this time. I cleared my throat to call for attention, the panoply of warlords and royals granting it.

"We're all here, so let us begin," I briskly said. "No one in this room requires introduction, so we'll directly attend to the matter at hand."

Adjutant had arranged for our maps of the principality of Hainaut and its outskirts to be sent, and attendants had artfully displayed them on the great table around which all of us were arranged. Much of where the enemy was shown by markers to have armies was now guesswork, considering three battles had been fought in quick succession over the last week – General Abigail's assault on the Cigelin Sisters, the Second Army's holding action at the Battle of Maillac's Boot and the Iron Prince's fresh victory at the Battle of the Pools. We still didn't know if Abigail had taken the Sisters, but given her forces and the reinforcements involved she ought to have succeeded. Casualties involved on either side were unknown, while the Second hadn't exactly had the time to count corpses as it retreated into the Ways at the end of the battle.

By now the great valley of central Hainaut, a great bowl in which the capital of the principality stood near the centre, would be a tumultuous mess of warbands and marching columns and smashed undead armies. Out east the great undead army of at least two hundred thousand that'd pursued the Iron Prince since his ill-fated march on Malmedit was gaining on us, likely past the village of Juvelun by now. Our reunited army needed to get moving and fast, if it wasn't going to get stuck between the great force coming from the west, which the Second had bled to delay, and the even greater army pouring down the heights of Juvelun. The only question that remained to be answered was where our coalition army should march to. I believed the right answer to that was the city of Hainaut, the capital itself.

Yet while in principle I had the authority to simply give the order to march and expect to be obeyed, in practice trying to cram my plan down the throat of the people in this tent was only possible if they were inclined to swallow. That meant convincing them, or at least settling their most pressing objections.

"As all of you can see, the valley of Hainaut is swarming with undead," I bluntly said. "Soon there will be a strict minimum of about four hundred thousand corpses running around the region. Remaining where we are now encamped is a recipe for disaster, as it would ensure we would be harassed and ultimately encircled by a massively superior enemy force."

None argued the fact, as it was plainly on the maps and markers to any eye practiced in the trade of war. I swept the council with my gaze.

"More concerning is the fact that we are now running low on supplies," I said. "The column under Prince Klaus was entirely cut off from its supply lines for over a week, so it burned through its entire reserves. The forces I brought north will be sharing our own supplies, naturally, but that's not a solution – it's throwing a cup of water at a bonfire."

And that was after we'd even cheated a little when it came to supplies. Unlike us General Abigail was still going to have access to the supply line coming up from our defensive lines to the south, so I'd stripped the larders of the Third Army and its fantassin helpers dangerously bare before marching north through the Ways. It'd felt like kicking her in the ribs at the time, but I was now rather pleased I'd decided to play it safe.

"The adjunct secretariat, after collating the numbers given by all of you, believes we have around six days before rationing becomes necessary," I said. "After that, we have perhaps a week at half-rations before our larders are empty."

"And if we begin rationing from the start?" Prince Klaus asked.

"Three weeks, maybe a little more," I replied.

Half-rations, though, meant that our people wouldn't be at their sharpest. Given that our main advantage against the dead lay in the qualitative superiority of our rank and file against theirs, that was a bold gamble to make.

"We must act, and act now," I told them. "That much can't be argued with. What must be done, however, deserves a degree of argument. The floor is open to any who wish to speak."

There was a beat of hesitation, as if no one was quite certain they wanted to be the first to put a foot forward.

"You will have a plan, Losara Queen," Ivah said. "As is ever your way."

"I do," I agreed. "But this council is meant to be a fair hearing for any of you with an answer to give."

Captain Nabila, who I could not help but notice was only a few inches taller than me – if significantly broader and more stockily built – cleared her throat.

"I was told that Abigail the Fox took the Cigelin Sisters, along with the forces we had held back until now," she tried.

"We can't be sure she did, but the odds are good," Prince Klaus told her.

"Then we should thrust westwards, towards Cigelin," Captain Nabila said, tone firming. "The dead are in disarray, and we have great numbers. We can smash lesser warbands on our path, and when we arrive at the Sisters supplies can flow in from the south again."

The Princess of Hainaut stirred.

"They'll tarpit us if we try that march, Captain," Princess Beatrice said.

"I do not understand your meaning," the painted Levantine frowned.

"They will fight like barrowmen," Aquiline Osenia clarified. "Throw corpses at us to slow us down until they gather a great enough force to slay us in one stroke."

The captain hummed in understanding, nodding decisively.

"If we stay in the countryside we'll be going through bogs and swamps," Princess Beatrice added. "We'll be moving slow regardless. And if we cut to Julianne's Highway as quickly as possible, our line of attack becomes glaringly obvious."

And predictable tended to get costly, when you fought Keter.

"It seems wise to cede the grounds," Razin agreed, eyes narrowing. "We cannot take or hold them. Yet the westward march itself is a sound idea, I would argue. If we retreat to the Cigelin Sisters through the Ways, we can muster with the forces of General Abigail and prepare for a decisive engagement there.”

“Keter will not grant it,” General Rumena said. “It will withhold the blow and leave hunger to disperse us without a single blade being raised.”

Razin, I thought with a degree of approval, had good instincts. If smaller armies had been involved, his answer would have been a good one. The problem was that, as the Tomb-Maker had pointed out, we wouldn’t actually be able to feed that army if it was gathered together. It was one of the reasons we’d split our offensive into two columns in the first place – the force I’d originally advanced with, some seventy thousand soldiers, had been stretching the limit of what our logistical train was physically able to provide for. All armies involved had taken losses, sure, but at the end of the day we’d still be asking of that same apparatus that’d struggled with my column alone to now also handle the second column and our reserve on top of it. No, Razin had good instincts but it showed that the Levantine wars he’d been raised to fight just didn’t involve the same scale of armies being dealt with.

“Turning back towards Juvelun would be suicide,” Prince Arsene said. “No doubt our pursuers from Malmedit have already restored the fortifications there. We would have to take those grounds from a larger army once more, only this time while being struck at from behind as well.”

“Juvelun is lost ground,” Prince Klaus agreed. “And it no longer has strategic value even if we did take it – we forced that gate to be able to march into the valley, but it’s too late to try and keep it closed for the army that pursues us.”

“We could still attempt a strike at Malmedit,” General Zola said.

That got the attention of most everyone here, including myself.

“If the burden of numbers is too much for our supply train, we must split our forces again,” the dark-skinned general said. “A large detachment can be sent to strike in surprise at Malmedit and collapse the tunnels, as was originally meant, while we consolidate the rest of our forces at the Sisters. If this draws the dead to us at the Sisters, as seems likely, that same detachment can then march in haste to Juvelun and seal the valley around the dead.”

There were some murmurs of approval, and I cocked my head to the side. It was the answer of a classic War College general, I thought. Strategic goals had been set and were to be met, using our relative advantages – mobility by the Twilight Ways, in this case – over the enemy, and concentrating strength at where we were weakest to negate the enemy’s advantages. It was the kind of war that Black and Grem One-Eye liked to fight, measured and clever and very well-organized. Her answer, however, was also wrong. General Zola Osei understood war through the eyes of a professional, so it was only natural that it was the complete opposite that would find the fault in her answer.

"That's a dead end," Aquiline Osená said.

Surprised eyes turned to her, several disapproving. The Dominion had impressed with the bravery of its warriors, during the war, but not the acumen of its generals.

"She's right," I agreed.

Aquiline offered me a smile that might have passed for grateful, if you squinted a little. I winked back.

"It's a clever trick, but it doesn't win us anything," the Lady of Tartessos said. "The tunnels at Malmedit are useless now, there's no army left to go through them – we know where all of them are. Even if it works and we close the valley by holding Juvelun, what does it get us? The dead are already where they want to be."

"It's an approach that tries to mitigate the damage, not achieve victory," I agreed.

If we were trying to mitigate though, it was a solid plan. It would secure us a very advantageous position for an offensive next year and ease the burden of our defense by giving us chokepoints to defend instead of a long line in the lowlands. The issue was that the payoff would come next campaigning season. See, Black and Grem they'd taught a generation of officers to fight their way – as I'd thought earlier, measured and clever and very well-organized. Except that we couldn't afford to fight this clean, this careful. If that bridge up north got built, we'd be losing Hainaut. We needed to win the campaign now, before winter came, and that meant we'd have to take risks. The same kind of risks that my father abhorred, that would have gotten him killed if he'd tried them against a hero at my age.

But I wasn't him, and the war I was fighting wasn't the same either.

The Iron Prince sighed, looking at the maps.

"Agreed," he finally said. "If we don't win this campaign now, we might not have the warm bodies to do more than hold come next summer."

Grim, but he wasn't wrong.

"Can victory still be achieved?" Princess Beatrice calmly asked.

If anyone else here had spoke those words, I thought, half the people in the tent would have marked them a coward. None dared, though, when the woman speaking them was the princess of this very land we stood on. Few of us here had more burning hatred for the dead, or lost more at their hands. Idly I wondered if she was asking the question because she had genuine doubts, or simply because she'd recognized that if she didn't ask it no one else would dare to.

"Yes," I calmly replied.

"Then where is that that you would have us march exactly, Black Queen?" Prince Arsene impatiently asked.

"Hainaut," the White Knight quietly said. "The capital, that is."

Hanno had remained silent for so long I figured half the people in here had forgot he was even there. As for Tariq, as far as I could tell he'd spent more time using that nosy little aspect of his to have a look at the insides of the people than actually listening. I smiled mirthlessly at the hero, knowing that it wasn't military learning that'd led him to the conclusion. After all, it was not only strategy that'd led me to decide the capital was our shot at winning this.

"The capital is where I would have us march," I agreed. "As soon as possible – tomorrow at least, tonight if at all possible."

"Would the issue of supplies not remain?" Razin Tanja asked. "The grounds between the Cigelin Sisters and the capital are still in the hands of the dead, and I had thought it impossible to arrange a supply line through the Twilight Ways."

"It is," General Zola frowned. "Your Majesty, I have seen the same numbers as you. We simply do not have enough mages and priests for this – past a certain distance and a certain amount of soldiers, the amount of wagons we are able to send at the speed we can send them mean keeping the force supplied is not possible."

"That is true," I said, "so long as you need individuals capable of making gates to actually take the journey."

Meaning, if we had to send a priest or mage with every wagon – more realistically, a few priests and mages with every caravan of wagons – then there came a point where, if we kept sending wagons, all the available priests and mages would be in the Twilight Ways. Either headed to the place getting supplied, or heading back to the place where the supplies were being sent for. If the army was small and where it was camped close to where the supplies came from, that wasn't an issue. The journey was quick, and you could either avoid having a stretch of time where there were no more supplies coming in or make it so short it hardly made a difference. The trouble came when the army was large, as ours was, and the distance between the origin of the supplies and their destination was large. This was, unfortunately, also the case.

You got rid of that problem, though, if the gate-opened didn't actually need to make the journey. If the wagons could simply get there on their own.

"But that is needed, my queen," General Zola said.

"Unless we open a permanent gate within the capital," I said.

The room went still. It would be a risk, I'd not deny it, because if we lost the capital afterwards then the Dead King would have a gate into the Twilight Ways to study. On the other hand, the capital of Hainaut was probably the single most fortified city in the principality and once my sappers got to work it'd become even more defensible. We'd also be able to feed a significantly larger force in the city than our physical supply train would allow for. All we needed for the journey was for someone to open a gate near wagons somewhere in Procer and thread into it the destination of the 'Hainaut gate', and those supplies would get to the capital eventually. We wouldn't hold the road to the capital but it wouldn't matter, because so long as you had a mage around everywhere was a road to Hainaut.

"Those are difficult to make, I was told," Prince Klaus said. "Could we even make one quickly enough?"

"Us, I'm not sure," I admitted. "But you might remember we have fresh allies, since our summit at the Arsenal."

"The Gigantes," Princess Beatrice breathed out. "Is that why you sent them with my forces when we relieved the Iron Prince?"

In part, though I'd also been worried about exposing them to the dangers the Second Army had been about to face – or leaving them with General Abigail, where there would be no Named to pull them out of the fire if Revenants attacked in surprise.

"The Dead King might not assault the walls even if we seize the capital," Prince Arsene said. "A long siege to grind us down would suffice."

"A siege with its back to the army at the Cigelin Sisters," Klaus Papenheim replied. "And all the while we could sally out at will through the Ways, with strong walls to return to after. We can only hope they will try what you suggest."

"They will not," the Grey Pilgrim said, breaking his silence at last. "Mark my words, and that of the Choir I am sworn to: once the gate is opened in the capital, the enemy will know no rest until that city is razed to the ground."

No one, I noted with grim amusement, saw fit to argue with that. There was some more talking, afterwards, but I had them and most of the people in the tent knew it. By the hour's turn I had the agreement of everyone there. So on we went to Hainaut, to the last flip of the coin that would decide whether this summer was the dawn of the Grand Alliance's victory or defeat.

That in the city doom awaited none would deny, but like everyone else I rather wished I could know ahead whose doom it was going to be.

Javvies

That's an ugly status report. And that's going to be a long and brutal battle at the capital. On the upshot, being besieged and under assault by overwhelming armies of the dead is prime Story material, especially for the Heroes.

Yeah ... asking Cat to override Klaus's judgement was a terrible idea, and they should have known it was a terrible idea before they tried. And Hanno knew what her answer was going to be, which is why he really didn't want Cat asking him what happened, because he'd have to tell the truth.

Huh. Cat is wicked strong at Speaking if she can affect Tariq (and presumably Hanno) when she's not even aiming at him.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's more alarming than that. The idea that a villain at their height having Speaking like that, that's an old thing. Plenty of peak villains have historically gotten those sorts of power levels, it's actually a sign they will fall soon.

Plenty of peak villains.

Cat hasn't even got her new name fully formed yet and she's this strong.

ruduen

I don't think the implication of strength is what would draw their attention. Rather, it's the implication of authority.

To heroes, it would be concerning that Cat's in a place where she could Speak to someone in the role of the Grey Pilgrim, and have creation interpret her as having the correct authority to have that order followed, even if it's a 'mild' order.

dadycoool

Yeah, there's no way a Claimant coming into her name is anywhere near a Mentor Hero in terms of strength. It occurs to me that this is really shaping into a Black Queen v. Dead King Story, with her having authority over everyone on her side by various reasons including trust and diplomacy and him having authority over everyone on his side for obvious reasons. Very Black and Grey Morality here. "I want everyone dead so I can rule them all" and "I just want everyone to get along, even if it means slicing a few thousand throats in order to get them to bite their tongues"

erebus42

Yeah, I have to agree it seems to be more a matter of authority as apposed to raw power. Meta-authority over Named does work pretty well thematically considering her proclivity towards manipulating and extracting aspects as well as maneuvering Named and stories.

RoflCat

The lesson ol Kairos would be gleefully giggling over his....prediction? coming true.

>It was a superb thing, the way the Black Queen could so address a Choir and expect to be obeyed. She'd survived so many close calls with angels she'd somehow come to believe she could match them, and through that utterly crazed belief become something that could genuinely give a Choir pause.

>How long would it take for them to grasp that every time she got away with that, she came harder into the story of someone who could get away with that?

But yeah, her Name being able to influence even someone on the level of Pilgrim is definitely huge, even more so because it's not through raw power (i.e. the typical Villain thing that would likely lead to heroic rebellion for their downfall) but rather authority.

Mental Mouse

> she could Speak to someone in the role of the Grey Pilgrim, and have creation interpret her as having the correct authority to have that order followed,

Especially when she wasn't even pointing it at him!

Darkening

She seems to be speculating in this chapter that it's not because she's stronger than Tariq exactly, though she might be, but that she has a form of authority over him, which would fit nicely with the theory kicking around that her forming name deals in moderating and standing in judgement over Named.

LarsBlitzer

If that's the case then imagine her glee when the Drake shows up when she's close to the fullness of her power and launches into his usual line of patter but then "[b]Shut up![/b]" stops him in his tracks.

NerfContessa

He, oh yes, looking forward to that.

Drake regenerates from black flame Ball. For the 7th time in that fight.

Cat is aggravated, and shouts/speaks "Stop doing that you prick!"

Drakes regeneration.... Stops.

Mental Mouse

Fun but unlikely. If only because Cat certainly doesn't have authority over DK's Revenants.

Liliet

Except, likely, for those who had been Callowan heroes in life.

Drake, uh, is P R O B A B L Y not one of those.....

Mental Mouse

Even with King Edward, freeing him from DK required a major miracle and some negotiation with DK himself.

It's certainly possible that Cat is developing generic authority over Name, but DK's authority over his Revenants is much more specific and active.

Liliet

yeah but there are lesser degrees of power than "free permanently, no strings left attachable"

it's very plausible for Cat's Speaking to work on them IMHO, DK or no DK

Mental Mouse

Mmm. we'll see eventually.

caoimhinh

More like it is unlikely because Speaking won't stop his inherent ability of regeneration, whether it is born from an Aspect or otherwise.

nimelennar

Is this the first time that we've heard Abigail referred to as "The Fox?"

And is she going to be getting the Name that the Intercessor was trying to fit around Cat's throat?

Frivolous

No. Abigail has been called the Fox before, in Interlude: New Tricks.

No idea what Name Abigail is going to get, if she is.

Big I

There's that Callowan outlaw King called the Fox (the one with the song), maybe Abigail will just be "The Fox".

Burlyraven

The title's been applied a few times. Abigail is (or at least was when she last had screentime) still missing some of the needed oomph that Above and Below look for, though.

Mental Mouse

I'm not sure she is, actually. As I've said before, she thinks she's a coward, but she's no such thing – her capacity to come up with creative ways to save herself and her people is starting to look more and more like a drive. I could easily believe a Name of "The Fox" or some variation.

I think the pivot here will be when she learns to accept her own power and ability.

Matthew Wells

Even if she thinks she's a coward, we've already got one cowardly mage villain for her to team up with. Imagine Cat's glee at Abigail having to figure out how to put down a ghost so her mage can focus!

Mental Mouse

Imagine the Harrowed Witch's glee when Abigail's sympathetic response to the ghost actually calms him down!

Liliet

Even if Abigail gets a Name, it will 100% not be the one that Cat was circling around. The Role attached to the fox association is entirely different: a cunning general vs a one-on-one Named-wrangling trickster.

Frivolous

Asking Catherine Foundling to override Klaus Pappenheim in a matter fully under his jurisdiction was always foolish. As was asking Cat for mercy.

As I recall, Cat only rarely shows mercy, and then only when a trusted subordinate asks for it, like when Masego asked to spare Fadila because she was useful. This is the same woman who ordered hundreds of crucifixions.

A second successful Speaking, first to Be Silent, and second to Shut Up. Silence could derive from Catherine's Wish for peace, I guess.

First Speaking was to Bestowed only. Second was mostly to regular soldiers, but it affected Bestowed.

Still no Name, even. Scary. I guess we have to wait until the Battle of Hainaut for it to emerge.

Daniel

I liked the plea for mercy scene a lot, it spun together several threads very neatly.

Liliet

More importantly than the mercy question, Catherine does not override her subordinates unless they fucked up badly. Klaus did not fuck up badly; she would absolutely not undermine him even if she DID have a better idea.

Mental Mouse

It is interesting that both times Cat has Spoken, it was to tell someone to STHU. And the second time there was bleed to boot. AFAICT Cat hasn't previously made a habit of silencing people, or I'd be worried that she might blow an Aspect on that...

SpeckofStardust

I mean she did shut up the bard during their fight back when the lone swordman was attempting to kill the warlock.

Mental Mouse

Huh, I'd forgotten that.

Liliet

The first time Cat ever Spoke was to tell some heads to shut up too...

Mind, a similar ability of one of the characters in Harrow the Ninth (which I have just been rereading) is also revealed in a "EVERYONE SHUT THE FUCK UP NOW PLEASE" moment, so honestly I think it's just a common use for the power for anyone who ever has it XD

Liliet

(The thematic difference between using the ability for mind control vs for crowd control – if you're Malicia, shutting people up is not going to be on your list of interests, but if you're someone whose authority is Reasonable and borne of people actually listening to you as an individual choice, organization is likely to be a relevant matter)

Liliet

(not that the HtN guy is super reasonable, w/e. applies to Cat this way)

Yunamed

Am I actually early for once? Such pressure to say something intelligent. All the best Catherine, I hope you fully develop your name in time to turn this around.

dadycool

"Oh, you think the Iron Prince was harsh? You really think a servant of Below, the Black Queen of Callow, adopted daughter and heir of the Black Knight, each known to be very fond of cold, calculated, and final solutions, the one person that your own religion specifically named Heretic of the East, will give you a better answer?" They really didn't think that through. Also, she Spoke and her assumed equals were compelled to obey? What kind of Name is she getting?

Well, if you wanted to know where each and every single undead is about to head shortly, I think GP just gave us the answer.

nimelennar

It almost sounds like Klaus has been given his own Gallowborne.

dadycoool

Oh, I wish he could piggyback off that Story. A battalion that half-worships him as their savior the way her Gallowborne did? It's too bad there are simply too many differences for that to work.

Mental Mouse

> They really didn't think that through.
Indeed!

asazernik

(Necro-ing this thread to add)

Forget the Name stuff and her personal reputation.

They were getting stomped on by a Proceran (Lycaonese, but still) general for insubordination, so they appealed for leniency to... a Praesi legionary??? There is no world in which Juniper or Hune (z"l) or Aisha are a better bet than Pappenheim.

Burlyraven

Yeah, that's a climactic fight if there's ever been one. From a story weight standpoint, getting the gate up and running effectively declares the region as won, with a time released lock preventing recapture for decades, if not centuries. Pretty sure we're going to see the five Scourges that've gotten screentime in a dark Band of Five, at least three main character deaths, the new Squire either saving or being saved by Cat, and maybe even Abigail coming into a Name, if she's grown enough of a spine. Also probably Hanno's next step in his character arc.

I'd put more money on some of these than others, but still.

Liliet

> From a story weight standpoint, getting the gate up and running effectively declares the region as won, with a time released lock preventing recapture for decades, if not centuries.

I don't get that impression! Getting the gate up only gets them access to supplies – and reinforcements, granted, but where the fuck would those come from in decisive amounts? There's no Rohan that hasn't joined the war yet.

Matthew Wells

The Elves could perhaps be bullied into it.

Liliet

That'd need to be a storyline of its own, not an auto-win

caoimhinh

Recapturing Hainaut pushes the frontlines, so forces can be relocated from other fronts into the offensive. Plus, there are some "Rohans" that haven't joined the fighting yet, besides the 20 thousand or so Helikean that stayed under Cat's authority, the League of Free Cities hasn't joined, and the Dwarves have yet to really fight, so far they have only provided material support.

Liliet

The dwarves are intending to commit when they launch an offensive on Keter itself, they won't come to defend Hainaut or they'd have committed ages ago.

The League of Free Cities is busy fighting itself, unfortunately.

And recapturing Haunaut ALLOWS THE FRONTLINES TO BE PUSHED, not redraws them automatically.

It's a significant strategic advantage, but it's not a win button.

Reader in The Night

The problem with Abigail coming into a Name is that the "reluctant general, cowardly genius" narrative is typically Above's, since it operates by leaning heavily on Providence. If Abigail came into a Heroic Name, you'd have the same problems as with Squire, only magnified a thousandfold because she's the commanding officer of one of Callow's Armies. The chain of command and authority straight-out goes to hell, not to mention Heroes possibly out-muscling Catherine from her own country.

Cicero

Maybe, but such a name like "the Fox" would probably be able to suit it's Role to serving under a villainous Queen – if that villainous Queen is better than the alternatives.

Liliet

The problems with Squire are specifically 1) high ruling name potential for this Name specifically, 2) the Penitent's Blade.

I don't think Abigail is in much danger of having plans for the throne, it's why Cat cultivates her in the first place.

And tbh I feel like she'd have a Neutral Name if any at all. Skill-based without a spice of Doing The Right Thing sounds like Neutral to me.

Javvies

Not necessarily.

Barring explicit indicators of being a Hero, ie tossing around Light, it is more likely that any Name Abigail gets would be assumed to be a Villainous Name, or at least a Villain iteration of a Neutral Name.

Javvies

Dammit, wasn't done yet.

Besides, Abigail's Story, as perceived by almost everyone except the Woe and probably Tariq, isn't that of a reluctant general or cowardly genius.

She's an excellent commander on the conventional measures, and backs that mundane expertise up with a mad and cunning genius, and probably an uncanny foresight, and possibly an uncanny amount of luck to cap it all off.

Plus she's Cat's handpicked military protege.

The Callowan Fox, perhaps.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure that Cat would have no problem at all with a Heroic General who was utterly loyal to Callow. And lowborn to boot, so despite having earned a title she'll be no ally to the old nobility.

Liliet

> is typically Above's, since it operates by leaning heavily on Providence

I don't think this is valid logic.

Frivolous

I don't believe Revenants can form a band of five. Catherine's words in chapter 48: Hilltop, imply that the undead have little or no story weight.

The corollary of that is that bands of five don't work for Revenants in any useful manner.

Quotes here:

... but it won't be a great uplift like it would be with a living army. Undead armies already don't tire and don't have to worry about morale, there's just less for providence to give them.

"We might not have a story we can ride," I elaborated, "but we've got a lot of godsdamned heroes to weigh in on our side of the scales. That counts. Believe me when I say that, because unlike everyone else here I've fought armies with that many heroes attached before."

Burlyraven

Right, and that's part of the story. They'd be a bastard band without the power of friendship that comes with a normal band of five. They're five extraordinarily powerful Revenants that have gotten a large amount of screentime in this book and given everyone excessive trouble. It's very likely that whatever actual band is set to counter them will have members that mirror but are at a slight disadvantage to one of the Scourges individually, but cover each other as a team.

Frivolous

Burlyraven – You know, it occurred to me just now that, under normal circumstances, the obvious and logical thing for Keter to do would be to send the Scourges en masse to kill Catherine and the other Named.

I mean, if one Scourge is a nightmare, then the more the better, right? Or worse, from the Grand Alliance's point of view.

I now suspect that the reason Keter doesn't do that, and instead uses Scourges in small numbers of 1-3 at most, is that to send too many at once is to tempt Providence and/or Above to gift the heroes and maybe even the villains with the tools and luck they need to defeat all the Scourges.

This reasoning exactly parallels why Keter doesn't send demons and devils.

Mental Mouse

Also conservation of ninjitsu. Notice how with two or three Scourges together they slaughter soldiers but otherwise don't hit any plot markers... but when Varlet showed up by himself, he was able to kill arguably the top non-Named figure on the scene.

Mental Mouse

Nope, as Liliet notes, getting the gate up just gets them supplies – and as Cat and Pilgrim note, it raises the stakes considerably. From that point on, they need keep that city permanently, with every undead within range attacking, followed by every undead DK can ship to the vicinity.

They should probably get those Gigantes to raise their wards first, because once that gate goes up they'll be using it to GTF0.

Sortale

why is the 2nd army crossing back into creation? since they have to go back into the twilight way anyway, isn't it better for the 2nd army to wait in the twilight way while Prince Klaus army crossing in?

caoimhinh

I want to think it's because they wanted to bolster the forces of Klaus's column in order to secure the location in case of attack, but honestly it could be anything.

The concerns around why they can't feed the whole army put together but can feed it separated into columns are dubious, too. They seem to be based on real-life issues regarding the transport of supplies for armies during wars, but most of those don't apply with Twilight.

While in real life there are concerns around transportation going through a single road, making traffic of supplies slow, like how it is easier to send supplies to various Theatres of War and war fronts than taking them all to one front because there simply wouldn't be enough railways and trains for the supplies to make the trip in enough quantity, those concerns should not apply to the Twilight Ways. The whole realm is made to facilitate pleasant and quick travel, the Grand Alliance doesn't need to handle all the concerns that any company, country, etc. would face while shipping large quantities of goods through thousands of miles of road.

They don't even need to gather all goods into one caravan, but from various locations. Different goods probably come at different times because they need different measures of preservation, handling, etc. Like, their munitions supply don't come from the same place, the food, the coin, and the materiel also come from different places, and while there are advantages to gathering various goods in a single caravan, there are also advantages to sending different caravans of goods, and considerations related to the preservation of goods and their demand which changes priorities and decides schedules.

As an example, Concocter's supplies from the Arsenal wouldn't go through Salia, but the capitals of the Principate and key locations of the farmlands are likely used as "nodes" where various food, drinks, clothing, and other stuff is gathered before being sent as part of a caravan.

Also, physical gates can be used too, further boosting capacity.

A similar question is why does Cat (and the people who run the numbers and logistic exercise of running supply trains through Twilight) believe that "if we kept sending wagons, all the available priests and mages would be in the Twilight Ways. Either headed to the place getting supplied, or heading back to the place where the supplies were being sent for". Like...

Can't they just have the gate-openers in the places of arrival?

If you can scry into Twilight and back to coordinate the timing for the opening of ways, why waste the manpower of priests and mages taking the trip? One mage is enough for a whole caravan as the Communications Officer, and the priest and mages that are with the army can open the gates for the caravan to enter Creation.

And why does Cat imply the supplies can't arrive at the place where the armies are camped but somewhere close but still some distance away from the camp?

It's like this chapter is trying to justify the underuse of Twilight, but a lot of these provided "reasons" seem to have a lot of holes.

John

The Twilight Ways don't have a strict one-to-one correspondence with Creation. Without a permanent gate at the receiving end, a mage or priest simply can't "launch" a group of unescorted mundanes for a different free-roaming caster to "catch."

Mental Mouse

Adding to John's point about not being able to launch for another mage to catch, Twilight is big – I'm fairly sure that they can't, say, send two different armies in from separate points and have them join up within Twilight. (Ranger finding Amadeus would have been riding a different story).

Liliet

To elaborate on the two previous answers,
Rather than wandering a flat plain, think riding a train. You cannot just get on a random one then wait for your end station to be built, that will not get you to that end station. All trains are going somewhere specific; if there's one going nowhere, it's not the one you want.

Morgenstern

It's the same problem as it was with all ways back in Arcadia. You need someone who can find the exit with you, or you won't find any at all (unless there is already a permanent gate you know and thus can send to). Also, the time the journey takes is different every time, as is the traversed space. There is no way to make the exit exact unless there's a stationary portal; the way and exit point changes every time, as the whole space you travel through changes every time. Even at her height as Winter Queen, Cat herself could not make pinpoint exit points, they would always only as exact as "a few kilometers off, about here or there".

Impaula

I don't completely understand how all the questions are answered by the replies above, so at the risk of repeating what was already implied, stated or obvious:

There aren't many mages outside the Order of the Red Lion who could scry (even with the Arsenal teaching scrying to any who could learn), or at least enough to be spared for a problem arguably of lower priority.

To send goods from different locations, the army should open almost as many communication lines (the requirements have to be given for the right amount of supplies at least for the case of multiple smaller armies with varying amounts of supplies in different locations). The number of mages required will still be high, since scrying can't be used for co-ordination. It may also make it more difficult for the Grand Alliance to keep track of everything.

I'm not sure how physical gates would be useful, on the supplies side, because a number of mages are still required to open the other end (one mage can't keep a gate open for long). A physical gate on the army side could work, as a few mages can regularly open gates at sufficiently frequent intervals and send the wagons to find their way to the Hainaut gate. The sender can either send a single steady stream (physical gate) or at frequent intervals (regular gates), but the receiver needs it either as a steady stream or with multiple parallel connections (several gates at once to receive).

If scrying were to be a common resource, it would probably neatly solve most of the issues, with physical gates making Twilight use even more efficient. It would not matter how many locations the goods come from, as each mage and priest can open a gate of their own to receive the goods.

As for the Second Army crossing into the Creation, I think the reason was clearly stated to be morale, besides many other possible reasons.

anonymous4968

You have to remember, these countries and armies are primarily based upon ancient and classical age armies. Back then you didn't have staggered resupply and separating your armies into groups was just starting to get used. The first time it was used in anything close to a modern context, as a reminder, was at the tail end of the Roman Empire, literally the end of the classical age. "Dark Age" armies were usually a lot smaller and used for a lot less time.

The classical era concept of the supply train was carrying everything you needed with you to prevent raiding. Staggered resupply was developed during the early-modern era to cope with increasingly larger armies and faster firing ranged weapons.

Liliet

I think it's got the same answer as caoimnh's question – Twilight isn't a "higher level in a platformer" that you can ascend to and descend from at will. They cannot set another exit point once they've entered, the path exists as a thread following a needle, and before making another journey they have to end this one. The rules are different for sidling Named, possibly, or random wanderings, but for a mundane army / large group of non-magical people that needs to get from point A to point B, they need to get off the train when it's their stop.

Bennett Palmer

Ordinarily I wouldn't be concerned about Abigail losing, but the fact that they are assuming she won without verification make me very nervous about her.

Morgenstern

As does the consideration that there might not be any (!?) Named with her to fight off Revenants, this chapter raised. Guess I have to go back and look that up. Did they really not leave any with her? That sounds like a very bad idea...

Liliet

Scribe.

Big I

I fully expect Abigail to either a) turn up with a last minute charge to save the day at the capital, or b) go off and burn the Dead King's bridge while everyone's focused elsewhere.

Insanenoodlyguy

Abigail gets blackout drunk celebrating the taking of the sisters, then comes to a day later on the march towards the bridge, having slurred out a plan so great everybody got behind it. She improves it twice over trying to improv through acting like she remembers any part of it.

LarsBlitzer

"AB-AB-ABIGAIL FOX! HERO OF CALLOW'S QUEEN!"

"What!? I never called myself that at all!!!"

"You mean you didn't come up with the 'Bitch-Slap the Dead King' plan?"

"I think I'd remember if I did!"

"But we've already smashed the bridge to flinders. See? The main host of the Dead are stymied. Hooray!"

Imposter syndrome intensifies

Juff

Typo Thread:

clean successes > clean success and began to > and begun to grievances voices > grievances voiced was moment > was a moment
our pleas > out pleas be tactics (missing verb) going have access > going to have access had been sent > had been set bride > bridge gate-opened > gate-opener

edrey

this feel like a trap, Dk is the most experience named so far, equal to the bard, there is no way he didnt know Hainut would be the last battle, its way too simbolic. the Dk make mistakes, sure, but so far in the strategic view he predicted everything. on the tactical level Cat had won so far but Hainut just feel like a trap to me

sengachi

It probably is. But, well, this is the Dead King. I strongly suspect that there was never any set of strategies that would get them through this war having only made secure and sensible decisions the Dead King hadn't booby trapped.

Beating him is a matter of luck, Providence, and doing enough back end work that you have an army physically capable of pulling out a victory when the time comes to march into the mouth of hell like they are now.

MrMaturity

Whats the bet that this book ends with Hainaut being re-captured by the dead, now with a permanent gate into the heart of Procer?

dadycool

They can't use the Twilight Ways. GP tried and almost succeeded in killing that BS Regen V guy by sending him through a Gate. It's basically the single concrete advantage they have that he can't simply overcome with enough time.

Kyle Wong

They can't currently use the Twilight Ways. I'm certain that if the Dead King gets access to a permanent portal to study that he will be able to create countermeasures against the realm. Even if he can't find a way to allow his undead to enter the Twilight Ways, he might be able to deny its use to Cat's armies. I could hypothetically see him creating zones where the Twilight Ways cannot be entered, a magical jammer that shuts any open portals, or making the land inside the realm impassably dangerous.

Mental Mouse

> I could hypothetically see him creating zones where the Twilight Ways cannot be entered, a magical jammer that shuts any open portals, or making the land inside the realm impassably dangerous.

The first one he can already do, as wards – remember Cat and her Drow strike force had to deal with that a few chapters ago. And while he probably can't "close every portal in the vicinity", both Revenants and Named have been able to break individual portals.

The third is probably a no-sell unless he can overpower Twilight as a whole. Note that any direct attack against/ into Twilight would probably require DK to risk at least a shard of his own soul – he really doesn't like doing that, but the Ways are a big enough deal that he just might.

Luxuria Tenebris

While the dead can't use it, as the chapter say the Dead King will have a permanent construct to study. And if there is one thing we can be sure of is that Neshamah, one of the greatest mages ever, can atleast learn something about the gates.

Sinead

Fun thought: Is it just Nemashah's creations that cannot use Twilight, or all undead?

If it's the latter, that makes an interesting thought experiment about Zombie III...

Liliet

Only Dead King's creations. Pilgrim hates him, specifically.

And yeah Zombie III was already speculated in-universe to be more of a summon attached to a dead body shell!

dadycoool

Maybe Winter's undead-raising is actually fae spirits inhabiting a dead body at their patron's command?

Liliet

I'm pretty sure this was Cat's conclusion/hypothesis, yeah

Mental Mouse

Adding to Liliet's note, Cat's Winter zombies weren't harmed by Light, to her opponents' consternation.

Liliet

That's the loss condition. Endgame. End of the story.

I don't think EE's intentions for the ending of Guide are "just kidding, actual apocalypse happened". Just... doesn't cap off the dramatic threads quite right.

beleester

In theory it might not be a loss, if the Named succeed at taking out the bridge and leave the enemy army in Hainaut stranded. But the book has dragged out for so long that I can't imagine there'd be yet more battles after the siege.

On the other hand, I'm not writing off the idea that Neshamah could find a way to turn the Ways on them in some way. Imagine, they're forced up in Hainaut, the permanent gate is ready, they're waiting on the first reinforcements from the capital... and then the Drake steps out in a Ways-proof suit of armor for a final boss fight. That would be a hell of a twist.

Liliet

It would not be a good twist, I would say.

The thing is, the Grand Alliance's side is already at a huge disadvantage logistically. Living soldiers tire, require food, etc. Technically undead have a weak point in their Bind officers that the living don't, but even a living army will be at a huge disadvantage with their officers killed, even the Legions.

The Ways are the only thing they have that's even the reason they still haven't lost the war. It doesn't balance the scales so much as give them a remote chance in hell. If they lose that? That's endgame. DK can simply portal his armies/Revenants wherever the hell he likes, and there's nothing the living can do about it.

Daniel E

Would be funny as hell though. "In local news, a small fan-fiction community simultaneously burned down the internet while committing seppuku. And now sports."

Hitogami

This is shaping up to be an epic battle. I'm so excited for her Name and aspects

Soronel Haetir

Interesting that her Speaking came so close to working on GP.

Sparsebeard

With all the gates used last chapter and the fact that Cat wants to create a permanent gate in the Capital, I wonder if "Gate" won't end up one of her aspects... she HAS been using portals for quite a while now (lakeomancy is a sub-domain of portalamancy).

sengachi

Or maybe Connect, or Bridge, or something similar. It seems like she's growing into a diplomacy/authority/coalition-building Name, so I feel like any Aspects she gets will at least pull double duty on that front.

Halinn

I think dumping lakes on people is a very authoritative statement.

sengachi

Cat's aspect for lakeomancy is Offer, as in "An offer you can't refuse". XD

mamm0nn

Wait, they left absolute no Named with Abigail? I thought they took along half, or most. But no one was left with her, and we expect her to have won the Sisters and not get killed when we know that there are several capable Revenants around there?

Halinn

Just priming the situation for her to receive a name in the nick of time to turn the tide of a battle

medailyfun

at least Scribe

mamm0nn

True. So I guess Cat's comment of there being no Named is wrong, even if there's truly no combat Named there.

Aotrs Commander

"If that bride up north got built..."

I'm sorry, I know its a typo and exactly what was meant, but I suddenly had a vivid image of a cackling Neshimah assembling some sort of horrifying necromantic-construct-robot-wife and going "soon, my dear, soon..." and it was hilarious,

Liliet

-has been playing Curse of Strahd recentlyhmm

superkeaton

Ca's dominion over Named, some kind of arbitration or mediation it seems, is growing. I wonder if there's a point where it would work on the Bard or the Hidden Horror.

Liliet

Cat's Speaking has already worked on Bard before, in Book 2. She's vulnerable to this sort of thing, as she's always the minor side character in stories she weaves.

Patrick Herke

So the image that popped into my head was that of Cat forcing both to sit down with each other for couples counseling. And being like, "So I know you're both terrible people, but lets go over your problems with each other. And maybe we can find a solution that doesn't involve me removing both of you from existence." (all with a smile)

Tattletale

Not sure if this is my paranoia acting up, but I find the fact that Catherine is referring to Tariq by name and Hanno by his Name in her inner monologue very fucking ominous.

ohJohN

Looking back through this chapter, the text refers to him as Hanno 5 times and White Knight 5 times (she also addresses him out loud once, as White Knight, but that seems more appropriate for the context).

Conversely, there are 3 instances of Tariq and 5 of Pilgrim/Grey Pilgrim (Cat never addresses him out loud, but it's worth noting that one of the GP instances is in literal-thought italics).

I think it's paranoia; EE makes a habit of varying how characters are referred to throughout a chapter (e.g. Black/my father/the green-eyed man) and based on the numbers it's actually Tariq who's referred to more often by his Name than his name.

Liliet

at least neither of them are the green-eyed man

I cannot get over how fucking stupid addressing Black as that every other time is, especially when it's meant to be "pale green" rather than "vivid green you can spot as such even from a distance". Seeing his eye color through his helmet visor takes the cake though. Anime eyes Black / glowing eyes Black... ;u;

ohJohN

I like the variation – it keeps the text from getting too repetitive, and the descriptors are often helpful reminders of appearance/context for new characters or ones who haven't shown up in a while.

And, like, just because he's referred to as "the green-eyed man" doesn't literally mean Cat is able to see his eyes at that moment, you know? It's a striking physical characteristic she associates with him, and it's not like it's liable to change without direct observation – same as how she can refer to Hakram as "the tall orc" when he's not even in the room for her to check his height or race.

Liliet

HANNO

HANNO WAS THE ONE WHO DISCERNED HIS EYE COLOR THROUGH THE HELMET

anyway it's just a little silly. deep POV writing means that the way narration phrases things is the way the POV character is thinking about them, and by that measure Amadeus HIMSELF regularly thinks of himself as a "green eyed man".

I do also appreciate the reminders of the characters' appearance, do not misunderstand me. I am a great fan of anime as well.

It's just... fucking hilarious.

Morgenstern

She's done this before. It's (at least was) just a stand-in for their (former) closeness.

Xinci

Mhm, the groove gives you authority, be they gods or monsters. Anyway, Cat may have somewhat dropped the ball there, in that she could have framed it as a story so those mutineer captains could actually understand why they were doing what they were doing. She was caught up in her Name developments and her grief for the second army though, so she did one of her bad habits and lashed out at those who she saw as getting in her way instead of spreading out her perspective to their story as a group of people. Which if she did, she could probably come to a workable solution for the people there. Of course that may have infringed on Hanno's contemplation of justice, so it may be good that she didn't do so.

Liliet

More importantly, these people tried to get her to undermine her subordinate's decision by going over his head.

Cat does not abide that.

Mental Mouse

They're not only in a military context, but in a do-or-die situation. As she noted, the delay they caused will cost lives, likely more numerous than the mutineers themselves. That noble's lucky Cat let him walk it back at all.

rwil02

the "bride" instead of "bridge"
"gate-opened" instead of "gate-opener"

Mental Mouse

It occurs to me that Drake is probably going to be sent off to be somebody else's problem, because at this point the protagonists have demonstrated they actually know how to kill him for good. He may have escaped by a trick the last time, but that's not likely to work twice.

And if he goes to bother Abigail, she may manage to kill him through sheer paranoia! "This is the regenerating guy? Ok, first nail him with a lucky copperstone, and have the priests keep bathing him in Light while we scoop up some acid from those constructs, and dig a goblinfire charge out of stores. Then use an unraveler for good measure."

Patrick Herke

And you three go figure out more shit we can do to him. That's your job until he's dead

aran

Oh neat, she has an epithet already! Name can't be far behind then, right?

aran

"But that is needed, my queen," General Zola said.

I'm definitely missing something regarding gate mechanics here. Why wouldn't it be enough to have casters stay at either end, opening the gate each time a caravan arrives or departs? Maybe there's no fixed correspondence between locations in the Nether Twilight Ways and ~~the overworld~~ Creation?

Chapter 72: Omen

"As the long summer dies the wolves will dance with the sons of the king, and though cities will fall in the end the only victor will be death."

– Extract from the prophetic 'Book of Manifold Dooms', by the Augur Kaspar Reitzenberg (widely considered useless, as it foretells events both past and future without drawing distinction)

The city of Hainaut was a beautiful sight.

When I'd first laid eyes on it, last summer, the majesty of it had startled me. The capital had been built atop a tall and precipitously steep plateau – at its highest point it must have been at least three hundred feet going down in a straight line – that jutted out of the valley in more or less the shape of a hand laid flat, with the fingers in that description representing a gradually declining slope headed down towards the valley floor. A butte, which was the Proceran name for a hill so tall and narrow it was almost as a pillar of rock, jutted out slightly to the left of where the 'fingers' began, almost like the point of thumb. The most eye-catching part aside from the height, though, was the pale white wall circling around the city occupying the plateau heights. From closer up the ramparts of pale granite were revealed to be more of a pale grey with impurities, but at a distance and in the morning light it looked like the capital was crowned by walls of white stone.

"It is grand city, this Hainaut," the Apprentice said in a hushed tone. "I studied among the schools in the high hills of Ashur, yet even their splendour pales in comparison."

"It's pretty enough," the Squire conceded. "Seems like a lot of trouble, though. I hope they have good wells, or it's going to be a bloody walk down and back up that slope every morning with full buckets."

I swallowed a grin and Hakram gave me a rather droll look. I'd made a comment not too dissimilar after having my first look at it. I suspected the shared experience of having had the water chore – fetching buckets for baths or cleaning – had led to a shared skepticism of living anywhere water would need to be brought uphill.

"There is not a speck of romance in you," the Ashuran mage reproached him.

"Romance I want out of a lover," Arthur Foundling snorted, "but out of a city, I much prefer functioning sewers. Gods, just imagine if it doesn't rain up there for a month and the drains go dry. The stink."

I cocked an eyebrow at Hakram. Boy had a point. Mind you, the Vaudrii – the Alamans tribe that'd first settled here – had not been idiots. They'd not just picked the place because it'd look nice from a distance.

"Almost a fourth of the plateau, like a teardrop at the centre, is taken up by a great pool that the locals call le Bassin Gris," Adjutant informed both the young heroes. "It is fed by rain, which is frequent in these parts, but also by several great underground aquifers. Though you cannot see it from where we stand, near the back of the city there is a waterfall going over the edge of the cliff."

"See?" the Apprentice triumphantly said. "It was a sound notion, and soundly executed. You simply cannot stand to seen anyone spending coin anything but a good horse or sordidly unseasoned meat stew."

"If I seasoned it the way you do, Sapan, my skin might just turn permanently red," the Squire drily replied. "And a good horse is a sounder investment than white walls by any reasonable measure. The wall's stuck in the same place, and you can't ride it."

Hakram cleared his throat and both youngbloods immediately went silent, looking somewhat guilty at having bickered into front of us even if it'd been amicably. The orc was only amused, though. He'd been in a good mood all morning. Some of that no doubt had to do with the way that he wasn't sitting in a chair and instead standing on his own, though he was leaning heavily against iron-bound crutches. Even the leg he'd not lost had become weak in the time he'd spent without using it, so standing for more than a few moments at a time was both tiring and painful to him. Leaning on the crutches took the edge off that, though Masego had ordered me not to let him do it for too long. Orc musculature was different from that of humans, so doing this would actually begin pinching a muscle in his armpit that humans didn't have.

"Princess Beatrice told me that about a century back they had to make laws about not throwing filth and detritus into the Bassin Gris," I idly added. "It'd gotten so tainted the locals were calling it the Brown Basin instead, so now there's a designated point for that near the waterfall. All the sewer drains lead there as well."

"See," Arthur Foundling smugly grinned at the other Named. "I told you-"

Adjutant cleared his throat again, which killed that in the crib, and glanced at me reproachfully. I shrugged, unrepentant. Laure rats stuck together, at least to the extent that wasn't going to get me killed. The White Knight had rather frankly told me that there simply was no one in a position to take the Squire as even an informal apprentice, at the moment, so he saw no need to move the boy from his current placement. For the moment at least. That'd been with the understanding that I wasn't just going to put Arthur in a padded box somewhere into total isolation from other Named, though, so I'd arranged to have him introduced to a few people. Apprentice, whose given name I had recently learned was Sapan, was one of them. On the heroic side, I'd also presented him to both Roland and the Silver Huntress.

I wasn't going to pretend I'd not chosen those names and Names carefully – Apprentice both young and based far away, the Silver Huntress raised by Ranger and uninterested in power games, the Rogue Sorcerer both charismatic and opposed to certain aspects of traditional heroics – but I'd been careful never to actually hinder him in any way. I was well aware of how badly that story could turn on me if I dipped my toe in it. Apprentice was a peer in age and power, Roland was highly distinguished as both a researcher and a combat mage as well as one of the most broadly travelled of the heroes, the Silver Huntress was a frequent leader of bands of five. All of these connections might one day be of use, to a young man with ambitions to make a name for himself.

That they were also unlikely to be connections that came around to bite either myself or my legacy in the ass was, of course, a mere fortunate coincidence.

In the distance there were sudden flashes of light that caught everyone's attention. They were coming from atop the butte on the side of the plateau, a thick pillar of stone topped by a tall watchtower that was best known by Hainaut folk as la Veilleuse. The prelude to our retaking of the capital had begun. A small mixed force led by Named – the White Knight, the Silent Guardian and the Vagrant Spear – would come out of the Twilight Ways, a frontline of Osenia slayers brutally scything through whatever dead held the place. In small, tight places like the halls and stairs of a watchtower I'd seen few warriors more deadly than Lady Aquiline's nimble pack of killers. Robber, who'd skirmished at their side more than once, had admitted to me that even goblins were wary of getting in close with that lot. The slayers were unusually quick, for humans, and years of monster-hunting meant that those with bad habits had already been thinned from the herd.

"Can I ask," the Squire hesitantly began, "why we are bothering to take the watchtower?"

I hesitated. Teaching that one anything would always carry risks, and as long as he didn't have a formal mentor the risks were even sharper.

"I am curious as well," the Apprentice admitted. "There are barely any dead in there, I was made to understand. Should our efforts not be concentrated on the gates?"

I decided, after a heartbeat, that shared curiosity diluted this to an acceptable level.

"The gates are what we're aiming at by taking the Veilleuse," I said. "It's because of the way Hainaut was built."

"There is only one way in and out of the city," Adjutant told them. "The Ivory Gates, a set of seven great gates. When the city was still inhabited they were each dedicated to allowing certain people in or out – one of the gates, the one in the middle, was even dedicated to solely the Volignacs and those they favoured."

"Very orderly," the Apprentice said, sounding pleasantly surprised. "I'd heard of the Ivory Gates in my lessons, but the Rogue Sorcerer never mentioned this."

Ashurans, I thought with distaste. I expected they wouldn't even mind the Hells too much, if they were set up with proper citizenship tiers and open for trade.

"The city was built with the expectation it would have to be held against raids and armies," I said. "So beyond the natural defences the ancient Volignacs laboured on the land some. It used to be that the slope going up to the walls and the gates was relatively even all around, but over the years they dug a much steeper slope and left just a broad ramp going up to the gates. Actually taking this city, when it's being defended, is bloody work. I'm told the last time the Princes of Arans tried to storm this place, the Volignacs just pushed great round boulders over the walls and let Creation do the rest."

Both young heroes winced at the thought. Yeah, even I had been impressed by that particular historical anecdote. It was typical of the line, apparently. House Volignac was noticeably poorer in coin and manpower than all three of its neighbouring royal rivals, but it'd not lost a significant amount of land to any of them in about a century. As far as I could tell, they'd remained in power largely by being utterly savage at anyone who crossed their borders while simultaneously marrying into the royal houses that were enemies to their enemies.

"That's almost in the same league as Summerholm," the Squire said, visibly impressed.

"No," I replied, shaking my head. "It's significantly inferior, and that's actually what got Princess Julienne Volignac – Princess Beatrice's sister and predecessor – killed. Those gates and that path are the only way in and out of the city. So when the dead broke the Iron Prince's defensive line up north and poured into the central valley, the city was a nightmare to evacuate."

Hainaut city wasn't that large by Proceran standards, maybe sixty to seventy thousand people, but that was a lot of scared civilians wanting to keep their earthly possessions going through the same cramped streets to reach the same seven measly gates. The way Klaus Papenheim told it, at the height of the panic it had taken literal days to get a cart from the centre of the city to the Ivory Gates. People had slept in the streets instead of their homes so no one would take their place while they were gone.

"Julienne Volignac rode out with most of her mounted retinue to buy enough time for her people to flee," Adjutant soberly said. "Not a single horseman from that charge returned."

That put a bit of pall on the mood, so I moved on quickly.

"Essentially, going up that ramp and taking the gates from Keter would be a messy business," I said. "The moment our presence was revealed, the dead moved most of their garrison to defend those gates and the plaza behind them. While we could use the Ways to enter the city directly, the Dead King has proved in the past that he's capable of putting a temporary lock on gating in the region so it'd be a risk – it could close after our vanguard got through and then the troops would be stuck in the middle of an enemy-held city."

"I still do not see the use of taking the watchtower," the Apprentice admitted.

"The upper half of the tower," I told her, "is significantly higher than the rest of the capital."

Arthur Foundling started.

"Engines," he said. "You had siege engines moved in through the Ways as well as the soldiers."

I smiled. Clever boy.

"Before long our sappers will have them in place and we will be able to begin firing," I confirmed. "Straight into the undead so very tightly packed into the plaza right behind the gates."

The enemy had meant to make that place into a meat grinder that it would cost us dearly to clear, focusing on causing damage to our army rather than defending the city properly since the garrison the Dead King had left in here was simply too small to hold it against us. We'd been disinclined to allow that, though the watchtower tactic had actually been suggested by Lady Aquiline. Girl had a knack for sliding the knife in where it hurt, couldn't deny that. Dominion leadership was coming along nicely in some ways, and I suspected that after all this should some Arlesite princes try their hand at a border war with Levant they would be in for a rude awakening. The Blood hadn't stayed in charge of Levant as long as it had by being slow to learn lessons.

"What happens if they then retreat into the city itself?" the Apprentice asked. "Would it not be hard fighting to clear the capital street by street?"

"To some extent, but less than you believe," Hakram told her. "If they abandon the Ivory Gates then we will take them, and the moment we do sending soldiers into the city through gates is no longer as risky."

"Ah," the Apprentice murmured. "Because even if the ritual lock is deployed, the forces in the city will be able to reinforce the vanguard by foot."

I nodded in approval. That was pretty much it. If the enemy dug in further into the city, using street barricades and ambushes, we could essentially overturn that entire set of tactic by gating in soldier behind the chokepoints they were trying to hold against us and striking at them from the back.

"It seems like a flawless strategy," the Squire admitted.

I winced.

"Don't say that," I said, and he jumped in surprise. "Never say that."

"I... apologize, Your Majesty?" he tried.

"There's no surer way to get Fate to piss on your plans than calling them infallible," I sharply said. "I once saw the Tyrant of Helike tip a winning fight the other way just by boasting about how godsdamned invincible he was."

The little bastard had done it on purpose, but the point stood.

"Same goes for you," I told the Apprentice, tone softening. "You lot won't get your knuckles rapped as immediately as a villain making the same boast would, but there's a reason that most heroes are intimately familiar with the concept of tragic irony."

They both mumbled chastened agreements, and for a moment the entire situation felt like some sort of fever dream I'd stumbled into. Hakram, ever a prince among men, delivered me from that unsettling sensation.

"We're due for a show soon, so I'd keep your eyes on the sky," Adjutant gravelled. "Our ram is about to strike."

I cocked my head to the side, taking a sniff from the air, and nodded in agreement. Yeah, I could feel it too. Like a storm in the making.

"I'd not heard about the Volignac men taking siege weapons with them," Arthur said, sounding surprised. "The opposite, in fact. The sappers were vocally disapproving."

Which usually meant insulting deeply limericks, if they were feeling nice.

"While I mean no insult to the siegecraft of the Army of Callow, rams and trebuchets won't dent a structure enchanted the way the Ivory Gates were," the Apprentice said. "I am told the foundational enchantments were laid by the famous wizard Yvon de Grandpré himself. The gates were made beyond decay and strength of arms, Your Majesty, so mere engines could do nothing."

She paused.

"Unless the Rogue Sorcerer is sent out," Sapan added. "He is a noted spellbreaker."

"The enchantments don't actually make the gate unbreakable, Apprentice," I noted.

In the abstract, according to Trismegistan principles it was possible to achieve but the degree of power and precision required would be impossible. Akua had noted that 'physical invincibility', as she had termed it, would require an empire's worth of sorcery simply to empower a handkerchief. And that was just the formula itself, never touching the trickier issue of materials: almost every substance known to us would shatter under that kind of strain, or some cases be outright disintegrated. And while Jaquinite magic did work in some wonky and counter-intuitive ways – it was godsdamned ridiculous that imitating the cadence and syllables of certain passages of the Book of All Things should empower and stabilize a spell – its fundamental limits weren't actually too different from those of Trismegistan sorcery.

"There's protections against entropies – rust, erosion, rot – and the centrepiece is the famous 'dual enchantment' that made Yvon famous," I said.

Famous mostly to avid scholars of magic, but I did have a distressing amount of those in my circle of closest friends.

"The strengthening of material and the reflection of force," Apprentice admiringly said.

Basically what good ol' Yvon whatshisname had done was he'd made the gates and surrounding stonework denser than those materials actually were, which in practice made them much tougher. But that wouldn't be enough to actually stop something like, say, a wyrm if the construct decided it really wanted to go through those gates. So another enchantment, bound to the other one – that was the impressive part, supposedly, since it ensured that since the magics were linked they'd never clash and erode at each other – had been laid that reflected physical impacts when they struck at the Ivory Gates. There was a hard limit to how much power could be reflected, but it's still been very clever: a trebuchet stone tossed at the Ivory Gates would actually lose a lot of its momentum from the reflection, so it wouldn't be powerful enough to dense the denser materials.

It also gave a pale sheen to the materials when they were touched by light at certain angles, which had earned them the eventual name of 'Ivory Gates'.

Masego had noted the pairing to be quite clever, allowing the enchantments to effectively replicate the effects of much stronger spells for significantly less power expended – meaning there'd be a lot less decay in the magic over the years. The enchantments would have faded some over the years, of course, that was their nature. It was why both Praesi and my people usually preferred wards when it came to permanent defences. Wards were a set boundary forcing certain properties onto Creation and requiring a physical anchor, but they were also static. So long as the anchor was undamaged, any idiot with magic could add magic into the wards to keep them going. Enchantments, on the other hand, were an investment of sorcery into matter to achieve specific properties. Eventually that initial investment of sorcery would fade, and while the enchantment could be restored by another mage it was kind of like repainting a faded painting.

Unless you had a mage of similar or superior talent who understood exactly how that initial enchantment worked and what it meant to do, then there were going to be imprecisions and those were going to keep accumulating and diluting the original effect.

"Yup," I said. "We figure that since it's been about two hundred years since those enchantments were laid there's got to be at least six to ten major imprecisions from patch-up jobs by other wizards. Most of those are bound to be centred about the 'reflection' enchantment, since it's the most abstract and difficult of the two."

"You lost me some time back, Your Majesty," the Squire admitted.

Fair enough. At his age I'd not more or less fuck all about magic too. The wind began to pick up around us, as far away in the distant sky red eddies of power rippled. Among them I could see a faint dot around which the eddies were concentrated.

"There we go," I said, pointing at the dot. "Here's our ram."

"Nothing that small could break the gates," the Apprentice skeptically said.

The Squire laughed.

"I'd heard about this," Arthur Foundling said. "But I didn't actually think it was true."

The heroine shot him an irritated look and I took pity on her.

"It's not a thing," I said. "It's a person."

She started in surprise.

"That's insane, who could actually-"

The eddies of pulsing red contracted, spinning on themselves, and with a deafening detonation the Mirror Knight was shot down at the Ivory Gates at a speed that would have been enough to shred most Named to pieces. Unfortunately we didn't have a great angle from where we stood, so we didn't get to see him hit the gates, but there was a heartbeat of silence and then a detonation even louder than the last as all seven of the Ivory Gates went up in a cloud of stone and smoke and power.

"What?" Sapan croaked out. "What?"

"The Mirror Knight has an aspect related to reflection," I mildly said. "So when that nifty little enchantment reflects force outwards, it just goes right back."

"That was enough for an explosion?" the Squire asked, impressed.

"Aspects are finicky creatures, as you will learn," Adjutant grumbled. "In this case, after study the Grey Pilgrim determined that not only does the aspect slightly raise force before reflecting it but, by one of those caprices of Names, it counts every 'threat' individually."

We'd lost Arthur again, but the young girl gasped.

"Yeah," I coldly smiled. "So each of those patch-up jobs tacked onto that original reflection enchantment counted like a different 'threat' to reflect, and since they all drew on the same investment of power the Mirror Knight ended up hitting maybe six seven times harder than he should have because of that heartbeat of reflection games. Comparable to being hit by a mountain in the shape of a man, I'm told."

So Christophe de Pavanie had shredded the enchantment trying to contain him with that excess of force, which in turn had unwoven the enchantment that was bound to that reflection enchantment – the density one. With that suddenly coming loose, massive force and a bunch of sorcery bursting out the results were the plume of smoke and gravel going the better part of a mile upwards.

"That's really neat," the Squire said.

"And completely insane," the Apprentice heatedly added.

"Look, over the years a lot of people are going to tell you that something always wins," I said. "Power, cleverness, brute strength, preparations. And it's all bullshit."

I jutted a thumb at the desolation we'd dealt in about the time it took to boil a kettle of water.

"That looks like the work of two Named," I said, "but that's all it is, a look. It took half a dozen people to achieve that. The Mirror Knight and the Witch of the Woods went through the fact, but behind that? It was the Pilgrim that figured out the peculiarities of the aspect. It was the Rogue Sorcerer that was familiar with the enchantments, and the Hierophant that ran the numbers so we were sure that the gates would be smashed without it killing the Mirror Knight. And it's not just Named, either."

I leaned forward.

"Princess Beatrice was the one who was able to tell us how many times the enchantments would have gotten worked on, and how good the wizards paid for would have been," I said. "Without that, the rest was just air."

"So what does win?" Arthur Foundling quietly asked.

"Nothing," I said. "There is no single thing that gets you there, Squire. No one has the skills to do it all on their own – even my teacher, a man who spent his entire life learning how to twist and turn stories, got his heart ripped out in the Free Cities because he was facing someone who just... knew more. You want to know what the trick is?"

I shrugged.

"Don't do it alone."

I gestured at the smoke again.

"See, maybe I could have battered down those gates using Night," I said, "and maybe the Witch of the Woods could have ripped them off the ground, tossed them up in the sky. Maybe the White Knight could have carved his way through with Light, or the Rogue Sorcerer broken the enchantments and so an assault could follow. All of those answers, though, would have cost us in some way."

I forced myself to refocus on the pair instead of simply the orphan watching me as if spellbound, the Ashuran mage studying me closely as well.

"So instead half a dozen people sat down, kids," I told them, "and talked. Shared skills, shared powers, shared knowledge. And then we smashed those fucking gates without losing a single soldier."

I let that sink in for a moment.

"It's a big world," I said. "There's more than one pair of shoulders keeping it from falling. You don't have to do it all alone."

In the distance, a banner rose. A golden griffin rampant on blue, crowned by three golden daffodils. And under the ancient banner of House Volignac boots hit the ground at the bottom of the ramp leading up to the smoking gates, the men and women who'd fled this place with bitter tears three years ago returning to the city they had lost.

Swords cleared scabbards, glimmering under the sun, and with a roar the last soldiers of Hainaut came home.

—

We held the city by midafternoon.

There were still undead in hiding, waiting to serve as spies and inside forces when the Dead King came to besiege us, but the streets were ours and we were combing the capital for the infiltrators house by house. When it'd become clear the fight was over the dead had turned to sabotage, lighting fires and fouling the Bassin Gris, but it'd been nothing unexpected. There'd been fires when the capital was first taken, so the most flammable of the neighbourhoods had already gone up in flames and the humid summer air meant it was not easy for the arson to spread. As for the great pool of water, we'd put our mages to purifying it under Hierophant and already there'd been measurable success. With constant rotations of mages for the ritual, Zeze was confident that by dawn the pool would be fully restored.

Princess Beatrice gallantly offered to cede me the right to live in the ancient palace of her house, as I was the highest ranking noble and officer in the city, but I declined. I'd rather let her savour the comeback, and besides the place was too large for my comfort. I'd rather a smaller, more easily defensible place I could cover in layers of wards. I put Robber on the task, shaking him loose from Pickler – who was designing a replacement for the Ivory Gates with Akua and Roland as designated magical specialists – and was rather pleased with what he found me. It was a large guildhouse for what had been a guild of cheesemongers, with a small adjoining estate and two side wings. Well-located, in the southeast of the city but not too close or too far from the water.

Adjutant had begun rustling up mages to install wards and organizing guard watches before Robber even told me of the place, so I left it in his hands and instead headed to the open plaza that Princess Beatrice had suggested as the most fitting location for a Twilight Gate being raised. It'd been a good pick, exactly as the princess had described: Althazac Square was large and about as square-like as the name claimed. More importantly, it was located at the confluence of four major avenues, including the great street that circled through most of the capital like an unfinished ring. Supply wagons would be able to flow in without getting stuck in sidestreets. I sent a runner to give me agreement to the location, hoping the Blessed Artificer would be as up to it as she believed she would be.

I'd wanted Roland to be the one opening a gate, but he'd been quite firm in declining. Something about his talents being poorly suited to it. He'd seemed genuinely worried about the outcome, so I'd let it go. Masego and I had already forged a gate together and the Ways got... snippy when you tried to do it more than once, so like it or not Adanna of Smyrna was our best bet. I sent for her and we were discussing how long it would take her to begin the attempt – apparently a lot less than anticipated if healing priests and the Pilgrim leant a hand – when warning horns were sounded from the very same watchtower we'd taken that morning. An army approaching, it meant. I left the Artificer to it and saddled my horse, riding for the closest rampart and intercepting a report on my way. It was not an enemy army, I learned, but a surprise nonetheless. The Fourth Army, which should be at the Cigelin Sisters right now, had emerged from the Twilight Ways and was now approaching at a brisk pace.

That much was already unexpected, but even more so a particular detail I picked out after limping my way to the edge of the rampart. There was a banner flying above the advancing vanguard of the Fourth that I knew well, for it was my own – the Sword and Crown. That was not unusual, as every host within the Army of Callow had received one such standard when first founded. This wasn't a standard, though, but a formal banner.

Aside from me there was exactly one person alive that had the right to fly it, and her name was Vivienne Dartwick.

Big Brother

Oh, the Woe are back together again, it seems.

Insanenoodlyguy
haihappen

The chapter title is "Omen". That can't be good.

Miles

So many flags in this chapter. The prophecy saying the only victor will be death, a statement of what could go wrong (but nothing did yet), both rulers in the same theater of the war... yeah.

Only I don't understand how Viv is supposed to have met up with Abigail, unless she was there the whole time.

Liliet
gpptmarvin

If it wasn't clear I'm pretty sure the "prophecy" at the top refers to the fall of Keter, not what's going on in the present.

therealgridlock

It's also an extremely apt description of the graveyard of princes.

And, since it's described as describing past and future with no distinction... Maybe it's both?

Anomandris

Abigail – " Please don't kill me for this, but Scribe 'accidently' made my noble name Dartwick!"

Sir Nil

Is this the first instance of metagaming aspects so far?

caoimhinh

What do you mean?

Sir Nil

Well, pretty much just figuring out all the limits and specific workings of something, then use it in an extremely specific way for great effect. Here it would be MK's reflection aspect being a multiplier and reflecting each individual instance of the damage reflected by the Ivory Gates. Leading to the huge explosion. A better phrase might be Rules Lawyering the specific wording of an ability, but since most of the Aspects are pretty simple I feel like it hasn't shown up till now.

Javvies

Eh ... I mean, we know that Antigone, the Witch of the Woods already enjoyed her habit of using Mirror Knight as a projectile against undead constructs.

That said, I think this is probably the first time we explicitly know that somebody did the math on the exact capabilities of a specific Aspect and the target for a specific operation.

On the other hand ... where is the line between something like that and Cat's lakeomancy and gating tricks (especially early on) or magical or Named rituals, especially those involving or interacting with Aspects going to be drawn?

Actually, I suspect that Warlock's Imbricate Aspect may have involved working out the math to use it to best effect, even if it was a shortcut. Unless it's a different Aspect of his I'm thinking of. But we don't know for sure.

Sir Nil

I meant in a way that's less about maths but more about the specific interactions between two different things, that's why I wouldn't count Lakeomancy, it's smart but it still only relies on one side doing gate tricks, similar to Warlock's Imbricate which I recall overlapped different planes of creation and since it is just an upgraded version of Cat's trick I wouldn't count that. I'm more so thinking along the lines of them knowing how two different things would interact beforehand. They worked out MK's and the Ivory Gate's reflect would create an infinite loop until one side broke. Ritual casting I suppose could count but we haven't gotten any specifics of that, like how specific aspects would work together when used in conjunction. Especially those not originally meant to be made to work together.

beleester

Yeah, this interaction feels significantly more rules-lawyery than most. Normally an Aspect either has an obvious, hard limit (Rise works three times per day), or a vague "power supply" limit (Black gets exhausted if he tries to Lead too many people or Destroy something too big). This is the first time where the fine details have really mattered – someone sat down and asked "So, what counts as an 'attack'".

for the purposes of Reflect? Is it a single application of force? A force applied over a certain amount of time? Does Reflect have a limit on the number of hits it can reflect with one usage?"

And even when you do understand the details, some Aspects are just not that amenable to rules-lawyering. For instance, Black has clearly sat down with his aspects and thought "Okay, Destroy works on one object, is it limited by size? Can I destroy sorcery as well? What about Hanno's past lives, can I Destroy that?" but it all fits pretty well with the ordinary definition of "destroy." No matter how much you rules-lawyer it, it's only going to blow shit up. Here, we've got the Mirror Knight making an argument that crashing into something counts as an attack he can Reflect, which is a pretty damn impressive bit of rules-lawyering.

Liliet

The funny bit is, I think that's the intended meaning of the Aspect, not a rules-lawyering. They're abusing the hell out of it, but Mirror Knight was always about "fuck you, your eye doesn't get to hit my fist back".

Zoolimar

Actually crushing into the gates didn't count as attack. Ivory Gates had multiple damage reflection enchantments pasted over each other. Total power of enchantments was more or less the same as it was initially but due to being done by different people Mirror Knight's Aspect counted them as separate attacks and smacked them right back with sevenfold power.

Rey d`Tutto

Which sevenfold power then destroys enough of its paired Density enchantment to destabilize it completely. Which decompressed... Explosively!

Javvies

There might have been some bouncing between the Gate's defensive magic and the Mirror Knight's Reflect Aspect involved, each cycle increasing the amount of stain on each until the Gate's defenses broke first. Depending. It's not entirely clear whether it was just the one sequence or multiple cycles of mutual reflection and augmentation being iterated through.

It doesn't really make a difference either way. At least for this point in the story, though if it was multiple cycles, it's possible that it's a trick that could be useful and repeated against other targets. Assuming, of course, that there are targets worth using this trick on that have the same or a similar sort of vulnerability.

Mithyc

MK feels like he plays off of Newtonian physics in all honesty. It's basically a magnified reaction combined with the reaction having minimal, if any, effect on him.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. There was the way Diabolist outplayed Cat, expecting her to gate into Arcadia and preparing accordingly.

Mental Mouse

On consideration, Hanno's heavy use of Recall probably qualifies, especially once Cat got involved.

softle

To this degree, definetly

Frivolous

Very nice chapter.

I note that of those heroes introduced to Arthur; Rogue Sorcerer, Apprentice, and Silver Huntress; two are women and the man is straight, so none of them would be a possible lover or rebound infatuation.

Something I found in book 5, chapter 50: Sunset, that has a more sinister meaning now that we know Catherine can Speak again:

"If you feel like you're winning," Indrani said, "the single stupidest thing you can do is let Catherine Foundling talk. Go on, Tariq. Before she turns it around on us."

From now on, fighting Catherine will involve in part keeping her silent so she can't Speak at you. Though I wonder if Speaking works on the undead.

Bennett Palmer

That isn't how Speaking works. You need some sort of authority over someone to Speak at them. Unless Catherine has an aspect that effects how Speaking works, like Malicia does, she can only speak to gain control over subordinates just like anyone else.

Frivolous

Catherine was able to Speak to the talking heads in the Tower. She had no authority over them, right?

They were even undead, probably. As in, they were dead and still talking, so maybe.

BritishTeaLover

She was Named, which gives a level of authority over regular mortals, and she was the Squire to the Black Knight who served the Dread Empress, and had been summoned to the Tower. That connection would also give her authority, as she was one of the highest placed individuals in Praes at the time since the only people above her in the hierarchy were Black and Malicia.

It could also be there's a matter of willpower and conviction involved too.

Miles

She was the Black Knight's squire. That let her borrow his authority. I think that was even explicitly stated around that time.

Frivolous

Sorry for double posting, Bennett Palmer, but looking back at Eschatology, the relevant quote seems to be this:

The rules behind Speaking were opaque even to me, but usually it only worked on people weaker than you. Even then it wasn't a guarantee, some sort of claim to authority over them tended to make it easier.

So authority over someone helps, but by Catherine's assessment, it isn't necessary.

Composaurus

Do you need actual authority? I can't remember every instance of Speaking but I thought it was just a will contest, basically a "I am a larger piece in the story right now" stick to hit people with

KageLupus

But, when Cat spoke last chapter it had a mild effect on both the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim. Neither of which could be considered to be her subordinates. So I take that as foreshadowing that her Name itself will be related to having authority over any and all names.

The only way Cat could affect those two is if the groove she is wearing in Creation is "Someone who all Named have to listen to."

Miles

She did get asked to comment though, so as the one whose turn it is to speak, she had some authority to tell everybody in the room to shut up

Liliet

The creepy part is that she affected them without even TRYING to. They weren't among the people shouting iirc, they were just sitting there. They got hit with an AoE side effect and it was still enough to affect them.

Zedalb

As the originator of the truce and terms that everyone is operating under one could make an argument that she has some amount of authority over all named.

Also she does outrank the gray pilgrim though she's not directly in his chain of command the organization they both willingly serve under she is superior in.

The white night is trickier but I would still argue she wrote the terms and gave him a position that's equal well she is also having greater political clout so she may not have a direct authority over him but she could be seen as an authority figure greater than him.

It's like they're both Kings but she is of the more powerful prosperous country she doesn't have authority over him but she has a power over him that leads to him needing to cater to her which is sort of an authority.

antlan87

Good question, especially as the skeletons do not have ears. Which raises the question, can you Speak to the deaf? Seems like the kind of loophole the gods would employ, like in a "no weapon forged/wielded by man" scenario.

Inay

We don't know if Arthur is gay or bi/pan though, only that his last lover was a man. (Unless I missed a word of god about it)

Liliet

> the man is straight

Did we have that explicitly stated, or are you drawing the conclusion that the one (1) romance we know of him having was with a girl?

Though that's irrelevant considering he's also significantly older, and without him being a creep it's infatuation only, and that... would not be impacted by him being straight.

Also, we don't actually know that Arthur is gay and not bi.

AbraKadabra

We don't know that. Cat specifically ordered Hakram to find it out.

Liliet

> From now on, fighting Catherine will involve in part keeping her silent so she can't speak at you.

Rule #1 of fighting a bard...

Barthumphries

"so none of them would be a possible lover or rebound infatuation."

The new Squire is basically Young Cat. That may or may not include being bi.

Boadicea

Death flag for Vivienne, long live The Squire?

Liliet

from Imgflip Meme Generator

<https://imgflip.com/i/4m7s29>

Miles

Why would those 2 be arch rivals?

ruduen

Just a reminder to boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/boost>

Amusingly enough, for scenes like this, it's good that Cat has someone to discuss things with – I think that improves the chances of things going smoothly. If you can't discuss it with someone, it means there needs to be something else filling the gap – and with a plan this ironed out, that means the story might fill things up with things going wrong.

dcarter8419

It was really cool to see Cat teaching the youngbloods but also worrying

Ezario Gerion

She is definitely becoming a mentor here. The Story of it is so strong that it strongarms her, even as she tells us that she doesn't want to become a mentor.

I think that this is Above planting seeds for her downfall. "Two bickering Heroes, apprentices to an older Villain, destined to join forces and cast her down."

Liliet

I honestly think Catherine is overthinking it and neither is Above "plotting" anything (asksadfjlaksdfj;l) nor is this going to lead to her downfall. SHE WAS ABDICATING ALREADY THE SQUIRE HAS NO POWER OVER HER

Sykomantis

I'm thinking that she's starting to get compulsions from her future Role as Headmistress of Cardinal. With that in mind, I think she should actually be LEANING IN to her desires to mentor others, because one reason that people become headmaster of schools is that they started out as great teachers

Liliet

I'm actually not sure at this point that Cat's going to be the Headmistress of Cardinal, but she's been in the role of Wise Elder (who is for some reason in her early twenties) since Everdark. And it's great.

Rey d`Tutto

She had the Story-Fu to take on the Intersessor (sp?) and stalemate/win.

What she cannot Eliminate, she will Regulate.

The Regulator.

Liliet

The Sam Vimes.

Nobody understands what the fuck that means, least of all Cat, yet that's the Name and they just have to roll with it.

jamesc9

I had the impression that Names need a bunch of people to tell the story. Do we have a way of having a discworld book drop out of the sky?

Liliet

What actual in-universe mechanics? Sam Vimes is way too cool for that.

Rey d`Tutto

Lollipop!

medailyfun

I'm sure there's no story like this in that world

Cicero

Nah, it's a subversion story. The greatest villain who founds the new age, mentors two heroes, who go on to make her new age into one that favors heroes instead of villains as first expected.

Miles

I'm pretty sure it's not supposed to favor either. It's supposed to keep them away from civilians.

Soronel Haetir

Human artillery is the bestest!

ninegardens

What is Vivian doing here?

What the hell just happened back in Callow?
Cause... I'm guessing ain't good.

Big I

Vivienne wasn't in Callow, I believe she was back at the Alliance defensive lines with the Daoine reinforcements.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's even worse. What was dangerous or urgent enough to make her leave the defensive line? It's very bad news

Liliet

Not necessarily, IMHO.

Cicero

It also made Abigail abandon her designated target, so I don't see how it can possibly be good news.

Liliet

Did it? Is Abigail there?

Cpt. Obvious

Her army is...

308924810a

I bet it was something in relations to whatever was happening with the elves, that crown of spring, and said Daoine reinforcements.

Cat's reaction: are we at war with the kingdom of the golden bloom now?

Mental Mouse

I thought she was already in the field, but probably shouldn't be here.

AbraKadabra

Maybe Vivian got a name? Heiress Maybe? Anything else is bad news.

Liliet

Nah Heiress is bad news bc it seems to be a villainous Name and that would undermine her credibility in Callow badly.

Shining Princess, now? 😊

Mental Mouse

And they're still using Christophe as a missile? Okay, an exceptionally impressive one, but this really doesn't seem like something that would help his attitude!

Oshi

It might be a reminder that he has to work with people though. Catherine just gave a speech to the kids about it. He's probably gotten the similar one from the Pilgrim. That it has to happen now and not when he was younger is embarrassing as fuck but there it is.

Practicality

I don't believe that he's going to mind once they walk him through the logic: He's a hardcore Proceran nationalist, that admires sacrificing the few to save the many. By being a part of the assault they save time and lives, both are highly valuable and necessary. And it is honestly a too useful gimmick to neglect.

Cicero

He probably had an initial reaction of "not again" only to think about it some more and decide he really likes the idea. I mean, basically he got to be the key player who took a vital location in the reconquest of his homeland.

Mental Mouse

We'll see what he thinks of it after he can stand up again afterwards! That said, they did take the time to make sure that he was going to survive it.

mamm0nn

Well alright Christophe, I guess we'll go and ask Champion if she wants to do it. She's always so cheerful and helpful about it...~

Mirror Knight: Damn it. Fine, I'll do it. Glares at his living ammunition rival, the only rivalry he hasn't woefully lost yet.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Christophe de Pavanie? More like Christophe de Force Contondante.

I got this via google translate so don't crucify me if it's incoherent. 😊

Big I

The Squire and the Apprentice joking with each other in the middle of a war, how nostalgic.

Damn that's an ominous quote at the beginning of the chapter. Maybe they will lose this siege.

I'm beginning to like the Squire, hope he doesn't die and gets a chapter of his own.

Dresden 67

The opening quote seems to refer to the fall of Sephirah and the rise of the Kingdom of the Dead. The wolves are the ancient Lycaonese invading Sephirah fighting against the Neshemah's siblings.

In the end the victor was death, as the Dead King converted the entire population into undead.

Cicero

It's the third generation of that happening too. Only this time they are both heroes instead of villains.

Miles

Oh. Oh they're the heroic baby we. That's so cute.

Miles

Woe. *

Raved Thrad

Does this mean their group will be called "The Weal?" 😊

Burlyraven

I think Apprentice and Squire being a duo works in Cat's favor, as far as defense against stories goes, especially if they share the same pool of mentors and tutors. I've read the story it puts them in, but I can't name it specifically. While it doesn't remove them as a threat to her, it does set them up as something like lower champions. Basically, Cat gets to be the eccentric and blatantly sinister "aunt" character that gives solid but strange advice while the pair take down lower threats guided by reliable instruction from RS and SH. Their stories could turn sinister, which would make them a threat to Cat, but that only really becomes probable if she puppetmasters too hard. Hell, the fact that Cat plans on stepping down and going quietly actually plays into the story.

Oshi

The story is one in our world though. I'm skeptical something that like has been done in Calerinia. Besides that whatever else Cat may do she won't be leaving the stage just swapping roles.

Burlyraven

Yeah, but the role she's promised to take as of the Villainous summit was as a broker and guarantor, which is typically a Villain that even Heroes leave be. It's probably enough of a sidestep to dodge some of the more dangerous parts and possibly force some aspects of the story into place.

Liliet

> The story is one in our world though.

It's born out of basic rules of drama though: what gets to be the center stage, what gets to be the antagonistic force, what gets to be the tension.

Frankly, with Catherine's impending abdication, even straight up mentorship of the Squire would not really be a death flag for her: it'd have a very specific expiration date, and long before Squire was ready to stand on his own.

mavant

I dunno, she still could end up sealed into a tree.

Mental Mouse

Especially since Squire has plenty of advancement opportunities even without arguing with Catherine at all.

Liliet

I notice that Vivienne is there...

Mental Mouse

If they meet-cute this could get "interesting"...
Especially since Contrition might have their eye on Arthur...

Liliet

Squire needs to squire for Vivienne while learning from Cat. This sets up a dynamic that is way too interesting as such to lead to any of their deaths any time soon, and with Cat leaving for Cardinal after the war it's going to transition into a "how the fuck do we manage all of THIS without our teacher" story without any deaths involved.

knockoffnikolai

I'm not convinced that abdicating removes the risk of mentor-related death. There are a lot of stories where the mentor's been out of the picture for a while and then gets ganked immediately upon returning. Under that hypothesis the abdication just kicks the can down the road.

Liliet

From the point of view of those stories, Cat just needs to keep serious story-weight, ie have more to her than just

"this one kid's mentor". Which, she inevitably is going to.

Burlyraven

In the scenario I presented, abdication doesn't so much remove her as a mentor as it does shift her story. She goes from dark teacher, to the mob boss "relative" the otherwise straight laced cop (Squire into whatever Knight Name he takes or possibly even Apprentice) turns to in desperate times. It still could force her into a sacrifice, but it at least buys a few decades.

Liliet

Mhm! It's basically about what narrative threads are open.

erebus42

Potentially it could turn against her if both stick around enough to be considered her student but one of each transitions into a Hero and Villain respectively. Then she'd be in danger and they'd both get pushed into a story of former fellow student's turned enemies.

Burlyraven

That is true, but they both have very "pure" vibes to their heroics. It's not out of the question, but it would require a sacrifice bunt on Above's part for one of the two.

erebus42

They're young and you never in what directions chance is gonna push people. That's thing about transitory Names though, there's so many things they can grow into.

Liliet

The question is not whether THEY stick around but whether SHE sticks around. She's going to be the villain representative full time after the war is over and she abdicates.

Mental Mouse

That's assuming she doesn't become the Guide, with natural authority over all Named.

Liliet

That Name isn't happening, but either way, her story is going to stop intersecting with theirs immediately.

Mental Mouse

I'm using "Guide" mostly as a placeholder Name, but what makes you so sure of "that Name isn't happening"? The "authority over all Named" part is certainly hinted.

Liliet

How is "Guide" an authoritative name?

Also, no-one has ever referred to Catherine as that or described any part of what she's doing as "guiding".

You're right I'm not 100% certain, I'm... about 80% certain. I'm 99.999(9)% certain about it not being Practical Guide, though -_-

Mental Mouse

A Guide is the person you follow, the one who tells you want to do or where to go. It's not the same kind of authority as a queen has, but disobeying the guide in many cases... is just being stupid.

Pretty much as soon as she got out from Amadeus's shadow, Cat's been pulling people into her orbit... and reshaping them to varying degrees, though often with a light touch. She's surrounded by people who are powerful enough that she can't in fact give them orders unless they're willing to obey – and yet, somehow she consistently sets the tune.

Even folks like Cordelia, Pilgrim, and Hanno would have done a lot better if they had done what she told them earlier. And now of course, she actually has a pair of youngsters to guide....

Liliet

Hmm.

Cosmicjay

Think of one synonym to one sense of "guide": Ruler.

A guide may give you rules to follow too.

Liliet

thats a really fucking big stretch of the use of the word 'synonym'

dadycoool

So she gets the Squire after all. Big I raises a good point above me about the Squire and the Apprentice messing around while in the general vicinity of a big event. Arthur has so, so many parallels with Cat that I'm not at all convinced he'll stay on the side of Above. After all, the Black Knight position is open. Then again, Cat didn't go the normal Squire to Knight route, so he probably won't either.

I see that the tried and true method of "Witch throwing MK at it" is still considered a viable option.

Vivienne? Is the Woe about to be reunited again? How many red flags can we raise at once? Also, maybe more importantly, why is she here?

Oshi

If Hakram doesn't die then i expect the woe won't either. I think the climax of the book is set for just around Thanksgiving this year with a half month or more of denouement. Whatever it is, I think its gonna be big.

Konstantin von Karstein

Black Knight is a specifically Praesi Name, with a Praesi Story. Cat could have become one because Callow, was part of the Empire at the time, but it's no more the case. Arthur could become a Villain (which I doubt), but certainly not the Black Knight.

Ben

Cat has heard the song (the Girl Who Climbed the Tower, I think?) that presages someone potentially becoming the Empress of Praes, unless I got really confused somewhere along the way. People have been speculating about her getting some sort of new name giving her specific authority over Named in general, but if she somehow swerves and tries to climb the Tower then maybe Arthur could get dragged along somehow. But that's pretty damn speculative, I'll grant you.

Konstantin von Karstein

Did she heard that song recently? I don't remember.

knockoffnikolai

No, it stopped after the Doom of Liesse.

Cicero

There were hints that she could still claim that role as recently as the confrontation of the Bard in the Arsenal if I remember right..

ninegardens

Nah; that was a bluff.

She was hearing the song of the fox king, and Bard be like "What tunes in your head?" and she hummed the tune of the girl who climbed the tower. It was a lie. Bard knew it was a lie. Cat just did it to piss Bard off, and to emphasize that she knew that the fox king tune was Bard making a play.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/04/21/interlude-set-them-up/>

mavant

With a name like Arthur Foundling, surely he's going to end up pulling a sword from a stone.

Earl of Purple

Hopefully not one in the shade of a yew tree in a ruined city in the heart of the Twilight Ways. Hopefully there's another sword he can pull, one less royal.

Mental Mouse

As Cat pointed out, him getting to the throne is not necessarily a problem, though there are details we don't know yet. Having him hanging around Apprentice should yield some important information.

Konstantin von Karstein

Him picking that sword and then marrying Vivienne would be the best option, so it's not necessarily a problem. But it works only if he's bi.

Liliet

Also if Vivienne doesn't mind. You know.

Konstantin von Karstein

Arranged marriage for the sake of alliance were common, even if the 2 spouses didn't like each other, but you have a point 😊

Liliet

I'm just saying Vivienne should be the one arranging in this case -_-

Liliet

Cat was already Black's "lighter grey" student. For the next one in the chain to actually stay with Above this time only makes sense 😊

Elbrasch

Practical hero, that would be a nice change.

Liliet

300 heroic axioms

erebus42

Dammit Arthur! I know you're still in training wheels but still, it's really just common sense to never say shit like that. Careful Cat, you may not be a mage but there are plenty of stories where a master has two apprentices -especially when events unfold and have each apprentice on a different side of divide (say hero and villain)- both of their names are transitory after all...

caoimhinh

Yeah, and those cases are always dangerous for the teacher, because the typical way of those stories are that one disciple kills the master and the other disciples avenges the teacher. So Cat shouldn't get comfy in that role of having two pupils.

Liliet

You're overthinking it, IMHO.

There are many variations, and in the context of Guide, the stories of any of them just aren't going anywhere near there right now.

medailyfun

medailyfun

credit to Oglaf comic creators btw, the unique mix of humour and sex in a fantasy world

Xinci

Well that was a lovely reminder on a lot of mechanics. Good to see Cat has fully embraced that methodological frameworks don't actually have a size limit in what they can include and what entities can be part of their formulation. Would be no point in having souls and multiple different methods per individual, monster, entity, dimension, etc if you only needed one. Each part a weight on the scales in the end

Also for all of those earlier statements that the Book of All Things may just not be true, it definitely looks like its words are binding (suspected as much with the knights armor). I wonder what entity or entities made it binding when it first got written. Well or if it was even it first being written that made it binding instead of some collective decision.

Some more information on enchantments and enchantments is useful. Helps reinforce why Tariq noted similarities between miracles and wards. Both are reinforcing specific dimensional properties, but miracles presumably need no anchor as they are natural to Creation and or have a direct line to reinforcing that order (not that, the form of how they do this cant be usurped). I am still rather curious on the nature of the twinned enchantments. Seems like it possibly worked by the force being used to "increase" density also being what was used to mitigate and reflect foreign forces acting on the gate? Which would be pretty clever Wonder if Roland is worried about confiscating something while he makes the gate, or if its just the whole process would go against his role(Though Adanna being able to do it, makes it seem like a proper method could be used). Probably a issue in him not actually having his own magic I suppose. Might taint the gate with the magic of those one would rather not have access to such power.

Liliet

My wild speculation is, it's that Twilight requires a mage to commit their power to one (1) gate. Going more than once is cheating. Using someone else's power would allow you to go more than once and is therefore also cheating. Roland doesn't have his own power to commit, and he really doesn't want to do something Twilight would regard as cheating.

Javvies

Viv showing up is something I didn't expect to happen. On the other hand, it was probably inevitable that the Woe would be properly reunited at some point.

Squire and Apprentice learning together is a good thing because it helps lay the foundations for Named being instructed by various people, as will be an essential part of Cardinal.

Plus, it's a helluva lot safer to answer their questions than to be the Villain withholding knowledge. In addition, Cat's going to have to do some teaching of/imparting knowledge and understanding to Arthur to make sure he understands why she's not rebuilding the Callowan Knightly Orders as they existed before ther Conquest, so that he doesn't decide to try to do that despite all the very good reasons she didn't, and Viv won't.

Heh. Witch of the Woods is using Mirror Knight as a projectile again. I bet she still enjoys it, and doesn't think it's going to ever get old.

Especially after his dumbassery at the Arsenal, where he cut up Hanno (who we're pretty sure she's interested in, or at least that's implied). Hanno may not hold a grudge, or says he doesn't, but I'm willing to bet that she's not as forgiving of Mirror Knight.

caoimhinh

I will just point out that it's not implied Antigone is interested in Hanno, just that the two are close because they share a background related to an apprenticeship under the Gigantes, and they speak to each other using the Gigantes' silent body language.

It's likely that the people around them ship them or believe them to have a relationship, much like Tariq (and maybe others) initially thought that Hanno and Cat had a thing.

When Nephele implied that Antigone had a thing for Hanno, he mentally stated that as false, as apparently the language they use conveys such nuances and they have firmly stated the boundaries of their friendship.

Of course, he could be wrong. And one of the stereotypes of stories is the hero not realizing someone has feelings for him until a long time later or fate forces a confession out of the partner, so there's that...

Javvies

True. We don't actually know for sure if Antigone is interested in Hanno or not ... and I kind of doubt that Hanno is necessarily reliable. After all, assuming that she is interested, it's unlikely there was a love at first sight situation – which means that they started out acquaintances, became friends, and then Antigone got interested, but hasn't made a move to indicate that her feelings have deepened, because there's been no indicators that Hanno's have changed in the same way. She may feel that it's better to not tell him and not risk their existing relationship.

Though even if Antigone isn't romantically interested in Hanno, she's still fond of him and considers him a good friend. And I get the feeling that she doesn't have that many people she calls friend. That would be more than sufficient grounds to enjoy using Mirror Knight as a projectile even more than she already does. Forever.

Mental Mouse

Yes this... adding to your points, they're both orphans cut off from their own societies who were very socially isolated and completely enveloped by their Roles. Companions in arms, no need to be lovers.

Liliet

I'm not so sure that Vivienne won't be willing to reinstate the knightly orders.

Mental Mouse

Indeed, but later, when it's not so much a problem. Specifically, when all that lesser nobility making up the orders are folks who were raised by the throne and enculturated to loyalty, rather than formerly-independent sovereigns absorbed by conquest.

Liliet

No shit it's for later. Arthur is sixteen.

Javvies

I think Viv's position is going to be a lot closer to Cat's when it comes to how the Knightly Orders are going to exist and function in Callow going forward.

Remember, the reason the Orders were originally broken up was to prevent their quasi-independent military might, drawn largely from the ranks of the nobles, from being able to be a single, unified, voice and influence in politics.

The Order Of Broken Bells is, IIRC, sworn directly to Cat in her position as ruler of Callow and integrated into and subordinate to the command structure of the (mostly) apolitical Army of Callow, itself largely copied directly from the post-Amadean-Reforms Legions of Terror, where the nobles had no influence.

Point is, Arthur has expressed interest in restoring the pre-Conquest version of the Knightly Orders ... which is a thing that I'm pretty sure won't be happening. Cat's brought back Callowan Knights, but not the pre-Conquest separate and independent Orders, and I don't see Viv changing that any time soon, if ever.

Liliet

Cultural demands are a significant political argument, though.

People are going to want to see a multitude of knightly orders, bonus points if they've got the same names as the old ones. There's a lot to be gained from wrangling a reorganization of Broken Bells into technically-multiple-orders without compromising the military advantages of the current structure, and I don't think it's at all impossible.

Arthur is just the early bird of that cultural wave, and honestly it's a good thing they are getting the warning now!

Javvies

That'd easy enough to bypass – they're all the same order, but the primary subdivision is the chapter – which is roughly equivalent in size to the immediately pre-Conquest Orders.

And internal organization was modeled on the old Orders by Talbot.

If you want to reuse the pre-Conquest Order names, just use them to label the various Chapters of the Order.

The fundamental point of Cat (and Viv) keeping the Order of Broken Bells as the only Knightly Order, and part of the Army of Callow, and sworn to the Crown of Callow, is to prevent future problems.

Separated Orders means complicating the chain of command, and letting there be one or more independent Orders is going to get a hard no, as significant military forces not under the control of the Army of Callow or the government of Callow is not going to happen, because that's a recipe for trouble waiting to happen.

Liliet

Yeah, independent Orders are a no, but a complicated chain of command from separate Orders might well be worth it from a political point of view.

Juff

Typo Thread:

point of thumb > point of a thumb

"It is grand city > "It is a grand city shared of experience > shared experience seen anyone > see anyone coin anything > coin on anything into front of us even > in front of us, even into total isolation > in total isolation

the Silver Huntress (extra space)

in our out > in or out

gating in soldier > gating in soldiers or some cases > or in some cases famous 'dual enchantment' that made Yvon famous (should remove the first famous) but it's still > but it'd still dense the denser (dent?)

most abstract > more abstract

I'd not more > I'd known more could seen > could see

"It's a person. > "It's a person."

slightly raises force > slightly raise force six seven > six to seven force and a bunch of sorcery bursting out > force, and a bunch of sorcery bursting out, through the fact (not sure what this means)

"So instead half a (extra space in front) give me agreement (is this right?)
That much was already unexpected (extra space in front)

Liliet

Woe reunion Woe reunion WOE REUNION

We didn't get a proper one in the Arsenal because of Harkam being indisposed ~~and depending on if you count her, Akua not being~~ there NOW IS THE TIME HYPE HYPE HYPE HYYYYYPE

Casey Glick

Eh, I'm sure that Indrani and Masego will just go hang out elsewhere and we'll never get that reunion. After all, which is the stronger story: "the band gets back together for one big hurrah" or, and I'm sure you'll agree with me this is better, "an endless game of phone tag"?

Liliet

you make a good point

Hitogami

Lol, they actually used the mirror knight as a battering ram! 😂😂

That is absolutely hilarious.

Tom

I wonder if they could enhance the effect by strapping goblin munitions to him.

Earl of Purple

No point. If that's what he could do against the enchantment on the gate without artificial help, they aren't needed. And adding some to 'just make sure' wouldn't be accepted, either. Cat can't replace the goblin munitions easily any more, since the civil war in Praes and the situation in Foramen and the Grey Eyries make resupply functionally impossible. The only munition that could have had an affect is goblinfire, and there's no way they're using that in Procer.

TeK

What about doing it for fun?

Cold Cyberia

Guess you can't have the pivotal battle of the war without all the main characters being there. Cat will have to do some crazy thinking to dodge the "band reunites for a last stand" trope.

It would be suicidal but I really want a scene where all the Woe is sitting around a campfire, just like when Procer was invading. They really do seem like a special band of five. Doubt it's going to happen but a man can dream.

Liliet

I think campfire meetups are enough of a tradition for Cat's circle that we're going to get one come hell or high water.

Aotrs Commander

Finally a task which is intellectually suited to Mirror Knight!

(It's be too much to hope for it will knock some sense into him, of course...)

Also, Arthur does seem to be a bit of Smaller Cat, doesn't he...?

Liliet

Catherine herself certainly thinks so! 😊

Javvies

Smaller Cat? Impossible. Remember, she's short and complains about it. A lot.

Younger Cat, sure. A look at what Cat perhaps could have been had she gone Hero instead, quite possibly.

laguz24

A city of seven gates is this Hainaut or Gondolin here, also a moment of badassery from Mirror Knight. He wishes that he did all of it himself which runs counter to cat's thinking where you need other people, Mirror Knight does not get the difference between friendship and being used as a tool. Since he is such a tool himself.

JRogue

Has it been specifically stated that the Squire only becomes the Black or White Knight? We already know of a few other "Knight" names, like Knight Errant and Mirror Knight I am pretty sure there was a Drake-Knight or something similar. All of the Paladins are technically knights as well. There is also always the possibility of a new Name which has happened a lot recently.

As has been stated, I believe that the Black Knight is a Praes only name, although Below, by its very nature, is more than willing to break the rules. Hanno is either setting up to transition into a new Name, or will have an epiphany that transcends him at an important story moment, and then most likely kills him. As has been mentioned over and over Arthur has Hero written all over him.

Could Squire conceivably become a different "Knight"?

Liliet

Considering that Name transitions can go fuckwild if you deviate from the archetype anyway, and depend on what's really happening with you – your Role – rather than what has happened to your predecessors, – yes. Yes, he could.

Barthumphries

'Could Squire conceivably become a different "Knight"?'
Absolutely, yes he can. This is all the long con by the Bard. The Squire, working with both Hanno and Cat, firmly with morals on the side of good and having had his life saved multiple times by the works of evil, and with the Grey Pilgrim right there as an exemplar, will become the Gray Knight. And thus the terms and accords will be smashed because there's now a new Neutral side.

superkeaton

Cat just taught young Heroes about the Power of Friendship. Amazing.

Liliet

Like father, like daughter.

Barthumphries

And that's why she's going to die. She kept thinking, "I don't want to be their mentor. I don't want to be their mentor. I don't... oh, hey, let me give you all a valuable lesson that will lay the foundation for everything you do in the future while waxing rhapsodic..."

IDKWhoitis

I think Cat should take the mentorship. Her paranoia is well founded, but if she can directly influence the next generation of major Heroes, it will set a solid foundation. Heroes in the future won't need to be the strongest, or the fastest, they will need to be clever and know the shortcuts to counter the kinds of villains that will sprout and fester in the Age of Order. The villains will adapt by themselves and they would likely reject the notion of Cat mentoring some kid villain (they would try to assassinate them).

However, if Cat can implant some deep pragmatism and awareness of consequences into the next Callowan White Knight, then I shudder to think of what Callow becomes. It goes from being a scrotched backwater country into the foremost Named Superpower in terms of influence and sway it would hold in Named politics.

Frivolous

Hmm. Occurred to me last night that Vivienne might have arrived because she acquired a Name. If she gained a Name, she'd have to go to Catherine to sign onto the Truce and Terms.

After all, she's been the only Callowan princess for 2 years. She won't be the Shining Princess, though. She's not a hero, I think. She might be the Shadow Princess.

The argument against that is that someone would have noticed Vivienne's Name coalescing during her visit to the Arsenal.

Anyway, it's a thought.

Earl of Purple

Who says she's not a hero? She was as Thief. And Callow still generates hero Names, Alfred's enough for that. Say it is Shadow Princess, though, that could be a subtle enough Name that it lurked without anyone noticing until it was ready, like Thief did.

Mental Mouse

Shadow Princess would seem to be unprecedented – Viv might indeed get Shining Princess, but she's not Cat – I don't think she'd manage a new Name.

Rathalos

Oh gods. We have a Squire, we have an Apprentice. We have the Heroic version of Archer and a Villain's Name that turned out to be Heroic (opposite of Vivi's) (vide Roland's extra chapters)... And it's a Rogue/Thief themed, too! Now we only need 200 pounds of muscle (maybe MK?) and we'll have the Third Calamities. Damn.

Mental Mouse

I notice there's no mention of the Fourth Army looking particularly mauled, which just increases the mystery here.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Cat: "I can't let myself become a mentor to this kid because his story could be dangerous to me."

Also Cat: "I'm going to teach this kid exactly my villain mentor taught me, by carefully exposing him to people and advice that will make him helpful to my cause while avoiding any villain traps by making sure it's legitimately helpful. In no way will this result in a parental relationship with an underlying threat of prophesied parent killing."

308924810a

So, the strategic situation as I understand it is that unless they endure (and preferably, break) this siege they're proposing to get involved in, they're not going to have a reasonable chance to reach the lakes and get the Gigantes wards up, nor a chance to take the bridge site, nor much of a chance to ever strike at Keter.

I need to go reread the section where Cat was trying to plan out this campaign, because I'm laboring under the probably-mistaken impression that they had a need to take the bridge thus campaign, I might be mistaken, maybe just getting closer is fine, and if they can break the siege before the end of campaigning season, and simultaneously build up a store of supplies for a further thrust later in the season they might still be fine for that.

Also I guess Hainaut city would be a valuable forward base from which to try to do that in the winter campaigning season, or they can still try infiltrating a small force to do it and accepting the risk of a trap.

The real issue is that I can't see why they're certain this won't end up like another siege of the Morgentor and hold them up for the rest of the season. Maybe that conclusion is based on the relative numbers of forces? Or on the force they have in the potential siege's rear area? But what do they do if the Dead King decides to hold back a lot in his attack, circumvalate and wait for bridge-transported reinforcements of a higher quality in the next campaigning season before he makes his serious attempt to storm the walls?

jesdynf

Seriously? Nobody else is going to call her out for rules-lawyering her way past a two-hundred-year-old enchantment and then allowing fate to guide her to the mightiest throne cheese has built upon the continent?

Bargle Nawdle Zouss

A couple of s thoughts:

1. I'm kinda hoping that the new Page joins the group with Squire and Apprentice. He'd be the annoying kid brother to both, and add more international flavor (Callowan, Ashuran, Proceran, respectively), with a bit of hero worship of Arthur.

2. How could there have been such a powerful wizard as Yvon de Grandpre 200 years ago, if mages had primarily been looked down upon in Procer for so long until Cordelia Hasenbach created the mage order (whose name escapes me at the moment; the Red Lions, perhaps)?

Earl of Purple

1) Me too.

2) Because even though they were looked down on and distrusted, they're still wizards. Their abilities and powers are very, very useful, and if you own a city you will probably want to be sure that the city is proof from magic, just in case your enemies come at you with magic. And priests won't do that because that could be seen as favouritism within the House of Light, which is a political power bloc in its own right in Procer.

Chapter 73: Signs

*There's nothing impressive about oracles, Chancellor.
All that's needed to foretell the future is a fool and a tiger pit."*

– Dread Emperor Malignant III

I'd never seen Vivienne in armour before.

Mind you, she wasn't exactly barded for war and wearing full plate. She'd put on a blue riding dress, then accentuated that with a good steel breastplate topped by matching spaulders and a loose gorget. She'd not bothered with a tasset to cover thighs, preferring only a broad belt, and the lack of greaves and gauntlets softened the look. It was a good choice, I'd decided. Playing the warrior queen outright would not have suited her, but a martial touch that added to her increasingly regal manners would toe the line just right. It was a reminder that she might not be a soldier, but that she'd ridden out some of the worst scraps the Woe had ever been in without being dead weight. Considering Vivienne had spent most of her adult life wearing loose leathers and treading rooftops without ever developing an interest in fashion that I'd noticed, I could only praise whoever it was in her service that'd made the suggestion.

"Too much?" Vivienne asked, taking off her riding gloves.

Dry as the tone had been, I suspected that the slight undertone of abashment I'd picked up there wasn't just me looking for pearls in a pigsty.

"It suits," I replied, shaking my head. "And I notice you made sure you'd be able to fight if you had to."

The riding dress wouldn't mess up her footing too much, and she was a nimble one even without a Name to heighten the talent. I did not hide my approbation. There was no call to ever feel safe north of Salia, no matter what we liked to pretend.

"It's the classic Summerholm cut," she told me, sounding amused at my ignorance.

I snorted. Yeah, if there was one city in Callow where there'd it's be a fashion staple to be able to fight in your dress it'd be the Gate of the East. I probably would have had to learn about this stuff if I'd ever held a proper court, with all the attached feasts and festivals and formal receptions that involved, but my kingdom had half on fire and on permanent war footing from pretty much the moment the crown was set on my brow. Mind, you as the daughter of a minor baron who'd held the title mostly in name since the Conquest it wasn't like Vivienne would have been swimming in new dresses. It'd been a wealthy of upbringing, but that wealth had begun dwindling before she was ever born and the noble title had, as determined by Tower law after the Conquest, died with her father. There was a reason I'd had to raise her back to the formal Callowan peerage.

Black had preferred leaving my people's nobility to wither on the vine with their titles intact rather than strip those outright, you see. It was less likely to lead to conspiracies, with all those suddenly landless knights and barons instead worrying about how they were going to pay for the upkeep of those mansions my father had so mercifully left them to own.

"The cloak goes with everything," I shrugged. "What more do I need to know?"

"I still remember when you avoided wearing black like the plague," Vivienne smiled. "How the times have changed."

I grimaced, as this was a bit of a sore spot. I'd gotten used to the darker colours, in truth, but I did still have the occasional craving for a pretty sundress or a tunic in a tone you'd seen on a rainbow that'd not been cursed by some fucking warlock. The trouble was that the 'Black Queen' couldn't be seen wearing those things, it'd take a bite into a reputation that'd come in too useful too many times for me to be able to justify wearing a dress that'd not been rolled in a barrel of soot beforehand.

"When I retire," I told her feelingly, "I will wear nothing but pastels for a year. I solemnly swear."

"I'll look forward to the Mirror Knight expounding on how the pink dress is really a hint of your many perfidies to come," she snickered.

We shared a moment of quiet amusement at the thought. I'd seen precious little of ol' Christophe, as it happened. The White Knight had not been softhanded in making it clear that he'd disgraced himself, which had seen his popularity dry out some. Even those who would have been inclined to still lean his way had been kept away by the neat trick of there being no one really willing to argue with the Peregrine when he told you to go away. Tariq was proving a finer check on the Mirror Knight than I'd anticipated, though I still had to wonder if even the Grey Pilgrim was going to be enough to set that man straight. The chuckles faded, though, and I did not resume banter. It was Vivs here, not an officer or a ally, so I didn't bother with subtlety.

"Why are you here, Vivienne?" I bluntly asked.

"Always a pleasure to see you too, Catherine," she replied.

The way she tucked in that perfectly fine milkmaid's braid told me that, once more, she was a little more nervous than her tone and face would imply.

"Don't give me that," I dismissed. "You know well that the only reason I could even spare you from your duties in Salia was because we need you with some battle honours to your name before you succeed me. I'm happy to see you, Vivs, but we're not really in a time and place where happy's what takes the day."

"I know," she admitted with a grimace. "And the truth is, my reasons for coming are thinner than I'd like. I take it this is just going to be the two of us?"

She gestured at the solar around us, situated in the same guildhall that Robber had found me hours earlier. Adjutant had accurately deduced that I'd want this solar – nice windows but not too large, sun-facing and with room enough inside for multiple desks and chairs – for my own and made warding it with our usual suite of protection a priority. He was still arranging the last details for the rest of my new lodgings and headquarters, but he'd be on his way soon.

"Hakram's coming as soon as he can," I told her. "Zeze's got duties for a while still, and I left word for Indrani but I've no idea where she is in the city."

Hunting for undead, I suspected. It was all a little too cat and mouse for my own tastes, but Archer had always liked a hunt and Keter's last infiltrators made for interesting – if not overly dangerous to a Named – quarry.

"I was asking whether you wanted to bring in allied commanders, actually," Vivienne said, "but I suppose you answered the question regardless."

I shrugged. I wasn't going to keep anything from them unless there was a call for it but I felt no need to include them into what was, on the surface, a purely Callowan matter. Both the Fourth Army and Vivienne herself were of my lot, it was to myself they answered first and foremost. Being in the room for this conversation was not a courtesy I felt I owed them.

"You were meant to command the troops at the defensive line down south," I noted. "If General Abigail did take the Cigelin Sisters-"

"She did," Vivienne confirmed. "It was a rout. The Tyrant's Own under General Pallas baited the dead out of the defences with a feigned retreat, and when the battle was engaged the fantassins under her command found a way through the hills the dead hadn't. They were struck in the sides as well, and their lines collapsed. Some five thousand withdrew, and the relief force the Dead King sent decided not to risk taking back the Sisters from her."

Huh, fancy that. My nervy little general had come through once more. I'd expected a victory out of her, but this was more decisive than I'd anticipated.

"Good, then we should be establishing contact soon," I grunted. "Doesn't explain why you're here and not commanding the Deoraithe and levies that we funnelled up to hold the defensive line."

The Daoine troops I trusted to handle themselves, but Proceran levies had a nasty tendency to run when things got rough. Wasn't some deep moral flaw, even if some of my soldiers like to pretend otherwise, but more or less what you should expect when you put a spear in a shoemaker's hands and told him to fight something like beorn.

"The Augur believed that if I was not here by the moon's turn, and the Fourth with me, then Procer would fall within the year," Vivienne bluntly said. "The Astrologer wasn't quite so sure, but she agreed that the storm about to come for Hainaut is going to be a horror and the signs are largely against us."

"The Augur can't see the Dead King," I pointed out. "Or myself, for that matter."

She could also be outmanoeuvred, as Black had proved during his ill-advised Proceran campaign. Her long-term predictions tended to be vague and her shot-term ones only mattered when they got where they needed to be in time for them to be useful.

"The First Prince saw fit to reveal that the Augur been working with the Forgetful Librarian to find a way around her blind spots," Vivienne said. "It's a process of elimination, or at least Hasenbach hinted as much. Every time I'm not here before the whiteout, after it the Hainaut front collapses."

I frowned.

"The whiteout?"

"All our prophets encountered something similar," Vivienne said. "Trying to peer into what happens during the coming battle here is somehow blinding for oracles. They've theorized it's because there are too many entities involved who resist or outright muddle foretelling."

Huh. I supposed we had gathered a significant amount of Named, which would pretty much twist Fate into a knot. On top of that there were Choirs involved – at least Mercy, possibly Judgement if it triumphed over the Hierarch at a critical moment – here on the Dead King and my own's ability to screw with predictions. That was a lot of moving parts for a mortal oracle, maybe more than they would be able to physically comprehend all at once.

"The Astrologer insists that the stars indicate the Gigantes will be critical in what is to come," Vivienne added, "but that one might be muddled. She's also sure they'll be crucial to something in Twilight's Pass, and there's barely any of them there."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"I wasn't aware there were any at all," I said.

"Hasenbach wrangled further concessions out of them through the Dominion," Vivienne said. "She had to first get the Highest Assembly to vote a formal apology to the Titanomachy for the Humbling of Titans, though, which cost her some support in the south. Among her prizes is that the Gigantes sent a group to fortify the Morgentor, with an eye to doing the same to the rest of the fortresses in the pass."

Well worth some Arlesite grumbling, in my opinion, but then I wasn't the one that had to keep the shitshow known as the Highest Assembly in a semblance of functioning order. Somehow I suspected that if we'd not cooperated to let that same Assembly try the Red Axe for attempted regicide Hasenbach would have had a harder time getting that vote passed. It was easier to get princes to bend their proud necks when you'd proved you were willing to cross Named to protect their lives.

"We do have Gigantes in the city," I said, "mind you, at the moment they should-"

The air shuddered, and for a moment it was as if all the world had gone still. As if I was a fly caught in amber, as if all the empty spaces of Creation had chillingly filled. And when that power released me, as primordially indifferent as the wave that could guide the sailor ashore or drown him, I found myself gasping as I leaned against the table. Vivienne was looking at me in a panic, already on her feet.

"Cat, are you all right?" she asked, taking my arm and supporting me.

I closed my eyes, focusing on breathing in and out. The urge to empty my stomach passed.

"I'm fine," I got out.

"You're not fine," Vivienne bit back angrily.

I gently pushed her away, still leaning against the table slightly.

"I'm not being stubborn, it passed," I said. "And it won't happen again."

Blue-grey eyes examined me, as if looking for a lie.

"You didn't feel that?" I asked her.

Slowly she shook her hand.

"Feel what?"

"I'm guessing," I sighed, "that was my first taste of what Gigantes spellsinging feels like for someone... attuned to the parts of Creation I am."

"Bad?" Vivienne quietly asked.

"What the Witch of the Woods does is a pale imitation," I ruefully said. "They tap into something larger, Vivienne. It was like standing next to Sve Noc if they were losing their temper, but less... targeted."

Masego has once called the godhead a trick of perspective, as the Hierophant's eyes had always seen further than those of other men. I'd once been such a trick, when I had scavenged my way to rule over Winter, but it'd been blind flailing. It was not without reason that the Dead King had described my apotheosis as 'accidental' when we'd first met in Keter. These days I could touch those deeper rules on occasion, as I had at the Second Battle of Lauzon's Hollow, but my understanding was limited and the use was rough on me. What the Gigantes had just done – and it must be them, for no one else in the city should be capable of this – had... ridden such rules, for lack of a better term. Like a ship on the tide, using the sea without mastering it. It was not they way I did it at all, but that I had the capacity in the first place must have been enough to make me... sensitive.

Hierophant would have been as well, I figured, but no one else in Hainaut.

"I'll be ready next time," I told Vivienne. "It was the surprise that left me vulnerable."

Like a sucker punch in the gut, though they'd probably not meant it to be.

"Perhaps they could be prevailed upon to give warning, next time," she mildly said.

"Yeah, I'll ask the White Knight to pass the request along," I softly laughed. "Shit, it's been a while since something took me this badly by surprise."

An overdue reminder, perhaps. It was a big world, and I'd not seen all there was to see in even my little corner of it. We resumed the conversation until Hakram joined us, but there really wasn't much to add to what she'd already said. Vivienne had come to the capital with the Fourth largely on the word of the Augur and the Astrologer, and though she had freshers news than we about the going-ons in the south she truthfully didn't have much to add. She was just as lost as we were, only now in addition to our uncertainties about the defence of Hainaut there was a hanging sword above our head to remind us that oracles were pretty sure if we lost here the entire war was lost. Lovely.

At least we had Vivienne with us, so even at the bottom of this freshly dug pit things were looking up.

—

There was need for a war council, as there so often was these days, but we went about it briskly. General Bagram, a large and aging orc who'd been the right hand of Juniper's mother for decades before becoming a general in his own right under the Army of Callow, was added to that ever-expanding roster of people with a seat at the table along with my designated heiress, Lady Vivienne Dartwick. Discussions were without frills, as we all felt the invisible noose of Keter's advance tightening around our necks, and there were few arguments. Given the very real possibility that we were going to lose either the gates or the walls at some point, Princess Beatrice gave formal permission to my sappers to prepare the streets to repel invasion. Pickler was still busy replacing the Ivory Gates, but no doubt she'd be delighted when informed.

Quartering was revised to accommodate the addition of the Fourth Army, which had blessedly come with an overfill of supplies that'd allow us to avoid rationing before the first supply wagons arrived through the Ways. I'd been right twofold, as it turned out: it'd been the Gigantes that had startled me, and the gate they'd helped the Blessed Artificer make was already technically finished. It was recommended it still go unused until dark, though, as apparently the parts where they had melted the veil between the Twilight Ways and Creation were still 'cooling off'. Fucking Hells, the more I learned about Ligurian sorcery the more it fucking terrified me. And Triumphant had gone toe to toe with those people at their peak? Gods, what an utter monster that one must have been.

By sundown we all left the palace that Beatrice Volignac seemed so deeply happy to have reclaimed, most of the practicalities of our defence hammered out into a working shape. It was the Pilgrim and the White Knight who reached out to me afterwards, though, to arrange a formal council of Named as well.

"It can be considered a given that every Revenant in the principality, including the Scourges, is now headed our way," Tariq said. "We need to prepare accordingly."

"Agreed," I said. "We need to divide our people into bands. And more importantly-"

"Your insistence that a band of five needs to be sent after the bridge immediately," Hanno frowned. "Yes, I was told of it."

"A heroic band of five," I said. "Given the steep odds and how it'll be impossible to really prepare, it's the only setup with a chance of getting it done. And if Tariq told you about that, then he told you I'd like for you to lead it."

It'd be a loss, because the White Knight took to most Revenants like a sickle to wheat, but I had doubts about any band led by a lesser hero succeeding. The Grey Pilgrim might make it as well, maybe, but Tariq always shone most when he was in a supporting role and that would muddle things up some.

"To clarify," the White Knight mildly said, "on the eve of a battle prophesized to be decisive for this entire war, you request that I leave."

"Yes," I bluntly said, "and the Witch as well, you'll need her."

A light touch on my arm interrupted me, and I turned to find Vivienne cocking an eyebrow.

"I will leave the three of you to your conversation," she easily said, "but if I might make a suggestion?"

She gestured at our surroundings, namely the now dead gardens leading up to the front gates of the Volignac family palace.

"There are perhaps more appropriate venues for you all to talk," Vivienne finished.

"Common sense," Tariq ruefully murmured. "Such a rare, precious thing. My thanks, Lady Dartwick."

"I still feel the urge to take to rooftops on moonlit nights," she replied, "so do not bestow upon me a surfeit of honours, Peregrine. Lord White, Catherine, a pleasant evening to you."

Hanno returned the courtesy, while I cocked an eyebrow at her. She had a deft hand with heroes, as she'd just reminded me. I sometimes forgot she'd been part of William's band, back in the day, and had been a decent fit there from what little I knew. Heroes tended to be split between those who considered her a fallen heroine, just punished by Above in the form of losing her Name, or those who essentially considered her a retired heroine who'd embraced other duties. Tariq tended to lean that way, though I'd never quite been able to pin down Hanno on the subject.

"I'll see you later," I told her. "It's been too long."

"Agreed," she feelingly replied. "I'll try to see if I can rustle up Indrani from whatever winesink she'll have stumbled into by now."

"Don't bribe her with my liquor cabinet this time," I warned, "it's impossible to get the good stuff this far out, and..."

I suddenly coughed, feeling the distinctly amused gazes of two of the most prominent heroes of the age as I argued with the heiress to Callow about the fate of my booze stash.

"Carry on," I said, vainly trying to claw back a bit of gravitas.

It, er, might take a while. Vivienne took her leave and I went for a walk through a garden of dead things with the Pilgrim and the Knight. To my surprise, I found the sight oddly troubling. I'd thought myself well acquainted with death, for how could I not be? I'd waded through it on too many battlefields to count, and thrice I'd come close to staying in those cold arms forever. I'd deal it out and suffered it, used it as a tool and flinched from it. If my throne had been set upon a foundation of anything, death was it. And still, limping through the garden, some part of me was dismayed. It was all dead. Ever tree gone grey, ever flower wilted every blade of grass frayed. Black earth had gone fallow, covered by dead leaves and insects forever still. This wasn't the coming of winter or even some black tragedy. Intent had done this. Thorough, patient intent to kill every living thing there was to kill.

There was bare, graven beauty to the garden that felt like a knot in my throat. Was this the world the Dead King wanted? A field of grey from shore to shore, so utterly barren that even the sea grew lifeless lapping at it. I forced myself to set aside the thought. Stroking the thought of failure instead of tending to the needs of the moment was as good a way to see them turn true as any.

"It has to be you," I said, standing in the shade of a leafless tree.

"I am not certain we need to send a band at all," the White Knight calmly replied. "It would strip the defence of much-needed strength, and there will be time enough to attend the bridge after victory is secured here."

"If victory is secured here," I pointed out.

"In this, I believe the Black Queen to be correct," the Grey Pilgrim said. "We should not bet the fate of all Calernia on our ability to win in battle against the hordes of Keter. It would be dangerously irresponsible."

I nodded in appreciation at the old man's words. Not that he was speaking them for my sake – Tariq had never been shy about disagreeing with me on anything at all, to my occasional displeasure.

"It weakens our ability to win that battle to send Named away," Hanno flatly said. "In particular fighters as apt as Queen Catherine seems intent on assigning, in all humility."

"Smashing that bridge isn't going to be a pleasant autumn stroll, White," I said. "I mentioned you and the Witch of the Woods because the job needs a captain and the power to collapse a bridge. To add survivability, I'd throw in the Forsworn Healer and pack the rest of the five with one set of muscles and a specialized killer."

The kind that'd be able to kill something that couldn't be killed conventionally, like the Painted Knife or the Rogue Sorcerer.

"There I must disagree," Tariq said. "Not with the necessity of power, but with the White Knight's presence being required. His role would be better suited to a situation like the approaching battle."

Fuck, I silently thought. Part of me wanted to get snippy that the Heavens got to have two people around for this talk, but honesty compelled me to admit that there really wasn't anyone else who would have made a difference. Hanno took advice from many parts, but it was my understanding that people who could make him actually reconsider a decision were few. The Pilgrim was as close to a peer as I'd be able to rustle up in Hainaut.

"You genuinely believe in the wisdom of thinning our forces before a major engagement?" Hanno asked Tariq, frowning.

"Empty prayers birth no miracles," the Grey Pilgrim replied.

I cocked my head to the side. Huh. Yeah, that was solid namelore even if he was coming at it from the other way. He meant, I gathered, that for a prayer to be answered it would need to be sincere. In this case, that meant sending Named even when it would be costly. Black would have phrased it more along the lines of Creation being a machine that gave out according to what you gave it, while I myself preferred to think of it in terms of weight: you couldn't topple a wall with a pebble. If you wanted a trebuchet stone, you needed to use a trebuchet in the first place.

"That only reinforces that we do need to send him," I insisted. "We can't half-ass this, it'll backfire on us."

"This isn't a ritual field and we're not bleeding prisoners to make a tower fly, Your Majesty," the Pilgrim flatly replied. "There is no need to open our own throats to make this work."

I bit out the very unflattering answer I had on the tip of my tongue, as I was pretty sure he knew the Kharsum words for both mother and goat.

"I remain unconvinced this should be attempted at all," the White Knight said, frown deepening, "but when the two of you are in agreement you are rarely incorrect. I'll concede to sending a band, and a heroic one."

That was a start.

"I appreciate that," I said.

"But I am horrendously wrong, and you must now tell me why," Hanno drily replied, and I remembered why I liked him in the first place.

"I wouldn't go quite that far," I said, since the truth-teller couldn't read me. "Look, I've seen you ride this horse before. Picking out traps with the Fortunate Fool, picking fights specifically because they put you at a disadvantage."

"Heroes placed in situations where it is possible but unlikely for them to triumph buck the odds more than they should," Hanno agreed. "It is the way of stories, and stories have power."

"But that's the thing," I said, "in those stories, you don't send some nobody to kill the dragon and win the princess' hand. Sure the guy seems like a nobody, but we know he's not because the story is about him. He's really a prince, or a knight, or fated in some way."

"Your argument is that we must look for a specific manner of fate, then?" Hanno curiously asked,

"No," the Grey Pilgrim quietly said. "It is that the dragon's lair is full of skeletons whose mishap was being... insufficiently fated, yes?"

"Weight," I said. "See, the bridge looks wide open right now: all armies are accounted for and far, we know where it's being built and where most of the Scourges are. But it won't actually be open."

They were both looking at me like was belabouring something very obvious, which I supposed for heroes I was. Villain lairs were always trapped and vicious, while heroes didn't really have those.

"So there's going to be a fight," I continued. "Which you figure you can win sending some solid heroes while keeping here our finest. That's a mistake, though, because that bridge is something that could lose us this entire war. It's the reason we began this campaign in the first place."

Hanno's eyes narrowed.

"Weight," he repeated. "You imply that if we do not send shoulders capable of bearing the burden of this entire campaign, all they will be is... skeletons in a dragon lair."

"I do," I said. "And that means it has to be you. Because pretty much the only other person in your camp with that kind of pull on the war is the Grey Pilgrim, and no offence Tariq but--"

"No, I agree I would be ill-suited to the task," the Pilgrim murmured. "Perhaps if Laurence was still with us it would have been different, two of us ancients with three younger, but as things stand the forces within the band would not be in harmony."

"So you agree," I pressed.

"I don't," Tariq replied. "You see this weight as a scale that must evened, when instead it should be seen as a crucible to help the rise of another great character. We should be discussing who among the servants of Above in the city could benefit from this opportunity, not entertaining sending away the White Knight before a pivotal point of a crusade."

Godsdamned heroes. There was a point where optimism became delusion, and thinking every test was some sort of ladder was well past it. Sometimes you just failed, because you hadn't been prepared enough and you'd underestimated the foe.

"This isn't a fucking crusade, Tariq," I said, exasperated. "I know it's more comfortable for you to think about it that way, but my side of the fence is here too and we count. The role of a White Knight isn't the same it would be in-

"Enough," Hanno said. "I understand the need for a swift decision, but I will not let myself be strongarmed before considering this properly."

"We can't afford to wait long," I bluntly said.

"The discussion can be resumed tomorrow, after our council of Named," the White Knight said. "I will sleep on this, at the very least, and consult with others I trust."

Not what I'd wanted to hear, but I could already see that pushing any further now would just burn goodwill for no gain. I suppressed a wince, looking back on how I'd gotten drawn into an argument about 'the role of a White Knight' with the Pilgrim while said White Knight was right in front of me. Hanno was remarkably even-keeled, but that probably hadn't done me any favours. It'd been a mistake, too, since the man I actually needed to convince hadn't been the one I was arguing with. I snuck a look at Tariq. Had that been on purpose? Getting my thoughts out so the White Knight could see them splayed out without having been drawn into the thick of it.

"By all means," I said. "We can continue this when everyone's rested."

"A good evening to you, then," Hanno said, inclining his head,

I returned it, and he bade a significantly less formal goodbye to the Pilgrim. Who stayed behind, as I'd hoped he would. The two of us continued the walk towards the opposite end of the garden, his slow gait and my limp evenly matched. Neither of us pretended this was about anything but continuing the conversation that'd just abruptly ended.

"He is in a pivotal moment of his journey as one of the Bestowed, Queen Catherine," Tariq said. "Sending him away from the battle could have deleterious effects."

"Or it could be exactly what he needs, Pilgrim," I replied. "We don't know, either way."

"His own leanings-"

"Are a consequence of his character, not some arcane working of fate," I bluntly interrupted. "If he had some instinct niggling at him that this was a mistake I'd reconsider, but he argued based on logic. He thinks his place is here in the thick of it, herding heroes, so that's where he figures he should be."

"Because that is his place," Tariq just as bluntly replied. "He is the White Knight, and the hordes of Evil has come."

"Maybe that was true a century ago," I said, "but you gave me a whole speech about how he has to find a new way, Peregrine. What you're describing is more of the same."

"This new way you argue for is also your way, Black Queen," the old man said. "Not his. If this were his own notion I too would reconsider, but it is not."

I grimaced. Yeah, I could see that from his perspective this was meddling on my part.

"It's a strategic decision I'm pushing, not a personal or even a story one beyond my understanding of forces that need to be addressed for the operation to be a success," I said.

It wasn't exactly an apology or a justification, but it flirted enough with both he should be able to understand I wasn't unaware of where I was treading.

"I believe you to be acting in good faith," the Pilgrim acknowledged, "but that does not mean it would not lead to error."

I breathed out.

"All right," I said. "Then I'll back off and stop pushing, if you do the same."

He cocked an eyebrow, clearly less than inclined to agree. I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. I was going to have to pay for the goods.

"I'm calling in my favour," I said.

I'd not agreed to keep an eye out for Razin and Aquiline without putting a price on it. The old man's face remained calm, but he studied me for a long moment.

"I will not argue for something I believe to be a mistake," Tariq Fleetfoot said.

"I'm only bargaining for silence," I replied.

He didn't look happy about it, but then favours weren't supposed to be things you were inclined to give in the first place.

"Then the bargain is struck," the Grey Pilgrim reluctantly said.

We shook on it, wrists clasped, and broke off the grip as we reached the end of the path.

Leaving the garden of death behind, we went into the city and instead saw to the living.

Dave

oh boy first again? This chapter felt short? Looking forward to more buildup

caoimhinh

The calm before the storm.

If you can call calm to actually feeling how the winds are gathering and the clouds are darkening. These build-up chapters feel like a coil spring being compressed and every five paragraphs a new weight is added to the pile over that device.

onedollargum

Felt longer than usual to me.

Sparsebeard

A valorous White Knight,
Bought and sold in the night.

Liliet

Literally what Catherine bought was for him to make his own decision without Tariq meddling.

Sparsebeard

I'll be surprised if the Knight doesn't end up in the heroic band now I'll admit. Whatever the decision Hanno makes though, it'll impact on both his and Cat's Names.

Christian Oaks

Yeah the white going where the black sends him definitely is him tacitly agreeing with her role above all other named

Cicero

My instincts say it will be the Squire, and maybe the Apprentice.

devildragon777

Yay, the Woe will be together for this! Figures that it has to come on the eve of 'The Most Important Battle of the WAR'™, though.

Gigantes sorcery continues to be absurd, and scary. What the heck did they do?

...I dunno if leaving Hanno to stew on matters on his own is good or not. He hasn't gotten much out of it so far?

ninegardens

>...I dunno if leaving Hanno to stew on matters on his own is good or not. He hasn't gotten much out of it so far?

Oh, but he has... all of this stewing is basically just a kettle of story weight (at least, according to Pilgrim). This is effectively a ritual built of time and doubt rather than iron and blood.

Simmering is like... its like a pair of poker players repeatedly raising the stakes. It doesn't say which way it will go, but it does say that when it does go, it'll either be terrible or fabulous.

KageLupus

"Gigantes sorcery continues to be absurd, and scary. What the heck did they do?"

"...apparently the parts where they had melted the veil between the Twilight Ways and Creation were still 'cooling off'."

Sounds to me like the Gigantes helped the Artificer burn a hole through creation and into the Twilight Ways to create a new permanent gate. How they did it would probably require some more info from the Witch's interlude as we don't have a really firm grasp on their magic right now, other than the fact that they are pretty good at warping Creation with words.

dadycool

So it's confirmed that she's a minor god. Creation rippled with power from something far greater than her and she felt cowed by it in a way that a mere mortal like Vivienne, and likely even other Named, isn't.

Wow, that garden. It's honestly a little depressing to see it dead simply because it was once alive.

lol, "The White Knight you're talking about is right here, by the way." What would happen if Cat, a Leader of Named, coming into her own Name, joined by her Squire and the three Heroes she's had him associate with, were the ones to burn the bridge? It satisfies everyone while being ideal for no one.

Konstantin von Karstein

She was a minor god, it's probably why she felt it. Cat will not be a Hero, it would muddle Providence to send her destroy the bridge. And Arthur doesn't have enough weight, experience or destructive power to be anything than a dead weight in that band to destroy the bridge.

Cicero

I don't know... Cat has played the role of Hero a few times before when she was the Squire. (Despite not being a Hero). Maybe she could do it again.

Liliet

Demigod sounds right for Catherine.

God I'm hype for every single thing happening here.

mamm0nn

She's not a minor god, she once was a minor god. There have been a great many hints of attunement lingering for her of her past powers of Winter, from still sensing certain wards of containing to the luring of the Maavii prayer. She's not the power that is but hidden, but the power that was, and that's sufficient to feel these kind of things.

Sinead

I think where I slightly disagree with this analysis (and it's probably in line with the Dead King's perspective) is that while Cat is a Former Minor God, she a) wasn't broken from the loss of her apotheosis b) still has the spiritual grooves carved into her soul that can allow her to grow into something More. Not saying that she will become a full god, but considering the perspective of the Titan in the last bonus chapter (Colossal 1 for the record), I think "godhood" is something relatively flexible.

Given all the parallels drawn previously, perhaps the Tower was an ascension ritual in it's own way, and Triumphant's breaking of the Tower, and the world's rejection of that path broke that path to the Tower for ever, leaving only the echo in the song from nowhere. It would explain why it's the Girl who Climbed the Tower, rather than something more gender neutral.

The setting really seems built around the fact that one cannot do things that they cannot in some way to conceive or perceive (Cat's apotheosis was accidental, but it really was the cumulation of her putting herself in the line of succession for Winter and then killing off everyone above her. She just didn't think through the implications). So the fact that she can still sense the workings of the Gigantes to me implies that she could be capable of working at that scale if she so chose to. It may be that other non-spellcaster Named could sense the power, but I don't think they would be as sensitive to it, more just aware of the movement of power.

Liliet

You believe the "lingering attunement" to not have current godhood implications. That's the view Catherine herself takes, but it's not the only possible interpretation.

Florian Hötzl

Agreed.

New heqdcanon: She rebuilt tower is a pale imitation of Tower of God.

Matthew

If Cat wanted to win... and win easily, send the squire and the White Knight to the bridge. Hanno would get killed and then the squire would ride the death flag to greater victory.

saithorthepyro

That would be a terrible idea for Cat to try. Hanno, despite their disagreements that they have kept away from professional decisions, is one of the few Heroes she has a rapport with who also has a lot of pull with the entire Heroic community and is likely to help get the Accords up and running after the war ends. Getting him killed to try and give a power boost to a kid that she has purposely distanced herself from and she is actively worried about becoming a threat just because of his name and where he is from sounds like a terrible idea.

hakureireimu

Is Rapacious Librarian supposed to be Forgetful Librarian?

Liliet

Good catch -_-

Crowley

The Forgetful Librarian was a villain who Hasenbach recruited to serve her in Salia. I think you're getting them mixed up with the Rapacious Troubadour.

Crowley

Re-reading that part and some of the comments, i believe there might have been a typo that got the two mixed up, sorry.

shikkarasu

OK, but real talk I would LOVE a story about the Rapacious Librarian. It would be like Masego if he was never born with the Gift. Devouring knowledge both metaphorically and literally.

Florian Hötzl

But books are not dietary well balanced.

Too much Fibre, you know? ^^

medailyfun

with so many Named around the Creation itself starts to confuse and forget the Names

origamiflame

Looks like EE was the Forgetful Librarian this round hahaha

Big I

I'm going to speculate on who gets sent to the bridge.

Not the Witch, since she's tied to the giants and they're in the capital. Not the White Knight, same reason, plus this is the climax of the war. Not the Valiant Champion, since she and the White Knight have got a buddy cop thing going on. Squire, Apprentice, Page and Young Slayer are too young.

That all being the case, I'm picking; Blessed Artificer for fire power, Rogue Sorcerer to be in charge, Vagrant Spear as DPS, Silent Guardian as tank, Forlorn Healer as healer. Maybe swap Vagrant Spear for Silver Huntress or the Guardian for the Mirror Knight, since VS and MK have history.

sengachi

Hmm. All solid tactical choices, but the Rogue Sorcerer isn't really a leading Name. He's not the one you have rally your haggard band in the darkest hour to go into the mouth of death exclaiming battle cries in the defense of your homeland.

And going up against the Dead King's strong point, that's what they'll need. Someone who can stride into the mouth of hell knowing they'll die and make you want to follow them.

Matthew

Rogue sorcerer has been the MVP of the heroes. Like he is competent, resourceful, not prone to ego, and works well with Cat.

sengachi

Oh yeah, he's easily one of my favorite Named in the story and he's good at what he does. He's really good at what he does.

He's just ... if I were to make a Lord of The Rings comparison, he's a Legolas, not an Aragorn. Pound for pound Legolas is probably one of best fighters in the Fellowship, has one of the best heads on his shoulders, and isn't prone to problematic personal issues. But if you need someone to give an inspiring speech at the darkest hour, Legolas is not your guy. Aragorn is.

And the Rogue Sorcerer just isn't an Aragorn. If they're going to assemble a band of five to break the bridge, someone on that band needs to be an Aragorn.

Cicero

I wouldn't say the Rogue Sorcerer is Legolas, if I where to pick an equivalent from LotR it'd be Faramir. Which means he is exactly the guy you'd pick to go take the bridge when Aragon is needed to defend the capital.

It's just... he's likely to die, or be wounded nigh unto death in the process. Along with most of his band too.

He's the man who gets it done, despite not being the fit for the role, but "get 'er done" is not the safest method in heroics. Heck, it's not the safest method in real life either.

Anomandris

That's kinda the reason why doesn't fall into the "Charge of the Light Brigade" band category. He is too pragmatic to be manipulated by Above and as you mentioned, works well with Cat. The bridge job needs a quasi-Fanatic leading it for the story to make sense, and Roland definitely isn't .

Actually MK might be the best idea if not Hanno – especially this is twisted as a redemption arc.

Cicero

Hmm... and interesting idea. The Mirror Knight would probably fill both Cats and Tariq's criteria. He has both the weight and has the potential to grow from the mission.

Be a bitter pill for Cat though. Though I suspect the White Knight might think of it himself.

Cpt. Obvious

Sending MK to destroy the bridge would be risky. Not that he wouldn't get it done, he's an excellent fit for that. But the question is what it would do to his ego.

Something like that would change him. The fight in the Arsenal blew his ego up like a balloon. That he'd destroyed five or six demons almost single handed inflated his ego to the degree it took WK beating him unconscious barehanded to bring him down to earth again. If he is sent and succseed it might trigger the same reaction, or it might force him to grow as a human. We've heard his internal dialog and know that he's probably as straight an arrow as can be found. He doesn't really have a bad bone in his body, but with the kind of power he has and his tendency to see any shade but pure white as being evil he can cause a lot of problems.

beleester

Rogue Sorcerer would be a natural fit for a raid behind enemy lines, though. He's spent most of his life alone and on the run, and he's good at improvising his way out of tight situations. And he's still got a good amount of firepower if things do turn into a straight-up fight.

This is a commando raid, not the charge of the light brigade. Get in, blow up the bridge, get out. Roland is good at that sort of thing. You're right that he's not necessarily a motivating or leading sort, but he's the rock-solid second in command that the whole operation would rest on.

Hmm, now I'm warming up to the idea of Mirror Knight in command with Roland as his Designated Thinker.

Liliet

Blessed Artificer is an ARTISAN. She requires supplies for everything she does. She's a terrible pick for an independent mission.

Konstantin von Karstein

The problem with the BA is that she needs here artefacts, and if she use them all she's useless. I doubt that in the middle of nowhere she could make new. The WW is more likely. If Hanno stays here there's a Name to speak with the Gigantes, it's enough.

ninegardens

Right... so it feels like Tariq play is to aim Mirror Knight at this situation. He's the obvious upcoming named that Grey Pilgrim has been hanging out with, with enough of a story that he might just about pull it off. I can't think of anyone else with the story weight to pull this off? But MK having his redemption arc here... feels about right. Possibly sending him to his death in the process but...

Meanwhile, Witch of the Wilds and Hanno have SYNERGY with the Giantese, which makes them a good fit for hanging back, even if it weakens the bridge attempt.

Give all the auspiciousness, it almost feels like the story wants Viviane to head to the bridge... but she isn't named at the moment.

Is there anyone I'm forgetting? The new squire and other newbies just don't have the weight to them.

LarsBlitzer

The only other heroic Names I can think of are the Relentless Magistrate and the Grizzled Veteran, but their place would obviously be back with the army. The Veteran should be with the other Fantassin Companies that the Iron Prince had to cow to get them to come along, to keep their morale and nerve up if nothing else. The Magistrate's Name is tailor made for ferreting out undead infiltrators in an urban setting. Setting him loose on the alleyways and courtyards will turn up tons of undead vermin faster than you can say "I am The Law!"

Liliet

You're probably thinking of Grizzled Fantassin, and I don't think she's a hero. She's about as iconically Neutral as it gets after Ranger. She had to be bribed with a lot of money to come along to a world-saving-important mission, which should tell you all you need to know about her allegiance, I think.

beleester

It's the "possibly ending in his death" bit that worries me. The Mirror Knight is an enemy of Catherine, and I feel "Villain sends troublesome hero on a suicide mission" is one of those stories that ends badly for the villain, even if we know that heroes pull off suicide missions all the time.

On the other hand, if Cat is arguing for the White Knight and the Mirror Knight bravely volunteers in his stead...

ninegardens

Oh yeah, CAT can't send him. But if MK volunteers, or if... Tariq (the wise old mentor) or Hanno (the man who has no reason to trust MK, that man who lost a finger to MK) turns around and says "Christoph, you can do it. I believe in you", that is a very different story weight.

I think the main trick is... Christoph is used to going in their and being the only survivor. In order for the bridge story to work out for him, he also needs to keep the rest of his band alive. (If they live, it is heroic growth. If the other band members die, it's a "failure with one lone survivor")

sengachi

Oh this will be interesting. Especially because it seems like Catherine's name is built around authority over or passing judgment upon other Named, I wonder if that might come into play here.

Liliet

I think this is the one place where Catherine proves she's a good pick for this authority by NOT meddling. And by keeping away other meddlers, using her favor for that, by the way.

origamiflame

Given her use of speaking mostly to shut people up, and also this bargain, I wonder if one of her aspects could be around silence?

Liliet

Doesn't really sound like Catherine "add some sharpeners to it" Foundling. Now, order/discipline? Absolutely yes 😊

shikkarasu

'Order' doesn't really feel like Catherine "Set The House On Fire While She's Still In It" Foundling, either. Chaos is a little too baked in to her for that.

Liliet

Order's been her goal from the start, she kind of bonded with Amadeus over that. Chaos is the method, but order is the goal, always. This is the gal whose solution to all of the world's problems she can reach is an international treaty binding parties that have never been bound by a treaty before, and whose reaction to being turned into an increasingly mad fae was to take rigid oaths to limit what she could do.

Do not be confused by applying strict DnD alignment rules. Catherine is a fantastic example of Chaotic Lawful (where Kairos, by the way, is an example of her opposite from that same post, Lawful Chaotic)

Tom

Peace has always been Cat's goal, as explicitly observed by Kairos. That peace requires life, and if we're sticking to the whole "order vs chaos" dichotomy, life is always a mix of both. The Dead King's world would be much more orderly than anything Cat has envisioned, and she finds it horrific: "There was bare, graven beauty to the garden that felt like a knot in my throat. Was this the world the Dead King wanted? A field of grey from shore to shore, so utterly barren that even the sea grew lifeless lapping at it."

Liliet

Yeah, it's true that Catherine is not at the extremes of the Lawful alignment as envisioned in DnD-like verse. It is also true that relative to the average normal state of Calernia, her wish is to make it more Lawful.

dcarter8419

I feel like Cat it's right in terms of named and weight but that it shouldn't be Hanno. MK would be a better pick IF it swings into a redemption arc

Liliet

Same here, to be honest.

Sinead

Especially if he is assigned Severance to have the systemic acknowledgement of his possibility of growth. Then again, I am a sucker for the idea of Christophe becoming "The Sword and Shield". I blame JoCat.

I'm always mixed on Christophe, since as pointed out, he was left to fester. Yes he could have "gotten himself out", but I think that ignores that there is a lot of pressure on Named to do things a certain way, and he wouldn't have had the same support structure as Cat did while he came into his power to keep him from making to grievous mistakes or to more importantly correct him. Cat probably had more exposure to the idea of actually working with foreigners before becoming Squire and rising up through the Imperial Legions, while Mirror Knight seemed to have come into his own just before the Tenth Crusade.

In my head, I compare Christophe to Hakram, but while Hakram gained his power when he gained that certainty in his life, Christophe was handed power and chucked into the world, where the lens that he viewed it through was found to be horribly flawed. And while adaptability is possible, I think it is important to recognise that Names don't encourage character growth in the same fashion we would expect people to grow (I think the magnification of virtues and flaws is true of all Names, not just Dread Emperor/Empress. The Tower is just the one with the most resources to back it up).

Liliet

Yeah, Christophe was kind of fucked over by his surroundings. He's a good egg.

Sinead

I kinda felt guilty after we got chapters from his perspective for all the frustration around him. Protagonist centered morality is a hell of a bias, but I thought I was pretty good at avoiding that in this series.

ninegardens

I mean... even in his chapters he was kinda an idiot... but he was an fool, and a tragic figure, not selfish, not a monster. He was just... kind of dumb. But that's a forgivable flaw, so long as he accept that he needs to trust people and not lead with his own wisdom.

But yeah, realizing how many times he had been the "Last man standing in a massacre" was... it put his story in more context, that he knows about the failure.

Liliet

EE is REALLY good at writing conflict where both sides are reasonable and virtuous 😊

caoimhinh

So the pattern of chapter titles for this arc is “predictions of the future”.

With Eschatology (which is the study of the end of times or the end of the world in theology), Omen, and now Signs, these chapters titles are painting an eerie but cool picture.

And all clairvoyant Named agree that the coming battle is a whiteout where they can't predict the outcome? And that's already the best scenario, considering if Vivienne isn't there they can predict assured failure?

Well, that's a war with the fate of their civilizations on the line, alright.

Reader in The Night

You know, this conversation didn't really read like two Heroes and a Villain making a decision, it felt like a Hero (Tariq) and a Villain (Cat) trying to sway his opinion, and Hanno at a crossroads.

We heard before that Cat couldn't transition into the Grey Knight because there was no cultural demand for the role, but that's no longer true, is it? Here, in Hainaut, the battle isn't between Good VS Evil, it's between the Living VS the Dead.

And it's not just that: this entire campaign has been taking an axe to the old rivalries, the old way to do things, the old Black-VS-White Duality. Cat said it herself, this is not a Crusade. This Tipping Point feels decidedly more... Grey.

And we have much speculated that Cat will have a name to stand in Judgement over other named, haven't we? And yet, even weakened as it is, I feel that it's very unlikely that Cat will get to pass Judgement on the Chosen from Above without the Choir of the same name having a say on things.

Currently, the Choir of Judgement is locked in battle with the Hierarch. The Hierarch himself is largely factionless in the Above-Below conflict, but he ends up weighting more for Below because he's tied to Bellerophan Law, and that polity is typically Below's. If the Choir manages to absorb the Hierarch, it might not come back as lily-white as it used to be.

A new power, a Greyer power, coming into play at a dramatically appropriate moment, claiming both the Representatives from the sides as it's own (with lighter or darker shades of Grey, of course), could have a lot of narrative strenght. More, it would have a lot of story symmetry.

hakureireimu

I don't think the Practical Guide to Evil is to be ... not Evil. Arch Villain is still my guess.

Liliet

The Practical Guide to Evil being not lowercase evil has been the case since Chapter 2, when Amadeus first walked Catherine through the implications and reasoning involved with governance.

Uppercase Evil has to stick, though, alongside uppercase Good 😊

Sinead

Re read Chapter 2 because of this. I had forgotten that Cat didn't drink a lot in the start of the series.

Liliet

It's beautiful, isn't it?

...yeah, she only started to drink a lot after all the trauma 😊

dcarter8419

This.

edrey

To put a cherry on top of all that, the bard make a move. Who want to bet?

Now i have a theory about triumphant, she was close to be a god, the DK said she has clarity like anything he had seen before and the godhead is a trick of perspective. She fought a angel head on and won after all.

Also, The Rapacious librarian? Wasn the forgetful librarian?

saithorthepyro

If I had a nickel every time events that happened were theorized as a Bard Plot...let's not forget that not only does this require Bard fooling a lot of augurs and prophets at the same time, but Augur has gone toe-to-toe with Bard before and won. There's a very good chance that she cannot really mess this up.

Crash

Althought I do see your point on this(The Bard is much like Death Flags and Rules of Three, in this comment section) this might be the one time where there's some merit to this.

It's not so much that she had fooled the augurs but that her presence in addition to Cat's and the increased interest of the Dead King in this fight makes her being present a good explanation for the issues the augurs are experiencing. Not by way of nefarious 45D Chess, but by her nature as one of the people who fuck with the Augurs.

She doesn't need to be masterminding anything here, just showing up and fucking with predictions and generally disrupting the situation by simply showing up to say Hi and immediately sending Catherine into paranoia would be enough to fuck with this very delicate situation.

Casey Glick

Foundling's Law: as the length of a PGTE thread approaches infinity, the probability that the Bard is blamed for an event approaches 1.

origamiflame

This one's definitely a logarithmic curve

Black Spiral Dancer

Honest word!

ninegardens

But... but logarithms tend towards infinity... not towards 1. D:

origamiflame

Hmm you're not wrong.
... Sigmoid-esque curve?

Liliet

This is a good bet, IMHO. Not that Bard's necessary for this – there's plenty of mess already, as Catherine has commented, and “we literally cannot fucking tell what's going to happen” is a good oracular backdrop to a climactic battle – but her presence would definitely contribute to it, and is not entirely unlikely.

mamm0nn

My own theory is that the Bard has made many Named to dilute the batch. Named are rare and powerful and meant to leave an impact, but then a Named came along who went around creating little Named to remove that. Now we've got so many Named that most are even forgotten or just one-note Roles.

We know that Hierarch wasn't one of Bard's creations, she said so herself, and he without any training other than existing went up against a Choir. Perhaps the likes of Triumphant and the Dead King were such true Named too, ones that trickled through in the early days of the Age of Wonders where the Intercessor appeared and broke the power of the old Named.

True Named are greater, more meant to create Stories than follow them. They'd be like Triumphant, able to do so much more despite being in an era way behind the modern advances, or DK who is still the leading figure in knowledge of the arcane even after millennia. Maybe Cat has broken through to such a True Name herself, but whether that's the case or not there's no real need for a pre-Age of Wonders Named to be a god of any sort to be as potent as they are.

edrey

Its possible, but at the same time i would say that hierarch was so powerfull was because his first rival was the bard. He led creation guide his aspects and his third aspect is based on the soul of a city without a story for a millenia and with the corpse of a god as base. The power of a name depend of the story but we lack the details to say more.

mamm0nn

Tyrant's Helike was the one with a god in the basement. Bellophon just has a scribbled-on rock.

agumentic

Scribbled-on rock that happened to be a corpse of a god, though.

Frivolous

The upcoming Battle in Hainaut is already a WB move. See the conversation between Tariq and Catherine in chapter 61 Adouber:

"But why the sudden obsession with the armies in Hainaut?" he finally asked. "What changed?"

"You fight the Bard, Catherine," he said. "Neither walls nor locks nor oaths are enough to keep her from learning secrets if she wishes to know them."

"You think she sold us out to the Dead King?" I skeptically said. "If there's one person I'd buy she wouldn't sell us out to, it'd be him. What would she even-"

I froze the dreadful thought that came all too soon. The Grey Pilgrim sighed.

"So he comes after us with his entire hateful might," Tariq said. "So we suffer a stinging defeat at his hands and, like children in the dark, we pray for deliverance by our own guardian angel."

Chances are very good that everything Vivienne mentioned about how Hainaut will be the result of the WB tattling to Neshamah.

And yeah, it should be Forgetful Librarian.

medailyfun

I suspect Bard had made her move already, and this move was about the elves and Forever King

Konstantin von Karstein

Good catch, she could have leaked the existence of the Spring Crown to those pricks.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, this is all waythehell off Bard scripts. I suspect Bard could screw it up, but that's the only thing she could do – and she doesn't actually want the Dead King to win.

Liliet

So I fucking love this.

Neener neener to everyone who expected a disaster to the south to be the reason for Vivienne coming, FUCK DOOMSAYING.

Of course, doomsaying is also what actually happened in-universe, and like... holy shit. This is so cool. There are so many ways this can go, with the premise being that if the whole Woe isn't gathered together everyone will lose. Scenarios range from "Catherine dies and Vivienne needs to be here to substitute for her" (I'd say it's unlikely given book 7 will also exist, but knowing Catherine's history with dying so far,) to "Vivienne needs to talk Catherine out of a stupid thing / openly go against her at a crucial moment to prevent a mistake" to "Vivienne needs to MAKE a mistake that would unpredictably lead everyone to victory" to "this conversation was literally it, Vivienne's addition to the mix at the start changed the dynamic to one that would lead to the better outcome" to "the Woe needs to be together to make a collective self-sacrifice" to "Vivienne is about to come into a Name and save the day” to HOLY SHIT I HAVE NO IDEA THIS IS SO MUCH FUN.

THE WOE IS BACK TOGETHER SQUEEEEEEEEEEE

Crash

So, knowing Cat’s history with dying I’m about to go ahead and make a bold claim: I don’t think she dies again, and if she does it’s next book at some very climatic moment.

As she mentioned this very chapter she has danced with death thrice already, I think she’s gonna give it a rest for a bit. Reckon the next one might stick haha

Althought doubtful, I’m here for Named Viv and the absolutely horrible migraine that’d cause Cat lmao (been leaning towards Heiress lately, cause that’s fun)

Liliet

I’m sticking with Shining Princess for Viv, as it will cause a headache and solve a problem simultaneously in the most entertaining way! It will also illustrate a problem with Cat’s “no Named rulers” idea even further than it was already discredited XD anyway yeah I’ve been leaning more and more towards “naw Cat’s not dying easily” like, those previous three times? they were legitimately with a chance of her not coming back from that. they were for real now? Cat has established a pattern of “death is temporary” and now she’s unkillable unless you go to the same lengths as she had to to even get a hit on the Wandering Bard.

I really want Cat to die again, only for it to gloriously not stick, this time for no particular reason other than “she’s Catherine Foundling”. It probably won’t happen, you’re right – I want many things, some of them mutually exclusive – but if it were to, it would be great and fit well. IMHO.

Earl of Purple

Maybe her first Aspect will be Return, letting her cheat death on her own.

Liliet

Honestly that sounds like Cat.

Also allows her to make the best last minute saves.

medailyfun

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Love that movie.

Sinead

Will Return only work....nine times?

John

Nine day cooldown after each self-resurrection, maybe.

Sinead

Oooh that's even better than my "Cats have 9 lives" joke. Perhaps if we want to really make it interesting, her resurrections are like her soul searching, where she has to murder both the Below and Above representative in her soul to come back to life.

That would be an interesting twist. You get the resurrection, but you have to earn it every time. And I like it more than Bard's body snatching (it took me so long to realise that Wandering Bard is basically a Name that became sentient, considering that she checks to see what her calling name is every time she takes a new body/kills the mortal)

Crash

Yeah, I like Shining Princess since I saw it as a suggestion it's just that a Callowan Heiress sounds interesting.

A traditionally Praesi Name in the hands of a Callowan born, who often opposes the Wasteland but acts as heiress to the Squire who proved the curren Practical Evil works.

That's kinda poetic. Also Viv would absolutely fucking hate it lmao

Sinead

I just think it should be "Shining Princess -> Sun Queen" because she's not just any old Good Queen of the Old Kingdom. She's the Dawn of the new era.

Vivienne's reign will be an enlightened era, but her work to not have Cat discarded by Callowan history is to frame her reign as "Dawn restored from the dark by a thief in the Night".

Vivienne recognises that she would not be where/who she is without Cat/the Woe extending her trust. If she frames her entire reign that while is worthy of respect in it's own way, also a tribute to Cat's own work, I think it would be the best ending that Cat's work in Callow can get.

Of course, we could both be wrong. Perhaps Vivienne just gets fridged to motivate Cat because she isn't motivated enough already.

The whole point of the Book 4 was that it was the pit of despair for all the Woe (save Hakram). Now it's "breaking all the armies in Creation" time.

Liliet

> Perhaps Vivienne just gets fridged to motivate Cat because she isn't motivated enough already.

The one thing I'm fairly certain will not happen!

Sinead

I just word it like that because I am getting really pissed off at all the "DEATH FLAGS!"

Maybe characters will die, but I really feel like PGtE is a much happier setting than people give it credit for. The most common elements that are used to make a setting "grimdark" are avoided for the most part, and pointed out as exceptions when they do occur.

This is why I genuinely expect the Woe to make it through more or less intact. If Hakram was going to die, I really feel like Arsenal was the place to do it. The fact that Cat made a point to mend rifts between the Woe (her talk with Vivienne) enable Hakram to wake. Yes, Cat and Hakram had their own working out to do, but that has progressed positively! Why do we need to undo all that hard work in a story that genuinely rewards investing in others? To me that's the actual moral of the story: "Institutions/cultures/groups matter more than any one person. invest in people, and make the point to do so, and you will be rewarded with what they do for you in turn."

Liliet

THIS THIS THIS THIS THIS

> PGtE is a much happier setting than people give it credit for

THISSSSSS

It's "MATURE" but it shows how MATURE doesn't have to mean grimdark and deadly and hopeless????

> I genuinely expect the Woe to make it through more or less intact.

ME T0000 FUCKING GOD

> Why do we need to undo all that hard work in a story that genuinely rewards investing in others? To me that's the actual moral of the story:
"Institutions/cultures/groups matter more than any one person. invest in people, and make the point to do so, and you will be rewarded with what they do for you in turn."

this is some good shit right here

AbraKadabra

The two of them NOT mutually exclusive. Heiress is a transitory name. It May TRANSITION into a heroic name, possibly.

Sinead

On one hand, I see where you are coming from, but I think Cat's legacy is helping bring Callow out of the Age of Wonders into the Age of Order, and that is better reflected with Vivienne starting with a Name that fits the Old Kingdom (especially with the rumblings about Cat ignoring the Old Ways) and transmuting it into something that will thrive in the the Age of Order.

Vivienne is the Heiress of Cat's legacy, yes. But since that is for the Crown of Callow specifically, not the general flexibility that Heiress implies in Praes, Shining Princess is a better fit. Plus, coming into Shining Princess could be the finalised boost to Vivienne's own martial prowess.

Hmmm, some speculation: what if one of the reasons for Vivienne to be here is as the rallying point of pitched army battle? Part of the issue is that the White Knight is the only big rallying point Above has, so if Vivienne becomes another such figure (along with her reputation as one of the Woe), this may serve as something to bolster resolve.

Either she along with Cat bolsters resolve during the siege while the White Knight rides after the bridge, or she does the same role if the bridge assault fails and she is needed to serve as an additional rallying point in the second siege.

It is a lesser pull than the White Knight, but a band of 5 that works as closely as the Woe do could make the difference, especially if you have the work that Cat has put in for the lesser named to have the holding power amplified (Arthur with the legions, Sapan and Masageo with the mage lines, etc.)

Mental Mouse

> I really want Cat to die again, only for it to gloriously not stick, this time for no particular reason other than "she's Catherine Foundling".

Oh, that would be awesome. Just imagine the looks on people's faces... While Cat's all "well, I guess I am kinda special...".

Liliet

Cat: "I swear I wasn't even trying this time!"

Point

When I read the Augur's words about Vivienne and the Fourth, it felt like a death sentence to me. As if her presence leading the Fourth will result in her death and that will bring Cat's name to finally bloom to decide the battle in favor of the Alliance.

I hope to be wrong, but it gave me that impression.

Liliet

It's one of the dozen possible interpretations 😊

Crash

I spent half this chapter convinced the cause of the whiteout was either Cat's Name(though I still believe it makes most sense for it come at the very end of this book) what with the whole Woe back together again, or, failing that, the Bard making a move, possibly by means of the angel corpse.

But then this conversation came, yeah it's definitely Hanno. Guess he is about to find his pivot. And there's a Squire in the mix for it (Named Arthur! Gods Bellow and everburning, I'm still not over this.)

Either way, we're approaching a climax here, might be we're heading into the final (extended) conflict of this book?

The Queen's own band of five is back together, there is a Dragon in need of conquering that requires a Heroic band of five to match and all the augurs are having mild panic attacks, this should be fun.

Liliet

> all the augurs are having mild panic attacks, this should be fun.

MOOD

Axel Rafael

I'm calling it, if Cat doesn't get her name until the end of this battle, she'll either get a lot deeper into it or get closer to a form of "godhood" (that's going to be inevitably related to her forming Name) 😎

Also, this Chapter sets so many things for the future of the story 🙄

And I missed hanging out with the Woe. Watching them interact with each other reminds me they're still human with Petty flaws and preferences 😊 Love The Guide ♥

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

Watch her become the first God Alongside, of Names and Narrative.

Javvies

Heh. Abigail is successful once more. This time offscreen, so we missed out on the entertainment of her inner thoughts juxtaposed with what those around her see.

Viv being present with the Fourth just makes things indeterminate as opposed to definitive loss? That's definitely going to be rough. Though, of course, we already knew that, and so did they.

If Hanno's not in charge of the bridge Band, then who else does Tariq think could be?

Mirror Knight could maybe be part of the Band as the muscle/tank, but there's no way he could lead it. Both because he lacks the leader skillset, and because nobody would accept him as leader.

Unless the Kingfisher Prince is present and nobody mentioned it, I cannot think of a Heroic Named that could lead a Band of Five on something this high stakes.

ninegardens

See, I would argue, from a story perspective (IE, what Tariq was pushing), the fact that MK has failed so horribly before is precisely why MK should lead it.

mamm0nn

Ah, so that's how everyone dies.

I hope not, Pilgrim would doom us all if he thinks that MK is going to pull through in that regard. He's been quite stubborn about being stupid.

Crash

Which is absolutely the kind of moon logic heroes ascribe to, "those who don't want to lead are best suited to it" bullshit.

This is most likely what Tariq would like. The Squire is also an option in this, potentially the Blessed Apostate and the Apprentice, if he truly wants to make this a learning experience.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Blessed Artificer would be a catastrophically bad pick for leader thanks to her personality. Sending inexperienced Named to lead what is probably the most important Band of 5 of the century looks foolish.

Liliet

The Blessed Artificer is a catastrophically bad pick for an extended independent mission because of the nature of her Name. She's an ARTIFICER. An Artisan. She's a Tinker. She needs materials and a workshop for every trick she can pull later.

Crash

I didn't even mention the Artificer though? I fully agree with both of you. Adana has never met someone she hasn't instantly annoyed or insulted in some way.

I meant the healer that was opposite to the Burned Apostate (?), The boy Cat met early in the book.

Liliet

...Stalwart Apostle. Neither of the halves you mentioned were a part of her Name. You confused Apostle and Apostate, which was Tancred's Name (Scorched Apostate), and has the exact opposite meaning.

So yeah, we assumed at least one had to match who you meant 😊

Crash

I also fucked up the Burned Apostate ,it's actually Scorched. Fuck.

The amount of Names is starting to confuse me lmao

Sorry for the mess!

Konstantin von Karstein

She a bit too young for a mission that sensitive:)

Mental Mouse

"those who don't want to lead" fits Hanno, not Christophe! And no, this is not the time to send in the kids.

Crash

It isn't but Tariq has already implied he believes the Bridge can be used as a way to take whoever goes there stronger through the triumph

Mental Mouse

But like Cat says here, you need to be able to back up your story.

Before the Keter trip, Pilgrim could have said "well, I have more experience"... but that doesn't necessarily apply anymore, what with Cat's stolen Bard power.

dcarter8419

Yes Kingfisher Prince!

Juff

Typo Thread:

cover thighs > cover her thighs there'd it's > it'd had half > had been half wealthy of upbringing (wealthy sort?) you'd seen on > you'd see on soldiers like > soldiers liked shot-term > short-term the augur been > the Augur had been here on > along with my own's > my own
must be them > must have been them they way > the way freshers > fresher
winesink > wineskin
I'd deal it out > I'd dealt it out wilted every > wilted, every accounted for and far (is this right?) like was belabouring > like I was belabouring must evened, > must ne evened, hordes of Evil has > hordes of Evil have

Burlyraven

Okay, I wouldn't even know which chapter to dig into to find out, but wasn't Kingfisher with Hanno? EE seems to have sidelined him after giving him "too much" of a spotlight, but this kind of suicide mission is literally what his Name was crystalized around. He's a leader that's meant to succeed when no one else can, and just leaving him to collect dust on the sideline seems a waste. I'd rather he be properly killed off than forgotten.

Burlyraven

Tack a if nothing else on at the end there. I'd ideally like him to be Cat's retirement plan.

Liliet

Why wouldn't the Kingfisher be at Twilight's Pass?

308924810a

Eh, Rapacious Librarian? We already have a Rapacious Troubledour, they seem kind of overly-similar. Though it could be another case of there being a bunch of Champion variants.

I still think Scheming Librarian or Grasping Librarian, might be better.(also we totally need an Ambitious Advisor, or Sinister Vizier)

Liliet

Forgetful. Forgetful Librarian is the Named who was with Cordelia. This is EE making a mistake most likely.

JJR

It's actually the Forsaken Librarian. One of his aspects makes people forget the first part of his name and substitute a random word though.

=P

Liliet

Her. It's a her.

Black Spiral Dancer

You're just proving his point. Or hers.

Liliet

Theirs.

Gerionar

We have a Name for the sinister vizier, It's Chancellor.

nick012000

Calling it now: it's gonna be the Squire, the Apprentice, the Page, the Young Slayer, and one other young hero mentored by Vivienne are going to go out and become the third generation of the legacy of the Calamities and Woe, facing a trial by fire destroying the bridge.

If Catherine wants weight, then what greater weight than the weight of the legacy she wants to pass onto the future?

Konstantin von Karstein

There's no way. They were speaking of WK, WotW and GP, it's not to send young transitional Named. It's one of (if not the) the most crucial mission in the war so far, and a failure would be the end of the Alliance.

Like Cat said in this very chapter, sometimes you fail, and sending children to attack a target primordial to the DK is bound to fail.

nick012000

They're Heroes. If their doom is certain, that just means that their success is inevitable.

Konstantin von Karstein

I am sure the dozens (if not hundreds) of Heroes killed by Neshamah will be comforted by that thought

Liliet

Yeah, no, sending children at death is not a success story, it's a callousness-becomes-your-downfall story.

Cold Cyberia

I love that Cat sees fate as a set of scales. It fits with the arbitrator/judge theme and she's already got the heraldry for it. I'm a bit worried she'll be blinded in the battle to fit the fair justice trope.

Hard to say what the whiteout will be caused by. Initially I thought it'd be Cat's Name – especially if she's going to fill in the Role of the Choir – but it seems a bit over the top? I'm going to go with Unspecified Bard Plot™. Maybe she manipulates Arthur so that Contrition says hello again? Lots of opportunities for her meddling.

Mental Mouse

> I'm a bit worried she'll be blinded in the battle to fit the fair justice trope.

Or blind oracle.

Sinead

I mean, if she gets blinded, she could use shadow construct for Eyes. Especially if Zombie III comes back as a Nightmare (long odds I know, but I gave it a shot since Zombie III got a lot of attention right around the description of The Summoner's own creations), Cat is right on the Odinn path. Especially if she only loses one eye. Granted, Cat's had vision, but no real oracle ability before now. Granted at the scale she is operating at, it might just be a "trick of perspective"...

Mental Mouse

Also:

> she's already got the heraldry for it.

I noted way back then that her motto cuts both ways...

Sugar Roll

A crucible to help the rise of another gear character? The Squire and the Apprentice fits the bill. My money is on them being sent out.

agumentic

No, they really don't. A young party would work if that bridge was their final goal after a long journey, but they are too close to it as it is, both geographically and temporally. It would be like taking the final exam at the beginning of a school year. If we follow Tariq's logic, what they need is someone already powerful, but in need of a harrowing test to rise above themselves – which really does describe Mirror Knight, as some people above have theorized. Pilgrim can even go with him to fill the role of both a support/healer and mentor, even if that would likely end with his death.

ninegardens

I would argue that Pilgrim can't go with him. In order for it to truly be MK's "coming of age" "Rise above self" test, we need for the mentor to be ABSENT in order for it to work.

It needs to be a "We trust you" moment, not a "Let us hold your hand through this lesson"

agumentic

Well, he can't hold MK's hand at the most pivotal moment, but I think he could participate before that. It's just that the way mentors tend to bow out before pivotal moments is death.

NunoSempere

Refusal of the call, huh.

Black Spiral Dancer

A whiteout... cool name. I like it. Thrilling chapters ahead.

Josh Grim

Finally caught up .

DJ CARTER

Same. What a chapter to get caught up on...

Frivolous

I have to wonder: Will the whiteout be because:

1. There will be too much interference and power for Bestowed like the Augur to see through?
2. Creation itself will shake and shatter during the battle?

So far we're expecting #1, which is a relatively technical issue affecting unusual senses and Named aspects, but it could be #2 that happens, which will affect everyone.

Darkening

Well, with the Gigantes being there being critical and them apparently melting holes in reality, who knows lol.

emperorirritant

My predicted lineup for the bridge mission is: WK as leader, Blessed Artificer to take down the bridge as I feel like she could make some sort of device or tool for the job, I think Forsworn Healer would be a good pick just like Cat said to add some survivability, Silver Huntress for a sniper/specialized killer partly because we have seen and heard that the Revenant Archer is really good at sniping but the actual Archer needs to be with the Woe, and as a final muscle the Valiant Champion could go assuming she's in the city. I could also see the Rogue Sorcerer going on the mission as I think he's probably more pragmatic than the other heroes and just willing to get dirty, he's also super versatile which is always handy

ChillyPepper

Let's see how this would go. Creation wants Hanno to carve a story path that will become a blueprint for future names of his new one. In such an attempt the Witch of the Woods is going to be hurt and/or die in this battle.

It might have something with her trying to do a Gigantess thing she was taught by her 'godly' mentor, and this is why the other Gigantesses are important in keeping things from going downhill after she does I assume?

In her hurt/death she will become a motivation for Hanno to carve this new path.

Although, I do have to wonder if the fourth and Vivienne fit into this narrative as the cushion to the blow going against creation.

Liliet

> In her hurt/death she will become a motivation for Hanno to carve this new path.

I am fairly certain "fridging a female character to motivate a male character" is the one thing we will NOT be seeing played straight in PGTE. Ew.

ChillyPepper

Did not mean it as a male female thing. More as a love interest partner going down, like in Squire, or guilt trip since she is most likely the one he knows best.

Liliet

Considering they are however respectively female and male, I do think EE will not write it like that.

I do not think it's a coincidence that Squire's Dead Backstory Partner was written to be a guy.

Doylist-ly speaking.

hoser2

One way Vivienne becomes necessary is if someone needs to hold things together in Cat's absence. I can see Cat being disabled or going raiding. I prefer raiding, but nobody asked me. Vivienne as proxy leader seems like it will give her some of the experience Cat wants her to have.

hoser2

On further reflection, another unique contribution that Vivienne could make would be to intervene with Akua. IIRC, she was aware of some of the previous mechanisms that Cat implemented to check Akua and there was a recent interlude wherein they interacted. Vivienne could have crucial interactions with Akua (particularly in Cat's absence).

Frivolous

I predict that former Dread Empress Triumphant, probably a Revenant but who knows, will make an appearance at the Battle of Hainaut.

Why? Story-wise, tons of foreshadowing.

More logically, she's one of the few people who has ever proven to be a match for the Gigantes.

Or maybe the causality is reversed. Maybe the Gigantes agreed to help the Alliance because they knew or predicted that their great enemy Triumphant was an ally of Keter.

Triumphant would also explain why the odds are against the GA at Hainaut. I mean, it's Triumphant, may she never return. And now she has.

Trebar

Maybe Vivienne needs to be there because the band going for the bridge ends up being the Woe. I know the claim is it can't be a villain or a mixed band because that messes with Providence, but I could definitely see the story going in that direction. If they want to send the big guns, then the Woe is the biggest gun they've got.

Liliet

Wrong kind of gun. Hakram's an administrator who currently walks on crutches, Masego needs to pull power from others to use it, Catherine's entire Role has been building up around being a leader of nations and armies, Vivienne isn't even NAMED at the moment, Indrani's the only one who matches but at that point you might as well send her solo, she'll do better without having to cover for the others being liabilities.

Chapter 74: Herald

"It is not the grand choices of our lives that determine who we are. It is the small acts of small days, the quiet kindnesses and cruelties, that shape us like a smith's hammer. And when those grand choices come calling we are already formed, already shaped, and we understand that it was never really a choice at all."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

I'd returned to the cheesemonger guildhall with what I believed to be pretty sensible hopes.

By now Adjutant ought to have gotten the first set of wards anchored around the property and the watches set up, so I'd be able to steal a few seats and drag my friends into the solar for our first homecoming in much, much too long. A quiet evening before the storm blew in would do us all some good. Instead as I limped my way down the cobblestone road leading to the hall, cloaked under a veil of Night, I found that the place was swarming with activity. Wagons were being dragged by oxen into the estate, some filled with live chickens and the occasional goat while others were crammed fit to burst with barrels bearing the seal of my army's ale rations.

Soldiers and officers from both armies that'd come to the capital were all over the grounds, seated at tables or on dead grass, talking and drinking and eating their fill. A few pits had been dug and pigs were roasting as well as a few birds, while sergeants stood by open ale barrels and marked tankards with red stripes after filling them – making sure no one emptied a keg on the own, I figured. Magelights had been put up, hanging from ropes crisscrossing the grounds, and braziers had been spread around to beat back the coolness of the night. It looked like a festival, honestly, and pretty rowdy one.

Some fighting circles were already emerging, greenskins and humans brawling under the eager shouts and bets of their fellows, and some mages had set up a pair of tables for an old Wasteland sparring game called achoma – kettleburn, in Lower Miezán. It was a Legion favourite, since all you needed to play it was six small cauldrons and five marbles. Two teams of three mages were trying to shoot the marbles into the cauldrons of the other side, using only low-grade fireball spells to both attack and defend. Anyone whose cauldron got scored on had to take a drink, which meant games tended to end with a need for healing by a still-sober practitioner.

To my amusement, I saw that some boys and girls from the House Insurgent had dragged up tables of their own and were trying to mimic the game using Light tricks instead. Mind you, what drew the crowds wasn't any of those but the unholy melding of my own people's proclivity for open-air plays and puppet shows during fairs and the goblin tradition of takha. A Taghreb word, that, since the Tribes had unsurprisingly never shared their own for it. It meant 'jeer' and stood for the way goblins tended to put on farces making fun of other people's traditions, typically stealing the structure of an already existing play or story and then twisting it into a parody of itself.

Blending my people's tendency for spite and the typical goblin fearlessness in mockery had birthed shows like the one I was currently looking at. They were called trick plays, or sometimes 'Barber and Edward' plays after the two characters that were a recurring motif in every show: the cunning goblin sergeant Barber, whose beauty always caused suitors to swarm after her, and morose young squire Edward, who always ended up winning and then losing a fortune before the end of the show because of his need to settle every slight. The two of them always ended up triumphing over the damned foreigners, usually by getting one of Barber's suitors killed and Edward sacrificing his latest gain to screw over his latest enemy.

And so, surrounded by a drunk and cheering crowd, half a dozen Callowans and goblins were putting up a play on a table that, by the sounds of it, claimed to be a recreation of the Princes' Graveyard. Gods, I really hoped there weren't any Procerans or Levantines around. Trick plays did tend to be harsher on nobles than soldiers, but they weren't kind on anybody. Not even me. In at least one of them, set after the Folly, Barber stumbled onto 'me' having nicked the standards of the Sixth Legion and painting them blue to use them for the Army of Callow, hoping no one would notice.

Which, you know, fair.

"- so we should just cut them!" a goblin wearing a tabard shouted.

Half the audience shouted it with her, as it was apparently a recurrent line, and I realized with a start that she was supposed to be the Saint of Swords. The real laughter came when the 'Saint' turned towards the 'Pilgrim' and found him asleep again, though, having failed to notice Edward stealing his staff with the intention of pawning it off to some Procerans. It uh, wasn't an interpretation of the Graveyard real flattering to anyone who wasn't part of the Army of Callow. There was a swift scene change, with a mage tainting the magelight green instead of blue to signify it, and I was treated to the sight of the Tyrant of Helike – played by a young Liessen girl – duelling one of his own gargoyles as played by a grizzled sapper.

The both of them, I grasped from context, sought Sergeant Barber's hand in marriage. I smothered a laugh, still under my veil. The wretch would actually have gotten a kick out of that, I figured. I lingered long enough for the Tyrant and the gargoyle to defeat each other in a draw and was about to leave when the scene was changed once more and Edward ran into a cloaked shape, dropping the staff and when picking it up accidentally taking up the other person's instead when he scampered off. Wait, that was a patchwork cloak even if the colours were faded. And a staff?

"I swear I've seen this somewhere before," the Black Queen on the stage observed as she looked at the Pilgrim's staff, to the hooting laughter of the crowd.

My character then proceeded to go through an overlarge laundry list of foes real and imagined it could belong to, always with a second line dismissing why it couldn't be them. I couldn't help but smile when it came to the Lone Swordsman and the line went 'alas, 'tis too long a stick to have been the one up his arse'. Meanwhile Edward, on the other side of the stage, lost 'my' staff while in a panic and began deploring his upcoming executions by various methods in between foe couplets declaimed by the Black Queen. It ended with him imploring whatever Gods might be listening to bring the staff back, which a goblin with hands painted black making crow noises seemed about to answer.

On a whim, I drew on Night and wove two shades of darkness into crows. I passed them my staff of yew and let them fly, dropping it on Edward's head. The crowd went utterly silent.

"And don't lose it this time," I sternly spoke through the Night, before unmaking the crows.

Half the actors looked like they weren't sure whether they should be awed or terrified, but the crowd was not so ambivalent: there was a deafening roar of approval, followed by cheering. The play was waylaid for a bit, and with a satisfied smirk I left them to it. I'd send someone to get the staff back later, but there was no harm in it serving as a prop for a bit. Drifting away from the crowd, my attention was caught by a figure at the outskirts of it. Wearing a hooded cloak, it was lingering at the edges and sniffing about as if looking for someone – but never actually looking at people, as far as I could tell. The silhouette was hard to make out under the cloak, but those careful steps I knew well. I extended the Night veil to cover the both of us after hobbling close, which was nit immediately noticed.

"Taking a walk, Vivienne?" I idly asked.

She didn't start, or even look particularly surprised, which kind of took the fun out of it. Bringing down her hood, she shot me a put-upon look.

"I had people waiting for you on the road, but you never showed up," she accused.

I shrugged.

"Got curious," I said, and gestured at the festivities around us. "Your doing, I take it?"

"It's been a long war," Vivienne said. "And it'll get dangerous to cut loose when the dead start arriving."

Fair enough. I wouldn't begrudge my people a night of rejoicing, even if I'd not been the one to order it. With the supply wagons coming in through the Ways, we could afford to bite into our reserves a bit.

"It's a good call," I said. "Maillac's Boot was rough on the Third, and the Fourth has known little but Twilight and battle for a month."

"Hakram described that one as a little more than just rough," she grimaced. "And General Hune dying's a blow. I know you weren't close, but..."

My fingers clenched. It wasn't always about closeness or friendship. If people stuck with you through long hardships, sometimes that alone was enough to be a bond. I'd trusted Hune, even while aware her allegiance was not deep, because I'd known her in ways I now knew the leading figures of the Army of Callow less and less. The circle that'd come up with me through the ranks was dying off.

"If we look back, all there is to find is ghosts," I quietly said. "Forward we go, lest they catch up."

The sounds and lights of the feast reached us through the veil of Night, muted as if belonging to another realm entirely. I sighed.

"I need a drink," I said.

"That I can provide," Vivienne amusedly said. "Brought a crate of Vale summer wine, too."

"You give the best bribes," I praised.

"You're just a cheap date," she snorted, linking her arm with mine. "Even the wakeleaf's not that expensive, for a royal vice."

I smiled, both at the repartee and the subtle way she'd made herself into a support for my bad leg now what that I'd leant out my staff.

"You've seen the treasury, Viv," I drawled, "if I were an expensive drunk, Mercantis would own the country by now."

"I like to think that, as a kingdom, we could afford to help you drown yourself in at least second-rate wines," Vivienne solemnly replied. "That it what it means to be a patriot, Catherine."

My lips quirked. I'd missed this more than I'd realized. Even after we'd settled some of the tensions between us at the Arsenal, there'd not been much time to spend together. And while most of the Woe had been with the army since the campaign began, I'd spent most of my hours in war councils, fighting or scheming – with a lot less of a reprieve for sleeping than was probably healthy. It was Hakram I'd seen the most, and over the last few months that relationship had grown... complicated in ways it'd not been when we were younger. From the corner of my eye I noted we were drawing away from the lights, past the guildhall itself and into the adjoining property.

"So where is it you're taking me?" I asked.

"We made a fire," she easily said. "Indrani found a good place and Hakram gathered everyone."

My steps stuttered. Even leaning against her arm that led to a painful twinge, so I pull Night from the veil to smooth the sensation away as I gathered myself.

"Cat, are you all right?" Vivienne asked.

I nodded jerkily, righting myself up. I couldn't quite grasp why that had blindsided me so much. It was the first night in ages we were all in the same place, it was only natural we'd have a fire. If I'd not been busy speaking the White Knight and the Pilgrim, I would likely have arranged one myself. Maybe that was it, I thought. Had we ever had one of these without my arranging it before? I couldn't recall a single instance. It wasn't like I should feel insulted by this, and I didn't, it was just... I breathed out, somehow gladdened and saddened at the same time.

"You don't usually keep your thoughts to yourself like this," Vivienne said.

She tried to make the tone a teasing one, but it did not seep all the way through. I was smelling smoke and our steps had brought out as the edge of a cove of dead trees and skeletal bushes, so we couldn't be far. I could almost see the fire's light, the shadows it cast against the darkness.

"You ever feel like the world's passing you by?" I quietly asked.

Our steps slowed, and she slid her arm out of mine. Smoke came on the wind, and the distant sound of talk and laughter. I could see the edges of the warm light, licking at the dark we were still cloaked in. It touched the side of Vivienne's face, framing its shape. The dainty nose and heart-shaped chin, the cheeks that had lost some of the hollowness they'd born when she was still the Thief. And those piercing blue-grey eyes, considering me in silence.

"I used to," she said, leaning back against the tree. "After joining the Woe. I didn't know it, at first, because there were always so many things to learn, to do, to see. But it sunk, in eventually."

"Not anymore, though?"

She smiled.

"I figured out what I want to do," Vivienne said. "It was easier, before we met. I didn't need to think, not really – I knew the Lone Swordsman was a hero, so his cause was just. If I fought for that cause then, I would be just as well. There was no need to look further."

"A lot of the things he wanted were good," I softly admitted. "I just didn't think his way of getting them would work."

"That's always the trouble, isn't?" Vivienne ruefully smiled. "The means. Everyone likes the dream, but no one can agree on how to get there."

"Didn't you?" I asked.

She snorted, shook her head.

"I know I want to see our home safe and happy and prosperous," Vivienne said. "And I figured out, before it was too late, that being the Thief wasn't going to help me with any of it. Once I knew who I wasn't, it just... didn't seem to matter as much that I didn't know who I was."

She leaned her head back, against the bark, looking up at the night sky.

"I wasn't going against the current anymore," she murmured. "I wasn't drowning."

Though her lips quirked into a smile, it was mirthless.

"Hakram saved my life, that night where he cut off his hand," Vivienne said. "He shocked me out the nightmare. And every time I felt the urge to go back, to dismiss it, I saw the blood again. The bone and the flesh. And words can lie, Cat, but not those."

We let the silence lie between us for a moment, almost comfortable.

"I don't think I can do this for strangers," I quietly admitted. "Maybe when I was young and it still burned in me, the knowledge that I was right and I was going to fix it... maybe back then it was enough, just the principles. The ideal. But now it's the people that bear me through it, and with every year there's a few less."

My fingers clenched.

"You are bearing me through this," I said, "and it is breaking your backs."

And at the end of the road, what will I find? I did not voice did, did not dare to, but terror coiled in my guts like a snake as the thought came unbidden. A world of strangers, and a graveyard where everyone I ever loved lies sleeping the dreamless sleep. Vivienne learned forward and slowly reached up her hand. I froze, wondering if she was going to cup my cheek, but instead she flicked my nose. I started in surprise and outrage, wrinkling it.

"Don't be so arrogant," Vivienne Dartwick chided me. "Do you think the banner's yours just because you raised it, Catherine?"

My mouth closed. I was taken aback enough to be speechless, for once.

"We've all stayed with you for our own reasons," she said. "For oaths or causes, because we believe in the woman or the dream, because we have our own pride. You don't get to take that from us, Cat. It never belonged to you."

"It'll get you killed," I hoarsely replied.

"There are things worth dying for," she calmly said. "It's not all on your shoulders, Cat."

She looked at the light of the campfire in the distance, the drifting sounds of what seemed to be Indrani loudly singing. I followed her gaze.

"Sometimes other people can light the fire," Vivienne gently told me. "You're not the only one it keeps warm."

She offered up her hand, slowly, and like a lost child I took it. She tugged me along, and as the veil of Night fell I let her take me home.

—

"- you take that back," Robber said, tone deadly serious. "Sallastus? Really, Sallastus?"

Akua Sahelian, somehow making a fallen log look like a sofa to lounge on, cocked an imperious eyebrow.

"His comedies were among the finest Miezan works that remain to us," she replied.

"Oh Gods," Indrani said, grinning like a loon, "you actually sound defensive."

I pulled at my bottle — like most evenings whose bounty was arranged by Archer, it was heavy on bottles but low on cups — and shared a look with Pickler, who was rolling her eyes. It was always unsettling on a goblin face, especially at night when their eyes got somewhat luminous.

"I hate it when they talk theatre," I told my Sapper-General. "I don't know half the names."

"My mother made me read some plays so I wouldn't look like a fool if I participated in a takha," Pickler admitted, "but I always despised the stuff. I might as well have spent the time clipping my nails, at least it'd have improved my life somewhat."

She was drinking from a tankard of dark beer that was about as large as human head, and so a significant chunk of her chest, which someone had painted the side of with a very nice, if threadbare, rendition of a human being set on fire. There were also notches around the rim, which I decided not to think too much about. There were a lot more than I'd anticipated.

"Neither of you have a speck of culture in you," Hakram mourned, seated to my side. "It's sad what this army has come to."

"You read Proceran bodice rippers," I sneered. "I take no commentary on taste from you at all, buddy."

"Gobbler, Hakram, why?" Pickler asked him, sounding genuinely puzzled. "It'd be like reading about mountain goats mating, only with pretensions of sentiment."

"Hey," I objected.

"No, she has a point," Masego noted.

"- Augustina?" Akua hissed, sounding outraged. "Perhaps if you want to hear Aulus Blandus' verses as butchered by a second rate-

A heartbeat passed, eyes moving towards the irritated-looking orc.

"Hierophant's a member of an Ashuran love cult," Hakram revealed, shamelessly betraying a comrade.

"I am?" Masego asked, sounding surprised.

Vivienne coughed, sounding a little embarrassed.

"It is possible as fee was paid in your name so you might be added to the rolls of the Covenant of Gasping Ecstasy," she admitted.

Indrani, leaning her head backwards over Vivienne's shoulder, wiggled her eyebrows.

"All right, you now have my undivided attention," Archer announced. "Continue."

"Tell me you didn't use treasury funds for that," I begged.

There was a beat of silence.

"It was from Indrani's pay, she's still stealing it," Hakram said.

"Hakram, you treacherous whore," Vivienne cursed, as I began laughing convulsively. "I knew it was a mistake to bring you into this."

Indrani, not unexpectedly, was more amused than offended by the fact that Vivienne had continued robbing her for years. It wasn't like she usually touched the coin I had kept in her name, anyways. Masego cleared his throat, cutting through my snickers and Vivienne's continued tongue lashing. Indrani flopped gracelessly over Vivienne, landing on the dark-haired lady's lap and then extending an empty hand – only for Masego to fill it with her bottle without even turning to look.

"Are there obligations attached?" he seriously asked. "I do not want to be a feckless associate."

"He's right," Archer approved. "What did I even pay for? There better be naked parts."

"I don't believe participation in the yearly pleasure festival is mandatory," Vivienne said.

"Are you quite sure?" Indrani hopefully asked.

"The priests have their sermons compiled every few years," Adjutant told Zeze. "I'll try to get you one of the scrolls."

"That is very kind of you," Masego beamed, but then his expression turned shifty. "Though am I to understand that as a trick this is an acceptable specimen?"

"For a human, maybe," Robber said. "Not enough blood."

"I am human," Zeze helpfully reminded him. "Good, then. How might I go about making Adanna of Smyrna a member?"

Indrani, useless as always, began belly laughing and even Vivienne couldn't hide a smirk. Neither of the goblins were inclined to intervene and I'd recently been informed that Hakram was a treacherous whore, so that left either me or Akua. I glanced at her, finding her looking mightily amused and very much disinclined to help.

"Zeze," I said. "That, er, might be misinterpreted."

He looked at me in surprise.

"How?"

"You'd be trying to make her part of a love cult of which you are also part," I slowly said.

Indrani contributed a gestured that, while accurately representing what I was getting at, was very much less than helpful.

"This is why I call you a wench," I told her.

"Ugh," Masego said, wrinkling his nose. "How could anyone make that mistake? She is terrible. And she must know she is, as I frequently tell her so."

Yeah, I had no trouble believing that. The frequent screaming matches were something of a hint.

"I do believe it is possible for Ashuran citizens to become parts of a prestigious ship's crew in an honorary manner," Akua idly said. "On occasion even ships that have sunk. Perhaps that might make a more fitting present, Hierophant."

"Oh," Masego muttered, "it would be as if I were telling her to go to the bottom of the sea. That is clever."

He actually seemed pretty enthusiastic at the prospect of trying to get one over the Blessed Artificer, which was kind of heartwarming in a very Praesi way. The conversation drifted towards some of the more elaborate slights we'd seen dealt out over the years, something Robber was quite interested in arguing with the rest of us, and Vivienne eventually got tired of Archer being sprawled over her so she pushed her to the ground. Pickler had moved to sit on the other side of Hakram to discuss something about a fellow War College student I'd never known who'd recently gotten promoted back in Praes, so Vivienne slid into the spot by my side with a bottle of her own in hand. I offered up mine and we toasted, drinking down.

"I'm surprised we're all here," I said afterwards, eyes flicking on the other side of the fire.

Akua was telling a story about some ancestor of hers who'd drowned a Stygian slaver in melted slave chains, to the vocal approval of some around our circle.

"It's out of my hands," Vivienne murmured. "And I have made my peace with it."

I hid my surprise. Forgiveness was not something either of us would ever offer over the Doom of Liesse, so I was not sure of her meaning. She must have sensed my uncertainty.

"I don't deal in absolution," she said. "Not for me, not for you, and certainly not for her. The Folly must and will have an answer. But it's not for me to decide what it will be."

She half-smiled at me.

"You've trusted me with a lot, Catherine," Vivienne said. "And it's not a tie that goes only one way. I trust you with this – I believe you'll see justice done, in the end, or something like it."

"I have you an oath, once," I quietly said.

"I relieve you of it," she said, without a speck of hesitation.

I went still with surprise, which had her smiling.

"What good would it to, for me to demand her suffering?" Vivienne murmured. "Would it unmake the tears of a single orphan, mend a single inch of blighted land? Liesse was lost, and all who dwelled within it, but I'll not chase vengeance of healing."

"I have not forgotten the Doom," I said.

"I don't expect you will," she said. "It lingers in your dreams more than mine. Worry not of me, Catherine, when you see to this. I would be quite the fool, to need twice to learn the lesson that no amount of taking can ever set things right."

I wasn't quite sure what to answer to that. It felt like getting her blessing, somehow, but also like she was... washing her hands of it. As if it no longer concerned her. Troubled and yet dimly relieved, I sunk back into the warmth of the conversation instead. It was not long before my bottle was empty and the smile back on my face, the ebb and flow of conversation with old friends filling me whole. The hours passed, long into the night, and most of us stayed around the fire instead of returning to the guildhall. Indrani had brought blankets, and though Robber disappeared into the dark it was only after tucking in a very drunk Pickler affectionately. I drifted into sleep easily, but woke while it was still dark. There were still hours left until dawn, Sve Noc's first gift told me.

I tried to stay under the blankets, by the dying embers of the fire, but I got restless. Taking care not to wake anyone I snuck away, finding my staff propped up against a tree not far. I couldn't remember if I'd actually asked Hakram to see to that, but I suspected that even if I had not the dead yew would have turned up on its own. It was not an artefact, not exactly, but it was not a simple staff either. With the moon hung in the sky above us and a cool wind beginning to blow, I found my steps leading me to the guildhall. Not to find a bed, no, but to seek another old friend: the roof. It was flat atop, easy to tread, and easier still to limp to the edge.

I could not see the great valley that'd be spread out below around the plateau, but I could fix it in my mind's eye. I breathed out and learned forward, as if tempting the fall. The streak of ice, that fear I would never entirely master, came as bidden. Like an old friend. Not the only one, though friend was not the right word for her.

"Do you still have the dream?" Akua softly asked.

I'd not heard her come, but I had known it. We were bound, she and I, had been since I ripped her heart out of her chest and stole her soul. Though she was next to me, I did not turn.

"Yes," I murmured. "Though I came here, I think, because I am curious."

"Of what?"

"If you stand at the edge of the cliff a hundred times, or a hundred times that," I said. "Does the fear ever go away?"

I felt her gaze on me.

"Does it?" Akua asked.

I half-smiled.

"I don't know yet," I said. "Maybe it's something that can be taught, with time and will. Maybe it's just nature, Akua, and the best we can ever do is put a bridle on it and hope it doesn't pull too hard."

"Then why do you keep coming here, dearest?"

"Because I don't know the answer," I said, and turned to meet her eyes.

Lovely in the gloom, as she was lovely everywhere. And I felt it my clenching stomach, the fear of the drop, but it did not rule me. Not tonight. So I reached out, slowly, and as her gaze widened in surprise as I cupped her cheek. It was not a loud thing, or one requiring much power. Just will and knowledge. My fingers withdrew, having barely grazed her skin, and she went still.

"What have you done?" Akua Sahelian asked.

"I no longer have power over you," I said. "You are bound to neither my mantle or my power, and Sve Noc has no purchase over your soul save what you give them."

"You are mad," she faintly said. "I could leave, right now. Even without Night, I know such tricks that..."

"I know," I agreed.

"Then why?" she hissed.

"Because I don't know the answer," I said and turned away, closing my eyes.

For a long time I stayed there, the wind in my hair, and let silence keep the night. When I opened them, Akua was still at my side. I almost smiled. Wasn't that something?

In the valley below, far from my sight, the dead began to gather.

tithin

I can't say I saw this outcome.

Sir Nil

It's inevitable. If Cat's trying the Redemption thing on Akua then Cat has to make it be of her own will. A Redemption isn't worth shit if someone else forced you to do it.

Cayle

Contrition more than redemption I think

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. Wrong flavor. Contrition basically accepts that nothing can undo what you did and that change is meaningless. You should try to do something to make up for what you have been, but you are what you've been. The point of this whole thing, at least the point up till now, was to make Akua actually change and grow. I think given a contrition attitude about it just wouldn't take. "Nothing can undo the evil that I've done and am... so why would I be anything else?"

agumentic

"Nothing will change what you are and what you've done" is a lesson Cat specifically made a point to teach Akua by using heroes as proxies.

Liliet

What you've done, no. What you are, yes.

And Contrition in this universe is about taking up a sword to go kill what made you do what you did that you're now hating yourself for. It's not about trying to quietly change yourself into someone who does good about an entirely unrelated issue.

agumentic

I won't really argue that Akua is going to go for Contrition or anything – for one, I am not convinced she will – but, in Cat's own words, "if (Akua) saved ten lives for every one she'd taken, she would still be the same woman who'd murdered an entire city". It doesn't mean she can't be something else as well, but it's not going to change what she already is.

Liliet

'what she is' and 'who she is' are different questions here

Cpt. Obvious

The “revenge” Cat is shaping is Akua growing into a person who realizes what she missed in the way of friends and love as she grew up. How she was robbed of a childhood, and how she spread that taint through her actions. Once she realize, and understand, how much suffering she has caused and truly regrets it then Akua’s suffering really starts. And the only one torturing her will be Akua herself.

Now what she’ll do then is hard to tell. Fleeing by terminating her own existence would be the cowards way, and whatever she is, coward isn’t it.

I doubt it could lead to redemption. Conscience or not, she’s not likely to suddenly turn to the light. If she did Contrition are the only ones I could see being interested in taking her in.

I find it more likely that she will do something big that claims her life and use her final wish to ensure that it succeed.

It’s either that or she takes up some task needed to anchor the Liesse accords (and I can’t spell worth shit) even though it ends up binding her.

Whatever happens Cat are counting on the result being that Akua is going to end up paying the long price and be perfectly aware that she’s doing it to herself.

Vin

Hopefully this won’t happen result in the dead king exerting power over her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. He’s probably going to kill her though, at least indirectly.

onedollargum

It’s more likely to be the opposite, I think. If Cat was able to relinquish and unbind control so easily, the Dead King would probably have also been able to do so, or maybe even wrest ownership for his own goals. Now that Akua is free she should be able to better defend both herself and Cat.

Sethur

From a story perspective, I think this will push and/or free Akua to do something that will decide the battle for Cat’s army. Vivienne told Cat that everything will go to shit if she does not go to her before the battle. And Vivienne was the only person who could have pushed Cat to alter the relationship with Akua in this way. This was the pivot that the oracles saw by process of elimination. Cat needed a free Akua to win this battle and Vivienne was the only person who could convince her to set the Doom of Liesse free.

Cicero

That makes sense.

Also, this is a heroic tale. Viv is a retired hero who convinced Cat (the heroic piece stolen by the Black Knight to become a villain) to play a heroic role once more. Freeing another villain (a most villainous villain), which then leads to...

Redemption of a villain? To becoming a hero instead?

What kind of repercussions will that have for the new world being built? In which heroes and villains interact and not always in hostility?

miles

Redemption = death. If Cat wants to redeem herself it has to be through metastory shenanigans

Shveiran

Redemption equals death only if we give death a very open description: it can mean the end of your life, sure, but it can also mean a more complex and less literal death of the self.

if a character changes so radically it no longer fit its former mind frame, you can argue that it did "die": everything he was has ended. Something new simply took its place and kept breathing through the same lungs.

Redemption has to be a radical change. But even when the Pilgrim did it to Cat, she muses that death was the most LIKELY outcome, but the only certainty was that she would no longer be the Villanous Queen of Callow. Which likely was Tariq's point.

Frivolous

Ah. I wonder how much of this can be attributed to Catherine's association with Kairos Theodosian.

From Interlude: A Hundred Battles:

====

"Truth of truths, my friend," he chortled, "I already gave you the only answer to that question worthy of being spoken."

A Rochelant, when they had first begun this dance of theirs.

"That's the entire point," she softly quoted, "finding out."

====

The quote is not the same, but the sentiment is. That's the entire point: Finding out.

Soronel Haetir

Wow, somehow Akua continues to tread the path of fatal redemption. And even Vivian will be moved when that curtain falls.

marillius

I doubt that's the story being played out. Fatal Redemption is the easy way out. Practical Guide to Evil never does things the easy way. She is an immortal shade like spirit with countless lives on her shoulders being given a heart. My prediction is that she will not die. She will never die. She will live forever, never quite doing enough to make up for what was done. Not when she has saved as many souls as she has claimed, nor tens times that number.

KageLupus

My money is still on Akua becoming an eternal part of Cat's new school for Named. An immortal presence who is canny enough to keep all of the intrigue the school will generate in check, while also being committed to seeing Cat's ideals get passed on. How do you atone for something as terrible as the Doom of Liesse? Spend forever making sure it can never happen again.

Michael Hawkes

Hold on a minute. Is Akua going to sacrifice herself to end the Bard by replacing her!?

Hitogami

Wow, that is one scary punishment and it could be accurate, but I still think that something will happen to cause her to die. A death she has to volunteer for.

Insanenoodlyguy

She might have the narrative weight that it's unavoidable though. Generally anybody at her tier going for redemption has to pay for it in blood. I don't think Cat's actively trying to push her into it anymore, but that just means she'll walk into it herself. Black Avoids the stories, Cat wields stories, but Akua has always ridden them hard when she gets on one, both good and evil. Even when fully evil she had a very fatalistic viewpoint: She essentially said "I'm going to do this until I inevitably die violently like all others who have walked this path, and that's the game and I'm fine with it, I'm playing." I'm not saying she'll become a death seeker, but she's got a good chance of being right where somebody can do massive good with an ultimate sacrifice at a critical moment. I think if she doesn't walk off that cliff at the end, it's because Cat actively gets involved in squelching that story, which vow lifted or not might be asking too much.

Cicero

Auka volunteers for the bridge job? Fully expecting it to result in her death?

The Mirror Knight gets tapped for the bridge job (because he volunteers for it?) and the Witch does not want go, so Auka volunteers?

Or the Squire or the Apprentice end up going (maybe the White Knight decides that it has to be all volunteers, because of the danger – and the heroic story being better served that way?) and then Auka volunteers, and promises Cat her charges will come back alive?

There are a lot of ways for Auka to go wild playing the heroic role hard. Something she never had a real choice for growing up. Auka being the villain that always secretly wanted to be a hero? I could see that.

Liliet

Auka was a villain who played a heroic role for her homeland in her head.

Liliet

> She might have the narrative weight that it's unavoidable though. Generally anybody at her tier going for redemption has to pay for it in blood.

Not even Cat thought that when she thought Tariq was trying to assassinate her.

No, they don't have to. It's just a common writer copout.

Daniel E

I just want to mention that The Guide has absolutely taken the easy way out, the one time it actually mattered. Killing my favorite horse 🐾

Miles

Ah yes of course. The purebred Liessan Charger gifted to the de facto ruler of the League of Free Cities. Truly a noble steed.

Frivolous

Also from Kairos Theodosian, although not something he experienced or likely shared with Catherine.

From Villainous Interlude: Thunder:

====

"I think what he wanted was to see if a lion was still a lion, having lived in a cage all its life," he confided. "I think he just... wanted to see what would happen."

Nature tells, my friend. Nature always tells.

The boy's grinned widened, long and sharp and pearly white.

"I wonder what your nature is, Hierarch."

====

Cat set Akua free, at least a little, from the cage of her upbringing and conditioning, the cage Akua herself tried to escape by becoming Diabolist and defeating her mother, Tasia.

Now she sets Akua loose completely and waits for her to act, now that she has free will for the first time in her existence, if not her life. Though, knowing Catherine, she has contingencies in place anyway.

I wouldn't put it past Cat to, for instance, ask Tariq or Sve Noc for help.

Liliet

I think Cat will have contingencies to minimize damage from worst case scenarios, but they won't be Akua-specific – that's an insult, and a wrong way for this story to go. No, everything that'd make the fall softer if this goes south will be coincidental to it, and serve another purpose as a primary one.

I love every single word of this chapter so fucking much, especially Cat fucking with the play. And Vivienne trying to get a wider perspective of what she's doing through her thick skull (I don't think it's quite all the way through yet, she's just taking Vivienne's word for it, or we'd have rephrasings in the narrative in her own voice). And Masego having a wonderful, friendly feud.

Oh yeah, and Vivienne finally relieving Cat of that oath. That'd been a long time coming ♥

RoflCat

No, she won't have contingencies. Or rather, she can't, if she has any it'd not only make this gesture pointless, it might even have the opposite effect.

If she still have something over her, then it's just changing the cage, not a true release.

Liliet

^^^ this

Frivolous

You could be right, Liliet and RoflCat.

I think one example in your collective favor was Malicia's use of Rule-empowered Speaking to plant subliminal commands in her officers, as a contingency in case her loyal Black Knight Amadeus betrayed her. He did, which made Malicia's initial betrayal a good idea.

Do you think it's a Story rule in Creation that if one plans for a friend betraying you, those plans must inevitably become useful?

That would be a really nasty rule, requiring blind trust in your friends, though it does seem a likely corollary in a universe where the Power of Friendship exists, i.e. if you plan for your friends to betray you, the Power of Friendship is retroactively null and invalid.

Mental Mouse

> Do you think it's a Story rule in Creation that if one plans for a friend betraying you, those plans must inevitably become useful?

I'm pretty sure that would be a Heroes-only rule. For Villains, "[blind] trust is the wager that takes your life".

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: Heroes only? But how often do villains employ the Power of Friendship in the first place?

In other words, the trust your friends rule might be invalid in the case of (most) villains because they don't have friends they really trust in the first place.

In other news: I've begun prefacing each Reply with the handle of the person I'm replying to, because it can get confusing and hard to discern otherwise.

Mental Mouse

Frivolous: Yeah, but that's how story-grooves work. The Calamities were unprecedented, and the Woe took that even farther. Cat also plays hero stories, but heroes don't normally have to worry about other heroes betraying them.

I think the Woe are breaking new ground story-wise.

And yeah, the WordPress comments are staggering under the conversations here.

Hitogami

Mouse, I suspect there haven't really been enough villain cases of blind trust to start that as a story groove, I support the idea that having specific measures against her is just a means of widening the cage she is in as opposed to setting her free. She has to be free to go or stay and to help or hinder for it to be true freedom; and for whatever story Cat is making it must be true freedom, remember that Cats revenge is to make Shua go willingly to her own doom, just that we don't know what that doom is going to be

Mental Mouse

> Mouse, I suspect there haven't really been enough villain cases of blind trust to start that as a story groove

Oh, there's plenty of cases in our own literature – consider the classic “villain's beautiful daughter betrays him”, or various guards and other underlings that shouldn't have been taken for granted.

But yeah, in this case, Cat is playing a deeper game – “trust in their nature”, but Cat has heavily investigated and reshaped Akua's “nature” Even without magical constraints, Cat has swept up Akua into a story that Cat carefully laid out for her..

shikkarasu

I think it's an extension of Chekhov's gun. If the trap is set then, in the third act, it must be set off. It doesn't need to work, but we have to see it try.

sivarajan

I vaguely recall the Calamities having contingencies in place to kill each other. Would that count as planning for betrayal?

Frivolous

sivarajan: More like in case a fellow Calamity went crazy or got corrupted by a demon.

At least that's what Masego said to Catherine that one time she apologized for giving him an amulet triggered to explode his head off in case he really was corrupted by that demon.

I don't judge that to be true betrayal. That's in the spirit of friendship, not against it.

Malicia's subliminal commands in case Amadeus went rogue are different, though.

Liliet

Those were contingencies they deliberately gave to one another, so it's kind of the exact opposite.

jamesc9

Liliet: Cat didn't talk to Masego before giving him the hair ornament.

Liliet

True, I was talking about the Calamities!

The story with Masego was much more amazing and high drama than that. She did actually talk to him, she just didn't tell him what he was doing, but she did talk to him to try and assuage her worries, which didn't happen XD

Anyway, the point with that one was that she might not have told him, but Masego KNEW from the start and accepted it willingly. That's a verrry different story from Malicia violating Black's trust behind his back with him none the wiser and confident she wouldn't do something like that.

Liliet

*didn't tell him what SHE was doing. jeez wordpress let me edit

Liliet

Malicia didn't just make a contingency for Amadeus's betrayal, she factually did that by betraying him first. The commands did long-term damage.

Shveiran

Are you talking about the commands seeded into the minds of the Legions? Because if so, I don't really agree. I mean, granted, it was not nice by any stretch of the word, but at the end of the day they were the main military force within her empire and they were clearly more loyal to someone else and only served her as a consequence.

Even if we don't consider Praes' history of betrayals, it's not really strange that she sought a way to ensure they would obey her commands at a critical juncture, even if Amadeus told them not to or if, say, Amadeus died and someone else brought them under their banner.

Again, it wasn't nice, but nice doesn't always cut it. If the Iron Prince or Cordelia had the capacity, I can't say for sure they wouldn't have done the same just in case of a rainy day.

Liliet

There could be all sorts of ways to ensure that, that weren't seeded mind control commands doing long term damage to the subconscious of people Amadeus personally cares about?

(Let's remember Juniper is the daughter of Ingrid, one of his old and close friends)

You're not wrong that it's not surprising. It's the opposite that's surprising: the concept that they could have worked together for so long WITHOUT turning on each other.

Mental Mouse

That said, Cat's still the Black Queen, with the Woe at her back. If Akua gets too far out of line, she can be extinguished. But Akua has already come too far to turn back to Wasteland ways....

Akua's bonds now are... the same bonds of relationship and care that everyone else wears.

shikkarasu

"Then fear me, drow, for I wield the power of friendship."
-Akua Sahelian, activating Catherine's Trap Card

Florian Hötzl

Agreed.

And dang, this was a beautiful chapter.

TeK

It seems I am a honorary member of a ship that sunk a long time ago, but now had unexpectedly re-emerged.

caoimhinh

Just make sure to pay the fee of membership to Commodore Liliet.
She commands all ships in these waters.

BlackPhoenix7777

How much for lifetime membership?

Liliet

Lifetime devotion.

To the cause of Not All Relationships Are Sexual Or Romantic
On One Or Both Sides.

Not much, right?

BlackPhoenix7777

I'll take it.

Liliet

ṽ h ' n * é ' ^ - ~ π c = ' o / \ ṽ * , , ḡ / a = ' ḡ ḡ c

BlackPhoenix7777

Kinda feel like I made a deal with Sve Noc here... Nah, it's probably just my imagination.

ATRDCI

Somewhere in nonexistence, Tikoloshe is proud his son wants to be a member in good standing of a sex cult.

magesbe

Can I just say that this chapter's quote is fantastic and really covers some of the chapter's major underlying themes. How powerful a simple night around a fire with close friends is. And even more about Akua. Once Akua was freed, whether to stay or leave seems like a grand, life changing choice.

But it's not. Akua made her decision as far back as Great Strix, and she's continued to make it again and again. In the end when it came time to leave or stay, it wasn't a choice at all.

Liliet

It's a life-changing choice, but what if you don't want to change your life? 😊

Mental Mouse

"Staying the course" is also a choice.

Liliet

It definitely iSSS : D : D : D

Insanenoodlyguy

I disagree. It may well be true that the choice was already made, but narrativm makes this a pivot. This is her grand, life changing choice moment, even if it's easy. There's a few ways this could have gone and Akua started on a particular path.

Liliet

Sometimes, pivots ARE about choices that aren't really choices at all.

BlackPhoenix7777

Agreed. Come to think of it, the chapter quote reminds me of a Mercedes Lackey song. Time for a relisten. Also we need to find or bribe someone to give voice to the PGtE songs.

dadycoool

Wow, this was a very nice deep breath before the plunge. A festival, a bonfire, a sleepover, and a relationship development that we don't understand yet. It's nice to rest for an evening once in a while.

Liliet

Don't we? Don't we really? 😊

Unless you're talking about Masego and Adanna, because I want to see them on-screen together right now very very much.

dadycool

Eh, I've never been great at reading deeply into subtext etc. so things like Akua's continued presence has subtleties that I completely miss until someone points them out. I'd never last in an aristocracy.

Liliet

...doooo you want a link to reddit character analyses of Akua?
9u9

dadycool

ooh, sure!

Liliet

It is my hope that if I link it like this it will not blow up and take up half the comment section. Sometimes I do that on purpose but now is not one of those times. Anyway this one's fuck-off old

This one's newer!

I think two links should be able to go through without moderation pause, if I'm wrong you'll find out by it not being posted an hour after you asked!

Liliet

(my comment is awaiting moderation bc two links is too many apparently)

Liliet

(it's up now!)

Necarion

Not quite a Beach Episode, but I'll accept "Cat Fucks with the Ember Island Players" as an appropriate substitute.

Big I

I'm probably in the minority here but I'm expecting Akua to repay her freedom with betrayal.

ninegardens

I'm expecting her to repay freedom with loyalty... then betrayal.... and then sudden, unexpected redemption.

Insanenoodlyguy

It will be loyal betrayal. Cat's gonna have like, a "My sacrifice will clench this for everybody" moment, and that's when Akua blasts her with her new name trick or something to take her place, possibly making some brief but epic monologue about how she just stole all the glory of this moment.

TideofKhatanga

Akua buying time for the White Knight's party by standing alone at the almost finished superbridge, which will from then be known as Gjallerbru.

Mental Mouse

Kinda like Pilgrim did in Liesse III?

Liliet

Yo, respect for making clear claims :3

We'll just have to see, won't we?

Juff

Typo Thread:

pretty rowdy > a pretty rowdy tainting (should this be tinting) nit immediately > not immediately
That it what > That is what pull Night > pulled Night speaking the > speaking to the had brought out as > had brought us out to did not voice did, > did not voice it, Sallastus?Really, (missing space) as human > as a human as fee was > a fee was a gestured > a gesture have you an oath > gave you an oath would it to, > would it do, vengeance of healing > vengeance or healing and as her gaze > and her gaze

mamm0nn

"I'd send someone to get the staff back later, but there was no harm in it serving as a prop for a bit."

Meanwhile on stage

No, really! I can't move it! The damn thing is immobile! The goblin screeches as he puts his entire weight behind trying to move the standing upright staff without avail, much to the amusement of the crowd thinking this is a goblin size joke.

Mental Mouse

> No, really! I can't move it!

And then the Edward character stumbles into it, and it falls over with perfect comedic timing.

Sinead

I just like the idea of the staff enjoying itself and messing around on it's own will.

Of course, letting it spend it's evening among trick plays may give it a sense of humour...

(Long shot I know, but I like the idea of continuing that empathetic back talk Cat got when trying to disguise herself as the Wicked Enchanter to a full on sense of humour.

Just so that Cat can get back talked by a stick.)

BlackPhoenix7777

Huh. I think this is the first time my hopes for this ship went upwards without plummeting immediately after.

Burlyraven

Of course there's a magical beer pong. Damnit, I want to play.

And did Cat just resurrect Akua in truth? I think that's the only way she could have really been set free, but that's a terrifying power for a Villain to have, even with qualifiers. I've been calling Cat developing into a Great Old Power in her later years for a while now, but that might just be the most concrete evidence in support of that concept.

Matthew Wells

I think Akua's probably a greater undead of some sort now. We know those can retain a soul and be unbound, e.g. Dread Emperor Revenant, Barrow Lord, First Llesse Cat...

Matthew Wells

Come to think of it, all of those were Named. Akua's probably eligible for a new Name now.

agumentic

Technically, Akua never really died – her soul never left the mortal coil.

WuseMajor

I feel like this is a very important point. One of the main things we know about the undead is that they can't fundamentally change. While they can accumulate knowledge, they can't learn. They can age, but they can't grow.

If Akua is actually becoming a better person, if she's actually changing, she's not undead. She's something...else.

Nicholas Guyett

I think you finally helped me address this niggling question mark in my brain about how there were these repeated hints about Cat's necromancy being weird and her raised undead developing intelligence and personality that necromancy doesn't usually give.

It's been a chekov's gun that's been unshot since book 1 and it was driving me batty.

Konstantin von Karstein

Since book 3. It was the fae undead who could learn.

caoimhinh

Her heart got ripped out of her chest, and her body burned to ash. So, yes, she died.

Admittedly, that body didn't have her soul, as she had ripped it out of her own body by the time she was 13.

She wasn't "dead" because there was still a connection between her body and soul.

But after the destruction of her body, and the prevention of the ritual which would have let her possess a baby (that was Akua's countermeasure for her death), by stealing her phylactery and tying it to Cat's Mantle of Woe then we can very well say that Akua really died.

agumentic

I guess it depends on what exactly you can call "Died". I would say that since her soul never left for other realms or dispersed, she never died, she just changed bodies. What is the difference between flesh and Mantle of Woe, in the end?

Matthew Wells

Well, blood, for a start.

Liliet

I think she didn't resurrect her technically speaking per se. I am boldly claiming Akua still won't need to eat / will be able to turn intangible at will / probably won't be able to bear a child, for example. Akua is not currently a human.

But, uh, functionally speaking...

Sinead

Hmmm, I wonder if Cat has one more "oddity" as far as bringing about new varieties of beings into Creation to put in play.

We have Akua, Larat and the Wild Hunt, and I wonder if we'll see a third one.

Thinking about what The Wild Hunt represents in our mythos, is Akua going to have a similar fate to Jack O'Lantern?

Panda

Your pen game is immaculate. I'm thankful you chose to share your vision.

mavant

Man, I really thought they were gonna kiss for a minute there.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat and Akua or Cat and Viv? I was thinking both (to clarify, I don't think Viv would be changing preferences or anything but rather that a single kiss might happen, it did seem like this was going to be punctuated with one of those for a moment there.)

Liliet

I swear Catherine and Vivienne were blatantly flirting there for a moment.

RubberBandMan

It only took six books for Cat to have the queer girl experience of 'are they flirting with me, or just being friendly?' and have it 'being friendly' for once. Except that one time with Killian it's typically been 'yes, it's flirting, even though it's an enemy'.

And of course Cat does the cheek-touch to Akua that was denied to her from Vivi. No symbolism here, themes are for nerds....

Liliet

Akua vs that cheek touch: <https://media.oglaaf.com/comic/trapmaster.jpg>

Zee

I made the following connection: Viv came to Hainaut because the Augur said the front will fall in a year if she didn't. This chap, Viv said to Cat she is no longer pushing for Akua's punishment. Then Cat releases Akua. Therefore, Akua's role in Hainaut will have a significant influence on how this campaign develops, mainly in the battle to come.

Mental Mouse

Vivienne has also knocked a bit more sense into Cat, perhaps keeping her from doing something stupidly self-important and self-sacrificing.

Or maybe the Dead King tries stealing the Cloak of Woe, only to find that it doesn't actually give him control over Akua anymore....

Regardless, the party chapter becomes a potential plot pivot for the climactic battle against the Dead King... All hail EE!

Frivolous

Zee: That makes sense, yes. A free Akua would have more agency. Her future would look very different to a precognitive compared to that of a bound Akua.

Maybe Akua has tactics or knowledge she managed to keep secret from Catherine, or that Catherine never bothered to ask about, that could be useful in the coming battle.

Earl of Purple

Aah, Masego. If Cat hadn't let you out of the trap you walked into, Adanna would have been quite embarrassed. She would have seen the subtext, and possibly enjoyed membership, but I don't think she knows Zeze well enough to know he didn't see it.

Necarion

Earl: I'm pretty sure the made-up subtext would have encouraged Indrani to make a public "I shall fight you for the affections of the Hierophant" declaration to Adanna, much to her utter mortification and amusement of literally everybody else on all sides, Heroic and Villainous.

Liliet

And Masego's utter confusion.

Kini

I don't think words can say how significant this is. Nor just how far these two have come since they first met.

Akua is the Rival, the whetstone that honed Cat into the wicked blade she is today. And here she is now, freed of all burdens and obligations, but as she is now she is one of the Woe. Indelibly, and irreplaceable.

The beauty of this all, is that Cat made Akua want to be better, not by threat, not by guile, not even really by example, but by giving her somewhere to belong

Sesostris

Am I the only seeing some foreboding with Cat tossing her staff into a play about object switcheroos? Either narratively because she's a Villain, or more pragmatically because the Dead King has a hidden revenant in the city who lays in a nasty surprise on the staff that'll bite her at the worst possible time during battle.

Sinead

In short, I think that is worrying overmuch. It is just to be a bit of light hearted amusement that bolsters morale and Cat's own story amongst her subjects. Please stop looking for hidden daggers in everything. That's why Malicia is so isolated. In this story, putting in the actual work pays off.

The staff is not some overpowering relic, it's just a useful staff that helps Cat when she needs it. She doesn't put any serious demands/ expectations on it, so it cannot fail her. As such, there is little value in such a switch. While the staff has mystical origins and is a symbol of Cat, much like the Mantle of Woe, Cat doesn't use these items for anything that any other high quality version of those items would not also do. Even when there are surprises, they are all meaningfully telegraphed in the story.

Also, this deep into GA territory, I don't think Revenants could meaningfully hide for long.

In general, I wish people would stop panicking over these little details. I think EE has earned enough faith after 6 books to not pull stunts like this. The Night of Knives was a direct and brutal response to Cat's attempt to assassinate Malicia. It wasn't some "surprise contingency". The mental hooks in the Legions was known of when Malicia executed Akua's mother, and were a contingency in place against Amadeus, not Catherine.

Mental Mouse

Also, the staff itself would probably object to tampering.
Remember, it didn't even like when Cat put a glamour on it.

Frivolous

Lesser comments:

Priests of House Insurgent using Light to play a game while intoxicated and especially to gamble sounds heretical to me. Does anyone else agree? It sounds like that 'perverse service to earthly powers' thing.

"So we should just cut them!" being what is always said by the Saint character in the play is sadly faithful to the original. Laurence basically always did want to cut someone.

Cat using Night to create a fake Sve Noc seems horribly heretical, too. She was basically using powers granted by her goddess to pretend to be said goddess.

Though I guess it could be explained, if Andronike got pissy over the lese deity, that anyone who got fooled deserved what Cat did to them. The drow are a raiding and theft culture after all, and deception is likely a strong theme.

Covenant of Gasping Ecstasy is a good name for a conspiracy. Gaping Ecstasy would also be good.

Liliet

> Priests of House Insurgent using Light to play a game while intoxicated and especially to gamble sounds heretical to me. Does anyone else agree? It sounds like that 'perverse service to earthly powers' thing.

They're decidedly not... serving a power, in doing that. Arguably, they're creating problems for earthly powers instead, which is in fact quite virtuous by the mirror of that logic!

> Cat using Night to create a fake Sve Noc seems horribly heretical, too. She was basically using powers granted by her goddess to pretend to be said goddess.

I think it was obvious enough it was Cat fucking around in a theatrical context it doesn't really work like that.

Mental Mouse

Also, Cat's move both flabbergasted the players and got major cheers from the crowd, which would probably both amuse and gratify the goddesses.

Liliet

e x a c t l y

Sinead

I love the idea that “trick plays” make it to the Drow, since they already have rap battles, so twisted mirror plays that mock the opponents could also fit some form of drow humour.

(At least I want Rumena’s reaction to trick plays.)

Some Smartass

>Priests of House Insurgent using Light to play a game while intoxicated and especially to gamble sounds heretical to me. Does anyone else agree? It sounds like that ‘perverse service to earthly powers’ thing.

No, just frivolous. And it could be part of Above’s plan for all we know, perhaps by showing more people than just Tariq that the limitations of Light are mostly imposed by the wielder.

>Cat using Night to create a fake Sve Noc seems horribly heretical, too. She was basically using powers granted by her goddess to pretend to be said goddess.

They’re demonstrably willing to rebuke her for anything they don’t like no matter how petty, and did not do so.

Mental Mouse

It’s pretty well established that normally, summoning Light is basically a magical ability, once granted a priest or Named can use it freely according to whatever their usual rules are. The only exception we’ve seen, was an occasion where Pilgrim’s Choir was Right There Watching, and eager to make a point.

Liliet

Yes, but why would they not like this?

Liliet

...ignore my previous comment, i got a brain fart and didnt finish the sentence

Insanenoodlyguy

Some of the army has already began adapting crow iconography, and Sve Noc has allowed this. It’s not hard to view it from a lens of “observing these troops making a small performance effigy to Sve Noc, the Priestess then granted them a small vision of the true goddess power, eliciting shock and awe.”

Admittedly, if they actually made a caricature of the Goddesses themselves it might be different, but I feel like their take on the play itself would be “Yes, this is both amusing and accurate. There is no other God closer than us to answer entreaties, and frequently we have to compensate for your inadequacies and get things done while you contemplate pointless things.

Sinead

Also, isn't one of Cat's goals with her Role as First Under Night to teach them to emphasise with people to avoid becoming faded and unchanging monsters a la Nemashah and the Wandering Bard? I would think at this point, they could appreciate the humour, even if Andronike may be a bit more clinical about it. I could totally see Komea being genuinely amused by this though.

Cicero

I think a more likely outcome with Sve Noc is that they get curious about Cat involving them in the play, and then they start taking an interest in the play themselves. To the point where they start answering small request in the plays – making Sve Noc goddesses of the theater.

Liliet

Goddesses of death and theatre is a fantastic dual domain.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's the divine portfolios of Vidiuus, from TGaB, 😊

Liliet

how could i forget ♥

Florian Hötzl

Which, heck, I really need to start reading again.

That God seemed less of a bastard than most, but then I wasn't even halfway through...

Also agreed on it bei g a great mix.

Sinead

Sve Noc, the Goddessess of Death, Strife, Competition, Excellence, and Ambition.

They are twinned because while they are united, they debate and argue over issues, refining the positions down to something more flexible.

One represents the focus of the "Here and Now", favouring reckless abandon, and jumping into the fray, while the other is more cool and methodical, aiming for precise methods to thier own goals. Dedication to the long process for the final pay-off.

Why wouldn't they become patrons of the Arts?

(I am now picturing crow versions of the classic Greek comedy and tragedy masks)

In case you haven't noticed, I am kind of a big fan of Sve Noc

Sinead

Here's a fun thought: If Tariq decides to criticise Cat for this choice with Akua, she could counter with "Empty Prayers birth no miracles."

Not saying that the scene won't happen, but considering how much Tariq asks people to take things on faith (with good reasons, yes, but it's still faith), it would be a fun little callback in my opinion.

Liliet

I was wondering about that scenario, and I think Tariq understands INTRISTICALLY what Cat is doing. We've had a scene of him interacting with Akua, and it notably played into Cat's plan exactly – because Tariq's instincts go in the exact direction that Cat's driving this. He's not going to have objections, I don't think. It's a trick from his book in the first place.

Sinead

That is a fair point. I am more thinking of the perspective of the discussion of trust, but Tariq does have that understanding of the path one needs to take to get someone to change.

Xinci

I do wonder if Cats oath affected her thinking. Oaths seem to act as bindings on souls, and bindings seem to affect the ability to think, amongst other things. So it could have been pushing her down a specific path of behavior to complete her oath and curtailing other paths of thought.

Seems Cats is drifting inevitably from her “home” framework of Callow, which is a good sign for her shifting Name at least.

Liliet

Oaths don’t have effects on souls unless you’re a fae or unless it’s a special magical soul-binding oath.

They do have an effect on the mind through the mechanism of you knowing you gave an oath, though, which has this exact same result functionally.

superkeaton

I appreciate that Cat’s flaw of being determined to own sins that aren’t her own keeps coming up, and reinforces why she needs the Woe. That little bit at the end was lovely.

sengachi

“I don’t think I can do this for strangers,” I quietly admitted. “Maybe when I was young and it still burned in me, the knowledge that I was right and I was going to fix it... maybe back then it was enough, just the principles. The ideal. But now it’s the people that bear me through it, and with every year there’s a few less.”

That hit really hard. Damn.

agumentic

It’s both funny and very sad that Cat is like what, 25? Even less than that? She is still young by any measure of years. But then she did spend most of the last decade on the battlefields leaving friends and supporters behind, that will age anyone far more than simple time.

sengachi

Oh jeez that hurts. She’s my age, but she’s been so damn aged by all of this.

Liliet

She’s 23 or 22, depending on if you trust erratic or the manual timeline calculations.

sengachi

I posted this and the following section in a discord server I’m in and just like that finished convincing 3 people to finally pick up PGtE and read it. 😊

Goibnu

What better punishment for a selfish monster than to get her to willingly sacrifice herself for friends she never knew she could make. To make her human and look back at all the horrors she has committed and truly regret them deep in her soul cat really is a cruel one

308924810a

Booo, hisss.

Still kiind of pissed off at Akua and how it seems like this is just making it more difficult to punish her for the mess around Liesse. A bunch of deaths which still hasn't been proportionately answered for.

I can sort of imagine a 'she's doing this to redeem Akua and make her want things she knows she doesn't deserve, and thus make her punish herself'-type situation. But any failing there will lead to akua escaping and making another giant mess, so she really needs some amazing countermeasures prepared for the betrayal.

There's also the whole issue around how Cat and Akua never really stopped being rivals in conflict over the fate of the Dread Empire, Cat just refuses to see it.

I mean, does Cat seriously imagine that miss Praesi noble pride isn't going to do something about it when the man who killed her father starts slaughtering his way through the nobility in a bid to annihilate their entire culture?

This decision is a lead-in to Cat and Akua's inevitable third major conflict.

308924810a

And then there's the problem of what happens if she succeeds too far and Akua ends up as a Heroic Named trying to sign on to the Truce and Terms? There's essentially no way to spin such a situation that doesn't become a pain in Cat's ass.

kini

that's...kind of the point though?

it's been pointed out repeatedly that Akua can never truly atone for what she did, that the scales will never be truly balanced.

This all began with Akua trying on the idea of being "good" while she was in control during the Battle of the Camps, mainly because it was fun, and then over time Cat realizing that this was the better path forward, the longest price she could possibly extract from Akua: redemption. Not as a destination, but as the process it truly is. Like I said above, Cat managed to make Akua want to be better through the simple expedient of showing her what the rewards were.

And even beyond that, this redemption will not work if it is not done fully and freely of Akua's own choice. It's a gamble that isn't, the answer was known long ago.

Because yes, Cat does, in fact, actually trust Akua at this point, and honestly, I don't understand why you don't.

308924810a

I don't trust her because she learned the wrong lessons from her parents, and as far as I can tell isn't unlearning them by working with the Woe.

When she was sent into the maze to kill her friend as a child she learned that any act, any suppression of personal feelings is justified if it is for the glory of evil. And as she rose through the nobility she learned that the loser follows the winner until they can become the winner.

You'd think her whole 'iron might sharpen iron, but iron is brittle' revelation might change her, and it does, as does her observation that victory can come without having to reign supreme and be in control and that by accepting that you can avoid having to fight in the first place, but by necessity these things cannot change her need to come into conflict with Catherine.

Not so long as she loves her people, the praesi nobility, who Cat would rather see wiped away, nor so long as she hates Black, who Catherine loves, nor so long as Cat and Akua's story conflict within Narrative Causality over whose legacy of the nature of evil that will come to shape the Dread Empire remains unresolved.

So maybe Akua does want to uphold fidelity in her relationship with Catherine and the Woe, but for that desire to become reality it needs to first overcome her impulse that she needs to seek greatness, and the lesson that setting aside whatever impulses are ancillary to greatness in evil is always justified.

And even then, she can feel comfortable in betraying Catherine so long as she encounters a situation where she can believe Catherine has betrayed her first, of which there are several surrounding Black, the lords of Praes, and Catherine's own followers.

Liliet

> Not so long as she loves her people, the praesi nobility

She really, really, really doesn't. They've killed everyone she ever cared about, be it directly or through teaching HER to put them in danger.

kini

Also: Akua never truly hated Black. He was, at most, an irritating roadblock to her ascension.

Don't get me wrong, Akua always thought that Black was wrong, and despaired of the culling of the old ways, but it was never personal. And now, most of a decade down the line, Akua has come to realize that she was wrong.

And it's not as though Akua was ever any great patriot of the Truebloods in the first place. Remember how she was planning to throw off that yoke too once she had her flying fortress?

So yes, this has been a long time in the making, and there was never any other choice Akua could have made. Not any more.

Sinead

Is she "Praesi Pride?" She seems pretty scornful of Karois, wjlho is basically the last harrah of the Irritant/Traitorous style Evil, when before she embraced them.

I don't think there is going to be a conflict, since I see her following her great uncle's path and leaving Praes behind.

Liliet

I want it so badly to come up that Adanna is her cousin and that Akua kind of low key would have liked to be her.

Sinead

I know, as soon as Adanna was introduced, I thought, "I want Akua's reaction to her."

Sinead

Also, if my long shot of Akua being taken up by the Choir of Compassion is correct, there could be some mirroring involved, especially since my understanding is that Adanna's original foil was supposed to be Diabolist, not Hierophant, though she despises both Roles of those people.

Another penny weight I'll put on the scale is the fact that every Calernian faction mentioned in the story does show up in some form or another (the gnomes may not show up, but the Red Letter in my opinion count), and I think of all named Choirs, Compassion is the only one we have yet to hear from.

Besides, if Akua is moved by the harm she has done and seeks to atone, the bind of Compassion (no harm to sentient creatures) could be taken to an extreme of cause no deaths up to and including animal and plant life.

I know this counters my earlier post about Akua mimicking the tale of the jack O'Lantern, but you may still have the wandering sinner trope, especially since she will have turned away from Below while not really being in a position to be embraced by Above.

Liliet

> I mean, does Cat seriously imagine that miss Praesi noble pride isn't going to do something about it when the man who killed her father starts slaughtering his way through the nobility in a bid to annihilate their entire culture?

She's going to cheer him from the sidelines or wade in and help.

Akua's been hurt by that culture more than most, and during Book 4 we've established that her thoughts on the topic have been going towards "no yeah that WAS wrong all along".

Openendings

Akua has accrued a narrative weight bigger than Liesse at this point: like Kairos, she can pass, if you squint right, as the Last Great Villain of the Age of Wonders. It's not necessarily her true Role – while alive she was more of an Age of Wonders cover band (Malicia-funded, too) than an encore tour – but as the constant angel on Cat's shoulder singing praises of the old ways, she seems to qualify as "symbol of an era" more than any other villain, uh, alive. (Amadeus/Malicia are transitional, Neshamah is in a whole other category, etc.)

So insofar as the shoe fits, and the Age of Wonders is "dying" with each treaty Cat brokers, Akua's long price is going to be one hell of a pivot. For Akua, pretty much being the fulcrum on which centuries' worth of narrative weight is about to get yeeted...

...that might get heavy.

So, uh, very looking forward to seeing what happens. And kind of rooting for her to get a fate exactly as bad as a hundred thousand deaths and no worse.

Daniel E

Just want to say that I very much love the visual concept of yeeting several centuries worth of narrative.

Liliet

yessssss

Black Spiral Dancer

By the title I thought her Name would finally start to manifest...

Storm

hmmmm, reminds me of the Warlock and his husband's final moments

Chapter 75: Desolation

"My dear Chancellor, I am most disappointed in you. If she escapes the crocodiles before the rope snaps, then of course she will go free. What does it matter, that she will oppose us again? Only the fearful insist on winning every game of shatranj they play."

– Dread Emperor Malevolent I, the Unhallowed

I didn't know which part should rightfully be considered the miracle: that we'd managed to cram this many Named into one hall, or that a brawl had yet to ensue.

"Some among us call them the Scourges," the White Knight said.

The tone had been calm, unhurried, but the words alone were enough to kill every whisper in the ruined basilica where we'd gathered. There were nearly thirty Named were here – twenty-seven, if you counted my own coalescing claim – but Hanno had the undivided attention of every last one. Revenants were never pleasant surprises on the battlefield, but most people here had run into one of the Scourges at some point. Some had walked away with scars or dead friends, and even those who'd gotten lucky to be spared either now knew better than to believe the Dead King was without champions of his own.

"That is not without meaning," Hanno of Arwad said. "You all understand, as few ever do, that names have power. That they bind us to Creation and bind it in return."

The dead had not been kind to the Basilica of Perceval Martyred. Neshamah had made sure that no holy grounds remained in the capital after taking it, and it would take long before the priests were able to consecrate this place again. The defilement had been... thorough. Dust, soot and ash now painted once-pale walls, and there was hardly a single pane of tainted glass that'd not been shattered. An entire hunk of wall had been ripped out to the side, reduced to rubble, and the front gates were unusable from the bell tower that'd been smashed down against them. Even the ceiling had not been spared, some kind of great horn piercing at it, and so sunlight came down in dusty rays on the tall terrace where the White Knight stood.

Below the rest of our Named were gathered in small gaggles in gangs, keeping to circles of their owns even within the greater allegiance to Above or Below – however loose it might be – and seated on the same ornate stone benches where the mighty and wealthy of the city of Hainaut had once sat to be lectured by priests now long dead. I stood above on the terrace as well, leaning against a sloping arch with my staff of dead yew resting against my shoulder, but I liked the coolness of the shade better. I'd looked like a right idiot if I had to pull down my hood because the sun was getting in my eyes, and I could only be amazed by the way that the White Knight could stand in a sunbeam and apparently not mind in the slightest.

Truly, his powers were beyond the reckoning of mere mortal such as myself. Hanno glanced at me, either smelling out the sarcasm or to indicate I should pick up where he'd left off. We'd not planned this out in great detail, but it was true in a way I had more experience with this part than he did. I pushed off from the arch, limping to the edge of the terrace.

"Naming them gave them weight," I said. "Part of that was in your minds, holding up as something to be dreaded or fought, but what truly matters is the weight it gave them on Creation. A Revenant belonging to their number is no longer simply one of the Dead King's stolen corpses, it is now a Scourge."

I let the word ripple out, enjoying the way it reverberated in the hall even now that there was a gaping hole in the wall. Say what you would about Alamans, they knew how to build temples.

"That story will be as wind in their sail," I said. "They'll be harder to destroy because of it, a little luckier and a little sharper. More than that, they'll find it easier to kill you."

No one argued with what I'd said but I found some faces growing blank or, for the less practiced, outright skeptical. Mostly on the heroic side, as my lot rarely needed much convincing that the world was out to get them, but the Berserker and the Headhunter stood out in their almost-derision. Irritated, I struck at the stone with my staff once and let the clap jolt half of them.

"Don't be fools," I said, tone grown sharp. "You think you survive falling off cliffs and make it through blood-curling curses because you're just that good? As Named we are not only subject to the common rules of Creation, but those of our kind as well. Sometimes that is a shield, but if you act like a strutting boy it will bury you."

I swept the crowd with a look and this time found a more receptive audience. Good. I wasn't going to tolerate our losing Named just because the world had not yet gotten around to beating some measure of humility into their bones.

"If we raise the Scourges above our other foes, as we have, then Creation will follow," I said. "And the least of the ways they'll be raised is in the way that all those little fortunate turns, all those coincidences in your favours? They're gone. 'The Scourges can kill Named'. That is the very bedrock of the story we made about them."

I flicked a glance at Hanno, who took back the torch, and retreated back to my more comfortable nook as he stepped into the light again.

"Yet we can kill them as well," the White Knight calmly said. "Names, Bestowals, Choosings – however you would call what we are, it is a nature that thrives when overcoming adversity. All that the Scourges represent is an adversity to overcome."

I almost cursed, since that kind of 'life is a trial we are destined to win' attitude being reinforced by the fucking Sword of Judgement was the last thing we needed before this scrap, but I was pleasantly surprised after a moment.

"Make no mistake," Hanno continued, "the Black Queen did not misspeak. Fail to heed her warnings not only at your own peril but at that of everyone here, and millions more across Calernia. Yet in raising our opposition higher, we have also given ourselves deeds to strive for."

He smiled, face serene.

"Great foes are overcome," the White Knight told them. "That is the shape of such stories."

Well, that or you died. I could see how that wouldn't be the greatest speech to give on the eve of battle, though, so I'd let it slide. I stayed back and let him keep at it a while longer. We'd already tended to the few complaints under the Terms there'd been, which for once hadn't mostly been backbiting between his folk and mine. My armies hadn't been the only one to enjoy a night of drinking and festivities, after the Fourth arrived, and in the drunken celebration that'd ensued a great deal of... indecorous behaviour had ensued. It was worth hearing them out just for the petty pleasure I'd felt at Hanno making the Page admit that the 'desecration of his affairs' he was talking about was some drunk Volignac trooper taking a piss on his saddlebags. The mood had been pretty lighthearted, even through the inevitable amount of sniping that ensued when Named were forced to sit in the same hall, but moving on to the meat of the reason we were here had doused that. Revenants were rarely a laughing matter, and the Scourges never.

"- by joining the combat and eyesight reports, we have determined which of them are likely to be participate in the coming battle for Hainaut," Hanno said, then paused. "Our thanks to the Adjutant for this work, as it was him who saw to the work and found signs of the Tumult having operated on the outskirts of Prince Klaus' column."

There were some murmurs of appreciation, several grudging, and stone silence from others. I drummed my fingers against the side of my staff, committing those faces to memory. One of them had me sneering: like I'd needed more of a reason to dislike the Valiant Champion.

"So how many are we in for?" Roland asked.

"Eight," the White Knight calmly said.

Yeah, that did little to raise spirits. Each of those Revenants were dangerous on their own, but several became significantly worse when they were paired with proper allies – the Hawk and the Mantle in particular. The Berserker let out a low whistle and grinned.

"Eight out of ten," she said. "Keter really wants us dead, looks like."

"Eight out of nine," I corrected, pushing off the arch. "The Firstborn got the Stitcher up north."

That was well received. The Tumult was more of a danger, practically speaking, but the Stitcher's tendency to turn up in a dragon's worth of animated dead bodies was more of a horror to behold than the Tumult's own preference for tossing storms at soldiers.

"The Seelie is missing," the White Knight said, "but we believe her to out east, leading the assault against Princess Rozala Malanza. Every other known Scourge has been encountered by one of our columns as they advanced, and they should all be within marching of when we believe the battle in Hainaut will happen."

I smiled, beginning to methodically stuff my dragonbone pipe with a packet of wakeleaf.

"So now we talk about the pleasant end of the business," I idly said. "Namely, how we're going to destroy them all."

Even coming from the – former, thank you Cordelia – Arch-heretic of the East, that won some cheers both sides of the gallery. Hanno picked up the thread as I passed my palm over the bowl, lighting the leaf with a small flicker of flame, and I breathed in the smoke with a small pleased sigh.

"We have some knowledge of the abilities of all eight, and will speak of them in order," the White Knight said. "Beginning with the Wolfhound."

There was a beat of silence, then I cleared my throat.

"Hierophant," I prompted.

Masego started, as if surprised. My eyes narrowed and I threaded small tendrils of shadows along the arches going up the ceiling. He'd not had an open book in hand, no, but looking at it from above... that sneaky little shit. Three rows back there was an open book in Mthethwa, which I was pretty sure he'd been turning the pages of discreetly with wrested magic. He'd been using the clairvoyance of the glass eyes to look through the back his own head and the rest of the things in the way, reading without even giving a visible hint. I gave him a look making it clear we'd be having words about this later even as Indrani, seated at his side, snickered in amusement at his expense. She did deign to tell him whose likeness had been asked for, at least, and Zeze had an illusion of the Wolfhound up in the blink of an eye.

It was pretty obvious why the Revenant had earned that sobriquet: a sculpted helmet of iron in the shape of that animals head had been its signature since its first appearance, though he also seemed to prefer using a sword a board when it had the choice. Armoured from head to toe, the Wolfhound's face had never been seen, though he'd spoken with Named on occasion.

"Most of you will have encountered the Wolfhound at some point," Hanno said. "He is, by our reckoning, the Scourge with the fewest deaths – Named or not – to his name. That is because he is rarely out alone."

"He's a bodyguard," I bluntly said. "And one of the better Revenants when it comes at taking a blow. He seems able to see through illusions and able to partly shrug off aspects. As I understand it, the Mirror Knight experience this firsthand."

Christophe the Pavanie, seated near the back of the heroic side and with only Tariq sharing his bench, looked surprised to have been called on.

"I did," he replied. "We've clashed... six times, now? One of my aspects allows me to reflect the blows of my enemies, to turn them back, but it did not affect him the way it should have. The strength was weakened before it touched him."

"It has been the same with magic," the White Knight added. "He is not immune to spells, but they do seem to weaken when turned on him."

"Weaknesses?" Roland called out.

"We haven't found any," I admitted. "He doesn't seem to have any great offensive talents, but when it comes to the defensive he doesn't seem to have any great flaw. It's why we usually see him partnered with another Scourge, they're expected to be handling that aspect."

"The Twilight Ways would destroy him," the Grey Pilgrim said.

I nodded.

"They would," Hanno agreed. "For those of you who are able to open gates, it is a valid tactic. Still, as with all Revenants I would warn you of mobility – even the slow are quicker than they seem, and they appear to be able to feel the forming of a gate into Twilight."

Which did make an unfortunate amount of sense. Creation liked balance: the Ways were deadly to Revenants, so the Revenants could smell them out. I would have appreciated the Gods suspending that rule until the lives of everyone on Calernia were no longer on the line, but deities did tend to be inconsiderate shits. Except for my own splendid and flawless patronesses, of course. I felt Andronike's unamused touch brush against my mind, the divine equivalent of a half-hearted glare.

"We do have some other talents we believe would go through his defences," I said. "Among them, the Rapacious Bard is capable of affecting souls. That should ignore the protection."

"Overwhelming physical strength works as well," Hanno said, a tad drily.

Between the Berserker, the Champion and the Mirror Knight we had that covered.

"The partner is usually the trouble," the Barrow Sword pointed out. "Whoever runs into him needs to expect a hard knifing."

"Colourfully put," Hanno said, "but essentially true. So far we have seen him paired with the Hawk-"

I saw the Mirror Knight wince, as if still hurting, and Archer smile unpleasantly. She'd not liked that the Hawk had gotten to escape from their duel in the slightest.

"- the Mantle and the Varlet," Hanno finished. "We should not dismiss other possibilities, but Keter does tend to favour certain sets of tactics."

I pulled at my pipe, blowing smoke upwards. The White Knight was right. It was, I suspected, because Neshamah was undead. He couldn't really learn anymore, even when infusing himself with the knowledge of his latest acquisitions. So instead he let his Revenants find approaches that work and then used his wits to make openings for that knife instead – a skill he'd mastered while still alive.

"We burned two aspects of the Varlet's at Maillac's Boot," I announced. "So I won't count them out, but they're got a lot less of a bite now."

"It's the sneaking aspect that's left," Indrani said. "So watch for daggers in the back, it's what it has left."

It was a spirited decision that ensued, moving through one Scourge after another. The Hawk, deadly at range and harbouring an aspect we believed gave her the simple ability to 'kill'. It was why her arrows, even though often made up of mundane material, could wound even someone like the Mirror Knight: there was nothing that she could not, in principle, kill. She was weak up close, though, and tended to leg it when Named closed range. The Drake, though very difficult to kill by most villainous means, fared poorly against Light and Tariq had teased out of him at Maillac's Boot what we believed to be his last survival trick. The Mantle shared the weakness against Light, at least great quantities of it, but was capable of hamstringing practitioners the same way she did me.

The Tumult – or Archmage, as heroes insisted – was a spellcaster on par with both Masego and the Witch of the Woods, meaning if we didn't want casualties to start shooting up the moment it showed up we needed to field either against it immediately. Its fondness for using storms and weather meant most of our fighters struggled to close range. Indrani couldn't do shit to him even using See to aim. The Axeman, as they called the Pale Knight, hadn't been encountered frequently save by those who'd served in the Cleves front. While he was just as frustratingly hard to scratch for everyone as I'd found him, the Headhunter pointed out that the way he'd always avoided the Myrmidon and the Red Knight in fights meant he must have some weakness to his armour. The Mirror Knight noted he seemed to often serve as leader among not only Revenants but the lesser dead, a tactician as much as champion. There was little to say on the Varlet, save that not even our finest wards seemed entirely capable of stopping its sneaking about, which left us with only one left.

The Prince of Bones.

"Light can make a dent," Hanno said. "Though only so much."

His stance had loosened over the length of the conversation, first going from calm to easy and then all the way to him sitting at the edge of the terrasse. I was, myself, leaning against a half-broken stone pulpit and pulling at my second packet of wakeleaf.

"He can close Twilight Gate, if they are still forming," the Witch of the Woods flatly said.

I cocked a brow. She'd not taken off her painted clay mask, but I gathered that under it she was frowning.

"Mine as well," the Pilgrim agreed. "Though not quickly, and it can be fought."

"Sorcery doesn't work either," the Harrowed Witch volunteered. "Mine, anyways. I can dent if I put my full strength into the spell, but think we'd have to strip him layer by layer to get anywhere."

I didn't see an obvious solution to the Prince of Bones either, to be honest. The illusion of him Masego was providing made it clear why: we were dealing with, essentially a corpse encased in what had to be a few hundred pounds of steel. It looked like armour, but it wasn't. Just layers upon layers of metal, moved by the necromancy buried safely deep within. Worse, that steel was layered with enchantments and whatever devilries the Dead King could muster. Running away wasn't usually an issue, the Prince was slow on the move, but when you couldn't run? Even the Pilgrim hadn't been able to put him down, and the man had a Choir whispering tricks in his ear.

"The Firstborn tell me it's essentially the same with Night," I offered up, having never fought him myself. "And he usually sticks with the Grey Legion, so he won't be easy to pick off."

"We just need to crush him head on," the Berserker insisted.

"Crush what, solid steel?" the Barrow Sword mocked. "No, what we need is the right blade."

A few looks were flicked the Mirror Knight's way. The Severance hadn't been a secret since the incident at the Arsenal.

"We mean to use it for the Dead King alone," the White Knight said, "lest he find a way to overcome its edge."

"If it comes to that, we've been able to bury him before," I said. "The Witch of the Woods has done it. It's not a killing stroke, but we can keep him out of our hair long enough for enough Named to gather something will stick."

It wasn't the most confidence-instilling of suggestions, but at the moment it might genuinely be the best we got. And, to be honest, if we could deal with the Grey Legion for good the Prince would be much less of a threat. I pointed out as much, which Tariq backed to the hilt.

"Alone he is a slow, lumbering monster," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Much of his power comes from his legion – the Hashmallim believe some of his Bestowal is invested in his soldiers, and that they in turn empower him."

"If it comes to that," I finally said, "I'll authorize the last of our goblinfire to be used."

That cheered some but other less. Not only because the green flames were notoriously prone to spreading out of control but also, I realized in a startling moment, because some of the people here believed the Prince would actually survive the fires. Most of them had never encountered the substance, I reminded myself, but I still found myself shaken by the skepticism. The conversation stretched out for another hour, mostly when Named were willing to share particular talents that made them well-fitted to fighting one of the Scourges, but eventually we called the council at an end. I kept Ishaq back, as the Barrow Sword had essentially been confirmed as my lieutenant among villains when I kept bringing him to war councils, while Hanno was instead accompanied by the Pilgrim.

"Some bands seem like natural fits," the White Knight said.

"Agreed," I grunted. "Troubadour, Summoner and Guardian?"

The Silent Guardian had signed that she believed she'd be able to handle the Wolfhound, due to an aspect of hers, so the Summoner for mobility and the Troubadour for the killing stroke were the obvious additions.

"Either Huntress or Sidonia with them," Hanno replied, nodding in assent.

"Huntress," I said. "I know for a fact she's not only competent at range but trained herself in tactics against archers."

By which I really meant Archer, but it'd work against the Hawk as well and she could imbue her arrows with Light so that'd be trouble for Mantle too.

"The Young Slayer with them," Tariq suggested.

I cocked a brow, but Ishaq was stroking his beard in agreement.

"As a spotter and a skirmisher both, the boy has talent," the Barrow Sword said. "If you desire the Huntress to be one of the strikers, then you need a replacement."

I glanced at Hanno, who after a moment nodded.

"Sold," I said. "Mirror Knight for the Prince of Bones?"

"There's no one else who would be able to take a hit from him," the White Knight replied. "Who to pair him with is the issue. I would argue against a full band here."

The Barrow Sword, I saw, was watching us both like a starving hound being shown into a larder. Why? After a moment I realized that even as I thought the question, Ishaq had asked it out loud.

"Because Hanno doesn't think we can kill the Prince of Bones," I said, "which means investing a full band there would be a waste. A partner, though, is pretty much a precaution to keep the Mirror Knight alive."

"I do not understand what makes him different from the Wolfhound," the Barrow Sword slowly said, "save perhaps greater strength."

"The Prince of Bones is a hammer," Tariq calmly said. "We can dull the blow, but it will fall. The Wolfhound, and whoever will accompany him, are blades we can break."

"It's going to go the usual," I explained. "You know, the beats – we win, we lose, we win again. Only with Wolfhound and partner, like Tariq said we have a good change of rolling those two Scourges up outright. Kill them clean. We don't have that with the Prince. Instead we use those beats to pull out the Mirror Knight when this goes south on him, and we just need a partner for that. Not a full band."

The Barrow Sword looked at us, smiling in glee and yet somehow almost frightened.

"Is it always like this?" Ishaq asked. "Battles between Bestowed. Like... shatranj for the mad, with half the rules unknown and the rest shifting?"

I cocked my head to the side. In my experience?

"Yeah, pretty much," I shrugged.

I turned when the heroes chuckled, met with almost fond looks.

"The Black Queen has sharpened herself against exceptional opponents," the Pilgrim said. "I have known few Bestowed, either by Above or Below, whose knack for stratagems was stronger."

The Barrow Sword had the gall to look kind of relieved, the shit.

"If this practice is to be considered an art," the White Knight said, "in all humility you might be considered to stand before some of its finest living practitioners."

Compared to the Intercessor we were all rather lacking, but then I supposed that was rather his point. I cleared my throat.

"I was thinking Stalwart Apostle," I said. "I'm told she's worked with him before, and though she's hardly a veteran-"

"I must disagree," Hanno said.

"Indeed," the Pilgrim said. "Christophe is a remarkably enduring young man, but the foe is not one to underestimate. The Forsworn Healer would be a more appropriate partner."

"That leaves you as our primary healer, Tariq," I said. "Which is a fucking waste, considering your striking power."

"More lives will be saved by your hand red than pale, Peregrine," the Barrow Sword said.

There was a challenge in the tone, but Tariq seemed disinclined to address it.

"We can revisit," the White Knight said, correctly ascertaining I wasn't convinced. "For the Axeman – the Pale Knight, if you insist, though we seem to have a profusion of knighthoods these days – the Headhunter and Vagrant Spear seem like our finest foot forward."

I mulled that. The Headhunter knew their way around fighting the Pale Knight, and Sidonia had a knack for killing things she shouldn't be able to. Neither were good at taking hits though.

"Needs muscle," I said. "Berserker?"

"I had thought to leave them a pair," Hanno admitted. "If we use bands to go aggressively after the weaker elements at first..."

"That's a recipe for bodies on the floor," I grunted. "Two pair against two of the Dead King's heavies? We're losing at least one of those for sure."

"The Hierophant against the Archmage seems a match all can agree on, at least," Tariq stepped in.

I inclined my head to the side.

"I was considering going after them with the full Woe, actually," I said.

"Not Lady Dartwick, surely?" the Pilgrim asked.

"No," I said, "we'd need muscle instead. I have candidates."

One was by my side, but the downside to taking Ishaq was that he was a natural captain: he'd be a lot more useful as the head of a band of five. That left two other options, each hard to swallow for different reasons. The Valiant Champion was honestly probably the finest shield left, with both the Guardian and the Mirror Knight already assigned. I just happened to despise her. And the other was, well, the Squire. Between Arthur and Indrani we'd be able to hold a line up close if we had to, while Zeze and I could slug it out with the likes of the Archmage without missing a step. The issue, though, was that Arthur Foundling himself might be a threat to our lives. His story was not one that seemed all that friendly to the continued survival of the Woe.

"I would agree in principle," Hanno slowly said. "The Archmage is the Scourge I would like dealt with soonest."

It was all haggling after that, were I began to discern different strategies. Ishaq was fresh to this sort of planning so he tended to fall back to the Levantine conception of a band of five, the same that'd founded the Dominion itself: Champion, Slayer, Binder, Brigand and Pilgrim. Which wasn't a bad instinct, in most circumstances, but he needed to wean himself off it. When facing the unknown balance was useful, but when planning the destruction of a known quantity it was better to tailor the band to the foe. Tariq, on the other hand, was coming at it from another angle entirely: he was setting things up to keep Named alive. Not because the old man was a soft touch, although when he could afford to be he was, but because in the Pilgrim's experience if heroes fought an enemy for long enough they won.

I wasn't going to argue with that too much, but there were risks to that kind of thinking. Both sides of the fence were playing here, and I'd proved at the Battle of the Camps that some calibre of foe time wasn't enough to overcome. Yet theirs, were in away, the old conventions of Named warfare. Hanno and I had been raised by our teachers to approach those fights differently. The difference between us, I began to notice, was that he seemed much more inclined to take risks. I chalked it up to the habit of having providence on his side, at first, but eventually I was forced to concede otherwise. I was just used to planning from the starting position that I was going to lose something before it was all over, while the White Knight had known the kind of full-throated victories that'd been so rare in my career. He'd known them pretty regularly, too, with the defeats at Black's hands being pretty severe departures from the norm. We settled what we could for today, agreed to speak again tomorrow and broke off.

Except he didn't leave and neither did I, because I'd noticed something and he'd not tried very hard to hide it.

"Witch of the Woods," I said. "Valiant Champion. Stalwart Apostle, and last of all the Merry Balladeer."

Names he'd been careful never to let drawn into an assignment, along with his own. A pretty neat band of five, though the Apostle was young and Hells if I knew what he wanted out of the Balladeer. No Named was every truly without strength, but as far as I knew she was a bardic Named without any standout talents.

"I did not mean to hide it," Hanno said. "It was simply not a discussion I wanted to have with company."

My brow raised, as did my wariness. I'd already sworn oath to Tariq that I'd not meddle with how the White Knight overcame his doubts, and that meant not letting myself be drawn into too pivotal a conversation.

"It's a band of five," I acknowledged. "I'm simply not sure what you mean to do with it."

North, to end the threat of the bridge that was still looming tall in the distance? Or to lead them here in the city, a blade against the Scourges. Hanno chuckled, though the days where the sound would have carried that undertone of serene amusement seemed pass. Whatever certainties it'd been that'd lain at the heart of the calm, they had been shaken. Shit, I thought, Tariq's right. I'd still half-believed, deep down, that the old man had been exaggerating. Not so much, looking at the unease on the White Knight's face now.

"I was not so certain myself, when I woke up this morning," Hanno said. "But it is going north, Catherine. It must be the north."

I slowly nodded. It was what I'd wanted, only now getting it was making my fingers twitchy. Unsure if a mistake had been made or not.

"The bridge at Thibault's Wager must be broken," I finally said, choosing my words.

"How carefully you speak around me, these days," the White Knight wanly smiled.

I did not answer. I knew a dead end when I saw one.

"I do not know," Hanno finally said, "how much good I can truly do here in Hainaut. You are a capable leader and tactician, seasoned in leading Named."

"Your departure would be a loss," I honestly said. "And not just because of your skills in combat. But I still believe it to be a necessary one."

"I imagine you do," the White Knight said, "though that is not what moves me to go."

He looked up at the ceiling, where the afternoon had turned the lay of the sun. Shadows gone bright, light swallowed up by the shade.

"There are goods I do not know if I should strive for," Hanno of Arwad said. "If I can achieve, even if I did."

He breathed out.

"So I will start, perhaps, with the good of which I am certain," the White Knight said, meeting my eyes. "It will be north, Catherine Foundling, and the light that still lies within my grasp."

Dave

Dang, people really have moved mostly to reddit?
Don't forget to vote!

Mental Mouse

And Discord....

Raivshard

Ages ago, at that

mavant

I wanna hang out with Masego.

KingJulius

You can try but unless you are an Encyclopedia made person he will likely be reading a book he stashed the next room over through the walls.

mavant

That's why I want to hang out with him; to get excited about learning together.

Russell Todd

Oh boy, our White Knight seems to be taking a step towards Gray.

Liliet

Nah, this is just the belly of the whale. The lowest point.

308924810a

Unless this is all according to the Bard's plan.
In which case he's not only going to have to overcome whatever the Dead King has lying in wait for him(which I now expect to include the missing Scourge up near the bridge), but also a loss of the power of his Name, and random swings of narrative causality against him, like that thing with the reflection off the Mirror Knight's bracers making it clear that he was appearing uncaring.

Or? the whole plan is to get him to spend more time off in these small strike teams because he has faith in the righteousness of working with heroes to end a great evil, but less so in the righteousness of making uncertain morally but goal-directed compromises in service to a military campaign.

Liliet

...you know, this is really making too much sense for a comment that starts with "unless this is all according to Bard's plan" 😊

Sinead

I can see that being the plan. What would be interesting is if there is an interlude where Hanno's talking to Rafella, and it comes up what Cat's relation to Sabh is. Or perhaps why Cat reacted poorly to the Stalwart Apostale. Hanno has Cat's perspective on those two. And I would argue that his role as a leader also involves helping mediate conflicts, of which he will now have two Heroes that have personally started a feud with Cat, and they potentially do not know why.

People keep saying that Rafella should know why Cat is angry with her, but 1) Cat is rendered to speechless fury upon seeing her, and 2) everyone else sees this as not their problem to deal with.

As for Pascale, I don't know if Cat ever addressed her issue with her at the time.

Also, while that could be the plan, it can also be the pivot that defines the Accords and the functioning of Names being assigned where they are the most effective. And as pointed out, Cat is the actual general. Hanno is a warrior, not a soldier.

In short, there could be a plot, but I can also see this just further cementing in the power of the Truce and Terms, especially if there is Heroic discussion around the terms

Liliet

> People keep saying that Rafella should know why Cat is angry with her, but 1) Cat is rendered to speechless fury upon seeing her, and 2) everyone else sees this as not their problem to deal with.

That is a very apt summation of the impression I thought their relationship was giving off when it came up, well put -_-

> As for Pascale, I don't know if Cat ever addressed her issue with her at the time.

Considering Cat's general mood and wellbeing at the time, I'm confidently betting on "not".

You have such a good point here, damn.

Sinead

I generally find this story to be a fairly optimistic story overall, so I really expect the best from all parties involved. It's why I get really pissed with the more nihilistic takes on the story.

I blame the grimdark of the 90s and then Game of Thrones. People just expect the Varlet to pop out and cut everyone's throats and forget that while this is free at the moment, EE has plans to refine and sell this story in the end. If they divebomb the story, they ruin 6 years of work along with any attempt to trying to turn this into a publishing success.

As far as more character expectations, I do think Hanno has the right shape of this. Cat surprised him at Arsenal around the Red Axe, but he also recognises that a) she is juggling an equivalent work load to him with her lot + his on top of being a ruler, a general of an international coalition, a religious leader and representative of the Firstborn, and b) she is someone who takes her people under her dark wing and will pull goblinfire on those that go after what is hers (a "goddess of impossible victories" cannot gain that loyalty without extending it in kind).

Not saying that Cat did not over react in her reactions to Rafella and Pascale (both Hanno and Hakram have pointed out as much). However, Hanno is someone who really can have the perspective to aid reconciliation.

I genuinely like Hanno. I think he works better as a priest/guide/guardian than a politics/logistics leader. So I think his choice here is the right one. It doesn't set aside the "other goods". It just acknowledges that Cat is probably the single greatest asset to oversee a seige, while he is best suited for a sortie and a "full throated victory". Besides, if he finds this sortie clears his head, he may be better off when he comes back "at the first light of the 5th day" (hell I think he actually comes from the east too....)

Sinead

Correction to the last point: The bridge is to the North, yes, but I think in terms of return strike, the battle front makes coming through a flank would be better.

Plus I like the imagery of Hanno's cavalry charges. Wouldn't it be neat if he does something where he turns Recall into a Light based equivalent of the charge of the Oathbreakers in LoTR. Manifestations of the Heroes of the Age of Wonders where he doesn't have the absolute judgement of the Choir, but he has the ages of wisdom of centuries of Heroes. I'm not sure if Hanno's able to do something where he "wakes" the memories into a shade that can discuss/debate/offer advice (as much as undead who cannot really change overmuch) and thus synthesise a path forward. If possible, this would be Judgement's 'Will of the People' to balance out Hierarch's demands.

Liliet

Hanno does still need to catch up to what Cat's reasoning was exactly wrt the Red Axe issue, because last time he reflected on it, he thought Cat did it for political gainz with Hasenbach, which is. not how that went

I'm with you on every single point tbh

Earl of Purple

I think Hanno would have gone to Pascale after he met with Cat after their first meeting. To reassure her that the greatest villain of her generation wasn't Pascale's lifelong enemy.

Cat wouldn't, it's not really her place- Pascale is a hero, not one of Cat's, so an explanation or a one-on-one chat isn't really appropriate for Cat- and she doesn't have the time to do it herself, anyway. But Hanno does know the story, because Cat told him, at least enough that he can go to Pascale and say 'Cat's not angry at you, really. She's upset at herself, because there was another. A young lad who would have been your rival. She wasn't able to save him, and seeing that you were saved, with a Name so similar, was a reminder of that'. Or... Something that reassured her without making Cat seem quite so human.

Sinead

The only thing I would disagree with there is that Hanno at the time would not have any reason to think that he should not humanise Cat. That doubt may have arisen post Red Axe Trial, but not in the time before. He still may have had some discussion with her, but it would be easy enough for the spectre of that first impression to still be lingering.

However, Hanno's seems to be not that great with intra group mediation, which is why I think in terms of more coming out in this raid away from the GA army. Think of how he didn't handle the heroes meeting in Arsenal because he couldn't handle the intra party stresses that were showing up in interparty issues. That is why I think something more coming out of this raid than saying that things are already in their end state at the start of the journey. It would be interesting if Hanno gains perspective he needs through helping others with their own struggles.

Honestly, my guess is that Rafella doesn't think in terms of Sabah really being human, since the shape shifting monster is still a monster no matter the shape it takes. The fact that Lykaia (Antigone's companion) is of similar description as Sabah, and is seen as almost a reverse role to Sabah (a big beast that is elevated mother figure, while the mother figure is reduced to a monster due to side they are on).

I am not saying that Rafella is being deliberately cruel, but I genuinely don't know if she has the perspective to realise that while Cat walks around with the banners of the hosts she have fought, Cat sees Rafella as walking around with a flayed human skin.

(I know that Pascale was the main point of your post, but I just find the complexity around Rafella so damn tragic)

Liliet

True, Hanno probably told her stuff, yeah.

Andrew Hulse

Where are all the comments? Where are the conspiracy theories?

Half the fun of the chapters is reading all the wild guesses afterwards...

amit27592

Mostly on reddit. WordPress commenting system leaves a lot to be desired.

miles

There wasn't much new in this chapter to guess about.

ninegardens

Welp, no MK vs bridge arc for me. 😞

Burlyraven

Taking Squire as a temporary part of the Woe might just be the single worst idea to come out of this. I know Cat was opposed to it, but even that fact that it was considered is concerning. If he absolutely must be around Cat or any of the others in the Woe, really, it should be as a duo. Hell, put him as a roving resupplier or reinforcement, because at least then it only puts a death flag on Hakram (see ammo kid in 3rd Matrix movie/Spiderman in Endgame for my mental image of his role). Otherwise just keep him with Apprentice or one of his established tutors like Huntress or Roland.

Also: oh look, a female alcoholic themed bardic Name pops up that absolutely no one is suspicious of despite no one seeming to know anything about her. Nothing suspicious at all there.

Cicero

The Squire taking Viv's place inside the Woe?

It could be bad, but it could also be very good. I'd classify it as a high risk high reward tactic.

It increases the ties the Squire has to the Woe, to Cat, and even to Viv. If successful, it makes it less likely that he will lead heroic opposition to Viv, and more likely that he becomes instead a heroic tempering of Callow as made by the Woe. (Something Cat would not object to).

It creates the room for a romance to naturally develop between him and Viv (assuming he is bi, which can not be dismissed – after all he parallels Cat who is bi).

It also emphasizes a mentor role for Cat, along with all the possible death flags from it. And the possible death flags for the Woe as a group – protecting the youngster is always a threat to an established band,

And it creates potential death flags for the Squire as well. As youngster with the vets dies is a trope.

Auka might be the one in the most danger though. She's got a big "redemption equals death" flag around her, and Auka of all people protecting the Squire of Callow? Ii has all sorts of symbolism to it.

Liliet

Yeah, well, I'm pretty certain it'll be fine.

Leaving aside how we still have a whole book left so Cat's not dying for good... actually that's a pretty important part of this, as a reader I'm fairly certain of her survival... taking risks for the common good has been Catherine's best strategy so far. Remember when she literally got her head cut off because "it would be cheap at twice the price"? And how that ended up for her? Yeah, this is one of those. Cat needs to put on her big girl pants and take a personal risk, and that's exactly what she's doing.

The thing about the Squire is that he doesn't really have the apprentice-dooming-the-mentor Role. Catherine is stepping way from Callow as soon as this war is over, so she's not in his way in any way, shape or form. She won't be looking after him. Vivienne will, and the story relationship between the two of them is quite different. If Cat teaches him? They'll be both her students and successors, as a pair rather than rivals. That's a story that's VERY good for them and VERY bad for whatever obstacle decides to stand in front of them.

Also, he's a Foundling and Cat feels kinship with him and I want to see more of him on screen with her SO MUCHHHHHHHHHHHHH

Shveiran

Uh. Those are... very good points about Vivs and Arthur. Color me convinced.

Burlyraven

Oh, see, I'm very much in favor of Cat taking Squire under her wing, I'm just adverse to him joining this battle. I don't see Cat dying either, but she's coming into a powerful villainous Name, and the combination can result in a lot of deaths for other characters surrounding her.

Cpt. Obvious

I feel the fear of the mentors death story is a bit exaggerated. The Grey Pilgrim has mentored many heroes and managed to avoid that story. Black mentored Cat when she was the Squire, arguably the most dangerous combo for him as he not only risked the mentors death but also the death by backstabbing as he mentored a villain. To make it even worse the Squire is a transitional name to become the Knight. And even so he managed to navigate all those stories and come out with not only his life but with someone who he consider family.

Sure, Cat being the arch villain of this generation and the Squire being of the Heroic bent complicates things but I don't think it's enough to paint a permanent death sign on anyone.

Besides it seems either the grove she's in, the emerging Name or Creation itself really want her to mentor this Squire and to a degree the apprentice.

Notice a symmetry here? Just like Black mentored Cat, and she ended up befriending those who makes up the Woe, which just happens to be a lot like the Calamities, she's just taken the Squire and the Apprentice under her wing. Looks like a band of five in the making.

The Calamities were all Villains. The only one that seemed to straddle the fence being Sabha, though being born a monster she didn't really get that choice.

The Woe however counts:

A former Hero Thief whose only claim to Evil is guilt by association.

A former Villain Squire who obsessively tries to do as little Evil as possible to people at large.

A former Villain apprentice who frankly does not care about the Above or the Below other than as something to be researched.

A disciple of Ranger, who were a Calamite, and who is just south of being neutral.

A truly practicing Evil Villain who also is the most loyal and self sacrificing friend imaginable.

And finally the shade of a criminal who murdered over a hundred thousand people in a single ceremony. A shade that are tottering on the brink of being able to claim her heart but at the cost of having to deal with the consequences if her former life.

The Calamities started out with a newly minted Squire and Apprentice meeting.

The Woe started with a fresh Squire and a not quite as new Apprentice meeting.

And now Catherine just happen to be mentoring the fresh Squire and a just slightly more seasoned Apprentice.

Now the question is will this be a classic band of five that's all Heroes, or will they carve a new grove?

Liliet

First readthrough? :3

agumentic

Taking the Squire as a part of the Woe has certain story risks, it's true. On the other hand, not doing ones' utmost against the Scourges runs into another bad story Cat pointed out – namely, "You weren't prepared enough and the Scourge killed you all". I think this one has a much worse and is much less open to the kind of story manipulation Cat can pull. So, taking him as a part of the Woe doesn't seem like such a bad idea to me.

Cicero

Signs Herald Desolation

Yeah... I'm feeling nervous too.

Lox

Don't forget omen

dadycoool

Love how they're divvying up the Named for the upcoming battle. Poor Ishaq, "Is it always this insane?" For basically everyone else, it wouldn't be, but Cat has taken peeks behind the curtain and is able to discern shapes and patterns on the other side, with lots of practice honing that skill.

All the candidates for a fifth Woe member are bad in their own way. Looking at Squire, taking a kid along doesn't sound quite right. I'm half convinced that he'll become the Black Knight, but that seems like a very long shot.

Cicero

It's not a serious suggestion... but I had the stray thought that one of the ways to lessen the threat of the Squire to the Woe would be for Viv to participate as a member of the Woe, and then claim the Squire of Callow as her bodyguard. So the Squire isn't acting as a replacement in the Woe, but rather as an accessory to Viv who is a member of the Woe.

It would leverage Viv's role as heir designate to the throne of Callow. Emphasize the Squire's links to Callow, while diverting him from the link to Cat. And with Viv as a retired Hero it also lessens the hero messes up the villains threat.

It just puts Viv in a dangerous situation. On the other hand, the story would suggest her survival...

Liliet

I think it's going to work that way on the narrative level anyway. Taking Squire instead of Vivi puts him in the role of her... deputy? partner? equal. He's stepping into the shoes of "the Woe's hero recruit", where Vivienne has already moved on to "Catherine's apprentice and successor". Which is exactly the role Catherine is worried about him taking on, as well. But with him substituting for Vivienne here while she's busy with duties she's a better fit for and has more affinity for? Where the combat role he's taking is not one she ever liked or wanted?

Yeah, this is good setup for the two of them working together, IMHO.

Sinead

That being said, 20 gold that Vivienne ganks Varlet who attempts to assassinate the leadership of the Army. Full on knife fight.

She then dusts herself off and gets back leading the army

Liliet

Vivienne has always been shit at killing.

It would be so great for her to succeed this time specifically :3

Sinead

I see that I accidentally ended up double posting on the same idea. Whoops, my apologies.

The reason why I would like Vivienne succeed here is because Varlet is reduced down to just hiding, which was Vivienne's specialty. She also made a point to not lean on the skill overmuch, so her spotting a strike coming and just dealing with it when she is seen as the least of the Woe would be great.

Of course, what I want is for her to pull off some Sun shenanigans that is Light-like but specifically not Light (she held the Sun in a third of her soul for a number of days, that gotta leave some marks) to flush out the Varlet and then just end them quickly.

...I may be too invested in this theory for someone who doesn't have any input in this story in the slightest.

Liliet

Okay but imagine Vivienne standing over tied up Varlet as her guard rushes in. "Stabbing isn't really my thing"

Sinead

OK, yeah, that would be good. Especially if the narrative goes full ham, and she comes out of this dust-up with Varlet spotless. No dust, not a single mark on her.

Cat would be friggin pissed

Liliet

Yessssssss

Sinead

I'm not sure if my previous comment got eaten (or is somewhere else in this comment section), but I really hope we get Vivienne take down the Varlet trying to assassinate leadership. As in they sneak past Squire on guard duty, and Vivienne just takes them out and then continues on with her other duties.

This doesn't require Squire to be on guard, but it would make a hell of an impression.

hakureireimu

Unless Hakram becomes cyborc, Cat needs another member to have a full band of 5 anyways.

Raivshard

I mean, he already is, at this point, but yeah, he's not fully acclimated to the new limbs yet. Maybe Masego figured something out?

Sinead

Stand could be used to help make the final step (hah) to cyborc. Perhaps meditation with Find, rise with Stand, and then a full on Rampage?

I know there is the whole thing of “do not rely so fully on your Name for things”, but that shouldn’t destroy progress I don’t think.

shikkarasu

There’s not relying on your Name, and then there’s working things into your Name. Hakram’s Dead Hand became part of his identity much like Cat’s Mantle of Woe. This can turn even a mundane object into something more. I am hoping that he can weave prosthetics in general into his identity and make them stronger in turn. Might be a use for Stand, or it might be a rare/ previously unheard of case of one Aspect turning into another.

Or heck, maybe just one of those OP Name perks like how Black Knight can manipulate shadows and perform limited Necromancy without the Gift, or how Lone Swordsman could detect lies. Adjutant is a new Name, so its still likely malleable.

Liliet

Akua.

Rey d`Tutto

Ubua

dadycool

That sounds nice. I was rather bummed that Viv didn’t get the chance to play with her friends. Without her, it’s not truly the Woe.

Liliet

Vivi never liked combat anyway.

Rey d`Tutto

No, but she excelled at STEALING what Artifacts the Enemy relied on.

Banners, a Fleet of ships, the Sun...

onedollargum

Ishaq feels more her successor than Squire does. Wide eyed wonder and everything.

Sinead

Successor to the leader of the Damned, sure.

Cat has many Roles to divvy out. She doesn't need one successor.

rwil02

4th?

Wow

rwil02

10th by the time I posted 😊

NerfGlaistigUaine

I love intelligent pragmatic villains, I really do, but you gotta admit politics must have been so much more interesting back when the old breed were around.

Matthew Wells

Yes! Hanno learned a moral lesson! Power-up time!

ninegardens

But did he learn the right one? Or did he learn the wrong one, and the correct lesson is about to be handed to him along with an entire can of whopass?

Sparsebeard

So now, Cath is the undisputed authority on the front. I'd argue both for named as the only representative of the accords on site and militarily as the Black Queen.

Hanno knows it might be "good" to stay as a balance of power but decides to give Catherine a chance.

This is what Cat's favor bought.

hakureireimu

Is Rapacious Bard supposed to be Rapacious Troubadour?

Daniel E

Unless it's the Rapacious Librarian again.

laguz24

You know, this sort of story leaves a great opening for a sort of lower decks episode where we get to see some more heroes and villains that aren't as invincible and are still learning the steps of the dance.

General Chaos

> the Hashmallim believe some of his Bestowal is invested in his soldiers, and that they in turn empower him
I'm assuming this is Ophanim

Juff

Typo Thread:

Named were here > Named here either now knew > now knew tainted glass > tinted glass
Below the rest > Below, the rest their owns > their own I'd looked > I'd have looked holding up > holding them up tolerate our losing > tolerate us losing be participate > be participating marching of when > marching distance of when animals head > animal's head sword a board > sword and board experience this > experienced this Christophe the Pavanie > Christophe de Pavanie
Knight winced > Knight wince spirited decision > spirited discussion believed have > believed gave close Twilight Gate > close Twilight Gates dent if > dent him if didn't seen > didn't see something will > something that will were I began > where I began that some calibre > that for some calibre theirs, were in away, > theirs were, in a way,

beleester

Rapacious Bard -> Rapacious Troubador

Also, a continuity error: The Seelie is stated to be attacking Malanza in the east, but Malanza is holding Trifelin to the west.

Darkening

Yeah, there's been a lot of east/west confusion this book.

mamm0nn

Hm, another bard. Could be useful, especially for such a mission.

I always assumed that Book 1 Cat looked at bards as lovable but woefully ineffective because they're in stories already touched up by success in the end and plot armour by being past tense and retelling both. However, the true purpose of Bards being a greater understanding and control over Stories and Providence.

Not as in, they'd have insight of things like Cat does, though that is indeed one of their powers, but that they have greater control over it. Cat can foresee a pivot or story and prevent it happening by direct act, the Bard can see a gap for a Story and insert it. They can see the groundwork for a treacherous lieutenant betrayal and urge the story to do it at a chosen point, or see a dead mentor story and twist things around by taking the pupil away so that it becomes a Hero overcoming all adversity again.

Taking such a figure with them would greatly aid the odds of the Band of Five, as it would essentially make four much more lucky and effective fighters over five that can do a lot yet still stumble if the Story doesn't go their way.

Hitogami

Cat is so jealous that the White knight has had enough one sided victories that it's affected his tactics. To be fair the enemies that she's faced usually were powerful to threaten creation, but still, she's jelly 😊

Mental Mouse

Well – double-edged sword there, especially with him running off to take a bridge,

ninegardens

So... the dude wasn't sure what to do this morning, and then woke up and decided "You know what my party of five needs? A Merry Balladeer that no one seems to have mentioned previously. And we'll head north. Good plan."

Is that you WB? Are you doing evil things? Hmmm.....

Liliet

I'm pretty sure the Merry Balladeer has in fact been mentioned before! Let's see...

Hmm.

> Hanno had already sent the Balladeer and the Harrowed Witch, two of the more level-headed among his Named, to prevent that particular situation from spinning out of control.

> Respect for the Chosen would stay hand and the Balladeer was highly popular besides, while the Witch had the means to quickly send word to him if need be.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/10/09/interlude-ietsism/>

Yeah, I think this is the same Named, Hanno is just used enough to her he shortened it, where Witch is not one of his so he didn't (also, there are multiple Witches lol)

Earl of Purple

Wandering Bard always drinks from a distinctive flask, and carries the same instrument. They're too much part of her to hide them. She can't hide herself like that for long.

Merry Balladeer doesn't have either, I think. And if she's been around for more than a year, she's survived a WB face change.

Christian Oaks

Seems sus. I'd vote em out

agumentic

It is kind of hilarious how Cat continues to deny that she is teaching Arthur.

"I am about to propel this man's whole career... But I am not a mentor".

Kofi Abbey

Wow, is there really no voting link comment after all this time?

Liliet

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Boost the vote and vote for the boost!

Frivolous

I'm a little surprised that they didn't run a hero lottery to determine which Chosen would be assigned to go after which Scourges. But I guess even heroes don't trust Providence that much, even when there are so many heroes fighting on the same side.

Or perhaps it's merely that most heroes benefit from Providence equally, with only rare exceptions like the Fortunate Fool being lucky to a reliable and great degree. Therefore logic and tactics remain important.

Villains, of course, can't trust Providence very much, so they'd use logic and tactics almost exclusively.

I wonder if the Page and Apprentice were assigned to do anything, or if they were even at the meeting. Maybe one or both of those transitional heroes was assigned to guard Vivienne during the battle.

308924810a

Here's a quote from Quora on the subject of how the selected the Venetian Doge:

"For more than five centuries (from 1268 to 1797) the procedure to elect the doge (chief of state) did not change.

Choose 30 members of the Great Council by lot.
These 30 people are reduced by lot to 9.
These 9 people choose 40 other people.
These 40 are reduced by lot to 12.
These 12 people choose 25 other people.
These 25 people are reduced by lot to 9.
These 9 people choose 45 other people.
These 45 people are reduced by lot to 11.
These 11 people choose 41 other people.
These 41 people elect the doge."

Apparently the logic behind this was that god intervened through incidents of random chance, so they wanted to give god as many chances as practical to intervene in who would get elected as Doge.

In a world where fate and providence demonstrably warps probability I could totally see this kind of system being popular.

It might even work right here in this siege, because they're riding off of a story of being the last stronghold with any real chance of stopping Keter from rolling over a big chunk of Procer and killing a great number of people. And of the heroes and their allies making a heroic final stand for the sake of Procer, where they'll savage the enemy either before their defeat, or in a successful defence. So Providence should guide heroes into the places where they can do the most good more easily.

ninegardens

So... is it just me, or is Cat making a pretty significant Story error regarding The Severance.

As in... she's saving it up as a final weapon against the Dead King.

Like... she's treating it the same way villains treat a flying fortress.

She is relying on a magical sword to save them or whatever.
Like... I dunno.

It just doesn't feel like it has the weight for that. It does feel like it has the weight for cleaving the prince of bones, or taking down the bridge, but using it in the final push feels like a recipe for failure (or for DK to steal it, which is even more terrifying).

Like... this EXACT kind of thinking is what had Black pissed off at Malicia back at the end of book 3: don't rely on flying fortresses or magical artifacts. Just don't.

Now... maybe she's going to use the Severance for slaying some kind of gatekeeper or whatever at the entrance to Keter- sure, fine, whatever... but the idea that it has anything near the weight needed to roll DK seems laughable (especially when wielded by MK).

Is there something that I'm missing here?

Liliet

Heroic vs villainous story.

Mental Mouse

The Flying Fortress thing is about sweeping all before you with your mighty weapon... if they did overuse the Severance, e.g. against the Prince Of Bones and the other toughest Scourges, then they would be playing that story.

The Ultimate Weapon that only gets used once against the Big Bad, that's another story entirely, and a heroic one that's more likely to succeed.

ninegardens

I can see the logic, and I get it but...

I still don't think it will work. I put strong bets AGAINST Severance being of use against the Dead King, and the reason is... Its not tied to him? And its not tied to the hero using it?

Its not "The mirror knight's destined sword" and its not "The blade destined to kill the dead king". If Tariq was using it it would be "a meaningful token from a fallen friend", but it ISN'T that.

At the moment, its just a very pointy stick. It's a tool, a war asset, there isn't any STORY imbued in it. Its the product of Name necromancy and industry, and heck, maybe that works, maybe that is the story of Cat's new age of order ("Collaboration beats destiny")... but at the moment, according to oldschool story tropes, it just.... it doesn't fit?

I dunno, maybe if whoever wields it isn't the mirror knight, and thus the sword bleeds them, then it will have the weight. The weight of blood being spilled, sure, but weight nonetheless.

But at the moment, because it isn't personal to any of the characters, it doesn't feel like a heroic weapon. Its origin too industrial and impersonal, its path is too tainted.

Heck, If Zeze was into revenge more, it could have been "the weapon of heirophant's vengeance", but he honestly doesn't seem to give a damn about the sword, or vengeance, and is more interested in having fun with quartered seasons.

Mental Mouse

"The mighty weapon prepared for the final battle" is a story in its own right. It's weakened by not being secret anymore (and by having been used previously), but I think it can still be of some use, if the first time it appears outside the Arsenal is for that final battle.

Andrew Smith

I mean Zeze did have that talk after the whole forming of the twilight ways with Cat on killing the dead king to sum up/quote him I saw how gods are made and so how they can be unmade.

Magical heroic sword of bullshit power that has a only the worthy may wield effect(Hanno even brings up he can tell that the sword won't let him use it thanks to it kinda being the embodiment of miss NO TRUCE WITH THE ENEMY.) Really it is kind of like an edgy master sword from Zelda

That by itself makes it powerful(add in this sword took years to make by an experience hero since pretty sure it is Decree(think it was that aspect) Taking the sword that was the Saint of swords(who was thought of as someone who could kill the dead king) and using it to then kill the dead king is a story

Of course it isn't the only thing the war is riding on since quartered seasons was being made for the exact same purpose fucking over the dead king

Sinead

I think something to consider is that the Lawrence could cut anything, so a blade that cuts whatever it's swung at is a solid war asset that is still a good thing to keep out of the Dead King's sight to give him minimal time to try and adapt.

Even if it doesn't succeed at being a tool to break the Dead King (since Quartered Season seems to be a means to make the Dead King sealed Evil a can with no undead armies to make assaulting Keter easier), it's still useful to only keep back as a tool used to respond to the escalation of taking on the Crown of the Dead.

Granted, I tend to think of these things as less meaningful than the actual people behind them. The stories are more the way these forces get applied. I think it's all a lot more blind than it seems like on the ground.

hakureireimu

Yes, it's not a flying fortress, and the war doesn't depend on it.

Mental Mouse

> "We burned two aspects of the Varlet's at Maillac's Boot,"

"We". Cat is being modest!

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: Possibly hoping to keep her ability to steal and/or destroy the aspects of others a secret, given it can probably be used against living heroes and villains as well. That capacity is a weapon, and Cat is too savvy and paranoid to brag about it.

But she can't or won't keep it secret that the Varlet is reduced to just one aspect, either, as that would be tactically foolish. So saying 'we' did it helps occlude the capacity without intruding into folly.

Because I sometimes forget smaller details about the Practical Guide to Evil: Can someone confirm or refute that Cat's ability to destroy or steal aspects of non-corpses is known to anyone outside the Woe?

I know that Tariq and Laurence were there when Cat used her capacity to steal aspects to help destroy the Spellblade, but Laurence is dead and I think Tariq is probably too cautious of angering Catherine to risk spreading that information.

I can't remember any other circumstance.

Sailorleo

The Ophanim gave everyone present at the Prince's Graveyard visions of Cat using the ability to grab Forgive from Tariq and use it to revive him during the formation of the Twilight Ways.

Mental Mouse

Actually, IIRC the visions explicitly did not extend past Tariq committing suicide, remember how surprised everyone was when she brought him out alive.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. Certainly few people have survived that trick, but she has also been fairly public about harvesting Revenant and villain corpses during this war, and some extensions of that idea are natural.

Someperson

Feels like Hanno just decided his Role is more about going out and executing the tasks that undoubtedly need doing than it is about leading the Named front and center in the most decisive battle of this vaguely crusade shaped confrontation.

Whether he meant to or not, it seems like he just granted a great deal of legitimacy to Catherine's incipient Name, which appears to involve authority over other Named. If anyone would challenge her right to such a mantle of authority, it would surely be Hanno, who is both her equal under the Truce and Terms and the White Knight in a battle of Named against the hordes of evil.

Chapter 76: Rapt

"Princes dream of victory, farmers dream of peace."

– Proceran saying

There would be no hiding the departure of the White Knight, so there was no point in even trying. We did the opposite instead: all but threw a godsdamned parade for his band, gallantly going into the unknown as they were. We rustled up a crowd drawing from all armies, got them cheering with a few speeches about heroism and how of course we were going to win, just look at how Evil that fucker the Dead King was. Paraphrasing as I might be, I liked to believe I'd seized upon the essence of the oration. If you filled the belly of soldiers and opened up casks of booze they'd cheer at pretty much anything, in my experience, so I had it arranged. Because the cheering was what mattered, you see. It was what would stick in their heads when they thought back about this.

The White Knight and four other heroes were leaving in broad daylight and the streets were half a festival, so of course it was a good thing. Not something to get angry about, or afraid. Hanno and the Witch of the Woods were both major losses from the perspective of defending this city, and soldiers would know it deep down, but so long as we set the tone on how they should think of their departure it shouldn't result in a morale loss. I supposed it would be in poor taste of me to hope that the Valiant Champion got herself killed during the adventure, you know in a magnificent sacrifice for the sake of the world and all that good stuff.

Thankfully I'd never been above bad taste, so I hoped my petty little heart out.

We had fresher cats to skin, though, so I did not spare much thought for the matter as I had no doubt that Hanno would smash that bridge to pieces. Besides, perhaps removing himself from the turbulence of politics for a while would help the White Knight settle his doubts. There was nothing like a straightforward, hard-earned win to help the world make sense again. The defence of the capital would not be as straightforward an effort, and there was no doubt that a defence would soon be needed: the dead were gathering in the plains below. Like rivers coming down the hills circling the great valley at the heart of Hainaut, undead came flowing at our feet.

We conducted sorties, at first. Every day or so we sent a few thousand horse through the Twilight Ways and attacked some of the smaller packs of undead, striking quick and hard before withdrawing into the Ways before the enemy could gather in sufficient numbers to force a melee. Even a run-in with the Archmage wasn't enough to get us to stop: the Blessed Artificer and myself took to accompanying the sorties, and we were usually enough to stalemate him. But after a week, we were forced to admit that sorties were no longer really feasible. Adanna took an arrow from the Hawk about half an inch to the left of her heart, which was an unpleasant wakeup call, but beyond that the tactic itself was no longer viable.

There were just too many of the dead.

I'd never really seen it put to us so starkly, how much more of the enemy there were. Yet the city of Hainaut stood atop a tall plateau, and it made the truth impossible to deny: the capital was like a rock surrounded by the tides, a sea of death gathering below us. We couldn't pick at the enemy because there wasn't anything like enemy formations to pick at. Just a mass of walking corpses that covered the land like a carpet of iron and bone, standing terrifyingly still. The sight of it was... not good for morale. It was one thing to know that we would have to defend the city against at least fourfold our number, it was another to see that fourfold standing silent on the field. Waiting, watching, dreaming of that final stillness. As was so typical of the Dead King, he'd drawn first blood before the battle even started and no cost to himself.

Shaping our mundane defences was not difficult, or at least not complicated. There were four stretches of wall to defend, the four cardinal directions, and a fifth force would have to be kept back as a reserve. The Alamans, now consolidated behind Princess Beatrice Volignac – who was the least powerful of them in truth, but remained the ruler of these lands in principle – tried to push for the 'honour' of defending the northern stretch, the great gate, but were refused. That task would go to the Fourth Army, as the Army of Callow's siegecraft was superior to that of any other force here. We gave them the west, instead, since the dead were certain to try to use the butte known as the Veilleuse to take a proper crack at overwhelming that rampart. The Levantines got the east and the south, as the latter was little more than a sheer drop and so would be easier to defend.

The Lycaonese and the Second Army were kept back as the reserve, in deference the casualties they'd already taken in the campaign. As for the Firstborn, though on parchment they belonged to the reserve as well we had particular duties for them. We were not blind to the Enemy's favourite ploys, or above turning them to our own advantage.

It had been in the air for days now, but it was the Crows coming that told me we had reached the knife's edge. The Sisters had first come to me in my dreams, always perched on my shoulders as I stood on the edge of a hundred different drops and flying away as I fell. Then one fateful dusk it was all with eyes who were able to see them circling the skies above the capital. Sve Noc had come to Hainaut in the... flesh, for lack of better term. Though I was First Under the Night, it was the Firstborn they'd come here to tend to – as was only natural, considering near every drow south of Serolen was currently quartered within the walls of the capital. The Firstborn were largely holed up along the eastern shore of the Bassin Gris, the broadly oval pool of water at the heart of the city and feeding the waterfall at its southern tip.

Rumena had pushed for it, mentioning that most drow had once lived in cities or towns that'd been near underground lakes or rivers in the Everdark. It'd been a risk putting them near the Levantines, considering the Dominion folk were just as touchy and prone to duelling, but putting them with the Alamans near the western shore would have been even worse. Alamans reputation among the Firstborn had taken a sharp dive downwards after it became broadly known that the Langevins of Cleves had planned to backstab them over territorial gains even while they were fighting to defend the lands of that family. Not that the Firstborn were usually above a spot of backstabbing, famously, but even by their standards that'd been a tad egregious.

The cohabitation with the Levantines had actually gone rather smoothly so far. It probably helped that they mostly came out at night, taking up the majority of the watches during the dark, and so the hours spent out and about only partially overlapped. The relative peace there was a relief, as there always seemed to be a hundred things in dire need of getting done and I was ever moving from one to the next. Hakram and Vivienne did what they could to lighten the burdens, but I still felt like I was being pulled a dozen ways at any moment. Still, I could justify setting aside time for a meal with the Woe at least once a day on the basis of needing to prepare stratagems against the Archmage and I embraced the justification wholeheartedly. How much planning was actually done varied between some and none, but it was still a balm on my day to spend at least an hour talking with people I actually liked. But there had also been... changes recently, and though Akua had not acted on them immediately – or even shown much of a change at all – eventually it came to a head.

"Your patronesses have offered me power for fealty, did you know?" Akua asked me one evening.

We'd already polished off dessert and both Indrani and Masego had wandered off – they had shared quarters, but neither of them actually slept there regularly – after Hakram went to solve a jurisdiction dispute between Princess Mathilda Greensteel and the Fourth Army over a Lycaonese soldier in her service who'd palmed some of our supplies. Vivienne had excused herself after I opened a second bottle of wine, noting she still had correspondence to see to, and that'd left me alone with Akua Sahelian.

"I figured they might," I noted. "They tried the same with Masego."

And I expected Akua to decline for much the same reasons he had. Praesi had no issue with gaining power through contracts and sacrifices, but submission was another thing entirely.

"Alas, I am not so eager to surrender my soul anew," Akua said. "Though given my current straits the offer was more tempting than it would have been once upon a time."

I half-smiled, sipping at my wine. Some pale Proceran thing, from somewhere in their south.

"Is it really that hard?" I asked. "Power always comes with strings. I always thought it'd be restful, to be without them for a while."

She dressed, I had noticed, somewhat more modestly now. Still with an eye to grandeur, she'd always had that much, but the red and white gown she wore tonight was high-necked even if it was closely cut. I'd been somewhat surprised she could still change her shape even without Night, but Masego had been all too willing to tell me that was actually a consequence of her nature as 'shade' rather than anything born of Winter or Night. In most circumstances a soul split from a body, which was what Akua was, would either pass into the world beyond or be remain as either some sort of diminished apparition. Those rules, though, applied largely to people who hadn't cut out their own soul the way Akua had when she'd been a teenager.

She was stable, and even somewhat in control of her own nature – her appearance and movement at least – because the split had not been accident. She had taken a knife to her soul long before I put a bloody hand through her chest.

"Hypocrite," Akua chided, though with more amusement than anger. "You have clawed desperately for power ever since your first taste of it, Catherine. Your only doubts were I finding a form of it that was not personally distasteful to you. You rhapsodize on powerlessness like a queen lauds the virtues of the common farmer – but without, I notice, ever retiring to live on a farm."

I flipped her off, earning a smug smile, but did not outright deny her words. While I might be intending to abdicate queenship over Callow, I didn't exactly intend to make my sword into a ploughshare afterwards. I still had a few decades in me handling the rise of Cardinal and the steadying of the Accords. I drank of my wine, leaning back into the seat I'd years ago stolen from Arcadia, and cocked a brow at her.

"So what are you going to do?" I asked.

She went still, as if surprised. In that moment, it struck me that I'd not seen Akua wear any jewels since that night on the rooftops. A riot of elegant clothes yes, and the occasional veil, but never once adornments of silver and gold. Golden eyes watched me, hooded, and I stopped to wonder at the fact that even dressed in a simple gown she still looked as much royalty as any woman bearing a crown I had known.

"You do not offer words of caution?" she asked. "Warnings about the price of seeking power?"

Thin veil that they would have been, covering up the fear of what she might do should she gain strength again.

"It's not another cage, Akua," I said. "Only larger and with bars harder to see. I meant it."

"And should I desire to leave, here and now?" she harshly asked.

"You are," I simply said, "not my prisoner."

Her hands clenched, those long and deft fingers you saw so often on mages.

"Would you have spoken the words," Akua bitterly said, "if you thought I might leave?"

You will, I thought. Before it's all over, you will. Because that's what fate is, Akua Sahelian: the recognition that, no matter how many doors there are, there was only ever one you were going to take.

"If it is my blessing to leave you want," I said, "then you have it."

Without another word, she rose from her seat. I met her eyes in silence, not moving a finger, and she left the room without a single look back. I poured my glass full again and waited, but she did not return. I wasn't sure how long passed as I stayed there, seated and silent. I wondered, for a moment, if she'd truly left Hainaut. No, I eventually decided. She'd not yet the crossroads in her story. I finished my glass and hoisted myself up, wandering under moonlight. I could have gone to have a look at Adjutant's arbitration, but why bother? It was Vivienne I sought instead. She wasn't far, considering she was quartered in the same guildhall as I was: easier to guard, if we were both there, and it wasn't like we were lacking room. It might have been for letters that she left, but it wasn't what I found her doing.

Magelights lit up the salon she'd claimed as her work room, but instead of being seated at a desk she was on her feet. A thick plank of wood with targets painted on it, circles and squares of various sizes, was propped up against an empty bookcase and I watched with a cocked eyebrow as the heiress-designate to Callow palmed a knife and threw it. It spun with a sharp sound, the tip tearing in the middle of a painted red circle at least half an inch deep. I clapped and she turned to roll her eyes at me.

"It's a knife trick, that's all," she said.

I shrugged. I was a decent hand with a throwing knife myself, but not as good as her – not without relying on the unnatural dexterity and senses a Name could lend you.

"I didn't know you were keeping your skills sharp," I said.

I'd known she still carried knives, obviously, but that was just plain good sense.

"Knives are easiest to practice," Vivienne admitted. "Henrietta Morley has been on me about learning to use a sword passably, but I've only kept at it long enough to avoid skewering myself."

"I still have sword spars with my guards on occasion, but I'm not as keen on it as I used to be," I admitted. "I don't fight the way I used to when I was seventeen."

"Knives always came easiest to me, back when I was the Thief," she said. "Mind you, I learned more out of a month of regular lessons on that with Robber during the Iserre campaign than out of several years of kicking around as Named."

I stared at her. She'd picked up lessons from Robber? Well, she wasn't going to be winning any prizes for chivalry anytime soon but I figured she'd probably be quite good as slitting throats if she were ever in a bind.

"What'd you even bribe him with?" I curiously asked.

"Two months of knowing where Hakram kept his aragh stash," she grinned.

"That would have done it," I snorted.

I limped across the panelled floor until I could run a finger against the knife stuck in the plank, easing it out and testing its weight. Well-made, and if it wasn't goblin steel I'd eat my own hand. I flicked it at her, and to my pleasure she snatched it out of the air.

"So why'd you start?" I asked.

More than once I'd tried to push her into picking up a weapon, back when she'd been the Thief, but she'd always been reluctant. Even back when she'd despised the Legions, she'd been less than sanguine about killing us. I honestly couldn't remember her ever seeing her take a life outside of a battle.

"The same reason I started learning Mthethwa," Vivienne said, sitting against the edge of her desk. "I used to be envious of how the rest of you got it spoonfed, did you know? Masego was raised by the Warlock and 'Drani by the Ranger, you got the Carrion Lord as a tutor and Hakram had an entire aspect prodding him so he'd always know what you needed him to."

She smiled mirthlessly.

"Me, all I got what the scare of my life from the Assassin and a few years of running, making sure never to stay anywhere long enough the Eyes would be able to find me easily," Vivienne said.

"Gods, Indrani was raised in the middle of the fucking woods and somehow she still knew four languages and her classics in Old Miezan. So I was a little bitter about it, but mostly I used it as an excuse for why I was dragging behind."

I hid my surprise. I'd known she'd had some issues with how she felt different from the Woe, but honestly I'd figured it came more from her late arrival and well, to be blunt, being used to siding with people that were just better than us. Morally speaking, at least.

"But then Masego kept devouring books," Vivienne smiled. "Indrani started spying on woodworkers in Laure, you and Hakram started studying Chantant. And what did I do?"

"You essentially put the Jacks together from the ground up," I pointed out.

Courtesy of Aisha and Ratface we'd long had some contacts in Callow and Praes, but we'd been hopelessly outmatched by the Eyes and the Circle until Vivienne folded the Guild of Thieves and the Guild of Assassins into her Jacks and began turning our old mess into a proper network of spies.

"And I did good work," she agreed. "But you were all improving yourselves, and I was spending more time on excuses about why I wasn't than figuring out how I could do the same."

I wouldn't throw stones there. I might not have enjoyed learning Chantant, but part of the reason I'd been able to force myself to was that the other most arguably useful thing I could teach myself was basic magical theory and I would have preferred eating a ball of goblinfire. If Akua hadn't been particularly skilled at keeping the lessons I requested of her interesting, I'd probably still have some major swaths of ignorance there.

"After Hakram got through to me, I guess it was harder to swallow the excuses," Vivienne continued. "So I started looking at doors I'd left closed. This was one, so was Mthethwa. It's also when I set to thinking about what good could be brought to Callow, instead of lingering on all the evils still needing to be cut out."

I slowly nodded, clenching my fingers and unclenching them.

"I'm sorry, Vivienne," I quietly said. "I had no idea."

"I'd hope so," she smiled, "you were the last person I wanted to know, Cat. You'd just taken me in, I didn't want to be the dead weight."

"You never have been," I frankly told her.

The smile turned fond, but it was nothing more than that. It was, I thought, a devil she'd already faced. There was no uncertainty left there.

"It was hard to be angry with you about it, when you shared secrets so readily," Vivienne said. "I'd been with a band before, and even among heroes tricks are not often simply given when asked. It was one of the first things I liked about you, that you didn't hoard your knowledge."

"They weren't my tricks to start with," I shrugged.

She shook her head, as if amused.

"It's one of the reasons follow you, Cat," Vivienne said. "You don't think of it as cheapening you, when you help others get stronger."

I cleared my throat, almost embarrassed.

"And to think I'm the one who's been drinking," I teased.

She chuckled.

"Get the bottle, then," Vivienne said. "I've got a letter to Duchess Kegan to finish, but when I do it occurs to me it's been ages since we've played shatranj."

Gods, I was definitely finishing the bottle then. I'd take away from the sting of defeat. And still, as I limped out of the room, I found I was smiling.

—

I did not see Akua the following day.

Much as the thought dug at me from the side, I let it pass. Thankfully, there was quite enough to busy myself with. We'd sent a few outrider companies far in the valley through the Ways to have a look at the situation there, and the answers were not promising: the dead were almost finished gathering. We'd be facing an assault soon. I delegated more and more to generals and commanders, instead focusing on the Woe. If we wanted to kill the Archmage without losing one of ours in the process, we needed a solid plan. Thankfully I'd had a few ideas, and there was a reason that even now he'd finished working on the new gates Masego barely bothered to sleep. I'd asked him to make anew a breed of artefacts his father had once made for the Calamities, and later on once for myself at the Camps, and he'd taken to the request with a grief-tinged fervour.

"The spellcraft behind these is fundamentally akin to scrying," Masego said. "Which means they won't work outside the walls."

Proper scrying didn't even work within the walls, even behind the cover of the city wards, but as I understood it the 'paired stones' worked just differently enough the interference would be minimal.

"The Lady mentioned the Carrion Lord liked to use these," Indrani mentioned, chin resting on her palm.

On the table were four pairs of polished, smooth stones. One was meant to be kept inside the mouth and the other in the ear, the former to speak and the latter to hear.

"Father made them at Uncle Amadeus' request," Masego agreed. "Though he found them an interesting challenge, he always said. Their limitation as an artefact was that there was a single 'master' pair, which was the sole that could both receive and send sound to every other pair."

Which Black wouldn't have minded, since his core strategy when the Calamities fought was typically to keep Warlock out of sight and call him down like some sort of magical artillery. The master set went to the Sovereign of the Red Skies, and there was really no need for anything more complicated. My father had always been wary of complexity, when Named fought. Fragility was to be avoided at all costs in his tactics.

"Yet you've improved the design," Hakram said.

Masego clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth.

"I have changed it, certainly," Hierophant said. "Improved is a premature assessment."

The other object on the table was, I suspected not by coincidence, something that rather looked like a legionary's backpack. The resemblance was only a surface one, however, as though there was straps to make it easier to carry the artefact itself was mostly wood and copper. A sort of large rectangular box, it was covered with neat sets of runes set around incrustated stones. By the box a flat stone with carved Miezian numerals from one to four was waiting, and what looked like the mouth-stone from a paired set. The Warlock Wekesa had preferred a simple, smooth design to his artefacts as that fit the tactics and philosophy of the Calamities. Masego, at my behest, had created something a little more sophisticated. Aware of the fragility of such designs, we'd acted accordingly and focused it all in one place: this master box, until someone found a better name for it.

"So this lets us talk to each other instead of simply to the master set," I mused, eyeing the box.

"Inaccurate," Masego sighed. "Which is why we will require Hakram to field it."

Adjutant had been studying the box all the while, eyes narrowed.

"The incrustated stones each pair with one of the ear ones for you?" the orc asked.

Zeze smiled, visibly pleased.

"Correct."

"The box is relay of sorts, then," Hakram mused. "Only there will be a complication, one that requires active administration."

"Isoka's third principle of scarcity," Indrani drawled. "Can't use two spells that use the same parts of Creation in the same place at the same time."

Masego beamed at her and she preened.

"So the spells that transmit the sounds can't be used simultaneously," Adjutant said. "You will need me to either serve as a relay for planning, or establish a connection between two sets of stones."

"That'll be one part," I said. "Our great trouble with the Archmage so far has been that it's fucking impossible to get at it. When it knows Named are close it puts up a storm around itself, and then it usually falls into a certain pattern."

"One major offensive spell at a time, keeping an eye on the opposition in case it can breach its defences," Adjutant slowly said.

"We'll be coming at it from different angles, simultaneously," I said. "That means we need someone who can actually figure out what it's preparing to hit us with, and where. That will be you."

As additional prizes, it would also significantly lower collateral damage – if we could catch large-scale spells before they wrecked the inside of the city, we could counter them – and keep him out of the direct fighting. Hakram wasn't a fool, he was aware that he was in no shape for a scrap with Named, but this approach meant that he was still fulfilling a role and an important one to boot. I'd not invented this for him, I'd just told Masego that we were in a position to have someone dedicated to handling the core artefact if it improved its uses. Adjutant looked at me for a long time, then slowly nodded.

"My Name seems to approve," he gravelled, then shook his head and changed the subject. "Have we decided on a final roster for the combat?"

"Everyone in this room," I said, "and one more."

"Akua?" Indrani asked. "Viv's not in a place to brawl with a Scourge these days."

"I was considering the Squire," I admitted.

"No," Hakram said, without missing a beat.

"Look," I said, "I know-"

"No," Indrani flatly said.

I scowled.

"No," Masego snickered.

"I didn't even say anything," I protested.

"The kid's not ready for a fight of that calibre, even if he wasn't a replacement the Heavens are trying to line up for you," Archer said. "It's not happening, Cat, let it go."

I grit my teeth, but found no takers at the table. Fine. I'd find another use for him.

"The either we bring in Ishaq or Akua," I said.

"Akua's a stronger hitter," Indrani frowned. "And muscle's useful, sure, but the Barrow Sword's not used to working with us the way she is."

"I cut Akua loose from the Night," I said. "Along every other binding I had on her."

A flicker of surprise from Archer, but that was all.

"Good," she simply said. "About time."

Tense, I studied the other two. Masego looked puzzled but largely indifferent, while Hakram... thoughtful, but not angry or disappointed. Either of those would have stung. He gave me a look that made it clear we'd be discussing this at some point, but did not otherwise pursue the matter.

"I'd still prefer Akua either way," Indrani added. "That's why she's not been around, isn't it? She went to find some fangs."

"Good odds," I agreed. "Though she didn't tell me before going. She could just have left."

Indrani rolled her eyes.

"Sure she did," Archer said. "Zeze?"

"I would prefer her to the Barrow Sword as well," Hierophant said after a moment. "Even if she regains only middling power, her state as a shade means she can ignore a great many traditional magical defences."

My gaze moved to Hakram.

"I prefer Ishaq in the abstract," Adjutant said. "You already have spells, steel is what you lack. But in practice, he'll be more useful as the chief for a band of five."

I breathed out. Well, that was a rather strong endorsement for her.

If she returned.

—

Dusk found me on the ramparts, looking down onto the plains below with company.

"The Dead King's making a mistake," I said.

Tariq stood at my side, rheumy eyes on the sea of death below.

"Is he?" the Grey Pilgrim mused.

"It's a pivotal battle with our backs up against the wall," I said. "We're surrounded and outnumbered. I know I warned your lot about getting cocky, Pilgrim, but I expect that they'll cut through the lesser chaff of Revenants like knives through butter."

That was the way those stories went, wasn't it? The lone company of paladins on the hill, scattering the faceless evil hordes. The few stubborn souls on the wall, keeping down from failing one more time. Creation loved a last stand, loved to turn them into victories – ruinous ones, often, but victories nonetheless.

"I am not so certain, Black Queen," Tariq said. "You knocked a gate into the wall we have our backs against."

I cast a look at him, found his face solemn.

"You think the gate tips the scales the other way?" I frowned. "It shouldn't. We could flee through those, sure, but we're not getting reinforcements. What we have is what's here, and we're severely outnumbered."

"It is not as simple as that," the Peregrine murmured. "It is not about what the gate brings as much as its existence. The stands we make, Catherine, they are not... strategic. Measures. That is what brings them power, you see. It is not a scheme, a trick."

An empty prayer, I thought.

"So you're saying that the gate muddles that," I tried.

"Is the Dead King trying to take Hainaut to destroy us and blow out the last candles of hope," the Grey Pilgrim said, "or because a twilight gate is a great war prize?"

I took a moment to let that sink in, reaching for my pipe and stuffing it. I had to turn around, as the wind blew back the first mouthful of smoke into my face, and I leaned against the crenelated rampart as Tariq kept looking below.

"If it's the candles, we win it," I finally said. "But a prize? He gets to win those. He has won them before."

I pulled at the wakeleaf, troubled. It was not an angle I'd considered.

"Creation is a fickle mistress," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It can be hard to tell what yarn it is she will spin. We are not without a tale of our own, I reckon. One about how a defeat here is the end of the Principate, the first step to the ruin of Calernia. Such stakes bring attention, and attention here is to our advantage I would think."

He glanced at me, arching a white brow.

"It's been hinted to me that Below's less than fond of the Dead King," I acknowledged. "Mind you, he's one of their greats. If they put the finger to the scales here, which I'm not sure they will, I don't think it'll be in his favour."

He nodded, as if he'd expected every word. Considering the angels whispering in his ear, he might have.

"And so it is not a mistake, I do not think," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It is a gamble, instead. A roll of the dice. And even in defeat, he loses nothing here he cannot afford to lose."

I almost objected that if we deal him grievous losses defending the city we'd be able to roll up and expel him from the entire principality of Hainaut, hopefully as a prelude to the Gigantes warding up the shore, but I got what Tariq actually meant. There was nothing down on the plains below that wasn't ultimately expendable to Keter, because everything but the Dead King was expendable to Keter. If this war ended with every undead made ash save for Neshamah himself but all his opposition buried, that was still a victory for the King of Death. His empire of death could always be rebuilt. He had all the time in the world. Us? Not so much. Even a sufficiently costly victory for us here played to his advantage. Every veteran soldier we lost here was one more conscript in the ranks when we came for Keter, every trick and artefact used here one fewer up our sleeve.

Attrition had always been the Dead King's favourite trick, that slow and insidious poison for which there was no cure.

"It still feels like a mistake," I murmured. "I don't know why, Tariq, but it does."

Like I was standing on the edge again, cold fear in my stomach as I looked down at the drop.

"He trains it in us," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Finding the shadow of our defeat in every action we take. It must be fought, Black Queen, else the war will be lost in our heads long before he wins it on the field."

I breathed in deep of the smoke, blew out a long stream of smoke that the wind curled away into nothingness. Tariq was not wrong. I knew that, agreed with it even.

And still it felt like the damned dreams, right before I fell.

Anomandris

Holed up in city. Facing insurmountable odds. Certain death and destruction.

Who do you think the Rohirrim are going to be here in the story? The Free cities? Amadeus?

NRFTW

Abigail

308924810a

At this point the only unengaged forces are the Elves, Dwarves, and possibly the potential to spare some more Drow from the northern front if they start marching south right this instant.

Daniel

And Amadeus and Ranger, if Ranger finds the Scourges worth hunting. I don't think the Dwarves will bother losing any of theirs in a battle where a decisive defeat for Keter is off the table. The drow are more likely, through the Twilight Ways. And MAYBE some contingent of tribal Orcs bribed to act as some kind of mercenaries.

Alex Straughan

Don't forget about The Horned Lords, one of them could bring an army to sign up for the Terms.

308924810a

The only mentions I've found of why people don't wake up the Horned Lords more often is that they tend to wake up hungry, being the personification of that trope where someone wakes or unseals an ancient evil, expecting them to be grateful, then has that ancient evil turn on them.

Truth of the matter is that I can't figure out how anyone on our side of the conflict would even contact the Horned Lords, and whether doing so would create a coherent force with any chance of coordinating with any of the other forces in the field.

There's certainly a chance that the right Horned Lord could convince the ratlings to fall on either the rear of the Dead King's position or the rear of the Drow position, but it's uncertain how valuable that would actually be -we're not sure if they can break through the veil of Night(or coordinate with any force that can), and the Dead King can probably just poison his corpses/ outfight the ratlings with the extra forces he might still be holding back/retreat from that front and leave the ratlings to assault the remaining Lycaonese, to counter the whole approach.

Someperson

Also Horned Lords make for very annoying Revenants.

nimelennar

White Knight & co. are the obvious candidates, so let's eliminate them.

It won't be reinforcements from Callow, because Viv already brought those. Ditto for the Firstborn; if Sve Noc were going to summon help, they would have arrived with it.

Akua is definitely being set up for a Han Solo style moment, but I think that's more of a personal turning point and not a story turning point (although it could be both).

If I had to guess, I would say that now is the perfect time for this magnificent bastard to ride in:

"May we meet again, my queen, before the end," [he] said. "For every gift you gave you took fair measure, and I can pay no higher compliment."

"And what will you do?" I asked.

"Whatever we wish, my queen," the one-eyed fox said. "For be it wicked or righteous, it will be entirely ours."

Hitogami

I highly doubt it'll be that tricky bastard, but I'd enjoy seeing what he's done with himself

ninegardens

Meanwhile, it turns out he's spent the last 2 years leading elves to Ranger once per week, so that the crazy bitch is too busy to stab his eyes out.

Liliet

The fucking elves?

Oh, there ARE dwarves waiting in the wints. Maybe they'll deign.

Tom

TBH I'm not expecting to see the dwarves until next book, if we see them above ground at all. There's been so little mention of them in this book that it would feel kind of out of place, plus what we've seen of them makes them seem better at wrecking cities than breaking sieges (though presumably they have some capacities for the latter too).

Miles

Akua is missing on the eve of battle and also a mentor figure to cat with the magic lessons

RubberBandMan

The fact that everyone is absolutely sure that Akua is going to stick with them in this hell trap when she's weakened and free to leave is starting to make me twitchy.

Sure, they're probably right. But the fact that they're so sure is ... Worrying. There's betting on someone pulling through because you want to believe in them, even if it hurts you when they fail, and there's not even considering that you might not know them entirely. What if Akua was trying to help, but fucked it up somehow? What if she's planning a long game and won't be around for this particular battle?

What if she's lost and alone and confused and scared and hurt and there's no Woe for her to be sardonic to?!?

dadycool

Oh, the fact that there's so much optimism right before such a big battle has been setting me on edge the whole chapter.

edrey

Akua is definily the finger on the scales for below, the story dont fit otherwise

Liliet

Note that Cat herself isn't, just everyone else in the Woe is. I think the shape's right for Akua to come back in time and prove them right.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's not just that, it's them feeling it coming together. Namely, that the Woe is about to include Akua as a band of five. All three of the other Named Woe probably feel it stronger then Cat, who's name is not fully formed again. She's gonna show up, with some "fangs" as Archer put it. Perhaps at the last second, or even during the fight, but she's there because how would a member of the Woe not be there for a fight that requires the Woe?

Tom

Vampire Akua is so hot right now

Sinead

Akua's appearance will probably make or break my theory on her becoming sponsored by Compassion. Might as well doup in everything here I can think of.

I can argue it either way (Discussion on patronage, the presumption that she is going to look for "fangs" when she may actually become even more limited (though undead are probably a loophole). This means that Akua could possibly be someone that does the last minute arrival for Hanno (thinking of Tariq finding Laurence for example) and then comes back to the siege at it's low point. She could be the final snowflake on the avalanche that causes Hanno's crisis to resolve itself (there has been great discussions by Lillet and others on "Akua may never be able to balance the scales, but there is no reason not to try anyway) which may help resolve Hanno's issues around Judgement and actually draw out Hierarch.

Hell, Akua arriving as a healer that starts at healing Arthur has some awesome Morganna Le Fay similarities as well.

...I think that ties together all of my theories over this past book into one interdependent pile. Let's now see how well it stands.

ByVectron!

What if she went to the DK to become his Chancellor?

Rob

Dead king doesn't share power. Chancellor is the name meant to replace a Dread Emperor/Empress.

So highly doubtful

Turning to DK for a chance of rebirth from her "shade" state is possible though.

Am of the opinion she will stay with the Woe though.

Levi Kalden

I think cat considers her returning not in the matter of her personalty but more of her story. As an ex Named with importance to her name she is bound to the workings of fate and cat doesn't think this to be the right point in time to leave if she ever will

308924810a

So Catherine is developing an intuition that the Twilight Gate is somehow a mistake, even though it's a necessity for their capacity to undertake this campaign and battle plan.

I'm vaguely inclined to trust that intuition, but I don't think it's an insurmountable problem.

They have plenty of opportunity to take on supplies now, so what happens if she DESTROYS that gate, acting at the moment that they successfully divine Keter's plans around the thing and potentially turning the situation into another completely surrounded final stand partway through the siege?

caoimhinh

No, it's the opposite. Her intuition is that Neshamah is making a mistake.

It was Pilgrim who thought it wasn't that, and convinced Cat that it was a gamble, yet Catherine still feels deep in her that Neshamah is making a mistake, somehow. Which is interesting.

Look at their conversation:

"The Dead King's making a mistake," I said.

"Is he?" the Grey Pilgrim mused.

"It's a pivotal battle with our backs up against the wall," I said.

"I am not so certain, Black Queen," Tariq said. "You knocked a gate into the wall we have our backs against."

"You think the gate tips the scales the other way?" I frowned. "It shouldn't."

"It is not as simple as that," the Peregrine murmured. "It is not about what the gate brings as much as its existence. The stands we make, Catherine, they are not... strategic. Measures. That is what brings them power, you see. It is not a scheme, a trick."

That made Catherine worry, as it was an angle she hadn't considered, but the conversation moved on, and then came this:

"And so it is not a mistake, I do not think," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It is a gamble, instead. A roll of the dice. And even in defeat, he loses nothing here he cannot afford to lose."

"It still feels like a mistake," I murmured. "I don't know why, Tariq, but it does."

Like I was standing on the edge again, cold fear in my stomach as I looked down at the drop.

"He trains it in us," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Finding the shadow of our defeat in every action we take. It must be fought, Black Queen, else the war will be lost in our heads long before he wins it on the field."

I breathed in deep of the smoke, blew out a long stream of smoke that the wind curled away into nothingness. Tariq was not wrong. I knew that, agreed with it even.

And still it felt like the damned dreams, right before I fell.

Conclusion: Catherine is not talking about her side making a mistake. It's just that she can actually feel that the Dead King is making a mistake, but doesn't know how she knows or what the mistake is.

So I'm guessing there are Name shenanigans at play here. Or maybe whatever it was that she got from the Bard's echo back then.

308924810a

I think that partway through that conversation they switched which side's mistake they were talking about.

Liliet

Specifically, in between these two statements:

> "And so it is not a mistake, I do not think," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It is a gamble, instead. A roll of the dice. And even in defeat, he loses nothing here he cannot afford to lose."

> "It still feels like a mistake," I murmured. "I don't know why, Tariq, but it does."

caoimnh quoted these together so it's easy to follow: yep, this is not an easy to follow switch from the outside XD but Cat knew Pilgrim would know what she's talking about! The first refers to Neshamah making a mistake (a very "wait, that can't be right" paranoia fuel), the second to Catherine making a mistake by failing to see his REAL angle.

ninegardens

My guess is that what she can see looks like a mistake, but also... Dead king doesn't make mistakes. Therefore there must be something she can not see.

That's what's bothering her.

If she can feel Nessie making a mistake, but she knows that isn't true, then it means her intuition is off.

And if I had to guess... the prophecy of "Giants do something critical in the twilight ways" is part of that. a CRITICAL part of that.

... Has Nessie figured out how to send troops through twilight? They keep emphasizing that he can't, and by that logic...

Liliet

I think it's both. Catherine started talking about Neshamah making a mistake because it seemed implausible to her and made her feel like she was missing something. Pilgrim provided the missing pieces, but Catherine still feels like something's wrong. Might be she's right, might be it's what Pilgrim said – paranoia carefully nurtured to trip her up and rip defeat out of the jaws of victory.

Mental Mouse

> And still it felt like the damned dreams, right before I fell.

Here is what Neil Gaiman had to say about falling dreams, in "Fear of Falling": "Sometimes you wake up, and sometimes the fall kills you. And sometimes, when you fall, you fly."

Burnsy

I have a theory, based on basically no evidence but the general sense that the Dead King is going to pull a fast one:

- 1) Kairos told Cat that the Ways can lead to other places than creation, a gun that's yet to be fired. Places like, possibly, the Serenity.
- 2) We know TDK has living human agents raised in the Serenity, a realm of unknown size.
- 3) the Twilight Ways are the Coalitions' trump card because they actively destroy any of the undead that try to enter them

Theory: The Dead King is going to send a strike force of living soldiers via the Serenity, through the Twilight Ways and hit them in the back in the middle of the battle, simultaneously cutting off their escape route.

Jason Ispwitch

I can see it happening... but could that possibly be the mistake Cat is sensing?

He's the Dead King, after all, not the King of Lots of Undead and Lots of Brainwashed Living People Too. My intuition is that violating his Name like that would have consequences.

On the mundane level, it offers the opportunity for lots of things not in his favor. Morale boost for Good Guys "the Dead King couldn't touch us with all his undead because we're so good, so he had to send living troops". An unmatched chance for more intel, from his living forces. The chance to seed doubt back into Serenity.

He still could do it, but I'm guessing it won't work out well in the end for him if he does.

308924810a

Y'see that would make more sense than my paranoia.

I've been worrying that he was going to draw things out for as long as possible, then ask his ally Malicia to send a force into the Twilight Ways to make a permanent gate from there into one of the more dangerous parts of the Hells.

Then you've got devils bursting out of every permanent gate the Grand Alliance has made, and maybe some of them having the senses to manage sidling getting out at random to terrorize the countryside.

Liliet

I'm not sure that's how Twilight works. Its relationship with space is not linear.

Crash

Side note, is Malicia even allowed there? I don't recall.

The Ways are finnick against undead because Tariq really didn't want them there. Can't imagine he had a much better option about the Dread Empress.

Or would that be too specific to take effect?

Liliet

Zombie III was undead and the Ways didn't give as hit. It was specifically Dead King's work.

I suspect covering two opponents like that would be spreading the weight too thin, so Malicia's in the clear.

Mental Mouse

Well, Zombie III was Winter undead (that is, actually a fae construct), and Cat's Winter undead weren't affected by Light. But Malicia is just a human Named, no barrier for her, any more than for Amdaeus and Ranger. Obviously, trying to raise undead in the Ways would be bad, but I suspect even her extra bodies probably wouldn't have a problem – by all accounts, those are sorcerous constructs but not undead.

Liliet

Actually IIRC the extra bodies are DEFINITELY undead at the base.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. If so, then Malicia probably can't send them into Twilight, and she's unlikely to risk her real body.

Liliet

Ah, but that WOULD turn it into the kind of last stand story Pilgrim is saying the Twilight gate saved him from.

Mental Mouse

In addition to the other replies – the Alliance holds their gate, certainly on the creation side and perhaps even on the Twilight side. Any hostiles coming out of it will be coming through a single portal into the heart of an alert and active army.

erebus42

So Bellow is not a huge fan of the Dead King huh. I wonder if it's because he's been on the board so long that they've grown bored with him.

Insanenoodlyguy

He's stagnation. Unchanging, unlearning. The gods want their creations to DO stuff. And he's really only able to be useful in this way by making others who can still grow and learn do stuff in response to him. So him actually winning, and then making the continent go into effective stasis isn't their preferred outcome.

Frivolous

I believe the DK is a bit of a dead weight as far as Below is concerned. He represents an enormous mass of Evil that does little or nothing to serve the cause of Evil in the wider world. This gives Good an advantage so long as Good doesn't go after Keter, because Good can bestow more heroes to balance out Keter.

Sometimes I think that heroes have an advantage in their capacity to age. Villains are unaging and can stagnate even without becoming undead. Heroes can't, because they die off eventually.

Mental Mouse

> Villains are unaging and can stagnate even without becoming undead. Heroes can't, because they die off eventually.

That is roughly science's best answer to the question of "why do we ("we" being nearly all multicellular life!) get old and die?" If a population doesn't change, then sooner or later, either a changing environment, or a new innovation from another species, will wipe out the whole population. Aging forces turnover and gives new variations a chance to shine.

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: Good thought. Astute, incisive.

Villains don't age, but they do attract violence. So despite their lack of aging, they are forced to evolve, because if they don't they get killed.

In further thought regarding the Dead King: I think one reason Below dislikes him is his primary motive: He's a coward, and everything he does is in service of his cowardice. He isn't curious, and he's not particularly experimental or exploratory. He took his ball and went home, and now no one can play because he guards his ball ferociously.

Neshamah just sits there like a block of ice that refuses to melt, whereas Below wants him to be water, flowing and pushing.

There have been other undead Named rulers before, like Dread Emperor Revenant, but Revenant wasn't a coward.

I think one reason why Below favors Cat is she is the very opposite of a coward. She's vibrant and active and transformative in ways that further the Great Experiment that is Creation.

Mental Mouse

> He isn't curious, and he's not particularly experimental or exploratory. Which probably has a lot to do with being undead. I dunno about Below "wants him to be like water", but certainly they have to be getting bored with him. The rest of the continent mostly learned not to open the box on him, and Crusades against Keter had decayed into a routine.

Cat has chained the routine big-time, and indeed is rewriting rules almost across the board... and she even shares the fun with Above's crew. Much more interesting....

Insanenoodlyguy

"And I did good work," she agreed. "But you were all boosting Practical Guide to Evil on topwebfiction,, and I was spending more time on excuses about why I wasn't than figuring out how I could do the same."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/boost>

Mental Mouse

I note that we are currently second on their All-Time Favorites list, and not far behind Worm on that.

RoflCat

Something of a hindsight, but I guess Indrani's rather quick approval of Akua's release might be attributed to her past.

Liliet

Indrani has also been on Cat's case about her personal emotional issues wrt Akua since at least the post-Prince's Graveyard campfire arc, but you're probably very much also right 😡

Liliet

oh my god when will this emoji stop blindsiding me. :x is not fucking 😡 !!!

Mental Mouse

And that's why people prefer actual graphic emojis to old-style emoticons. Once you're past the basic three or four, the natural spelling of expressions gets... ideosyncratic. 😊

Liliet

Wait, what? Who prefers what? What's the distinction between emoji and emoticon here?

My entire problem here is that I want the straightforward keyboard symbol smileys, and evil platforms convert them into whatever stupid images they think line up with them
)=

Mental Mouse

> Wait, what? Who prefers what?
Okay, fair cop.

"Emoticon" wasas the "fancy name" for text smileys, "emoji" took hold for the graphical form.

The problem with text smilies was and still is, that for all the lists of them that got passed around on USENET, once you got past the first half-dozen at most, people stop agreeing on what they mean. – e.g., does an "x" mouth mean kissing or cursing? Does it matter if it's uppercase? What about an asterisk? That was an issue 40 years ago (well before the Web existed!), and it hasn't gone away.

The little graphical cartoons that are emojis, some of them enshrined by UNICODE, aren't completely without ambiguity, but they're a lot better. And note that a UNICODE character is defined by its numeric value and official description, not by its graphical representation.

So, some software tries automatically converting one way or the other. This works okay on, say, Discord where you get rapid feedback. Not so well on WordPress, where you don't get to see the program's interpretation until after it's too late to edit.

Note that my E-mail client Thunderbird actually mechanizes that disaster, for the worst of both worlds! It lets you choose graphics such as "foot-in-mouth" or "embarrassed", and shows them to you as graphics, but it then converts them to text on send. Good luck if your reader is using a different client, that might interpret them differently or not at all.

Liliet

Valid. And thanks for the explanation!

Anyway, I'm going to keep using emoticons and inventing combinations that platforms I use haven't caught yet. Fuck them, I'm gonna keep running this race.

Holy shit Thunderbird. I'm so glad I haven't used that function in it, I DID wonder how the FUCK it would have worked.

(Note: the reason I use)= and (= and ^^ at all is bc of races long past...)

Juff

Typo Thread:

liked to believed > liked to believe and no cost > at no cost deference the > deference to the and feeding > feeding (or which fed) be remain > remain
as either some > as some
It's not another (shouldn't this be "just another") yet the crossroads > yet reached the crossroads quite good as > quite good at her ever seeing her > ever seeing her what the scare > was the scare reasons follow > reasons I follow
I'd take away > It'd take away the sole that > the sole one that "I was considering (extra space at the start)
"The either > "Then either surprise form > surprise from likes knives > like knives
we deal him > we dealt him

Big I

I think the giants are going to betray them to the Dead King, so as to repay Procer for screwing them over centuries ago.

Konstantin von Karstein

There's zero chance of that. The DK doesn't make alliances, except with powerful Villains. The Gigantes know he will betray them and kill/raise them. They also know that after Procer they're next.

Burlyraven

Heh, everyone on the same page that bringing the Squire along would be a terrible idea is very satisfying.

I'm with Pilgrim here: this coming fight is not going to be a last stand. This is a grand brawl over a strategic asset. In many ways, that's actually a good thing, as it actually puts more story weight behind the gate if they can secure it (see my prediction of the gate story-locking the area for the Alliance for decades or centuries), but it also means a defeat for the Grand Alliance has weight as a plot device in a more powerful story (see another of my predictions that if Cat didn't have a solid Name by now, she'd earn it amidst the corpses of her army). Neither is certain, and unless there's an angle I'm not seeing, I don't think this story gets a heroic charge from reinforcements.

That said, the shipper in me is totally rooting for Kingfisher deciding to abandon his post in an attempt to woo Cat by being a heroic badass. The high military commander would totally go for that sort of thing, right? (half /s)

Mental Mouse

Eh, he knows better. He was relating to her as one professional soldier and leader to another, quick and discreet fling not excepted.

Yunamed

I have a feeling Cat's going to lose big....I'm feeling very uneasy about the upcoming battle...

Thanatoss

Remember that Cat never lost any big/significant battle. It is basically one of the most important parts of her story.

This is why I have strong feeling about her getting some big connection with Trumphant:

- it was hinted few chapters ago that she can "feel" giant's magic and if Trumphant fought vs them what monster she was,
- Cat and Trumphant got the same room in Keter
- Trumphant killed Judgement Angel, and Cat gives pause to

Angels

This is big pattern, i have no idea what comes from it but damn

Liliet

As has been brought up in their conversation, an actual defeat here is endgame, end of story, Neshamah wins. That won't happen.

There are a lot of shades of costly victory remaining available though...

Sinead

ALL HAIL DREAD EMPRESS VICTORIOUS!!!

New crack theory: Cat climbs the Tower and becomes the last Dread Empress of Praes, as she literally never dies/holds the reigns long enough that she forces the legend to fade.

(Hey, Callow's based on Great Britain. Of course the last great Queen of an Empire is Queen Victoria....)

Reader in The Night

I wonder what was that with the Fate stuff? Cat seems to be actively anticipating an Akua betrayal because her Fate is inescapable, but I thought she was more the type to say "Fuck Fate, I make my own Destiny".

Also, how does her actively anticipating Akua's Sudden But Inevitable Betrayal equate with her setting up a punishment for Akua? Did she somehow set up a way for Akua to self-destruct when she (inevitably) turn Evil again, just to drive home the point that Akua was never a better person and could never have been a better person, no matter how much she tried? That seems a little... Harsh, and against the themes of the story being told so far.

I suppose I could see something like the ending of Portrait of Dorian Gray, but that doesn't seem all that satisfying.

Sinead

Huh. I read it as the fact that while Akua now has her freedom, she feels bound to stick around, even though everything she has been taught says to flee.

I don't expect a betrayal, I just see that Akua's return won't be a form of overwhelming firepower, but something different,

beleester

Everyone thinks they can be like “screw fate, I make my own path”, but not many people actually do. Here’s how I read that exchange, more or less.

Akua: Ha! You were doing that heroic “if you love something, set it free” thing, weren’t you? Well screw that, I make my own fate. I’m leaving.

Cat: I totally knew she’d do that. She’ll be back.

Crash

Honestly I agree with Cat. Akua is leaving, but not now. Doesn’t feel right yet.

Liliet

Well, it was more like:

Akua: What bullshit! How dare you make me stay willingly!

Cat: I’m not making you stay.

Akua: Oh come on! You want me to stay and are hypnotizing me into it with your evil heroic viles!

Cat: I’m literally giving you my blessing to leave right now.

Akua: ...

Cat: ...I have no idea if she’ll be back.

...I might be a little confused about what Cat’s trying to do here.

Christian Oaks

Cats punishment for akua has always been to show her everything she did was wrong, she could have had friends and happiness and power all along or something along those lines. She does that by being her friend, and the logical step in that is not forcing a friend into something dangerous

Crash

That conversation is now canon.

Liliet

> Cat seems to be actively anticipating an Akua betrayal because her Fate is inescapable

I don’t think it’s a betrayal she’s anticipating, at least not for good.

Daniel E

Yes yes, drama and tense action, blah blah. You know what could allow breaking that bridge from safe distance while keeping White Knight & company behind to defend? A flying horse 🐎 (never letting this one go)

Darkening

A flying horse dropping mirror knight onto the bridge from a mile up at terminal velocity before it flies off to eat bodies somewhere. Poor horse.

Crash

If Cat said those words near one of their augurs I'm fairly certain they'd just drop dead instantly.

Foresight isn't working, the White Knight has just left on a quest and the Black Queen is saying the Dead King is making a mistake? (Insert obligatory this is all part of Bard's scheme here)

Oh boy.

Frivolous

I believe that this chapter gives new information on Vivienne's past quandary as Thief, and why she eventually lost her Name.

It's interesting, this new anecdote from her perspective, in that she was finding excuses not to learn and improve, in contrast to all the other Woe, and also in contrast to heroes like Hanno and Roland.

The Name of Thief would not, I think, have been so brittle in someone other than Vivienne. Being a hero and Thief, compelled to rob the wicked, to take, should not in itself have prevented Viv from learning and growing. I think another Thief could have been more constructive and creative about it.

Examples in fiction include Roark, the male protagonist of J D Robb aka Nora Roberts' In Death series, who started out a pickpocket and branched out to computer science because he had to defeat sophisticated technological security systems, and eventually became a business billionaire who merely stole art and jewels as a hobby, for fun.

I think Vivienne's problem was she robbed out of anger. She didn't take any real joy in being the Thief. It didn't make her happy. So maybe that caused her to coast along, relying on her Name.

I wonder if and suspect that all this talk about how Vivienne lost or left behind her Name could be important later on, because studying how a Name is lost without that Named dying can be useful in predicting how a Name is gained.

It might also be relevant to the Intercessor. Surely that is someone whom Catherine would like to see lose her Name.

Liliet

Vivienne's problem was that she was playing an RPG while Cat's faction was playing an economic strategy game, and she kept feeling the mismatch without quite knowing what to do about it.

Mental Mouse

> "Is the Dead King trying to take Hainaut to destroy us and blow out the last candles of hope," the Grey Pilgrim said, "or because a twilight gate is a great war prize?"

> I took a moment to let that sink in, reaching for my pipe and stuffing it. I had to turn around, as the wind blew back the first mouthful of smoke into my face, and I leaned against the crenelated rampart as Tariq kept looking below.

Okay, I think we've got a hint that Tariq's just right here. Notice how the moment after he comes out with that, Cat's smoke gets blown into her own face? Have we ever seen that in text before?

Sinead

...That is a very solid point. It's a frustrating point, because it runs in the face of strategy. But then again, that final stand is for "after strategy fails".

I wonder if this shows the difference between Above and Below. Above gives a "last stand" boon to it's champions, who sacrifice themselves to overthrow their foes, while Below gives a curse with their dying breath.

In the end, is there a mechanical difference in effects, or is it just the mindset on how they are implemented?

Liliet

Damage vs preservation, I would guess. ~~the thing Amadeus is so mad about~~

Sinead

Exactly! Though the death of all players means you have Preservation and Destruction without oversight on the After. The first leads to rigidity of thought, with no desire to change, while the second uncaringly strips away the good and the bad. The end result puts them back in the issue of the Garden: cyclical thought that never really changes.

Hence Amadeus' curse on all martyrs of the First Step of Change.

Liliet

I suddenly feel like I was thrown into Mistborn...

Sinead

Hah! I hadn't noticed the name similarities

I don't know about you, but I sort of wish that the series "growth through the ranks" made a point that Stories are not actually what are at play within the dynamics of the world (they switch so quickly – look at Karios and Saint's interactions) Rather, stories are how mortals track it akin to High Arcana. Perhaps that is what we are building up to with Cat more fully stepping on the level of Bard and Nemeshah. She isn't there yet because she balances so many hats. I suspect that the end of the book sees Cat shedding the Crown of Callow, and mantle of First Under Night, and stepping into her emerging Role. That is her Fall into the Abyss. The Crows do not reject her, she just will have outgrown the Role, and they her. Although I do hope she keeps some relationship with the Sisters. They are so entertaining.

Granted, this might be me reading my own biases into the setting, since "Narrative" as an objective force is something that I find frustrating since you do end up with a lot of the issues that were called out by this series over and over again. But the fact that the system can be "played" to me means that the base premise of "narrative" is fundamentally flawed.

A side note: When Cat abdicates, part of me wants there to be a pomp and circumstance scene between her and Vivienne of passing the torch akin to Cat's and Edward VII. While Callow may ultimately sour on Cat's reign, the scene between Edward and Cat reads to me as the seal of legitimacy of the Crown (independent of Above and Below).

But I am biased there too as I go back and re read that scene every so often.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure it's actually very much about narrative. People's perception and "collective subconscious" actively warps reality, and that's something I absolutely adore as a concept, so there's my bias in the opposite direction from yours 😊

Like, issues? No shit there are issues in how people process things, in how the same event can be interpreted multiple times, in how this interacts with the agency of people it's actually happening to, etc. That's the fun part!

(I mean, we've had WoG explicitly confirm that a particular Name coming into existence or not depends on cultural prerequisites... That's such a fun concept???)

And of course you can play the narrative. Stories are what the storyteller makes them, it's just that in this universe you're telling the story with your entire existence and not just out loud. Of course you get to manipulate other people's perception, that's how other people's perception works 😊

ALSO I VERY MUCH THINK EDWARD VII GAVE CAT'S REIGN A SEAL OF LEGITIMACY AND I KIND OF WANT THAT TO COME UP TBH ALONGSIDE THE SWORD IN THE STONE ANGELIC RESURRECTION THING
there are few legitimate rulers as legitimate as Catherine is ;u;

Matthew Wells

So I've been thinking, what will the titles be when PTGE gets published?

Two possibilities I've thought of:

- 1: Squire
- 2: Adjutant
- 3: Thief
- 4: Archer
- 5: Hierophant
- 6: Shade
- 7: Judge (or whatever Cat is becoming)

Or maybe:

- 1: Squire
- 2: Lady
- 3: Sovereign
- 4: Priestess
- 5: Queen
- 6: Judge (idem)
- 7: Peacemaker?

Chapter 77: Tribulation

"I agree that outliving your enemies is the greatest of revenges, my friend, but we seem to have something of a philosophical difference about how that is to be achieved."

– Dread Empress Maledicta II

There was a pond on the guildhall's grounds.

Like everything else in this cursed city, it was dead. The weeds in the drab water had withered, the grass around the rim blackened. Even the mud at the bottom looked darker than it should. But the water was warm, having soaked in the sunlight of the day, and it was a pleasant sensation when I soaked my bad leg in it. I left my boots in the dead grass and looked up at the sky through dead branches reaching out like fingerbones. Something ghosted across the tripwire of Night I'd woven around the thicket, giving me a name before I ever saw a face. It was a short list, the people who would be able to pass with so light a presence. I clutched my silence tight, staring up at the cloudless blue sky as I waited patiently.

"How very carefree," Akua said. "I am surprised you did not send for a bottle of wine as well."

I chuckled, eyes staying on the blue.

"I still have duties this evening," I said, "and drinking half a bottle would make me want to take a nap."

It was a tempting thought even knowing I did not have the time to spare. Leaning back on the soft ground, my feet in the water and with a belly warmed by wine? It'd be a pleasant way to spend a summer afternoon, even one soon to be shadowed by war. I heard Akua come closer, wondering if the way I'd heard a sound at all was a concession on her part. Back when she'd still had hooks in the Night, her steps had made no sound and left behind no trace. Now, though, who knew?

"Are you done making plans of war, then?" she idly asked.

A little too idly, I decided.

"No," I said. "We want you with us when we go for the Archmage. Masego made paired stones."

"You'd have no use of me," Akua said. "I am without power."

I blinked in surprise. I'd thought for sure that getting fangs of her own was why she'd disappeared. Peeling my eyes away from the endless blue expanse, I turned and found her leaning against a beech tree. It was a long black dress she wore, with elaborate patterns looking like sunflowers across it all the way to the straps that kept it fastened against her collarbone. Her hair was styled in a manner I'd never seen on her before, closely cut on the left and sweeping towards the right. As was often the way when she preferred her thoughts obscured, her face was unreadable. I cocked my head to the side.

"Are you?" I asked.

She smiled viciously, all the more beautiful for the anger she bared.

"Is this when you speak of the powers of love to me?" Akua asked.

"It's not a force to be underestimated," I mildly agreed.

It had kept the Dread Empire of Praes together for forty year, after all, made it the most powerful it had been in centuries. Without Black and Malicia, the genuine trust and affection between them, it would have all collapsed years before the Conquest could begin. And without the Conquest, neither of us would be here under the afternoon sun in faraway Hainaut.

"You do not love me, Catherine," she said. "In any sense of the word. I am not your friend or your companion, I am the woman who butchered a hundred thousand of your people. I am the doom of Liesse, the mother of the folly you have hung around my neck."

Her fingers clenched.

"Let us not pretend otherwise," Akua harshly said. "I tire of the game."

I studied her for a long moment, finding the anger boiling in her. The confusion too, or perhaps the shame? Even when sentiment peeked through clearly, she was more nuanced a woman than most.

"You know better," I simply said.

It wouldn't work if I were lying. If there was not a genuine affection, a genuine attraction. I was not skilled enough a liar to be able to fool her for long. She knew this, too, though she did not want to believe it. But this wasn't really about me, I decided. It was about her. You are afraid, I thought.

"You made a choice, didn't you?" I mused.

She flinched. My hands clenched, as I tasted the heady brew that was triumph and grief so deeply intertwined as to be indistinguishable. I'd done it. From here to the end, now, it was all writ.

"I sought the fae," Akua quietly said. "Through eerie paths. And I found what I wanted: one of them blinded by story, who would not see the knife until it was too late."

"Power through blood," I murmured.

Masego had firmly rejected the notion of making up for the loss of his magic by acquiring another power, be it Night or something usurped from some lesser god. It's not power I want, he'd told me. It is magic, Catherine, and for that there is no replacement. Yet it was not in Masego's nature to seek dominion, not the way it was in Akua's. For all that they were both the children of two of some of the most powerful figures in the Wasteland, they had been raised in fundamentally different ways.

"Through murder," Akua thinly smiled. "As much the transgression as what is offered up. It would have been a... beginning. Once I devoured that strength, it would have been easier to gain more."

"And yet you didn't," I said.

Her face closed.

"I still might."

I half-smiled. She was always easiest to grasp when she was similar to me, and when I had I ever been above threatening to cut my nose to spite my face?

"And what would that prove?" I asked.

"That I am not weak," Akua coldly said.

"You say that like there's only ever one way to be strong," I replied.

She hesitated. Once upon a time, she might have dismissed that. It was too late now, though. She'd strayed too far from the invisible fences of the Wasteland, seen the greater world beyond and the myriad strange and terrifying entities that strode it. She had seen powers rivalling the greatest of the Old Tyrants, not a single one having walked down their path.

"There's only one way to claim the Tower," she said.

Praes has failed, I could have said. Or, why would you want to? Or, why does your mother still rule you?

"And will that satisfy you?" I asked instead.

She did not answer, looking away. The silence stretched out until it was so taut I feared it might snap.

"Your way," Akua finally said, "it gives nothing. I came back empty-handed."

"Oh, I wouldn't say that," I murmured. "You came back after having made a choice, Akua."

"Is failure a choice, then?" she scorned. "What great revelation did I drag back with me, fleeing like a fearful child?"

I thought of a few moments stolen away before dawn, in the Graveyard's wake, of the same woman now before me standing above Kairos Theodosian with burning eyes. Of the words she had spoken then, addressed as much to herself as to the Tyrant.

"That you are more than blood," I said. "That you are more than what they made of you."

I saw something like hate in her golden eyes when she faced me, but for who I could not tell.

"It wasn't you," Akua quietly said. "So do not gloat, even where you think I cannot see. It wasn't you at all, Catherine."

I slowly nodded. Her face fell and she looked down at her hands.

"It's never just power," she said. "In that much at least you were right. I wanted to take from the fae and wield it as I once did sorcery, but in the end..."

She softly laughed, as if appalled at herself.

"All I could think of was those lessons with my father," Akua said. "The joy in him, when he shared magic with me."

She looked away again.

"It would have been ugly, replacing that with a thimble of power earned through cheap murder," Akua quietly said. "Ugly all the way down."

You told me about your cradle-sister, once, I thought as I watched her. A girl called Zain, whose throat your mother made you cut when you were barely eight years old. And you told me, after, that your regret about that day was that you cut her shallow. That she bled out slower than she needed to because your hand hadn't been steady.

"And so now I return to Hainaut, empty-handed and fool," she scoffed.

Deftly, I went rifling through the many pockets of my cloak until I had what I looked for: two small stones, enchanted by Masego's own hand. Her set of paired stones. She went still as I reached out, slowly prying her fingers open and pressing them into her palm.

"You returned to us," I corrected.

And golden eyes searched me, looking for the lie and finding only truth. I had meant every word. And I also thought: if you had to cut her throat again, right now, your hand would tremble.

Her fingers closed around the stone. I withdrew my hand.

I looked up at the blue sky, winning and lost.

—

"The city was made to be held," Sapper-General Pickler said. "And if simple force of arms decides this, it will hold. You have my word on that."

I cut into my slice of beef, chewing thoughtfully. I'd not necessarily meant our shared meal to be about our duties, but I honestly couldn't recall ever having a meal with Pickler where business wasn't touched on at some point. I'd never taken it personally, of course. Pickler didn't draw the line between duty and her personal life the way most people did. To her it was the work that was the centerpiece of her existence and all the rest was secondary. I sometimes wondered if that was why Robber's long-lasting affections for her had never been reciprocated: romance just wasn't something she cared enough about to ever put above her tinkering.

Mind you, the goblin ways of romance were alien enough to me that even if they were engaged in a torrid affair I'd find it rather hard to tell. For one, their culture typically drew no direct link between being a romantic couple and being physically intimate. Sex was about breeding and arranged by the Matrons to strengthen bloodlines or alliances, nothing else. My understanding of it was that goblins didn't really feel physical desire the way most humans or orcs did, so the... impulse just wasn't there. It was pretty much unheard of for one of their kind to seek a brothel or a fling. It was more of an abstract craving of the other person for them, an itch that didn't require skin to be scratched.

It'd made me rather curious about exactly what it had entailed when Nauk had been courting Pickler, considering he must have known at least as much about goblins as I did, but I'd never quite dared to ask back when we were at the College. And nowadays, what would be the point? He was long dead, and that wound would never heal if I kept picking at it. It wasn't mine alone, anyway. For all that Robber had once made sport of Nauk at every occasion, considering him a rival for Pickler's affections, I could not recall him ever speaking ill of the other man since he'd died. Enemies or not, they had been Rat Company.

That still meant something, to the few of us left.

"It's different when the enemy doesn't break," I reminded her. "The ramp that gets them to the gate is a beautiful killing floor for your engines, but the dead won't ever flee. It'll not be waves so much as a wave, uninterrupted."

"The skeletons aren't the trouble," Robber said, unusually serious. "We can handle the Bones and the Binds, Catherine. The constructs will be a little trickier, but you finally let my people off the leash for a reason."

He bared needle-like fangs in approval. By that he meant I'd cleared all sappers for use of our last goblin munitions, to their riotous cheering. Goblinfire was still restricted, but officers of the rank of tribune and above were allowed to request its deployment in a limited fashion. We'd set aside part of the stock for that purpose, around a third. The rest we had more interesting plans for than just propping up the defence.

"It's not Hannoven or Rhenia," I sighed. "The Volignacs didn't count on the walls cliffside being scaled, or things like beorns and wyrms coming out to play. It's not the gate I'm worried about so much, it was built expecting a fight. It's the rest."

The city of Hannoven was, tales said, essentially a set of ever-taller walls circling a lone mountain. It was widely considered one of the greatest fortresses in all of Calernia even if it had fallen multiple times to ratlings and the Dead King. Rhenia had fallen to neither and was even more daunting a prospect to take: it'd begun as a fortress carved into a cliff but then become a city almost entirely dug within a mountain of solid rock that could be sealed up at will. Both of those great cities had been built without any great weaknesses because the people who'd built them had learned that Keter always punished weakness. But Hainaut just wasn't built the same, for all its striking presence.

It just hadn't had to withstand the same kind of sustained, brutal warfare the Lycaonese cities had. Most of the time undead invasions that'd crossed the lakes and pierced into southern Procer hadn't even bothered to siege the capital, just gone around the plateau and let the Volignacs hole up in their fortress-city up high. Princess Beatrice had admitted to me that there might actually be some truth to the old unpleasant rumours about some of her ancestors outright letting the dead through when the principalities to the south got too troublesome to deal with. I hoped none of the Lycaonese royals ever heard about that, because it was the sort of thing they would take very badly.

"There's not much to be done with walls atop a cliff," Pickler frankly said. "They built with quality stone and saw to the upkeep decently, which passed solid defences on to us. I stand by what I said, Catherine: we can hold this city, so long as Revenants don't pry it away from us."

An expectant gaze followed.

"I won't say the Scourges will be easy meat, or even just the other Revenants," I told her, "but I believe we can win that fight. We prepared, and we have gathered significant Named talent."

I held no illusions that we'd win this without casualties, though. At best we'd lose at least a band of five's worth, but I wouldn't be surprised in the slightest if it were more. We were aiming to snap the Dead King's finest blades, that deed wasn't going to come cheap. And I'll bet one or two of the Scourges will get away whatever we do, I thought, so that they can come back to haunt us if our armies ever make it to Keter.

"If you say we can, then I expect we will," Pickler said, and I started in surprise.

That was pretty effusive by her standards. She'd never been heavy handed with praise, at least outside her fields of interest.

"I do wish we had Juniper and Aisha with us, however," she wistfully added. "Generals Bagram and Zola are skilled, but it isn't the same."

Preaching to the Choir, there.

"Agreed," I murmured.

"Bagram doesn't even inspect kits personally," Robber told us, like this was a great offence.

Way I heard it Juniper had picked up that habit from her mother, General Istrid Knightsbane, but while Bagram had served as Istrid's right hand for over a decade he did not seem inclined to continue the tradition. Juniper famously had been, and the chewing outs she'd given recruits who got sloppy were still legend among the old crowd from the Fifteenth.

"Juniper's doing better," I volunteered. "Last word I got was that she was now able to go several days without episodes."

By year's end she should be fit for field command again, though I wasn't signing off on that until Aisha agreed regardless of what the healers might say. The Hellhound wasn't above bullying priests or mages into saying what she wanted, but Aisha wasn't the kind of woman to let herself get forced into saying a damned thing.

"The Peregrine shortchanged us, if it took this long," Pickler coldly said.

"More like Malicia put her back into fucking with her mind," Robber darkly replied. "Another account to settle out before the knife is sheathed, Boss. The old girl bled us a few times too many."

"Praes will be settled," I evenly said. "By treaties if I can, by the sword if I must."

A shiver went up my spine and for an instant I almost felt like someone was looking at us. I pricked my ears with Night, but we were alone. My sudden distraction had been missed by neither of the goblins, Robber having already discreetly bared a knife under the table.

"False alarm," I said, shaking my head. "The wait's driving me mad, I think."

"Won't be long now," Robber said. "It's in the air, yeah?"

Pickler bared pale, sharp teeth.

"They have never fought a proper siege against our sappers before, Catherine," the Sapper-General of Callow said. "And after this, they will never try to again."

We drank to that, and the meal finished on the high note of Pickler showing me her latest improvements on the contraption of leather bands and steel that she'd first made for me years ago, the device that would send a knife up against my palm if I flicked my wrist just right. They helped me try on, and it was with a smile and a flourish that I revealed a sharp little rib-sticker in goblin steel. It would do nicely, I thought, watching my reflection in the side.

Gods knew I'd not lack use for it.

—

The moon was out in full.

It'd been days since anyone had glimpsed a single cloud above the capital, day or night, and this high up the sights bared by that absence were always striking. The rampart where I had gone to stand had become my favourite for the way it gave me a good look at both Hainaut itself, the island of lights and flames that an inhabited city at night turned into, and the vast expanse of sky above. The stars were visible in a way that they rarely were when standing in a city this size, for the valley around us was a ring of unbroken darkness. The dead saw the same be it night or day, and the forges they used were hidden from our sight. If I let my mind wander I could almost imagine that the city was just an island drifting under the stars, the dark around us nothing but dark and deep waters.

Shadows moved against the darkness, cutting out the lights wherever they passed, but I was not afraid. I knew them too well for that. Two great crows, whose feathers somehow seemed darker than the night sky itself, circled slowly above. They were careful never to leave the sky above the city, where wards made it difficult for the Dead King to attempt anything against them, but that was the only concession to prudence they made. I stayed beneath them, the warmth of the Mantle of Woe pulled tight around me as I pulled at my pipe and let curls of smoke rise up like some fleeting offering to my patronesses. They came to me when they'd had their fill, and in Komana I found vexation at having been denied something to hunt.

The Dead King had robbed the Sisters of any prey they might have sought, killing everything that crawled or swam as far as the eye could see. Their talons had not been red into too long for the Youngest Night's taste. Sve Noc took to the rampart I was leaning against, each landing on one of my sides in a smooth flurry of feathers, and I almost smiled when I heard those sharp talons rake at the stone. There would be marks. They seemed in no hurry to talk, so silence hung between us for some time as I breathed in wakeleaf and spewed it out over the edge of the wall. There was hardly even a breeze, tonight.

"The war does not go well," Andronike said.

My fingers tightened around the dragonbone pipe Masego had gifted me. I forced them to loosen, even though what I had been told was nothing less than deadly serious. It was not the war here in the south that the oldest of the sisters would be speaking of.

"How bad?" I quietly asked.

"We sent Vesena Spear-biter and its sigil into the lands of the dead to ravage and draw attention from your own campaign," Komana said. "All souls were lost."

I softly swore. The Vesena had never particularly impressed me even before their last defeat, but they had been led by the Seventh General and been one of the great assets of the Empire Ever Dark.

"Radhoste and Jutren were lost as well," Andronike said. "The Dreamer to a breach in the Gloom, Jutren to an ambush as it pursued."

That made it the Sixth and Tenth General dead as well. Fuck, the finest of the Firstborn were dropping like flies. I'd thought the northern front halfway under control, what the Hells was happening? The goddesses had never been shy about looking at my thoughts, so I did not need to ask the question to get an answer.

"The Dead King has perfected his answers to Night," Andronike said. "With every battle fewer of the Secrets work unimpeded. The war cannot linger, First Under the Night."

"If it lasts too long, we will die out," Komena harshly said. "Our losses are becoming too great and there are..."

"Concerns," Andronike finished.

Not here, I would have been tasked to address them. That meant up north again, and there were not many who might trouble the Sisters among their kind.

"Kurosiv?" I quietly asked.

"It is now the First General," Komena said.

That wasn't an agreement, not quite, but hardly a denial. I grimaced. Kurosiv the All-Knowing had long been considered a leech by the two Sisters, but not one that it would be easy to remove. It was only going to get worse with time, though. The same stuff of which the apotheosis of Sve Noc was made was what Kurosiv was now hoarding, and though that made the drow powerful it also made the Sisters uniquely vulnerable in some ways. I suspected that swallowing Winter had made them more vulnerable in some ways. That power was not one used to being ruled by the same face for too long, and now that it had been devoured by goddesses of theft and murder expecting loyalty out of it would be naive.

"If we win here decisively, then we can have Hainaut secured by winter," I said. "After that, when the snows clear, it is Keter we turn to."

"We are aware," Andronike said. "It is why we have come, Catherine Foundling. This battle has our full attention."

My heart skipped a beat and I set down my pipe, studying the crows closer.

"You're not the same crows that were here before I left for the Arsenal," I finally said. "How much of you is actually here, Sve Noc?"

The great crows laughed, the sound of it eerily like caws.

"Half," Komena said.

I froze.

"Of everything?" I hissed out.

"This battle," Andronike mildly repeated, "has our full attention."

They had said what they wanted to say, and so found no need to linger. Without bothering with anything as petty as goodbyes, the Sisters dropped off the edge of the rampart and took flight. With dark wings they rose, cutting out even the insolent silver light of the moon as they passed before it. I found my hands were shaking when I picked up my pipe again. I filled it anew, more to have something to do with my hands than hunger for another packet of wakeleaf. Half, Gods save us all. That was... Well, I didn't have to worry about any of the Firstborn here being raised from the dead at least. The Sisters would nip that right in the bud. And Night taken from the undead would form quickly and smoothly, so there was that as well. It was still a heavy investment on their part, to send half of their divinity so far from their seat of power, and I was not quite sure what had driven them to it.

If Komena alone had come I might have called it recklessness, for she was the more hardheaded of the two, but for Andronike to have committed as well? It meant that they no longer considered the war up north one they might feasibly win alone. They were betting on the Grand Alliance because it was the only good bet left to them, not because they felt a particular fondness for our collection of human realms. I let the smoke calm me, thoughts following down the cascade of consequences that Firstborn reverses implied for the war. It might make the dwarves more reluctant to intervene, I concluded with a grimace. The Kingdom Under wasn't interested in picking a fight with Neshamah on behalf of an alliance that was losing, they'd made that much clear: a clear shot at the Crown of the Dead was their prerequisite for sending in their own armies.

With the drow front facing defeat and our three southern ones varying in degrees of deadlock, we did not look like a good horse to back from the dwarven perspective. Better for them to avoid all-out war with the Dead King and instead concentrate on the strategy of underground containment they'd been implementing for centuries. I breathed out the smoke, eyes closed. Yeah, with that in perspective I could see why Andronike would agree to investing so heavily here in Hainaut. We were highly unlikely to win this war without dwarven involvement, and if we lost the battle over the capital the chances of the Kingdom Under joining the dance were pretty much nonexistent. They'd be rushing to finish their containment, not sparing time for dying human petty kingdoms.

Gods Below, there was even more riding on the Battle of Hainaut than I'd thought.

I stirred myself out of the contemplative daze I'd been falling into. Hakram would still be awake, I figured, and I wanted to pick his brains about this. Not only would his insight be welcome on the consequences of the drow being driven back, but there might still be time to prepare some last defences for Hainaut. An idea or two were beginning to coalesce in the back of my head, and – and the city light up, flares of red light going up in the sky as trumpets sounded.

Hainaut stirred awake and from the corner of my eye I saw a patrol of fantassins bearing torches run towards me, but it was not them I paid attention to. Hand against the crenellation, I leaned over the edge of the wall and looked down. And there they were, keeping to shadows as they moved: pale skeletons beginning to climb the cliff, like a swarm of ants going up a wall. And beyond them the entire sea of deaths stirred, thousands upon thousands of corpses and monsters all moving as one. Roars shattered the quiet of the night, a chorus of wyrms announcing their presence and their hunger for the destruction to come, and below great ladders of black iron were brought to the fore as Keter began unleashing its preparations.

The battle for Hainaut had begun.

ErraticErrata

And so we start the final stretch of Book VI. As usual, first update of the month means an extra chapter in the eponymous tab. It's "Colossal II", the second and last part of the Antigone POVs.

amit27592

This is going to be one epic battle! Both of the martial kind and mind/story games.

I think this is the first big martial fight since the Everdark arc.

dadycoool

The goblins finally get to go all out, yay!

Also, that "Half" kinda reminds me of the Joker in The Dark Knight.

Sinead

You know, I had had a great conceptual picture of poetic prose to about how the nature of being Named is to take steps on the mountain the separates the mortals from the Immortals, and that the bindings and pressure of the power shapes you the deeper into it's grip you go, forging your soul into the absolutist mould that bears kinship to the Angelic hosts and Infernal hordes. And that while villains have cast down Angels, have any ever made a Devil Rise?

But * all that noise!

AKUA IS GONNA BE THE BEST COMPASSION GIRL!

Liliet

I'm pretty sure PGTE continues to not be a cultivation story, and the point remains down here around mortals where power is just a means to very socialist ends...

But man, Akua swearing to Compassion honestly sounds weirdly less far-fetched than it really should. Cat's estimation that her hand would tremble again 😊

Sinead

I mean, that's an entirely fair point. I was more going that Akua's family has been made out to be extremely irredeemable by the traditions they held, and Akua took that philosophy as the basis of her Name as Diabolist, which had to have left it's mark. It's all hammy exaggeration on the fact that few villains see value in raising up an enemy, even if in doing so, said enemy will be clapped in chains far stronger and cruel than any of their own devising.

Really "Akua sworn to Compassion" boils down to my going theory is that Above's angels appear to "those who need them to exemplify their chosen virtue beyond mortal means". Willie wanted to be Contrite beyond mortal means in response to his own sins. He did not want any reprieve from owning his sins. Hanno was a broken young man who wanted to be an agent of justice in a way that left no room for doubt that his actions were just (note that this is different from systemic justice). I believe the same can be said for Tariq, though the exact details of his story elude me.

Akua clings to story and ideals that made her an absolute terror as a Villain. Could she then embrace those ideals of Compassion (I was shown compassion when I deserved it. Who am I to not do the same for others?)

I won't cry foul if it doesn't pan out, but I will do the hammy hype train until it resolves itself one way or another. Because a) I like Akua's character arc and b) I am _really_ curious as to what Compassion's schtick is.

Liliet

Well, Akua deciding that killing even a fae is just not her aesthetic now was certainly a step in... that hemisphere 0.0

Sinead

I know!

I'm so excited to see the conclusion!

Tom

I'd guess compassion would be pretty OP vs revenants, because it would be about freeing them from their compulsory service to Nessie.

Sinead

A thought I had that relates to your observation that PGTE is not a cultivation story. While I agree with that, I think where I got the idea from my description is from the Augur's reflection of "the trap built into Creation". I have always read that to be all Named (especially in the context of the climax of the story) rather than just a trap for those like the Wandering Bard. Those best to pursue and answer the Great Question(s) of Creation are granted the power and influence to champion their line of thought, but are also bound more tightly to the world in doing so.

I agree that it isn't a cultivation story because the power is always granted from an external source (regardless of Amadeus' "coronation vs. recognition" distinction of Heroes and Villains).

Liliet

Amadeus was talking from his ass very much when he said that, desperately dancing around "I don't actually like Below's philosophy and I don't champion it in any meaningful sense, I'm actually trying to do a revolution over here" because he isn't going to just say that.

Anyway.

Yeah.

Sinead

Good point there, although it always sounded to me that the "Coronation vs. seizing power" is how most people seem to view the difference between the factions, which is why I used it.

Amadeus is very much a Hero, in the sense of being a champion of the people. However, his people are Praes. Cat has made the mental shift of extrapolating this philosophy to the entire continent, even if she holds Callow in her heart.

Liliet

Yeah lol that's also why Amadeus said that, he was reaching for cliches to get to his point without actually saying anything that would make him look good XD

But I don't think there is a real consistent difference there. Each story is specific, and commonalities between Good stories are generally a different set than commonalities between Evil stories, there isn't a fundamental difference XD

I'm not sure if "external power source" is a meaningful distinction there, though. The way I see it, the power source is the very fabric of the world, the "narrativium" mechanic built into it. I guess that's philosophically different from internal qi that's yours to manipulate on a fundamental level... it just feels like Guideverse could support cultivation, too, if that was the story somewhere XD

Sinead

I mean Laurence and Ranger are right there for one.

Sinead

*Hye Su

(I try to use names over Name personally, since any time I follow the logic of the Name system to any conclusion it's always horrifying)

Liliet

On the other hand, if there's one character who doesn't DESERVE her given name acknowledged...

Liliet

FOR ONE, YES LMAO

Mental Mouse

The Bard also said "... and when the hour is mine, I seek the story that will free Creation".

hakureireimu

"Those touched by Compassion never took another life again, not even those of the worst monsters in Creation." That doesn't sound like Akua.

Sinead

She didn't take a life here, when she was free to do what ever she desired. She is also labelled by many to be one of the greatest monsters in Creation, even though she was granted this second chance at existence. Akua hasn't fully embraced the damage of her Folly in terms of the fact that she annihilated a city. If her looking at binding a fae in a story of false friendship (as someone else pointed out, a simulation of trying to kill Cat), what happens when she extends this line of thought to the rest of her actions?

Besides, others have pointed out that while Cat's plan has worked in the broad strokes, her expectations of the little details are often off. Having Akua turn to Compassion for atonement and not Contrition (in approach, not the Choir) would be a similar thing.

I am not saying it's not a long shot. I'm just saying that it would be a glorious landing if it is true.

Juff

Typo Thread:

I had I > had I and fool > and a fool me try on > me try it on it have me > it gave me into too > in too
Not here, I > Not here; I city light up > city lit up sea of deaths > sea of death

edrey

Akua is just great and way too sad.
So, who was spying cat? The varlet, the bard, the heavens or the Dk, that is very suspicious. There are too many actors in this story who can do it but why this conversation? I feel foreshadowing here.

Frivolous

edrey: I believe that was Cat's approaching Name that she felt looking at her.

Her new Name first sparked when she declared to Tariq and Hanno that she would put the East in order. This new feeling of being looked at echoes the same.

Or it could have been someone scrying on her, maybe Malicia.

In other news: It bothers me that Kurosiv the All-Knowing is ascending. I interpret that he is capable of usurping Sve Noc. This would be bad.

On the other hand, if Cat or someone else can learn to reverse engineer Keter's so-called answers to Night, Kurosiv won't be so much of a problem.

I suspect that with sufficient free time Masego could concoct a final solution to Kurosiv. Anyone who could solve the problem of how to keep the Wandering Bard from disappearing should be able to solve the so-called leech.

Mental Mouse

Except it didn't match how she normally experiences her nascent Name. Her name is a beast at her back, not something spying on her.

Liliet

Might have been her Name / Creation itself.

Rey d`Tutto

Gotta be the Name/Creation. What she said was:
"Praes will be settled," I evenly said. "By treaties if I can, by the sword if I must."
That statement has narrative weight.

Liliet

Yup, especially when she means every sound.

cremadiscampi

Blood for the Blood God! The war chapters are always fantastic, this is going to be fun.

Liliet

Om nom nom.

I'll admit I thought this would happen, like, four chapters ago, but HELL IF THIS BATTLE DOESN'T DESERVE AN ARC OF BUILD-UP.

And Akua ♥ ♥ ♥

I love how Cat cannot really predict her. She knows the broad strokes of what Akua's going through, but she got multiple surprises here at the end for how exactly it went. It wasn't all according to plan so much as... Cat bet on inevitability, and was proven right.

And no, it wasn't for her sake that Akua did this at all. From the start, this was her own struggle. From Book 3, when she asked Fasili if he ever got tired. From when she was eight and first got grievously wounded by the system she was asked to uphold and glorify. From when she went looking for expunged records and found a cautionary story about what happens to those that run away, conveniently leaving out that he had a family and Sahelians never managed to do anything much to it.

Cat provided the environment for Akua to fight this battle in, but if one of them was doing this for love of the other... well, both, either or neither, really. They both had their own reasons, and they both care.

And Cat's a dumbass, but it's okay, because she's not alone and doesn't have to do everything herself. She can just... count on people, and it'll be fine.

And Akua gets to wield Arsenal-grade artifice nasties, I'm guessing 😊

Simpli

They are billions~

Burlyraven

Hmm... I wonder if Akua's story is going to steady her hand, or play up that deep down, she does have a heart.

The Crows investing Half of themselves in this is concerning. It's a serious gamble, and more than a few stories come to mind in which one or the other halves is lost in some way. Also, the mention of countermeasures to the Night and Keter attacking when Night is strongest is concerning.

Frivolous

Burlyraven: I know I'm concerned.

This chapter strongly delineates the limits of Night and of Sve Noc. Sve Noc and the drow don't seem to have any resources besides Night. That's a terrible weakness. No versatility.

I think that, if Sve Noc has any foresight at all, they must mull over the necessity of diversifying their portfolio, so to speak. They need to learn to do other things besides Night. If they don't, sooner or later they're doomed.

I mean, the fact that Keter only took a few years to engineer a strong and reliable counter to all the facets of Night is alarming, considering Keter is mostly dumb and uncreative undead.

Compare that to the Alliance, which took many many living regular and Gifted and especially Named minds to generate the copperstones, the Unravelers, the Severance, and Quartered Seasons in the same span of time, even though living minds are better at learning and innovating.

It could be that Keter's being ruled by the Dead King, who doesn't have to argue or do diplomacy with anyone else, makes Keter's Research and Development more effective than the Alliance, which is made of multiple sovereign nations.

However, my feeling is that Keter has many more legs to its power base than the drow, who make do with Night alone.

Liliet

Alternatively, Sve Noc can lean into the overspecialization and count on having allies to have their back. Sometimes, weakness IS strength: "you could beat us if you wanted but it'd cost you all the support we can provide with our specialty so y'know do the math" + "well YEAH we arent really a danger to you. We're just really really useful 😊"

caoimhinh

"Keter is mostly dumb and uncreative undead"

No, it isn't.

That's judging a civilization by its armies. Which, while useful in some ways, it's not a way to accurately grasp.

Keter has the most accomplished sorcerer in Calernia's history, Neshamah.

It has countless bound souls and Revenants that have been exploited throughout the centuries, and it has the Serenity, which is filled with living people among whom very well might be thousands upon thousands of practitioners of magic who have been tutored in magic by Trismegistus himself through millennia.

Besides, I have been telling this for a while, Catherine and everyone else is so convinced Neshamah can't learn in a meaningful way or change his ways, yet we consistently see him do that. He can learn, we have seen him learn. Even if things like his personality might be stuck forever unchanging, he is constantly learning and improving. He is constantly creating new constructs of undead, new wards, new spells, and new artifacts. How is that not learning? How is that just a bunch of dumb and uncreative undead? We even have confirmation of him experimenting and making trial runs for new runed artifacts and slowly improve them and developing new ways to fight Night.

It is undeniable that he learns.

Cat is just in denial or too stuck in the ways of what the Bard said about him being unable to grow.

The Dead King is not like any other undead, because he reached Apotheosis through his undeath, he is on a league of his own. Cat's thoughts on how Neshamah surely is simply letting the Revenants do the planning and strategizing and thus Keter "learns" through that indirect means, seems like she is oversimplifying things.

Liliet

Cat's splitting a very fine hair wrt Neshamah learning.

He can improve skills he already has. He can pick up tricks and invent schemes.

He cannot gain entirely new skills, cannot master new mindsets. All his gains are on top of his old mindset. Picking up a new profession entirely requires changing how you think in a way that he's not capable of. So he can do anything that "a really powerful and cunning sorcerer" can do, but a war general? He cannot become one, he can only ever be a really powerful and cunning sorcerer acting like one.

medailyfun

the majority of normal adult people can't master new mindsets...

Liliet

they can generally manage one per century im sure but i mean no-one said it was a condition UNIQUE to undead

Liliet

> deep down, she does have a heart.

I mean, at this point, it's not even deep. The heart has been excavated and sewn to her sleeve, if still on the inside.

caoimhinh

Question 1: how is that Drow so dangerous, exactly?

Cat has been very vague about it, and how it is a leech, but why is it difficult to dispose of? Sve Noc should be able to rip the Night out of it and be done with it. So why aren't they capable of that?

Question 2: Did Akua run a sort of simulation of herself and Catherine through that Fae she found? I don't know if maybe I'm reading too much into it, but hear me out.

"I sought the fae. Through eerie paths. And I found what I wanted: one of them blinded by story, who would not see the knife until it was too late."

What story is that? A story of trust and treason, of course. It would mirror her relationship with Cat to a degree, where she is always walking the line between loyalty and betrayal, always standing on the edge of that moment of treason with a concealed knight, always deciding to not do it. Until she does.

"(Power) Through murder. As much the transgression as what is offered up. It would have been a... beginning. Once I devoured that strength, it would have been easier to gain more."

Yet Akua refused to walk that line, to the point that even in the parallelism and simulation story that the Fae would be walking to fall victim of Akua, she failed to carry on with it.

"Your way gives nothing. I came back empty-handed."

She gains nothing from remaining loyal, she obtains no new strength, no sudden source of power. Nothing, except having made the choice. And maybe keeping what she now has.

This phrase picks my interest:

"It wasn't you. So do not gloat, even where you think I cannot see. It wasn't you at all, Catherine."

What exactly is she talking about here?

agumentic

That it wasn't Catherine's teachings or actions that stopped her from killing that fae.

Liliet

What agumentic said. Akua stepped back from killing because of memories of her father, and Catherine had only the most indirect relation to it – that of encouraging her to rediscover her own emotions and her own self and act on it. She didn't do it for Catherine's sake, to make Catherine like her, because of what Catherine said or anything like that. She would do it to spite Catherine, but her own unrelated sentiment stopped her.

Of course, that was just as planned™ on Catherine's part, but it's still significant for Akua that as far as Power of Love involved goes, hers was her for her family, not for Cat.

Adrian_V

About the Drow there could be many reasons but my guess is that divinity comes with rules and if they break them they will be in deep shit, for example it may be a case of hoist by their own petard in that he isn't doing anything against their teachings and if they remove him without reason or pretext (and even then it would need to be a good one) there could be consequences.

Plus he could be effective and losing him without a replacement when they already lost 3 generals could be too dangerous.

Andrew Smith

Also like Cat said the Night was already a power of taking from others so more than most other kind of powers it would be able to change the face of the greatest holder of it and then they took in Winter a power that straight up is used to having different faces in charge of it

Big I

I really hope Cat doesn't lose this battle.

Xinci

Hm, so it seems like Cat has gotten Akua to go down the new growth route, which I presume inevitably will be rife with strife and struggle and involve Akua cutting ties/and or being hurt herself to achieve it(much in the same way Cat too has self-mutilated to achieve her goals).

Well unsurprisingly Sve's maladaptive allocation style is getting them exterminated. It isn't adapted in any way for a non-closed system where its the sole methodology. The sigils betting methods may act as a manner of diversification but it is slow forming. A nice thing in peace or for petty raids, but not in a methodological arms race between frameworks. Such organization is nice but the bedrock of information transfer isnt there to improve every group of drow for every iteration. A chance was had to reform the allocation methods of secrets or at least generation of secrets to aid in larger cooperative and aid the Drow in emergently self organizing specialized groups specializing against against specific foes(much in the way the Longstriders were specialized against Mighty). But this wasnt done so now they suffer.

Liliet

> A chance was had to reform the allocation methods of secrets or at least generation of secrets to aid in larger cooperative and aid the Drow in emergently self organizing specialized groups specializing against against specific foes(much in the way the Longstriders were specialized against Mighty). But this wasnt done so now they suffer.

What do you mean?

Darkening

The drow have all sorts of different specialties, that's the point of the different generals that all have their own combat styles for their armies and tribes. Sve Noc even says, the secrets weren't all countered at once, it's a process where every battle a few more get more neutralized. The problem is that they don't have traditional magic, just night, so all their power stems from one source. Given time, they could probably develop more mundane tactics that would let them fight without leaning on Night so much, but that's a process that would take experienced commanders and years of training, which is not exactly readily available while fighting an extinction war for a couple years.

Sinead

You should give them the grace then that they never left a =n extinction war since the Sisters struck their bargain with Below.

It was just a civil war then.

I suspect that they used to have sorcery, but Secrets of Night system converts the spells to Night secrets. That's the only way I can think of for Secrets to be wide spread, when most drow are killed for their knowledge instead of teaching and training. The Secrets must have origin from some form of education system, and I don't think Night existed in even the proto form that Cat first encountered during the time of the Twilight Sages.

Adrian_V

Finally!! Who wants to bet on who's interude we see first and the POV used? In such a big battle they are necessary.

And since a loty has been talked about it i will just add (or re add since it is posible someone mentioned it already) Cat has made a weapon out of Akua, she is firmly in the redemption equals death path i think, if she survives the battle it will be a miracle.

My guess is she dies in a pivotal role/point and Cat gets her name finally

Tom

If EE really wants to troll us, he could do the next chapter with a perspective from someone in the group going north to the bridge XD

Adrian_V

PD: someone should link the post in reddit if everyone really has moved there...me sad T_T

Liliet

<https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/>

Sinead

I wonder if Sve Noc could work around the nature of Winter being "ever changing faces" by just cycling between the two of them as the predominant face of Night? I think as deities, they have enough base archetypes split between them, that an internal cycle would resolve the issue.

Of course, they need to correct for the issue of their First General, and I would think that if Cat pulls through on this, you may see Sve Noc gaining more personal power and influence to deal with their First General. The majority of the Drow is in the North, but Losara (Cat's attempt at a formal priesthood) is all in the south. So a consolidation of power here may also lead to a consolidation of power within her new system. If she cedes the mantle of First Under Night (my guess is that it will go to Ivah) then it could be that the drow will head North over the winter to refortify the Duskwood.

What I wonder is if Sve Noc will diversify in terms of allowing non-Drow Sigils to form. I like Cat wielding Night. It will be a shame if she loses it.

medailyfun

yeah, Sve Noc can accept goblins to the Night, greatly expanding the possibilities

nomedeplume

Cat's comments on Praes recall the old line about the Romans, "they created a wasteland, and called it peace."

Could mean she's headed towards a name like "Peacemaker." Still a name sworn to below, as she's perfectly willing to burn a nation, if it means peace in the future.

sivarajan

"Ours is the business of empire, and what a peace we will make." (From Ye Mighty.)

Daniel E

This feels like exactly the kind of fight that Juniper could make or break, and yet she remains sidelined. Like the loss of the most brilliant strategic mind of a generation has just been completely shrugged off. At this point, I don't think her making a return will matter in the slightest, given how casually she has been written off.

Liliet

They have a lot of good strategic minds, and it feels like another brilliant one just wouldn't change a lot on the scale of this battle. It'll be made or broken by Named on both sides, and that really isn't Juniper's song and dance.

Sinead

Also Juniper was behind a lot of this approach, so there could be elements of her work in here.

I think Juniper will be part of "...with a sword if necessary." , since her arc started out with loyalty to the Empire.

Liliet

More like Juniper was loyal to the Legions and Black 😊 she's not even going anywhere from that!

Sinead

True. I was thinking of Marchford where Juniper has demands from Cat they will not march against the Empire (she didn't want to fight her mother at the time, but I think just the principle mattered to her too).

Now though... she may have plans already available when Cat comes stating that they need to march on Praes.

Cue thought train going fully off the rails, Ozzy Osbourne blazing loudly

I just like the idea of Cat expecting to have another grueling war, and then Juniper slams down a comprehensive invasion plan of Praes because she was left to her own devices and wants to get back at the Tower for one betrayal too many.

Cue an interlude or two for the other factions to reflect on the incoming invasion, and then back to Cat wondering if Amadeus ever found himself utterly terrified by General Grem.

Instead of Cat climbing the Tower, Callow's First Army gains the cognomen "Victorius" as they tear down the Tower, may it never be raised again.

Liliet

YESSSSSSSSSSSSSSSSSS

(Also, let me check that conversation now...)

> "I will not see the Fifteenth turn on the Empire while I breathe," Juniper said and her voice was like bedstone.

...

> "I'm not rebelling," I told her, meeting her eyes. "I'm not asking you to fight your mother, Juniper. Or you your family, Aisha. But things can't continue as they've gone on. Not anymore. Not after all the lines they've crossed."

...right, Catherine was talking about Istrid, Juniper about the Empire. You're right!

...

and then I kept reading because I love that scene

> And just like that, there was only one. Juniper was close, had been this whole time, but she'd not moved in a while. She came closer to me, spine straight but shoulders tight.

>
> "Swear to me, Catherine," she said hoarsely. "Not my mother. Not any of them. That they won't be the enemy."

>
> "I swear," I told her, and offered my arm.

...we were both right lmao

Sinead

Huh, violent agreement.

(If you wonder why I don't just hit like on things, my WordPress account formed via this comment section exists, but I've ended in a Catch 22 trying to resolve it. It's the damndest thing).

Liliet

I have a principle to not track who ISN'T pressing like or something like that as a principle lmao that sounds like a good way to create drama out of absolutely nothing and some badly working internet or something

Sinead

True. I was more reflecting on the fact that the "like" system is more important in a comment section like WordPress due to the visual space taken up by every comment. It's something I notice every time I end up chiming in with a two word piece.

Then again, I could just stop viewing this site on mobile and that would solve nearly all my problems...

Liliet

...I'm not viewing it on mobile, that could be making a difference, yes XD

Lucy Rose

I feel like this is the beginning of a Pattern of 3. If the Dead King unveils a secret weapon and by treachery turns this into a decisive loss, then the Grand Alliance will be hunted and fleeing with no allies to turn to. That sets them up for a direct march into Keter, with no options available but to take the fight to him. If they fight there, they get rebuffed but manage to deal blows to the dead forces as well, for a draw. Then, they sweep into the capital in a last ditch effort, under cover of night. They storm the castle, but become surrounded. As the sun rises, all those allies who previously turned from them, the dwarves, the goblins, etc, flood into the scene and rescue the Grand Alliance, and the fight is taken straight to the Throne where the Dead King is beheaded in a decisive victory.

Liliet

> I feel like this is the beginning of a Pattern of 3.

It's not.

If they lose there, they'll be wiped out. There is no recovery. They'll lose the army, then they'll lose the defensive lines, then they'll lose the war. Dwarves won't interfere, the drow are losing too. This is legitimately the ONLY chance. If they lose they won't HAVE an army to invade Keter with. Not a sufficiently big one. And they can't do shit there without a sufficiently big one.

This loss will send them into a death spiral. DK knows his shit. He's not setting them up for a victory with any defeat he ever inflicts.

Not to mention, a Pattern of 3 is between two specific people who are rivals. Not between factions. It just doesn't work like that.

Sinead

Since Creation is a giant philosophical question, I always read patterns of 3 as the beats in a specific argument, the fact that it's "loss draw victory" or "victory draw defeat" is more to do with the fact that the villains that make it through the claimant stage are usually rising a high in a place with little resistance until a Hero arises (the reason that Tariq and Laurence were notable is that they basically did a zero tolerance policy on any villain rising, forcing even those that did survive them to keep on the down low. Hell, one can look at their time as an example of what a form of the Accords could achieve. Similar to Malicia and Amadeus keeping Heroes in line to keep their version of the Peace.)

I would think that “loss draw victory” is more to do with the fact that letting an opponet survive allows them to be shaped into something specifically aimed to defeat you rather than anything specific to “Heroic narrative”. It’s just that Above had it’s argument all laid out in the beginning, while Below keeps chucking stuff at the wall to see what sticks.

aran

She didn’t leave to get more power, but to get a more lesbian haircut; oh my~

aran

Praes has failed, I could have said. Or, why would you want to? Or, why does your mother still rule you?

I like that we see the rejected dialogue options

Interlude: Blood

“Honour is neither reputation nor law. It cannot be borrowed or bought, bent or bargained with, for it comes from a place that is beyond deception. Fidelity to virtue belongs only to yourself and the Gods, and needs no other witness.”

– Extract from the book ‘Reflections’ by Farah Isbili, second Holy Seljun of Levant

The roar shook the sky, trembling through the starlit dark and down the bones of all who heard it. Razin Tanja of the Grim Binder’s Blood, Lord of Malaga, grit his teeth.

“Binders to the bastion,” he shouted over the noise. “That is where the beorns will strike first.”

He met the gazes of the last of the practitioners that had come north with his father, feeling a pang of pain at the absences he saw in their ranks. Razin had never loved the binders, envious of the talent he had been born without, but he'd grown on the same grounds as them. Most he'd known by name, and a few of the younger he'd gone on skirmishes with. Few were left, and fewer with every battle.

"Do not try to destroy them," he reminded his mages. "Sweep them off the walls as quickly as possible, that is all."

Destruction was better left to the Lanterns or warriors trained in the use of pitch and flame, Razin and his captains had learned. The binders were weaker in traditional offensive spellcraft than Callowan and Proceran mages, but their blood-bound spirits were able to physically push back Keter's monsters in ways that other sorcerers could only dream of.

"We will return victorious, lord, or take the short path home," Ganiya Hundred-Ghost, eldest of the remaining binders, solemnly promised.

Razin sharply nodded.

"Honour to Levant," he said.

"Honour to the Blood," Ganiya fervently replied.

They were gone within moments, fleet-footed on the stone as they sped towards the bastion where the first of the enemy dead would reach the top of the walls. Razin's sworn sword kept close around him, and the Lantern that had taken oath to protect him for the battle as well, as he went to the edge of the eastern rampart and looked over. The dead were coming in waves, he thought, eyes narrowing as the moonlight revealed the abominations of bone scaling sheer cliffs. The skeletons were many but also slow and they would not reach the wall for a long time. It was the monsters scaling the cliff that would draw first blood, the massive bear-like abomination called beorns that were clawing their way up. Inside their bellies they held companies of lesser dead which they vomited before rampaging, and for that reason it was the great bastion to Razin's north they would target.

They'd want flat grounds and room to spew out their soldiers, to create a beachhead atop the walls. Keter usually preferred taking ground than lives, early in fight, knowing it could afford the losses to get into a superior position before the fighting became heavy. It also meant that Razin Tanja had been entirely aware, even if many of his captains had not been, that the warriors he had sent to guard the bastion were not being rewarded with hours by fires in a place where the wind did not bite too deep. The warriors in the bastion were going to die. Perhaps not all of them, but most. The Lord of Malaga had made his decision with that knowledge in the back of his head, whispering. And of the three captains regularly commanded warriors in the bastion, he had chosen one who was of his great supporters and two who were not. His loyal captain he had sent to obscure his intention, should men think on this later, and now that decision was like ash in his mouth for it was that man who now held the bastion. This, he suspected, would follow him in his dreams for months to come.

It had been easier, back when Razin still believed war to be a glorious thing.

A game of daring and cleverness that the sharp stakes only further gilded. That was the way it was, in the old stories, with the victors returning home covered in loot and honour and the defeated slunk away to lick their wounds until a chance to even the score came. Warriors died but they died in honour, proving their worth, and the deeds done in war made them immortal – perhaps not worthy of the distinction of being added to the Rolls, but kept alive past the end of flesh through stories and songs. Razin had believed in this, he'd begun to realize, much like a man dying of thirst would believe that beyond the hill lay a river. Razin Tanja of the Grim Binder's Blood had not a speck of the sorcery that had made his line famous: war had been the only way he was ever going to be able to distinguish himself, make up for the lack he'd been born with.

And so Razin had embraced the ways of blood and steel, devoted himself wholeheartedly. He'd practiced with the blade until his palms bled and bones ached, he'd learned to move captains with words and sung the praises of the honourable ways of the Dominion of Levant. Of their inherent savage virtue, born of stripping away all the pretty lies and false righteousness the nations around Levant coated their own ways in.

Then he'd watched Careful Yannu kill his father in an honour duel, and it was like scales had been ripped off of his eyes.

"My lord," one of his men quietly said, shaking him out of his thoughts. "We must move. We have stayed in the same place for too long, Revenants might come for your head."

Razin gave the horrors below one last look, hand resting against the pommel of his sword. They'd be here before too long.

"We will do our part," the Lord of Malaga murmured. "On my honour."

—

The vulture had broken itself forcing its way through the wards that protected the skies above Hainaut, but it had gone through.

Though it was in freefall, the necromantic abomination no longer animated, it had still served the Dead King's purpose with success: on the creature's back, Tariq glimpsed the shape of a Revenant huddling close. It had infiltrated the city, and when it reached the ground would no doubt begin to wreak havoc. The Grey Pilgrim watched the vulture drop like a stone for a heartbeat, then lengthened his stride. The Enemy would not have risked one of the Scourges so carelessly, but there were no Revenants that were not dangerous. Even one whose Bestowal had been weak whilst they lived would still be able to cause a great deal of chaos and death, if left unchecked.

Tariq let the pull of chance guide his path through the city, passing by the orderly ranks of Callowan companies heading for the gates and bands of haphazard fantassins being exhorted to move quicker by their officers. Few saw him, for he did not care to be seen. The old man's face tightened as the Ophanim whispered in his ear, warning him that he would not arrive in time. He'd been close to where the vulture and Revenant were to fall, but not quite close enough. He was two blocks away when the large shape smashed into a house with a thunderous crash, though not so far that he could not discern that the Revenant had nimbly leapt away before the impact. So where had it gone?

"Rooftops, do you think?" he asked his old friends.

The Ophanim murmured their agreement.

"The furtive sort always take to the rooftops," Tariq complained. "It is unkind. My knees aren't what they used to be."

A passage through the Ways would allow him to close the distance, but also reveal his presence – most Revenants could sense the touch of Twilight on Creation. He would have to move the old-fashioned way. Tariq went through the house that had been smashed, using the ruin as a path to the roof, and before long he was on rough tiles and cocking a white eyebrow at his surroundings. He'd found the cloaked silhouette almost instantly, skittering atop another roof as it was, but not only had it yet to notice him it was also... a streak of fire coming from down in the street interrupted his thoughts, and promptly solved the mystery of why the Revenant had been paying closer attention to the streets below than its immediate surroundings.

The Revenant ducked under the flame, proving it had kept exceptional reflexes even in death.

The mage that'd tossed a spell at the cloaked Revenant cursed loudly in High Tyrian, warning the two warriors by her side that they were going to have a fight. Tariq moved silently across rooftops as the Revenant hesitated for a moment then leapt down, moving in a streak of speed. Not so swift that one of the two warriors – boys, he now discerned – did not move between it and the mage with a raised shield, forcing it back with a measured swing of his sword. The other boy darted forward as the Revenant drew back. A straight-edge sword was swung out, but the dead Bestowed revealed a blade of its own in a glimmer of moonlight on metal and caught it.

"Incise," the Page disdainfully said, adjusting his blow and shattering the Revenant's sword.

It had not been simple strength, Tariq caught, but instead precision. With the point of his blade, the Page had struck at the weakest point of the sword wielded by the undead and struck it with all his might. An adjustment done in a fraction of a moment, too. Impressive, for one his age. But he was still green. Having moved behind the Revenant, hidden by the shadow of a tall chimney, the Pilgrim watched as the Revenant abandoned the blade and simply slugged the young Proceran in the face with inhuman strength. The Page rocked back, and when a knife flicked out in the Revenant's other hand came close to getting his throat cut – the Squire, stepped in once more, taking the blow on his shield and forcing back the Revenant.

The Apprentice, with a triumphant cry, landed a spell on the cloaked figure's side: a streak of blue flame ate up the entire cloak in second, forcing the Revenant to throw it away even as the Squire closed distance and battered him down with strikes of his shield. Though it was a brutal and inelegant method, Tariq noted that it succeeded at putting the Revenant on the ground and keeping it there.

"Come on, Gaetan," the Squire hissed. "I don't have anything that can-"

"Incise," the Page panted out angrily, severing the Revenant's head.

Sharpness and precision, Tariq decided. That was the nature of the aspect. The Ophanim murmured what their own sight revealed, which had him cocking an eyebrow. 'Incise', it seemed, would be significantly stronger when dealing wounds than killing blows. There was a sense of frivolity to it, of defiance. The Page's nose was bloody, and he would likely get a black eye out of this if he wasn't healed. The Pilgrim, after a moment, decided not to reveal himself. A black eye was always a good lesson, for a young Bestowed, and he would not rob them of the pleasure of their victory by revealing he'd watched over them as they won it. He had, after all, been entirely unneeded here.

Providence pulled at Tariq's feet and he slipped away in the dark, feeling a call towards the east. The old man's lips tightened. That was the wall, he knew, that was held by his countrymen.

The Grey Pilgrim took back to the streets, fleet of foot and clad in dusk.

—

He turned aside the skeleton's sword with his buckler, letting it scrabble against the hide-covered wood, and placed his strike: the blade ripped into the bone of the neck, severing the spine after two wild hacks. The skeleton collapsed, necromancy unmade, and Razin Tanja breathed out. He did not have long to rest, as a flicker of movement to the side had him ducking to avoid a well-thrown javelin that bit into the shield of the sworn sword to his right.

"Forward," the Lord of Malaga shouted, "forward for Levant!"

A roar answered as the last of the dead the beorns had spat out were driven back from the bastion by a tightening shield wall, those that weren't smashed instead pushed off the edge so that might be broken by the fall. It was a small, petty victory but the warriors had won it and they shouted themselves hoarse afterwards. Razin raised his blade, claiming his own share of the acclaim, but then praised Captain Alezon – who'd held the bastion until reinforcements could arrive, and died holding to that duty. Razin had liked the man, counted him almost as a friend. And he had sent him here to die. Sometimes he wondered if he was truly better than what he wanted to replace, but when he did the searing clarity of that night after the Graveyard came back to him.

How clear it had been, in that moment, that the Blood were no longer what they had been meant to be. How much difference was there really, between the red-handed sons and daughters of the Blood and the rapacious princes their sacred ancestors had risen in rebellion to drive out? With the Procerans gone the blades had not been sheathed. They'd just turned them on each other instead. Like dogs in a too-small kennel, snapping and snarling. It must end, Razin had realized, or they would ruin their homes and the Dominion with it. Yet for all that he had tried to embrace this truth, the practice of it had been... difficult. Dreams were always prettier before they were dragged to the ground, where all the mud of practicalities sullied them.

Razin Tanja had not become Lord of Malaga – the first ever elected away from ancient Tanja grounds, through a trick of procedure – without incurring debts and troubles, which now both had to be settled. There were captains in his service who would not hear of straying from the old ways, of making pacts of peace and ending raids when they returned home, and he could not yet afford to lose their support. His humiliating defeat had Sarcella, even if dealt by the hand of the Black Queen herself, remained a scar on his reputation. And though some here and at home had well received the announcement of his betrothal to Aquiline Osená, others were openly dubious.

Tartessos and Malaga had long fought over wealthy territories laying between them, he had been reminded, what was now to be of them? What of the deaths come of the last wars, must they go forever unavenged? There was no honour in these surrenders, warriors grumbled.

Aquiline had admitted to him in private that some of her captains had been mutinous over the notion as well, in no small part because as long as she had been unwed her hand in marriage had been considered the greatest prize that a captain in the service of the Osená might hope to win. Worse, the most ardent supporters of their union tended to be captains who backed the marriage because it would secure the southern border of the Osená and allow them to send their full might to war against the Ifriqui of Vaccei, their old enemies of the Brigand's Blood. Sometimes it felt like every step forward they took was followed by two steps back. Yet Razin knew nothing but rain came from throwing curses at the sky, and so he used what he had at hand: the war. It was ugly work, but Razin and Aquiline traded blood for hope.

The captains that would never bend were granted the honour of leading vanguards, men and women more farsighted raised to replace them. With steel and deeds they bound warriors to them, by oaths and debts and the hard companionship of those sharing battle, and inch by inch they had gained ground. Lady Itima Ifriqui of Vaccei would be an enemy so long as she lived, but she was old and her heir Moro amenable to a peace. Careful Yannu loomed tall over them all, undefeated in honour duels, but for all that the older man was accruing honours like speaking for Levant at the Arsenal, he had no allies beyond his own kin. And though they were all wary of the Holy Seljun, beyond Wazim Isbili lay a greater power still. The Peregrine smiled upon their efforts, his approval as the blessing of the pilgrim's star.

And still it was damned ugly work, trying to move Levant. It cost too much blood, and Razin almost missed the days when the scales had been over his eyes and he'd still believed there had been glory in sending men to die.

"Prepare yourselves," Razin said. "It will be a long night, and there are many victories yet to claim."

Already he could see a beorn attacking positions to the south of the bastion, aiming perhaps not to take the wall but instead to spew out its load of soldiers in the city itself, and he could only hope that Aquiline would send the Lanterns there on time. His binders were resting and the priests from Procer had yet to arrive, save for the healers that were already preparing beds for the wounded in the nearby barracks. As for himself, he would stay here until the next batches of pitch arrived at least. Longer than that would be risking – a man in shoddy hide armour, barefoot and armed with a great sword, landed in a roll among the warriors nearest to the edge.

“Good evening,” the Drake grinned.

—

The Barrow Sword squinted.

“That’s not the Pale Knight,” he finally said.

“Your wisdom is peerless,” the Vagrant Spear solemnly replied.

Ishaq rolled his eyes. Sidonia was not entirely unpleasant, for one of the Blood, but she seemed to believe it her oathsworn duty to needle him at every opportunity.

“It’s just the Drake,” the Berserker said. “We can take him.”

Of that Ishaq was not so certain, but he would not outright disagree. The three of them were strong in close quarters, and not without talents that would allow them to stem the tide of that Scourge’s healing. More than that, the last two members of his band of five had teeth beyond what mere blades could bring to bear.

“Um,” the Harrowed Witch hesitantly said. “Shouldn’t we... do something? He’s killing soldiers.”

The Drake had wasted no time in beginning to cut up anyone that moved around him, it was true. With that greatsword of his he smashed through shields and blades alike, slaughtering with ease even as warriors kept trying to close around him on all sides so he’d not have room to swing the large blade. Useless, when the Scourge was probably capable of shattering a shield with a kick anyway. It was like ants trying to wrestle a lizard.

“We are meant to handle the Axeman,” the Blessed Artificer regretfully said. “If we spend ourselves against another, there will be a gap in the defences.”

“He’s a Scourge,” Sidonia grunted. “Killing him is still a win. We should strike.”

The Berserker nodded in fervent agreement. Sentiment was in favour, Ishaq decided, but should he give the order? Much as he disliked to admit it, he probably couldn’t afford to let the lordling ruling Malaga get himself killed. It would deal a hard blow to the morale of the Tanja warriors, and the Black Queen would have Ishaq’s hide for it. On the other hand, letting Tanja warriors die would win him favour with the Grave Binder – who the Binder’s Blood despised – and even if he intervened there was no guarantee that the young man would honour him for it. Blood only ever felt the need to owe debts to Blood, like honour was a drink only they could partake of. It'd be bad tactics to do nothing, Ishaq finally decided.

"We strike," the Barrow Sword said. "As was planned."

He half-expected the Artificer to argue with him, but though she looked displeased she refrained. Perhaps she was sensing her opinion was not shared by most. No challenge was offered, though, so Ishaq rose from his crouch and took the lead. Sidonia was quicker on the run, but also a lot more fragile. The ancient armour of bronze around him moved without a sound, smooth as if oiled from enchantments older than he dared to imagine, and the Barrow Sword unsheathed Pinon. The ancient blade hummed, tasting of the death in the air, and without a word Ishaq leapt from the rooftop to the edge of the rampart. From the corner of his eye he saw a warrior thrown in the air, missing an arm as she screamed in pain. The Drake was merciless.

As he began to push his way through the throng of warriors he heard the Spear and the Berserker land behind him, Zoe snarling at the Malagans to get out of her way. Beyond the ring of shields he glimpsed binder-magic at work, creatures of dirt and ash trying to drive back the Scourge, but it was a bad match. The Drake was both strong and difficult to kill, the spirits did little but rip up flesh that healed within a heartbeat and they were failing at pushing him over the edge. Now, though, he was here. Steps measured as he advanced the Barrow Sword breathed deep of the evening air. Ah, opportunity. Was there ever anything that tasted sweeter? A spirit-wyvern was cut in half, the blade that did it biting shallow of the stone beneath them, and the Drake slunk out. Grinning wildly, his hide armour already tatters, the Revenant glance at Ishaq curiously.

"Villain?" he asked.

It must be the beard, Ishaq decided. Surely he did not look that villainous?

"You wound me, friend," the Barrow Sword smiled, tapping his ancient blade against his heart.

Pinon hummed at the touch, thirsty beast that she was.

"That's the plan," the Drake agreed, darting forward.

Ishaq raised his sword, but the speed had been enough that the Revenant might have startled him into an unwise parry if this hadn't been what he was after in the first place.

"Honour to the Blood," the Vagrant Spear gleefully howled, smashing into the Drake's side.

Light roiled and screamed as she severed an arm, but the Revenant only laughed – abandoning his greatsword, he caught his own limb and threw it at her face as a fresh one grew anew. Ishaq, though was not intending to just stay and watch. Sidonia was forced back by a wild swing of the greatsword, retreating smoothly with both hands on her spear, and before the backswing could return Ishaq closed the distance. The Revenant struck at his armour but the ancient bronze mail took it without flinching, and the mistake allowed him to get a good cut of his own in: across the face, through one eye and the mouth. The Drake was unmoved but Ishaq stayed in close, elbowing the wrist trying to get the greatsword around him and hammering forehead to forehead to drive the Revenant back.

Which he did, eyes wild as he put fingers to his already-healing wound.

“That sword’s not Dominion work,” the Drake coldly said.

Pinon sang, devouring the last bits of soul it’d managed to pull away from the Dead King’s bindings.

“There are all sorts of treasures in barrows, if one has the nerve to take them up,” Ishaq smiled.

Not that he would have been able to put his sword down now, even should he wish to.

“Well,” the Drake said, “it’ll make this a little interesting, at least.”

The Malagan warriors had withdraw, wisely, though more likely it was because to their eyes the affair looked closed enough to an honour duel. Those were not interfered with without incurring great shame, and did Ishaq’s entire homeland not just quake at the very shadow of shame? Like hound on a leash, only so enamoured of the prison they sang its praises in song. He glanced at Sidonia, who nodded back, and as one they struck. The Drake howled in laughter, and the dance began anew. The Scourge was fast and strong, nimbler with that monstrous sword than he had any right to be, but they were neither of them unskilled. The Vagrant Spear feigned a low bit only to snake a hit at the throat, forcing the Drake to bat it away, and without batting an eye Ishaq slashed at the undead’s back.

The flesh grew back. The soul did not, and Pinon sang with glee. It liked taking from souls already claimed best, preferring Binds and Revenants to the living.

Ishaq withdrew, though not quite quickly enough for his face to be spared the edge of the returning greatsword. A thick cut across the cheek, dripping blood against the edge of his mouth. He swallow a lick, smiling, and saw fury bloom in the Scourge’s eyes. It did not like losing parts of itself, no matter how small they might be.

"That'll be enough, children," the Drake said. "I'm being told to stop playing."

And behind him, as if summoned, the hulking shape of a beorn climbed over the ledge and looked down at them through a gaping maw, roaring out.

"You have a bear," the Barrow Sword, conceded. "But we have her."

He juttet a thumb behind him, where the Berserker was slowly advancing. Her body was jerking wildly, eyes turned bloodshot and hair looking like it'd been shot through with thorns. Muscles grew, and as her face turned monstrous the Berserker hacked out a breath.

"Rage," she snarled.

The beorn swatted at her, but she caught the paw with the flat of her blade. Both wavered, for a moment, before she smashed the great limb into the floor with a triumphant howl. The Drake looked a little unnerved, and Ishaq frankly couldn't blame him. Zoe wasn't particularly able to tell friends from foe in that state and shaking her out of it tended to be... difficult.

"I always get the worst assignment," the Drake sighed. "Would it kill that prick in his fancy armour to take the vanguard, one of these days?"

"I sympathize," Ishaq smiled. "Please, friend, allow me to relieve you of your burdens."

The Barrow Sword moved, and the Vagrant Spear with him.

The dance resumed.

—

It was a good fight, Sidonia thought as she pricked the Drake's neck and send Light howling into his body.

Though bones snapped and flesh burned, the Revenant swatted at her and she was forced to withdraw a few steps until the Barrow Sword commanded their foe's attention. It was a fight worthy of being added to the Rolls, even though Ishaq was one Below's and so sundered from honour. The Berserker was ripping into the beorn that'd come up over the ledge, now with her bare hands since she had used her sword to nail shut the beast's maw, which left the two of them room to handle the Drake properly. The abomination was still far from death, but then they had yet to reveal their own killing strokes. The Scourges always had surprises, and so their opponents must have some as well.

They went another round with death, this time Ishaq taking the lead. The Drake was wary of the Barrow Sword's blade, which though grave-goods and so proscribed seemed particularly suited to slaying Revenants. Ishaq went forward aggressively as Sidonia circled around the back, baiting the Drake into a warning swing, and immediately the Vagrant Spear struck. Three quick steps and extending her body like the spear she wielded, the tip of her steel finding the back of the Revenant's head – only he danced to the side, sword flicking back to bat away her spear before he caught Ishaq by the edge of his mail even as the Barrow Sword carved into his flank.

"That's all we'll get," the Drake said. "Get on with it."

With a heave, he threw the Barrow Sword upwards into the sky and turned to Sidonia with a hard grin. Half a heartbeat later a black-feathered arrow sprouted in Ishaq's throat as he still rose in the air. And as if a veil had been torn down, an undead drake was revealed. Batting its wings half a hundred feet away from the bastion, above the height of the fight. Atop the creature stood a single archer. The Hawk, Sidonia thought, and felt a glimmer of fear. She had no time for more, as the Drake was on her and he was not an opponent she could afford to be distracted against. Still, Zoe must be warned as much as she could be in the throes of her rage.

"The Hawk is here, Berserker," Sidonia shouted. "Watch-"

An arrow sprouted in the villainess forehead even as she threw the beorn off the wall, staggering her for a moment. Ashen Gods, the Vagrant Spear thought. Mere moments and already two of her band were dead. Only, instead of collapsing the Berserker screamed in utter fury before ripping off one of the crenels and tossing the large stone at the drake.

"Impressive," the Drake complimented even as he struck.

Sidonia let the worries sink away into nothing. She would not survive this, if she let the world command her attention. Eyes on the enemy's blade, she nimbly withdrew two steps and smiled. Yes, this was better. Her and the foe, nothing else. If death came through arrow, let it. She would end her life in honour. Breathing out, she circled again as the Revenant studied her. He feigned with a brusque step forward but she did not bite, choosing her angle. Right behind the shoulder there was a point where the Scourge could not even parry, the arm simply did not bend right. If she could get him to move... She rushed forward, earning a swing, and slid under the horizontal strike.

She rolled around the kick that followed, coming up in a crouch with the point of her spear upwards. At precisely the right angle Sidonia rose, and to the strike she added the secret Creation had bestowed upon her: that so long as you struck with the soul instead of the hand, there was nothing you could not Pierce. The blade of her spear slid through the armpit, shearing through flesh and muscle and bone as blood sprayed and she bisected the Drake. Her spearhead emerged through the other armpit and she ripped it free as she stepped back, blood flecking her face paint. Only, she realized with dim horror, just enough had healed by the time she withdrew the spear that strings of skin had kept the severed parts together.

"Good blow," the Drake praised. "My turn."

The angle was wrong. She knew it even as she struck at the swing coming at her, trying to change how it would strike. Instead the spearhead scraped along the side of the greatsword, changing nothing, and with a swallowed scream she felt her enemy's edge cut halfway through her arm and outright through the shaft of her spear. The Drake snorted, socking her in the stomach and letting her stumble to the ground.

"The Tanja lord, Hawk," the Scourge called out. "I'm not in the mood for pursuit, get him now."

And from the corner of her eye, Sidonia saw the arrow fly. Finding a path through the press of bodies and shields with impossible accuracy, as if eager to snatch out the life of the Lord of Malaga. And it made it but an inch away from the Tanja's throat, before the sour-faced spectre of a young man became visible and unhinged his jaw to swallow it whole. The Harrowed Witch, Sidonia realized with dim relief. She rolled to her feet, bleeding but unbowed, and breathed out. She still had two aspects to use. Only the Drake seemed disinclined to allow her to use them, already on her and swinging. Barren Mercy, Sidonia thought. She would have to cushion the blow and she raised her hand...

The point of the Barrow Sword's eerie blade punched through the Drake's belly, Ishaq looking bloodless but very much alive.

"Gods but I hate dying," the Barrow Sword hissed. "Do you have any idea how many souls that sets me back?"

Well, Sidonia thought, rising to her feet with the two halves of her spear. Perhaps today's deeds would not have to be added to the Rolls by another's hand, after all.

—

Razin had known this fear before.

During the battle he had not yet known would be called the Princes' Graveyard, witnessing the Firstborn unleashed under cover of the dark. The way death had just... ensued, and they'd all been powerless to stop it for those few Bestowed with the privilege of doing otherwise by the Ashen Gods. It had stuck in his throat then, that fear, and it did now even as his life was saved from some Revenant's murderous whim by the whim of some clever Bestowed using a ghost. And he knew, he did, that the intelligent decision made was to leave. To stay behind a shield wall and retreat out of sight, where the archer could not easily pursue beyond the city wards. And yet instead, Razin Tanja felt his jaw clench. Is this the sum of us? We die in droves while the demigods settle the score, little more than an afterthought for either side.

No, he thought. Enough.

"Warriors of Malaga," he shouted, "shield wall."

They would not be ghosts before death even bothered to find them, spectators to the end of times. If they were to stand here tonight, it would be sword in hand. A shiver of surprise went through the warriors, of hesitation, but in the end he was the Lord of Malaga and this was war. The shields went up, sword rose.

"Binders, on my word," Razin said. "Knock that drake out of our fucking sky."

An arrow streaked towards him again, but the apparition swallowed it once more. Who did it belong to, he wondered? He would have to find out. Thanks were in order.

"Forward, sons and daughters of Levant," Razin Tanja screamed.

"The Blessed Artificer requests that you unleash the binders right before she acts, your lordship."

Razin almost stabbed the woman who'd just addressed him in surprise, as a heartbeat ago he would have been sure there was absolutely no one standing next to him. Ashen Gods, how long had she been there?

"And when is that?" the Lord of Malaga asked, steadying his breath.

"In..." the young woman addressing him trailed off, cocking her head to the side, "seven heartbeats now."

Cursing, Razin immediately ordered for the binders to strike even as his shield wall advanced. Bound spirits flew out, gathering substance from their surroundings as they did, and struck at the archer and the undead drake in a storm. On the ground the Revenant was carving at the shield wall, slicing through shields like butter, but with the Barrow Sword and the Vagrant Spear striking at him he could not afford more than a few idle blows and he was steadily losing ground. Now there was little but a strip at the edge of the bastion left to fight over, and there the monstrous Bestowed the other had brought was still raging. It snatched the Revenant by the foot and started wildly smashing him around, the other two Bestowed backing away carefully.

"Gods, let this work," the young witch by his side murmured.

The sky lit up with Light. Streak after streak gathered in a circle, like ceiling made of spears, and every last one was angled down at the storm his binders had made. The spirits, he now grasped, had not been meant by his allies to kill the archer but to blind it.

Light shone until it blinded them all, and like a tide it fell.

—

The Grey Pilgrim's steps stuttered.

It was, Tariq thought, almost like getting a glimpse of years to come. The devastation visited unto the bastion seemed like a small thing, compared to the cheers of his countrymen defending it. The sky was filled with smoke and the Drake was still there, pinned to the ground by sorcery and swords and the bruising grip of the Berserker, but it was the living that had caught his eye. Razin Tanja, the young man that was half the hope he saw for his home rising above itself, reluctantly but honestly clasping arms with the Barrow Sword as he just had with the Vagrant Spear. Warriors roaring in approval. It was a different world, he thought. One he had not been born to.

He'd come here to take care of Levant, but Levant had taken care of itself.

It was pride he now felt welling up in his belly, but grief as well. There was still some aid he could lend, at least, and that much he would offer. The Pilgrim made his way through the crowd, warriors respectfully parting for him, and though offering smiles and nods where appropriate his stride led directly to the Drake. The Berserker had just pulped his stomach, but those eyes were wide open and aware. They also filled with fear, when he approached, as they should.

"Drake," Tariq gently smiled.

"No," the Revenant hissed. "Not you, I was so close I was—"

Light lashing out, the Grey Pilgrim pulled open a gate into Twilight beneath the Scourge. He struggled, but there was no avoiding this while bound. Screaming, convulsing, the Revenant fell into the gate and turned to ash. And this time, when the tooth flew out towards the edge of the rampart, Tariq was ready. He snatched it out of the air and the Ophanim hissed with anger at the abomination, their will joining his as he wove Light and tightened his grip. Dust flowed out from between his fingers, slipping into the gate before he finally allowed it to close. The Pilgrim opened his mouth to speak into the hushed silence that'd followed, but it was a great roar that broke it instead.

The Berserker spasmed in pain, half a dozen arrows stuck in her body and three through her forehead, but from the monstrous shape she'd turned into she slowly turned back into a woman. The Ophanim whispered and Tariq's hands tightened.

"Is there anything we can do?"

Silence. There was no. The Berserker's rage ended, leaving only a mortal behind, and that mortal did not breathe. Only the wrath had kept her alive.

Keter always had the last word.

SpeckofStardust

One named dead so far
Lets see how many more will go.

Liliet

One Named for either one or two Scourges, depending on how that had gone for Hawk.

Anomandris

One.

Indrani needs an awesome sniper showdown against the hawk...

shikkarasu

Only on-screen this time >.<

Sinead

I think it would be hilarious to have the second to last Interlude (assuming a series of Interludes between all the national factions) to have Indrani just wandering in the background to just snipe the Hawk and then wander out of scene. Cut back to Cat's view and from her perspective, Indrani is late to arrival and doesn't explain what she was up to.

The scene can be more impressive than just one arrow, but it still makes the general point.

beleester

Two, don't forget the one the young heroes killed. We don't know if it was the Varlet or some other Revenant (the grey cloak fits, but not the part where it pulls a longsword), but definitely a Revenant of some sort.

KageLupus

There is zero chance that the first Revenant was a Scourge, or that the Varlet would have been caught out by three kids after Cat and the Pilgrim spent so much time planning out the exact band of five needed to take out the various Scourges. The power difference is just too vast for Providence to help them overcome.

That said, the shape of that group has very strong echoes to Cat and the early days of the Woe and I am very excited to see where it goes. A Callowan Squire paired up with an Apprentice and a support-themed Named, both from an historically enemy nation, forging bonds while overcoming life-or-death fights against enemy Named? Cat made a big splash in the narrative when she hit the scene and this feels like another ripple caused by it.

Earl of Purple

Apprentice is from Ashur, also known as the Thalassocracy, which is a Greek term for a state that was a major naval power. Callow, meanwhile, is landlocked (well, except the Wasaliti...). Levant and Callow are both known to have fought Procer, as have the Free Cities. Ashur is not known to have warred upon any Calernian nation outside a Crusade or the regular naval engagements with Nicae, who want a share of Ashur's trading income.

agumentic

Ashur probably also fought Procer, since one of their bigger foreign policy goals is ensuring the Principate does not become a maritime nation, which it tried a few times, I am sure.

Downzor

Ditto Praes, pretty sure I saw a reference to Ashurian fleets wrecking the attempts of a Dread Emperor to build a functional navy

jworks17

I think Cat actually took the cloak from the Varlet last time, so I doubt it's them

Anomandris

Ok, that was epic by Ishaq and Sidonia.
Rip Zoe though.

"You have a a bear. But we have her."

If you listen closely, you can hear Shoot to Thrill playing in the background as the Barrow Sword revives....

Levant seems to have lucked out a lot with Razin. Lad is level-headed as hell. He still seems to be focused on some of the wrong issues (the whole section on the duels, et. al.). If the last section isn't a foreboding note on Tariq, I don't know what is.

Matthew Wells

The Pilgrim's favorite hobbies are healing people and collecting death flags, so it'd be weird if we got a non-ominous POV from him.

Henry

That's his secret they can never establish a good dramatic time to kill you if you are constantly foreshadowing your inevitable demise. In that case everyone's expecting you to die constantly so the story has to keep you alive

Burnsy

Cat to the assembled villains in her pre-battle speech: "And remember! You get killed? Walk it off."

Shveiran

It is a true and tested method, after all.

Insanenoodlyguy

Tariq was quite sure when there was only a shape of "Will need to go north" that he and Saint would not survive the passing of the torch to a new generation. He's known for years he wouldn't see the end of this.

imagesbe

I have a feeling that we're going to be seeing a lot of epic deeds and great sacrifices in this battle. Perhaps more than we've ever seen in this story so far.

Villain or Hero, there will be a lot of heroism in this fight.

Sir Nil

Hawk forgot that barbarians only take half damage when Raging.

Itarion

This is older than that. 3.5 Frenzied Berzerker prestige class, 4th level feature Deathless Frenzy. While frenzied (rage+), the frenzied berzerker does not die from anything but death effects (target dies) until the frenzy ends.

Revenant

If only there were a bucket of water handy.

Razorfloss razor

Damn it Berserker this is why you always take Diehard and Raging Vitality to avoid this situation right here.

Black Spiral Dancer

Yet it would certainly feel even more impossible than things already are if people could take so many arrows (including into their HEADS) and shrug them off like nothing afterwards. I mean, if those two were her 2nd and 3rd aspects, then MAYBE, but even in D&D I have a hard time thinking of berserkers fighting without heads or with tens of arrows in their heads and living afterwards, although by the rules they could be...

Razorfloss razor

It's not about living though it. It's about surviving long enough until a healer can patch you back to the world of the living. If her rage was still up it would have been easy enough to pull everything out and close the holes although pulling them out while under rage would have been a separate thing entirely.

Daniel E

Granted, having an Aspect dedicated entirely to not dying via being shot in the head is incredibly situational, but I will be incredibly grateful the one time I need it.

naturalnuke

The aspect would be called Helmet and fuck all those princes who didn't think of using it

Liliet

Depends on how much of a hobby antagonizing archers is for you.

Matthew Wells

Pretty popular around here.

j

What happened to the Hawk?

WuseMajor

Hopefully vaporized by Light, but hard to say without the body.

Big I

I doubt it. We didn't see a body, and falling off a wyvern seems pretty much like falling off a cliff to me, we know how effective that is.

Mental Mouse

The "falling off a cliff" thing is heroes only, Revenants don't get to invoke that. But they do have their own survival tropes...

Shveiran

Eh, it has never been mentioned in the novel, you are right about that, but it kinda is a bilateral trope. You think the Villain couldn't have survived X, but you never see the body, then surprise he comes back? It's not specific to cliffs, granted, but... it's kind of a general rule. You don't count your dead Named before beheading the bodies, it's all I'm saying.

Or maybe before throwing them in the Twilight Ways, in this case.

Konstantin von Karstein

And having the body burned. William thought beheading Cat was enough...

Liliet

William also tried to dismember her to be fair, the rest of the Woe drove him off.

Mental Mouse

Aside from the fall, there's also that storm of Light, which could quite plausibly have taken her out as well.

ninegardens

Unknown. Sidona might have destroyed her... but I ain't putting bets on it. Drake on the other hand is goneburger.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Gone, reduced to atoms.

Rey d`Tutto

He is no more. He has passed on. He is pushing up raises. he is beyond pining for the fjords.
He is dead bird.

Liliet

(she)

Mental Mouse

Drake is male, Hawk is female, but is the less certain kill. Both are potentially birds, though in a fantasy context Drake could also apply to a dragon variation (especially with that regeneration/self-res).

Miles

Wonder how this fight looks like on a chessboard

Black sacrifices a pawn, and then trades a Berserker for a Drake.

doominator10

Only white has a few million more pawns to spare...

Shveiran

Only one Drake thought

Big I

Shame about Berserker. Barrow Sword was awesome, definitely got some Iron Man vibes from him this chapter. I'm assuming his magic sword was made by the giants to kill dragons.

This chapter made me think of what the Tyrant told Cat about the groove she's leaving on Creation, of leaders making hard choices to serve a greater good. Razin sending his political opponents to die, the Iron Prince arresting or killing the fantassin captains. She's definitely having an impact.

And speaking of impacts, the Tanja soldiers reminded me of the Legions of Terror in this chapter, using discipline to counteract Named.

The Drake's last words made me think that the Scourges are fighting for their freedom, makes things more tragic. And it was interesting that he called the Hawk "the Hawk", since that's the name the Alliance gave them.

Liliet

Why do you think it's to kill dragons? It sounds like an anti-binder weapon to me.

Big I

Two reasons. One, in Colossal II Kreios told the Witch that dragons resurrected if killed, a soul sucking weapon seems to me to be a counter to that. Two, the Dominion is in territory that I assume used to be controlled by the giants, the Eighteen Cities.

Liliet

Yeah, but a sword just doesn't seem like it'd be effective against a dragon in any way.

Daniel E

Whatever happened to good old General Catastrophe? I would love to get his input.

Liliet

Sleeping, apparently.

Sinead

I could see it being a Dragonbane weapon if the sword is meant to make the wielder able to stand toe to toe with the Dragon. I could see this serving as the "Hero (old style term) sword falls from their grasp and they die". The Sword basically makes Ishaq a pseudo Drake.

Granted this theory is in part based on the assumption that instead of straight "souls" the sword cuts out and feeds on "vitality" or soul structure. This means more 'vital' opponent (one way to describe Dragons) feeds the sword a lot for the kill, but necromantic structures (which Binder spirits would fall under) are easier to eat, as they hold on their vitality more loosely.

Granted, this is me spitballing, but it could also be that undead were an issue in the 18 Cities era that required additional tools. (The current thought is that the Drakoi blood cursed Praes/Hungering Sands and that ratlings are descendants of those that ate the carcass, yes?) That puts that conflict on the other side of the continent from the Levant.

Liliet

Dragons fly. Archers have been established as an effective anti-dragon measure in sufficient amounts and with sufficient story beats, but a sword against a dragon sounds extremely useless logistically.

naturalnuke

Ah but who really has more to fear between the dragon and the peasant 'with a sword'?

If you remember that epitaph

Liliet

An epitaph indeed.

agumentic

Not if you corner them in their lair they don't. Heroes can also fly themselves. Knights killed their fair share of dragons with lances and swords, I wouldn't count them out.

Liliet

True enough.

And I'm still not sure how "dragonslaying" follows from "loves to drink souls, particularly bound ones".

Sinead

I was about to respond with Sigurd as an example , but Fafnir couldn't fly. And I think that's the main story I could think of regarding sword slaying dragons (I think George generally uses a lance?) I guess my second spitballing theory also works.

I am curious as to what's in the soil of levant that they have the issue of barrows that no one else does, though.

Liliet

huh, yeah

maybe it's a post-triumphant thing? they're directly to the west of the lake she made

Sinead

That could work. It definitely seems to predate the Uprising of Levant, at least given the dates listed for some barrows.

However, Ishaq's armour is also made of bronze, which to my understanding would put it before the War of Chains with the Miezens, so over 300 years pre Triumphant. Since Pinion is so effective against grave spirits, that had to be an issue prior to any curse of hers.

Perhaps it's a relic of the Titan's Fall? They sought to bring back the dead, after all....

Liliet

That was the other option I was thinking about, yeah!

Matthew Wells

It might have something to do with funerary practices- maybe if you don't burn the bodies or sacrifice them they just come back spontaneously sometimes. Callowans wouldn't know about that because they always bury bodies in hallowed ground, which would be why Cat hasn't thought about it.

Liliet

@Matthew Wells: Procer also has random ancient barrows scattered across it, the Prince's Graveyard happened with Catherine's camp on top of one, and those don't come alive.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think the barrow at the Prince's graveyard was more of a place of worship than a tomb.

Mental Mouse

Um, classic trope? Never mind the armor, the story is "hero slays the dragon", and often features a sword. (Sometimes it's a spear, though.)

Liliet

Are those flying dragons?

Mental Mouse

In-world, I'm not sure it matters in the face of a story.

IRL mythology, almost certainly not, I'm pretty sure that in the West flying dragons were a late development. (And Eastern dragons were a different track altogether, more in the vein of sub-deities). E.g., I recall hearing that St. George's legend started as him slaying an unspecified "great beast", which in context would likely have been a wild boar.

Liliet

In-world, the stories had to have come from somewhere.

And yeah makes sense for IRL mythology 🤔

Mental Mouse

> And it was interesting that he called the Hawk "the Hawk", since that's the name the Alliance gave them.

Which also lends new energy to the thought that the villains "just happened" to dub another of the Scourges the Tumult, same as one of the Horned Lords... and this particular Scourge has made a habit of hiding their own form within a storm, so they don't actually know what it looks like.

Adrian_V

Honestly it almost sounds like a Revenant/undead killing sword, which would make sense outside Nussy seeing how many Barrow undead named Levant appears to have.

daegone823

I think the tactics used by the Iron Prince have been used before. He was raised by the chain of hunger and all of his officers understood the choice he made, even Hano. the only people that seemed surprised were the fantassins, they are usually not involved in these type of end of the world fights.

I think the grove being left is of heroes and villains working together. A world leader being saved by a villain whose shade swallows arrows. Not because they like one another but because of the practicality of survival. Good/Evil don't matter when we are more worried about the good of society.

I think that with the Vagrant Spear's support the Barrow Sword might even be able to get into the rolls.

Letting go of petty struggles might be the crux of the queen's groove in society. Working together to achieve greater goods. I

WuseMajor

"My lord," one of his men quietly said, shaking him out of his thoughts. "We must vote. We have stayed in the same place for too long, Revenants might come for your head."

Razin gave the horrors below one last look, hand resting against the pommel of his sword. They'd be here before too long.

"We will do our part," the Lord of Malaga murmured. "On my honour."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Juff

Typo Thread:

captains regularly > captains who regularly slunk away > slinking away cut – the Squire, stepped > cut, the Squire stepped had Sarcella > at Sarcella approval as the blessing (is this right?) not share > not shared advanced the > advanced, the abandoning is greatsword > abandoning his greatsword Ishaq, though > Ishaq, though, hound on > a hound on low bit > low hit swallow a > swallowed a one Below's > one of Below's villainess > villainess's crenel (it seems this refers to the gap, not the wall) decision made > decision steading > steadying like ceiling > like a ceiling
There was no. (missing word)

Burnsy

Getting big Nightblood energy from Pinon:

"Hello! Would you like to destroy some E-v-i-l- Revenants today?"

allthesame713

First? Great chapter as always.

Liliet

LMAO

But yeah it is ♥ ♥ ♥

barlgenawdlezouss

Apprentice and Squire and Page? Called it! Go Teen Titans!

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

They just need a couple of Skillmonkeys.

Burlyraven

I was so expecting the Barrow Squad to move into action but be stopped as Razin came into a Name, able to Aragorn summon his loyal swords, even in death. Something like a no-magic variant of the Binder. What we got was fantastic, though.

Also, yay for Baby Name Squad! The Page being part of the mage/tank/rogue trio was also unexpected but cool.

Black Spiral Dancer

baby name squad actually made me ROFL

Darkening

So, squire, apprentice, page, let's toss in the acolyte to be their healer... That's a pretty good lineup, just need 1 more for a band of five. What other transitory names have we heard of? Heir I guess? Lots of royalty running around, suppose that could happen.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Young Slayer.

pirateddesigns

I was going to comment about the parallels between the Calamities and Woe, but Hanno's original band of five might be a better comparison due to being heroes.

Black Knight (Squire)/Squire/Squire
Captain/Adjutant/Page
Warlock (Apprentice)/Heirophant (Apprentice)/Apprentice Assassin/Thief/???
Ranger/Archer/???

White Knight/Squire
Valiant Champion/ Page (? – kind of outside the “tank” role of Champion)
Hedge Wizard/Apprentice
Ashen Priestess/ Stalwart Apostle?
Wandering Bard/ OH SH!7?!?

Also fun to note, the (presumably) most recent Page attended the Exiled Prince, who Kauk shot through the neck back at the Battle of Three Hills in Book 2, and was killed by Catherine.

Black Spiral Dancer

Ishaq apparently feels what everyone that has ever played Dark Souls felt many many times before.

dadycoool

It makes sense that Berserker wouldn't survive that, having pulled a Boromir, fighting through lethal arrows, but I as honestly expecting GP to congratulate the Levantites right before sprouting an arrow, having realized that he wasn't needed. That little inner monologue felt like a Death Flag.

Liliet

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

So, you're telling me Abigail the Immortal isn't a character? Abigail Blood-drinker? Abigail, General of the Third Army of Callow?

Liliet

She transcends mere characterdom

Liliet

...to elaborate on the comment I have left that is currently in moderation because of links,

The Grey Pilgrim had been expecting to die in this war from the very start, he discussed that with Laurence back before the Battle of Camps (yes, that early). "An old guy who thinks he's outlived his time" has been his character the entire time, and it was a pretty dramatic plot/character beat in the Twilight arc when he actively and literally fought Catherine to be the one to die. Because he thinks his time is over and the new generation must take over now.

This has gone beyond death flags: he has ALREADY DIED TO THIS. It's not going to happen the second fucking time asdkfskdgjksj if Grey Pilgrim dies it's going to be in a different plot/thematic beat entirely!

So, uh, no. In context, this is not a death flag in any way, shape or form.

Anomandris

What's beyond a death flag? Turned-into-Revanent flag?

Liliet

A survival flag.

KageLupus

I agree with all of your points except maybe the idea that Grey Pilgrim won't die from his death flags. I think that he is pretty much guaranteed to end up doing a Heroic Sacrifice at this point. The only real question is when and for what. First time it was to break the DK and create the Twilight Ways. This time it has to be for something similar in scope. I don't think killing a Revenant or even a Scourge will be enough, but eventually he will find some situation that will only work if he dies for it. Its pretty much a foregone conclusion since he is pretty actively searching for those situations right now.

Liliet

It'd be repetitive for him to do a Heroic Sacrifice because he considers himself old enough to be expendable. Narrative-wise, both in-universe and from the point of view of PGTE as a story, we've already seen that.

Either there's going to be a different emotional beat to a Heroic Sacrifice entirely, or we're getting a "relic of a bygone era witnessing the rise of a new one" narrative, like his POV on Razin shaking hands with Ishaq, here.

JJR

An interesting theory. One that The Pilgrim himself has not caught on to either, it seems. It would be an interesting character arc, having someone have to come to terms with living when they were sure that they would die.

Liliet

Incidentally, I want Amadeus's POV so so so badly.

Anonymous

It's definitely a death flag. Just because he has already died once doesn't mean he can't die again, especially when the Pilgrim seems to be looking for a suitably valuable death. This chapter is the Pilgrim taking in all the signs that he is no longer necessary to handle things. If you want to argue that this isn't a death flag, I think you're just shutting your eyes and trying very hard not to see the things that are there.

Liliet

Oh, it is a death flag. It's just a flag for the death that ALREADY HAPPENED.

We've already milked the drama out of it! There's none left!

Now there is quite a bit narrative juice left in the “watching the new era’s dawn as a relic of the old one” narrative, though.

Avenant

I think he will continue to live and maybe get a new Role as a Teacher at Cardinal. I mean he is kind of Gandalf/Dumbledore 😊

Reader in The Night

While them taking out the Drake is a win, it’s also concerning. The dialogue between Drake and Hawk reveals they were specifically trying to bait out Named for assassination, and they successfully managed to bait out the Anti-Pale Knight Squad (plus Tariq) and inflict a significant loss on it, meaning they’re all out of position to contain the Axeman.

Going by Cat’s “a win, a loss, a win” narrative, one band is about to get brutalized by the Pale Knight so that the Woe can overcome the Storm.

Liliet

I think that pattern applies to individual fights rather than the plan as a whole, that’d be too easy.

daegone823

I thought that as well, if the “Axe man slaying crew”, is here what is the ill equipped “Drake” slaying crew doing.

Please be a showdown with the black queen who comes into her new name.

Liliet

There wasn’t a dedicated Drake slaying crew. Drake was expected to act as a bodyguard for one of the other Scourges.

A very wise and blessed person has been keeping track on reddit:

Adrian_V

He could actually die due to old age, as in while sleeping or after a real tough battle.

Liliet

That’s the most likely death for him, yeah.

Earl of Purple

If Barrow Sword's sword won't let him die so long as it has souls, I see why he was chosen for Scourge hunting. If Cat knows about that little thing.

Also explains Levant's undead, too.

Frivolous

Getting rid of the Drake was good. Good enough trade for the Berserker. She was competent but he was a nightmare.

Anyone know the provenance or etymology of the name Pinon? I haven't figured it out yet.

Burlyraven: Baby Name Squad is good name for them, yes. Funny.

Big I: Yes, I agree that it was odd the Drake called the Hawk the Hawk, but maybe he was just under orders not to reveal her original Name, lest the Alliance learn her history and original aspects, so he copied the Alliance cognomen.

I don't believe that Razin knows about Scourges. I checked, and every use of the word Scourge in this chapter was in a section whose POV was Named.

Thus Razin cannot properly appreciate the honor given him by Keter, that they sent the Drake and the Hawk after him. I'm guessing that the Scourges are a secret, possibly because it would damage Alliance morale if it became commonly known that Keter has killers of Named.

I guess that was the first time a villain of Levant exchanged handshakes with a lord of the Tanja and received the acclaim of the Tanja warriors. Razin will probably find out in time that his life was saved from arrows by another villain, albeit Proceran. Ishaq's goals became that much more achievable.

I find it odd that I enjoy that Aspasia the Harrowed Witch did hardly anything at all during the battle. She didn't even block the arrows herself, she had her dead brother Julien do it. More mystery = good.

Arthur Foundling the Squire probably doesn't have any aspects at all yet. Bad situation to be in in a battle of this magnitude.

Liliet

I think Drake and Hawk were sent less after Razin and more to bait out the Pale Knight killing band.

Ben

It's possible he was thought to be a better matchup for folks the Pale Knight is concerned with, and he definitely can have more than one goal at once, but it sure looked like he and the Hawk were initially after Razin. I think folks sometimes get a little carried away with speculation regarding this story, but I'm not sure it's going too far out on a limb to say that if anyone can take a long view and try to shape national international trends, it's the Dead King. He may have a sense as to how important Razin is to Levant getting its shit together. But we've already seen with Hune and in some of the interludes that the Dead King has a penchant for sending Revenants to knock off important military/political leaders, for tactical and morale damaging purposes.

Liliet

I mean going after Razin is a good way to bait out any Named around, considering he's politically important in the long term.

Tom

And in that regard they succeeded; the Pale Knight killing band is no longer a band of five.

Liliet

Mm!

They paid a price for that though :3

shikkarasu

Contrariwise, Squire not having Aspects means that he can gain one specifically designed for killing Undead/Revenants. Catherine has complained about heroes doing exactly this many times. Canny opponents also like to bait out a third Aspect. If you don't have one, then you can't fall into that trap.

Arthur is going to be fine.

Shveiran

You are not wrong, per se, but let's remember that we've seen a lot of Named die before they got their last aspect, so it's hardly a guarantee

Mental Mouse

>Anyone know the provenance or etymology of the name Pinon? I haven't figured it out yet.

Unless it's simply a name rather than a word, "Pinon" seems to be one way or another a misspelling and mispronunciation.

(Qualifier: The Levantine-analog languages may have their own etymology, which wouldn't show up in my casual search.) Either:

> Definition of piñon

> : any of various small pines (such as Pinus quadrifolia, P. cembroides, P. edulis, and P. monophylla) of western North America with edible seeds [or the seeds thereof, commonly known as "pine nuts"]

> pinion noun (1)

> 1 : the terminal section of a bird's wing including the carpus, metacarpus, and phalanges broadly : wing

> 2 : feather, quill also : flight feathers

> pinion verb

> 1a : to disable or restrain by binding the arms

> b : to bind fast : shackle

> 2 : to restrain (a bird) from flight especially by cutting off the pinion of one wing

The second version certainly seems more apropos to a weapon

braxen1

Its one hundred percent a joke about final fantasy. Some of the games have items called phoenix pinions that resurrect you after killed or ko'd.

Frivolous

Ben: Yeah, I really do think that Razin was a target, if not the target. Reason: The Hawk shot at him. Twice.

Hawk shot at only 3 people that I noticed in this fight: Barrow Sword, Berserker, and Razin Tanja.

Mental Mouse and Cicero: Thanks. Your posts match my own findings. It's nice to have a second opinion.

Cicero

I assumed Pinon was derived from "pinion," which refers to the flight feathers of a bird, and so guessed it was similar to William's angel sword.

Though googling pinon results in references to a pine tree nut so...

daegone823

I mean he could have "Learn" which while useful in practicing with a sword or language comprehension is useless in battle.

Also I think the reason they have not spread the name of the scourges is because that would create a story for them. Legendary status. remember named feed on there fame. The Scourges would be infamous as named killers probably gaining more power. The growing narrative was commented on by The Black Queen in the planning stage of the battle. Hence a whole band of five was necessary instead of two named.

Who knows maybe that was why the Drake was angry he was this close to gaining enough power to break away from the Dead King with his newfound power.

Matthew Wells

Maybe that's how the Pale Knight goes down. He gets sent after Klaus and manages to free himself just long enough to destroy his body before he can end his own line.

Mental Mouse

I doubt it, but it's a lovely thought.

Christian Oaks

They already acknowledged the scourges have a story

Cap'n Smurfy

This is just Keter's story in a nutshell. Great victories won, a new, hopeful path found and one last tragedy at the end of it all. Just enough to make it bittersweet, maintaining the story of fighting The Dead King: You never get a clean win.

Konstantin von Karstein

And that bittersweet win open the door to a greater loss, with the fact that now the Band supposed to kill the Pale Knight lost its Story momentum.

Mental Mouse

It's not clear that nailing the Drake and maybe even the Hawk is a loss over the Pale Knight, especially if they can take the latter down later. The band does urgently need a replacement for the Berserker, though.

Big I

Headhunter maybe?

Aotrs Commander

Did... Did Ishaq just "we have a Hulk" the Drake?

Damn, I knew I liked him for a reason.

(For a moment there, I was really worried when he got arrowed, out of all the secondary Named, he is the one, turns out, I'm most bothered about surviving.)

Mike E.

Damn, this was good. Razin's internal monologue about having to send good men to all but certain death was heartbreaking.

Clint

Wow. Awesome chapter. Razin, Ishaq, and Tariq!

Tariq's POV on Page-Squire-Apprentice was perfect. We got to see them work together as a party, and got to see what the "last-minute-rescue-by-mentor" aspect looks like to Tariq, even when it turns out not to be needed.

Razin is soooo getting a Name – his fervent desire to change the world and Tariq's picking him out for mentoring make that clear.

Also, starting to platonically ship Barrow Sword and Vagrant Spear – their friendship could lead to everything Ishaq wants: his name added to the Rolls of Honor, despite his villanry.

Axel Rafael

I want to "give weight" to that platonic relationship Narrative wink wink

Jokes aside, I wasn't expecting Ishaq and Sidonia to have such a pleasant "comfortable" dynamic.

Also, Razin really reminded me of Catherine. The way he's caring about and grieving for his soldiers. That growing realization of what achieving his Dreams is going to entail, and the maturing that inevitably accompanies it. The Overcoming his limiting beliefs about what he can or can not do. And even his understanding of the need for more than violence, bravery and "honour" to Change the World. Almost like his growth was accelerated by being in contact with so many "Great People" around him indirectly guiding him.

Also, I too was totally expecting him to begin the Path to a Name...

Konstantin von Karstein

If he gains a Villainous Name, it would have massive consequences for Levant... And I wonder if he would be subordinated to Cat, a foreign head of state. It would be a clusterfuck of epic proportions.

Christian Oaks

I don't think so, he seems an awful lot like another Cordelia, a person who might earn a name but won't take it. Also he doesn't have magic, can people of a certain blood earn a name outside of it? Are there examples of that happening?

Ragnarok101

Gonna admit, I laughed out loud at Ishaq reviving and immediately bitching about how inconvenient death is.

Axel Rafael

The way he reacted to it, let alone the fact that he revived in itself, reminds me of Catherine for some reason, and I love it.

Actually, I might have seen bits of Catherine in different parts of this Chapter.

Xinci

Hm logical that he could reconstitute himself if he got enough souls. If you have enough souls you they can weigh in on what should be (so good for regeneration also good for patching up soul damage). I think Ishaq would be a very interesting form of undead if he somehow managed to become one with a good stockpile of souls available. Wonder where his weapon came from, perhaps originally a wonder of the Gigantes?

Tanjas dream is nice but any constructed society must always have means to mitigate malefactors if it is to survive. A united Levant while better against external threats must have a unifying internal thread to avoid internal dissension leading to internal destruction. Though Levant seems a possible perfect one for a unitary bond between Named of Below or Above due to their philosophy of strife not being entirely wrong. That is to say regardless of who's side you are on, they both get data for their last dusk. So if both sides can cooperate through strife, then they could achieve a more mixed framework of leadership. Though some reform to the Barrows and other bloodlines would be necessary for such a grand working of purpose.

Liliet

> Hm logical that he could reconstitute himself if he got enough souls. If you have enough souls you they can weigh in on what should be (so good for regeneration also good for patching up soul damage).

I'm sure you mean "souls are a known very potent source of power, and Guideverse is very flexible as to what results can be achieved if you have the power for it".

Shoji

Suddenly I feel like Razin is on the path to a Name...

daegone823

I doubt it. he explicitly states how he will not stand idly by while gods fight. He grew up without magic and will still fight without a name. He expects normal men to triumph where years of the blood "Names".

Liliet

In Guideverse, Badass Normals also get Names, if there's a groove for it.

laguz24

Nah, It should be easier to be badass without a name
Cordelia set the groove.

Nicholas Guyett

And Cordelia was offered a name by both above and below

Liliet

You're ascribing her actions a much more revolutionary quality than they likely have. There will have been plenty of badasses who didn't have Names or refused Names or failed to transition and were left Nameless while still being badass – see Catherine at the end of Book 3.

Stories are still there, waiting for people to trip into them like gopher holes.

Rey d`Tutto

Sometimes you play a role, some others a Role, and a few times it's a Name Role.

Crash

And every time they do(or more commonly, people insist they will) I cry a little.

Please. Even Razin was at it this time, not everything needs a Named to solve it. It's fine to have folks who don't have Names. It's neat, even.

Badass Normal is a trope for a reason. Let them be.

Non-benders are neat, fellas. The Cabbage Vender might have his story groove but it need not be a Story Groove for him to be memorable.):

Liliet

Sokka was Named, no question.

The cabbage vendor though, yes. I expect Abigail the Fox to remain non-Named throughout the story ♥ ♥ ♥

Benjamin Rogers

Amazing chapter

Testing

Wonder if we're going to get an interlude with Team Baby (Squire, Apprentice, Page).

laguz24

I have this theory that names don't matter in the game of the gods. Its the people that they come from, it's meant to stop on powerful individuals conquering the entire chessboard before the question is answered. Villains lose and are slain while heroes die after a happy end, however the people outside of stories are much more tenebrous.

Interlude: Song

"I wrote this work because it is our habit as a people to ignore the worst of our history and gild its mediocrities, and to speak against this practice will see you castigated as unpatriotic. This is more than wrong, it is dangerous. We must not snuff out the lights of our common soul by placating the darkness, else what manner of a world are we laying the foundation for?"

– Extract from the conclusion of 'The Labyrinth Empire, or, A Short History of Procer', by Princess Eliza of Salamans

Her lips had gone dry, so Beatrice Volignac made herself drink from her cup so it would not show. The wine was watered, she was not foolish enough to partake while a battle was being waged, but the taste of the stout Cantal red was bracing anyway. The Princess of Hainaut, or more truthfully the capital and a thin stretch of the old southern borderlands, set down her golden cup after having wet her lips and leaned down to look over the maps she'd had her footpads bring to the war room years ago. This was not a war council, for there was precious little planning left to be made, but given the prominence of the people seated in the salon where Beatrice's ancestors had once received visiting royalty any decision made here had the potential to make or break the defence of the city.

Everyone had a man or a woman at the table, so to speak. The Army of Callow in the city was led by the seniormost of their generals, an aging orc who went by the name of Bagram, but while the general was here his authority was mitigated by another's presence: Lady Vivienne Dartwick, heiress-designate to the throne of Callow. That the former heroine only rarely used her authority in military matters only reinforced its weight when she did use it, an elegant sort of artifice worthy of a woman with Lady Dartwick's excellent reputation with the Highest Assembly. There was some rejoicing among Beatrice's fellow royals at the notion that Lady Dartwick might be sitting the throne in a few years, though no doubt the prospect of no longer having to deal with someone who could drown an army when cross had played a role as well as Dartwick's personal qualities.

For the Dominion it was Captain Nabila, the stout commander of the Alavan forces within the alliance, who was well-understood to be the least of the three great Levantine commanders. Both Aquiline Osen and Razin Tanja were Blood, it lent a lustre to their authority that the other woman could not hope to match. The Iron Prince himself was here too, having left the command at the southern wall to Princess Mathilda of Neustria, with his empty sleeve folded over the arm he'd lost defending this very city three years back. The sole representative for the Firstborn was a certain Mighty Sagasbord, dark-skinned and quiet with a bent for the sardonic when it did break its silence. Prince Arsene despised it, Beatrice had learned, not that the dark elf particularly seemed to care. Theirs was not a culture that quailed at the thought of making powerful enemies.

It gave her the creeps.

"- eastern wall drove back an assault by Revenants and beorns," Captain Nadila shared. "Lord Razin led the defence, with assistance from a band of five Bestowed under the Vagrant Spear."

Beatrice's eyes sharpened. From what she recalled, that was the band with the Barrow Sword. The same man the Black Queen plainly meant to make her lieutenant. Somehow the princess doubted he'd been put under the command of another. That had the smell of Dominion politics, something she figured she ought to have as little to do with as possible.

"Only assaults on the walls," General Bagram growled. "Like we called it right. They won't touch the front gate until they've drawn out as many as our soldiers as they can."

"They'll keep testing us with Revenants," the Iron Prince said. "To suss out what Chosen we have at hand. Old Bones like to know the face of the opposition before he puts his back into the swing."

"The Revenants will be handled by Named," Lady Dartwick calmly said. "A defence plan was designed by Queen Catherine and the White Knight, before his departure. Our concern is to be the traditional forces."

Beatrice cleared her throat, claiming attention.

"Have our Firstborn friends confirmed our suspicions?" she asked.

Mighty Sagasbord coolly smiled. Its Chantant when it spoke was eerily perfect, and Beatrice knew enough of drow to know such proficiency could only be gained by wholesale slaughter of her countrymen. As always, that serene mask over the madness made her skin crawl.

"We dig for truth still," Mighty Sagasbord said. "But the Tomb-Maker itself leads us, Hainaut Princess. There is no need for... uneasiness."

That it could tell she feared it only made it more unpleasant to deal with.

"There's not much to do but wait," Prince Klaus Papenheim gruffly said. "No dishonour in that, it's the way war is. Some of us should try to get some sleep: the dead will try to run us into the ground, it's one of Keter's favourite tricks."

As all here knew, but when such a renowned veteran spoke the words it gave others the opening to do so without shaming themselves. The Iron Prince was not without his kindnesses, for all that like most Lycaonese he cared little for social graces.

"I may retire for a few hours, then," Princess Beatrice said. "It would be better to be fully rested when I relieve Captain-General Catalina from her command on the western wall."

Captain Nadila snorted, eyeing her with open disdain.

"Will you be returning to your palace for it, Princess Beatrice?" the painted Levantine asked.

The orc on the other side of the table chuckled. General Bagram received a cocked eyebrow from Lady Dartwick for it, but she took no further issue and he looked undaunted. It was the Iron Prince's unsurprised face that stung the most, though. Like he'd expected her to be the first to retire. Beatrice's fingers closed around her cup. Perhaps he had. It was not disdainful, but even now the Iron Prince thought of Alamans as soft – always it was they who balked, who slowed, who mutinied even as others bled to drive the dead out of their lands. And that belief, Beatrice Volignac found it reflected in the eyes of everyone here. She'd had it directed at her before, the look, when people thought that because she was fat it meant she was weak or stupid. But it wasn't about her this time, was it? Not really.

It was all Alamans that were being looked down on. And she could see the shape of it, almost. What great names had come of her people in this war? Cordelia Hasenbach was Lycaonese, Rozala Malanza was Arlesite and even the Kingfisher Prince, Frederic Goethal, preferred the company of northerners to his own kind while openly disdaining the games of the Highest Assembly. And it was unfair, Beatrice thought, for her people were brave. They were gallant and stubborn and love freedom more fiercely than any other under the sun, but what did it matter to these few before her now? All they saw was an Alamans shackle around the Grand Alliance's foot. And this was larger than Beatrice, than House Volignac or perhaps even royalty, but here and now it was her that the looks stung.

"I am not yet sure," Princess Beatrice evenly replied.
"Regardless, I will first go to our rampart and assess the situation there."

It was her home being fought for, she thought. Sleep could wait for a while still.

—

Catalina Ferreiro had become Captain-General of the Ligera Bandera a mere two years before the war against Keter began, an appointment that had been like a noose around her neck ever since. She had been a compromise candidate, she knew, that her decent battlefield record and noble lineage had seen her elected by the officers because they have her more respectable standing in the eyes of the rank and file. The powerful banner-captains of the Ligera had meant to use her as a figurehead while they privately continued the same infighting that'd paralyzed the greatest fantassin company of the Principate so badly it had been unable to even take a contract for the Tenth Crusade. Catalina had thought herself clever, playing off Vargeras against Capistrant until they'd spent themselves against each other and she had enough support to muzzle Garrido on her own.

The prize she had won, unfortunately, was uncontested command of the largest mercenary company on Calernia just as the first signs of the end times were glimpsed the north. As Old Teresa was fond of saying, the Gods never missed an opportunity to piss in the gruel of fantassins.

"Pitch and torches," the Captain-General bellowed. "Burn that thing or we'll lose the bastion."

Catalina preferred the spear, but it was a useless weapon against the dead so she'd taken to the halberd instead: with a grunt, she smashed the axehead into the flank of the skeleton coming for her and toppled it over the edge of the rampart. Her personal guard swept forward, smashing into the loose formation of undead trying to keep her from reinforcing the bastion where the Folies Rouges were being hacked apart by ghouls and the beorn that'd carried them up the cliff. Captain Reinald had done well against the first wave, but the second had caught him by surprise and now the entire western wall was at risk. If they lost that bastion... already the dead were trying to land ladders to solidify the beachhead. Flicking a glance back through the sweaty locks matting her helmet, she caught sight of the approaching torches. No more time to waste.

"Ligera," Catalina shouted.

"Faith kept through fire," her soldiers shouted back,

They charged against into the dead, whose formation the undead officers had not been quick enough to salvage. The Captain-General paced herself, picking her foes carefully – a thrust of her halberd pushed another corpse over the wall, a sweeping descent shattered another's helmet and broke the foul magics keeping it moving – even as the front ranks of her mercenary company plowed through the enemy line. A clear path to the bastion, she thought.

"Torchmen," she screamed, "with-"

Her words were drowned out by a thunderous roar as the beorn that'd been tearing at the fantassins in the bastion abandoned its playthings there, instead leaping down onto the rampart and casually sweeping half a dozen men off the wall into the city below. Some might survive, Catalina thought, though they might not wish they had.

"Aim for the beorn," the Captain-General of the Ligera Bandera calmly said. "On my signal."

Another seven men dead, the great abomination crushing them as easily as a boot would an ant.

"Hold," Catalina Ferreiro said.

Another handful dead, the beast enjoying its rampage. With only a thin stretch of wall to maneuver with and other soldiers behind them, her men could do little but stand and die.

"Hold," she repeated through gritted teeth.

And finally, crushing a young woman like a pulped grape, the beorn came close enough.

"Now," the Captain-General hissed.

Torches were put to the earthen jugs of pitch just before they were thrown, of the ten thrown nine splattering across the monster's large form. Flames burned clear and bright, spreading as they ate at dry dead flesh and the beorn howled.

"Halberds to the front," Catalina ordered, breathing a sigh of relief.

The halberdiers hurried forward, hacking at the creature even as it was destroyed by the flames and ensuring it would not smash into their formation. It toppled into the city below and the fantassins hurried to reinforce the bastion even as Catalina stayed behind long enough to arrange for the wounded to be sent back. Her bodyguards closed in around her as she followed into the bastion, finding the situation there had turned around. Captain Reinald had holed up his men in corners while the beorn rampaged but they'd come out swinging as soon as the beast was gone so the ghouls were already on the backfoot when her reinforcements arrived. She left the clearing out of the stragglers to her soldiers and took off her helmet, seeking out Captain Reinald.

She found the fat man conversing with his wizards, an untended wound on his arm that'd been inflicted through now-ripped mail. The captain of the Folies Rouges dismissed his casters when he saw her approach, offering a grateful nod.

"My thanks for drawing it away," Reinald said. "All our pitch was spent on the first three and we hadn't gotten fresh jugs yet."

"I expect you'll have to return the favour before this is over," Catalina replied. "Have you heard anything from further north?"

"The Bayeux footmen are holding strong," the older man replied. "Prince Arsene made it clear he'll tolerate no retreat."

Catalina breathed out a snort as Reinald smirked. Prince Arsene Odon did not have a particularly inspiring reputation as a military commander, though he wasn't as bad as some other royals. Still, he would never have made it above company-captain in the Ligera.

"We'll need to start bringing in the smaller companies to freshen up bloodied positions," Catalina said. "I don't want to dilute our ranks too much, but..."

"No, I quite agree," Captain Reinald said. "If we bleed our finest soldiers dry too soon there'll be nothing but the dregs left fighting come sunlight."

She nodded in agreement. It might seem callous to dismiss some of her fellow fantassin companies with so contemptuous a term, but some of them were honestly no better than levies. Which brought to mind yet more trouble.

"We'll need to keep a close eye on the Brabant conscripts," she sighed. "They keep breaking."

"Prince Etienne croaking it did a number on them," Reinald sympathetically said. "That man was his principality's backbone. Didn't help that the Iron Prince decided to pick them up by the throat afterwards."

"He did what he needed to," Catalina replied, but her tone was lukewarm.

That Klaus Papenheim was one of the finest generals alive was not in dispute – though the Arlesite in Catalina had her fancying that Rozala Malanza might give him a closer match than most – but that he'd acted like a... Lycaonese wasn't either. The northerners liked their tyrants, glorified them, but their southern cousins had never shared the fascination. Tyrants there got knives, not statues. Had this been another war, another man, many a company would have put coin together to hire assassins over a man who'd arrested so many officers on such spurious grounds. These were desperate times, of course, and the officers had been out of line. It was still a bitter pill to swallow for all of them, Catalina thought, that the Iron Prince's heavy-handed actions had not earned so much as a raised eyebrow from any other great name.

Mind you, whoever it was that'd figured appealing to the Black Queen over an issue of military discipline was a good idea should be sent to Keter for raising in the hopes that the stupid was infectious. Catalina liked the woman more than she figured she would have, being a murderous heretic, and considered her a generally reasonable superior officer. She was also someone who hanged her own soldiers when they got sticky fingers and whose answer to a mutiny was a lot more likely to be crucifixion than sympathy. It had to be the Joyeux Chevaliers that'd pushed for that, having some many noble brats within their ranks had them believing they were clever manipulators instead of expendable Highest Assembly catspaws.

"Sure he did," Captain Reinald grunted. "Let's hope he doesn't find it necessary to do it again."

"We wouldn't have so weak a position if we could agree on a representative," Catalina pressed. "I know the Grizzled Fantassin turned us down-"

She'd named an exorbitant price first, then noted that unless the Grand Alliance itself could be outbid there was no point in trying to buy her services. Old Teresa was said to be out in Mercantis these days, that floating pleasure house of a city. Hard terms to beat, admittedly.

"- it can't be you," Captain Reinald frankly said. "The Ligera has too many enemies, you'll never get the votes."

"It has to be someone, Reinald," she exasperatedly said. "If not me then another. And quickly. We are..."

Words failed her, for a moment, as the thought was hard to express. It was not a particular indignation that had been weighing on Catalina Ferreiro's mind but a hundred little signs, as if had some unknown prophecy on the tip of her tongue but could not bring herself to speak it.

"We're dying, Reinald," she quietly said. "Fantassins, our trade. You've seen the armies the rest of the world fields, now. Do you think we could handle the Second Army or a few sigils of drow? Gods, even the Levantines are making something of themselves."

We don't have mages and priests, Catalina thought. We don't have sappers or Chosen. War is leaving us behind. And the Principate had been hardened by the war too, she could feel it. See in faces and hear it in words. No one spoke of war as a part of the Ebb and Flow now, as the game of princes where glories and fortune were wagered. Even princes had grown harsher, and the wars they'd wage would grow harsher with them. Would veterans of the war against Keter really hesitate to torch a village? It had been against the unspoken laws of war in Procer, once, but what did those childish things matter to someone who'd spent three years fighting howling corpses as madness twisted the land around them? There would be no return to the old days, after this came to an end.

For better or worse.

"You're not wrong," Reinald muttered. "Some of the things I've heard... But this is a discussion to finish when the enemy is no longer at our gate, perhaps."

Catalina nodded, then smiled.

"Tarry not," she hummed.

The other mercenary snorted, recognizing the words from the old song everyone in their trade, from the greenest of boys to the most grizzled of warwives, had heard at least once.

"Or we'll be dead," Captain Reinald finished.

Over the edge of the rampart, a skeleton dragged itself halfway onto solid ground before a soldier smacked it down. The climbers were beginning to reach the top, she realized with dread.

The skirmishing was over at last, and the battle had begun in truth.

—

Well, Roland thought, this was going to be a problem.

"So that's why they kept dropping vultures and Revenants through the wards," the Headhunter said.

He — Roland had asked, as he couldn't discern the differences in her facepaint that heralded either gender — was looking at the same thing that he was: a gate into Arcadia opening in the middle of a city street. Which shouldn't be possible, the Rogue Sorcerer thought, considering this city was thick with wards. But the dead had years to meddle with the city after taking it, he reminded himself. The Grand Alliance reclaiming Hainaut and then repairing the old foundations as well as slapping on fresh wards was not a comprehensive fix, despite the frenzied efforts of their mages. At least it did not seem to be without costs for the Dead King: the gate had only opened by subsuming a Revenant and was opening rather slowly. They could not be opened with a snap of one's finger, which was good news tacked on to the bad.

"We need to close it," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "And find out any other gate that might have been opened out of sight."

"The city's bleeding magic everywhere, wizardling," the Headhunter skeptically replied. "We might as well look for a particular needle in a box full of them."

"Keter needs Revenants to make these," Roland replied, shaking his head. "There won't be many, and we'll have seen them falling."

"There could have been more than one Revenant by bird," the Headhunter shrugged. "And they can run anywhere after the fall. We've only caught one so far."

Fair points, but only so long as providence refused to put a finger on the scales. Roland would have to hope otherwise.

"There's another band out there roaming," he reminded the other. "We can only hope they will catch what we don't."

He rose from his crouch before the Headhunter could answer, expecting that otherwise he would be served a sermon on the subject of why the three young souls with transitory Named also assigned to keeping the streets clear were weak and so naturally doomed to failure. The other man's opinions were more strident than thoughtful, in Roland's opinion, but he saw nothing to be gained by arguing. The Headhunter's ways had paid off for him, and people with full pockets didn't usually tend to abandon the ways that'd filled them. A long casting rod of sculpted ivory in hand, the Rogue Sorcerers leapt off the edge of the roof and landed on the cobblestone street. The gate into Arcadia, a broad rectangle at least twelve feet high and twice that in length, was pulsing. Still stabilizing, Roland thought. He brushed a hand close to the surface, mustering his will.

"Confiscate," he murmured.

It took, he found with some relief, but not as much as he would have wanted it to. He was drawing from the active spell, but not the foundations. The light of the portal began flickering wildly. All he was achieving was further destabilizing the gate, not breaking it. Movement from the corner of his eye had him drawing back, but not quite close enough. A javelin, he saw just a heartbeat before it bit into his first defensive enchantment and shattered it. A shell of light became visible for a moment before shattering. A second flew out, but by then the Headhunter was there and he swatted them down with insolent ease.

"Gate's not closed, wizardling," the Headhunter grunted. "Get the Hells on with it."

I'm not sure I can, Roland thought. If he could not confiscate the sorcery, then he had to either overpower or shatter the gate – which would require strength he did not have or for his knowledge to be superior to that of the Dead King. He was going to have to improvise. If he couldn't break the gate itself, what were his options? He cast a glance at the Headhunter.

"You have the head of a Damned who could empower magic, correct?"

"Amplify," the Headhunter corrected. "And the heads only give weaker imitations. What are you scheming?"

"I want," the Rogue Sorcerer boyishly grinned, "to make this a much larger gate."

He felt like tapping his foot, like humming an old song. He was only a few mistakes away from dying, but wasn't that where he did all his best work?

—

Princess Beatrice Volignac of Hainaut went utterly still, her horse following suit.

Frost spread across the cobblestones like the breath of some wintry beast, steam curling above it like fading stripes of lace as ghostly lights set the shadows to dancing. It was as if a hole had been cut out in the world, revealing some fantastic winter vista hidden behind the curtains of Creation, and yet what had come out of it was not some strange monster or fair lord. It was an intimately familiar sight. The banner was what Beatrice recognize first, stirring as it was in the wind. A golden griffin on blue, crowned by three daffodils, but it was not the heraldry that made it distinct. It was the long haft of forever unrotting whitewood it hung from, ending in a crown of pure gold set with sapphires. Even streaked with ash and dust, Beatrice would have recognized the royal banner of the House of Volignac anywhere.

Riders streamed out of the pale plains of snow on the other side, ranks upon ranks of silent souls in beautiful enameled armour that rode steeds of the finest coats. Their lances were raised tall, a forest of sharp steel held up by unwavering hands, and at their head rode a beautiful woman. Skin pale as milk could be seen through the open visor of her helm, golden hair in a long braid going down her back. The armour she wore was a gift from Beatrice's father, a family heirloom of blue-painted steel etched with enchantments, and at her side the ornate wooden sheath of the ancient blade of House Volignac, Mordante, rested against her hip. And on her brow, atop her helm, a crown of gold had been inlaid into the steel for her name was Julianne Volignac and she had once rule Hainaut.

There was a gaping, bloody wound where her heart should be.

"Sister," Beatrice softly breathed out. "Gods, what did they do to you?"

She had taken a mere hundred riders with her as an escort when heading for the western rampart, a pittance compared to the thousands Julianne had taken with her on that last doomed charge to delay the dead long enough for their people to escape. But only a few have crossed, Beatrice thought. We can hold them at the gate. She looked around and found only fear on the faces of her soldiers. As much at the sight of who it was they were fighting as the numbers, the princess thought.

"Bastien," she said, raising her voice as she addressed the captain of her bodyguard. "Go for reinforcements. Hurry."

"Your Grace," the man replied, hesitating, "what is it you intend?"

Beatrice Volignac breathed out, watching her sister's golden hair across the street.

"I have you an order," she harshly said. "Go."

She heard him slink away, chastened. In the distance, Julienne Volignac met her sister's eyes and smiled sadly. She brought down her visor, lowered her lance.

"Look ahead," Princess Beatrice said, voice ringing out. "That is what Keter means to make of you."

The Princess of Hainaut lowered her lance, and after a terrifying heartbeat saw that her retinue followed suit.

"They gave their lives for everyone here," Beatrice said, throat clogged up. "So we could live, crawling through ash and dust to return home another day."

She pressed her knees against her mount, the destrier breaking into a trot. Her retinue followed. The enemy, on the other side, lowered their lances and began to advance.

"We're home now," Beatrice Volignac shouted. "We're home, and tonight we lay our ghost to rest."

Her soldiers roared, the thunder of hooves crashing against cobblestones drowning out battlecries even as the two lines of horsemen rammed into each other.

—

Catalina was not sure who it was that began to sing.

The world had turned black and white, chopped into moments of violence and moments of relief, but through both songs had begun to wind their way. There was nothing, the Captain-General thought with an exhausted smile, that Procerans loved more than a song. Even the ever-cold Lycaonese thawed, when the time came to sing. There were more singers than birds in Procer, it had once been said, and for every season and hour there was a song. Or a poem, or a dance or another gesture of beauty returned to the Creation that had given birth to all of them. And wasn't that, in the end, the most beautiful thing about her home? Even in the dark, they sang.

Perhaps in the dark most of all.

The dead came over the rampart, silent and relentless. Catalina battered them over the edge, hacked and split and felt cold iron sink into her arm when tiredness slowed her, but the tide would not end so neither would she. And all around her, the Captain-General saw only bastards. Mud nobles and cutthroats, peasants and shopkeepers, the leftovers of a great realm with blades in hand. And still they held, her thousands of brothers and sisters who too bore the name of fantassin, her fellow fools who traded life and limb for coin and a few boasts. And so when the song poured out of her throat, she did not fight. What else was there to do, when the world was so ugly, but to bring a sliver of beauty in it?

"My father wept for a prince

And died with a spear in hand."

The man by her side, covered in sweat and filth, shot her an incredulous look and began laughing before cracking a skeleton's skull. He joined his voice to hers.

"My mother hasn't wept since

Or left a god un-damned."

It spread like a fire, snaking along the rampart and the bastion until a thousand throats sang it, that old bastard song, the Sun In the West.

—

Beatrice Volignac was in the heart of the whirlwind, dancing with many smiling deaths.

They fought desperately against the honoured dead, trading lances with corpses until all were spent and furious melee with sword and shield swept across the cobblestone. There was something burning in all their bellies tonight that had devoured whole the fear, replaced it with clenched teeth and hard eyes. Before them was the mockery Keter had made of the finest gesture any of them had known, and what could they do but quell it? Nothing less could be tolerated. So Beatrice traded blows with a corpse in armour, ramming her blade into the throat and throwing it down its undead mount before pushing forward. A blow glanced off her shield and she answered with a hard cut, but it found no purchase in the enemy's armour.

They were losing, the Princess of Hainaut knew. The charge had not been enough. They had slowed the enemy's outpouring through the gate but not cut it, and now they were being drowned. Yet she found, queerly, that the thought did not move her to fear. It would be a worthy death, Beatrice decided, and such a thing was not to be feared. She was a princess of the blood, a Volignac: what did she have to fear in this world or any other, save for dishonour? So when the song came on the wind, drifting like curl of smoke, the Princess of Hainaut laughed. She, too, had once dreamed of being the one who would once again bring the sun to west. A good song, she decided, to die singing.

"Maybe I'll go east, they say Swords there can win a crown."

Voices joined hers, as the dead hemmed them in and the last of them gathered around the banner. The enemy were coming for them, for the killing stroke. Through her visor, Beatrice met her sister's eyes as Julienne approached with the ancient sword of their shared blood.

"Rule king a year and a day

Be buried with great renown."

—

Roland hummed under his breath, one hand on a desiccated human head and the other on a portal through which a great many people were trying to kill him.

It was just going to be one of those nights, he figured.

"Is it working?" the Headhunter asked with a grunt.

He carved through another skeleton's neck, kicking it into another's path as it tried to cross. The villain had, impressively enough, been holding the gate single-handedly all this time.

"Well," the Rogue Sorcerer mused, "if it is, then—"

There was a deafening keening noise and the gate double in height before beginning to shake.

"Wonderful," Roland grinned.

The Headhunter turned around, throwing an axe at him that cut through the javelin someone had very unkindly thrown at Roland's chest. Keterans, a people truly without manners.

"It's gotten bigger," the Headhunter noted, unimpressed. "Is that it? I thought it was—"

What looked like the maw of a beorn began to pass through the gate, roaring angrily and cutting off the conversation. Rudeness upon rudeness, truly. The other Named pulsed with a stolen aspect coming from a head and tried to force the construct back, but Roland kept pushing sorcery into the gate and amplifying the flow with the human head. Soon, soon it would be ready. Mind you, he'd best not tarry long. How did the song go again?

"Long ago, the tale goes,

The sun rose in the west

It might be it will again:

Tarry not, or we'll be dead."

The Headhunter was thrown back into the street, hitting the wall of a house and breaking through it, but Roland only smiled even as the beorn turned towards him.

—

Beatrice's horse had died on the third pass, but she'd knocked her sister down from hers so it had evened out the affair.

They had sparred on occasion, while they both lived, though in those days Beatrice had not taken the blade all that seriously — it had been the horse and lance she preferred, finding bladework to be an ungainly and sweaty affair. The spars had been measured, almost fond, more shared time than any genuine test of each other. This was nothing like it. Beatrice desperately brought up her shield as the family sword, Mordante, bit at the painted steel and let out a flash of light and frost. She swung at Julianne's head, but her sister's shield was already in place and they collided with each other as each tried to make the other trip on the blood-strewn ground

"I will free you," Beatrice gasped through her helm. "Gods, Julianne, I swear. I will not leave you like this."

The enchanted sword kissed the top of her helm, freezing the visor shut, but the Princess of Hainaut began hammering at her sister with her shield. Julianne had the strength of undeath to her, the tirelessness, but Beatrice was fat. She was heavy, and muscled, and when she struck her sister shook from the impact. Once, twice, thrice until Julianne slipped on blood and bone and Beatrice followed her down. A lance passed above her head, forced away by one of her last men at the last moment, but the Princess of Hainaut's eyes were only for her sister. Mordante bit into her side, frostburn creeping through her mail, but Beatrice ripped off her sister's helm and met those blue eyes with her own as she drew back.

"The fire turns to ember,

I wake from a sorry dream

Morning rides in pale splendour

Chasing down a fading gleam."

"We will meet again," Beatrice whispered, "in a better place."

And down her sword went.

—

Roland of Beaumaraais, nothing but a — borrowed — human head in hand, smiled at the monster forcing its way out of the gate into Arcadia.

"This should do the trick," he announced, removing his hand from the portal at last.

The magic he'd been drawing on stuttered, the bundle nearly empty, and the Rogue Sorcerer offered the beorn as deep a bow as he could without making the head dangle. The construct swatted at him, but he stepped away even as the Headhunter rose from rubble and the clawed limb came well short. The beorn seemed confused, as well it might be.

"The gate's frozen," the Rogue Sorcerer told it. "Brilliant man, Masego. His work his comprehensive."

Roland hadn't even noticed when that derivation had been added to the ward schematics, but then that didn't matter. What did matter was that the Dead King was not the only brilliant Trismegistan sorcerer in these parts, which meant that what had been used here to make the gates was a technicality and not a flaw. The last of the magic he'd fed the portal was absorbed at last, and with a loud keen the portal's length began to extend. It managed to grown another five feet, before the blind spot in the wards laid down by the Hierophant was entirely outgrown and they triggered with a vengeance.

"To borrow from a friend," Roland smiled, then raised his hand and snapped his fingers.

The portal exploded in a pillar of power and light, the city wards crushing it into nonexistence without mercy, and Roland de Beaumaraais was once more left to wonder at just how much he loved magic. There was always something new, wasn't there? The Headhunter caught up, looking at him warily.

"Come on," the Rogue Sorcerer idly said. "There will be other portals."

And, hands in pockets, he began to make his way down the street as he sang the song that'd been on his mind all evening.

"The road is long and winding,

Though I did it love it once

And tread it still, searching

The bottom of many cups."

Sometimes, even charlatans got to have a good turn.

—

Gods, but they were holding.

The Captain-General watched as ladders were brought to the walls and undead scaled the cliffs. Stones and logs were thrown at them, burning oil poured on ladders and Light filled the air as priests began turning the wrath of Above on the dead. It was a narrow, wavering thing but they were holding. And now the reinforcements were pouring in, lesser companies freshening the ranks of the greater and bringing with them well-rested hands. Mages were beginning to rotate in, cadres trained in the Arsenal, and though their magics were simple when turned on a single great monster in concert they were also often successful. Catalina withdrew from the rampart, exhausted enough her vision swam, but after a tonic and rest she would return.

She sat by a fire, her bodyguards close around her, and drank deeply from a waterskin. She smiled as she heard the chorus of the song rise again, perhaps the tenth time it had been sung tonight. The Sun In the West was often sung as wistful or angry – there was a reason it was familiar to taverns but rare in courts – but tonight it was, instead, almost defiant.

“Long ago, the tale goes,

The sun rose in the west

It might be it will again:

Tarry not, or we’ll be dead.”

Our sun has faded, Catalina thought, but it has not yet set.

There was still blood in the veins of the lumbering beast known as the Principate, and perhaps after the war... Lightning struck at the bastion and a howling gale swept over it, hundreds dying in the blink of an eye as Catalina was thrown against a wall and bit her lip as she felt her collarbone break. The storm screamed, and two silhouettes landed on the stone.

The Scourges had arrived.

SpeckofStardust

Catalina, I wish you well and that you don’t get raised after the next set of events to come.

Big Brother

Catalina is a friggin Badass, and so is Beatrice. Despite what others might think, I wish those two specifically to find greater successes and survival in the Keteran War

Sir Nil

It seems that the winning strategy in war is just to have a good song in your head.

Liliet

Fun fact: it really is!

Most battles are won/lost by people running away, not by slaughter to the last.

Doesn't work that way with Keter, but the Grand Alliance? Holding means "standing there and continuing to fight", as opposed to "no longer standing there".

And a song, well, it makes it easier to stand than to run.

Miles

I'm gonna pop some tags, only got $20 in my pocket. I'm I'm I'm huntin'. Looking for a come up. This is fucking awesome.

Crash

New hit by the Rapacious Troubador!

miles

Or the dead king

Morgenstern

Seems they did it. The DK actually went for the trap that is the Crown of Winter... Arcadia portals and too well preserved, faerie-like corpses coming out of wintry scenes... what else could it be?

Let's hope the limitations and new rules that come with his new powers are worth it.

Morgenstern

Gah... this wasn't meant to be a reply *sigh

Someperson

Pretty sure that Quartered Seasons has not been implemented yet.

The Winter Crown is already spoken for, and I'm pretty sure the Fall Crown is the one they were gonna use for Quartered Seasons. Also, I kinda don't think a strategy with this much foreshadowing would just happen off-screen.

Anyone with enough magical knowhow can rip a gate into Arcadia, and that certainly includes Neshamah and co. They just can't do it on nearly the same scale that the Twilight Ways facilitate.

dadycoool

This was fun. Interesting to see the war from the perspective of the fantassins, watching their world fade away around them. And she's right. After a war with a tireless enemy that you have to destroy utterly in order to sleep at night, sharpening your sword against the very best that recorded history has to offer, would the princes go back to their little squabble skirmishes where no one really died and it was basically a money war? Would anyone take them up on it if they did?

lol, Roland.

And poor Beatrice, having to put her sister to rest. At least she'll have earned the family sword?

LarsBlitzer

I'm reminded of the difference war was waged before and after the American Civil War. How it started as regimented and formalized Napoleonic volleys and charges, and ended with cities in flames. I don't think any noble will at least publicly admit to being bloodthirsty, aside from perhaps the Blood since ritualized combat is so ingrained into their identity.

I suspect Roland will be downright insufferable towards the end of the siege. His character seems well suited to rolling with the punches and improvising. I think we'll see his best work to come; his winning the Kobayashi Maru the only way he knows how: by cheating.

And lastly, Beatrice. There's a certain finality to that fight. I don't think anyone will look down upon her nation once this is all over and she's got her family's sword in hand.

jamesc9

Will it be same to hold Beatrice's family sword, or will it have been whammied by the DK to possess the holder?

laguz24

That's keter's strategy, hit them when they are exchanging companies. Just when it looks like they will make it through the night. Also bets on who the two on the wall are, my guess is the tumult due to the lightning and the wolfhound to guard him.

Liliet

Well, if it's Tumult – Woe time? 😊

Sparsebeard

Pretty sure it was said that Tumult is a long range fighter that stay's far from harm's way.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but it still has to come within the city to attack, otherwise the wards would get in the way, no?

agumentic

No. We've seen how long the wards last against the mages on the level of Witch of the Woods during the Waltz of Wroth, and the answer is "Not". And the Warlock was both an expert in wards and had more time to prepare them – Masego might be a genius, but he is not going to surpass his father in this particular situation.

Darkening

Yeah, but trying to target anything at the top of the cliff from the ground would be difficult. Vulture mounts would just be asking to get shot down, and scrying doesn't work around priests, which are sure to be around any important target and seeded in amongst the troops besides. So better to just clear a patch of wall and start throwing lightning around, with the ability to just hop off the cliff to retreat if necessary. Not like anyone's gonna pursue into the horde below.

agumentic

It can just use the storm to fly, the same way it sent two of the Scourges up the wall. Mobility spells are not hard to find at higher levels of magic, it looks like. Also, inside the storm, even Archer using See can't hit it.

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥ ♥

Boost the vote and vote for the boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

This chapter is GREAT.

Burlyraven

The Dead King sacrificing Revenants to make gates is one of those moves that seems kind of cool but basic, but might even be a meta attack on the Named bands. They probably aren't even meant to succeed, but they tie up the Baby Name Squad and some of the other roaming pairs, because the story dictates that some will almost succeed (as happened here). That means that the already thinly stretched Named aren't in position to meet the Scourges when they strike, like they literally did in lightning form here. Considering this conflict is weighted as a Pitched Battle and not a Desperate Defense, a Scourge blitz might actually work out in Keter's favor.

Liliet

It's not even meta in the story sense, it's "meta" in the same sense that assaulting the walls is not meant to actually take them but to draw away soldiers and exhaust them. Throwing resources that are expendable to you but that the enemy has to meaningfully commit to count? It's basic in the sense that it's a very basic strategy... not in the sense that it's easily countered.

Burlyraven

It's still meta in the sense that it relies on the good ol' story fu, rather than anything physical and concrete. There's no reason that any of the Revenants should absolutely make it through and that any of the ones that make it through should absolutely require Named to put them down, except for the fact that the story will require it. All things being equal, one of the lesser Revenants should be killable by a skilled enough group of mundane soldiers (as even a lesser Named would be) but this is a story that will require Named to put them down.

Liliet

Are you aware of statistics as a science

Crash

He knows Story Fu, apparently

Mental Mouse

Evidence to date is that statistics is a creational law in the Guideverse. 😊

Liliet

statistics isn't a law
statistics is a method of data processing

"99.99% heroes survive being pushed off a cliff. Plan accordingly"

TeK

Fun fact: repeatedly pushing someone off a cliff consecutively lowers their chance of survival.

Liliet

It lowers their overall chance of survival of the whole sequence, but not of each individual fall :3

(At least so long as surviving the fall isn't a matter of using up a resource the total amount of which is finite. Parachutes, providence (if it works that way), audience's goodwill, etc)

Matthew Wells

Unbroken bones...

Liliet

for example!

Frivolous

If I understand correctly, Roland the Rogue Sorcerer used the Headhunter's head's stolen aspect to make the Keteran portal so large it provoked Masego the Hierophant's wards into attacking it.

Also: the Headhunter actually collects and keeps physical heads. They don't steal and keep powers the way Catherine does at all.

I wonder how and where they keep the stolen heads, of which they must have many. Personal pocket dimension the way Thief kept her loot, perhaps?

Poor Beatrice. Fighting your own more beautiful sister raised as a Bind has to be horrific.

caoimhinh

Yeah.

It was said before that what the Headhunter did was "to take the head and a shadow of their power". Although it is similar to Catherine's power, it's not the same. Headhunter keeps a weakened Aspect and can use it constantly and even lend it to other people who can return it afterwards, whereas Catherine creates a one-use-only artifact with the full power of the looted Aspect. Although she can give the artifact to other people too and if other skilled people lend their talent, create a permanent artifact like the Severance.

Pocket dimension seems likely, or maybe bags of holding (those bags that are bigger on the inside), since Headhunter was shown having some heads on display, hanging around their neck and belt, but also many bags.

Fighting your own anything raised as a Bind has to be horrific.

Frivolous

caoimhinh: Julianne was Beatrice's predecessor as well as elder sister. Julianne died trying and failing to stop Keter from conquering Hainaut, their principality.

With Julianne raised as a Bind, Beatrice is facing the undead embodiment of the collective failure of Hainaut in general and House Volignac in particular. It is like staring defeat in the face, perhaps even literally.

The psychological wounding to Beatrice must be staggering. A comparable horror would be if Prince Otto Redcrown's father and two sisters came back and tried to kill him, too.

Thorium

I would argue that their single-use nature make the aspects Cathrine steals more powerful than the original. The idea of an aspect being able to literally destroy another is so broken that we haven't even heard of it outside of Cat's artifacts, which have done so twice. The Pilgrim also remarked that his Forgive couldn't undo natural or story-based death, which giving his life to stabilise Twilight certainly was.

Sinead

Expanding on this thought process:

Catherine's ability is the theft of power, but it is also a sacrifice of power, and it represents an offering of power for an effect. All her artifacts work at peak capacity.

Headhunter uses their skill to steal power, but they are not willing to let any of it go, so they get the usability (and perhaps it runs out over time), without anything as flashy.

shikkarasu

I agree. HH's ability is halfway between Catherine's old Take Aspect and the Harvesting ability she got as Winter! Cat. Head Hunter probably keeps all the limitations of an Aspect, like with Take, but doesn't have a limit of 1

Aspect at a time. In exchange for that flexibility they probably get used up permanently instead of refilling for free.

The question on my mind is how this compares to Roland's Confiscate.

Liliet

The impression I got is that they do not in fact get used up permanently. The price is that they are much weaker than in the original, unlike all of Cat's variations on this theme and also Confiscate.

shikkarasu

That would make sense. I'm not on the Discord, but is there some consensus on how Confiscate likely works? I know it takes a 2nd Aspect to Use and it just about kills him in protracted fights, so it really seems like RS got the short end of the Aspect stick compared to Headhunter's method or Zeze's Wrest.

Liliet

i havent been on the discord since before Confiscate was revealed and clarified but we do know that he needs "probable cause" for confiscation (backstory extra chapters), that it's stored as a "lump of power" that he can use up little by little (that one interlude), and that he does in fact need to broadly know HOW to use it to use it, or at the very least it helps (backstory extra chapters). We also know he can use magic of the most incompatible disciplines in a way people with the Gift cannot without incurring mental disorders (masego in interlude terms) and that he's v dangerous/crafty with how well he uses it (strategic assessment of him as a threat by cat back in book 5).

We do know the stealing is permanent until used up – he's never tried to give it back, even if it were possible. It's not clear how that compares against Wrest since we've never seen Masego use it against a hostile spellcaster rather than by borrowing his allies' power and then returning it, but it's likely Wrest does not allow you to store power indefinitely in the way Confiscate does.

Miles

Still waiting for the moment Masego decides to do magic with Roland and no other spellcasters around. Is he gonna recognize his own magic? And if so, will Roland live to become an arch nemesis, die, or become a pseudo woe where Masego just pranks him all the time and steals his game pieces?

Insanenoodlyguy

Forgive was more of a story problem though. That is to say, it should be able to undo a story-based death, but it never will be used that way because of who Pilgrim is. Using it such is so anathema to who Pilgrim is that it's not doable in practice; Pilgrim the Name would be sufficiently weakened trying that it ultimately couldn't use Forgive the Aspect in that manner. Same way that his Dawn could not have fought Akua's fall after the surrender was offered; he had every confidence that it could match it right up till that point.

Cat, however, has a very different roll in the story. Doing things that are not meant to be done, stealing aspects and using them for things their original owners never would? Both parts of her deal. So the penalties he'd have had were not in play this time.

Liliet

> Pilgrim the Name would be sufficiently weakened trying that it ultimately couldn't use Forgive the Aspect in that manner.

I got the impression it was more of a direct limitation than something that would come through the weakening like Shine at Princes' Graveyard. He just cannot, it won't work. It's a limitation of the Choir of Mercy as a whole, apparently, judging from what Catherine said to them, and this Aspect of his is tied to them.

But Catherine could use it in an untied way, somehow, because rules are bullshit and arbitrary and everything ultimately is subject to the Rule of Drama before anything else, because bless this book ♥

miles

Pilgrim didn't die a story death. He got sacrificed for the party but he wasn't anyone's mentor or anything like that, and wasn't even the first.

Liliet

Pilgrim died such a story death, the resurrection wouldn't have worked if he was the one using it.

And he didn't just "get sacrificed for the party". He got into an extensive argument with Catherine about which of them should die – I'll remind you that half a day earlier he'd been trying to kill Catherine himself. His argument was that the world will go on fine without him so long as Catherine's there to steer it. He'd been trying to low key tap into a mentor role with Catherine the entire time he'd been talking to her – Indrani called him out on how that was a bad habit, with the Woe being what they are – and this was very much a "passing of the torch" death.

Morgenstern

Far as I remember they were arguing about who _has to give up ruling_, not who has to die. The dying only come in when the Saint tried to friggin _destroy_ the Crown.

Liliet

Nope, the giving up ruling thing was without an argument – Cat'd made an agreement with Tariq that in exchange for her not killing Saint should she attack her – and then later also in exchange for her not killing Tyrant – he would give up his rule and she wouldn't.

The arguing was very specifically about who dies, afterwards.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/06/19/chapter-50-sunset/>

> "There is no choice to make," Tariq evenly said.

>

> And already I could see the lay of that, how it'd unfold. A band of five assembled before the eyes of princes and princesses of Procer had gone into broken Arcadia at the urging of the Black Queen, among them perhaps the two most famous heroes alive. Neither the Regicide nor the Peregrine would return from that journey. The treacherous Tyrant of Helike would escape with but a curse, and from the heroes the only survivor would be the Rogue Sorcerer – a hero little known, and a mage to boot. Sorcery was not well-trusted, in Procer, and seemingly rare in Levant.

>

> We'd be at war again before Morning Bell, bargain or not.

>

> "Agreed," I said. "It'll have to be me."

It came to a fight:

> The illusion broke, now that I knew it was there, and so did the one the Rogue Sorcerer had woven around the Peregrine. The Grey Pilgrim took the wounded crown, set with his own star, and placed it upon his brow.

>

> "No," I shouted.

>

> Like it was the most natural thing in the world, the Grey Pilgrim leaned down and gently pried the Saint of Swords' blade from her cold hands.

>

> And, just as gently, rammed it through his own heart.

The argument had gotten pretty heated on principles:

> "So you're just going to lie down and die?" I said.

>

> There was a heartbeat of silence.

>

> "The Saint of Swords is dead," I said. "We all had a hand in that, mine looming largest by far. But that's it, Pilgrim? Your friend is dead and you feel tired, so you're choosing death when Calernia is facing its harshest test since the reign of Triumphant?"

>

> "Queen Catherine," the Sorcerer hissed. "There is no need for-"

>

> "You've done some real nasty things over the years, haven't you Tariq?" I said. "We both know you have."

>

> The old man's blue eyes, limpid as a cloudless summer sky, met mine.

>

> "You don't get to roll over for death, after crossing those lines," I said. "After taking on that responsibility."

>

> "Which of us are you truly haranguing, Black Queen?" the Grey Pilgrim chided me, not unkindly.

(she was talking about Black, these are arguments prepared for specifically him) (note how the "you cannot just die after making all those nasty choices" thing rests on the flimsy premise here of her ASSUMING he had, but would fit like a glove on Black. This was a mentor death parallel allll the way)

Mike E.

More or less..Keter found a blind spot in Zeze's warding scheme that they could open a tiny gate in...Roland made the gate big enough to cross the boundary of the blind spot and then the warding scheme defenses took over.

I love how it was emphasized he was holding a "borrowed" human head...

origamiflame

I'm a bit confused, cause a gate large enough for a beorn to get through sounds pretty damn big, and its a huge oversight on Masego's part if so, which I'm disinclined to believe.

Maybe there's something more than physical size to it?

Liliet

I'm thinking of that moment in Book 4 when a creation of Dead King's found its way to Cat through all the wards without ever getting spotted by the Observatory – iirc it was because it was so minimalistic, there was basically no magical "footprint" to it. It had nothing but a pathfinding algorithm, an identification algorithm and a message.

It's likely DK managed to "compress" his gates so they fit within what for any other spellcaster would be a very daunting limit.

Xinci

Hm, the Alalamans are feeling the weight of souls gazes on them, as always their societal constructs will need to hold up to the pressure of time, or be crushed under the wheel. It is...bad, truly rather bad, that the rules of honor somewhat enforced by the house of light will be weak, and that those who may take advantage of this may not balk at breaking them now. I do wonder if Cordelia has plans for counter measures to mitigate this, as this feature threatens a very large amount of what she wants Procer to become after she dies. You cannot have a functioning republic if every member becomes a petty warlord. Such things drive centralization rather than decentralization.

Still it is pleasant in some ways to see the groove being made by this war. Dancing on the edge of oblivion, diving dauntlessly forward, for what else is there to do other than die? A decent bit of potential lies in such a thing if they can remediate the parts of themselves that would tear each other apart once they no longer face a foe capable of forging them like the Dead King(unsurprisingly they are similar to Praes in this way).

caoimhinh

I wonder about it too, but remember that Cordelia is the same person that thought a Crusade was what she needed to secure her reign over Procer (which is even on the summary of the story on the front page).

Then again, Cordelia has matured a lot since then, and Procer is not the same anymore. In the years after the Great War that put Cordelia on the throne of Salia, Procer had a weary peace, but they had too many fantassins that were becoming bandits because there wasn't a war where they could work, hence Cordelia's brilliant idea of having a Crusade where they would fight abroad and hopefully have their numbers diminished.

The current war against Keter is sort of a mixture of the two (Great War and Crusade) as it is bleeding the Principate, ravaging its people, and expending the lives of the fantassins while the madness of that war will probably divide the people into two: those who will grow mad and enamored with slaughter, and those who will be so weary of the horrors that they will advocate peace for the rest of their lives.

agumentic

> In the years after the Great War that put Cordelia on the throne of Salia, Procer had a weary peace

From what I gather, there weren't "years" after Cordelia got the throne. The civil war ended something like months before the beginning of the series. Kingfisher Prince was about sixteen and a half when Cordelia was crowned and "barely twenty" when the Dead King's invasion has begun.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I don't have exact dates, though I think there are at least 3 to 5 years between Cordelia's election as First Prince and the start of the series.

But even if you are right, there would still be like 3 years between the start of the series and the Tenth Crusade.

Liliet

I also think I remember the news about the First Prince's election being quite new at the start of Book 1.

Oshi

The Accords will likely help in that matter. Establishing rules for Named will trickle into nations. You ask demi gods to play nice but then burn villages? Not to mention those very rules bind the names away from such horrors.

All this established is that the world is moving away from late stage medieval warfare into what our world would call the beginnings of modern warfare (long range communications, logistics and established armies).

Víctor

Great job, as always

mamm0nn

Hm, the song felt kind of cheap. Callow and Praesi soldiers have songs, and they've done them well. For the Principality to suddenly go 'Oh we sing a lot too, more than you guys in fact because it's our lifeblood or something.' just solicits a shrug from me.

Also, not a great call, using lancers against lancers. Same weight, same momentum and same reach but the undead are a lot more sturdy against this kind of damage. Should've left the undead to troops more expendable or better suited, and reap through Bones like wheat.

Konstantin von Karstein

From what I understand, the princess and her escort where the only troops close enough to intervene and try to contain the gate, so they didn't have the choice.

Liliet

Tbf only one language on Calernia, as far as we know, is literally called "Sung"

Sparsebeard

Well, "sung" would translate to "chanté", "chantant" is more like "melodious" (adjective)... but close enough.

KiltedBastich

"Chantant" literally translates as "singing", for example, "the army passed by singing" would translate as "l'armée passait en chantant".

Sparsebeard

Also true.

Liliet

Thanks!!!!

DoOd

Actually, chantant translates directly to singing.

Sinead

Honestly, just restructuring the framing to be that the _common folk_ have a song for everything, since it ties back to both being a means to keep spirit during the Ebb and Flow, along with all the other wars would work. Heck, it also may be a relic from the fact that the Fair Folk would probably ask for a song they never heard of in order to spare your life. Or some combination.

There is a way to reframe this chapter that highlights the people without making them just "the singers", since as you point out, everyone has songs/poetry.

Mental Mouse

On the flip side, everyone thinks their songs are best....

Sinead

True. I guess that story thread runs a bit too close to "Here They Come Again" without quite as much lustre.

I genuinely like the idea of cknstantly churning out art as a survival mechanism against the Fae so much the language becomes the language of singers (Chantant).

Miles

Should have just dropped a lake on em. There's even a basin and waterfalls, really easy compared to pulling one out of Arcadia or creating one out of a river.

Really, these slackers are slacking.

Rey d`Tutto

Excellent, as always.

RoflCat

Fantassin's Creed: Against the Black Tide.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Blood, it lent > Blood, which lent
Like we called it right (should be one or the other) Old Bones like to > Old Bones likes to love freedom > loved freedom they have her > they gave her charged against > charged again took of her > took off her that, having some > that; having so as if had > as if she had transitory Named > transitory Names Rogue Sorcerers > Rogue Sorcerer recognize first, > recognized first, in a grown > in a crown once rule Hainaut > once ruled Hainaut
"I have you > "I gave you beauty in it > beauty into it mover her > move her the sun to west > the sun to the west gate double in height > gate doubled in height shook form > shook from His work his > His work is did it love it > did love it

Sinead

Another note: at the start of Roland's section

"differences in her" should be "their" if you were trying to have Roland reflect on the why he had to ask. As is, it comes across as being a dismissive, which I wouldn't think is the intent.

RoflCat

I think the implication was that he thought Headhunter was a she initially, then became unsure and thus asked.

Sinead

I see your point. I am wary of any retention of previous assumptions like that. Compare to Cat's use of "they" when discussing Headhunter with Klaus, since it is more encompassing when talking about people in general. I would easily concede the point if it's genuinely a non-issue.

To me, that may be a point to go back and reconsider. For my reading, it really jumped out the first time.

However, since I seem to be the only person who noticed/ commented on it, it may not be as big a deal.

LD1977

Nabila vs Nadila too

folros

"... the maps she'd had her FOOTPADS being to the war room..." A footpad is a highwayman, I'm guessing you ment footman?

Darkening

Maybe she stole them from someone lol.

Sugar Roll

Did the Archmage finally make an appearance? I feel like either the Pale Knight or the Wolfhound is accompanying him.

Daniel E

Could also be the Hawk looking for payback, having lost her own mount.

KageLupus

This whole chapter felt like it was building up to Catalina and Beatrice coming into Names. They both had a desperation to them due to the situations they were in. They both have a need to Do More (Beatrice to save Alaman honor in the Grand Alliance and Catalina wanting to save fantassins as a concept).

Add in the structure of the chapter itself, where their stories are linked with an established Named. Catalina starts a song while fighting a hard battle, which moves on to both Roland and Beatrice during their hard battles. The whole setup made me feel like it would lead to all three of their stories ending with an Aspect being used. Catalina even has a role she can step into as Captain-General. Beatrice is a little harder to Name, but something related to regaining lost honor and leading her people out of darkness wouldn't be impossible.

Darkening

Yeah, Beatrice's comment about how there's no notable Alamans in the alliance really seemed like it was a prelude to her proving herself some kind of hero and coming into a Name to be a representative of her people or something. And really, the exiled princess that returned and fought a great battle to reclaim her despoiled lands from the hands of darkness is a story that could have some real weight to it.

Liliet

Beatrice, maybe. Catalina, probably not. IMHO.

Captain Amazing

I've got a theory and will share it now! So Foundling has been doing a friendship is magic theme recently with the campfire and "don't do it alone" conversation. Also, most of her friends are dead. Clearly, this is a setup for necromancy. I think she gets her Name and a "Recall" aspect, ie to recall people from the dead. The catch is it only works on people in a hell and only if Judgement doesn't interfere, which it can't. I'm a die-hard Scorched Apostate fan and think he's coming back with a true resurrection from Sve Noc for his holy Night laser beams. The Repentant Magister is probably Contrition, as well as the Lone Swordsman and those are canonically hellbound right? There are no potential problems with this. Not unless dead Contrition heroes are holding back Triumphant or something. 😊

Unrelatedly, Foundling will adopt her friends' goblin baby if she lives through this all because Foundling, and start a tradition where the heir to her House is always adopted.

Axel Rafael

Captain Amazing: I can't express how, for some weird reason, the tradition would be epic, and the thought that she'd start it with a Goblin Baby sounds that much more epic 🥰🥰

Mental Mouse

The epicness may be coming from the shadow of David Byrne. But it's a Labyrinth of possibilities...

Phillip

*while David Byrne is awesome, I think you mean David Bowie

Mental Mouse

Indeed you are right.

Crash

At the risk of becoming Interlude Flow 2.0, I'm looking forward for the Callowan and Drow army interludes, if this keeps going.

Praneeth Kolichala

Taking the same risk, I also predict having an interlude dedicated to the bridge team, since it seems the nationalities interludes are only focusing on the battles occurring within the city.

Daniel E

I'm also happy to see that Edgar is still kicking, though my top pick here is the White Knight's crew.

It's not over until the fat lady sings. She has sung, and then a pair of Scourges arrive.

Interlude: Woeful

"Hardship does not create valour any more than rivers create fish. It is simply a circumstance where the valorous reveal themselves, and it would be a mistake to believe that what misery or ruin unveil could not also be brought into the light by love or duty."

– King Albert Fairfax of Callow, the Thrice-Invaded

Guillaume screamed in terror as he scraped desperately at the floor, trying to keep the winds from snatching him up in their like they had Leonie. His fingers were raw and bloody, the cut on his face was aching something fierce, he'd dropped his sword and Heavens it just wasn't going to be enough. He could feel the wind pulling at his feet, as if trying to drag him into the sky. The gales were thick with ash and dust, hard to peer through, but Guillaume had seen his friends go up into the whirlwind and never seen any of them return. It would be death if he went up. So he kept crawling forward as the cacophony of wind blotted out the rest of the world, like a fish fighting the current, but he was feeling a tug on his legs as the strength of the storm grew and – and, somehow, his hands had reached into a bubble of calm.

He did not waste time questioning the miracle, only dragging himself forward along the floor with the last of his strength as he panted and grunted and half-wept in relief. A hand grabbed him by the collar and he started in surprise, but he did not resist after realizing he was being dragged further into the bubble. There was not a trace of the winds here, he realized, and even the screams of the storm were muted. Guillaume looked up, his face covered in cold sweat and his arms still trembling, following the sight of a bracer-clad arm over a black gambeson up to a steel cuirass and then something that was impossible to mistake: a great black cloak with a patchwork of many colours stitched on, banners and stranger things.

The Mantle of Woe, he'd heard Callowans call it. And so it was the Black Queen's brown eyes considering him, set in a hard and angular face that seemed like it had been shaped to keep a frown. Guillaume shivered. They said the Queen of Callow was kind to the commons, but she was still one of the Damned and who would tell if she decided to take his soul now?

"Your Majesty," he stammered, "I-"

Idly she flicked a finger at his forehead, the lights dimming around them, and Guillaume felt something cold slither through his veins and all the way up his face. Like a coiled snake, it waited under his cheek near his wound.

"That'll stop the bleeding," the Black Queen said, in slightly accented Chantant. "But you'll still need to get it healed or it'll infect."

Guillaume dragged himself up halfway to sitting, gingerly touching the edges of the deep cut on his cheek and finding that it no longer bled or stung. There was a cool, pleasant numbness instead when he prodded. Thanks stumbled out of his mouth and she offered half a nod before rising from her crouch, leaning heavily on a long staff of dead wood that gave off a sense of... solidity that one did not often find in dead things. The queen suddenly cocked her head to the side, as if she'd heard something he had not. He pricked his ear even as he pushed himself further away from the edge of the bubble, but he heard nothing aside from the distant screaming of the winds.

"Good, the Drake was overdue," the Black Queen said, speaking to thin air. "And Ishaq said they got the Hawk as well?"

There was a silence, then the queen grimaced.

"I don't care what the Artificer says, Hakram," she said. "Even if the Hashamallim themselves came down from the Heavens and personally pissed that Light, unless we see that body burn with our own eyes then the Hawk isn't dead. Pass the word to keep an eye out for her."

Merciful Heavens, Guillaume shivered. Were they all doomed, had the Black Queen had gone mad and now spoke to the wind? Or had her powers grown so fearful that she could speak to others who were far away? He was not sure which thought scared him more.

"Your Majesty," he tried. "I do not-"

Dark eyes turned to him.

"Be silent for a bit," the Black Queen said. "No, not you. There's this-"

She cocked an eyebrow.

"What's your name?"

"Guillaume," he slowly said.

She cast a glance at his equipment, the worried gambeson and dull cuirass that looked so shoddy compared to her own.

"Brabantine?" she guessed.

"I am," he said.

"A conscript named Guillaume stumbled into my stillness bubble," she told the air. "But never mind that. Does Archer have eyes on them?"

After a moment, she blinked in surprise.

"The Archmage came up himself?" she said. "Shit. They're going for a major breach, then, he wouldn't come personally unless he expected to have room to cast in. Who's the other one?"

Guillaume had, without even noticing it, lowered his guard. He must have, or else why would he feel his entire body clenching at the sight before him? The easy expression on the Black Queen's face went up in smoke, revealing a face that was all hard iron. Starlight dimmed around them, as if shying away in fear.

"Meant for Ishaq's band to get him, but we'll do," the Queen of Callow evenly said. "'Drani knows?"

A heartbeat, then she nodded.

"Good," the Black Queen said. "She can take the vanguard."

—

"Sahelian confirmed it," Hakram's voice spoke into her ear. "It's the Pale Knight with the Archmage. Catherine leaves the vanguard to you."

Indrani hadn't needed Flighty Fantom's say-so to be sure of what it was she was looking at, but Cat letting her start off the waltz was good news. So long as that damned storm was swirling about, she couldn't do much with her bow anyway. After the first and only time she'd been able to put an arrow in the Archmage by seeing a weak point in the winds, the Revenant had rebuilt his usual storm defence from the ground up so there would be no repeat. The most irritating part seemed that the Archmage was now seemingly able to bring other Revenants into its storm to protect them, which he hadn't been able to a few months back. The defences had improved again.

She was going to have to carve an opening with her swordarm.

"Got it," Indrani quietly replied, letting the paired stone carry her words.

She unstrung her bow, as it'd make for too easy a target otherwise, and slid it against her back in the leather sheath she'd made. Crouched atop the bastion to the north of the one that'd fallen to the assault of the Scourges, Archer studied the grounds she was going to have to assault once last time. The ramparts of Hainaut had fewer bastions than most walls, though she wasn't Cat or Hakram so she had no real idea why, but the way they were made was pretty straightforward. Two levels: the lower one accessible from the rampart themselves through gates on each side and the upper one accessible through stairs leading up from inside. Easy grounds to defend.

Trouble was that the dead had come from above, directly on the flat grounds of the upper level, so it was them that were defending. Might still be some soldiers huddled up below, since the Revenants seemed more interested in allowing iron ladders to land on the wall than pushing their advantage, but they wouldn't last long once the dead got to clearing them out. Indrani wasn't worried about the skeletons coming up the ladders, but she didn't like the look of that storm: not only was it spreading out from the bastion on which it was centered, the winds seemed to be getting stronger. If she tried to walk her way to the lower bastion, she risked getting caught up in that.

She narrowed her eyes, trying out a Stride along the path. The feeling wasn't as clear as when she used the aspect when journeying, but it still tended to give a hint – and this time, the sensation was that of a broken path. Yeah, like she'd thought those winds were going to be a headache. Fortunately, just because she had to go on foot didn't mean she had to take this particular. Between See and Stride, finding the thin places between Creation and the Ways had always been staggeringly easy to her and tonight was no exception: a little below her perch, two feet forward and five feet off the ground, there was a weakness. Someone must have used powerful magic there earlier, it had that kind of a taste.

Would it get her where she needed to go? Indrani listened to the pulse of her aspects carefully, then nodded in satisfaction. Close enough.

"Going," Archer told Hakram through the stones. "I'm using the Ways, and tell them to be careful with those winds. I think the storm is growing."

She did not wait for an answer before leaping down, tumbling through the thin veil on the Pattern even as she reached for her longknives. The Pale Knight was at hand, finally.

Time to teach the Scourge that killing Lysander had been a very fatal mistake.

The connection severed itself before he could sever it, which Adjutant took to mean Archer had entered the Twilight Ways.

It wouldn't be long before she popped out in the middle of the enemy then, as had been her wont since she'd learned she had a knack for 'sidling'. Unlike using gates it wouldn't forewarn the Revenants, another reason that Indrani was best suited among them to taking the vanguard. Even if he'd still had both his legs, he wouldn't have been able to... Hakram forced himself to concentrate on the here and now. Too often these days did his thoughts take him down fruitless paths. Fingers pressing on another stone, the orc linked to Catherine.

"Indrani is moving, using the Ways," he told her. "You need to prepare."

"I hear you," she replied. "Is Masego ready as well?"

That was the essence of their striking plan, after all. Indrani was to interrupt the Archmage's casting of the storm, freeing Catherine and Masego to hammer both Scourges immediately with strong workings. From there the plan grew... fluid, as things grew harder to anticipate, but there were ideas that'd been discussed.

"All he needs is my signal," Hakram replied.

"Then let's get this going," Catherine replied, severing the link.

From her tone, the orc decided, she'd be smiling. He found he was as well. Grim as the circumstances were, it had been too long since the Woe had fought as one. That Vivienne's skulking would be replaced by Akua Sahelian's was not an improvement to his eyes, but these days Vivienne had duties of her own and – and it seemed that Sahelian wanted to speak. He touched the corresponding tone, and immediately her smooth speaking voice resonated in his ear.

"I have eyes on the undead climbing the ladders," the shade said. "Most are unarmoured, not shock troops, and they appear to be bringing up barrels. Should I risk a closer look?"

In most battles, it was Catherine that would have made such a call. Weighed the risks and benefits, then send out another to see her will through. Tonight, though, the burden fell on him. With the Woe being split among so many places, there could be no easy coordination save through the artefact Hierophant had crafted for that very purpose. That also meant that the one handling the artefact would make decision that would, typically, belong to the leader of their band. Hakram had been unsure of his own feelings, when Catherine had pressed the duty onto him. On one hand, it was a mark of great trust on her part. On the other, it seemed like an assignment perfectly tailored to keep him away from the fighting.

"Do it," Adjutant gravelled. "Archer's going in, we need no surprises."

"As you say," Sahelian replied.

It had been the delayed realization that someone would have to take up this task even if he refused it that settled the matter for him, in truth. And that anybody but him would either understand the Woe less, be distrusted by Catherine to see this done properly or be Vivienne Dartwick, who was needed to keep an eye on the Army of Callow in their stead. That the work existed beyond him, that it was not simply made to tuck him aside safely, had soothed the ugly assumptions that had been lurking in the back of his mind. He was shaken out of his thoughts by footsteps, one of his goblin attendants scuttling up the ladder leading up to the belfry overlooking the western rampart where he'd set up.

"Word from the streets," Lieutenant Tweaker called out, popping her head over the edge. "All invading gates are closed but two, and Beatrice Volignac is wounded but alive."

Hakram nodded.

"Time estimate for the last two?" he asked.

"The Rogue Sorcerer is headed for the first one, so not long," the goblin replied. "The other is still disgorging soldiers, though, so only when the Levantines get to-"

The head popped away and there was some chatter further down before it popped back up.

"The Peregrine took care of it," Lieutenant Tweaker corrected. "Only the Sorcerer's left now, a half hour at most."

"Keep me informed," Adjutant simply replied.

"That's the aim, sir," the goblin grinned.

He snorted, eyes returning to the rampart where a storm still raged, but the calm was not to last.

"Ah," Akua Sahelian suddenly breathed into his ear. "There appears to be something of a complication, Adjutant."

"Define complication," Hakram warily said.

"I have obtained one of the barrels in question," the shade said, "and just opened it. While I've no alchemical kit at hand, I do believe this is highly concentrated poison gas."

It fell into place a moment later. The storm growing, how the Scourges had been remarkably defensive in stance after their initial overwhelming strike. The Archmage had not begun to unleash offensive magics because he was about to turn his storm into one, by making the winds poisonous.

"Can you delay this?" Hakram asked.

The fingers of his dead hand, one of two, drummed against the end of the arm of his wheelchair – a small sculpted skull that Masego had been kind enough to add at his request.

"Unlikely," Akua Sahelian replied. "My acquisition of the barrel did not go unremarked, and I am now pursued by an entire flock of _"

There was a loud screech on the other side, followed by some very unflattering comments about vultures and baldness in Mthethwa that he suspected the shade had not actually meant for him to hear. Either way, it was now clear who the information needed to be passed on to.

Hakram's fingers found the stone and the dance began anew.

—

Guillaume would, in the safety of his own mind, admit to being curious as to why the Black Queen was just standing there and waiting. He wasn't fool enough to ask, though, or to look in the mouth the horse that was her continued presence here warding danger away. Guillaume had been born in a proper town, been taught some letters by the House of Light, so he wasn't some countryside yokel. Most of the stories about the Black Queen had to be guff. Tales swapped around camp fires, getting bigger with time or just invented wholesale – for some reason, some of the easterners kept insisting the queen had castrated an ogre in single combat. There had to be some truth to them, though, and Gods knew there weren't a lot of monsters out there that the Queen of Callow wouldn't make think twice.

That was reassuring, in a grim sort of way, which had Guillaume wondering if he had not ferreted out the quintessence of what it meant to be Callowan.

"You'll need to run when we lift the storm."

Jolted out of his philosophical musings, Guillaume started and turned to look at the Damned that'd addressed him. The queen looked tense, face set in that frown again, but not otherwise particularly concerned. It was kind of soothing, to have someone around looking at the end times like they were some sort of irritating inconvenience instead of the end of the world.

"You don't need to tell me twice," Guillaume feelingly said, then bit his lip. "I didn't ask, Your Majesty, but my company..."

"If they were on the rampart, they're dead," the Black Queen replied, not unkindly, suddenly then raised a finger to silence him. "I'm listening."

There was a long pause.

"And Akua thinks the winds will carry it?" the queen quietly asked.

Guillaume blinked in confusion. He'd never heard of anyone of that name, though he then reminded himself it was exceedingly unwise to eavesdrop too hard here. Boys from proper little towns like him weren't meant to hear royal conversations.

"We'll only get one clear shot at the two of them," the Black Queen reluctantly said. "What's the risk it could spread into the city?"

A grimace ensued.

"Archer should be able to burn out a single breath's worth," the queen muttered. "And she's got the scarf to filter, afterwards. Shit. How many survivors left from that first strike, do you think?"

Even as she leaned against her staff, the Black Queen – Merciful Heavens, Guillaume thought as he realized with a start that he was probably taller than her – worried her lip. One of her hands was twitching, he noticed, fingers curling into claws as they clenched against her palm and then slowly unclenched. Brown eyes swept across the winds, and then moved to him. He looked away hurriedly, and three long breaths passed.

"Fuck it," the Black Queen sighed. "We'll improvise. I'm going in, let Hierophant know."

Somehow dimly relieved, Guillaume risked a glance at the villainess. She offered her him a wild smile, for a heartbeat turning that dour tanned face into one that had him blushing.

"Hang on tight, Guillaume of Brabant," she said. "This is going to get rough."

—

"Why even bother making a plan, if she was going to discard it?" Masego complained.

"We hadn't accounted for the gas," Hakram replied. "If it gets into the city, this battle's over."

"As our defeat," Hierophant hazarded.

It seemed a reasonable guess, considering.

"Yes, Masego, as our defeat," Hakram amiably agreed. "Catherine's striking, are you-"

The connection between the two paired stones fizzled for a moment, dimming the last of his words as in the distance Hierophant's glass eyes glimpsed Night rising up in a great tide of darkness. Catherine was putting her back into it, if the reverberations from her working affected even active spellcraft in the area. An interesting phenomenon, and he itched to have a closer look at that in more contained conditions where the extraneous factors could be filtered out, but alas it would have to wait. Glints of a faded summer sun lighting up every dark, Masego studied his friend's attack curiously. It seemed a brutish thing, at first glance, a mere tide of shadow slammed into the Tumult's storm.

That the Scourge immediately answered with light magics, cutting beams of glowing power that tore into the darkness, was yet another reason why the Revenant was utterly underserving of being called an archmage. The effrontery was galling, truly. Someone with proper master of the higher mysteries would have noticed that Catherine, ever clever behind her pretence of thuggishness, hadn't just gathered Night and tossed it at an enemy working. The light cut through so easily not only because of its properties as one of the classical elements but also because that wave of Night was meant to be broken. It shook the storm some, when impacting it, but when the winds unmade it the darkness allowed itself to be carried by the gales like smoke.

Within thirty heartbeats, the entire storm was filled with a thick haze of Night. Masego felt a sliver of pride had how well she'd learned the foundational principles of Trismegistan sorcery: the essence of magic was, after all, usurpation. Akua Sahelian was to be commended.

"-are you ready?"

"I am," Hierophant replied. "You may tend to the others. My attack is at hand."

Surrounded by three dozen barrels of bronze rods positively dripping with invested sorcery, Masego had not held back in Wrestling what he required for a fitting admonishment. The magic was thick and pure, its tint strangely similar to that of a thin layer of oil atop water, and it was slowly circling around him according to his will. In the distance, his eyes piercing through the veil of Night surrounding Catherine, he found her silhouette raising her staff into the air. Good, she was about done then. The moment it struck down, to Masego's unspoken glee, the Night spread out within the storm roiled for one moment as the Tumult had his own spell stolen away from his control. Just long enough for Catherine Foundling to disperse it, abruptly breaking the storm into fading wisps of wind.

"And now my turn," Masego murmured, robes stirring in the evening wind.

Like a streak of lightning the sorcery shot forward through the sky. Hierophant's concentration stumbled when he saw Indrani walk out of thin air – she must have sidled through the Ways – behind the Tumult, who did not notice. The Pale Knight did, however, and before a heartbeat had passed the Scourge had his great axe in hand and was moving towards her as he shouted a warning.

"Too slow," Hierophant spoke through clenched teeth.

The filaments of magic snaked forward, sliding between them, and with a curt gesture of the wrist Masego shaped the sorcery into one of the first formulas he'd ever learned: out of the end of the filament a textbook prefect magic missile erupted, splashing harmless against the Revenant's armoured helm but blinding it for a moment. Archer ducked under the burning flame unleashed by the Tumult before he even turned completely, circling to stay behind his back, even as Hierophant began shaping the sorcery again. That missile had cost him, he estimated, one part out of a thousand.

Time to see what he might achieve with some halfway decent spellwork instead.

—

Of course Cat had gotten it into her head that was Indrani clearly needed was for her cover to be snuffed out just before she came out of the Twilight Ways. You know, just so she could be extra visible for the fucking Pale Knight and all. Gods, what a wench. Archer caught the axe between the edge of two knives, struggling against the Scourge for a moment before hastily stepping back when it became clear she wasn't going to win on strength alone. The bastard was even stronger than she'd come to believe from their first tangle at Lauzon's Hollow.

"This was unwise," the Pale Knight said.

"So was that second bottle of red last night, but that's life for you," Indrani agreeably replied.

He might have continued the conversation, but instead a streak of colourful magic darted in behind his head and seven wisps of hellflame shot out. The Revenant batted at them with the side of his axe, smothering a few, but more snuck around and slithered into the gap of his armour where they burst. With the Pale Knight distracted, Indrani went back on the offensive and moved to put him between her and the Archmage – which wasn't enough, damn it, the seventeen arrows of silver light that shot out from the top of the Scourge's staff curved around his ally. Shit, she was going to have to- and a gate into Twilight shivered to life right in their way, swallowing them all up. Archer grinned. Good, Cat was finally back in the fight.

She stepped around the gate, ducking under a swing of the Pale Knight's axe and darting forward. The undead in his pale plate tried to knee her at the junction of the shoulder and neck but Indrani tumbled forward and under him. Her longknives cut at the back of the knees as she rose, where most armours had a weakness, but she found no purchase as her blades scratched only steel. That they scratched at all was an improvement on her previous record against the armour, so- ah, she'd been right. There had been a weak point in the armour dead, it was just that the Revenant had had melted steel poured into the back of his knee. Still a weakness with the right tool, then.

And one more strike for Cat's theory that the Pale Knight's strange immunity was related specifically to his armour.

Archer kept moving forward, letting her enemy's backswing pass less than an inch behind her quiver, and got to the Archmage's flank. The Revenant was struggled with Zeze's latest bout of cleverness, a pool of raw magic he'd Wrested and was using to pump out spells from a distance by giving shape to parts of the pool – at the moment it was shooting out small tendrils of darkness that Indrani's Name screamed at her to avoid, so probably some kind of nasty Wasteland curse. The Archmage was frontloading a shield to deal with it, a pane of transparent light, and while its attention was there... ah, not so much of a sucker. Her attempt to sneak a blade into its back was met by a rippling circle of space that almost blew the longknife out of her hand.

And now the Pale Knight was on her again, only for a gate to open in front of him. Indrani went around, putting the gate between herself and the Archmage, which allowed her to see Catherine come out with a bare sword and sock the bastard in the side of the head with her pommel.

"Took you long enough," Archer said.

Cat snorted, the two of them eyeing the Pale Knight as he steadied his footing and the gate closed behind them.

"Took the scenic route," Catherine Foundling idly said. "It's such a nice night out."

And behind them there was a scream as the wind began spinning above the Archmage, who never did like fighting without a storm to cover his –

–

Hierophant cocked an eyebrow. Did the Tumult take him for an utter fool? Certainly he could not Wrest to separate entities at the same time, but what kind of a second-rate conjurer would he be if he'd not accounted for such a weakness in his chosen strategy? He set the magic he'd gathered to spinning around itself, slowly feeding a spell that made it rotate as a globe to insignificant costs, and dug into his aspect with relish as he reached for the dawning storm and-

–

A column of condensed lightning struck the Archmage three times, and Indrani's heart skipped a beat. It simply could not be denied she had good – nay, exquisite – taste in men. The Pale Knight suddenly went stiff, turning towards, Catherine and in a strange voice spoke a single word to her in a language that Archer did not recognize.

Catherine went still.

–

"I can't stop them any longer," Akua Sahelian said. "They have enough casters concentrating on me that should I linger capture is certain."

Hakram grimaced. The shade had done well at keeping anyone from climbing the ladders and joining the melee atop the bastion, but it'd only been a matter of time until Keter put together a force capable of dealing with her. He'd honestly not expected her to last so long. Much as he disliked the woman, Adjutant would still acknowledge the skillful performance she had offered tonight given her... reduced capabilities.

"Retreat," Adjutant gravelled. "Are Revenant coming up?"

"At least two, neither Scourges," Sahelian replied.

"I'll pass it along," Hakram said. "You know what to do."

She did not acknowledge his words, only severing the connection, a sure sign she was being attacked by enemies but trying not to show it too obviously. Hearing someone come up the ladder, Adjutant turned to see Lieutenant Tweaker's head pop over the edge.

"Movement at the front gate," she told him. "At least three wyrms seen, and it's looking like an all-out assault."

Hakram, idly, touched his prosthetic. A beautiful piece of work by Masego, that. He laid a finger against a groove in the wood, as if to scratch at a phantom itch.

"Sir," Lieutenant Tweaker began, "should we-"

Skeletal fingers closing against the length of wood, Hakram whipped out the wand and pressed his thumb against the rune sculpted into the side. There was a ripple of kinetic force as the enchantment was unleashed, the lieutenant's shape fading and turning into a misshapen Revenant halfway into a leap at him. Adjutant dropped the wand, hand finding the skull on the arm of his wheelchair and drawing out the axe it was the pommel of. He rose with the movement, Name pulsing with joy, and the blade split the skull in half as the undead's iron claws failed to pierce his chain mail. The Revenant dropped to the ground twitching as the necromancy tried to assert control of the limbs again. Half his body felt aflame, but he steeled himself through the pain.

"You got a goblin's speed right," Adjutant clinically assessed, "but not the weight. Sloppy."

The axe went up, the Revenant's eyes going wide, and Hakram of the Howling Wolves bared his fangs.

"Next time, Dead King? Send a Scourge."

The axe went down.

—

It was the aptness of the counters that allowed Hierophant to understand what he had been dealing with all this time. It was obvious, in retrospect.

The Tumult had answered the Liessen Chisel with a perfect shield in the Pelagian school, hellflame with a Stygian dry dousing developed during Maleficent the Second's wars against the League, used Jaquinite uncertainty principles to disrupt the magic he'd wrested halfway through a spell. The uninitiated among the heroes had insisted on calling the Revenant the 'Archmage' because of its broad variety of masteries in magic, but they'd never noticed that the masteries were impossibly broad. The only individual Masego had ever seen use so many different magics was the Rogue Sorcerer, and if he had never met Roland he might have dismissed this interpretation as him misreading the enemy's spellcraft. His eyes opened at the possibility, though, it was impossible to miss the telltale marks. This should not, however, be possible. Roland used a great variety of principles, but he had the protection of an aspect and though knowledgeable he was not a master.

The Tumult, however distasteful an entity, was.

Which was absurd, because those masteries could not have been acquired after death: the dictate that undead could not learn was not as absolute as some seemed to believe, but understanding the mysteries of an entirely new school of magic definitely qualified. And it was highly unlikely to have been achieved by living, as Hierophant was rather skeptical that someone capable of mastering multiple schools of magic, whether it drove them made or not, would not have made it into the pages of history. Which meant he was missing something. On a hunch, he tried a repeat: sending both a Liessen Chisel and a spurt of hellfire at the enemy from opposite ends of the massed sorcery. And he got his answer, at last.

The Tumult did parry both, but when it did it used Pelagian shields for both instead of the apter answer he had shown himself capable of using. Moreover, the Tumult had already shown he could cast two spells simultaneously so there was no reason for it not to. Unless it could not. He can only use one school of magic at a time, Masego deduced. And there was an obvious explanation as to why. He reached for his paired stone.

"Hakram," Hierophant said. "I have a theory about the Tumult."

"I'm listening," Adjutant replied.

He sounded a little out of breath, strangely enough.

"It is not a single Revenant," Masego said. "It is a multitude of dead spellcaster souls stitched onto the same corpse, likely with an oversoul – perhaps the body's original one – handling matters of control."

There was a moment of silence.

"If we target that oversoul?" Hakram asked.

"The King of Death is a skillful necromancer," Hierophant reluctantly replied. "It will not destroy the Revenant. It should, however, make it highly erratic as different souls struggle for control."

The orc chuckled.

"Well, let's see what we can do about that."

—

They'd taken too long to put down the Scourges, so now it was all going south. Indrani backpedaled, letting the axe pass half an inch away from her chin as behind her a blue-tinted shield took the impact from the four black streaks of sorcery that'd been aimed at her back. She flicked a feint at the Pale Knight's face that the Revenant didn't even bother to parry, ending up touching his helm, but the shaft of his axe was smashed into her elbow and she was forced to abort her actual blow and scuttle away as she swallowed a scream. Fuck, was it broken or just sprained? Either way, it strung like a bitch. She spared a glance for Cat, who'd just set a Revenant aflame and blown a few skeletons off the bastion but had just been forced to coat herself in a bubble of Night as a pack of undead mages tossed fireballs at her.

Indrani's straying eyes were not, to her surprise, rewarded by the Pale Knight pursuing. Instead the Revenant was going for... shit, barrels? As in those things full of poison Hakram had mentioned? One, two, three, strokes and three were split open as grey fog came billowing out. She hastily pulled up her scarf, trusting the enchanted weave to filter to toxins, which was long enough for the Archmage to attempt birthing another storm and Masego to shut him down. Unfortunately, the figure in grey and purple robes seemed indifferent to the lightning that was cast down on it. It flickered down the robes, grounding itself into the stone floor, and the Archmage began casting again. Keeping Hierophant tied up, Archer decided.

On the bright side, Indrani had just been given a moment to breathe so she reached for the pouch at her side and carefully unfolded the green cloth folded within before sliding it down the length of both her blades and tossing it to the side. It left them coated in a heavy transparent film, as she'd been told it would. Breathing deep, she went for the fog even as Cat wove some kind of bubble of darkness to suck it out and keep it from spreading too far. As she'd expected, the Pale Knight came out of the smoke aiming at Catherine's flank. Indrani sped forward, leaning into Stride to quicken her steps, and had to leap when just before she got into range the Revenant turned and swung at her. Catherine hammered at the Pale Knight's knee to hinder him, but a lesser Revenant was going after her again with a spear so...

Flow, Indrani thought, letting the aspect fill her up.

The axeblood went up, but she slapped it aside with a longknife and spun on herself. She landed on the Pale Knight's shoulder, tempted to attack but knowing that if she ended movement the aspect would end with it. She slid down the Revenant's back as it tried to catch her foot, landing behind it in a crouch and smoothly stabbing into the back of both knees. She found only a little bite, but it would be enough. The Pale Knight turned and struck at the same time, sweeping along the ground but she rolled between his legs and emerged in front of him. His extended arm was an opening, and she swiped the flat of a blade against the armoured elbow. The kick caught her in the ribs and one broke, but it was with a smile of triumph that she rolled against the ground and drew herself into a crouch.

The Pale Knight froze for a moment, before dropping his axe and pawing at his elbow as her aspect flickered out.

"Bad choice," Archer said. "The doses on the knees have had longer to spread."

Idly, she reached in the pouch and picked out a white cloth she used to wipe her blades clean with.

"What did you do?" the Pale Knight asked.

He stumbled, finding his footing hard to maintain.

"Delivered to you with the Concocter's regards," Indrani coldly said. "An alchemical acid that devour only bone and steel, repelled by all other substances."

The Pale Knight collapse to the ground, the only think keeping his upper legs connected to his thighs the stretch of pale plate covering them.

It was, Indrani thought with a hard smile, just the start.

—

Hierophant Wrested control of the storm again, jaw clenched, and shattered the spell.

How very irritating. Having grasped that he was facing a superior practitioner, the Tumult no longer even tried to do more than toss the occasional spell the way of Catherine and Indrani: instead he now repeatedly spent his power trying to birth another storm, not in hope of success but because doing so would command Masego's attentions. Hierophant himself rarely had long enough to do more than to form the occasional second-rate spell and send it flying before he must focus his attentions on the spell again, and the repeated struggle of wills against the Revenant was starting to tire him. Unlike the magic taken from inert objects, the Scourge's own must be forcefully usurped.

Masego felt sweat beading his forehead and going down his back. No, this stalemate was not to his advantage or that of his companions. The Tumult indicated the rhythm of their clashes, which meant he had an easier time sending spells at Catherine and Indrani than Hierophant had of defending them. The last three times it'd begun using increasingly obscure curses, and for the last Masego would admit that he'd been largely guessing when he'd used Sisi's Sphere as a defence — he'd not been certain it would actually work. He must regain the momentum, and that meant one thing: when the storm next began to form, Hierophant let it.

Instead he gathered all the sorcery he had left in a spinning globe, shaping it in one great working.

"Seven pillars hold up the sky," he began.

The world shuddered, seven wooden pillars forming out of raw magic around the Tumult. The Revenant tried to abandon the spell hastily, but Masego smiled. It is too large, he thought. And it takes you a moment to change between schools. Four runes formed above the Revenant's head, linked by a circle of pale light.

"Four cardinals, one meridian," he continued. "The wheel unbroken, spokes that are not. Thou shall not leave the circle."

And that, Hierophant decided, was a stalemate he could live with.

—

"Funny thing," Catherine Foundling said. "It was actually the Mirror Knight that helped me figure out how to kill you."

The Mantle of Woe fluttering around her Cat — no, in that moment Indrani could only think of her as the Black Queen — parried the last lesser Revenant's spear blow and severed its head with a brutal riposte, ripping out the blade and kicking the body over the edge of the bastion and onto a skeleton trying to climb up. The Pale Knight tried to push itself up with its axe, but Indrani kicked it away. The Revenant fell to his knees. She stepped away, sheathing her blades and reaching for her quiver.

"It's the Named you avoided in Cleves," the Black Queen idly continued. "The Red Knight and the Myrmidon. The Red Knight I understand — Devour is a headache and a half to deal with, but the Myrmidon? I couldn't figure out why."

The Pale Knight brought out another axe but Indrani had an Unraveller in hand — a great javelin artefact, one she'd adjusted so it could be fired from her bow but still very much a javelin. A swipe had that axe clattering away again and Archer added a smack against the helm so he would fall down on his back.

"But then I remembered that I never struck at you without adding Night to the blow," Catherine added, Night gathering to her like rivers to the sea. "And it fell into place. It's strength you have trouble with. Of that front, aside from the Mirror Knight who's damned slow those two are the physically strongest Named."

It was kind of hot, Indrani admitted to herself, when she monologued. She got that gleam in her eye, like she... well, maybe after this if they could spare the time. Probably counted as a form of healing, if you squinted a bit. Night caught her by the shoulders and tendrils began hoist her up into the sky. Higher and higher and higher, until the Pale Knight was barely more than a silhouette trying to get up, and then the darkness seized her tight.

"And down we go," Archer manically grinned.

She angled the unraveller downwards and the tendrils of Night drew back a bit before throwing her down. Eyes wide open, silent as she went down, she watched as the Pale Knight hacked away at the tendrils of shadow tripping him and slowly began to rise just in time to look up and see her. She met his eyes a heartbeat before the impact, too late for him to swing at her, and she slammed the unraveller through his throat through the gorget of pale steel. The Scourge gasped and she leaned in, ignoring the tremors of pain going down her legs from the landing.

"His name was Lysander," Indrani whispered. "Where you end up, carry that with you."

And with a final wrench she severed the head clean. Panting, Archer tried to get up but stumbled only for Cat to reach her side and help her stand. She also, bless her petty soul, kicked the Revenant's head. Indrani cocked an eyebrow at her.

"Fucker killed my horse," Catherine said, unrepentant.

Indrani saw that already undead were coming over the wall, the iron ladders steadily disgorging their lot, but it was the Archmage her gaze strayed to. Though bound by Masego's miracle, the Scourge had barely scuffed his robes throughout the fighting. For a bastard who preferred to fight at range, he'd proved remarkably resilient up close.

"Still need to finish that before we retreat for healing," Catherine muttered, "though at least he's still-"

A wooden pillar loudly cracked.

"Fuck," Cat said, "I really ought to know better by now."

Three of them blew and the Archmage's hand swept out, but no magic ensued. Indrani pushed away and reached for her longknives even as Cat struck out with a spear of Night, but a shape moved in the way before it could hit the Revenant. Akua Sahelian, dressed in threads of shadow, moved stiffly so stand between the Archmage and the Night. Cat pulled the blow at the last moment.

"Go through," Akua said through gritted teeth. "I'll-"

Her mouth shut. The last pillars shattered one after another and the Archmage shook free. Masego struck from a distance with brilliant blue flames but they splashed harmlessly on a shield, and when Cat threw a few threads of shadow they were carved through with arrows of silver light. Archer cautiously approached, keeping an eye on Akua as she did. They couldn't let the Revenant flee, as it was obviously ramping up to. The Wastelander must have been sneaking up on the Archmage and gotten caught, she thought, only that didn't seem like Akua at all. Weapon-wise, if the Archmage put her in the way it shouldn't be an issue. She had only a silver dagger in hand, enchanted by the looks of it, but wait wasn't that a –

A flock of yellow bee-like spurts of flame from Masego had the Scourge putting up a swirling ball of power to suck them up, while Catherine's curving arrows of darkness were met with matches in silver light. And with both hands occupied, the Archmage had nothing left to spare when Akua Sahelian thrust a ritual dagger into his left eye.

"Please," the shade amicably smiled. "As if I would allow myself to be snatched like some petty errant soul. For that presumption, allow me to take one of yours."

The Revenant screamed with a dozen different voices as she ripped out the knife, its blade glinting with eerie light, and the Wastelander smiled in triumph. Indrani hurried forward. If they could finish the Archmage here and now... All Indrani saw was a flicker, but she was the Archer and so she knew what she'd glimpsed. An arrow. And, heart clenching, she knew where it'd been aimed. She turned, watching a circle of Night flare around Catherine but failing to stop the black-feathered arrow that punched into the side of her face. Cat fell the floor, spurting blood, and even as Akua let out a scream of dismay the Archmage leapt off the edge of the bastion.

In the distance, two crows screeched in agony.

In the sky above Hainaut there were great rumbling sounds as power gathered, thousands of mages in the plains below unleashing their rituals at least. One after the other, three great gates above the city.

And water began pouring out of them.

kitebroken1

In the sky above Hainaut there were great rumbling sounds as power gathered, thousands of readers in the plains below unleashing their rituals at least. One after the other, three great gates opened above the city.

And votes began pouring out of them.

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>
Vote!

ruduen

So, we have a gap in which Cat wasn't visible (while going through the gate), and Cat getting killed by someone who explicitly told others to anticipate as still living.

How many 'deaths' does that make it for her now? It really isn't one of her best habits.

Adrian_V

And we just stoped seeing the POV from Guillaume, and not even a comment about him like if he fled or Indrani seeing him dead or fleeing or something.

Adrian_V

Forgot ton say how suspicios that is.....

Liliet

Catherine went from where Guillaume was to where Indrani was, Indrani was never in position to see his position.

Adrian_V

I meant that normally we get some closure on why the narrative changes, here it just stopped without even his take on how she put her game face on or a comment from her to take cover, i just feel is weird and suspicious.

New theory: that thing Cat did to him wasn't healing or just healing, she did something to have a failsafe to come back or take him over (a little too villaounous but who knows)

Liliet

I mean, the last thing we heard from him was Cat putting on her game face, so,

hakureireimu

She also took longer than usual to go through.

Tenthyr

And through the Pale Knight, did the dead king say:

Mistake.

nick012000

He says, as he makes the mistake that gives Cat her Name. LOL. I guess he didn't know that Black gave her the name of Squire by stabbing her through the chest.

ruduen

And Cat's eventual retort:

"I don't speak that."

Big I

Hahaha, Cat taught the Dead King Lakeomancy. Which is a horrible twist for our guys, but still pretty funny.

Also, Cat keeps being heroic. Saving Guillame, then throwing out her plan to stop the gas. And I wonder if Akua gets to keep the soul of the Tumult, and what she might be able to do with it.

AndromedaStar

I'm mostly surprised that it's described as water. Why not pour nasty poison/acid/etc out of the gates? Though it's more difficult to get a lake's worth of those I suppose.

Liliet

There probably aren't acid lakees in Arcadia, no.

The threat of the lakeomancy gates is that even if you close them instantly, that's still several tons of water crashing down into your army. It doesn't matter that it's water, it's the "several tons" part that's crucial.

KageLupus

I'm sure Cat would say she is being practical with both decisions. Saving Guillaume didn't cost her anything, and stopping the poison is more important tactically than sticking to their plan.

If that poison got in the storm and blew over the city it would kill every non Named. There would be no army and the Dead King would have won. He doesn't need the Scourges to survive at that point, since all he wants is to break the army anyway.

btnerb

Oh no! The dead king has learned Lakeomancy!

To be fair, the essence of (Trismegistan) sorcery is usurpation – using your enemies ideas is just that same principle in a different arena. Still, that is going to be a bad, bad day for the defenders. If only the Saint of Swords was there to counter it.

Darkening

It was pilgrim that broke it first time, though she did block some of it coming through.

308924810a

Well at least he didn't improve on it.

Wasn't there a magical girl fic which used portals and differences in the rotational speed of the earth at the equator compared to the poles to let the magical girl launch kinetic attacks consisting of gigantic piles of rocks, dirt and water travelling at a very high speed?

PS I think it was this one <https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Literature/SagaOfSoul>

At least he isn't hitting them with accelerated lakes that hit hard enough to carve into the mountain the city is on.

Burlyraven

Okay, so Cat's Name was solidifying in this chapter, and she has story weight when it comes to deaths actually strengthening her, but she is a villain, so there's going to be some side effects, to say the least. I have to wonder how much the Crows anchored themselves in Cat, and how many thousands of soldiers are going to die before Cat returns in a dark miracle.

SpeckofStardust

Losing cat against 3 reverents? not worth demand refund,
Also goodbye city.

TeK

It's like when your friend defeats you again and again by spamming the same unblockable move, so you learn this move and spam it on him.

shadw21

EE, please! We need to know! Is this leading to some sort of crossover plot with The Wandering Inn?

ftaku

Ikr, everyone killing main characters right now

noth

3 stories im reading had their main character "killed" in some way, is there a writer challenge that we dont know about?

Daltos

What 3 stories if I may ask?

Miles

Please, Cat has come back from worse with less.

MagnaMalusLupus

Hey, it's not Saturday yet; no spoilers!

TinfoilHat

My theory: its the same author writing both stories. Have they ever been photographed together? No?

I rest my case

MagnaMalusLupus

Hey, it's not Saturday yet; no spoilers!

Raivshard

Oi! Spoilers!

ErraticErrata

I've not read the Wandering Inn, it's purely coincidental.

Tom

To be fair, this wouldn't be a serious battle if Cat didn't die.

Captain Amazing

Good story, nice ending. Everyone dies so no loose ends. What's your next project EE?

ErraticErrata

It's called Pale Lights. Will keep you posted.

Sinead

At last, the Fall.

Crack theory: She has to petition the Gods themselves. The Angels were just a warm up act.

I hope Cat's return (as I presume we are not getting a full book without her perspective) is in the form of getting her body back (or at least a constant form). The Wandering Bard's "sentient Name" style is horrifying, and I would think is antithesis to what Cat's goals are.

Adrian_V

Either we are about to see some really dramatic come back or something much simpler: it was a grazing hit as in enough to knock her out a bit but not kill her (it happens even to bullets, sometimes it even looks like a clean shot)

Also did Nessie just copy Cat? This is plagiarism!! I knew he was bad but this is just horrible, can't believe he is willing to go to such low ways, shame on him!! xD

Liliet

It's definitely not a grazing hit.

Not because of whatever it said in this chapter (though the crows and Akua screaming is a bit of a hint), but because that's what happened the previous time. The Arsenal arc already had a cliffhanger of "is Cat dead???" drawn out across several chapters even, only to reveal that It Was Just A Flesh Wound.

Now everyone expects that, so... it wouldn't really carry the drama and tension that it did the first time. Nah, we're going to find out next chapter that yes she is in fact actually dead, that's a dead body, not alive, the arrow worked, the Hawk's Aspect struck true.

What also happened during the Arsenal arc was that we had multiple POVs that were utterly unaware that anything had happened with Catherine. So what I'm predicting is that this time, we're going to go across POVs that are very much aware / find out before our own eyes that Catherine died, and we're going to see the ensuing reaction / panic.

Someone on discord also wisely pointed out that this might be the disaster Vivienne was summoned to prevent: she can rally people in Cat's absence in a way no-one else can.

Cat's dead, but she has a history of not STAYING that way... 😊

That Other Guy

But if she does stay that way, I vote Tyrion Lannister for Black Queen... in drag.

Liliet

Sinead

I like the idea that after Cat's return as Peacemaker/ Arbiter/whatever her name will be, she fully embraces the Mantle of Woe's colour scheme with a a coloured dress under the Mantle of Woe and just spends an entire chapter enjoying the fact that she is no longer the freaking Black Queen and can actually wear something nice once in a while.

Also RIP Black Queen Name. It's twice it's almost come to being and then broken at the pivotal moment. Hell Indrani started thinking of her as Black Queen.

I'd say Cat dodged the bullet there, but that's not in the best of tastes at the moment is it?

Sinead

Would it be premature for Cat to add the Dead King's purple banner to her cloak for coming back from Death? That would just make her missing Orange and Red for a complete Pride Flag, yes?

Liliet

Catherine wears exclusively rainbow colored clothes including skirts for a while.

Vivienne has to urgently dig up a tailor / designer who can make that look good.

Sinead

Will she be Cat the Many Coloured, or Cat with the Technicolored Dream-Cloak?

I mean, I think everyone should wear kilts, so I wouldn't complain if she does wear vibrant colours.

Liliet

Cat has been whining about overly dark clothing since Book 2. I say let her live out her jewel and pastel colored dress dreams

Sinead

I would genuinely love it if she did make that switch. If she's one of those few villains that lives a long long time, it would be great to see how the Black Queen (which I suspect will live on as a Name that used to exist, even if that never was the case, and I suspect that it will never arise now) legend exists in the future, and will Cat the Arbiter/Peacekeeper be remembered as being the same person.

This works especially with a complete wardrobe change, as one would never associate it with the Black Queen (which is kinda the point).

Liliet

YES

Crash

The Pastel Queen

agumentic

On the other hand, we might get a clear statement from the beginning that Cat is not dead, merely in a coma or something.

Liliet

Ain't going to happen <= my prediction. Wrong narrative beats for that.

agumentic

Well, I agree that we certainly won't have another set of chapters where Cat's state is unknown. The story will promptly answer whether she is "really" dead or merely deeply injured.

Liliet

Won't be "merely deeply injured" because the crows wouldn't react like that to a mere deep injury – Cat can stem blood loss with Night and is currently surrounded by allies. She's instadead, from evidence.

(Also from narrative beats – we did "merely deeply injured" last time, the audience is expecting it now. Which I suppose you are (as well as I), so valid,)

agumentic

I think Crows' reaction is entirely unrelated to Cat's "death" – they were hit with something else. The text structure indicates that to me, at least – that reaction is its own paragraph, not the continuation of the one where Cat was shot. And Cat can't do anything herself if she is in a coma, not to mention the possibility of Night being lost. Healing from allies is exactly what can bring her to "won't die right now, we don't know whether she wakes up" state.

In the Arsenal, we had "state unknown, perhaps even dead??? (jk)", which, while resolved with Cat merely being injured, wouldn't be the same story as "Cat is grievously injured and out of commission". We did have something similar during the Battle of the Camps, but even then that story didn't play out completely – no getting up in the darkest hour there.

Liliet

considering how strong the suggestion that this is Cat being dead is, showing that it is not so in the next chapter would be a tension-breaking fakeout (and drawing it out further would be a copy of the Arsenal arc)

agumentic

Is it a particularly strong suggestion? Sure, arrows to the head tend to be pretty lethal, but not as much as, say, decapitation, and we have already seen someone surviving an arrow from Hawk, Cat is also surrounded by allies that can stabilize her condition.

As for tension, there is precisely zero tension involved in Catherine “dying” here. I think literally no one believes it’ll really stick. Cat being injured instead of “dead” creates practically the same situation on meta-level – “Black Queen is incapacitated and there will probably be some desperate measures involved in her coming back”. Sure, the characters might express more despair in text, but I am not really seeing the virtue of it – anything that additional despair could provide can be provided from other sources. Like the situation on the battlefield growing worse and/or Sve Noc getting their asses kicked.

308924810a

She could dead, just about to end up undead again.

shikkarasu

I broadly agree, but I have to point out that Cat wouldn’t move without preparing for Hawk. She knew that there is a 100% chance that Hawk would be alive since she was given the ol’ “no-one could survive that!” report from an underling. I’m thinking decoy zombie. I know, I know; what kind of idiot uses undead against the Dead King? Catherine would. The only proper Necromancer within Raising distance is the Temult, who is heavily occupied and no rational person would expect such a strategy. It’s also low-risk. If anyone takes control of her puppet then she just shreds it since it isn’t even Bind-level.

Long story short I refuse to believe that Catherine wasn’t in control of this encounter. Not when we aren’t seeing it from her POV. That’s when she has her best Mastermind plans.

Liliet

I agree Catherine was in control.

I also think she died for real.

I think it was part of the plan.

Wouldn't be the first, or even the second time.

agumentic

God, I feel like that would be just the fucking worst. I do think that Cat "really" dying is a possibility, but if it happens, I strongly believe it shouldn't be a part of some plan from her. That way we can have a plotline where everyone (and Viv in particular) can be hit with a realization that yes, Cat really dropped the ball and now they have to handle the situation on their own, with whatever desperate actions on their side providing Cat with the way back. But if it was her plan all along, it would all be so cheap and repeated that I am honestly disgusted by the mere thoughts of it.

Sinead

How would you feel if "it's part of her plan" in the fashion of "Fuck it, we'll improvise" is the moment she had the plan? And that her priorities would mean that her dying would be less of a cost than having any of her key subordinates die instead?

Cat's entire goal is build systems that do not require her, and thus can survive her and protect what she values.

Think back to her reflection on if she hadn't gotten a resurrection, but everything else worked out, it still would have been a steal. She has built up systems to take care of what she values without her needing to oversee it. From her perspective, as soon as she has all these lines of succession sorted out (which she does because Vivienne is available to oversee Callow, the Woe can take care of themselves, and the Firstborn are at the point where they just have her as a liaison with humans, but can handle themselves).

Combine this with Cat always wanting to protect what is her, that scene with Guillaume stating "this is going to get rough" is her committing to secure the victory of the walls and thus take the arrow from the Hawk (Keter always gets the last word).

Cat's way back is her taking the dream as a warning: You are going to Fall regardless. Do you let it come to you, or do you take a leap of faith?

Or to rephrase the above a bit: Cat's juggling so many glass balls, and when she misses a step, she instead trusts those around her to grab and take control of those balls that are closest to them and does a swan dive for the one that she can recover?

Liliet

hm. also a valid point. i guess that depends on whether you find tension and drama in the idea of catherine dying on purpose 😡

Mental Mouse

"It Was Just A Flesh Wound" – maybe in the Monty Python fashion! In the Arsenal Cat remarks that she came pretty close to bleeding out, and the fae did think she was dead.

Yeah, this is going to be nasty – obviously it's not going to take Cat out for good, but she may yet need a true resurrection from Sve Noc, perhaps with Masego's help. And in the meantime, everybody else has problems, especially with DK pulling that "see how you like it!" move.

Liliet

Sve can't do true resurrections, their power is of Below's variety 😊 sureisashametherearentanyheroesaroundandcatdoesntfitanyheroicnarrativ

Mental Mouse

Villains don't get resurrection aspects. Sven Noc has already recreated Cat's mortal body after destroying the fae construct she'd replaced it with.

Liliet

Everyone knows villains don't get true resurrected and can't true resurrect people. Cat has defied both of those, too.

Just saying 😊

(this is wild speculation, I know it contradicts stuff)

Crash

Oh since we're doing wild speculation.

EE pulls the plot twist of the century and she is truly dead, comes back as a Revenant.

Final Book is Cat planning and executing the undoing of everything she has built. Or, seeing that everything she has built works and she is beaten back.

Liliet

...wild speculation about stuff i actually want to see happen ._.

Sinead

I guess my only issue with that is that I hate "trapped in my own mind" perspective for first person narratives.

Even if Cat's own systems prevent her from breaking them, that method of making the point would be a really rough read.

Then again, I don't even like the idea of Sve Noc losing here, so I like my stories potentially a bit more on the lighter side than you do.

Liliet

> I guess my only issue with that is that I hate "trapped in my own mind" perspective for first person narratives.

yeah i fucking hate those too to clarify, i hate that scenario on every level

Crash

Instructions unclear.

Akua gets a Name. It's Wandering Bard: it was her plan all along, this is a stable time loop.

Liliet

Hmm. My usual proposition is that it's Cat who becomes WB in a stable time loop, but this is an interestnig variation.

That Other Guy

This is step 23 of her plan into infiltrate Keter. She just needed the right way to knock on the door. The successor to Trismegistus sorcery is Quatmegistus/Catmegistus sorcery.

The twins subvert the throne and take over the brood stock in Keter so there is a socially acceptable pool for the first born to draw night from. Unbeknownst to the surface, Keter undergoes a great innovation in schooling sorcery and other knowledge based skills, deeply increasing the skill pool for the firstborn.

Then Cat is made honorary princess of the Kingdom Under

Adrian V

Actually hasn't it been mentioned a lot of times that Mighty can revive? In the chapter where Cat saw a vision of the northern front (drow one) she made a point to note the dead king countered this by eating the corpses before they could revive or have the night harvested i think.

Liliet

yea but Cat's not made of Night the way drow kind of are (they cannot survive without it, it's their lifeblood literally) and in the Arsenal it's been established through her neck wound that she cannot use the Night to restore herself this way

Miley

It's pretty simple the first time she died on screen she was facing the big bad after a victory against his minion and on the cusp of a name, so she got a name dream.

Now she's facing a bigger, badder big bad, only on a battlefield this time; she just had a victory against HIS minions, two at once this time and she actually helped in all stages of the fight, and she's on the cusp of a more powerful Name. She's obviously about to just ascend to kratoshood.

Hitogami

It takes more than a little death to keep Cat down!
If she gets her new name here I'll be so excited!

Joel DELETED

Fantastic

Xinci

Ah so I may have been correct in it being the bindings on the soul that limited one to a school. Presumably apotheosis could let one get beyond this but the calcification would instead push one towards a differing rule set. A gestalt is a excellent solution, I wonder if you could make enough proper bindings to enough matter from a Hell /Arcadia/other dimension to mimic this artificially? Really glad to see more frameworks of souls and how they can be used.

Only one framework of effect/behavior for a specific variable or I suppose entity does seem to be a general rule for everything so I suppose its not surprising it has to switch out souls or that Masego cannot Wrest multiple entities at once.

Also great to have Lights uncertainty principle be noted for Jaquinities. It makes sense that they learned it and formatted it from miracles now. If it can be anything then specific patterns of stimuli would be needed to be used to get a specific result out of a possibly endless list of alternatives. Perhaps it works by them mimicking the faithful prayers probably "keyed" to useful patterns of effect(given the words of the book of all things definitely have actual effects on the world when uttered,transcribed, etc)Its kind of shortcutting what a trismigestian sorcerer does with a "automatic calculator" but its possibly rather slap dash and may not actually give you that much understanding of what happened. So a Trismigestian sorcerer may prefer to be able to do similar things with better mastery down the line(thus Wekesa and Masegos disdain)

Other things of interest being, Idrani seeming to copy the Lady when sidling. Creation cant make a counter-balance to sidling since it works specifically by finding weaknesses and holes in it, perhaps?

Liliet

> Other things of interest being, Idrani seeming to copy the Lady when sidling

Huh?

shikkarasu

Yeah, I don't remember Ranger using that trick, either. Not saying she couldn't, that's how you get I-Told-You-So stabbed, just that I'm sure the Lady hasn't done it on screen.

The normal method to getting in/out of Arcadia seems to be kidnapping fae (Used by Warlock when he and Black came to Marchford, also mentioned as a plan B for Masego if Cat refused to open a gate for him just before Underdark) so I would guess that is how she normally does it.

Liliet

i mean there's a permanent gate to Arcadia in the Waning Woods, William asked her for access to it way back when

Xinci

Ranger was noted to be able to cut her way into Arcadia and able to find such weak spots naturally. So similar to Flow, Idrani seemed to be using See to find the spots and Stride to aid in her getting through. As has been a theme with her she kind of copies stuff Ranger can do naturally.

Xinci

To clarify I mean, Idrani seems to be using See and Stride to attain a level of skill and level of understanding similar to how Flow allows her attain a level of understanding similar to Ranger's.

Miles

Flow doesn't give her any part of Ranger's learning aspects or anything like them. Flow helps her focus to a neuro-extraordinary way.

Liliet

It's a reference to Ranger being a half-elf I think. She doesn't need Aspects for what Idrani does.

Liliet

Ranger lived on top of a gate to Arcadia

Burnsy

Nessie has a nasty sense of humour

Juff

Typo Thread:

in their like (missing word) gone made > gone mad last long one > last long once make decision > make decisions suddenly then > then suddenly clear short > clear shot her him > him
underserving > undeserving proper master > proper mastery pride had how > pride at how prefect > perfect that was Indrani > that what Indrani armour dead (something wrong here) was struggled > was struggling to separate > two separate towards, Catherine > towards Catherine, by living > by the living made or not > mad or not hellfame > hellflame three, strokes > three strokes filer to > filter the at is tried > as it tried that devour > that devours collapse > collapsed think keeping > thing keeping he must focus > he had to focus must be > had to be indicated > dictated

He must regain > He had to regain began hoist > began hoisting through his throat through (might want to reword this) stiffly so stand > stiffly to stand Cat fell > Cat fell to rituals at least > rituals at last

mamm0nn

This is Orc radio, sending you smooooth jazz over the airways.
Dum, dum, dumdidum~

Cat: Damn it Hakram, stop clogging the airways with this stuff.
Doesn't matter if no one's saying anything anyway.

Archer: No! I like it!

Zeze: This station helps me concentrate when I study...

Dead King: Love this show.

...

Cat: Wait, you-

Dead King: Whoops.

tithin

Between this and TWI, I am very upset.

Frivolous

Akua let out a scream of dismay – Akua showed more reaction to Cat getting shot with an arrow from the Hawk than she did from seeing her own father getting killed by goblins.

I feel good for Hakram, killing a Revenant in single combat.

I curse EE for making me wait until Tuesday to find out what happened, if even that quickly. We may have to wait until next Friday to find out, if EE is sadistic enough.

Liliet

> Akua showed more reaction to Cat getting shot with an arrow from the Hawk than she did from seeing her own father getting killed by goblins.

TBF that's an emotional repression thing – I don't doubt Akua's emotions were stronger the first time, she was just not exactly in tune with them 😊

Frivolous

On further thought and after some brooding, it occurred to me to be thankful for my blessings.

If anyone else, anyone else in the Woe, had been shot in the head by the Hawk, I might consider that death to be permanent. I would be devastated, which is really bad for me.

But, since Catherine is the protagonist and main POV of the entire story, then I must assume something will happen to ameliorate that. I hope so anyway.

Vlatko

Cat's coming back for sure. Probably through her connection with the Crows. Still, her death here is pretty significant. Expect the new Cat to be different in some fundamental way.

Liliet

The Crows don't seem to think so.

Christian Oaks

I think what happened is the arrow had the same anti night poison on it as seen earlier with the varlet. I think the crows screamed cause they have. To sever themselves from their priest lest both be consumed

Liliet

huh, interesting and likely! though I think varlet's poison might have been produced by their Aspect, it would be very much like neshamah to reverse engineer something like that and give it to hawk

aurikdomi

well I guessed on the night being consumed bit though for the wrong reason 😊

Liliet

lol yeah

agumentic

Yeah, when Indrani used all her Aspects I became really worried for her for a moment.

Velrix

Cat go to battle without helmet then get shot by the foe she warned was not dead and to keep a lookout for ? Seriously ? Nice baiting. Foundation of a new aspect, Reveal, Learn, Know, Improve ?

Liliet

Helmets famously have visors, I doubt a helmet would have prevented this.

Do0d

She's been mocking the Shiny Prince for years for not wearing his and made a point of wearing one multiple times in the story.

Makes you wonder: Why wasn't she wearing one this time ?

SpeckofStardust

The artifact she was using for communication might not work with a helmet on.

shikkarasu

Not to mention her Winter Wights: Surprisingly A Bleeder, Should Have Ducked, and my personal favourite A Dress Is Not Armour.

Liliet

she also wasn't wearing one on her raid with Broken Bells back before Maillac's Boot! she also sat and wondered why the fuck she wasn't wearing a helmet that time

Sinead

That always seemed a bit odd to me, because she could have a "Black Queen" visor or even a shaped helmet inspired by the Crows depending on what she wanted to lean into (probably the second, since her martial side is more in line with the Firstborn this arc, and potentially a revision of the masks of the Twilight Sages as a revitilisation of the Firstborn culture) and still work as both additional protection, and still have her get shot in the eye at the end of this chapter.

Then again, Cat's restructuring of the sigils and the creation of the priesthood of Losara was some of my favourite parts of the series, so I would love it if there was more coming out of the Firstborn that we see in the field.

And you can have her remove her helmet to prevent terrorising poor Guillaume, so he still reacts to reading her face.

Liliet

Open faced helmets also exist!

Honestly, my opinion on the Broken Bells raid is "Catherine is swamped with WAYYY too many things to handle, consider and coordinate all at once, and is therefore occasionally a HUGE dumbass in random places that are lower priority than others. That Catherine considers making sure she doesn't die in a fight a lower priority than the REALLY critical stuff is just Catherine for you"

Sinead

That is true, but I also want "tasteful and effective face protection" in my fantasy war stories.

Huh....maybe that's why I like Akua so much. She also agrees with tasteful and effective armour.

Liliet

>tasteful

Cat has a long list of problems with your claim about Akua's armor snort Fair. I'd argue that she's walking around with a bright multicoloured cloak. Functional armour can still be a statement.

Sinead

I have literally heard “tasteful” and “elegant” used interchangeably with fashion, so I was not meaning anything crude by it.

But that’s on me, if that is a possible point of ambiguity

Liliet

I didn’t think you meant anything crude, I’m just deeply amused by remembering how Cat had 1001 problem with Akua’s armor XD

Also, well, Cat never said her cloak was tasteful either lol

Casey Glick

Ironnicize

Earl of Purple

Great fight, Guilherme was lucky. Pretty sure he wasn’t being puppeted by Cat, either. Were she planning that, he’d not live to overhear. Also, it worked with Tancred because they were the same height and she burnt the body.

Hakram still has it, pleased to say. Pity about Lieutenant Tweaker, though.

Wonder what the one word Neshamah passed to Cat was, via the Pale Knight.

Vlatko

“Mistake”, the Dead King said in Ashkaran.

medailyfun

the word was “Liliet”, obviously

Liliet

SLANDER I HAD NOTHING TO DO WITH THIS

-shfits away keeping her hands behind her back-

Cold Cyberia

So, three more interludes from different perspectives and maybe five chapters of will she/won’t she. I predict we’ll find out Cat’s actual status towards the end of January.

Anyway, an enjoyable chapter though I’ve found Guillaume’s inclusion unnecessary unless Cat had some grander plan and EE didn't want us seeing her thoughts or he was used as a body double. There's been enough common folk marvelling at how awesome she is that it's treading old ground and I'd rather see her thoughts in a chapter names after her band.

Do0d

Interludes don't have Cat's POV.
Guillaume was essentially acting as a camera for EE.

Liliet

> unless Cat had some grander plan and EE didn't want us seeing her thoughts

oh most def

"i took the scenic route" huh cat

> There's been enough common folk marvelling at how awesome she is

NEVER

Decius

It seems somewhat weak to bind a bunch of skilled magi together in one body but only allow one at a time to use it for spellcasting.

Is there some kind of interference that would prevent dozens of mages from being sewn together and be capable of all casting at the same time?

beleester

I'm guessing it's only one really skilled mage, and the other souls are just "expansion packs" to add on more types of spells. If Keter had a dozen Archmage-tier casters in different schools there would be no reason to glue them all together.

Andrew Smith

Thinking on it, I would say either it is one powerful caster with a bunch of souls that did whatever part of learning a magic system that is beyond a Undead and just added on. Though it seems unlikely to me since in that case any damage to that caster soul will completely remove the ability to cast(or reduce if the other souls have weak gifts).

I think most likely I see that each soul has at least a decently strong Gift for magic or the strength of the gifts were made to pool together to make the archmage with each one focused on a school, that way there is not as much of a single point of failure in a villain's minion.

Mental Mouse

It was previously said that spells can't use the same bit of Creation twice at the same time. Presumably that's a lot of how shields and counters work.

imagesbe

Oh my god I have to sit on this for how long now.

I fully believe that if Cat's actually dead she will not stay that way, but it may be several chapters before we find out for certain which pisses me off. Yeah this updates regularly, but while it could be next update, it could be weeks as well.

I can see Cat doing a Heroic Sacrifice in the last book, I don't see her going away before the last book has even begun.

superkeaton

Yep, that's about right. Typical Distraction Carnifex.

Aston Whiteman

Cat needs a reset. Crows are pissed off they lost their claim on Cat.

Entering Hero mode.

Spoilers not allowed to be...

ethericsentinel

It's the return of Lakeomancy!

Sinead

My guess is that the remaining chapters are all of Cat's successors stepping up into new Roles:

Vivienne: Sun Queen (The Queen is dead! Long live the Queen).
Supreme commander of all Callowan forces.

Ivah: First Under Night (assuming First Under Night and head of Losara are the same thing. Drow are not particularly sentimental creatures, so it may be that Losara becomes the Ivah (or who ever takes over the sigil) and First Under Night is a different role)

Ishaq: Head of the Villains and supreme commander of Named forces in Hanauit.

Any other roles/"hats" I am missing?

Liliet

we have a book remaining

Sinead

Oh, this is me being unclear in writing again. Sorry about that.

My theory is that Cat will come back with a different purpose. However the last book will not have her juggling all her different roles, and instead have a very specific goal. Think of how Amadeus has his breath of relief at the epilogue before striking out with Hye.

However, much like her father, Cat made a point now to build up systems that mean that the parts of the Alliance that she has personally built up will continue on without her. All the "crowns" she wears will fall to other heads, and she will take up a new Role.

Liliet

ooo nice

Sinead

Thanks!

Granted, I could be wrong, but I think that it works well to have Cat basically leave a lot of the current structure behind in a lot of ways. It's a completion of Nemeshah's prediction, but in a way that he couldn't foresee as he is.

I don't know if it works to have the organisation around the Truce and Terms have a thing for the biggest monsters (thinking what Cat's becoming, Hye, all quasi deity powers) where it's the case of they still need to abide by the Accords, but no one really wants them to be moving around mortals too much, with Cat's current arc as the establishment of the precedent.

Not sure if I'm getting the idea out properly, but Cat's level of Named are not just fish in the stream of the Story able to swim against the current. They are the ones that can jump the waterfalls and thus dictate where the stream goes. Hye doesn't have that to the same degree as Cat is going, but she did change the curse of Summer into an acknowledgment, so she is not without her own weight, even if it's of an old monster recognising baby monsters.

beleester

I think Akua would be a better pick for Head Villain. Not technically a Named, but she knows story-fu better and she's got better social skills. And it's the one job where being the Doom of Liesse is more of a benefit than a detriment.

Sinead

You have a point, even if it runs counter to my own personal crack theory of the end of Akua's arc.

Liliet

Akua is a bad pick for Head Villain, because her incentives and priorities have nothing in common with those needed for that position. She's not interested in leading others, she's not interested in establishing a stable society on Calernia, she's not interested in acquiring influence among villains (and if she were, it would not be a good sign). She's barely recovering from her childhood trauma, don't make her jump on a broken leg.

Frivolous

Sinead: Agree with this. Also agree with your following posts on this issue.

Cat's death or semi-death is why the Augur and the Wise Astrologer sent Vivienne and her Army to Hainaut.

Cat's death might trigger Vivienne into receiving the Name, not of Shining Princess as some of us originally thought, but of Good Queen.

The other role/hat you may be missing is that of supreme commander of the Alliance military, at least in the field. No one ever seems to gainsay her when it comes to making a decision.

Because one of Cat's Stories is that she has never lost a battle. Except perhaps until now.

I think at some level this was always going to happen. The Hawk was Keter's one-shot unavoidable kill, and Cat was a major, perhaps primary, resource for Neshamah's enemies.

I mean, even the Mirror Knight almost died from an arrow from the Hawk, and Cat's nowhere near as invulnerable.

So this feels a little like destiny.

Sinead

Thanks!

I'm hoping Vivienne becomes the Sun Queen personally. Starts out by chucking a ball of sunshine at someone. Current theory is that she uses "sunlight" (not Light) to break the hiding aspect of Varlet and deals with them.

As for Cat being "supreme commander of Alliance forces", I think that that role was mostly hers in part for being someone who wears so many hats. Her successors sitting in council and not being a disaster about things works just as well as having her at the head of the organisation.

As far as Cat having lost that battle, I remind you that Cat does not see her death as meaning that she has lost the battle, so long as her objectives are achieved. I suspect she will have a Lord Nelson at Trafalgar moment here, but that the battle will not actually be lost.

Will Cat then take a Gandalf the White moment of spending some time as a wanderer tying up loose ends?

Perhaps she settles the East the hard way as part of the winter break before the push on Keter.

laguz24

I have a theory, you know how the twilight ways can kill revenants, what if they can resurrect cat, or mercy decides to repay the favor and resurrect cat. Also, I was half right with the revenants.

Liliet

NICE

Sinead

It would be interesting if her "scenic route" is revealed in flashback to be her setting up the possibility. At least, I would rather Cat pulling a Magnificent Bastard moment where it was her thinking as soon as Hawk wasn't killed that they were going to get a victory cut short.

Cue Cat's reasoning of "I have both built up systems such that I am not required to make things function (all her successors are gathered to take up her roles), and I may have 1 more trick up my sleeve...."

I wonder if Twilight's "anti Nemeshah" defense will evolve into something more nuanced in the Age of Order? say "against those that are antithesis of the Accords (Revenants would definitely apply). Hell, Since Light kills demons, Twilight gates may be a way to dispose of Hell Eggs.

TheCount

Im not saying Cat survived this.... BUT I belive its another undead goat filled with munitions. with a illusion over it.

Sinead

New thought just occured to me: I wonder if Rumena Tomb-Maker uses the falling water to flood out the lower tunnels and drive out undead assault.

Not so much because I suspect Cat to have predicted the Dead King to have flood them out, but that Rumena has taken the time to think out counters to allies as well as enemy tactics and thus the Firstborn minimise their personal assault. Besides, the drow probably have ways to deal with lakes like this since floods in the Everdark would be extremely dangerous.

Miles

They say the Dead King is supposed to be some kind of genius who leaves no chance for his enemies' victory. Then he drops a lake on the inventors of lakeomancy and a bunch of heroes who've seen it all before and survived, and have been working on how to stop it.

This is almost as bad a move as attacking Keter with only a bunch of Trismegistan sorcerers andno experts

Praneeth Kolichala

Nah, you have to remember that at least some of Cat's legitimacy rests on the fact that she's "never lost a battle."
By using lakeomancy, Cat's "signature" in some sense, you not only cause immense damage (remember at the Battle of the Camps ~10,000 soldiers died despite the Grey Pilgrim shutting it down quickly), but you also draw attention to the fact that Cat was taken out. This will hurt morale, especially among the Army of Callow, and hurt Cat's legitimacy I think.

Sinead

I don't see how the fact that the Alliance wins this battle that Cat dies in (they kind of have to win this or else the Grand Alliance will just fail on so many different fronts) breaks Cat's legitimacy?

Yes she is a warlord, but she has spent the last few years building up the legitimacy of her own that at the very least others can take over those roles.

Lord Nelson died in the Battle on Trafalgar, but is still venerated in British military history.

The risk of the lakeomancy is the crush of water and the underground flooding unless some work was done to allow the city to drain better.

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't think so. Even if the 3 gates are closed immediately, the damages done will be massive, and I doubt it will be the case.

It's difficult to prepare against hundreds of tons of water falling from hundreds of meter. At this point it's just physics, and they don't have the WotW, Cat or Akua to stop it. Maybe Hierophant could destroy the gates, but before he does the city will be devastated.

Sinead

True. I was just thinking of the flooding effect as well as the water hammer.

Also, I am sort of surprised that they would not have anything prepared against this since Cat used it with great effect and we already know Nemeshah learns from his enemies.

I'm not saying this isn't bad. I'm more saying that this isn't "breaking open the city" bad since I really cannot see where this becomes recoverable if the city is lost. That's why I am wondering about having allies having made a practise to planning deal with lakeomancy effects.

It could be that this is instead a fighting retreat through the gate with the gate broken behind them, but we have in text that Procer will fall in a year.

Unless the idea is that the city is broken and everyone flees, while Hanno is successful, which results in Cat coming back to the living surrounded by the dead and then doing her own thing with out a support network while the rest of the Woe come into their own dealing with war.

That would also be something interesting. I just don't see how they withdraw from the city without massive, massive losses that just starts a death spiral. It was clearly spelt out that "If this battle fails, the Drow front fails, the dwarves withdraw, and Procer falls". I really cannot see how we can then have them fail the battle, but still win the war. Unless that sending Hanno away meant that he survives which means he is the White Knight riding back to be the deliverer of victory, which kinda leaves a bad taste in my mouth.

That's why what I expect is that there is a means to deal with the lakeomancy, even if it's just all these systems reacting to the aftermath.

(Sorry for this being a bit jumbled. It's hard when you have a thought intertwined with other thoughts).

Daniel E

The Hawk is certainly earning his pay today. 1 kill (Bezerker), 1 setback (Barrow Sword), and 1 incapacitated (Catherine).

Goibnu

I think everyone seems to be forgetting me forgiveness is jaunting around the battlefield right now and with all she has done I doubt that mercy would leave her gone

Sean

Grey Pilgrim does not have Forgive anymore. Cat tore it out of him to use to restore him back to life.

MadeThisAccountJustForYou \(@MadeThi54U\)

Only in the face? We've seen what she can shrug off in the Arsenal. Cat's gonna be fine. Beyond that, although DK's seen Cat use the lake trick, does he know breaking that trick is old hat for the Pilgrim? We've little reason to believe so. DK thinks he's played Cat but it could be he just lined up thousands of his own binds' heads to go pop

Crash

EE I swear to all the gods if the next chapter is called Epilogue there will be a fucking riot.

Sinead

I am pretty sure that we will see the reactions and responses of the Grand Alliance to this chapter and then the Epilogue will be the set up for the last book.

The last chapter will likely be Flow, as Malicia gets her claws in elsewhere.

Crash

Oh, another Interlude: Flow fella!

Yeah, really want some continuation to this ASAP. Would hate to sit on this absolutely wonderful mess for 2 months haha

Sinead

Think of how Book 4 ended with everything starting to get ready for Book 5, and then it cuts to Cat appearing out going "Ok let's try this again".

That's why I expect Flow to happen as everyone thinks that they have a measure of the events (that is Grand Alliance, Dread Empire, and Mercantis), then have Cat enter stage left. Perhaps she gets a greeting from Nemeshah or Bard, but I would like it they just assume that Cat is gone and don't look for her. This allows Cat to be the knife in the dark for really the first time on this scale.

ByVectron!

I don't think she's dead- multiple times, it was written that "arrows sprouted from their forehead..." when a kill shot is delivered, and the one that hit Cat "...punched through the side of her face."

Liliet

Crows and Akua though?

ByVectron!

I think the theory that the arrow was enchanted, and cut Cats ties to the Darkness, holds water. Side-effect of that would be the severing of the connection to Akua (though she is no longer bound, so this had a little less likelihood?) but the Shades reaction could also have been to the Archmage getting away, and unrelated to the injury.

Liliet

I strongly doubt Akua would SCREAM at the Archmate getting away.

ByVectron!

A scream of dismay is a specific thing, though. And again- Akua is no longer bound to Cat, so she would have no psychic impact from the attack.

Thinking more critically, would she necessarily even have witnessed it? Archer did because she is Named and could not only see the flicker but also identify the arrow for what it was. Akua is neither and she would have been focused on the Archmage.

Great discussion, though.

Liliet

Akua was right next to Cat as I understand.

And it's not about psychic blowback no 😊 plot armor presumption

Does this story actually need Cat? Several readers are pointing out she laid a groundwork for success without her. What if Book 5 is all Interlude? We are assuming she has plot armor and I think that's sloppy. The more creative direction would be for a deconstructed novel where the protagonist died and it didn't really matter, long denouement, 3rd Letter ends Keter and everyone else.

Liliet

Book 7 you mean lol

And no, "this is unusual" does not mean "this is a good idea". The audience is invested in the fate of Catherine Foundling more than in the things she cares about, there'd be a massive reader dropoff should she die.

aran

... wow! I admit I didn't see this one coming.

It looks like Neshamah has taken lessons from how she dealt with the Exiled Prince and gone for Why Don't You Just Shoot Her.

Spirituality Awakening

Amazing Story ... 😊♥

Interlude: Sigil

"Peace is death, stagnation of the soul. Peace is a child closing their eyes to the truth of the world: the great will partake of the small, until they falter and they too are partaken of. Strife is life and death, and there can be no more evil in embracing it than in the act of breathing."

– Extract from the 'Tenets of Night', ancient Firstborn religious text

Rumena waited, patient.

Many of the Mighty were growing restless, eager to seek excellence through strife as the... cattle around them did, but the once-and-again general knew better. The Enemy had sent hordes to batter the walls and the gates, but the Pale Crown was not one to seek triumph through brute strength. The killing knives had yet to be bared. The Mighty studied another of its kind, Mighty Borislava, as it sat on the bare stone of the street with its eyes closed. Night pulsed from it in weak waves, a feat of control considering the strength of the Secret being used. Borislava suddenly breathed out, its silver-pierced face twisting into a smile.

"They are found," Mighty Borislava rasped out. "The tunnels expand too quickly to be dug by hand or pick. The Enemy has brought acid-worms."

Rumena nodded, expressing no displeasure. That worms were not unexpected, though this marked the first instance they were used on any front but Serolen or the Pass. This cattle-city of Hainaut was as jaws of steel, the general had come to suspect, a trap laid for any unwary foot willing to step into it. Soon enough they would begin to feel the bite of those teeth,

"How many breaches?" Rumena asked.

"I have found seven, General," Borislava said. "Five of these along the western shore of the basin."

Reluctantly, it added that it might have missed a few tunnels whilst looking. Good, Rumena would not need to discipline it again. Borislava usually required such a firm hand only every half century or so, and had earned that raspy voice the first time it had allowed its pride to delude it into thinking it might replace Rumena as sigil-holder, but its usefulness in the southern expedition was feeding the pride again. Perhaps the old Firstborn would not need to end it before they reached their fourth century together.

"Zarkan," the general called out, without turning

The rylleh had been still and silent, knowing that even though bearing the title it was the weakest of its rank among the Rumena and should be wary of giving offence. Wise, though lacking in audacity. The mark of one who was to be slain and harvested before it could reach any significant measure of power. Night rewarded the knife that struck, not the knife that waited for the opening.

"Whisper into the Night," Rumena ordered its messenger. "Tell Mighty Jindrich that it is to begin attac-"

The wave rage that roared through the Night staggered them all for a heartbeat. Sve Noc were furious, their earthly forms in the sky above cawing in pain and anger. The general knelt, mastering the feelings not its own, and sent its humble regards above. Its goddesses deigned to answer, sending a flicker of thought: the First Under the Night. face ripped apart by an unnatural arrow. Near dead, though not quite. Already Sve Noc had sent had servant to see to the matter, moving with swift and silent steps, and the Eldest went with it. It was the Youngest, who had ever favoured Rumena and commanded its own affections in return, that bade the old drow to turn its eyes to the sky. Where sorcery made the firmament creak and groan, opening three great gates above the city.

Strike, Komena ordered.

The old drow breathed out, and Night flooded its veins. It filled it to the brim, seeping into the flesh and the organs as Rumena drew on a power it had not deemed worth using in seven hundred years. The Secret of Tolling Wrath was but a mimicry of something the Firstborn had been able to craft at will, ancient engines of destruction that the general had once turned on the unbreakable ranks of the nerezim as their relentless advance broke one city after another, but in the old nights it had taken a company of sorcerers and a Sage to guide them for the ritual-engine to be used. The Tomb-Maker could now do the same with but an exertion of will and power, as if a company of one. The Night vanished from it without warning, as the Secret took its final shape, and Rumena shivered.

It would not be able to call on the Secret twice tonight, it decided. Once had already set its bones to aching.

In the sky above, water had begun to pour from the gates. The Youngest cared not to suffer this affront, so see the wiles of her First Under the Night turned against a city under its protection, and so it had struck as well. The great crow had was growing, turning from a small blot of darkness in the sky to a great nightmare blotting out the stars themselves. It was, Rumena thought, beautiful to behold. And at last the Secret of Tolling Wrath finished shuddering its way through the air, striking the side of one of the gates with a sound like a bell. Power tore at power, tearing at the edge of the sorcerous gate, and it was with amusement that Rumena saw a long beam of Hateful Light spear upwards from somewhere in the city, cutting at the edge of another gate. The Peregrine was a reliable foe even as an ally.

It was after the Light faded that the Youngest Night struck, the great crow's wrath covering the sky as its wingspan streamed with the sea of water she had flown in the way of. Bending under the weight of the water's strength, the great crow raked her talons against the third gate and there was an immediate eruption of power. Rumena's crooked fingers tightened as it saw the Youngest Night tumbled downwards, her shape diminishing until she was simply a crow once more and she began circling above the city once more. There had been something in the gate that had hurt its goddess, the general thought. At least all of the gates were now – another one blinked into existence, Rumena's sharp eyes catching the side where the Peregrine's Light had cut it.

The same gate, not completely destroyed?

Whatever the truth of it, it began pouring water again and the old drow watched as the torrent fell like sea of stones on the Fourth Army of Callow. The shields made by sorcery were not enough, breaking instantly under the impact. Soldiers died, engines were shattered and the repaired gate shuddered. Before the annihilation could be complete, however, the side cut by Light snapped and the gate exploded in burst of sorcery that lit up the sky.

"Mighty One," Zarkan quietly said. "Mighty Jindrich has claimed the right of vanguard and begun assault the tunnels. I have word from other sigils of dead erupting from other places within the city."

"Then whisper this order to all sigils, Mighty Zarkan," Rumena said. "Strike now at the dead, and hold nothing back."

"Chno Sve Noc," Zarkan fervently replied, and others with it.

Rumena the Tomb-Maker did not say more. Instead it walked to a stretch of starlight on stone and softly spoke a word of power, its will reaching for the deepest depths of its shadow where it kept only things it had not meant to see Creation while it still drew breath. Yet it would make an exception, tonight. It would have been arrogance to refrain when its goddesses took the field.

It would put on, one last time, the armaments it had once worn as a general of the Empire Ever Dark.

—

Ivah of the Losara Sigil, Lord of Silent Steps, moved with purpose.

The Eldest Night had sent it to seek its mistress' side with all haste, and so it skimmed along the edges of the Pattern to quicken its pace. It was not a fortress or a fight Ivah found when its steps slowed but instead a house. Masses of water falling from the firmament had devastated swaths of the city, including most of this street, but though Ivah saw fighting on the ramparts to the west there seemed to be no immediate threat here. Instead a fire had been lit inside the house, and Night whispered to the Lord of Silent steps that Losara Queen was within. It rapped knuckles against the door, as was the human way, and only then opened it.

This was no great palace or library, simply a hovel of humans, and so within there was only one room. The lit hearth did not catch its attention, not when instead it saw Losara Queen wan and bloodied on a mattress of straw. By her side sat the shade it knew as the Mighty Akua, though no longer did she have the scent of one who could draw on Night. Curious. The shade did not turn and so Ivah took a step forward, closing the door only to then turn to the sensation of a blade resting against its neck.

"Don't move," the Mighty Archer said, eyes hard. "There'll be no vulture's meal tonight, Ivah."

The Mighty would strike him down without batting an eye, for though human she was admirably ruthless even with long acquaintances, but Ivah shook his head. The edge bit into the throat of its skin, but only shallowly.

"This is not my purpose," Ivah said. "I have been sent by Sve Noc."

The Mighty Akua finally turned towards it, her eyes like golden flames. Its face was not composed as the Lord of Silent Steps had always seen it before. It was... drawn.

"This one's not looking to wet its beak red, Archer," the shade said. "It enjoys its place too much."

The blade moved away slightly and Ivah nodded, pleased to have been properly understood by such a dangerous creature.

"Service to Losara Queen is pleasant and I could not sit her throne," Ivah told the Mighty Archer, slightly embarrassed as it was rather forward of it to speak so plainly. "I seek not Night in this house."

"I would hope not," Mighty Archer smiled. "You wouldn't live through an attempt at harvesting it."

It was always rewarding for Ivah to see others proclaim such loyalty for Losara Queen. To serve an accomplished sigil-holder was rewarding, for who should the Firstborn learn from save the great?

"Can you help?" the Mighty Akua asked. "Hierophant did what he could and I have further slowed the spread, but we've not turned the tide."

"We sent for healers," Mighty Archer quietly said, "but she's in no state to be moved. We can't do shit but wait, at the moment."

"I have no such talent," Ivah of the Losara Sigil said. "This matters not, for I am the tool in the hand of a greater power."

The blade was sheathed, a tacit permission, and Ivah approached the bedside. It unwove the bandages delicately, revealing the deep wound below, and unexpectedly found its heart clenching. Losara had... done much, for Ivah. Opened its eyes to paths that could be tread, raised it to a position of trust and power. It did not please the Lord of Silent Steps to see the sovereign it had once sworn oaths too so harshly hurt. The left side of Losara Queen's face had been torn through by an arrow, ripping through her eye and cheek as well as shattering the chin bone. Not a mortal wound, perhaps, save if the arrow were invested with power. It must have been, for someone had clearly tried to heal the wound with sorcery and it had opened anew since.

"Poison," Mighty Akua said. "It got into the blood. And something more, too. An aspect."

It nodded, closing its eyes and breathing deep.

"I know nothing," Ivah murmured in Crepuscular. "I am nothing. I am a vessel, filled with Night."

Power surged, power beyond Ivah's understanding. The Lord of Silent Steps felt the house around it shudder as the Sve Noc herself came upon it, flowing through the cracks and forming anew on the drow's back as a great crow. Her talons dug into its skin, drawing black blood, and it breathed out raggedly.

"Fuck," Mighty Archer muttered, voice shaken.

The golden-eyed shade stared at the goddess, unmoved.

"Your intentions, godling?" Mighty Akua asked.

"I will see to my chosen," Sve Noc said, voice like the cawing of crows. "Do not think to interfere in this, shade."

"We will trust in your intentions," Mighty Akua smiled, a cold thing. "Trust in ours, Sve Noc, should you overstep."

Ivah swallowed a gasp as talons sunk deeper into its skin, tearing at flesh as a mind infinitely greater than its own moved its hand to rest against Losara Queen's forehead. Night flared, moving into the First Under the Night's body, and knowledge came to the rylleh.

"It is a poison that resist sorcery," Ivah spoke for its goddess. "And it was empowered, as was the arrow, by an aspect."

Night slithered down the veins of the unconscious queen, feeling out the transcendent nature of the wound, and Ivah cocked its head to the side.

"Murder," the Lord of Silent Steps conveyed. "That is the essence of the trouble, the concept that seeks to kill her even now. This 'Hawk' was no servant of the Pale Gods when she still drew breath."

"But you can fix it?" Mighty Archer pressed.

"It can be done," Ivah agreed, bowing to the pressure in its mind. "But it will not be a panacea. The eye is gone for good, and a scar will remain."

"Fuck," Mighty Archer cursed. "Would the Pilgrim do better? He said he couldn't, when he came to pick up Masego, but if we lean on the Ophanim through him..."

"It will make no difference," Ivah regretfully said. "An aspect is an aspect. Sve Noc must see to it now, before the wound worsens, and you are given warning that it will be hours before Losara Queen wakes."

The two humans traded glances, Mighty Archer hesitating.

"Go," Mighty Akua said. "I will stay."

"You sure?" Mighty Archer asked.

"Trust me," the shade replied, wryly smiling.

There was a heartbeat of silence between them, until Mighty Archer nodded.

"I do," she said, sounding almost surprised. "Take care of her, Akua."

The shade went still, and somehow looked pained. Mighty Archer offered them all a hard smile.

"Meanwhile, I'm going to go express my displeasure to the Hawk."

—

Mighty Jindrich picked up the corpse by the throat, idly tossing it down the tunnel.

Its armour clattered as it toppled another few skeletons, the lot of them ending up in a writhing pile. Jindrich advanced on two legs, head slightly bent for the height of the tunnel, and fell upon the pack. One strike was enough to plaster a skeleton into the stone of the wall, another was stomped to dust and out of bored disgust the sigil-holder smashed the last two's heads into each other until both broke.

"Disappointing," Mighty Jindrich said. "There has not been worthy strife since we slew the worms."

"We could head back," Mighty Lasmir said. "Head down another breach, see if there is stiffer resistance there."

Lasmir was still growing back the arm it had lost to the acid spit, having not found enough dead flesh to devour for the Secret of Consumption to truly show its worth. There was a reason Jindrich had never bothered to kill Lasmir for it even before the First Under the Night had decreed that Firstborn of the southern expedition could not slay each other.

"No," the sigil-holder decided. "The Tomb-Maker implied there would be worthy strife, should we push far enough. We will quicken the pace instead."

The rylleh bowed, passing the order down to the rest of the sigil as it had been meant to. The breach they'd forced had been a pleasant fight, but below the cattle-city the dead had seemingly dug a maze of tunnels. Jindrich found the feeling of treading underground stone once more sweet, yet it had found little opposition aside from a continuous flow of skeletons. Even splitting the sigil down several tunnels had not yielded greater prey, but the sigil-holder was wise to the Enemy's ways. Once, a very long time ago, Jindrich of Great Strycht had wielded a pick and dug tunnels for souls it had believed to be wise. Sve Noc had shown it a better path, the true path, but it had not forgot. These tunnels were for moving around, but there would be somewhere further below where the broken stone would be dragged so it could be thrown away instead of clog up tunnels.

There, Mighty Jindrich decided, there would be enemies worth destroying.

Its sigil moved swiftly after the order was given. They ran into undead, a larger battalion standing together – forty dead, armoured and armed – which was a good sign and decent entertainment. Mighty Draha was allowed to use the Secret of Impalement to stick them all in a line before they were smashed into the walls until destroyed. Always good for a laugh. Until then the tunnels had been a slope, but after this they were a sheer drop with an iron ladder going down. Promising, Mighty Jindrich decided, and leapt. It landed atop the helm of a skeleton, crushing it with its weight, and let out an approving noise at what it beheld: a great cavern that was a hive of tunnels, swarming with corpses and dead stitched-up monsters. Even a few of the Greater Dead, these who had been Named in life, if its eyes were not being fooled.

The sigil-holder smiled, power thrumming in its flesh as it began to let it loose.

"You will be Night," Mighty Jindrich promised.

"You trespass on the realm of the dead," a voice replied. "And so will join them."

A tall silhouette, in heavy armour and bearing a large morningstar, strode forward.

"You are the one they call Mantle, yes?" Jindrich grinned.

The Greater Dead spoke not a word, but the sudden darkness not even Mighty could see through was answer enough. Mighty Jindrich laughed, letting Night rip through it and rent its body asunder before reforming it with a shell of Night.

Finally, strife worth having.

—

The lamellar of steel and obsidian still fit as it had when Rumema had been young, tightened at the hip with a belt, and the red-plumed helmet was still comfortable around its long pale hair. The marks of the ancient honours bestowed on it under the Empire Ever Dark, that of Great General Who Shook The World and Victorious Commander of the South, each claimed a shoulder with twisted braids of gold and iron. And at General Rumena's hip, the long single-edged sword of steel it had once borne into battle rested comfortably. Waiting, eager to be used at last after all this time. Sighing, the old drow straightened its back and heard it crack as if someone were treading on twigs. It popped its shoulders, loosening them, and only then did it lay a hand on the pommel of its sword.

"Mighty Borislava," the general said.

"I listen, Mighty One," Borislava cautiously said.

None of Rumena's sigil had ever seen it wear the armour. It had even the strongest of its rylleh feeling... cautious. A refreshing feeling, it would admit.

"You are to command the sigil in my absence," Rumena said. "Look for breaches and settle them, ensure the cattle are not overwhelmed."

"It will be done, Mighty One," the other drow replied. "If this one may enquire, what is it the Mighty One intends?"

Rumena's fingers tightened around its sword, and slowly it unsheathed the blade.

"Do you know why they call me the Tomb-Maker, child?" the general said.

"The tale is well-known, Mighty One," the Mighty said. "You slew many a sigil, in your pursuit of Mighty Kurosiv's end."

"The truth is older than that," Rumena chuckled. "Ysengral, I am told, meant it as a compliment."

And it flicked the blade downward, not to cut but as the focus of its will as it called on the Secret of Stone. The stone below its feet parted like a receding tide, and General Rumena walked into the earth. It closed behind its footsteps, a sealed tomb, and with a hunter's smile the Tomb-Maker burrowed deep into the earth. It felt the first tunnel within moments, moving to emerge into it and stumbling into a heated strife between dzulu and corpses. Rumena wasted no time, heading to the fore and closing the tunnel behind it with a glance. Slapping the head off the nearest skeleton, it walked back into the earth after closing the rest of the visible tunnel on the dead with a flick of its sword. The dead had dug beneath the city like ants, and now were crawling like them.

Rumena was not above stepping on the likes of them.

It wove between tunnels, closing them and burying the dead wherever it passed, until it reached a tunnel where some enchanted spikes digging into the earth resisted its will and kept it from moving the nearby stone. Unimpressed, Rumena seized the stone at the edge of the sorcery's range and moved the spikes close to the surface by indirect pressure before collapsing the tunnel. It took the time to clear the western side of the shore before moving further down, finding sheer drops leading into a large cavern where a sigil had already arrived. The fighting was heavy and the general recognized the enraged roars, having shared a city with Mighty Jindrich for some years once upon a time. It was far gone, to be this loud.

Rumena landed softly on the floor, knees creaking, and eyes the deep darkness around it with irritation. Some Greater Dead was playing a trick. The Mantle, yes? Losara had spoken of her. This war would be well rid of her continued presence. The general sped forward, knowing the darkness would be fixed in range, yet it died before the old drow even reached the edge. Unimpressed, it leapt over Jindrich – now the size of a house, half an insect and killing even its own sigil when it strayed too close – and swept a wave of blackflame through the throng of corpses on the upper floors where javelineers were massing. They went up like dried leaves, though the use of Night caught Jindrich's attention. It struck out with a long, articulated leg but Rumena only sighed and caught the end of it. It shifted its footing, tossing the other Mighty deeper into the enemy ranks.

That ought to keep it busy for a while.

Streaks of black smoke snaked along the ground towards the general, leading back to an armoured silhouette it decided must be the Mantle. Some middling thing with a helmet looking like a hound charged at it as well, a sword and shield in hand.

Disinclined to play, Rumena sunk into the stone instead of moving out of the way. Cursed spike went into the floor not long after, but it was already moving and too deep below besides. The cavern seemed to a major outpost for the dead, the source feeding all the breaches to the west of the city's great basin. Clearing it out in a single stroke ought to end the better part of that offensive in its tracks. Slowing its heartbeat the old general sunk deep into the Night and let the Secret of Stone settle at the heart of its soul.

Slowly, carefully, it began to sink Night into the bedrock beneath this city of Hainaut. As it did, extending fingers outwards, a greater force reached out and clasped its hand. The Youngest Night, talons puncturing skin even when the touch was meant to be tender, touched the general's soul. She was wroth, and her anger was cold ruin inflicted unto the world: her hands guided its own, her eyes seeing beyond the reach of what any mortal might, and together they made for the Enemy an answer. Tunnels moved, closing and then weaving themselves anew as an intricate web leading to the five great caverns dug far beneath the city. And then, one by one, the two of them bound the ends of the web to the bottom of le Bassin Gris, the great water basin at the heart of Hainaut.

Water began to pour, and with panting breath Rumena leaned against stone as it felt Komena begin to withdraw from it. Begin and then stop. No, the Tomb-Maker realized with dread, not stop.

Fail.

—

Ivah of the Losara Sigil went still, as two goddesses screamed and the city shook.

It had found the waterside, returning to its sigil after the Eldest Night had ended her use of its body for the mending of Losara Queen, but the once-still waters were now as a sea taken by a violent storm. And the ground shaking had not ceased, as if some titan was hammering at the city from below with desperate strength. It turned to the terrified drow looking at it for answers, knowing it had none save for the furious howling of the goddesses in its mind.

"Disperse," Ivah ordered the sigil. "Survive."

They scattered to the winds. The Lord of Silent Steps could afford to spare them no more thought, for now the attention of its goddess was once more hammering at its mind. The rylleh stumbled forward, ending up on its knees by the shore of the basin. The waters were not only roiling, it realized with distant horror, but lowering. As if emptying. Before the revelation could sink in, talons punctured Ivah's shoulders once more and the Eldest Night screeched in its ears. The wrath that bled into its mind made the world go white and brought it to the brink of unconsciousness, until those sharp talons brought it back with sharp pain. Service is required of you, Ivah of the Losara, a voice whispered into its soul. And though the talons were sharp, the voice was... cool. Soothing. A companion that Ivah had kept all its life without ever knowing it.

"We are born under Night," Ivah murmured. "We die under the Night. All that I am belongs to it."

The answer pleased the goddess. The pain of talons was fading, replaced with a pleasant coolness instead. Power intertwined with Ivah's own, like a sea pouring into a lake. And the binding was deep, so deep that the Lord of Silent Steps... glimpsed. There was another crow, trapped deep below in a cage of curses and spells. Bound to the Tomb-Maker, the Youngest Night was striking at her surroundings with impotent fury. And though the plateau shook, it did not shatter. And looking closer, Ivah saw... hooks. Someone was binding the crow, containing it. Its mind was wrenched away from the sight forcefully, made to look upon the power being poured into its frame. Veiled Gods, so much Night. More than a hundred lifetimes would have let it win.

"Why?" Ivah croaked out. "It is... it is too much."

Footsteps sounded behind it, but it was too exhausted to move. It felt as if eve twitching a finger would be enough to kill it, and still the Night would not cease pouring into it. A shape formed before it, a drow with silver eyes and ornate robes. It – no, she – bore a silver mask at her hip.

"You come at an inauspicious time," Andronike said. "Return when we are less occupied."

"One of you was caught."

The voice of an old man. The Peregrine.

"It will be dealt with," the Eldest Night said.

"Then why are you cramming your godhead into this one?"

A younger voice, calm but curious. The Hierophant. The Eldest Night did not answer.

"The Dead King is usurping the Night," the Peregrine said. "Of that, the Ophanim are certain. You are losing."

"If our First Under the Night was awake, it would not be so," the Eldest Night furiously replied.

"Your weakness exists regardless of Catherine," the Hierophant evenly said. "Do not blame others for your shortcomings."

Ivah felt a sudden surge of mind-shattering pain, the Night's flow into its body flowing, and it let out a hoarse scream. It was... Night was being pulled at from another side, through the other crow.

"He has his hooks in you," the Peregrine harshly said. "This can no longer be allowed. If he devours your power whole, it means our annihilation."

"We are," the Eldest Night said, sounding pained, "still fighting. The strife has not yet come to an end."

"We cannot allow him to devour you," the Peregrine said, voice gone eerily calm. "You know this. Better to end Night than that."

"You would kill them all," Andronike hissed.

"No," the Hierophant said. "There is another way. One that leaves enough they will live, if only as mortals. And with what you have put aside in this one, you will still be goddesses as well."

"Paltry things," the Eldest Night said. "Remnants."

"Time," the Peregrine softly said, "is running out."

There was a long silence, and in its soul Ivah of the Losara felt goddesses speak words only they could understand. Eyes closed, it saw the truth of things: a crown of obsidian, skeletal fingers wrapping around it.

"Do it," Sve Noc spoke as one, and offered up a hand.

A dark-skinned finger was laid against it.

"Ruin," the Hierophant said, and Creation obeyed.

Night broke, and the city broke with it.

TeK

Peace death...

Unrecovered

Your bunny wrote...

ruduen

Oof. In the grand scope of things, that's going to be costly. Still, that's what happens when you bring out the bigger weapons – you grant the story and the enemy permission to use bigger retaliations.

At least the fact that they were decisive about the act should reduce the fallout to something costly but bearable, rather than something completely catastrophic.

It's also good to have confirmation that Cat's not completely out of the game yet. Being wounded and in a rough state does mean story-wise, she's in a good position to get back up when things get to their worst. Still, the city itself is more and more subject to problems. I wonder how much of a city there'll be by the time everything's done, and if what's left can be reasonably defended. By now, it's looking like there'll be a need for something beyond mundane rebuilding to keep things intact.

Finally, go boost/vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Tenthyr

Oh wow this actually managed to get worse. I didn't expect the dead king to break the night to his will so quickly.

tithin

from what I'm gathering, he's not breaking it to his will, he's draining them of their power source completely.

basically, they'd still be gods when he's done, they'd just have absolutely no juice left to them at all

Liliet

Same thing: draining isn't that easy. Sve Noc did not manage to easily and quickly digest Winter when they shook it out of Cat.

Adrian_V

All this talk of swallow and diges....now i have the image of they sh!tting winter away or the parts not wanted xD

Morgenstern

So, did the other Crown enable him to try and usurp this one as well? That's an unforeseen consequence then, a costly mistake it would seem, of the Woe giving him the Crown as a trap... Hmmm... Gonna be interesting.

Morgenstern

Oh, right... the Crown was empty of a pool of power... he's now just trying to get back the power pool from Winter that was stolen by Night... oh dear.

That Other Guy

When does Neshamah bust out what Skein stole from Masego when he was the Apprentice?

Liliet

> what Skein stole from Masego when he was the Apprentice?

.....Masego had not met Skein when he was the Apprentice

WuseMajor

I mean, he's presumably been working on that for several years now. I wouldn't call it quick.

NerfContessa

Well,. That was entirely unexpected this early.
I thought he would pull out the big urwupation once they were closer to. Keter...
And fuck, they will be less than a 10th of what they were,.
And. The firstborn will become entirely mortal.

Shiittee....

Tom Thompson

Anyone else really hope that Cat leans into the grizzled veteran mold and gets an eyepatch after this?

DJ

Between the birds and the eye, I feel like she'll have a permanent Odin cosplay going.

Liliet

Cosplay?

-suggestive eyebrow wiggle-

Sinead

I had a really neat thought of wondering if she buried Zombie III in Twilight.

Odinn used Slepnir to travel across all of the 9 Worlds.

What do you use a faerie hourse that is native to the plane of travellers for?

Basically, I want Cat to have her horse back with the ability to literally run into Twilight.

Also complete crack theory on Odinn parallels....

My understanding of the general reason for Ragnorok and the fall of the Aesir is that promises were broken by the gods, which allowed for all bonds to fail.

If Cat is trying to bind the continent/Game of the Gods under such a rule, she may have Nemeshah and/or the Elves playing Fenrir to her own role as forces that are bound away, but will retaliate if her own balanced system ever destabilises. I could see that her putting this much effort into the system will bind her to it, as I do not expect her to die, just go dormant. Less a sentient Name of the Wandering Bard and more just a battered woman ever bound by her own desire to maintain the peace and keep people safe putting out the bigger fires.

The reason I chuck the Elves in here is because I suspect that their own play for the Spring Crown, and their general aloofness from everything is going to bite them in the ass, and they will write themselves out of this new world that Cat is building simply by not engaging with the system. And I could see that the same way that Nemeshah is one of Below's biggest players while Below doesn't care for him anymore (he doesn't do what he is supposed to do) that the Elves are like that for Above.

naturalnuke

Even if not intentional it just proves nothing is original. History rhymes, as they say.

Lord Reginald

Let's not forget the staff, cloak & penchant for insulting people who take themselves too seriously. Really all she needs is a beard and to graft a couple extral legs onto her next Zombie to complete the look.

Sinead

Hmmmm....I'm going to have to see how this unfolds before I decide how I feel about this. I don't like the idea of breaking a cultural ziegst like this, especially if it will actually kill people.

I get that this is a war on Death, but there are things about breaking icons that matter in terms of symbols in wars like this that would be much more literal here.

If loyalty matters in the current Firstborn metaphysics, and the shift in the sigil system to encourage such loyalty matters, than perhaps Sve Noc can outgrow this weakness that has arisen.

It doesn't make this moment easier.

Here's hoping that Runmera can collect interest and make good on its promise to tear down the walls of Keter. That will be it's finest work: crafting the tomb of Nemeshah as repayment for this.

Hitogami

It's not easy, but have you noticed that a lot of what happens in this story is that great power gets discarded or used up and it leads to something better. At the moment Cat and Vivienne both discarded their Names and are doing more now than when they had them.

ruduen

Amusingly enough, in the grand scheme of things, Night's actually been hitting its limits. Remember, the war's going poorly for the drow because of Night-specific counters. While it's still a hit to their overall power, they're losing something that was losing effectiveness in the context of the war.

The overall shift that might result will really depend on what replaces it, if anything. And even if they're brought down to the level of the other races... Well, the other races have managed so far. It's just a matter of how quickly they can rally and adapt.

beleester

"If your powers are lost, they will always come back stronger than before upon learning the appropriate moral lesson."

DoccuDesu

That only works for Heroes and those aligned with Above though, not anyone with ties to Below

matesbe

I mean, it's worked for Cat... like 3 times by now.

NerfContessa

See above.

^^

Sinead

That's true, and I do keep that in mind. I am hopeful about the evolution of the Tenents of Night meaning that there is a rebirth for the drow.

I think part of my issue is that the drow front was failing with the Night under constant onslaught, and the dwarves were looking at abandoning their part in this war.

What will give the drow their respite here? That's what I have a hard time seeing.

I also just liked Night as a concept, and hope that perhaps it can return in some form.

Aston Whiteman

Cat loses night, regains new power. No longer evil..

All according to plan...

erebus42

I hope she doesn't end up with some heroic name or some shit. I know it seems unlikely given who she is and the ideological/philosophical temperament usually required, not to mention that it would fuck shit up much more royally than it already is. I just always hated it that Wildbow did that.

shikkarasu

I feel like the Gods Above giving Cat any power would work like that time Rumena gave her a literal lift to Sve Noc: she'd try to strangle them at every opportunity. Even if she has less than no hope of succeeding, even if it means dying powerless in a cave forgotten by the world. It's the principle, you understand.

Liliet

Cat has gone on an inner monologue before about how that's a losing approach and you gotta breathe in breathe out and go for a victory for EVERYONE, and how Amadeus was wrong in just this way (even though Amadeus thinks this way now too rip)

Liliet

Everyone's going to close their eyes and pretend that's some very Evil Light Cat's slinging about. They still need a villainous representative!...

Matthew Wells

"Oh no! She's conned a Choir again! Do her nefarious plans know no end?!"

Crash

watch catherine get a villainous game and pull this shit anyway lmao

TeK

So she finally went full Odin mode, it's been a long time coming.

Big Brother

He did give up his left eye for wisdom, didn't he?

Necarion

Half the Night of the world, to save the world.

tithin

She does share certain characteristics with Mat.

Juff

Typo Thread:

bare stone > bare stone
That worms > The worms
those teeth, > those teeth.
wave rage > wave of rage had servant > a servant
crow had was > crow was tumbled downwards > tumble downwards fell like sea > fell like a sea in burst > in a burst begun assault > begun assaulting Silent steps that > Silent Steps that strike him down > strike it down
Ivah shook his head > Ivah shook its head dust and out > dust, and out rent its body > rend its body eyes the deep > eyed the deep Cursed spike went > Cursed spikes went eve twitching > even twitching

tithin

I kinda saw this coming a long time ago. It's grim that it came to this.

I hope they pull a victory through this, but at this point, there's not a lot out there that will save them.

Anyway, here's the white knight

Insanenoodlyguy

That's why they are going to win. The darkest out, her trump card played, near mortally wounded... Cat's about to get her name.

Hitogami

Wow! That's crazy! This whole chapter is totally crazy! So I'm assuming that it's possible for them to regain the Night by harvesting it from defeated foes, but it will take ages to restock.

mamm0nn

I think the act of harvesting is an extension of Sve Noc's deal turned godhood, so I don't think they'll have that ability either after this.

Liliet

They'll still be goddesses though, Masego says so.

shikkarasu

I think they lose Night and Winter as Domains/Demesnes. Hence the whole "existing as remnants" thing. They would be gods, but they might even be below Winter! Cat in raw power.

Liliet

as I understand they will still have... what's left of Night (there's no Winter as a separate domain, it was subsumed by Night). It just won't be a lot.

agumentic

To borrow from Masego's terminology, I imagine they will have the "crown/pool" of their godhood left, but the "water" of power in it is going to be almost entirely drained. I guess it's as good chance as any to fill it with something other than murder and Winter, which is almost a tautology.

Liliet

I got the impression it's also going to be somewhat, ah... damaged itself. It might not be able to HOLD as much power as it used to. And there's no guarantee it's even capable of accepting power that is not its own – Winter was pretty close to Night in many properties, and it was still a tough swallow.

agumentic

Hard to say right now, really. As I think was mentioned here before, in Catherine's view Ruin brings things to the very edge of breaking, but not over it. How exactly that translates into the use of Ruin now and the exact consequences of it is anyone's guess.

Sinead

If godhood is the trick of perspective, and the power is through what is offered to them (think of prayer and sacrifice giving them power), then perhaps this may be where you start to see the Tenants of Night evolve into something adaptable to all converts, such that the Crows actually gain power and influence from the small offerings of the Callowans and the goblins as well.

Sacrifice willingly give, especially in many small offerings could probably be absorbed easily, and probably prompt some expansion of role.

It's a gradual change though. So less a thing easily seen in the current war, but perhaps a means for Sve Noc to heal in the time after this war.

Liliet

Yeah, I'm still not seeing why anyone thinks Tenets of Night are ever going to stop being an ethnoreligion. Their entire point is being the drow thing, the thing about the drow, for drow and to let drow survive.

Xinci

Hm yeah this was rather inevitable given the DK's progress and Sve Noc's framework. Usurpation was their weakness and they were maladaptive for a environment where they had to contest multiple competitors due to their lack of safeguards.

This will possibly have rather costly impacts on their organizational structure, though perhaps it will be positive in the end for getting out bad actors like Kurosiv. As while the Drow's reduced lifespan may mean while they hold even less direct influence, this also means more cooperative behaviors may be incentivized due to murder being less useful and malefactors not living as long due to lifespan. Not without a greater cost to themselves anyway, it is also entirely possible that due to them being weakened like this and Iva being the strongest font they have now, that Kurosiv will try and usurp them either after the war or relatively soon.

Frivolous

Xinci: I'm afraid that usurpation by Kurosiv is no longer the worst case scenario where the Empire Ever Dark is concerned.

Note that drow have to be aware that Keter has perfected its answers to Night. The drow also have to be aware that Sve Noc nearly got usurped by Keter.

They must conclude that Keter is greater, mightier, than Sve Noc, yes?

The greatest danger therefore is that drow will attempt to betray the Empire Ever Dark and go over to Keter's side.

Kurosiv is only the Mighty most likely to do so. There will probably be others who also decide that treason and betrayal (and living) are better than continuing to fight on behalf of a losing side, especially when the enemy, Keter, has demonstrated its ability to kill drow very efficiently.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Drow will never betray Sve Noc for Keter, even Kurosiv. They are not stupid and know perfectly well that the DK doesn't want living servants (except for the Serenity) when he can have dead ones. He would usurp the Night instead of subjugating the Drow, killing them.

I can perfectly see Kurosiv betraying his goddess, but not to someone who will assuredly kill him. No one is going to betray the GA for the DK.

Frivolous

Konstantin: What about discreet neutrality aka running away then?

I'm not sure I agree with you that Kurosiv et al won't actively betray the Empire Ever Dark, but he might passively do so by scampering away from the war.

Now that Sve Noc has diminished, I am not sure they are still omniscient as far as the drow are concerned, or that they can still effectively punish Kurosiv.

Liliet

Where the fuck would drow run? Their entire problem was that they were boxed in and needed to win territory from the DK in order to have somewhere to live.

At the moment in the north they're defending their home.

Shveiran

Eh. Could the Langevins have afforded the drow taking offence at their plotted backstabbing? not really, but some people are just myopic assholes.

I'm not sure it will happen, but I think it's very possible Kurosiv will walk away from the battlefield and Sve Noc's oversight and just take his chances that he can deal with the rest.

With a bird eye's view, it doesn't work, but that is always not apparent to those in the thick of it.

Liliet

True enough RIP

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't know. Kurosiv (as a general) has to be aware that without the GA the EED can't win, and that fleeing en masse from the front is a temporary salvation.

edrey

did winter and night got divided? or komena is dead, i am open to options so its too much to ask that cat return at the darkest hour. that story would fit here.

Jason Ispwitch

Night has been Ruined by Masego, along with most of Sve Noc's godhood. Exactly what that means... I don't think we know. What knowledge and power individual drow will retain doesn't seem clear to me. But if it's not at least a good part of what they were Rumena and others are toast, unless Sve Noc can still miracle some rescue up.

Miley

Drow will finally be able to watch the sun rise.

Adrian_V

I KNEW IT!!!

It was a grazing hit (i know its not the right word but it was really late at night and i couldn't think straight xD), like when a person receives a bullet to the head and survives or even has something large trust into, like an accidental lobotomy.....

Mmm so Cat has/had 2 crows on her shoulders, and now lost 1 eye..... anyone can think of an Odin related title that could be her name?

Also that ending: HOLY SHIT!!!

Maybe her nae will manifest as a way to save the Drfow too, she has come to like them a lot.

Matthew Wells

All-Mother.

Black Spiral Dancer

The drow will eventually become vikings, with gods that hunger for blood (and that have abandoned them, so to speak), while Cat shall become their All-mother. Fitting.

Burlyraven

Well, I didn't think it'd be the whole damn thing, but I did call that the Sister's were gambling like mad risking half of the Night. That's just asking for punishment.

Weirdly, though, this might even be a best case scenario. The Night is a massive loss, yes, but it's such a massive loss that it might have eaten up most of the consequences of Cat going into her Story perscribed inconvenient incapacitation. Probably a few thousand more soldiers die (which Cat is going to flog herself over), but I think the only major characters that are at risk from this point on are the ones that aren't Named.

Typing that did make me realize that the 4th got the brunt of the water, and I'm now dreading the thought that Pickler and/or Robber might be dead, though.

TeK

Nay, no important characters death, not yet. Pickler has a lease on life at least until she can rry her mind on Keter walls, and Robber is supposed to die in the pyre of glory and stabbing and fire and corpses, which I guess also means Keter. The point is, they don't have narrative reason to die as of yet. You are probably right that most of the consequences had been nullified by the loss of Night. In fact, it just made the situation dire, as Saint once put it "the enemy on the gates, her people in peril, in the direst moment she will rise from her slumber and save them. It's not a Villain's story and I don't like it."

Liliet

Actually now that you're saying that, that's a little like saying lke "no, he cannot die yet, he needs to see his family after this when he retires the next day". I'm not saying DEATH FLAGS DOOM AND GLOOM but it wouldn't completely miss the mark tonally for Pickler and Robber to die here.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think one or the other has a good chance of being dead, but not both. Probably Pickler, Robber is already acting like he has a death wish at times so naturally he'll survive.

Liliet

Both or neither, otherwise it's too sad)=

Frivolous

So very glad Catherine lives. Such a relief.

I feel smug over my comment in Tribulation. I predicted this or something like this would happen. I didn't expect it to happen so soon, though.

=====

This chapter strongly delineates the limits of Night and of Sve Noc. Sve Noc and the drow don't seem to have any resources besides Night. That's a terrible weakness. No versatility.

I think that, if Sve Noc has any foresight at all, they must mull over the necessity of diversifying their portfolio, so to speak. They need to learn to do other things besides Night. If they don't, sooner or later they're doomed.

=====

I think there is huge favorable coincidence in that Catherine released Akua from all bindings, including connection to Night, right before Night got itself half-usurped.

I don't know what that means yet, but I think it's important.

mamm0nn

Night is the Below version of Light and it's very versatile in what it is both intrinsically and in options, so it was hardly too limited. It's like saying that only using steel is too limited, ignoring in how many forms of armour and weapons it comes.

It is more theme than others, sure, but it was hardly too much a singular gimmick. The issue lied in that it was too potent yet one-note.

Frivolous

mamm0nn: I'm not sure I can really agree that Night is the Below version of Light, at least not in the context you are using.

Night belongs solely to Sve Noc and the drow and Catherine; no other entity of Evil uses it.

Keter almost succeeded in usurping Night, and that brought down Sve Noc and the drow.

In contrast, Light and steel are ubiquitous. The only person I've seen who usurped Light was the Fallen Monk, and that imperfectly, in that Catherine believed that a Choir would easily destroy the Fallen Monk.

mamm0nn

We've been told several times by several people that Night seems to be a mirror or evil mimicry of Light, though. Sure, it's not the intrinsic cornerstone that Light is, but it's still a mirror copy, it seems.

Konstantin von Karstein

Below has no equivalent to Light. Night was created by Sve Noc and can only be used by Drows except for exceptions like the FUN. It also is an integral part of the Drow body/soul.

Light was created by Above, and only priests and Heroes can wield it. It's not a part of every human's soul.

There's similarities between the 2, but in a direct fight Light always win against Night. If it was created by Below, I think it would be equal.

Liliet

It was technically created by Below, though by Komena and Andronike's blueprints. Below wasn't producing it as an answer to Light though, only as an answer to their plea.

caoimhinh

To be fair, Night is one of the most versatile things shown as of yet. It's a lot like sorcery and a bit like Light. The Drown can do practically anything with Night.

Messing with Night is like creating a field where no magic or no Light is usable, it's extremely hard to do, and it's only because it is Neshamah that such a thing is possible.

It's still weird how the Dead King pulled this off, since it was a trap laid underground in a grand array, which means that he must have needed to predict one of the Sisters to go underground in person in order to set this. This working must have required preparations, materials, and so on for the ritual to be carried out and Neshamah's attempt at usurping Night to be done.

If this was done in the northern front, where Sve Noc is actively fighting, it would make more sense than in Hainaut, and it seems like too complex a trap to have been set only by mere chance.

Insanenoodlyguy

Which is why he put it in the big invasion hub. Shutting this place down would be a good strategic move, that'd also need a lot of mojo behind it, meaning cat or one of the mighty would need to be down there with some serious mojo. I don't think it had to be the goddess herself in person so much as enough night saturating the area, since all of it connects to her.. Dead King meticulously arranged this trap..

Shveiran

I think the set-up was elegantly simple: he brought in the acid worms, a powerful asset that could create breaches in the defenses and lead to collapse. A legitimate threat that was underground in nature.

What was the GA going to check it with, surface Fantassins or underground Firstborn?

After that, it was just a matter of making the threat big enough that Sve Noch herself was going to be personally involved.

As I was reading, I'll admit this seemed a bit far-fetched. Like, "how could Neshamah have predicted that" or "this all rests on teh Sisters getting mad someone almost killed Cat and I refuse to believe Keter can accomplish that with any reliability, or they would have already crossed her off". But now that I'm thinking about it... the Dead King didn't really need that, did he? He just read the forces in motion the right way.

Big underground threat, the underground response team will come in. If they are facing annihilation, which can feasibly be organized, the Sisters will get involved.

Liliet

Note that every single step of the setup was a good move on its own. Offing Cat would be best, but if he can't temporarily incapacitating her is excellent too. An underground invasion is an obvious move that loses him nothing and can potentially win him a lot. Etc. Anti-Night trap might have worked against a lesser amount of Night too, if not quite as effectively, and even if it couldn't – for all we know DK has been mounting that at every major battlefield that he's had enough time to prepare for, this is just the first time it triggered.

ByVectron!

I should have read Liliet before posting my reply...

Liliet

Meh, the power of the hivemind is amplified if everyone posts the same thing 9.9

ByVectron!

To add to this- there is no reason Nessie couldn't have been setting these traps for a while, and it just happens that this is the one we saw because it finally got sprung. He's got the time and resources, presumably, so he could have a number of these scattered assertions that we've never seen because the conditions to the weren't right.

Miley

Is every chapter going to have yet another reason why cutting the shade loose is the pivot that made them survive this battle? I assume the crowd are shielding Cat but Ubuah wouldn't have been so lucky.

Miley

Crows

erebus42

That's a shame, I rather enjoyed the inclusion of Night and the Mighty into the dynamics of things.

Insanenoodlyguy

Just because they no longer have night doesn't mean they will be impotent. They'll just be taking their evolution in a new direction.

WealthyAardvark

If Rumena doesn't die of old age immediately (perhaps unlikely considering Black's condition after losing his Name), it's still in a Tomb of its own making. Hopefully Sve Noc can still provide it with the power to get out before it suffocates in there.

Frivolous

I think Keter baited Sve Noc into a trap. My reasons:

The spell or whatever that drove hooks into Komana and permitted Night to be usurped could not, I think, have been used as effectively on any regular drow, or at a significant distance. It had to be used on either Andronike and/or Komana in person for it to be useful.

I think if the method could have been used on a regular drow, but then Sve Noc would have stopped it by killing the drow subject, and then Sve Noc would have been forewarned.

To that end, I believe it was made clear to Sve Noc that Keter had perfected its answers to Night. This caused Sve Noc to put half their eggs, invest half of their godhood, in the current Battle of Hainaut. Which in turn led to this chapter.

Basically it was an ambush and kidnap scheme, on a divine level.

In other news: More Woe mutilation shenanigans. Masego lost his sorcery. Vivienne lost her Name but is otherwise pristine. Hakram is at around 1/3rd the orc he used to be. Indrani got her brains exploded, though she got better.

Catherine of course is the worst, dying over and over again, and now she's lost an eye Odin-style.

Oh well. She can probably get a prosthetic eye to replace it. Masego already has 2 prosthetic eyes. He'll probably design an eye that allows her to see magic and shoot laser beams.

Matthew Wells

Nah, it'll have auto-scry to complete the Odin parallels.

roseocean2012

Mad-Eye Foundling?

mamm0nn

Okay, laser-eye actually sounds pretty neat. Let's do it.

TeK

Hasta la vista, Keter

Thanatoss

I would prefer eye like Masego, see through solid stuff all around.

But well lasers are nice too I guess.

What if her empty eye socket will be some kind of conduit for her new aspect? Hmm, no, probably prosthetic

caoimhinh

Damn.

Liliet

ikr??????

SO GOOD

mamm0nn

Cat, the moment she wakes up: "Okay, who said that this couldn't possibly get any worse!?! WHO DID IT?"

Liliet

asdjfhaskdjfhak;sdfhlakjsdfhslk Cat is Odin confirmed

hmmm I called 1 out of 2

Cat is not dead, but we DID find out immediately

Black Spiral Dancer

LOL, did anyone truly said Cat WAS dead?

Liliet

I did

Sinead

Eh. Old One Eye sacrificed himself to himself, and based on descriptions it's hard to tell if it's actually a death or near death experience. There isn't a huge different between comatose like this and being dead as far as "journey to the underworld" themes go. It's It's all wibbly wobblily deathy-wethy jumble of concepts.

I was wondering if this was going to put Cat back as a manifestation aspect binding her to rules like the Wandering Bard with teleportation to Nowhere. That would make her out Gandalf Tariq.

Liliet

n i c e

Sinead

Fortunately, Cat will end up with a different reflection of the Wandering Bard, which is fine. Intercessor seems overly bound for what would be interesting to have as a character perspective anyways.

I hope she gets her horse back though and just has the dash out into the Twilight.

SpeckofStardust

I thought your other statement was that cat planned for an arrow to the head, not that it was a death.

Liliet

oh we still don't know about whether she planned for it

Sinead

You might be thinking of my comments.

I was thinking Cat had figured that she was actually the less needed individual as far as the systems she has built were concerned, so she made herself a big glowing target for Keter to shoot.

laguz24

Crap, the drow front is about to go to shit at this point, also, what's left of the city at this point? It has been lakeomancied, tunneled under, and assaulted by the scourges. Exactly how many people are left at this point?

Insanenoodlyguy

That assumes cat doesn't wake up with a new mojo. Remember how Black could use an aspect that affected the entire group he led? I wouldn't be shocked if, still having a connection to the goddess of a race, that Cat wakes up with something that keeps the Drow fighting.

Unrecovered

It's getting worse and worse. Waiting for Hanno to save the day.

Sinead

That would legitimately piss me off and actually drive me to embrace Amadeus' Madman speech.

Let Cat have this dammit!

Matthew Wells

Team Hanno should, however, show up an hour later out of breath.

Frivolous

Sve Noc should count themselves lucky that Tariq and the Ophanim didn't decide to just kill them all at their moment of weakness.

I mean, if not for the Alliance and war on Keter and their desire to retain the goodwill of Catherine, who still lives, this would be doubtless be a great time for Mercy to ease suffering by murdering the goddesses of theft and murder, yes?

Also, I'm blackly amused by this chapter being a dark mirror to Melancholy. In Melancholy, Sve Noc offered Night to Masego to compensate for his loss of sorcery, and Masego refused.

In Interlude: Sigil, Masego offered Ruin to Sve Noc to prevent them from completing losing both Night and godhood, and Sve Noc accepted.

I bet the Gods Below are laughing their Evil guts out at this reversal.

Liliet

> a great time for Mercy to ease suffering by murdering the goddesses of theft and murder, yes?

I actually honestly don't think so? They're important to their people, their destruction would cause far more suffering (for drow) than it would ease overall unless you count genocide as easing suffering because now all these unborn children will never live to ever experience suffering at all (and that is not how Mercy counts, no).

Insanenoodlyguy

Total sum reduction. The drow certainly wouldn't be happy. But everybody now safe from the god of murder and theft's followers and their tendency to "collect" from others, probably a lot happier.

It's the path that Sve Noc would have gone down if she hadn't gotten herself a First Under the Night, her original plan was to just start eating other large power sources and I really doubt she'd have introduced a lot of reforms in her people. Killing all the drow with their Goddess becomes a feature of defeating the load bearing boss at that point, not an unwanted consequence.

Liliet

if she hadnt gotten herself a First Under The Night she would have never left the Everdark drow's presence on this front in the first place is a function of Catherine introducing them to positive sum games

Insanenoodlyguy

I was thinking more like the path where she just killed Cat after taking Winter.

Liliet

oh I mean in that scenario lmao yes

Praneeth Kolichala

Yeah, I think you have a wrong read on what Mercy/Tariq likes to do. They aren't really in the business of genociding large groups of people; when they kill for a greater good, it is always one person or a small village. (For example, Tariq smothering his nephew). You can't just name some weird, slightly-plausible benefit that might come from the genocide and conclude that because they do things for the "greater good," this means that they would commit that genocide. If Mercy does an evil for a greater good, the good has to actually be greater than the evil, and when the evil is genocide, it's hard to overstate how high the bar for the good is. Saying, "They were a fundamentally evil race based on theft and murder," would definitely not cut it.

Liliet

^^^ this

pyrohawk21

You know, an interesting thing is that I think we're seeing the ways of the world to come here. It is a world of Mortals. For here we see that one of the Immortal races that inhabit this continent have had their immortality shattered, with Night being Ruined. We've learned that the Gigantes aren't actually immortal, the way that the Titans that were their ancestors seem to have been. But rather their life is tied to their power. So they have the choice of living long, or being able to affect the world.

We have the Elves, who are basically removing themselves from the continent, which is likely to have dire repercussions for them later on. Either losing their kingdom or finding that they can't fully return to the world I suspect.

And then we have the war that is being fought, with the Mortal Realms banding together to once and for all shatter the Immortal Kingdom of the Undead... Or be shattered in turn.

So it seems to be that the era, and world to come, is very much going to be defined by the actions of Mortals. The agents of the Immortal will have a role in defining what paths the mortals travel, but the Immortal beings themselves are likely to have their own actions extremely restricted... Unless they discard that Immortality.

As a side note, I don't count the endless life of Villains as Immortality, because it is very susceptible to 'sword to the heart' ending them from even the weakest of beings if they get unlucky. It's similar to how the GIGantes are technically immortal in that they have a path to not dying of old age... But it's much harder for them to actually exploit that or it comes with steep costs.

TeK

Pretty much all immortals are actually mortals as in susceptible to the stabbing, but I don't think that somehow inviolates their immortality. Immortality is first and foremost imperviousness to age, not necessarily death. Otherwise aside from big G Gods there never were and never will be immortals.

Konstantin von Karstein

Immortality is like invulnerability. You have it until you don't.

Liliet

When your immortality statistically doesn't last longer than a regular lifespan, that IS a meaningful distinction from enduring immortals.

pyrohawk21

What I'm doing here is saying that there is a crucial difference between being immortal, and being an Immortal. Villains, the Gigantes if they conduct the rituals and don't spend the power, and possibly the Drow even after the Ruin of Night renders them Mortals, are all immortal as they don't die, and aren't even really affected, by the passing of time.

But it's a lower-case i immortal because said immortality comes with a big cost. For the Gigantes it is the fact that their lifespan and the power are tied to each other, so if they want to be immortal then they can't use their power and they must dedicate their life to conducting the rituals needed to accumulate more. For Villains it comes with the fact that if you want to retain that immortality, you need to keep doing the deeds that earned you the Name that gave you the immortality as a side benefit. And that tends to drastically increase their mortality rate. If the Drow retain a form of immortality, I suspect it'll probably be something like stealing the life of others, which means it has a constant cost.

But for True Undead such as the Revenants and the King of the Dead, they don't need to ever worry about keeping their immortality active. For the Elves, they have it naturally and the older they are, the more powerful their ability to manipulate Creation becomes, again making it so they don't have to pay a cost to stay immune to the ravages of age and they in fact purely benefit from living longer.

That's why I use Immortals to describe those two groups of beings, because they don't have a lesser form of immortality that requires you keep doing something to have it. But rather once you obtain it, you have it forever and don't need to do anything to preserve it.

So you aren't a Mortal Being that has gained extended life. You are an Immortal Being, immune to time's ravages.

Insanenoodlyguy

I like the lore of Last Unicorn for things like this, in that it's a mentality and fundamental difference in outlook that also makes up an Immortal. (in that story/movie everybody should experience, magic turns a Unicorn into a Human Woman in order to save her from a malevolent creature hunting unicorns. Unconscious from the experience, it's recognized by a character who knows lore that this is going to be horrible for the Unicorn, who may go mad. The Unicorn wakes up HORRIFIED, immediately aware she is no longer an eternal constant "I can feel this body dying all around me!" <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=e5rGhVhQaLk>

Other better people have expanded on all of this whom deserve credit I'm not willing to spend time looking up right now, but essentially, big I Immortals are BUILT to live forever. A mortal with an expanded lifespan might well end up regretting their state and seek an end. An Immortal is meant to be eternal, and so their outlook embraces it with a sort of stubborn optimism: Even on their worst day, at their most horrible moment, they know they have enough time for things to get better. It's why some of the strongest passions of mortals eludes them (and so makes the short-lived things so fascinating), but it's also how they can stay as they are so long. The Genie who's been in a bottle for decades, the Demon sealed for Centuries, they leave their confines and they are fine, ready to resume acting on the world. A mortal trapped for that long in the same condition, even if their life was preserved, would be completely insane from the process. Because they aren't built for that long-view mentality, and part of the process of a mortal becoming a true Immortal is gaining it, as Neshy refers to a bit in this story. It is, as many things that are of stories, both a weakness and a strength. There is a power in that inherent longevity, in the lack of need to change because of how little change can affect you, but of course, there's also the stories of mortals time and again defeating such things despite how impossible that should be, especially because of how easy it can be for an Immortal to forget that anything but another Immortal could ever be a threat to them.

Matthew Wells

I wonder how Elves are at learning? The undead seemingly being unable to learn big things is probably a result of all that, but Elves must presumably have some ability to radically change. Maybe they ossify at 80 or something, and then just accumulate magic.

Ranger seems to be both Immortal and flexible in her mind, but she's powered by three separate aspects related to learning, and is half-human.

Liliet

Ranger has also had the same personality for several centuries as far as we know.

There seems to be a clear distinction to be made here between "assimilating information and drawing conclusions" and "restructuring your information processing framework". The immortals are perfectly capable of the former at any age, but the framework ossifies with time – the longer you live, the less flexible your mindset is, and the less capable you are of mastering entire new skillsets / professions / philosophies that can't be processed as a subset of your pre-existing ones.

LostRaven

Oh nice to see Ivah gaining a partial Godhead by accident (more or less) same as Cat, an entity cramming the power in it shortly before that entity gaining new powers (King of Winter > King of Arcadia Resplendent)

We see a lot of echoes here, by stories created before by Cat herself. She originated the unknowing apotheosis. AND it's a former holder of Winter Power and still Lord of silent Steps who gains it.

Crash

My child Ivah is too pure for this world.

About to have some life changing after effects from having a decent amount of godhead crammed on it, too I'd bet. Unlike Catherine, it didn't have anything to help this along at all.

Andronike just panicked and started pouring all that Night into it.

Frivolous

ErraticErrata – Forgot to put in a Thank You for this phrase in Interlude: Woeful:

=====

the dictate that undead could not learn was not as absolute as some seemed to believe

=====

It was nice of you to give an answer to the topic we'd been debating about, whether the undead could learn. I appreciate it and I'm sure others do, too.

Dome Zasrekh

The Drow used sorcery before, will they do so again?

LoSS is best boi, rushing to Cat when she needs him, and Akua getting some love gold!

jak

I knew it.

As soon as he took Cathrine out and the crows retaliated, I knew he'd make a move against them.

No, even before that. As soon as it became clear that they were investing their godhood in this battle, i knew he'd make a play for it.

Adrian_V

Ok new thought: DK could do this because Cat is out of it, the sister said word for word if she was awake they could fight it better or something, so in tipical name fashion she could come back at a pivotal moment to save the day, it wouldn't be the first tiem she take a hero trope and make it work for her even when a villain.

308924810a

So I'm pretty sure they've just lost the war.

Without the general OPness of the Drow pinning down two thirds of the Dead King's armies they've got pretty much no chance of gathering a force capable enough of fighting the Dead King above that the Dwarves feel inclined to intervene.

If many of the Drow lose access to Night the Grand alliance is losing something like two thirds of its combat force and many of those who can make gates into Twilight, unless they can come up with replacements for that somewhere they're going to start losing.

Liliet

We know from epigraphs that Guide doesn't end with the Dead King devouring Calernia, so there's SOME X-factor waiting in the wings to spring out and turn the tide right back ^^

Trebar

So... is nobody commenting on the bard appearance?

Trebar

"silver eyes and ornate robes. It – no, she – bore a silver mask at her hip."

Wait, nevermind. I read that as silver flask

Matthew Wells

So did I, until you pointed it out. I just figured Masego blasted her.

hoser2

I think that was the pre-goddess form of the sister and not the bard.

Daniel E

Thus did the Mighty Jindrich get thoroughly yeeted by General Rumena, and it was good. On a more serious note; Cat has been developing a striking resemblance to Odin for some time now (Crows, war & wisdom in equal measure), but the addition of an eye patch makes it a certainty. I'm now wondering if perhaps she won't obtain a Bard-ish Name, but rather ascend to Godhood in her own right.

nipi

So Sve Noc is about to have its power halved? I mean they left half of themselves back in the Gloom.

Liliet

They wouldn't be panicking like this at losing HALF. No, this snared all of it.

Liliet

(if you only fell into quicksand to your waist, bisection is not how you can get out of it)

Crash

If only. They way Hierophant spoke, they're about to become the Watch 2.0

This is big trouble.

Liliet

What do you mean?

jamesc9

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/11/29/chapter-48-interrogation/>

'changes were observed' is probably a good place to start reading.

Liliet

I remember the worldbuilding, I'm confused by the sentiment.

superkeaton

I'll give this to the Dead King, he really knows how to get two birds with one stone.

Daniel E

Booo, boo on you sir. Your puns are bad and you should feel bad :p Also, you may recall that puns are illegal under Queen Catherine, along with being taller than her.

superkeaton

Given that I'm pretty sure we're of near-similar heights, I'm sure we'd see eye to eyes on the matter.

sengachi

I love how Zarkan has been with Rumena for almost four centuries now. Like, a looong time. And sure it thought it could take room at a once upon a time when it was young and stupid, but now paperwork together for a while, and Zarkan probably has the impression that it's seen most of what Rumena can do. Enough that every half century it starts thinking maybe it has a shot.

And then Rumena pulls out a freaking Secret it hasn't used in so long that Zarkan has probably not even heard rumors of it, the Secret predates it by so much. A Secret which outperforms both the Grey Pilgrim's Shine and a Goddess (Rumena wasn't injured by backlash after all) and casually unmakes one of the Dead King's greater workings.

What do you think is going on in Zarkan's head in this moment, and why is it "Hahahahaha, oh fucking gods I tried to kill that how could I have ever been so stupid?"

SaveOurSquirrels

Awh yeah cat with an eyepatch gonna be the coolest teacher?/ headmaster? at Cardinal

Crash

Rumena had the secrete of Earth Bending all along!

Darkening

Y'know, I find it odd that the Dead King is able to counter Night so thoroughly. Like, it's portrayed as being equivalent to sorcery or Light, but he's able to create perfect antimagic for it and ensnare and drain a goddess like this? You'd think over the centuries he'd have figured out similar counters for magic and light, yet we've seen no indication of that, but he was able to counter Night almost completely after just a couple of years. Sve Noc have been compared in might to a choir of angels, and yet we've never seen any suggestion that Keter's been able to bind one of those and turn it into a power source or something. I guess there might be some story aspects to the second part, since Keter chaining an angel would be an opening for a hero to come free it, whereas attacking Night is just Evil vs Evil, but still. It just feels a bit cheap for him to be able to fuck them over this hard with like, a day of prepping wards in a cave that he had no guarantee they'd even show up at.

Xinci

Well two key things. Night has less source purity than Light which means in a clash it comes down to sorcerous skill more than just power. The Night was only protected from usurpation by the skill of its wielder and in this Sve is lesser. She had a glaring weakness for exactly this kind of issue and wasn't getting countermeasures as the DK learned more and more about the Night as the war progressed. And secondly the DK has been accelerating his understanding of Night for years as we saw as his artifacts that could affect it got more streamlined.

Liliet

Night is not equivalent to sorcery and Light is equivalent to neither. Light has "source purity", as Xinci has pointed out, which basically means it trumps anything you throw at it. Sorcery cannot beat it, demons cannot beat it, if you throw something at Light the something gets destroyed and Light stays.

Night and sorcery seem to be competitive with one another: Night can disrupt sorcery and sorcery can disrupt Night, depending on configuration. Now sorcery can disrupt sorcery as well, so this is an eternal arms race, but Neshamah cannot make straight up antimagic field generators because they'll disrupt his own undead. I mean, he CAN, he just can't USE them when he also wants his undead in the area. They would give him a straight disadvantage compared to the living. Night though, he doesn't use it, so he can make disruptors and use them with impunity without losing anything.

Now this does mean that theoretically everyone could come up with ways to disrupt his shit right back, but we're back to the arms race problem here – the disruptor technology, the anti-disruptor technology, the anti-anti-disruptor technology etc. We're seeing this play out: the Unravellers, the copperstones, etc.

Darkening

I mean, we've directly seen Masego do anti-Light countermeasures back at the battle of camps, but sure, I can dismiss that as Name specific shenanigans that can't be lightly replicated by others. I still feel like a two year war is exceedingly rapid for him to have been this successful at countering it, but maybe he'd encountered it before. The drow did have a fairly strong reaction to the idea of facing him at first, so they probably did try raiding Keter at some point in the past.

Darkening

Though it occurs to me that that effect from Masego was based off an Order demon and Keter probably has those when he's willing to break out the big guns. So that should get interesting.

Liliet

Yeah, good point, he'd probably encountered Night before.

Mike E.

Ivah is the best bud. How far he has come since we first saw him and his band exiled from the underdark.

Also, his faith in the First Under the Night and in SveNoc is blindingly idolic.

Liliet

Its/theirs. Typos aren't legitimate pronouns.

Mike E.

So I just caught this re-reading the chapter...was the Mantle killed by Mighty Jindrich? I read this as Romena was on his way to take care of the Mantle, only for Jindrich to snuff it out before he got there, leaving Romena to believe the Mantle was overrated as a threat if Jindrich was able to kill it, hence his 'unimpressed' thought.

"The Mantle, yes? Losara had spoken of her. This war would be well rid of her continued presence. The general sped forward, knowing the darkness would be fixed in range, yet it died before the old drow even reached the edge. Unimpressed, it leapt over Jindrich..."

Crash

Well shit. I sure am glad I decided to read this on Thursday and only have to wait till tomorrow.

Holy fuck, Masego.

ByVectron!

Re-reads can be so fun. Did you know the Cat already has a fancy glass eye? Book 5: Chapter 65

"...that vicious little wretch Robber even threw something at me over the fire. I didn't quite manage to catch it but it slid into a fold of my cloak and I picked it up there. I blinked, finding a rather fancy glass eye looking back at me. Where had he even – no, I didn't want to know. It had to be someone of stature, though, part of it was painted but there was also coloured glass and that'd expensive as all... No, if I asked then he won. I'd get Hakram to find out later. Still, I pocketed the eye without any qualms."

Crash

Kinda hoping she doesn't put a glass eye in or gets an eyepatch or anything of the sort.

Just kinda... leave it as is. If nothing else, that's even better intimidation tactics. Especially since the Night has gone kaput.

Liliet

Tbf a glass eye can be a good option for wearing UNDER an eyepatch for structural integrity of the eyesocket.

Also, I want Catherine to have a Masego-style magic eye that isn't impeded by the eyepatch so she gets badass looks and utility all in one 0.0

Frivolous

Can't help but notice the parallel between this situation and the Battle of the Camps. Both times the situation was desperate and Catherine was injured and unconscious.

Feels very much the same way as this quote from Kaleidoscope II:

"She may rise," the Pilgrim said. "The shape of it is there. Wounded or unconscious, those she loves besieged, she may return to offer salvation at the darkest hour."

"And that's not a villain's story, Tariq," the woman grunted. "She's hard to predict, and that'll get people killed. You're sure about what you saw?"

The Grey Pilgrim let out a tired breath.

"What Catherine Foundling craves above all is peace," he murmured. "On chosen terms, perhaps, but peace nonetheless."

Liliet

Yup 😊

aran

A villain with the literal aspect Murder feels a little on the nose 😏

goliath1303

I don't remember which chapter it was in, but it was definitely mentioned in an earlier chapter that the Aspect isn't murder, it's kill. I think it was started when the decisions were being made as to which Named would be best used to counter which Revenant, but I definitely wouldn't put money on that guess.

aran

So Catherine is now one-eyed and has two corvid companions? That sounds familiar.

aran

Wonder how that happened. Maybe the link got established through the arrow in Catherine's skull?

ninegardens

Tariq and Zeze is the buddy cop duo I never knew I needed.

Spirituality Awakening

Nice story. 😊

Interlude: Kingdom

"Fifty-seven: the greatest of powers is not an enchanted sword or cataclysmic spell, it is simply to be in the right place at precisely the right time."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

The Black Queen's own favourite trick had been turned against the Fourth Army, and the results were a bloody ruin.

At least two thousand dead in less time than it took to boil a cup of water, that much again in wounded and even worse: siege engines, as well as the sappers who manned and built them, had been pulped by the great sheets of waters that had fell like a wave of stone from the Heavens. The Dead King's sorceries had been aimed foremost at the positions above the rebuilt gates of Hainaut, the siege platforms Sapper-General Pickler had ordered built before the enemy came, and there was not a soul left alive there. The results of that were immediately disastrous, for though the Fourth Army was hastening to reinforce the lost grounds the enemy had not missed the opening: beorns were already there and emptying their bellyfuls of soldiers, as great snakes of dead flesh bit into the wet stone and opened their maws to make themselves into siege ladders.

Worse, a pair of wyrms had landed atop the siege platforms and was terrorizing the attempted reinforcements. They monstrous dragons of flesh and bones, magnificent examples of what the greatest necromancer to ever live could achieve at the peak of his skill, were shrugging off Light and sorcery alike. It would take concentrated volleys of either to drive them back, and the Fourth was still on the backfoot: with so many officers dead, it was struggling to move priests and mages where they needed to be. It was a miracle, General Zola Osei thought, that the Fourth Army hadn't outright routed. Nearly every other army on Calernia would have, after seeing nearly half its number killed or wounded in so short a span. But the soldiers, first hardened on the grounds of Arcadia and then against the horrors of the Folly, held.

For now, at least. How long would that last? General Zola Osei of the Second Army of Callow let the urge to wince pass through her, refusing to indulge, for it would not do to show weakness to her staff when disaster loomed so tall. She set down the Baalite eye, choosing her words carefully as her staff tribune and senior mage awaited her opinion.

"If we do not immediately reinforce, the gate is lost," General Zola said.

"If fully commit, we risk losing the gate anyway and being swept away entirely in its wake," Staff Tribune Adnan frankly said. "I would argue in favour of ordering the Fourth to retreat while we fortify the entrance to the city and prepare for battle there."

"Should the Dead King hold the gate, the city's wards are at risk of collapsing entirely," Senior Mage Jendayi replied, shaking her head. "I won't pretend that it will not be bloody to take back the gate, but even on purely tactical grounds it is the superior decision."

They were disagreeing, Zola considered, because they were starting from entirely different premises even if neither had stated as much: Adnan considered this battle lost, and was now looking to mitigate, while Jendayi still believed victory achievable and so was willing to spend lives to reach that end. General Zola herself was not yet certain which way she leaned, though she was aware a decision needed to be made urgently. Already she had sent her two senior legates to prepare the grounds behind the city gates in case of a breach but now she either needed to send companies into the stairs leading up to the siege platforms, which the dead were certain to turn into a meat grinder of brutal proportions, or send messengers to the Fourth before it overcommitted. And the truth was that, even beyond tactical considerations, Zola was not certain if the Second had the stomach for the kind of fight taking the gates back would mean. Not since Maillac's Boot.

The general had always admired the Black Queen's almost alchemical knack for transmuting battles into loyalty, but the Boot had left scars in the Second. Losing General Hune had been a blow, even for Zola herself, but the casualties taken that day... Many still had nightmares of the hordes that never ceased coming, of the things crawling out of the much and in those dreams the gates into Twilight always closed too early. If Her Majesty had been there with them, perhaps, but now? The rumours had spread. The Black Queen was wounded, unconscious, and now her armies were wavering. Catherine Foundling had never been defeated on the field, but that legend did not apply to the Army of Callow when it stood without her. If I don't give the order to take back the gate, General Zola thought with cold clarity, then I have declared this battle a defeat. It will not be possible to win, afterwards.

Before she could speak, however, she caught sight of strange movement atop the gates. An eddy in the flow of the dead. Zola's grandmother had been a Mosa, and though the blood had since thinned she could still perceive motion uncannily well even in the dark. She pressed the Baalite eye against her face again, the enchantment lending her better sight through the dark, and started in surprise.

"General?" her staff tribune worriedly asked.

"Mad," Zola Osei softly said. "Utterly mad."

Goblins, it was goblins. At least a cohort's worth of them, maybe more, but it was not a battle they had come from. Zola saw as they climbed atop the great necromantic constructs – the beorns and the snakes and even one of the wyrms – as lesser dead clumsily tried to pursue. Nimble and utterly fearless the sappers, for those bags they bore could not be mistaken, spread out and every heartbeat a few more of them died from being shaken off monsters or caught by undead. And still they went, until a horn was sounded and like candles in the darks the monsters lit up. One after the other, matches struck and devices triggered as jets of green flames burst and Keter's great beasts screamed.

Robber's Marauders were not a legend without reason.

"We go forward," General Zola Osei said, throat tightening. "The Second will take back the gate."

The Army of Callow had not yet bent the knee to even odds overwhelming. It would not break that custom on her watch.

—

Like most great catastrophes, Adjutant thought, it had not been neatly done. The Grey Basin – le Bassin Gris, to the locals – had occupied maybe a fourth of surface of the plateau on which the city of Hainaut had been built, an uneven oval that began south where it ended on a waterfall over the edge and went up the middle of the capital until it ended at the beginning of the great district facing the city gates. The basin had been a major boon to the city, for both sanitation and drinking water purposes, and it'd been kept full by both underground aquifers in the rock below and regular rainfall. It was also, as of a half hour ago, entirely gone.

It had been expected that the undead would dig under the city, for it was one of Keter's favourite tactics and one of the few weaknesses of the city-fortress, and the Firstborn had been the natural answer to such an assault. They too were familiar with fighting underground, Night was well suited to such skirmishes and unlike humans they could see perfectly in the dark. And as far as Hakram could tell, when the dead had finally dug their way up into the city the fight had gone overwhelmingly in the favour of the drow. On all fronts they'd either held or outright beaten back the dead, in some cases even counterattacking deep below where the dead were massing for their offensive. And then it had all gone horribly wrong, somehow.

Sve Noc had been caught in a trap, of which the nature and purpose was still unclear, and it seemed that to free themselves from it the Crows had made sacrifices. Swaths of dzulu had suddenly fallen unconscious, and even Mighty had seen their powers suddenly falter. Worse, the angry throes of the goddesses had shattered the bottom of the Grey Basin and the water had poured into the tunnels dug by Keter. They too had broken, in some places too fragile, and it had begun a disastrous chain of collapses that'd essentially hollowed out the heart of the city. Now where the Grey Basin had once stood there was a sheer drop of at least a hundred feet instead, with massive rubble and the corpses of both drow and broken undead strewn everywhere.

"Hard to tell how many died," Secretary Amelia said. "The Firstborn are shit at coordinating with other forces, they never told us how many they sent down into the tunnels."

"Concentrate on finding the Losara," Hakram said, leaning on his crutches. "They are most likely to have numbers for us."

"The curves of the cliff seems to curve inwards," Secretary Prattler noted, crouching at the edge with an interested look. "Dangerous. The plateau's structure became unstable."

"And the tunnels?" Hakram asked.

"They didn't go anywhere," Prattler, once a lieutenant in the sappers, replied. "If the dead climb the side of the drop, they'll be able to access them and enter the city by other paths than the edge. We need to close them as soon as possible."

"Send word to the sappers," Adjutant ordered. "Save for the situation at the gates, this is the highest priority."

"Won't be many left of us, but I'll see what I can do," Secretary Prattler saluted.

The reports from his phalanges were increasingly staggered, but the flow had not yet been impeded. The difficulty at the moment was keeping the Alliance high command informed, and Vivienne in particular. Irritatingly, the situation with the Firstborn remained unclear. The nature of the consequences of what had happened save for a fourth of the plateau shattering were still to be determined. Night had weakened, observably, but was that it? Answers came when his picket informed him that Masego and the Pilgrim had strolled out of the dark, that overly ambitious creature Ivah with them. Hierophant looked invigorated, the Pilgrim wearied, and neither wasted time on niceties as the 'Lord of Silent Steps' stood in the distance and seemingly entranced.

"The Dead King laid a trap for Sve Noc in a cavern below the city," Hierophant said. "And through the sister he captured, he attempted to siphon the Night."

Hakram's jaw tightened. That would have been too disastrous for words.

"Did he succeed?"

Hierophant shook his head.

"I was invited to use one of my aspects onto the Night through one of the sisters," Masego said. "What Trimegistus seized, I ruined."

"Along with most of the Night itself," the Peregrine quietly added. "The Crows hid away a portion of their power in a mortal receptacle beforehand, but most of the Night itself was unmade."

"It was a measured action," Hierophant calmly said. "It will have hit dzulu the worst, as they had reserves of Night but none of the protections of the Mighty. Nisi will have gone entirely unharmed."

"And Mighty?" Hakram asked, licking his chops.

"Weakened," the Pilgrim said. "Significantly so."

Then the Gloom that defended Serolen was likely gone as well, Adjutant thought. Dark news.

"When will the Sisters return to the field?" he asked.

"That is why we are here," the Pilgrim admitted. "You are, as always, the man who can find the needle in the haystack. The Sisters cannot reclaim their power, Hierophant tells me, until their imprisoned half is freed. Else we risk simply resuming the disaster on a smaller scale."

Hakram blinked.

"One of them's still trapped?" he flatly said.

"Yes," Masego said. "The ritual was quite comprehensive, though I expect it was primarily meant for a godhead shard and not the possession the net caught. It allowed the halves of Sve Noc to keep communicating."

"It is," the Grey Pilgrim said with grim face, "still down there."

He pointed down below, into the field of soaked rubble, and for a moment Adjutant's mind went blank. Saving someone down there? Impossible. Not, he adjusted, merely impractical. Which meant... mhm, perhaps he would be able to Find a solution after all.

—

"The Second Army has engaged at the gates," General Bagram grimly announced. "It is gaining steadily, but there is no telling the outcome of the engagement."

"And your Fourth?" Prince Klaus Papenheim asked.

"We've stabilized the flanks and are focusing on evacuating the wounded," the orc replied. "The situation is stable."

Vivienne let out a long breath and spoke the truth no one else seemed to want to.

"It has been confirmed that the Grey Legion is approaching the gates, the defences of which are still in enemy hands," she flatly said. "I am the least seasoned military leader at this table, but it seems to me that those gates are about to be smashed open."

Just a few soldiers of the Grey Legion, hulking masses of moving steel that they were, were enough to serve as a battering ram. The entire frontline of that silent army hitting the seven gates as once would be worse by an order of magnitude.

"We can still hold," General Bagram insisted. "So long as the walls do not fall, the enemy can be bottlenecked in that district."

"The east holds," Captain Nabila said. "No beachheads remain and we have mastery of both rampart and bastions."

Proud as Vivienne was of the Army of Callow, she had to admit that in the battle for Hainaut the Dominion that had distinguished itself. Almost half the western rampart, held by Alamans troops, had collapsed after being struck by Scourges until Catherine had led the Woe – and Akua Sahelian – to slay one and drive away the other. Unfortunately, the reinforcements led by Princess Beatrice had never materialized as instead they'd run into enemies in the streets of the city. They'd won that clash decisively, at the price of the Princess of Hainaut being wounded, and at the moment it was Prince Arsene of Bayeux that was theoretically the commander of that flank.

The man was not here, however, having instead sent his niece Lady Marceline to speak for him.

"The Brabant levies broke and ran," Lady Marcelline frankly said, "but we've contained the breach to a single bastion. Captain-General Catalina survived the attentions of the Archmage and she's leading the local effort while my uncle oversees the norther stretch of the rampart."

"Anyone would have buckled, hit by that kind of magic," General Bagram said with rough sympathy. "But can the mercenaries clear the enemy's foothold? If they'd don't, this all falls apart."

"Perhaps if Chosen were to lend their strength the matter could be settled more easily," Lady Marceline leadingly said, turning her eyes towards Vivienne.

It rather amused the heiress that even though she had not held a Name in years, by simple virtue of having once been the Thief people believed she still had influence over Named. As if even Catherine – Vivienne’s heart clenched, but Indrani had promised she would survive – Catherine, with all her strength, did not struggle to keep their kind in even a semblance of order. The privileged information that Vivienne Dartwick did hold in regard to their kind was not a consequence of her thieving past at all, but of Hakram Deadhand being fiercely meticulous even when calamity was at the gate.

It was not sorcery but regular messengers, which admittedly some might argue were harder to arrange in a city besieged.

“They’ve had heavy casualties,” Vivienne said. “On the Silver Huntress survived out of her band after they were caught in that ambush, and only barely. It might be possible to request the Headhunter and the Rogue Sorcerer lend a hand, but they have been highly mobile so mustering them may take time.”

It’d been a slaughter, according to the report she’d gotten. A well-crafted ambush by what had appeared to be a half a dozen Revenants in a narrow street had taken a lethal turn when the Prince of Bones had torn through a wall and pulped the Young Slayer’s head with a single blow. A black-feathered arrow had taken the Summoner in the throat almost simultaneously, and the rest had been overwhelmed. The Grey Pilgrim and Masego had arrived in time to save the Silver Huntress’ life, but both the Silent Guardian and the Rapacious Troubadour had been lost.

All that with nothing to show for it, aside from a few destroyed lesser Revenants. The Prince of Bones had managed to retreat into Arcadia under fire by both the Peregrine and the Hierophant, indifferent to even their harshest attacks, while the Hawk had been long gone by the time those two arrived. The gate the Prince of Bones had used had been found and closed by the pair, but it was expected by everyone in this room that the Scourge would be back to lead his Grey Legion when it breached the city. Lady Marceline made a moue at Vivienne’s answer, displeased.

“Perhaps the band of the Barrow Sword instead?” she asked. “The Blessed Artificer alone-”

“The survivors of that band are already tasked, by order of the Adjutant himself,” Vivienne mildly said.

The mildness was not one that invited further argument, and with ill-grace Lady Marceline accepted the help on offer instead of the one she’d wished for. Vivienne sent out the messenger promptly, even as argument resumed as to whether or not the battle for Hainaut could still be salvaged. There was some optimism that it still could, so long as the drow managed to rally and help the Lycaonese keep walls of the pit created by the collapse of the Bassin Gris from being climbed by the dead. For now the sheer quantity of rubble and water was making it effectively impassable, but it would not last forever.

"The Neustrians could reinforce," Lady Marceline said, "at the moment they are not-"

It was like an itch, Vivienne thought. Or perhaps simply the slightest of pressures, tickling like a feather. Not the first trick of the sort she had learned, back when she was the Thief, but the first she had been taught. That was almost nostalgic, in a terribly dangerous kind of way. Vivienne Dartwick kept her breathing steady, concentrating as the talk of the commanders washed over her, and listened to nothing save the sound of her own breath. In, out. In, out. There, the itch again. The... weight. She had not been wrong. Idly, the heiress-designate to Callow pushed back her chair seemingly to make room for her legs as she reached for a carafe of water. Leaning covered one of her arms from sight, gave her free hand, and a heartbeat later she was moving.

The knife flew, perfectly thrown, and would have caught the hooded figure in the throat if it'd not been parried by a serrated dagger.

Prince Klaus, who'd been about to get his throat slit, was the first to draw his sword. General Bagram was but a heartbeat behind, and even as Lady Marceline backed away so she'd have room to draw her rapier Captain Nabila palmed a throwing axe. Vivienne, though, had already leapt atop the table with a fresh knife in hand. The Revenant flickered, as if made of heat mirage, and for a moment her eyes stung but she focused through the pain and flicked a second knife. It was parried, but the flickering ceased.

"Varlet," the Iron Prince hissed, striking hard.

The Revenant turned the blow aside, punching the old man in the stomach hard enough it emptied his lungs, but Bagram hacked at its shoulder and it was forced to step back. The orc's blade bit into the Prince of Hannover's shoulder but only shallowly, and Vivienne reached for the back of her belt where she kept a pouch even as she finished crossing the table. Captain Nabila's throwing axe was swatted aside and General Bagram's charge ended badly, the Varlet sweeping his legs and tossing him at the table. Vivienne's fingers closed around a handful even as she leapt, the table flipping below her as Bagram stumbled into it, and she watched as the Iron Prince's swing was not only parried but riposted with a vicious cut that ripped across his face.

And the Varlet turned to her, even as she flew through the air, but Vivienne Dartwick smiled unpleasantly and threw a handful of golden dust into her face.

The Scourge hastily retreated but it caught her anyway, the Revenant screaming as the Concocter-made compound burned at the dead flesh and glowed brightly. Let her try to disappear with that. Vivienne tumbled into the animated corpse, the two of them landing in a sprawl, and as she slid out a third knife the other tried to slice open her throat. She caught the wrist in time with her free hand, struggling to keep the blade from going into flesh, but she was losing in strength and she had to abandon her knife to help with her second hand. She was losing anyway. Fortunately, the Iron Prince then kicked the Varlet in the head.

She fell to the side and Vivienne snatched up her knife, stabbing into her foe's wrist even as the Revenant tried to punch through the back of Klaus Papenheim's knee. She nailed the dead flesh, preventing the blow, and by then Captain Nabila had joined the fray with a war axe. Vivienne backed way so they'd have freer hand, getting back to her feet as General Bagram brushed past her to lend his sword to the cause of keeping the Revenant from rising. Lady Marceline, though armed, was staying far away from the foe. Vivienne threw her a scornful glance, passing the fallen table to snatch first a magelight globe from the wall and then a candle from a candlestick. She deftly turned back just in time to see Bagram rip through a wrist and then hold down the limb.

"Keep her from moving," Vivienne ordered.

"She-" Captain Nadila began.

"Do it," the Iron Prince grunted, hacking at the hood.

They managed, barely, and even then Vivienne had to dodge a kick as she approached.

"You will-" the Varlet began, but the words were interrupted by someone shoving magelight in her mouth.

"I could sneak better than that at eighteen," Vivienne Dartwick scathingly said, pressing the candle's open flame against the magelight globe. "You ought to be embarrassed."

And after five heartbeats exposed to fire, exactly as Masego had shown her it would, the Jaquinite magelight exploded with a loud pop. The tongues of flame exploded outwards, incinerating the Revenant from the inside as a jet shot out from her mouth and Vivienne avoided it by reclining her head to the right. The heat licked at her face, but she did not close her eyes. The Revenant, head mostly consumed save for charred bones, stopped moving.

"Decapitate it to be sure," Vivienne said, drawing back.

Captain Nabila did, rather eagerly, and the corpse fell listlessly. Feeling the eyes of everyone in the room on her, Vivienne cocked an eyebrow. Had they believed her harmless because these days she wore dresses instead of leather? She was able to fit more knives in a gown than she'd even been able to in trousers. I spent my fighting years as one of the Woe, Vivienne thought, matching their gazes. Does even a single one of you grasp what that actually means? She picked up one of the knives she'd thrown, carefully placing it back against the hidden strap.

"General Bagram, I leave this in your hands," she said. "I'll be heading out."

The orc slowly nodded.

"Where to, my lady?" Bagram asked.

"Where the hammer will fall," Vivienne replied. "The gates."

—

Amusingly enough, the Barrow Sword was the only member of his band who turned out to be useless to the purposes for which it had been sent for.

Ishaq took it in good humour, proving to be in a rather amenable mood overall. His successes before members of the Blood, his usual foes, had put him in a fine mood. Hakram spent little time speaking with the man, instead guiding the efforts of the rest of the band. No one was inclined to climb down, especially now that dead from the plains below had begin to crawl all over the rubble, but the Harrowed Witch was the solution to that: the bound soul of her brother, which she could sometimes force to obey her commands, had been sent instead. With the help of Hakram's own aspect the place where General Rumena was buried had been found, which had been when the Vagrant Spear moved out.

Passing through Twilight, as she was a fair hand at sidling, she emerged even as the Blessed Artificer began raining down Light on the dead in a hail of javelins. Striking with Light and the power of her Name she'd quickly pierced through the mass of stone, allowing a haggard Mighty Rumena to stumble out. The first stumble was an appearance by the Hawk, who from her high perch atop a vulture let loose an arrow. Aimed at Mighty Rumena, Hakram discerned, but it was not to be. Another arrow hit it mid-trajectory, Archer having finally found trace of her prey, and before a second could be loosed both the drow and the Vagrant Spear disappeared into Twilight.

The Firstborn could see to themselves, then. He had done what he could. An opinion seemingly shared by Masego and the Grey Pilgrim, who had lingered talking to each other quietly but were not clearly intent on leaving. Hierophant absent-mindedly bade his goodbyes, mentioning he was headed towards the gates, but the Peregrine stayed for a longer conversation.

"The Firstborn situation seems as settled as it can be," Adjutant said.

"We but tied a bandage over a gaping wound, but it is better than nothing," the Peregrine quietly replied. "I am simply glad that we were able to free Sve Noc."

The tired-look old man, Hakram considered, had been fully prepared to kill the two goddesses rather than let them fall in the hands of the Dead King. Soberingly, he seemed to believe he would have been capable of the act.

"Losing the Firstborn entirely might have lost us the battle," Hakram warily agreed.

There was a long pause as the old man studied him, those rheumy blue eyes piercing in ways that were beyond simple sight.

"The Ophanim believe the battle is lost regardless," the Grey Pilgrim murmured.

The orc's pulsed quickened.

"And do they care to share their reasons why?" Adjutant calmly asked.

The situation was not favourable, to his knowledge, but it was not yet disastrous. The walls largely held, and though the gates were threatened they were yet to fall. In the longer view the great pit that had replaced the Grey Basin was a liability, but salvaged sigils and the still-fresh Lycaonese should be able to hold them. The battle had certainly grown more arduous, but it seemed to early to write if off.

"There is a Crab," Tariq Fleetfoot said. "It nears. They can feel it approaching."

Hakram froze. The massive necromantic creatures were as moving small cities that the Dead King used to keep the armaments of his armies in fighting fit. They were a massive resource investment, and so jealously guarded that few had even been seen, but one had been seen earlier in this campaign. The Rogue Sorcerer, when scouting Lauzon's Hollow, had believed he'd glimpsed the spells keeping one invisible to the naked eye. And though it was not the purpose of that construct, given its sheer size it would represent not so much a siege tower as a siege fortress.

"Masego and yourself are both capable of destroying constructs of that scale," Hakram finally said.

And perhaps the Blessed Artificer as well, or Catherine were she awake, but there were not certainties with either.

"A monster, yes," the Pilgrim sadly smiled, "but a city, with wards and protections as this Crab will have? No. Already the Ophanim tell me their influence is being restricted by some working of the Enemy's. The battle is lost, Adjutant."

His bone hand clenched.

"You want us to begin a retreat," he said.

"That I leave to military minds," the Peregrine said. "But I say this: we cannot leave a twilight gate in the hands of the Dead King."

"We can't afford to lose this battle either," Adjutant growled. "If we do, Hainaut collapses. Perhaps all of Procer with it."

And if Procer fell, the rest of Calernia would not be far behind.

"There is a way," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It would be ruinous, but there is a way."

Adjutant's brows knotted.

"What is it you want of me, Peregrine?"

"We need to wake up Catherine Foundling," the Pilgrim said. "And for that I require your help."

—

They had taken the gates, inch by inch.

General Zola had watched as the army already bloodied at Maillac's Boot bloodied itself anew taking the same wide stairs that Callowan sappers had built but days earlier, tight ranks of legionaries heaving and screaming and they drove back the howling dead. Nothing was held back. Sharpers were thrown freely, shredding the enemy's tightly packed hordes, and fireballs struck in volleys as spears of Light tore into the side of massive monsters. And the Second Army, living up to the excellence for which the Black Queen had honoured it, bled and won. The bodies fell, until all that was left was green flames and corpses no longer moving. Zola gave her orders, connecting her lines with the Fourth Army's and evacuating the wounded through the twilight gate. There were no longer mages to spare to send them back into the fight, as too few healers.

Then the gates broke.

The Grey Legion strode through the wreckage, ranks and ranks of silent steel bearing thick shields and great weapons. Light barely bit into them, sorcery was useless, but munitions made a dent. Goblinfire most of all, though the dead simply made some of the legionaries lie over the flames so they would not spread and walked on. Through traps and pits, through caltrops and spikes, lumbering but indifferent. And when the Grey Legion reached the barricades, the lines wavered. Thousands of pounds of stone and wood were shattered in moments, and then great swords and hammers scythed through the frontline of the Second, but still the Second Army held. Zola Osei rode up and down the line, sending heavies into the gaps and ordering concentrated fire from the priests. Ineffective as they were, they still fared better than swords.

It tightened her stomach, watching orcs and humans and goblins pile themselves on the steel-clad dead to topple them and die and drove to destroy even a single one. Spells and Light came down in volleys from the ramparts and even the burning gatehouse, lines from the Fourth having dared to venture there, but it was not enough. The Grey Legion was pushing them back, slowly but surely. Blood and guts flowed down the street until the pavestones were so slick her men tripped on the entrails of their comrades, until smoke and ash stung their eyes to weeping and munitions slowly began to run out. A barricade collapsed entirely, a street routed, the shield wall collapse and then as if by a spell the breach was closed.

The Mirror Knight had come.

General Zola had heard the man called a fool by people high and low, but in that moment she felt only awe. That sole silhouette, marred by smoke and dust, smashed into the Grey Legion as if a cliff had decided to turn back the tide. He shone brightly, glimmer of Light, and as he advanced the enemy bent around him. Steel shells cracked, armoured dead went flying and an army of one sent the darkness howling back. Zola shouted herself hoarse organizing volleys to support him, sending in heavies to hold the ground taken back. Gods, they could still win this. They could still turn this around. Slowly, one at a time, the numbers of the Grey Legion were dwindling. The Second Army would not bend before they did. And forward the soldiers went, screaming their songs in defiance.

Then the Crab came, and the hope went out of them like a candle snuffed out.

Every gain made over hours of fighting gone, just like that. The monster-fortress stood above the ramparts, ramps coming down with iron hooks to disgorge undead atop the gate wherever the goblinfire had not spread. The shape blotted out even the sky, a tall shadow belching out acrid smoke the mage lines of the Fourth fled but not always quickly enough. The spell volleys sputtered out, and below the Grey Legion smashed into the ranks with fresh ferocity. The Mirror Knight was, before too long, a sole island of resistance in a sea of steel. And he fought on, but he could not win the war alone. Perhaps before Maillac's Boot they would have been braver, Zola thought. Perhaps if the Black Queen had stood with them, as she had through the last nightmare.

But Maillac had happened, and the Black Queen was not there. The Second Army broke.

It was a retreat, at first. Almost controlled, soldiers edging away from the enemy. But the panic spread like a stain on lace, and steps turned into a run. And once a few had begun to run, thousands did. The Grey Legion were terrifying even as part of a shield wall, who wanted to fight them without it? The streets and barricades clogged with soldiers trying to flee, and in the wake of the Second breaking the remains of the Fourth Army broke as well. The only saving grace was that the Grey Legion were too slow to capitalize and that the streets were too narrow for the rout to make it far. The same barricades meant to be held against the dead instead bottlenecked fleeing soldiers, the blind panicked stampede killing hundreds.

General Zola had ordered spells fired into the broken ranks to turn them around, at first, but it changed nothing and she would not be party to butchering her own soldiers like animals. She tried to organize two fresh lines of defence but both buckled under the sheer mass of the routing soldiers who were in no mood to listen to shouting officers. There was, she bitterly realized, little she could actually do. She'd lost control over her army. They might as well be utter strangers now, for all the sway she had over them. Should she arrange for a more orderly retreat? The battle was good as lost now, but perhaps she could still salvage an army out of this. The sun shook her out of her thoughts, absurdly enough. The sun, in the middle of the night.

And still there it was, hanging in the sky above them, red and burning and casting golden light. A miracle, Zola thought, and remembered the strange lights that burned under the eyecloth of the Hierophant. They were, she thought, eerily similar to what now shone above her army. Which slowed in its flight, confused and worried. And slowly, as General Zola watched, something changed. One of the barricades being toppled calmed, and when she sought the sight with a Baalite eye she found that a banner had been raised. The Crown and Sword, the Black Queens own, but it was not the Black Queen flying it. Lady Vivienne Dartwick, armed and armoured and mounted as the Order of Broken Bells rode around her, headed into the fray.

And wherever she went, under that burning sun that somehow had the Grey Legion buckling, the terror turned to shame. And shame turned into determination, soldiers streaming behind her.

The tide slowed.

The tide halted.

At last the tide turned around, and as the broken armies headed back into the fight General Zola Osei thought that while Callow might only have one queen this night it had gained a princess.

kitebroken1

At last the tide turned around, and as the broken readers headed back into the fight General Zola Osei thought that while Callow might only have one author this night it had gained a voter.

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Miles

Boo lame.

Any other line in the chapter would have been better for it wouldn't ruin the best part a literal second after getting to it.

nimelennar

Yeah! Go Vivienne! Yoink a victory from the jaws of this defeat!

Unrecovered

From bad to worse huh

ruduen

Huh. Well, I guess it's a good thing they never pawned that off.

hakureireimu

They did pawned it back to the summer queen. But Hierophant already made a false sun in book 4.

ruduen

I had to double check.

In Book 3 Chapter 45, that's the last time the sun is on screen, with Cat threatening to destroy it, and stating that it would be returned if there's agreement.

There's a blank spot in what we know of the immediate aftermath. That being said, it's mentioned in the extra chapter Ye Mighty that summer did get it back as a result.

So, we'll have to see what details get revealed as we continue.

Darkening

I suppose it could just be Masego echoing a miracle, as he's wont to do.

Vyran

could it be an adaptation of the banners Viv stole from the imortals (Summers elite guards that were ultra hard to kill until their glowing banners got taken) back during the arcadia campain?

it would fit with the glowing sun over a raised banner, used to rally and buff their soldiers.

Jack

They couldn't fence it.
It was too hot.

Sam

Boooooo!

Frivolous

Hope Pickler and Robber survived, but I'm almost sure one or both of them died. First the Lakeomancy, and then the suicidal charge by sappers – one or both of them would have been involved in that.

=====

EE – possible discrepancy: The orc's blade bit into the Prince of Hannover's shoulder but only shallowly...

Is that correct? It makes it sound like General Bagram attacked Klaus, though I guess that could have happened accidentally.

=====

Yes! Vivienne rules! I love that she led the others in slaying Varlet.

Agree that Vivienne got a Name again, what with the last word being princess? That Shining or Sun effect seems to indicate that, although it could have been Masego's.

=====

Losing Berserker earlier and now Rapacious Troubadour and Summoner means 3 villains have died so far.

So far only 2 heroes have died, and one a transitional – Young Slayer and Silent Guardian, and we know almost nothing about SG since she doesn't talk, haha.

=====

This situation strongly resembles the Battle of the Camps, what with Catherine being unconscious and those she loves besieged and in peril both times.

And once again the important goal is getting her to wake up.

Tom

> Is that correct? It makes it sound like General Bagram attacked Klaus, though I guess that could have happened accidentally.

> The Revenant turned the blow aside, punching the old man in the stomach hard enough it emptied his lungs, but Bagram hacked at its shoulder and it was forced to step back. The orc's blade bit into the Prince of Hannover's shoulder but only shallowly

Varlet punches Klaus and then steps away from Klaus when Bagram comes in swinging a sword, which means Klaus is still easily close enough to get more sword from Bagram than was intended.

But was it Klaus's functional shoulder or the shoulder for his missing arm? 😊

danh3107

The sun is the Sun of Summer she stole from Arcadia and the Summer Queen.

Konstantin von Karstein

No, it was given back. It's probably Masego doing something. At the Camps he already used a reproduction of the Sun.

Jed

Hey, if it works once, then the literal laws of the universe decree it'll work better the second time.

Mennolt van Alten

> Agree that Vivienne got a Name again, what with the last word being princess?

Disagree. Why? Because Cat specifically has her as heiress-designate because she does not have a name and she is 'less important' than her so people won't go for her as much. If she gains a name that will jeopardize all that they worked for in the last years to make other leaders know here etc. If she was forming a name she would probably try to snuff it out and murder it like the name of the leader of the principate a while ago.

Mental Mouse

It's been heavily foreshadowed that Cat might not get her way with regard to ruling Names.

agumentic

>Because Cat specifically has her as heiress-designate because she does not have a name

No, Cat has her as an heiress-designate because Vivienne is a good fit, Name doesn't come into it. Cat is not going to revoke that status if Vivienne does get a Name here.

Snappy

Yes because her desire is the accords, which state that none of the named will rule a country. Which is why she was regretting Cordelia getting a name. It would put her in an awkward position if her heir got a name

agesbe

As has been stated on multiple occasions, preventing Named from ruling is likely just not going to happen. Catherine desires that no Named be rulers in a vacuum, but she doesn't like in a vacuum. At the very least the Dominion will completely refuse to sign them unless that clause is taken out.

Liliet

That clause is dead in the water, it has already been said this book.

Miles

I don't think Viv can get a Name at this point. Above holds grudges and she doesn't have the temperament to get power from Below.

Matthew Wells

Heroes don't need direct sponsorship. The first time Viv got a name was because she fit the role, not because the Gods had a place for her.

RoflCat

She was a Callowan doing thievery as 'revenge' against the occupying Praes, that's pretty much a free ticket to Heroic Name.

Hell Catherine herself probably was on the list of consideration until Black intervened, much like how Assassin went to recruit Viv at one point.

Adrian V

I guess that was Viv and Masego working together at the end right? Otherwise Vivienne gained a new name probably, maybe even if Masego was helping (gained a princess, sounds too fitting to not be a name).

Plus how she discovered the Valet, i mean that was a sign of her emerging name or a vestige from her old one, the former is more likely since she has aged a lot and too much time has passed.

And just what does Pilgrim plan to sacrifice to get Cat back? His live comes to mind but i am not sure how that would work....

Will need to reread the chapter tomorrow xD

Big Brother

Viv never returned the Sun she yonked from the Summer Princess. Where do you think it's been this entire time?

Dresden 67

She did return it. It was one of the conditions of Cat's bargain with the Summer Queen.

Even if she hadn't, Vivienne is no longer the Thief and so doesn't have access to her old aspect of Hold.

Adrian V

Huh i had forgotten that, my train of thought was that she couldn't access anything from her vault/space/whatever thief stash after losing the name, like if there was anything it was released at a certain location, lost forever or slowly released into creation at random (i imagine a % of maggufins found in lost ruins are created like that xD)

Mental Mouse

More likely just permanently stranded in a dimensional pocket. Though with the artifact they claimed from Diabolist, Masego could be able to access and loot that.

shikkarasu

I love the idea, though, of some Thief gaining Hold 20 years from now and being all “WTF is in my Name-pocket? A Callowan barge, 2000 old Praesi Denarii, a similar amount in the oldest Callowan coinage since the revolution, an empty coin purse with the name ‘William’ on it, IS THAT THE ACTUAL SUN!?!?!”

Mental Mouse

She gave Arcadia’s sun back! That was part of the deal for Summer to yield, leading to the Resplendent marriage. She probably didn’t keep any of the barges either. On the other hand, there’s certainly quite a bit of the palace silver, and probably stuff she stole earlier from the nobles and Praesi that she was robbing in the beginning.

That Other Guy

The barges were used to block up a gate Cat was trying to punch through before Thief joined the Woe

Mental Mouse

Right, and I’m saying she surely dumped all of them.

shikkarasu

Oh, to be clear I doubt any of these were actually kept, canonically, and I know that the sun was given back. The mental image just tickles me.

Miles

It’s a freebie for the next Thief.

mamm0nn

The prickling in the back of her neck isn’t a Name or power, it’s what Cat always used to notice Thief when she was trying to sneak up on her. She taught Viv how she kept noticing her, and thus how to sneak up on her unnoticed, and Viv thus also learned how to notice other rogues sneaking about.

beleester

That was a Name trick. Cat describes it as part of the instincts that come with being Named.

"You know how when you came into your Name there was this set of instincts just under your skin?"

The brown-haired woman cocked her head to the side.

"It felt more like a hand guiding mine," she said.

"Close enough," I said. "When you're about to get wounded or killed, you're going to get a tingle just like it."

She nodded slowly.

"I had no intention of striking you," she pointed out.

Miles

Doesn't say you need the name to sense it. There's no expenditure of power with it either. She learned it from the instincts but once she knows there's no reason to forget.

Pretty sure Black used nonbold "name tricks" too after he lost his.

Frivolous

beleester: Thank you! Very much appreciate your finding the relevant quote.

If Catherine is any authority and if she was speaking correctly, then the sense-invisible trick only works for Named, as only Named have those instincts.

But that means Vivienne had a Name even in the tent, fighting the Varlet. In fact, the Varlet may have triggered the Name.

Drunken Dwarf

I think it is Viv and Masego working together. Masego has done stuff with Summer before and the whole banner holding Viv is doing seems eerily similar to those Summer Elites that buffed themselves with banners. Then again Viv could have also just taken that one Calloween Name, Shining Princess.

As for Pilgrim's plan, another form of ruinous I'm thinking of is...what if the Pilgrim and Mercy helps Cat become a representative of one of the Choirs? Giving a Villain (especially Cat) access to a Choir and Light would certainly be considered 'ruinous' by the Grey Pilgrim.

TigerQuoll

Sounds like its the Shining Princess (or Shining Prince for a man), the traditional name of the crown prince/princess of Callow.

dadycoool

Wow, what a big chapter. It's a little overwhelming, so I'll focus on the last part. Vivienne never gave the sun back to Arcadia, did she? And where the Woe go, their enemy Breaks. Especially when they take advantage of a Trope, like the "First light on the fifth day" she just did.

'Ladi Williams

I legit cried after reading this chapter.
Thank you EE

Konstantin von Karstein

She gave it back, it was part of the bargain to force the marriage between the Queen of Summer and the King of Winter. But Masego Witnessed it, and so can imitate it.

limwanya

Where are the Dead King's devils and demon's?

Big Brother

In Keter, waiting for the Grand Alliance to knock on his doors

Cmxy

But if they win at Hainaut, the dwarves will join the front (probably)

Zggt

I believe there's an underground front where the Dwarves are already doing their damage. Their plan from the start was to use the rest of the sapients to tie up as much of the army as possible. It's been working swimmingly so far.

Bitan

J

Adrian_V

They led the demon of absentia or forgetness lead the way...and so got lost xD

mamm0nn

Escalation gains a return favour. If Below aids their champion, so can Above. And generally, whomever escalates first will see the opposite reaction being greater and more devastating.

It's like a Named battle. You never use your Aspects right away, you try to bait out their Aspects and use yours to counter theirs or if at all possible bait out and counter them with power and skill. Especially for Villains, you only use Aspects to counter the enemy's Aspect or when you really need to use it to survive. One of Black's basic lessons.

The Dead King too would know this basic lesson, and not use demons and all his other nightmares until the situation warrants it. If he escalates, then the sum of it all will lessen and aid and surprise reinforcements will be greater. Grey Pilgrim even said as much before. For example a surprise reinforcement of the elves might halt the Crab, but had DK sent in a legion of devils and demons then that same force could've been the tide-turner against this much greater foe.

Snappy

He wouldn't use them cause that would probably push the "good" side to get loads of buffs and get angels involved. So he is waiting till he has to use it.

Them winning her isn't game over. A crusade once got to keter and was turned away.

The crows are weakened till they can live without night so that front is open.

Dwarfs are still undecided weather or not to continue the fight .

And rest will be so bloodied after this fight that it will take time to get into shape.

JediJuliet

It's been mentioned that he can't escalate like that without suffering consequences in his opposition, that sort of nigh-permanent endless warfare (especially since demons permanently impact creation) basically mean that the opposition WILL be given further tools to permanently and negatively impact him, possibly even allowing his defeat by some hero shouting platitudes down the road.

Matthew Wells

Definitely the return of the Shining Princess name. She's been unable to access her hammerspace without a name, and Masego hasn't replicated the Sun miracle that we know of. Also the whole

'routing soldiers turn into a charge' has been mentioned a couple times to be a standard ability of martial Heroes.

Matthew Wells

And also Amadeus, but he has an aspect for that.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, it's the heir to the throne of Callow leading a charge of knights against the Enemy, and we know the Shining Prince(ss) led the charge against Black. And you're right, giving hope and courage back to fleeing soldiers is definitely Heroic. Guess we know why the seers were sure Hainault would fall without Vivienne.

Dresden 67

Masego has mimicked the Summer Sun before, at the Battle of the Camps. The Sun itself was returned to Summer as part of forcing the Summer Queen to marry the Winter King.

Matthew Wells

Just reread that- he did indeed, but this doesn't appear to be the same miracle- he wielded it offensively, generating it directly in the enemies' path, while here it's being used to empower allies.

Crash

Listen buddy, if you're in a rout in the middle of the night and the Sun suddenly comes out on your side... Yeah, that does wonders for morale.

hakureireimu

It's also being used offensively:

Matthew Wells

'Somehow buckling' is a pretty big leap from 'ball of fire spawned on top of me'.

Matthew Wells

And Masego has to ration magic now, so there's no way he's pulling out the big stuff without aiming properly.

Mental Mouse

On the contrary – remember that part of why Thief stole Arcadia's sun, was that the Queen of Summer could never be defeated under the Summer Sun. Masego has used that to give Vivienne a similar buff for her troops.

Juff

Typo Thread:

worse: siege engines, > worse – siege engines – had fell > had fallen
They monstrous > The monstrous out of the much > out of the muck, of surface > of the surface of a at > of at gates as once > gates at once the Dominion that had > it was the Dominion that had norther stretch > northern stretch
On the Silver Huntress > Only the Silver Huntress backed way > backed away had begin > had begun orc's pulsed > orc's pulse screaming and they > screaming as they as too few healers > as well as too few healers die and drove (should this be "die in droves") glimmer of Light > glimmering of Light
Black Queens > Black Queen's
The tide slowed. (extra space)

nakam

that much again > that many again, i think

WuseMajor

Yoink!

'Ladi Williams

I'm scared of what the Grey Pilgrim regards as ruinous.
Because what are they going to sacrifice to wake Cat up if not GP himself?
And Cat without an eye and scarred!
Why...? EE...why?

Liliet

As to the latter part: 1) because Cat is Odin, 2) because badass.

Reader in The Night

Well, to any of us losing an eye would be a horrifically crippling wound. To a Named Villain... It's actually pretty much a power-up?

Cat already had a Red Right Hand in the form of her limp, but that was mild and could go away at will. A distinctive facial scar and an eyepatch, though? That is Tier One in terms of Villain Recognition Value, and in the Guideverse, with Recognition comes Power.

Even more, a Villain that is physically disabled is 200% more likely to be a dangerous plotter, and so Cat's various schemes are a bit more likely to stick. It seems weird to plot better because you've lost an eye, but that's the story beats.

In an unrelated note, I think the Peregrine is going to force Catherine's Name to consolidate, thus damaging it or crippling it's potential. Catherine having her Name fucked with is a common theme by this point.

Tom

> In an unrelated note, I think the Peregrine is going to force Catherine's Name to consolidate, thus damaging it or crippling it's potential. Catherine having her Name fucked with is a common theme by this point.

I had completely forgotten about the way her Name got messed with previously, but you're 100% right.

Alternatively Cat might already be in the middle of a Name dream brought on by her injury, and Pilgrim's going to screw it up because they need her to be awake more than they need her to have a Name.

Or maybe Pilgrim's choir has informed him that Cat's having a Tankred style dream. TWINS they were.

Insanenoodlyguy

The thing is, Pilgrim says whatever it is he's going to need Hakram's help. If the ruin is specifically on Catherine, It doesn't seem like he'd be willing to give that help unless it's literally "this or Cat dies" last second stuff. I feel like it has to be a broader ruin, though probably something Cat herself will be really, really unhappy about.

Burlyraven

Okay, so it wasn't a full destruction of the Night. Still pretty bad, but it didn't turn the shock troopers into tribal conscripts.

I know it's inaccurate to say a goblin did something heroic, but Robber just did something damn heroic. Leading his Marauders in that suicide attack on the constructs was essentially identical to what really sparked Kingfisher's Name. I seriously doubt he earned a Name himself from that because of goblin culture, but if he could become Sapper Jesus and spawn an aspect for unlimited ammo, that would be really useful right about now.

And Vivienne has to have gained a new Name in this chapter. The story beats are just too perfect for it, and if Cat did come into her new Name, it would mean the Woe being back to full strength just in time for the final arc. My only hesitation there is that Hakram may have just sacrificed himself to jumpstart Cat. It's not an absolute, but it's definitely not an outside possibility.

laguz24

Nah, the whole sacrifice bit has already been done. It's kind of like death flags, once you reach a certain point they stop becoming relevant.

That Other Guy

One of Robbers Aspects will be to produce goblin fire at will.

And turn livestock into munitions

Morgenstern

I'm not sure "bad" revenge does always count as "good" vengeance, especially when it comes to a pseudo-romance of two goblins. Pickler was probably with her precious machines =/ Forget about the Troubadour, why did she not get a death scene? Or are we to presume instead of yet another off-screen death (hidden in an on-screen wave of death), she somehow escaped _that_, as a Non-Named?

Matthew Wells

She has a habit of finding someplace to watch from, and without a new toy to set up she doesn't have a reason to be on the front lines.

Insanenoodlyguy

Robber already had a Name. It was Robber. Goblin named, unlike most of creation, are intentionally kept secret. He did a very good job.

NerfGlaistigUaine

NO not the Troubadour! I liked that one 😞 Hoping he's somehow still alive, his power's got something to do with souls so its possible, but I doubt it.

Wish he'd at least gotten a death scene.

mamm0nn

Yeah, it's odd that this silent figure standing menacingly in the corner never even got around to causing the problems that he was destined to cause.

Liliet

Don't figure he had the scale to cause problems here. He ain't no Wandering Bard and dealing with minor bardic assholes after her is like shooting fish in a barrel, probably, for Cat.

AceOfSword

Barrow Sword's power also has to do with souls and he was able to use those to cheat death... But he's a martial name. The Rapacious Troubadour is a killer, but I'm not sure if that's enough to warrant him having such a trick...

Though Assassin seemed to have a "come back from being killed" trick too..

laguz24

Hmm, interesting. But what is the ruin of the sun that the grey legion has. But also, I think that ordinary people can sense a pivot, it just comes so rarely that they don't know what it is. Viv has merely been attuned by her time as a named, plus she still somewhat matters story wise. But I am voting for shining princess.

Thanatoss

No, Vivienne will probably not get Name. Remember we are witnessing END of Age of Wonders and start of new age, probably Age of Mortal, so yes it was VERY fitting that Generals just killed Scourge without any Named backup.

Liliet

Vivienne sensed that through a trick that Cat had taught her, to detect someone looking at you.

And with that said, it's beautiful that Vivienne says specifically that she could sneak better than that at eighteen – before eighteen, she got caught by Cat every time the same way XD

Sinead

I loved that detail so much!

laguz24

Another theory on what the pressure is, providence.

Anomandris

I've used the term before and I will again – this chapter was sheer Malazanesque writing. Those descriptive yet short paragraphs. A roller coaster of emotions – you go up and down often. A bird's eye sort of view of everything. Punchy, short sentences with the full weight of the plot behind them.

I have not been this awed by fantasy battle writing at least since The Crippled God.

Crash

Oh boy. That's one hell of a Chekhov's gun you got there, buddy.

There goes Hakram Deadhand, off to try and get dismembered again. This time, with incentive from a Choir. What a guy.

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

Man, he's probably got a thousand orc brides waiting in the orc afterlife.

Matthew Wells

Not to worry, if he loses any more body parts, he'll be immortal! Nothing to hit!

hakureireimu

Wait Bagram hit Klaus's side? Is Varlet an orc?

agumentic

What I think happened is that Bagram hacked at Varlet, she stepped back, and as result, Bagram hit Klaus accidentally.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

His weapon is big enough to hit two people simultaneously and the angle was wrong for avoiding that outcome.

ninegardens

So... that Sun Vivi has....

She no longer has her bag of *HOLD*ing, so it probably not that (and got returned).

It... may be the Pilgrims star? He does have SHINE as an aspect, and we haven't seen that deployed yet.

Or it could be Masego doing Sun Fae mimicary?

Matthew Wells

The Shining Princes of Callow weren't called that for nothing, methinks. And now Callow has a Princess again.

Zachary A Sloan

I feel like EE would have used capital-P Princess at the end of this were the case.

Also, Vivienne getting a name seems to sort of cheapen the whole idea Catherine is going for, with making Named less relevant to the ideal post-War Calernia.

That being said, the evidence someone else posted of the "feeling an itch when someone is looking at you/about to attack you" being a Name trick is fairly persuasive, unless Catherine was just wrong and it was a trick mortals could also learn (or ex-Named could use).

Sinead

It could be that this isn't the moment she gets her Name, but rather in the moments after this sortie. This is only the start of her final arc to a Name. She is a "p"rincess on route to become a "P"rincess.

Cat doesn't want Named rulers because she wants to deescalate conflicts to individual level, rather than a national level. It was already sounded as it was something that isn't possible even without Cat's own succession plan being complicated by it.

However, if Vivienne responds to this by creating a set of laws in Callow that bind the crown of Callow itself (think Great Britain's Magna Carta), that can be a compromise that resolves this issue for the best way possible.

Frivolous

Zachary: Pardon me, but the end of Charlatan IV ends with Roland describing himself as a lower-case rogue sorcerer, not capitalized Rogue Sorcerer.

TeK

It is the one she stole, but she accessed it through a different name. I wonder if it's literally Shine. Pilgrim's star is, er, Pilgrim's star, so the sun is out of question. And while Masego could probably manifest the sun, this sounds like an abhorrent waste of power for some superfluous reason. So not him.

Tycanor

Viv won't get a name back, if she does she cannot rule by Catherine's terms right? Same reason she was happy Cordelia didn't take the Warden name when it came along.

Liliet

Vivienne getting a Name or not is not something her or Catherine are likely to have a say in, alas (where by alas i mean fucking best).

But also the Accords have thrown out the "no Named rulers" clause, it was never workable.

Crash

Not so much thrown out as Cat has been very strongly told it's not happening due to it being the literal foundation of the Dominion lmao

She'd go for it, given the chance it's just that the others are currently refusing.

Liliet

It's not just the Dominion. Like, the Dominion is just an illustration of a more general principle.

Rulership and Names are inevitably intertwined. You can have non-Named rulers, but it might change any moment either due to a charismatic leader taking over (imagine if Accords said Kairos cannot be Tyrant of Helike. Poor Accords...) or due to a ruler growing into their competence and importance during a crisis to the point of getting a Name (and not everyone has an Augur to story-fight for them).

When a new nation forms, it has a Named or a band of Named forming it more often than not. When a nation throws of a foreign yoke, it has a Named or a band of Named leading that more often than not.

It's just HOW ROLES WORK.

The idea was always stupid. Cat's ideas are usually pretty good, but this? This was not one of those.

That she still wants it is... not a sign that there was ever a chance that it would work -_-

Crash

Oh I'm not saying it's a good idea or that it will work.

Just that she will fight for it becomes absolutely, completely impossible. Like if her heiress became Named.

That'd fuck everything up because there's no substitute for Vivienne.

Until then, Cat will continue to be stubborn about it. It's what she does haha

Mental Mouse

Back when she showed the Accords to Amadeus, he as much as told her "you aren't going to get that in the end, but you can trade it for some concession or other along the way".

Frivolous

I'm a little surprised that Andronike and Komena are not embodied again. I figured that was what it meant when Andronike invested most of the remaining Night into Ivah and also appeared to Masego as a woman with a silver mask.

I mean, she was prepared to lose most of Sve Noc's godly power, and Masego was able to touch her. I figured she'd retreated to her meat body.

But what with Andronike not reappearing in this Interlude, and only Rumena being Found by Hakram, I guess that means Andronike had only been an apparition, not a flesh and blood woman.

=====

Could someone please help me out by showing me where it says or does not say that you need a Name to detect an invisible person the way Lone Swordsman did and the way Vivienne does now?

I can't find any reference to it except in Heroic Interlude: Attaque au Fer. It's really bugging me that I don't know and can't find where Vivienne learned Willy's technique.

Matthew Wells

William didn't have that trick; Cat taught it to her after she joined the Woe. Sometime between the Battle of Four Armies and One and Second Liesse, if I recall correctly.

Frivolous

Matthew: Oh. Thank you.

Crash

William did have the trick, Thief used to get deeply annoyed that he always knew she was skulking about. He just never taught her.

Matthew Wells

Thought that was a Choir boy thing; he was also able to detect liars, which we've only seen GP use without an aspect.

Liliet

Andronike and Komena don't have meat bodies at this point as best I can tell. They ARE Night. They can create avatars to embody themselves, like the crows or the apparition Ivah saw, and that's as close to a "true body" as it comes for them.

Cicero

I don't think it requires a Name. It's just much like other instincts that are heightened by generic Name powers. It's not that ordinary people can't have those instincts, just that it takes a lot more effort and experience to train those instincts to work. I mean, Cat says she got her skill of noticing assassins by being followed around in secret for a couple weeks. I'd guess that for an ordinary person it would be more like a decade or two being at war, or in constant danger.

Of course, retired Named folk probably are able to retain the experience of using those instincts even if they don't have Name powers juicing them anymore.

Frivolous

Cicero: I've been reading from the start trying to isolate when and from whom (if she did not learn it on her own) Catherine learned to detect invisible people.

My guess, you see, is that the trick Cat learned can only be used by Named. If someone reliable like Lord Black claimed the same, then it may be Vivienne used a Name trick, which means she was the Shining Princess even in the tent fighting Varlet.

But it's just a guess. Still reading through old chapters.

Raven

"It rather amused the heiress" are we getting a hint at something here?

Morgenstern

Viv has been called heiress (though not Heiress) for a very long time...

mamm0nn

Mirror Knight: Don't worry, everyone! I'm here to save the day!

Random 4th Legion soldier: You suck!

2nd and 4th immediately rout

Robber: I'm one of those random goblins that fought the Vultures before and rallied you all to fight with courage again, wanna fight with me?

2nd and 4th stop routing

Viv: Also I'm here, and I brought the sun! Look how silly that Crab looks when you can actually see it! That thing can only scare someone when it's a large looming shadow!

2nd and 4th rally and fight back!

Viv: You're in the way, Mirror Knight! Get lost!

Zeze: I too am here, to remind you guys that there is goblinfire over there. We might want to not go back into that direction.

2nd and 4th immediately stop running towards the undead to kick their ass, to start orderly retreating. Thanks, Masego.

Yunamed

There's always beauty at the end...Thank you EE

Magicturtle

Im kinda starting to find this war a bit stale... While the writing is top notch as usual, you can only take so much of the same before it gets a bit boring. The alliance wanna do something?

Kether fucks it up. The battles just starts to feel the same after a while. I might just be salty cause i have been waiting so long for cats name to come though 😊

Burdi

same here, been waiting for cats Name since 2018

TeK

That is the point though. The war with Keter is, fundamentally, a gruelling, repetitive slug. If it evoked those feelings from you – good. Cause that's what it is.

Rohit Ramesh

That said, it's a bit of a low point in the serial. When we get a few chapters a week it's harder to stay attached to this book because of the pacing.

There's more than enough goodness to keep someone engaged when reading it through, but right now it's a slog. I can't see why others are getting annoyed.

Honestly, I expect it to read much better as part of complete book series or binged than it does right now.

Morgenstern

I can attest to that, as I binged the chapters of the last week. I'm not annoyed in the slightest, but only sad that I reached the end of the binge right now.

Daniel E

I know you meant to say 'slog', but I like yours better.

Captain Amazing

RIP Summoner. You were an asshole with Eridan Ampora levels of oblivious overconfidence and more ambition than sense, but I never got the impression you were a sociopath, which is saying a lot by villainous standards. Cross my fingers for necromancy solutions.

The Troubadour won't be missed, and the Silent Guardian was almost set up as tragedy fodder, no offence. Dunno about the Slayer as there wasn't enough screen time.

beleester

Yeah, the Summoner was personally annoying but actually had the skills to back it up. A real shame we won't get to see him grow out of that.

Frivolous

Captain Amazing: Is it possible that his name being Cedric was a sign he was going to die?

Cedrics aren't known for their longevity, are they? At least since Harry Potter.

origamiflame

Just as a thought, someone on reddit was mentioning the link between Cat and Odin, and now that she's lost an eye it's getting even closer...

Thanatoss

Epick, absolutely epic. I love it... Please more

Cold Cyberia

I think Grey Pilgrim is going to force Cat into a Name dream, like what Black did at the very beginning and what Masego helped with in Marchford. He's an old hand at Namelore and as a mentor figure he'll know how to jumpstart Names. Especially since conventional sorcerous and divine means of waking her up didn't work. Leaning on the narrative is the last option remaining. Anyway, I'm glad we're not stuck in a limbo with regards to her status.

Not sure what to think about Vivi getting a Name. It fits culturally and narratively, what with the last charge, but it spits in the face of the overall themes of not needing Named to save everyone, new world order, etc. Either way the development is pretty interesting.

My crazy prediction is this: the story of the battle of Hainaut is not the last stand against the Dead King. Instead, it's a story about who will fill in the Role of the Choir of Judgement. Sort of how the First Llesse was a story about Callow's soul and Cat was the synthesis of the new (Praes) and the old (Callow). This battle will be reframed as a story about the nature of judgement, with Cat being the synthesis of the divine (the Tribunal) and the strictly human (Anaxares).

Mental Mouse

I think if Judgement comes back into play that will be happening over at the bridge with Hanno's party.

Nicholas Koenig

I really like the idea of Cat becoming a replacement for the Choir of Judgement but I think she will do it as a villain. What have we heard again and again about the Gods Below. They Listen. They Remember. They Pay Their Debts in Full! What is that if not a concern for justice. I can see Cat replacing the Choir of Justice as a villain with the authority to ensure that everyone gets their due.

Liliet

I hate to break this to you, but capitalism isn't the essence of justice.

Not to be all political or anything.

Nicholas Koenig

I agree capitalism isn't the essence of justice. But what the Choir of Judgement was doing wasn't either. Replacing one incomplete vision of justice with another is not unreasonable.

Miles

We may not have justice but we do have Just Ice. Which is what's left of Sve Noc after the Night got ruined.

Liliet

The Choir of Judgement was at least fucking trying.

Sinead

To m, the issue with Judgement is the fact that mortals cannot access laws like that and consistently apply them to their actions even if they wanted to. Same with Mercy, but for the opposite, utilitarian view. And as has been pointed out, most people would be spared under Judgement rather than executed. Also, considering that Hanno gets a compulsion to flip a coin when around certain people, and he has never mentioned having such a compulsion around Cat, makes me curious if Cat has been deemed successful so far in threading the needle since Book 4 (thinking of her talk with Edward about "abdicate once you are no longer needed, lest you spoil everything you have bled to bring about.")

I think my issue with Judgement is more the fact that they never advise, they only judge. Mercy is the opposite in that they only advise, but never judge. If the Choirs took a role that brought their mandates into a less heavy handed role, they wouldn't be this often maligned force that they are often portrayed as. Perhaps that would come in time through the nature of the Accords.

This may also mean that the Ashuran mystery cult becomes the dominant face (hah) of Above's practise, if the idea of accessing the various facets of the Mandate of Heaven becomes a thing.

Liliet

> the fact that mortals cannot access laws like that and consistently apply them to their actions even if they wanted to. Same with Mercy, but for the opposite, utilitarian view.

I get the impression Judgement is also somewhat utilitarian in its "laws" – it applies only the most basic criteria of "will the world be better without this person based on their actions so far".

I think Hanno gets not so much a compulsion as an... itch? It's his personal thing, not externally opposed. He wants to get an answer, it bugs him. It's a curiosity/uncertainty/anxiety thing, not angels nudging him. Note that that guy (Arnaud of Cantal) turned out to be "on his side" – supporting Cordelia in her campaign to get people to actually work together and stop being a crab bucket.

Sinead

> I get the impression Judgement is also somewhat utilitarian in its "laws" – it applies only the most basic criteria of “will the world be better without this person based on their actions so far”.

Fair point! I think I was making the distinction between the two because I have understood Mercy “flexibility” to be the nature of utilitarianism compared to the more common deontological approach of the other Choirs. It’s the basis to how most Choirs impose a structure, while Mercy advises Tariq but he still makes the decision.

Then again, I see mortal approach to both of these systems ultimately converging, since perfect application of both should bring you to similar places (“The Right Thing”)

> I think Hanno gets not so much a compulsion as an... itch? It’s his personal thing, not externally opposed. He wants to get an answer, it bugs him. It’s a curiosity/uncertainty/anxiety thing, not angels nudging him. Note that that guy (Arnaud of Cantal) turned out to be “on his side” – supporting Cordelia in her campaign to get people to actually work together and stop being a crab bucket.

Also a good point. I have always read Arnaud as someone with a pretty dark past who is working to get out under the shadow of it, which may be the bias I am picking up from other people observing him.

Liliet

Arnaud is CURRENTLY known as a rapist, and appears to have deliberately adopted that as part of his reputation for what he does RIGHT NOW (well, at the time before he blew the cover, anyway). Now it can be argued whether he really did the thing or pretended he did without actually doing it, but “getting out from the shadow of a dark past” is high key NOT the vibe he’s giving off to me. More like “hiding in the shadow of a dark present”.

Sinead

That’s fair. I had understood that there was more to the rumours than may have actually be present in the text.

It doesn’t help that Arnaud just rubs the wrong way in most interactions on screen. I recognise that it’s an act (and an effective one), but it still makes him not my favourite character. That then bleeds into the rumour mill effect.

hakureireimu

> overall themes of not needing Named to save everyone

Is that even a theme? Do you think Cat will reject her new Name? Do you think Arthur should have rejected his?

Shveiran

Ok.

Ok.

1) This was awesome.

2) No, I mean it, this was fucking awesome.

3) ... With that said, what the fuck? Vivienne still has Summer's sun?

... Since when?

That... I want to say "that makes no sense", but by this point I know better. This series is absurdly good at being consistent. Still, this need explaining. How did Vivienne store it without being the Thief?

And why oh why did she never use it before? She went through a lot of dire situations while also struggling with immense feelings of inadequacy; and all the while, she was sitting on something like this and didn't use it?

Why didn't she bring it out in Keter, when Catherine was bound and the Empress was in sight? She had no way to know that Catherine was going to bring in the Wild Hunt with Call, and her plan was to shoot dozens of Sentinels with a crossbow she was no good at using.

Why didn't she use it during the Battle of the Camps, when Catherine was unconscious and she was struggling to come up with any possible alternative to unshackling Akua Murderhobo Sahelian?

This was so, so awesome. I want it to make sense so badly. Someone please make it make sense again.

Liliet

I have a whole TWO answers for you, either of which could work independently but it's probably both together!

(No, Vivienne does not still have the sun, it was returned to Summer when Cat bargained with them at Dormer. But)

1. Masego had Witnessed the sun, it was the birth of the Aspect and everything as you remember, it's what he got his eyes from.

Given a sufficient amount of power to draw on, he can therefore replicate it at need.

2. Vivienne has long been speculated to be destined for the Shining Princess Name, and a sun sure is a shining thing 9u9

agumentic

> Masego had Witnessed the sun, it was the birth of the Aspect

It wasn't, actually. He got Witness during Woe's travel to Keter when he and Akua were working on accessing echoes of the Bard and the Dead King.

Liliet

Did he?

Alright, Witness is not mentioned in the High Noon -> Close sequence...

> "You demand the miraculous on the schedule of the shoddy," Masego muttered, then paused.

>

> His saw his glass eyes turn to peer behind him while the rest of his body remained still.

>

> "Could it be that simple?" he said.

>

> "You've dealt with miracles before," I encouraged.

>

> "I've vivisected and employed parts of them," he corrected absent-mindedly. "But the gap is one of understanding, and I have a mechanism at hand to correct that failing."

>

> I felt him gather power without ever chanting or drawing a rune. Not shaping it for a spell, I thought. Drawing it into himself. I opened my mouth to ask, but Akua discretely shook her head.

>

> "A mystery," Hierophant muttered to himself. "In the technical sense. Foolish, foolish. I saw, when in transitioned. Quantification is anathema to higher sorceries."

>

> His hand shot out and he clasped my wrist.

>

> "Yes," he grinned. "They will not deny me, be they Gods or fathers. I will Witness."

>

> A ripple passed across the world, and what it left behind was no longer an echo.

...yeah, you're right, he did THAT without even the Aspect. In my defense, he does reference his transition here, there are related themes ._.

thanks ♥

TeK

I feel that the sun was hidden in the space of narrative potential. Not unlike a Thief of Stars, a Thief who stole the Sun is a significant enough event to be part of Vivienne's legend, for a lack of a better world. As for sun being returned, well, given it wasn't an actual celestial body (and we aren't going to touch whether or not celestial bodies do even exist in the Guideverse) but a metaphorical representation of one. While it was "returned" the connection still remains. So when a Shining Prince needed to, well, shine, the Aspect replicated both the most shining thing Vivi had seen AND did.

Liliet

The narrative kind of glossed over it burning her hands to char back then, but that sure happened.

Matthew Wells

Vivienne just kinda ignored a lot of permanent injuries when she was the Thief.

Liliet

I mean, she kind of had Masego right there. He's an excellent healer.

I will note Vivienne got extreme burns, specifically, approximately every time she was in a major engagement with the Woe. Five Armies: the hand(s). Dormer: got caught stealing sun banners. Liesse II: Cat set the palace on goblinfire. Keter: got lightning-fried by Malicia's mages... Like holy shit. Vivi.

Matthew Wells

She also took two direct hits from Masego during the attack on Warlock's Tower, although those were just 'fling target like a ragdoll', not fire.

Liliet

Yeah, I'm amazed by the sheer specificity of the kind of damage, despite the disparity of sources. Summer twice, goblinfire, lightning...

Sinead

I assumed that Vivienne is associated with the Sun after being the Thief of the Sun. So while they released it, holding it however briefly left it's mark. Think of how Cat can still have influence on the Fae even after Winter has been devoured by Sve Noc. As such she can invoke an echo of it in this rising power as a Shining Princess (though I am hoping for a Dawn Princess - > Sun Queen personally).

Callow has already had the Shining Prince(ss) Name, so this can be a reimagining of that Name in line with the rest of Vivienne's legend as the Queen of Thieves. So she couldn't do this before because she wasn't the person she needed to be to do this before now.

Crash

That is not quite comparable I don't think. Winter was devoured yeah but also Catherine became First Under Night, the exact thing that devoured Winter. Plus it's not like Winter had no effect in the Night, Cat mentions the effects it had. It's not a stretch to believe that this is a two-way street.

The fact she used to be the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, a fae title is also probably helping out a lot.

This legend as a Queen of Thieves is also quite a big stretch. She was queen of the thief's guild yes, but it wasn't a big part of her. If anything, the fact she broke the Dark Guilds and folded them into her Jacks is much more important to her character; less thief, more spymistress.

Her story here is not as a thief of any kind either. She is literally coming to raise the morale of her army at their darkest hour because there is nobody else who can right now, this is more Shining Princess, yes; but no thieving in sight. Unless you want to say she is 'stealing the victory' but that feels... weak.

This may turn to be an Aspect of hers, if indeed she has gained a Name but I don't know, still think it's more likely to be Hierophant's doing. The Sun isn't really the important aspect of that Yoink, it's that she delivered when she had to; that at the moment of extremely high pressure, when all her friends were depending on her she came through. It might easily have been a storm of fire that she stole, the attack wasn't the point.

Sinead

Fair enough on all counts. My reason for a Sun related Name is more of an dualism to Cat's own reign shaping the culture of Callow as it emerges from the Conquest and into the Age of Order. So a Black Queen/Crown followed by a Dawn/Sun would be an interesting motif. Basically a similar relationship as the Helike Kings and Tyrants.

At the point I wrote that, I had missed that Hierophant had headed to the gate, so Vivienne was the only other source I could see.

Rey d`Tutto

Dawn Princess who follows after the First Under the Night?

Sinead

I presume that while the Name of Black Queen never manifested fully here, it still will exist in the Callowan cultural fabric to be the flip side of the Good Crown. I also just like the contrast between Cat's main time ruling Callow as the last Queen of Winter (even if she never held that much metaphysical power) as Moonless Nights contrasted with her successor being an embodiment of an "enlightened era". Callow now has refined this mindset of "hard monarchs who get the job done" through Cat, and this idea of it being followed by a restorative monarch.

Whether it actually becomes the case that Black Queen->Dawn Princess->Sun Queen remains to be seen, or if this is just a once off. I just think the slight shift from the original Callowan tradition of Good Queen/King would be interesting considering the changes of the last ~25 years since the Conquest.

Liliet

At a guess: Vivienne is doing the sun thing with Masego's support... AND getting a Name out of it.

So. Fucking. Cool.

And really hope I was wrong about both Robber and Pickler dying here :x

Crash

Sure seems possible, with the goblins dying in droves.

Your Shining Princess theory is looking real good right now. (still hoping for Heiress though)

Liliet

Heiress is a plausible villain name, so it's not as funny for a member of the Woe, to me -\(/-_-)\/-

Crash

I've no idea what that emoji is supposed to convey haha is it a shrug?

It's a traditionally Praesi Name yeah but that's why I find it interesting. Vivienne is very Callowan so that'd be kinda neat. It's also one of the transitional Names which is why it being usually villainous isn't that big a deal since she might well go into Shining Princess later and that'd be even cooler.

That said I'm not convinced the Name itself is villainous, think it's more like Squire, could go either way. It's just that Praesi were, traditionally, the ones with a legacy they wanted to go into. Or, more likely, the usual heirs to the throne of Callow went straight into Shining Princess > Good Queen. They were never quite in the groove of the Heir to something entirely new, but more in the tried and true martially capable prince rides into battle one. Which doesn't fit Viv, even though she is doing it this very chapter it's not because this is her forte; it's because someone has to. She's not a general in that way, she is an heiress to Catherine's new rules of engagement and do what we must mentality.

Fuck I feel like that was rambly and still didn't get my point accross. Ah well.

Liliet

yes, it is

I said though that it's PLAUSIBLY villainous, which is to say, unless she outright wields Light, everyone can say "of course, another villain of the Woe". While Shining Princess is definitely 100% guaranteed or your money back heroic.

Crash

Would that help any? Didn't they have all kinds of weird stories floating about on how the Thief(which was apparently a heroic name, go figure) was overtaken by the ~evil wiles~ of the Squire? and corrupted by the Woe/had always been a villain anyway?

Her having a clearly heroic Name won't stop people from being all like "of course the Woe is evil!"

Liliet

Sure, but it'll make the contortions much more entertaining!

TeK

Holy shit. While I cannot shame anyone for running at that point, it does kinda lessen the cognomen Second Army had been given, if they broke ranks literally in the next fight.

Sinead

The cognomen was based around the speech of "I am asking more of you than I have any right to ask, and I will continue to do that because you are all I have to see this done."

The story of the Second is the fact that they held without breaking, but also acknowledged that they have paid their dues. I think that they will be fine.

There couldn't be a Battle of Hainaut without a Battle for Malac's Boot. And they buckled, yes, but those in leadership backed their faith and so they shall hold one more time.

Rey d`Tutto

They broke rank due to Catherine's absence, and rallied to Viv's presence.

Evgeny Permyakov

>> "There is a way," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It would be ruinous, but there is a way."

OK, that's not ominous at all.

Pilgrim, what the fuck?

hoser2

Yes. What will be ruined? How? And to what end?

The ruin seems related to either waking Catherine or what Catherine will do when she wakes. I infer from the context that the ruin applies to an effect on the alliance, as ruining the Dead King's stuff would seem to be a benefit.

If the ruin is something Catherine does after she wakes, it could be her one time use of a stolen aspect. However, I am not aware of a relevant aspect on cooldown that could be looted and thereby ruined that way.

Otherwise, her known tricks seem to be Speaking, use of Night, one-time use of stolen aspects and Gate-making.

The thing that has to be dealt with seems to be the Crab, unless Vivienne has an answer for it. Gate-making seems like it could help with the Crab. Do you drop something from a gate onto it or have it fall into Twilight through a gate? Or is there a more elegant solution? Lakeomancy is such a cliché at this point that it becomes dangerous because it is expected and the DK could trap the attempt.

Sinead

I think it's that it will cost a lot of resources that could be used elsewhere to get Cat to rise, and it might not work. Say using Tariq, Hakram and Masego as anchors in this ritual (though it might be that Masego is helping Vivienne with this Sun banner)

Liliet

Masego said that he went to the gates.

Sinead

I had forgotten that.

I feel my general point still stands.

I hope this isn't Cat's Name gets it's spine broken again". One, we have already seen that happen. And two, Cat has really anthropomorphised her Name to the point that I like the idea of a Name that has "learned" not to be hindered the same way again.

In this case, I would find it interesting if it's more that Tariq doesn't want Cat to become Named, because he has dedicated his life to smothering out villains before they would have reached the heights she did. Tariq doesn't actually believe that the Accords will succeed. He just thinks it's better than the alternative and will at least by Calernia a few decades of reprieve.

I just hoe we just get one last "Cat Name Dream" hurrah with her talking to Dread Empress Victorious and Good Queen Catherine the Great in terms of the fact that with her carving this new groove, she is standing at a momentous pivot.

Liliet

(And she socks them both in the face and takes the third road, again)

Sinead

If her new Name is Neutral in Role (thinking of how Indrani and Hye are described as sometimes fulfilling Heroic Roles), it might be interesting if instead of murder, she binds them instead. A spritual manifestation of a personal Accord

hoser2

Maybe. I know nothing.

For me, "ruinous" implies harmful destruction, sacrifice or loss beyond opportunity cost, although opportunity cost could indeed be heavy. Someone suggested above forcing Cat's name prematurely and losing some potency. That fit for me as a possibility.

Xinci

Well, under the Sun, Summer knows no defeat. What Cat saw was a overall pattern so I suppose the Name Shining Princess makes sense, even if it wasn't exactly like this in its previous iterations. Doesn't even need the Name if the pattern is that deep and recurring I suppose.

As a side-note I wonder about how well the Army of Callow can make up for its losses in skilled personnel, in casualties, and in experience. The Night would be useful as a sort of last chance, method to save information and experience and transfer it to a part of ones societal construct but with what has happened to it, it is likely too fragmented for such use at the moment. The general also brought up the mental aspects of war and I wonder what techniques they have for processing and healing wounds of the mind as well as those of the body. In a environment of ever-coming conflict, societal constructs like Callow and Praes would have a lot of pressure to innovate methods that aid both the body and the mind not crack under the pressure of war. And with their current mingled interactions, its pretty likely a good bit of that trickled down to the army of Callow. Light with whats been shown so far may or may not be able to do it? It can be soothing but miraculous healing doesn't harm what isnt natural, so its a question of time perhaps? A good amount of such mental injuries do legitimately have physical issues in the brain that can be healed naturally over time so I suppose there is a angle there. Sorcery could also do the same things as Light for some of that but that's a question of knowledge. Admittedly I would assume the Praesi to have a pretty good understanding of biology in such things so the Army of Callow may actually have a pretty good level of skill in its mage corps for such things. Though given how badly their numbers have been butchered, that level of skill may drop rather shortly. Hopefully Cat and Vivien work on some contingencies to save, improve, and reiterate the methodologies that worked into Callow as a institution.

With the Night as it is, the Drow and indirectly Cat, have potentially lost much of their ability to save and transmit information. Though I am still unsure, it was notable that they worked the Night together in the Everdark, so separated as they are and embodied in physical Drow, the efficiency of much of the Night may lower. They have lost a lot of the contained information I presume, though the notion of reclamation, and Ruin being a aspect of study does perhaps mean a good bit could be salvaged. Still the amount of new Night and how it will be processed, may result in a good bit of degradation for the Drow as a functional group, kind of like a weakening cardiovascular system impacting the rest of the bodies functioning. It is interesting to note that the Mighty had protections against such things, so hypothetically if Sve had a proper network of loyal Mighty like the Longstriders, she may have been able to better salvage herself this time. Perhaps almost like nodes of ranvier but made of a full on biological entity? It is in part rather lucky and somewhat understandable that the Dead King didnt craft the ritual with the thought of getting a full half of the Night.

Mental Mouse

> Well, under the Sun, Summer knows no defeat. ... Doesn't even need the Name if the pattern is that deep and recurring I suppose.

Ohhh! I think you may have something there, even if it's Masego providing the "sun".

nipi

Hmmm... We have not seen Cat drop a fortress out of a gate jet. Wonder if its an appropriate occasion to drop it on the Crab or near/around the gate to allow for a safe retreat?

onedollargum

"Where to, my lady?" Bagram asked.

"Where the hammer will fall," Vivienne replied. "The gates."

It's moments of dramatic tension like this that I'm really glad the response wasn't "To war".

Sinead

I literally cackled as Vivienne came into her own glory there.

I call that 2/3 so far, with the 3rd to be confirmed.

Great chapter, though I am curious as to what resources they will have to take on Keter.

Cat may have to bring everyone else in line beford heading to Keter.

'Ladi Williams

Awesome

Nicholas Koenig

I agree that we are witnessing the end of the Age of Wonders, which was really the age of the lone hero/heroine. Triumphant (may she never return) is probably the ideal type for the age, we don't know the name of a single person who worked with or under her, unless you count the Dead King and he is more god than person.

More recently though the decisive thing has always been groups, either long term bands of five like the Calamities and the Woe or nations under their leaders. The change we are seeing is not the end of the Named but the strengthening of society and the norms that make it work well. Named aren't going away they are being placed under the law.

As a result I think Vivian is getting a Name and she is going to end up being the model of what it means to be a Named in the new world that is coming into being.

Sinead

I wonder if this becomes both an ideal for getting the White Knight out of the picture both because he does have the power to lead a charge to break the bridge and also because he would be the wrong sort to rally the front. His presence would be similar to that of Mirror Knight, and they just need someone to help bring the Broken Bells to the fore and rally forces that Hanno would not have had the pull to do so. Named are still key, but they are not the improbable forces that Hanno represents, even if he also believes in empowering others.

I wonder if we will see a scene between Squire and Vivienne in the aftermath. That would be neat, since he may see Vivienne as someone who would be key to bringing about the "spirit of Callow" as he sees it.

Further rambling here.

If Vivienne is coming into some form of Shining Princess, this basically means that she has been anointed by the Heavens as Callow's spiritual guardian (and this isn't Above's knife at Cat. It's the tradition of Callow prior to the Conquest). I kind of want to see Cat pass the crown to Vivienne in the denouement of this book. Then again, as stated before, I loved Cat's moments with Edward, so it would be cool to see Cat on the other side.

Nicholas Koenig

You mentioned both Squire and Callow's traditions prior to the Conquest and that gives me a place to put what I have been thinking about what comes next. I don't think Vivienne's charge will be enough to rout the Dead. I expect the Dead King still has more tricks up his sleeve. What Vivienne's charge does do (assuming we are correct that she has gotten one of Callow's traditional heroic royal names) is make the fight for the gate into the classic Callowean story of the heroic stand to turn turn back evil at the gates. Vivienne has herself and the Army of Callow but to win she will also need a band with the traditional Callowean names.

Isn't it convenient that there are three transitional names wondering around in a group that we haven't heard anything about in a while. I think it is time for them to show up and take their place with Vivienne. We have heard the name Wizard of the West dozens of times but never met anyone with that Name, I think apprentice is getting it. Arthur Foundling cannot get a Royal name if Vivienne is holding one but he is devoted to the Light and the Gods Above and is a Knight, I expect he will be either Paladin or Crusader (since White Knight is taken). When we saw the name Page in the past it was as support for the Exiled Prince, Page may keep his name or switch to an adult name that supports Vivienne. That leave Vivienne one short of a band of five, I expect the fifth will be a foreigner to represent Callow's allies. If Page or Squire are killed then the fifth will be General Abigail possibly with a name like Stonewall.

hakureireimu

Vivienne already has a band of 5—the Woe. Cat specifically refused to kick her out last book even though she didn't have a Name anymore.

Hitogami

The problem with Names is that technically it takes time to grow into them, even if it's from a transitional Name. It's never an instantaneous power up so much as a steady upgrade with a few thresholds for power increase.

Even if those guys get a hold of powerful names, they still need time to properly grow into the aspects.

Cicero

While that is somewhat true, the act of gaining a name usually does provide some immediate power boost that then fades back to a lower level, after which the progression you talk about begins.

Hitogami

As I understand it that applies more to unnamed to Named conversions rather than progressing from a transitional Name. There's a small boost in power if they get a combat-related name but they lose versatility from their previous aspects

Mental Mouse

No way would Abigail get Stonewall – that's just not what she does! She might well get "the Fox" or some variation, people are already calling her that.

Liliet

I would argue Dead King IS the perfect icon of the Age of Wonders – everyone else during it was trying to be him. Well, all the villains I mean, heroes were more reactive though so it's still about his influence.

SpeckofStardust

I mean the fact that the age of wonders is dead really fits for the you know Dead king after all the tyrant did slay it.

Cicero

Although it's possible that this is just signalling Viv finally gaining the respect she needs as the heiress of Callow, the ending does strongly imply that Viv might have gained a Name again: Something Princess.

Of course, the traditional Callowan name would be Shining Princess. But I don't know how that flows with the Black Queen, First under the Night, and all the other night and darkness imagery around Cat and Callow right now.

I guess Dark Princess is possible, or maybe something on the boundary of night and day, Dawn Princess?

Of course, there is nothing preventing her from having more than one way of saying her Name. Just as the Grey Pilgrim is also the Peregrine.

John

Pilgrim says you can send a hero to kill a monster and have the narrative backing you up, but not a city. That crab is also described as a mobile fortress. What DO you send?

Sappers crack open fortresses; Robber and Pickler are unaccounted for. Akua has far more personal expertise specific to mobile cities full of undead than anyone in the Grand Alliance.

Cicero

A villain. A villain can have a narrative about destroying a city.

Frivolous

Cicero: I think I agree. Akua and Catherine and Masego and each been awesomely destructive at times.

Akua killed a city once. Catherine did that trick in the Underdark where she dropped a whole room into Arcadia. Masego nearly destroyed all of Iserre.

superkeaton

Rip Summoner and Troubadour.

hoser2

The Crab is a moving city. That much mass could never be lifted. Nor could it move faster than a glacier, change direction or stop. Magic has to be doing those things. Attack (or ruin?) that magic and it could self destruct.

The fact that they have been so zealously guarded implies vulnerability.

hoser2

It's a cliché at this point, but don't you have to throw the Mirror Knight at it?

sengachi

Ohhh, now I see why Vivienne had to be here.

If she hadn't, high command would have been slaughtered by the Varlet and this rout would have just kept cascading. And in the absence of Catherine and with all the Named engaged elsewhere, there was no one else who could have stopped a Revenant assassin and rallied the fleeing Callowans.

Frivolous

sengachi: True. Agree.

Hmm. It just occurred to me now that it was awfully coincidental that Prince Arsene of Bayeux was absent.

I now suspect that Arsene knew that the Varlet would attack the command tent, and he sent his niece Marceline there and told her not to interfere when the Varlet slaughtered everyone else.

Tohron

One thing I remembered: they have Gigantes with the army, since they helped open the gate, but they haven't gotten involved yet. Seems like Ligurian sorcery would be a good counter to the Crab.

Rabblrouser

Reading that the heroes get crushed is so disheartening. This whole chapter made me nervous and sad.

Interlude: Lost & Found

"To sacrifice is to embrace end for the sake of beginning."

– Daphne of the Homilies, best known for ending hereditary rule in Atalante

Special Tribune Robber of the Rock Breaker tribe threw himself to the side, landing in sprawl as the dead scrabbled at him. No point in even stabbing at those, he figured, there were too many for a knife to do any good. Nails ripped at his face before he bit the fingers off and spat out the fouled blood, wriggling through the hands and blades of the writhing mass of undead. A sharper went off close, biting thunder in a ball, and it was an opening. Tripping through shredded flesh and iron, sucking deep of the smoke, the goblin crawled beneath some Bind in bronze armour and tumbled down the stairs. He reached for a sharper of his own but found his bag ripped open – half his munitions were gone, and he'd spent most of the other half.

Cackling out a curse, Robber ducked under some skeleton's axe swing and pushed the dead down onto the corpse on the stair below it. A blade rang against his back, biting at the mail, but he scuttled down the corpse he'd pushed and leapt off the makeshift ramp. He landed among a pack of ghouls, all of them turning like bloodhounds with bared fangs, but there was a flash of heat as a streak of flame coming from above cut through a few. Claws ripped at his side, but these creatures he could wound. He stabbed the ghoul's eyes twice, moving so it shielded him from the others as it screamed, and made a run for it down the cobblestone road as a volley of shining spears began to fall from above.

There were still a few skeletons in the way, but Robber slipped by after hamstringing one from behind with a laugh. The barricade was covered in soot and blood, but the legionaries manning it seemed in a decent enough mood as they opened their shields to let him through. Catching a few whispers of his name, Robber took a moment to preen under their gazes before getting to business.

"I'm looking for Poulain street," the Special Tribune said, dusting off his shoulders. "Happened to get lost on the way. Don't suppose any of you have directions to offer?"

"We're two blocs west, sir," a young lass answered. "It's the next barricade, can't miss it. We had to collapse the street in between when the lines buckled."

When the lines had broken, more like, but that wasn't the kind of talk the officers would be encouraging. Robber had been extracting himself from enemy lines while that disaster had come home to roost, but he's still been able to spare a glance or two for the sight of the Second and Fourth legging it. Someone – probably one of the Woe, it was usually a safe bet when it came to shit like this – had since hung a sun in the sky and what was probably Vivienne had led a countercharge that'd ended the rout. How long that would last, though, was a question digging at him. It'd take more than a lightshow and a banner to turn this around.

"Good, I was already getting bored," Robber grinned. "Do finish that Bone I stabbed earlier, would you? I hate to leave the work half-done."

A few laughs, some solemn vows, but some of them wanted more. Aside from a few stray attacks at their barricade they must not have seen much action tonight, considering they were too far to the east of the where the Grey Legion had struck.

"Preparing another spot of goblinfire, sir?" a sergeant asked. "Most the city saw your last one, it'll be hard to beat."

Not exactly. The barricade on Poulain street was where his cohort was meant to rally after it had scattered during their deep strike on the constructs. It was where the goblin would learn how many of his marauders had made it out – one in five, one in ten? For all he knew, he might be the only survivor. There'd been close calls, making his way back to safe grounds. Borer at least ought to have made it back, he decided. The good captain was already dead inside, Keter's boys wouldn't even notice he wasn't on their side.

"Half the fun's in the surprise," Robber chided. "Any of you lot heard where Lady Vivienne would be at?"

"Word is the princess is out west, with the Hierophant," the same lass from earlier said. "They're driving back the Grey Legion."

The princess? He eyed the others, and though some eyes had been rolled at the title no one had apparently cared to contest it. Not even the few orcs in the crowd, the lot that tended to get touchiest where the Boss was involved. Dartwick wouldn't knife Catherine, mind you. Didn't have the stones, and she had the crown neatly lined up in a few years anyway. Her little charge tonight had made a splash, though, and that devil wasn't ever going to get shoved back in the circle. All above his paygrade that, so he didn't spare more thought for it. He took his leave instead, taking to the rooftops instead of sticking down in the streets where the dead swarmed. It was a good city for that, built mostly in stone instead of wood, and there'd been plenty of slate for the roofs.

It was easy to find where sappers had blocked off the street in the middle, since they'd knocked down houses on both sides until the street reached a temple of the House of Light with a small belfry jutting out. It was through there that Robber passed, lingering beneath the bells so he could have a proper look at the battle below.

Almost immediately, he let out a whistling hiss through his teeth. Looked good, at first glance, but he'd been in a battle or two since the College. The eerie sun up above was keeping the Grey Legion bogged down and the centre of the Army of Callow's line had steadied, but he wasn't seeing a lot of holes in the ranks of the steel-clad dead and that was bad news. Meant once Ol' Bones broke this binding, and he would, it would start smelling like rout again. The flanks, which were all Fourth army, were being pressured as well. The Crab was spitting out dead by the hundreds through ramps docked against the gates and the ramparts, and the only reason the lines hadn't shattered was that the bastions and ramparts were good bottlenecks.

The trouble with bottlenecks was that Keter tended to throw constructs at them 'til they popped, and Robber wasn't seeing much that'd be able to handle them. If a few Named were to pop up, maybe, but with the entire city being squeeze tight at the moment there was no guarantee of guardian devils – or angels. Special Tribune Robber, for the first time in years, allowed himself to curse quietly in the stonetongue. At this rate, the battle was lost. To that he only knew one solution: he'd pick up what was left of his cohort and find the Boss.

—

The Black Queen was as a needle in a haystack, were the haystack aflame and swarming with soldiers. It should have been impossible to find her, for the shade left to guard over her would be hiding her from the enemies still seeking her death, but in truth it was merely improbable.

To Tariq Fleetfoot, that change of word made all the difference

The Adjutant was not swift on his crutches, but that did not matter when their steps were guided by something greater than they. Listening to his instincts and the whispers that went beyond them, the Grey Pilgrim led them down alleys and through broken shops, weaving through smoke and screams as the city began to die around them. The western wall was going to fall, the Ophanim whispered. Soon. Time was running out. It was in a pleasure house they found the Queen of Callow, the establishment long empty and closed save through passages that the dead would not find easily. Not so for the Pilgrim, who led the Adjutant down them until they were intercepted by drow in the colours of the Losara Sigil.

From there it was not a long walk to the madam's room, where Akua Sahelian was zealously keeping watch over the unconscious body of Catherine Foundling. As always the shade's emotions were difficult to properly Behold, as if muted by night or smoke, but Tariq found both anguish and a shaded sort of pride there. As if she herself had done something worth lauding, though a feeling of... transgression? Yes, transgression was threaded into it. She also held sway over the drow, who cleared the room when she asked them to and left the three of them alone with the slumbering Black Queen. Tariq was somewhat amused to see that even in times of hardship she made a point of greeting the Adjutant formally and first before cursorily acknowledging his presence.

"And what is it that brings you here?" Akua Sahelian asked. "It will be some time before the way to the next safehouse is clear, we can afford to speak some."

"The Peregrine," the Adjutant growled, "claims he has a way to wake Catherine. A ruinous one."

Wariness, in this one, but also expectation. Tariq was perhaps not trusted, but at least trusted to deliver. The insult, though, he would not let pass quietly.

"You mistake me," the Grey Pilgrim said, tone sharp for all the calmness. "Am I some petty conjurer, to pay my debts in the blood of others? I am a servant of Mercy, now and in all things: I will visit no ruin on others I am not willing to visit on me and mine."

The orc studied him a moment, then inclined his head.

"You have my apology, then," Adjutant said.

It was sincerely meant, and so Tariq let it end at that.

"I can wake the Black Queen because the Ophanim will lend me their hand in the work," Tariq said. "And when she wakes, I am to offer her a bargain."

The shade studied him.

"Were they not willing to lend their help earlier?" Akua Sahelian asked.

Tariq did not answer, which he supposed was damning enough. The Ophanim would not be moved to lend their help to one of Below's, even one allied to them, were the consequences of refusing that help not calamitous. It was not simply in their nature to do so, to abet greater suffering to come for the sake of lesser suffering taking place. The greatest concession they could make was absence of action. Tariq had asked back then and they had refused, only for him to find his own skills with Light insufficient for the task. Even now, when they had conceded after he asked a boon of them, it ran against their nature to accept his request.

"Charming," the shade said, tone dripping with aristocratic disdain. "Still, better late than never I suppose."

The Adjutant cleared his throat.

"And what was is my presence required for, Peregrine?"

Tariq cocked an eyebrow. He had believed it obvious.

"Because you are the person Catherine Foundling loves most in the world," he said. "If I were the one to call her out of her slumber, I would be refused. You will not be."

Something golden bloomed inside the Adjutant, in the wake of his words. Love returned, but there were shades to it. Relief, guilty surprise, shame, vindication? For all that they were often shallow, the orc's emotions were among the most complex that the Grey Pilgrim had ever seen. The Adjutant nodded, face grown taut.

"What must I do?" he asked, his voice rough.

Before Tariq could answer, he was interrupted.

"She will lose nothing through this ritual you press on her?"

Akua Sahelian did not quite believe him, it seemed. She had not been raised to believe in fair dealings.

"It is not a service I render her to wake," Tariq plainly said.

"Speak the words, Pilgrim," the shade said, golden eyes gone hard.

"She will not be harmed by this," the Pilgrim flatly said.

The dark-skinned woman eyed him for a moment, then sighed and moved away. Frustration bloomed in her, regret and resignation warring. Heeding Tariq's instruction, the Adjutant took the hand of his mistress with his fingers of bone and held it. Eyes closed the orc began to breathe in and out evenly. The Ophanim murmured uncertainly in the Pilgrim's ears as he approached, but he reminded them of their promise. He laid hand on the Black Queen's neck, grimacing at the sight of the fresh scar she'd earned tonight. That eye would not be returned to her, not if it had been taken by an aspect. Enough distraction, he chided himself. Turning his attention inwards, Tariq sunk into the Light.

He did not draw it into him, to be wielded or shaped, but instead immersed his own soul into the light of the Heavens made manifest. Earthly senses began to fade even as the voices of the Ophanim became clearer, louder. They guided his hands, patient teachers that they were, even as he shared a shard of the Light with the Black Queen's body. She was not entirely human, he saw with startlement. Differences had been made, set into the essence of her body. The work of the goddesses of theft and murder she worshipped, the old priest decided, for this seemed not dissimilar to the boon that kept the Mighty ageless: Catherine Foundling's lifespan had been stretched out, as if every day she had been born to live was to take a hundred instead to be spent. And there was more, a deeper shaping that he found only as the shard of Light found its way to what he sought.

The very soul of the Black Queen.

It was still the same mangled thing it had been since that first time he glimpsed it by campfire, scarred and cut and hacked away at. The difference was that it had been... facilitated towards Night. It had helped the stretching of the lifespan, the Ophanim spoke in their coldly ringing voices, but it had not been the purpose. Catherine Foundling could hold more Night than a mortal should, absurdly more. More than she would be able to wield, Tariq thought, which meant wielding had not been the purpose. A receptacle, the Ophanim said. A vessel. Not for possession, but for the hiding away of their power and godhead should it be threatened. It no longer seemed words of simple trust, when the Eldest Night had told him that had their chosen been awake the Dead King's trap would not have been a threat.

Tariq went deeper still, finding the great wisps of the Bestowal shaping itself around the unconscious woman. It tasted of authority, he thought, as if the commanding ring of her words had not told him that already. Of steel. And of something else, something that eluded his understanding. East, the Ophanim said. What would birth her Bestowal lay in the east, not this endless nightmare war. And it was a purpose bound to another, like bound stars, calling and casting away. Is this what is to come? The Ophanim could not tell. The future was clouded, darkened. And the Pilgrim's flicker of Light went deeper still, until it touched the sleeping mind of the queen. The consciousness swatted away the touch, as hard-bitten in the throes of dreams as it was when awake.

So Tariq left another to the work, simply bringing forth the presence of the Adjutant and the Black Queen he served. What was spoken there between souls he did not watch, for it was not his place, but as the Grey Pilgrim emerged gasping from the Light he heard another gasping breath along with his. Catherine Foundling, helped into a sitting position on the bed by Akua Sahelian, was opening her eyes. Eye, now, he supposed. He watched the realization of that particular change sink in as she groped at her face. Her lips tightened, then she breathed out. Tariq was surprised to realize that he could sometimes glimpse the outermost edges of her soul now, of her emotions. The protection of the Crows had weakened.

"Fuck," the Queen of Callow cursed. "I got shot by the Hawk, didn't I?"

"Yes," Hakram Deadhand fondly rasped. "Even after all that talk about keeping an eye out."

"Hey now," Queen Catherine blearily muttered, "did I do hand jokes?"

"Yes," the Adjutant said.

"Constantly," Akua Sahelian agreed.

"It was one of the first things you said to me after your return from the Everdark," the Adjutant noted.

Tariq kept silent, letting her draw on the comfort of their company without spoiling it by reminding her of his presence, and she gathered herself with a sigh as the shade pressed a cushion under her back.

"That one's going to sting, and the Night feels like it's gone through a wringer," the Black Queen frowned. "Don't suppose you could bring me up to speed, Tariq?"

"We have," the Grey Pilgrim simply said, "lost the battle."

Disbelief, tempered by what he suspected was a reminder to herself about patience. It had that self-inflicted note to it.

"Breaches?" she asked.

"There have been," Tariq says. "And there will be more."

"That can be turned around," the Black Queen said. "Even if your Choir disagrees."

"The Crab has made an appearance," the Adjutant gravelled. "The Grey Legion breached the gates and the Fourth and Second routed until Vivienne rallied them."

That gave her pause, Tariq saw, though her soul was obscured to his sight.

"Your opinion?" she asked the orc.

"If we do not retreat," the Adjutant said, "we risk annihilation."

Tariq watched the shudder of fear and fury and recrimination go through her, taking no pleasure in it. He, too, understood what this night would cost them. What it had already cost them. The queen glanced at the shade, who shook her head. Her opinion was no different.

"I reserve the right to change my mind," the Black Queen coolly said, "but let's say I believe you. You didn't spend time and tricks in the middle of this nightmare to wake me up so we could have a pleasant chat, Pilgrim. What is it you want from me?"

She thought differently than the Black Knight did, Tariq noted. He tended to begin with larger concepts and then narrow in, while she instead went down winding but narrow paths. That way of silencing almost all of their mind in order to focus on the opposition, though, was eerily similar.

"There is something that can be done," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Something that will deny the Enemy its victory. But the price of it will be, as I have told the Adjutant, ruinous."

"To you," the Black Queen said, eyes narrowing.

And that is why half the world fears you, child, Tariq thought, not without fondness.

"Yes," he simply said.

"The price?"

"Blood and smoke."

She breathed out shallowly.

"A dear price," the Black Queen murmured. "And so now you would bargain."

She paused.

"Your prayer, it will end this?"

"As if it were written in the stars," Tariq smiled, amused at his own expense.

"What do you want for it?" she asked.

"Three boons," the Pilgrim said, "Once before, I entrusted you with the two I believe will be the future of my home."

"Those troublesome lordlings," she frowned.

Underneath it, though, he glimpsed a flicker of affection threaded with irritation. They had learned more from her than she knew, though she had never claimed them as students.

"See them through this war," Tariq quietly asked. "And when they take leave of you, see them off ready to face the trials that lay ahead."

She considered him for a moment, that sole eye cold and measuring. Slowly, she nodded. There was something of a commotion outside the room, but Tariq paid it no mind. Nothing could be more important than this single conversation.

"Make peace with the White Knight," Tariq asked. "That this civility may one day pass to all in service of Above and Bellow."

He glimpsed her soul the briefest moments, seeing it weigh... consequences, stories? Dozens of them in a moment, keeping and cutting and settling on an answer. The old priest found it as frightening as he did fascinating. The Queen of Callow nodded once more.

"Two boons," she said. "Your last?"

"The Ophanim will sing with me," the Grey Pilgrim said. "I alone do not have the strength. Yet the Dead King has brought with him one of the fortresses that moves, a Crab. These bear wards and enchantments, among them a great working that restricts the touch of angels on Creation."

"I do not have the strength to bring it down anymore," the Black Queen admitted. "Perhaps if Sve Noc were with me, but even so I'm not sure my body can take the strain. The poison left marks."

Tariq shook his head.

"They know where the magic was laid that fights them," the Pilgrim said. "In the belly of the best. I require of you someone that will journey there and destroy it."

She went still as stone.

"There will be no coming back from that," Catherine Foundling said.

"No," Tariq quietly agreed.

"You want me to send one of the Woe?" she hissed. "Fuck you, Peregrine. I'd rather roll the dice on fighting. If you really-"

Akua Sahelian gently laid a hand on her wrist. The queen paled, teeth clenching.

"No," she said.

"It would be just," the shade softly said. "Or close enough."

The Adjutant, tellingly, spoke not a word. His soul had measured deaths, and found this one the most acceptable.

"I said no, Akua," the Black Queen harshly repeated. "You don't get to just jump off a bridge and call it quits, that's not-"

"Well now," a voice drawled. "Looks like I came in at just the right time."

Tariq turned, brow raising when he saw a goblin covered in soot, blood and dust swagger in. A sapper, he recognized, and he'd even seen this one before. Special Tribune Robber, he believed? He was rather famous in the Army of Callow as one of the Black Queen's finest men.

"Robber, what are you doing here?" the Queen of Callow frowned.

"Volunteering," the goblin grinned. "Sound like a proper evening, it does. Raiding a Crab, destroying ancient magics, calling down the wrath of angels? Can't believe I almost missed it."

Yet he had not. Whose hand had it been, Tariq wondered: Above or Below's?

"Come off it," the Black Queen sharply said. "Your cohort-"

"Only thirty-two of us left," Robber said. "It's not even a company. But we'll do, Boss. For this, we'll do."

"The war's not over, Robber," she tried. "There's still battles-"

"That'll be more glorious than this?" the goblin laughed. "Doubt it. Wouldn't matter even if there were, Cat. This one's got our name written on it."

"Why are you all so fucking eager to get yourselves killed?" Catherine Foundling roared out, lights dimming in the room. "Robber, I swear on the Gods Below that-"

"It's settled, Boss," the goblin smiled, almost gently. "We're going. Even if you tie me up, you know I'll slip the bounds and go. It's done. The arrow's been loosed."

The anger went out of her like a flame guttering out. The glimpse of her soul that Tariq found had him looking away. He'd not seen such violent, exhausted grief in a long time. It was... not pleasant to behold.

"It doesn't have to be like this," the young woman said, voice raw.

"Only cowards live to fifteen, Cat," Special Tribune Robber said, smiling. "It's been coming a long time, tonight."

Tariq closed his eyes, knowing it had come to a close. The pieces were falling in place. One more, now, and it would begin.

—

The clouds of acidic smoke that the great undead dragon spewed out were so large they must have been visible from the other side of the city.

The mages would do what they could – the Rogue Sorcerer had gone to lead them – but the damage was already done. The Brabant conscripts, freshly returned back to the rampart, broke and ran again. The officers that would have been their backbone laid dead in a marsh to the east of Hainaut, where Klaus himself had ordered them burned. Panic was a vicious thing, in a battle, worse a killer than any sword, and tonight it bit deep at the men holding the western wall. Once the conscripts fled the fantassin reinforcements they'd been screening were left exposed, and as another wave of beorns came over the walls to protect the ladders being secured the fantassins began to waver as well. They were not cowards, that lot, but they were stuck between two strengthening enemy beachheads with no real way out.

The original order likely had been to clear the bastion the Archmage had hit earlier, as it was the easier flank of the two, but it all went sour when the dead began striking at their back as they fought. The dead in the bastion withdrew just enough that the fantassins would be able to flee down into the city, and flee they did. The last stretch of the western wall, to the north, was still in the hands of the Prince of Bayeux and holding strong. Even if they held, though, it would change nothing. All that Arsene Odon would achieve was preventing the dead from hitting the back of the Army of Callow by the rampart, with the rest of the wall in the hands of Keter they were free to push into the city itself.

Prince Klaus Papenheim knew better than to shy away from uncomfortable truths after swords left the sheath, so he did not flinch away from this one: the battle for Hainaut was lost. It was now his duty to act so that the nature of this defeat did not end up destroying the Principate and the rest of Calernia with it.

He ordered barricades raised to block most streets along the line of the fallen rampart, manned by soldiers of Hannover that would not hesitate to kill anyone trying to force their way, but left two large avenues free for the conscripts and mercenaries to feel down. He sent for Princess Mathilda, and so received his first blow of the night: the only answer brought back by his captain was a black-feathered arrow, sodden with blood. Pushing down the grief – he still remembered her as a girl, close as sisters with his own – the Iron Prince forced himself to keep his mind on the battle. He sent the Neustrians to secure the gate into Twilight, and his most trusted captain to make sure that the Gigantes were out of the city before they could be killed and raised.

Word was sent out east to the Dominion informing them of the situation and warning that an orderly retreat was the only path left to them if the Grand Alliance did not want to turn Hainaut into the doom of the continent. Klaus sent word to General Bagram so that the Army of Callow might join the effort, learning that while the Second Army still held the Fourth was buckling on the walls. If they broke too early, the Prince of Hannover knew, then this would turn into a massacre. The surviving parts of the Fourth Army held the bastions on both sides of the gates that were preventing the dead from striking at Prince Arsene and the Dominion from behind. Bayeux would fold in mere moments should that happen, if they hadn't already, and the Levantines were already seeing redoubled assaults on their positions. They were at risk of breaking too, should they be flanked, and if they did break then the battle would grow beyond salvaging.

"We need to bolster the positions of the Fourth," the Prince of Hannover told his captains. "If we do not, this city takes us all."

"Horse won't cut it for holding a bastion," Captain Engels said. "And we can't move foot quickly enough, my prince, even if we can even move it at all. Callowan lines are bunched up, they can barely even move their own troops."

"We could cut through the Bayeux positions," Captain Abend suggested.

"If they rout while we cross, or even after, then we'll be trapped there," Captain Tietjen objected.

There was no easy answer, the Iron Prince thought, and the longer they dithered the fewer options they would have left. And yet he found himself at a loss. His army was already stretched too thin, and the Neustrians needed to keep the gate. Could the Firstborn be called on? They seemed to have rallied enough to aim fire at the undead scaling the pit sorcery had made in the heart of the city, but they had lost a step. Worse, General Rumena missing they had no leading officer: only a mass of bickering tribes which it might take too long to gather into cohesive reinforcements even if they were inclined to lend a hand. They would have to risk it, Klaus finally decided. What else was left?

The answer of the Gods came in the face of another weary old man in faded grey robes.

"Prince Klaus," the Grey Pilgrim tiredly smiled.

"Peregrine," the Prince of Hannover replied. "You bring word?"

"I bring death," the Pilgrim said. "Nothing more or less."

The old general softly laughed.

"Death is our sole birthright, Peregrine," Klaus Papenheim smiled. "It's why it matters to spend our lives well. It will be a good one I hope?"

"Among the finest," the Grey Pilgrim tiredly smiled, and told him the plan.

—

Between his height and the orc's crutches, they had about the same pace.

"Did you know," Robber idly said, "that you were the first person I ever spoke to, at the College?"

"Liar," Hakram snorted. "I heard you picked a fight with Yagin from Tiger Company while you were still waiting in line for dormitory assignments."

"It's really quite unpleasant how hard you are to lie to," Robber complained.

"It's not easy, you're just a naturally honest man," Hakram assured him.

Mortally offended, the goblin gasped and put a hand over his heart.

"Fighting words, greenskin," Robber said. "The honour of my deep and ancient house—"

"Your tribe is called the Rock Breakers," Hakram skeptically noted.

"Because even our newborn babes are mighty enough to split a boulder with a single punch," Robber lied.

Hakram looked him up and down, then cocked an eyebrow. He said nothing, which made it even worse.

"Don't think I won't stab a cripple," Robber warned. "We do it all the time, it's much easier than stabbing people who aren't cripples."

"Have I lately mentioned my deep respect for you culture?" Hakram gravelled.

Magnanimously, Robber only kicked his chin. Godsdamnit, the bloody thing was armoured. That prick.

"You'll be one of the last to die when the Great Goblin Conspiracy finally takes the world," Robber conceded.

"Merciful," Hakram praised. "You are in a fine mood indeed, Lord Robber of the House of Lesser Footrest."

The goblin preened, glorying in the way that he'd worked himself back up to Lesser Footrest last month. His was an ancient and honourable title. And when Hakram leaned over to slip something into his munitions bag, he was even in a good enough mood to pretend not to notice. They'd reached the end of the path, anyhow. The last of his cohort were gathered, Borer having just come back with a fresh loadout of munitions. Now all that was left was for the Lycaonese to open the dance. The two of them lingered in silence for a long moment.

"Anything you want Pickler told?" Hakram quietly asked.

"There's nothing to tell," he said. "I left her a letter, though. Make sure she gets it?"

His friend – his oldest friend, perhaps even his first friend – nodded.

"I won't say it's been an honour," Hakram smiled.

"Gods forbid," Robber grinned back, then hesitated.

He looked to the side, embarrassed.

"We had... we had times, didn't we?"

"The best," Hakram replied, voice hoarse.

They stayed like that for a longer while still, until the sound of horses nearing told them time had run out.

"Make sure Cat doesn't let it eat at her," Robber quietly said. "It's not about her, not really."

"I know," Hakram said.

They met eyes, the goblin and the orc, and clasped arms.

"Somewhere, somewhen," Robber grinned.

"We'll meet again," Hakram finished, smiling.

They let go of their arms and not another word was spoken.

—

"Strike hard and do not slow," Prince Klaus Papenheim said. "Stay with your captains. If you are split from your company..."

He paused, raising an eyebrow.

"Find a nice place to die," he suggested.

Laughter shook his riders. The jest was an old one, well-worn gallows humour of the kind his people tended to prefer.

"Our duty is not to be victorious," the Prince of Hannover said, "for there is no victory to be had there. We open the way for the handpicked sappers of the Black Queen, that they might destroy the enemy's sorcery and free the Pilgrim to strike down evil."

The answering cheers were hoarse, but they were wholeheartedly meant. There were less than a thousand of them left now, even after they'd taken southern horses to fill the ranks. The Prince of Hannover looked at them with old affection, that old soldierly lot that'd followed him through a hundred battles on a hundred fields. Not so young now, for he was long past his own youth, but though the faces had grown wrinkled and the hair had gone white the eyes remained iron.

"We've had battles," Klaus Papenheim said. "And we have kept the oaths we swore. I'll not preach to you what is at stake, sons and daughters of Hannover. Haven't we all heard that song a hundred times already?"

The world was always ending, one piece at a time. There was always a doom over the horizon, taking its first newborn steps even as you buried the last.

"Behind us is spring," the Iron Prince said. "Ahead of us is the Enemy. You are Lycaonese, so what more is there to say?"

Klaus Papenheim, Prince of Hannover, unsheathed his sword. A thousand riders did with him, the steel bright under the stars of the Twilight Ways. Before them the gates yawned open, revealing a city devoured by nightmares. Horns sounded, defiant in the gloom, and backs straightened.

"Forward," the Iron Prince shouted, and forward they went.

—

Tariq sat, not in a dignified stance as some straight-backed sage but instead like an old man lowering himself against the broken wall of a temple, his bones aching. He would not be found easily, he had been promised this. He sunk into the Light, as easily as taking breath, and let it fill him. The Ophanim, his old friends, were close. Yet they could not help him through the last step, not yet. All that was left to do was wait.

Wait and trust in the valour of others.

—

They plowed into the enemy ranks, smashing and hacking as they went. Through the flat grounds of the gatehouse, green flame licking at their sides as they rode through death and broken engines, through ghouls and skeletons and even a roaring beorn. The old banner of Hannover held high in the wind, the lone spearman on the wall and the old boast of the House of Papenheim beneath it. War cries resounding through the night as hooves thundered, Klaus Papenheim and his thousand rode up the ramps leading into the Crab. That city-monstrosity, laden with monsters and corpses it was pouring out into Hainaut. Undead and horsemen tumbled down below but they pierced through the dead and took the ramp, clearing it for the sappers to follow them. But a few of them, small creatures that they were, and so quick on their feet.

They would make it to the end, if the Iron Prince and his riders died loud enough.

Curses streaked at them in swarms, arrows and javelins flew, but tonight the Heavens were with the Lycaonese. The wind turned, the Crab shook, and onwards the riders went into the city. A thing of iron and bone, of stone and dead flesh, and the fumes it belched out billowed foul as the horsemen pressed through. Pikes came for them first, gathered hastily in a street, but Klaus Papenheim laughed and began to sing.

*"The moon rose, midnight eye
Serenaded by the owl's cry
In Hannover the arrows fly."*

Voices swelled his own as the refrain came and their riders fell into a wedge.

"Hold the wall, lest dawn fail."

They punched through, pikes skittering against heavy armour or finding enough purchase that horse and rider tumbled into the mass and broke the formation. The rider went on, down the street and towards the burning forges ahead.

*"No southern song for your ear
No pretty lass or merry cheer
For you only night and spear."*

Too few pikes, the second time, but the Enemy laid the ranks on thick. As if to make a rampart of bone and armour, a barricade of writhing dead. Skeletons raised swords and axes, put up shields and their ranks kept swelling. But it would take greater wheat than this, to dull their scythe.

"Hold the wall, lest dawn fail."

Screams as javelins and curses came at them from the sides, biting through even plate, but even as the riders died the ranks of the dead shuddered under the impact of a thousand heavy horse. It was in the hands of the Gods, for a moment, but even through the melee the Lycaonese pressed until there was only room ahead once more.

*"Come rats and king of dead
Legions dark, and darkly led
What is a grave if not a bed?"*

The forges were deeper, into the belly of the beast, and their fires burned bright as a noonday sun. It was a place precious to the Enemy this, and it mustered a worthy defence for the last hall barring entry to it. Undead by the hundred, and looming above them were monsters. Beorns and great snakes, even flocks of cacophonous buzzards. And above them all, the mightiest wyrm that the Prince of Hannover had ever seen. A hulking beast, large as a fortress and with blood-red eyes.

"Hold the wall," Prince Klaus shouted, "lest dawn fail."

It was to be their last, he could feel it in his bones. The wyrm spat out poisonous green flames and fumes, sweeping through the front ranks, but even the panicked and dying horses tumbled forward into the tightly packed ranks of the dead. Buzzards came down in swarms, sorcery lashed out with eerie screams, and the last riders of Hannover smashed into their enemies. They were too few, too tired, and still they pressed on. A spear killed Klaus' horse under him and he fell on his stump, screaming hoarsely, but he rose before he could be slain and fought on sword in hand. They sang still, but the voices were fewer. The charge spent.

*"Quell the tremor in your hand
Keep to no fear of the damned
They came ere, and yet we stand."*

One corpse after another, his arm was burning his face bleeding from half a dozen cuts. He'd taken a spear in the side, a wound that would kill him before long, but still Klaus Papenheim pushed through. And again and again and again, until a roar shook his bones and a gaping maw opened to reveal the flames igniting within. The Iron Prince struck with all his might, with all his rage and his sorrow and his pride, and with a great crack a fang broke.

"So we'll hold the wall," the Iron Prince murmured, "lest dawn fail."

The fire swallowed him whole, and the last though Klaus Papenheim ever had was for his niece.

—

It was an entire city trying to kill them, even the stones and the streets., and Robber could not remember the last time he'd had this much fun.

Tabler croaked it when something that liked looked like a massive bone scorpion speared her through the stomach with a stinger that was screaming, which was a very sporting heads up from Keter that their infiltration had been noticed. The dead were thousands they had nasty little critters, but what was that to a sapper of the Army of Callow? They were quicker, better at scaling walls and objectively prettier in the eyes of the Gods Above and Below.

"Mind you," Robber told his flock, "Borer does bring down our hallowed company's average in that regard."

"I apologize, sir," Captain Borer dutifully replied. "Shall I write myself up for distractingly ungainly looks again?"

"Eh," Robber mused, "we'll see how I feel about it tomorrow."

That had them all cracking up, of course, which got Wiggler a javelin in the throat but that was a cheap price for comedy of such quality. The Pilgrim had burned where they needed to go into their minds, though the old man had refused to entertain the Special Tribune's inquiry about whether being marked by angels in such a way could be considered theologically inappropriate workplace touching, so there'd be no getting lost. Brasser died blowing himself up so that a flock of buzzards wouldn't kill them as they crossed a makeshift ladder-bridge, but that was a sign they were making progress!

It was fairly dickish of the Dead King to begin setting fire to buildings so they wouldn't be able to cross the rooftops, in his professional opinion, but that was nothing that liberal use of sharpeners and a healthy disregard for personal safety couldn't fix. You absolutely could blow up a fire, if you had enough munitions at hand. They lost Racker to the beorn awaiting them on the other side of the explosion, though, which was a genuine loss since with her gone there was no one at hand that everybody else disliked the most among them.

Unfortunately, it seemed like the streets ahead were now swarming with dead and buzzards. Fortunately, there was a solution: they used demolition charges to blow through the layer of stone and bone beneath them, then slunk down a rope onto the lower level. They only had enough charges to do it once more, so naturally they immediately repeated their exploit. Grabber stayed behind just a little too long, though the greater tragedy was that Lilter's joke about 'grabbing the opportunity' was better than the one Robber had been mulling over about grab-bags.

The ran into devils when they got close to the ritual chamber, which was a nice change of pace. Not even the Praesi kind, these ones were like pulsing pustules of flesh whose proximity alone was enough to cause intense pain. Lilter blew herself up to make them a path, which had the secondary benefit of ensuring that Robber was once more without the contest the funniest of their little band. There were only seven of them left, by then, but they were nearly at the chamber. Trouble was that literal hellhounds were on the trails, by the barking and smell of sulphur.

You learned to recognize all sorts of stuff, if you spent enough summers in Ater.

"We'll hold," Captain Borer said, sword in one hand and sharper in the other. "Go ahead, Special Tribune."

Robber met his eyes, surprised even though he shouldn't have been.

"You were a treat," Robber finally said.

"Always thought you were a prick," Borer cheerfully replied. "Go die like a sapper, Rock Breaker."

He grinned back, scampering away before he could be caught up in the coming mess. He found the chamber below, just the way the Pilgrim had seared it into his mind. No more mages around, just a massive chamber of obsidian with carved runes everywhere. Gingerly he tried a foot first, and when it didn't burst into flame went further in. His own bag had been filled, from the start of this waltz, purely with goblinfire. And one more thing, he recalled late, that Hakram had slipped in. In the distance he heard the crack of sharpeners going off. Little time left.

It was a scroll, Robber found out. A fancy one, there was even a seal at the bottom. He scanned the contents, curious, and froze. By my authority as Queen of Callow, I so raise Robber of the Rock Breaker tribe to the title of noble, under the aforementioned honour: Lord of the House of Lesser Footrest, to be held in perpetuity. It was the royal seal below but there were fresher words, the ink a little smudged. No matter where you end up, Catherine Foundling had written in that ugly scrawl of hers, you will be one of mine. Sooner or later, I will come to collect. Screams, fighting. The devils were close.

Robber's throat closed as he traced the words with a trembling finger.

"The best," he whispered.

He struck the match, the parchment taking fire, and with a wide grin he plunged the burning scroll into the bag. He closed his eyes, feeling the burst of fire washed over him, but it didn't hurt at all. He thought, somehow, that even in this deep place he was hearing something.

Robber died hearing the wind.

—

The sky cleared, and Tariq looked down from above.

All those who would be able to escape tonight had. There was no more call to delay. The Ophanim, the companions of his life, laid their hands on him. They were sad, grieving, but he smiled.

"It is a beautiful thing," Tariq Isbili said, "to die smiling."

Tariq of the Grey Pilgrim's Blood breathed out, the world breathing out with him, and let his blood sing out into the world. The oldest treasure of his line, the secret of the Shine. The pilgrim's star, his people called it, and they spoke truer than they knew. Every Isbili that ever lived had it coursing through their blood, the blessing of that star. It was a tie, and though Tariq could no more move the star than an ant could move a tower he was not alone.

The Grey Pilgrim pulled, and the Choir of Mercy pulled with him.

The warmth filled him, pleasant at first but soon burning. Searing. But he was in a place beyond pain, filled only with light, and so Tariq Isbili did not flinch. Not even as he felt the burn spread through the bloodline, through every last one of his kin. Through everyone with so much as drop of Isbili blood. And the Ophanim threaded their fingers through his, heaving even as his insides charred and his kin turned to ash, until at last the sky gave.

In the darkness above, a star went out.

The Grey Pilgrim opened his eyes, looking down at the city below and the hordes of the dead. And though he bore the weight of many griefs, in that moment it was not his many sins he thought of. It was a balcony in Alava that came to him, the pear trees beneath and the woman he had once loved. Perhaps, he thought, he might yet see her again.

Tariq Isbili saw streaks of white pierced through the night sky and died, smiling, as stars began to fall.

The Marquis de Pressed

For the first time in three years, I bawled like an infant. This... this hurt. Despite the fact that Robber had so many death flags that he could have spoken exclusively in semaphore, I was still expecting the little bastard to escape. And yet, each of them died in a way that fit them perfectly. Thank you, Errata, for giving them this final honor.

GoodGirlJW

Still crying while I write this.

mamm0nn

"Make peace with the White Knight," Tariq asked. "That this civility may one day pass to all in service of Above and Bellow."

I see that Tariq too can be a petty little prick at times, calling out Below to be nothing but haughty words shouted too loudly. Also:

Tariq: I sacrifice my whole bloodline!

Oraphim: You have children?

Tariq: I don't.

Oraphim: Then you're only sacrificing yours-

Tariq: I sacrifice my whole bloodline to increase the power of my sacrifice!

Sinead

I have no problem with the first part? Tariq was asking Cat to be careful around Hanno because of the crisis of faith he was dealing with at the time, butt he has resolved this (mostly) by setting forth to break the bridge. Tariq is essentially releasing her from that bind (as much as it would hold her) saying that now it's a time for action. Tariq's perspective with the quasi angelic insight is useful in this.

As for the blood sacrifice, yeah that's a tough one to swallow. If it was instead ripping the potential of Shine out of the Pilgrim's bloodline and breaking the Name, that would be different, but bloodline sacrifice (that isn't a request and call that only those that choose to answer die) is hella sketchy from a moral point of view, but still entirely within Mercy's wheelhouse.

I would honestly think that a reworking of Starfall to be a final request to the entirety of the Pilgrim's Blood that is willingly answered to be a better way to do it, since the idea of this arc is that all the deaths are gone to willingly, but that's just my take.

It does not fit well with a “kill a person and murder the universe” perspective though.

TeK

There are no pretty options. He killed his kin for a dream, this is his sin that allowed him to win.

Sinead

I agree that it works for Tariq’s character to murder people for “the greater good” similar to his use of the plague.

However, the scene also works as a sacrifice asked of the entire Pilgrim’s Blood to to sacrifice the Name of Grey Pilgrim. Simply because I suspect that those that would fully fall in the line of succession of the Name are also the sorts of people that would sacrifice themselves for this cause. It would be the Grey Pilgrim Name giving itself as a sacrifice to fuel the spell, rather than bearing witness of the sacrifice of others for a cause. There have been other barbs sent to those like Hye, the Wandering Bard, and Tariq about never being fully part of a group and not fully grasping those connections.

I hope that makes sense as more than just a “pretty option”. I was more thinking of something more transformative than that. Not a redemption in death but still a change in outlook.

TeK

Yes. Tariq death was an ugly one and pitiful. He went out once again sending his family to death [strong] without even being allowed to ask[/strong]. But, to be fair, you do not hang the survival of the world on the better nature of someone else.

Adrian_V

Its also in accordance with their national beliefs, blood carries honour and all but also duty, this is here is just an extension of it, although i bet that some do scape, mostly the too young and who really aren’t even in levant and basically don’t care for blood.

Morgan

My guess is that the Name is tied to the Accords, which unless Black succeeds in becoming Dread Emperor won’t be a proper thing. When Black rules Praes and can sign the Accords that binds the continent under them and allows for Cats new Name to finally emerge. I'm still holding out for Headmistress in light of the school at Cardinal, but we'll see.

beleester

Having a choir of angels step in to settle a losing fight? If Black was here, he'd be furious with how this battle turned out.

AbraKadabra

Um, the DK used devils at the same time, so probably it is balanced.

Asterix

Let's hope Hakram threw a sharper in that bag, along with the scroll, and Robber died to the explosion. If he dies to goblinfire... Well, we know what that stuff is made from.

As awesome as Cat is, I don't think she can bring back a soul that's been eaten by a demon.

Matthew Wells

Goblinfire doesn't consume souls- Liesse was burned, but it still ended up the most haunted place in Callow.

SNTTz

Reading the sappers' last fight while listening to Sabaton's "Devil Dogs" is glorious.
RIP you magnificent bastards, may you nuke all Hells.

Josh

I really think this chapter would be enhanced with a minor POV of some of the pilgrim's kin doing something heroic before they burst into flames. I think we tend to focus on the named too much, especially when a huge group of people suddenly keel over.

Correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't the dominion made solely of the kin of each of the original named? So pilgrim's blood dying off is a pretty huge chunk of the dominion right? They deserve a heroic send off immortalizing their valor.

Hitogami

No, they are ruled by the kin of the original Named, but to my knowledge he is the last of his bloodline since he killed his nephew.

Josh

Gotcha. That makes more sense. I don't think he was the last though, otherwise I doubt there would even be a mention of a bloodline sacrifice cause there wouldn't be a bloodline.

Hitogami

Or maybe it's a bloodline sacrifice because he is the last? Maybe it's being seen as him sacrificing more than just his life.

Matthew Wells

He has cousins- one of them was ruling the Dominion in his place.

Morgenstern

And that note about everyone with even just a drop of the bloodline entire (not just Tariq's blood, but of every single one of his forebearers as well!) wasn't for nothing either. A great many Levantines, wherever they are on this whole world, just dropped dead with him.

Including but not restricted to the child(ren) he might have had with that lady from the balcony, after all. Everyone of his family, no matter if they were twelve times or more removed from him, by way of being some great-great-great-great-.... grandfather's brother's grand-nephew's grandchildren or whatever.

Everyone.

Daniel E

Call back! Conspiracy II – “It was the Matron who decided it. She walked into the cave, took one look at him and spat. You scheming old witches, can't you see he's heard the wind? she'd said. You're the Tower's now, boy. Go die in a gutter for the Empress.”

I'm glad Robber at least got a proper sendoff, which is more than can be said for Hune and Zombie 3. And finally, 'Gray Pilgrim used Heavenly Artillery. It's super effective!'

Sinead

I'd say Hune's send off wasn't bad, considering that she was personally guided to the afterlife by the Gods Below.

I personally think that Zombie the Third will have some form of reappearance. I don't think fae power dies that easily, let alone fae power that is allowed to learn some new tricks like Zombie was.

Besides, the only thing Cat is missing for her Odin aesthetic is a sweet horse.

Adrian V

I was going to post this as a response but i think is better as a new comment: what if part of the weakening of the drow is a way to balance the scales? Since if they ward the lake that basically seal away a front and gives them a safe heaven so to speak then weakening the drow front is the way of fate to balance the story.

Although i am not 100% sure how that will resolve itself (the Drow and Night situation) since it appears that while weakened they still remain strong enough to be considered a fighting force, it is telling that Klaus was more worried with they lack of organization than anything else (and aparently they were containing the gaping maw that was the lake?)

Daniel E

Consider that Hierophant mentioned the stronger of the Drow would likely retain their powers to a degree, but likely none of them are immortal anymore. Combined with what we learned here, Sve Noc squirreling away a not-insignificant chunk of their godhood in Catherine's soul, I'd say the Drow are still very much in the game.

Morgenstern

They couldn't squirrel anything away in Cat, though, this very chapter seems to indicate, because she was unconscious/half-dead and thus unavailable at the time. That's why the siphoning-off of power by the DK was effective to some degree. They only had less perfect vessels in the forms of Rumena and Ivah that they tried to cram into what they could. Those simply couldn't hold enough, though, because (unlike Cat) they were not made/changed/prepared for that.

Morgenstern

If they could have hidden in Cat, as they intended for such a case, they wouldn't have needed to allow Masego to Ruin their power to stop the DK from siphoning off even more.

beleester

Warding the lake closes the front for the Alliance, but I don't think it does any good for the drow. But they expected the drow to gain a lot of Night from fighting the Chain of Hunger, so they might be able to rebuild their losses over the long term?

Morgenstern

Night has been Ruined by Masego. It seems very likely there will be no rebuilding of power (the old way at least). No more harvesting via Night.

Sinead

I figure that Nemeshah had figured that Cat was a vessel for Sve Noc when he was implying that she was no longer mortal during the Prince's Graveyard.

I wonder if this is entirely Sve Noc's handiwork, or if Cat would always have the marks of having handled a godhood, especially since she surrendered it in the end.

I guess the latter option would make it Sve Noc taking advantage of something Cat was unaware of rather than them shaping Cat for their own purposes.

Estelulu

Wait, did everyone of the Pilgrim's Blood die?

Nguyen Hong Hai

Me think only those who are willing, sacrificing newborns seem really pushing it even for angels.

Adrian_V

I think only those that are either aware of the blood in them or carry themselves by the belief of the blood (as in that being of it has privileges and responsibilities, even if they rather just want the privileges)

Zach

I think you might be forgetting the time that Tariq killed his nephew.

The Choir of Mercy has no problem with virtually anything as long as it's the lesser evil.

Hitogami

Robber you beautiful bastard, I will be waiting for the day Cat comes to collect your soul from wherever it winds up. What a way to go!

TeK

You know, in a weird way, I do not mourn Robber that much, just like I also do not mourn Iron Prince. Their death was... Good. Gloryful. It was something that was always supposed to happen and it was a death they deserved. Robber died in a blaze of glory, breaking down the wrath of Death itself. Apart from burning down Keter, there is really no better ending for him. Klaus always had death hounding him every step, so he went out the way of Papenheim: And Yet We Stand.

It is Tariq instead that I truly grieve, for his death was neither desired, nor gloryful. It was yet another sacrifice for a better world, and it was an ugly one at that. His entire family, murdered by him to spare a continent their fate. His last deed was not good it was instead a terrible burden of necessity.

And Gods forgive me, but he did not deserve that. He should've been left lying on the throne of Twilight, for at least there he had died without sacrificing anything else for the greater good.

Sinead

Honestly, the only reason I grieved a little bit for Robber at first was because I hadn't fully gotten the goblin lifespan in my head. Robber and Borer were old for male goblins.

There is that really good point earlier in this section of 3 old men ride to death which really brought that into perspective.

isioisi

I legitimately had to go have a little cry at Robber's glorious passing... I've not been this messed up over a fictional character in years. Thank you EE, you're a damn good writer and the love these characters have for each other shines like the pilgrims star.

Nicholas Koenig

Everyone has focused so much on what Tariq did, and trying to figure out what exactly he did, that we are ignoring something that strikes me as at least as important. How is the Dead King going to react to this?

I have never been clear on what his goals in this war are. He is definitely fighting the Intercessor/Wandering Bard. He seems to have some type of agenda regarding Catherine, although I can't figure out exactly what. My best guess is he wants her to ascend in some way. He seems to have been after something in his relationship with Triumphant and not gotten it because he helped Triumphant too much and he sees Catherine as a possible replacement to Triumphant. I don't think actually conquering Calnaria is high on his priority list.

The Dead King just had his main army trashed in trade for the destruction of the last Hero who was clearly of the old school. The war is looking like a draw at this point, both sides have lost their main force. If the Dead King has Catherine heading in the direction he wants her I could see him offering peace at this point. He may well have gotten what he wanted out of the war.

edrey

Army related, Dk was driven back, in the story of the war, that is other thing

My theory is that the bard used that aspect of her to trick perspective, in that dinner with robber and pickler, so cat name is now linked to the east, like the fox song in the arsenal, so now is a story of malicia and cat, possible the Dk, Fk, the bard, black and akua. And the cherry on top is the drow and the Night. Way too difficult to predict the next arc. However, the attack to keter will happen just because the dwarfs wont let this opportunity disappear and the GA less. Not to mention cat need his defeat for the accords.

TeK

Well, here's play by play in my understanding. DK uses ET to create Procer which is a Non-Named country, something beyond the Good and Evil and established himself as it's nemesis. Fast forward a few centuries and DK uses Cat to create the Accords, which is an organisation with a potential to be beyond the Good and Evil and established himself as it's nemesis. Meanwhile we got WB acting as a mediator between Good and Evil, and seemingly an upholder of balance. She seems to be very intent on killing DK, even though her reasons can't be Heroic ones. My guess is, DK wants to go beyond the dichotomy of Good and Evil, to create an entirely new system, and therefore be beyond the influence of the Gods. Not unlike the Winter King.

Although Winter King analogy may as well be a reference to the "marriage" between Good and Evil.

aurikdomi

The Dead King through the massive working that ended with Masego stripped of his magic stole a piece of the WB and learned something with it, both what the intercessor wants and how to thwart her. That I think is his goal.

Abnaxis

Tariq: "Black Queen, I'm gonna need you to look after my chosen successors, since I'm not living through this."

Cat: "Sure, I got you."

Tariq: Kills not only himself, but the entire ruling bloodline of the Dominion

Cat: ...

Yeah, that first boon is going to be a lot more trouble than was initially planned on...

hoser2

Or a lot less trouble.

But seriously, the two leaders and the pilgrim's country must still exist or the bargain with Cat would not make sense.

Likewise, some number of relatives of the Peregrine must have died with him for the chapter to make sense.

Adrian

You're an author of a caliber that is hard to conceive.
Brilliant. Brilliant.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

A magnificent exit for a magnificent goblin.

Juneau

I got flooded on Christmas eve.

I didn't cry.

I spent Christmas day with 3 strangers, a friend and my wife.

Today I pulled up carpets and prepared to get rid of lots of stuff...

Sad, but fine.

Then I read this. I cried. Robber, may you rest in torment.

aran

Wow. Klaus, Robber AND Tariq in one chapter. Probably a whole bunch of others that will turn out to not have made it, too.

David

I can't really begin to say how much this story has consumed my life. I think I've read it through. Stopped following it for a few months, and then read it through again some 6 or 7 times now.

Please, whenever the tale of Cat finishes. Publish them in some medium I could purchase them in. I'd love to have these books on my shelves.

TeK

I'm your Venus. I'm your fire. Your desire.

genericIntent

It's... It's an interlude, and SO MUCH happened. I think I'll need to reread this chapter one or thrice. Excellent story craft.

shikkarasu

3:15 – Bestowal

"This is not a bargain, King of Winter, it's an oath," I hissed. "One day, we'll meet again. Not tomorrow, not next month, not for decades. After your game's played out. After I've learned to kill gods. On that day, I'll come to collect."

This is the 2nd time Cat has made this promise. 10 Denarii says the 3rd time makes it an Aspect.

Letouriste

This was beautiful. Really.

Took me 24h hours before i felt ready to comment. You are really good at that. Finishing character arcs, giving them a death fitting them.

Thanks EE

Cheerless Mirth

The fact that Cat didn't awake her Name during this battle was ridiculously surprising. I mean, yes, with how the battle turned out I do understand why not; her Name being related to authority was no secret and that didn't quite fit to this battle.

Especially since, as many others, I do believe it to be at least somewhat related to the Accords and/or Cardinal.

But still! The epic battle! The thing that no prophets could discern! And yet...well, what, we got gutted Night and three old men dying.

Don't get me wrong, they're important events, but not really on the scale I imagined. Especially since it would be epic if we saw Cat waking up at the perfect moment with her Name, looking at the scales of the battle and toppling over the table the scales are on.

Chapter 78: Keter's Due

*"The parity of light and darkness is a false perception.
Light is transgressive, an imposition on the natural* *order, and so will always spend itself into nothingness.

Be as the dark and you will be beyond struggle, ever returning when the flames die out."*

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

The turn of the year had begun with a boy I'd thought I might save, and then a hard lesson remembered to me by the Dead King. That this was not a war as I had known wars before, that there would be no miracles or saving graces to this ugly, brutal, exhausting struggle to the death we were having. I thought of that night again, as I watched stars fall on the city of Hainaut, and the lesson echoed once more: sometimes we just lost.

Masego's spell was little more than a window between Twilight and Creation, but what it showed was... I knew the forces at work, but still the sight caused me in me a sort of primal awe. The meteors, shards of a broken star, were massive. The first that struck toppled half the city in a streak of dust and white flame, scouring it clean of life, but the rain did not end there. Again and again the capital and the valley around it were struck until there was nothing there but barren glass, and still in the distance stars fell. How much of Hainaut had been scoured in the span of a few moments, I wondered?

It'd not been undead alone that'd still been in the city when the star fell. The Fourth Army was gone, as were most of the Hannover men and the Prince of Bayeux's army. Almost all of the Alavan troops had been lost as well, since they'd served as the Dominion rearguard, and at least half the Firstborn with them. It had been a cruel defeat before the Pilgrim began his last hurrah, but after the star had struck the results could only be called disastrous. Not a single army in fighting shape had made it out of Hainaut except maybe the Neustrians, and they'd just lost their princess.

I couldn't even blame the Pilgrim for when he had begun to call down the wrath of the Heavens, he'd not had any choice. There would be no repeat of the sacrifices – my heart clenched, my nails dug into my palms – that had bought him that opening, and risking a longer wait might have made it all worthless. He'd done what he could and turned this into a disaster for both sides at least. The Dead King, for all that he was the victor of the field, did not have an army left in all of Hainaut. The meteors had seen to that. Much as I itched to blame Tariq for what I'd lost tonight, it would have rung hollow to try it when he'd died trying to save all of Calernia.

And he had, Gods forgive me. If we'd simply evacuated, fled back to our defensive lines, then the simple amount of corpses swelling Neshamah's ranks would have been enough to overwhelm us to the south after we retreated there to lick our wounds. And once the Dead King pierced into Procer, got his hands on cities and teeming masses of refugees, then it was all over. The Peregrine had averted that doom for us all, and I held that truth close as I watched the pieces of a dead star rain down on Creation.

"Some of the Scourges will have made it out," Indrani quietly said. "The Hawk for sure, maybe the Prince of Bones as well."

"The Grey Legion's good as gone," I replied, forcefully calm. "That, at least, is a gain."

There had been few enough of those tonight that I would find the silver linings where I could.

"The Crab is destroyed as well," Masego noted. "Though it likely was in a practical sense even before the meteor struck it, given the amount of goblinfire burning within."

My fingers clenched. Blood dripped down from my palm onto the soft grass.

"It was a good way to go," Archer murmured. "They will sing songs of him, Catherine."

I would rather they didn't, I thought, so that I might hear him sing again instead. But I'd known deep down that Robber would find his worthy death on some battlefield or another. He'd been looking for years, trying ever starker odds against ever sharper foes. You would have hated peace, I thought. Despised it to the bone. A long silence trundled along, the only sound that of our steady breaths. My cheek clenched in frustration as I tried and failed to blink an eye I no longer had.

"It will end soon," Hierophant said. "The power is spent."

I nodded. The pale streaks were waning, growing rarer. Even the might of the Choir of Mercy anchored on the death of a great man was not a force without limit.

"Your officers want to speak with you," Indrani reminded me.

"They can wait," I said.

General Bagram was dead. Vivienne has saved his life from the Varlet only to die trying to rally the Fourth mere hours later. General Zola was now in overall command of my remaining soldiers, something eased by the hard truth that aside from the remains of the Second I had few of those left. Later I would speak to her, but for now I saw no point. Indrani brushed a hand against my arm, startling me as I'd not seen her coming. I had blind spots now, I reminded myself. I'd need to learn to compensate for them. I shook away the touch, even if it was meant in comfort. Archer knew me well enough not to take it badly. She left me to the way I had always preferred to handle my grief: alone. Her footsteps were soft against the grass as she left.

Masego stayed, but his eyes were on the vista revealed by his spell. He'd always been the most accommodating of my friends when it came to sharing solitude. It made him the easiest to be around when grief was still raw.

The last streaks of light softly died, leaving behind only a darkened sky and one fewer star than there had been at the beginning of the night. Hainaut was a ruin. The city itself was shattered, blackened stone smooth as glass rising in jagged pillars that looked eerily like teeth. Smoke and ash were on the wind, swirling thick. The land around the capital was no less a ruin, the plains scoured down to burnt bedrock as far as the eye could see. Nothing would live here for decades, centuries even. Of the armies the dead there was not a trace left, not even of that behemoth Crab that had tipped the scales in the Dead King's favour at the end. It was all dust on the wind, hundreds of thousands of souls released back to whatever Gods they had kept to.

There was a terrible peace to it all, I thought. Masego turned towards me, raising an eyebrow in silent question. I nodded and he let the spell die. It ended in time for me to hear footsteps approaching, the cadence of them telling me who they were before I turned. That hobbling walk was Hakram on his crutches, while the still unnaturally smooth stride was Vivienne's – she had once walked rooftops as other women did streets, and the touch had never quite left her. Leaning against my staff, I watched them approach with apathy. Vivienne looked away when I met her gaze. Trying to avoid looking at my eye, I realized, and suddenly felt self-conscious. I would have brought down my hood, were it not too obvious a reaction.

"Catherine," Adjutant greeted me. "The starfall has ended?"

I cocked an eyebrow at the empty talk, gaze moving to Vivienne.

"What is it that you two need of me?" I plainly asked.

She grimaced, and this time did not flinch away from the sight of the gruesome scar I had instead of my left eye.

"You need to hold a war council," Vivienne said. "At least for Callow. General Zola's keeping it together, but she doesn't know where to go from here."

"It's obvious," I tiredly said. "We lost the battle but the Pilgrim salvaged us an opportunity with his death. If the White Knight succeeds to the north then we will escort the Gigantes to the shore and ward Hainaut from the dead. If he has lost, then we retreat for the Cigelin Sisters and fortify what we can against the coming onslaught."

I did not doubt that even as we spoke the Dead King was marching troops through the bottom of the lakes to our north, trying to turn the setback into an opportunity. We'd destroyed the Twilight Gate here along with the rest of the city, but we still had pharos devices for mass-deployment of our remaining forces. Returning to Creation at the moment would be pointless, especially since the ruins were still hazardous and there was no water left to drink, so we would be staying in the Ways until the sun came up if not even longer. There'd be no point in leaving the Ways just to enter them anew when we marched either north or south.

"It might be obvious to you, Catherine, but not others," Hakram calmly said. "More than that, you must be seen. The Lycaonese lost both their rulers in the span of a single night. The Alamans are shamed and desperate, with only a destitute Princess Beatrice to calm them. The Dominion mourns the Grey Pilgrim without even a body to burn. The Firstborn huddle among themselves and speak to no one. And the Army of Callow broke tonight, for the first time since it was founded."

"You're needed, Catherine," Vivienne said. "The Black Queen is needed."

When fucking wasn't she? My fingers balled into a fist, blood sliding down the skin from where my nails had bit through skin. Hakram's eyes flicked there, though with his nose he would have smelled the red long before that.

"Enough," Masego said, voice grown hard. "If you have the voice to ask, use it settle the troubles you bring her instead."

I started in surprise, half-turning.

"Masego-" Vivienne began.

"She should be asleep, Vivienne," Hierophant said, eyes burning. "She insists on remaining awake, so she will, but do not mistake this for her being in a fit state. You ask too much."

I found myself both warmed and irritated.

"I can speak for myself, Zeze," I said.

"Then do so," Masego bluntly replied. "But I will not let this war drag you into the grave, Catherine. I have not forgotten what Aunt Sabah's death did to my family, and I will not allow Robber's death to bloom that sickly flower twice."

I might have taken issue with the tone if he'd not spoken the words that followed. I remembered it too, the brittle look in Black's eyes after Captain was killed. I had not loved Wekesa the Warlock while he lived, but I would not do the man's shade disservice by denying he had cared for Sabah just as deeply. That evening in the Free Cities had left scars on all the Calamities, even if some had been subtler than others. I would not blame Masego for dreading the only family he had left might come to the same end. I sighed, drawing their attention.

"There's nowhere for them to go," I said, gesturing at the Ways around us. "And it will take more than my carcass being paraded through a camp to fix this. I'll see to the Army of Callow later, but the rest can wait."

Masego beamed at me, which was comforting even though I knew this was probably the wrong decision. I was tired enough that I found it hard to care: there was only so much beating that this thrice-dead horse could take. I met Hakram's eyes and found surprise there, but he nodded. Vivienne was harder to read. Was she disappointed? If she was, I'd cope. The legend I'd set was not one I could live up to. If this campaign should have made anything painfully clear for all the world to see, it was that I didn't always have the answers. I'd pushed for this offensive from the start and even if I'd not been the only one to do so my influence had objectively been key. This catastrophe was on me, if it was on anyone at all.

Most the people I could have shared the blame with were dead.

"Leave me," I said. "I-"

My sentence went stillborn when I felt a shudder of indignation through my tenuous bond with the Night. Sve Noc were enraged, and though I found the shades of emotion difficult to parse I did pick up that this wasn't about the Firstborn. In the distance, two great crows took flight. Masego was not far behind them, wrested sorcery already opening anew the same window into Hainaut he had allowed to lapse. The spell was not as stable as the last time, the edges buzzing and the spell itself letting out trails of smoke here in Twilight, but what we saw could not be missed. Among the great fangs of black glass which were all that remained of the city of Hainaut, a great spell was stirring up a storm of ash.

It was not one of ours.

"Hierophant, what am I looking at?" I calmly asked.

Masego remained silent for a time, golden glass eyes darting back and forth as they parsed the glimmers of the spell that could be seen through the ash. Thick, curving cords of runes spinning in cycles without making a sound, a dull but growing pale sphere at the heart of them.

"I am... unsure," Hierophant admitted.

The Crows plunged through the night sky in a precipitous glide, Andronike and Komana claiming my shoulders and sinking their sharp talons into the steel of my pauldrons. They hissed urgency at me and I raised my bloodied hand to clutch my staff.

"Whatever it is, we can't let it finish," I said. "I'll open us a gate, and-"

I glanced at Hakram and Vivienne, lips thinning. No more risks tonight.

"- you and I will go," I told Masego. "Archer too, if we can-"

This time it was someone else who cut in, and before either Adjutant or Vivienne could object too. I was pleased to see Archer striding towards us on the grass, but surprised to see her scarf was already pulled up and her bow strung. She'd been expecting trouble already.

"Cat," she said, "we have a problem."

"I'm aware," I replied, jutting a thumb towards the spell-window. She took a glance, then grimaced.

"Cat," she said, "we have two problems."

Fuck me, I thought. Hadn't this night been enough of a malediction already?

"I'm listening," I said.

"The Gigantes are gone," Archer said. "All of them. I think they went back into Creation."

I felt a moment of blind panic at the notion of Keter getting its hands on Gigantes spellsingers, Gods would even the Ways be safe anymore now that Tariq was dead – but the talons of the crows pricking at my skin drew me out of it. I breathed out.

"Hierophant, is this their work?" I asked.

"No," Masego immediately replied. "This is Trismegistan, Catherine. And I understand why it unsettled me. The elements I found familiar were of my work and Akua Sahelian's."

I blinked.

"The Dead King cribbed from your spellcraft?"

"I suspect," Hierophant softly replied, "that it was the other way around, Catherine. However unknowingly. It is not without reason that the very magic we practice bears the name of Trismegistus."

"Shit," Archer said. "This is his spellwork, isn't it? His actual hand weaving the spell, not some intermediary's."

Well, would you look at that. It had somehow gotten worse. There really wasn't any time to waste if Neshamah himself was making a play, so I stiffly swept my staff across the air and ripped open a gate down into Hainaut. A howling gale swept ash and smoke towards us and I glanced at Archer and Hierophant.

"You two, with me," I ordered, and went into the storm.

—

The winds slashed at us angrily, bludgeoning us with ash and sharp pieces of gravel.

With the Sisters themselves on my shoulders I could almost call on Night the way I'd been able to before it was ruined, but my body was weak. Aching and too close to collapse. Even with Komena banishing the sensation of exhaustion, I could feel a tingle at the edge of my senses warning me how close to unconsciousness I still teetered. The bubble of stillness I wove around us flicked in and out, becoming harder to maintain the higher up the slopes we went. It was Archer that guided us, pathfinding through the jutting blades of glassy stone with their sharp edges that dug into our boots. She took us through detours that saw the stone protect us from the wind, but even with all our haste it was frustratingly slow going.

I clutched the rope when it came down after Masego had finished climbing, passing mastery of the bubble to Andronike as I concentrated on hoisting myself up. My muscles burned even when Indrani came to stand at the ledge and began to pull me up, grunting with effort, but after an eternity of labour I was over that too-sharp edge and falling on my knees atop the stone. My bad leg was pulsing with agony, but it was dull and distant. The Sisters did not want me distracted. I had left my staff down there, beyond the bubble, but it still stood perfectly still as if untouched by the storm. I extended my hand and moments later it was slapping against my palm, the dried traces of my blood rubbing against my palm as I pulled myself up.

The crows returned to my shoulders, never having strayed far. They seemed wary of leaving us behind, my patronesses burned by what it had cost them to face the Dead King while I slept. Hierophant was standing at the edge of the stillness, black robes in disarray and those long tresses woven with silver trinkets swept to the side. He was looking out into the distance, standing beneath two great fangs of stone crisscrossing as in the distance the Dead King's magic slowly revolved. Archer had found us the right place, I thought, sending her a thankful look. Decent shelter and a good vantage point, it was exactly what we needed.

I limped to Masego's side, not that he gave a visible sign he'd hear me coming.

"So?" I asked.

There was a tense silence.

"I believe," Hierophant murmured, "that he is opening a Greater Breach."

I screamed out the vilest curses I knew at the sky until my voice went hoarse. Archer came to stand by our side, silent as she warily eyed our surroundings.

"Can you Wrest it?" I asked.

"I have been trying," Hierophant conversationally said, "for fifty heartbeats now,"

His shoulders were trembling, I noticed only then. It was hard to see under the ash-dusted robes. And though he was not grimacing, there was a line to his mouth. Tension. I dared not speak another word, even if he'd not said the distraction would be harmful, instead listening as Komena whispered into my ear. I heard not a word but something greater, and my vision swam until I glimpsed a part of what the goddesses were seeing. Wills at war over the sorcery raging ahead of us, those slowly spinning circles of runes and the sphere within them. Like ink in water, Masego was trying to spread his will through the gargantuan amount of power but it was not enough.

There was too much water.

"His perspective is still too narrow," Andronike whispered into my ear, regretful. "He has not witnessed enough."

It was hard to deny the truth of that when it was before my eyes. Hierophant was failing and would fail. Did we have anything else that might destroy this? Night would not be enough, not when I was falling apart and the enemy's raw strength was so great. Did Archer have an arrow that would – no, that was thinking about this the wrong way. The Intercessor had mocked me, in the Arsenal, asked me where Neshamah's devils and ancient sorceries were. Well, they were here now. Why? More importantly, why now? But I'd already been given the answer to that, I belatedly realized, by an old man that was now a dead one. He cannot use either, Tariq Isbili had told me, speaking of devils and demons.

It would represent too steep an increase in strength on his side of the scales.

The Pilgrim had meant in the sense that if the Dead King used devils, then the heroes of the Grand Alliance would in turn get to call in angels as a superior counterstroke. Except we'd struck first, hadn't we? The Grey Pilgrim had died intertwined with the Choir of Mercy calling down his dead star, it was our side that'd broken the seal. The story's not on our side, I realized with dread. Even if Masego had proved to have the capacity to Wrest the spell, he still would have failed – the scales were tipped in Neshamah's favour for this to work, he had earned it. Fuck. And I couldn't believe it would be only the one gate either, it wasn't the Dead King's way.

"Can you see afar?" I asked Sve Noc. "Look for other gates like this, still forming."

"It will be difficult," Andronike cawed.

"But not impossible," Komena noted.

It would require enough of their attention that I'd be on my own, though, their minds brushing against mine made clear. Wouldn't matter, I decided, power wouldn't get us through this. They seemed inclined to agree, and on my shoulders the weight of them waned. As if much of them had gone elsewhere. The glimpses they had granted me ended too, but Masego had been about to be evicted – diluted into effective nothingness, more accurately, but the practical result was the same – from the spell, his aspect stuttering to a stop. He breathed out raggedly moments afterwards, body shivering. Indrani moved to help him up.

"You'll be fine?" I asked.

"I withdrew before it could be turned against me," Hierophant hoarsely replied, nodding. "But though defeated, I have learned some of his secrets. It was impossible not to, when my will was coursing through his work."

He coughed, as much out of exhaustion as the heavy and ash-laden air.

"It is imperfect," Hierophant croaked out. "Unlike the closed circle that Akua made of Liesse. Not only will Keter's Due spread, it was made worse. On purpose, I think."

My stomach dropped.

"How much worse, Masego?" I quietly asked.

The last time the Dead King had opened a Greater Breach, he'd blighted most of the Kingdom of the Dead doing it. It was the reason the phenomenon was known as Keter's Due in the first place.

"I can't be sure," Masego admitted. "Perhaps as far as the defence line to the south?"

That was, I thought, perhaps nine tenths of Hainaut that he had described. Made into a howling wasteland by the spell ahead of us, those spinning circles whose rotations were beginning to quicken. My bloody hand left the staff and I looked down at it, feeling numb. This was... Tariq had died for this, and a blighted Hainaut with a permanent hellgate in the middle was what would be achieved? I grasped for a story that could turn this around, but what was there left? We had spent all our miracles, our strength, our last chances. We had bargained ourselves away until only a remnant's remnant remained, and still it had not been enough. The two of them looked at me, somehow expecting I would turn it around, but to my horror there was nothing.

My bag of tricks was empty.

"I-"

I swallowed. The words tasted like ash in my mouth but I forced them out anyway.

"I can't stop this," I quietly admitted. "I have nothing."

I looked away, afraid of what I might see on their faces at that admission. What I found, instead, was a tall shape standing alone in the winds. Down there, away from our shelter. Troublingly close to the spell. Indrani began to say something but I raised a hand to interrupt her. Was this the Dead King, inhabiting a favoured corpse and giving silent invitation by his presence? Talon sunk into my flesh once more, the Sisters returning from their spirit-journey at last.

"There are two more," Komena said.

"One close, to the west, and one far in the northwest," Andronike said.

The other two southern fronts. Cleves and Twilight's Pass. Neshamah did not just intend to win here: he was going to win everywhere and all at once. Not, not everywhere, I almost immediately corrected. That would have been a mistake, overreaching. Enough of an opening for the Heavens to put their fingers to the scale. He'd not touched the front against the Firstborn, trusting in his crippling of the Night and his ability to triumph in a battle of Evil against Evil.

"Catherine," Indrani said. "It's all right. Your armies are still in the Ways, all we lose is-"

"That's not a corpse," I softly said, sole eye still on the silhouette among the storm.

I glanced at my companions.

"Hierophant, can you shield the both of you?"

"I can," Masego slowly replied.

"Then do it now," I said, and walked over the ledge of our perch.

Magic bloomed behind me even as I fell, Hierophant weaving transparent shields as the ground hurried towards me. I barely drew on Night, instead letting the Crows slow my descent. They were uneasy, but I slipped through the storm and limped my way to the lone figure. It was even taller than I had thought. Almost thirty feet tall, his deep brown skin just as indifferent to the elements as the still-pristine white tunic the Gigantes wore. The giant cared not for my approach, and I saw no other of his kind around us.

"Can you end it?" I asked.

The screams of the storm drowned out my voice, but I trusted I would be heard regardless. The Gigante glanced down at me, his short neck bending unnaturally.

"We cannot," the giant said, voice even.

Hope I'd not quite allowed myself to feel died out.

"So what are you doing here?" I asked.

"I wait," the giant said. "I witness."

"Witness what?" I pressed.

"The end," the Gigante said, "and what will come after. Send away your followers, Queen of Callow. Soon the Young King's circle will close and they cannot withstand what will follow."

The spell was ending soon, then. He was warning me that Keter's Due would kill Archer and Hierophant if they stayed. Masego would know as much, and I suspected he would lead Indrani out whatever I said, but I wove a snake out of Night and sent it towards them bearing an order to retreat just in case. I could have gone and done it myself, but it felt like a mistake. My instincts were screaming at me that if I left, I would miss something important.

"There are other gates," I said.

"We know," the giant replied. "There, too, others will witness."

There was a pause.

"Prepare yourself," the giant said.

The world went still, for a terrible moment, and then the storm exploded outwards. Even with all the Night I could spare holding me down and the guidance of Sve Noc, I still fell down on one knee. The power was blinding, staggering, and I could feel it sink into the earth as well as the air. Whether it lasted for moments or hours I could not tell, my body and mind bitterly arguing what was true and false, but eventually the storm passed. It left behind only a perfect circle of runes hanging in the air, a perfect gate into some distant Hell.

A heartbeat passed, and nothing came out.

"What did you do?" I rasped out.

"It is called," the giant said, "the Riddle of the Lock."

My heartbeat quickened.

"It's a gate," I said. "Are you telling me your mages locked it?"

"Our singers are dead," the Gigante said. "I witness only the work they gave their lives for."

My fingers clenched as I remembered that while the Gigantes had sent people into Cleves there had been no bargain for the Pass, that – I stopped. But there had been, I realized. Clever Cordelia had spent the goodwill she had won executing the Red Axe a second time to move the Highest Assembly to apologize to the Titanomachy for the Seven Slayings. They'd sent people into the Pass to fortify the Morgentor. If the Gigantes had locked all three gates, perhaps the war was not yet lost.

"We are in their debt," I carefully said.

"Aid was promised," the giant said. "Aid was given."

I nodded.

"And how long will their gift last?" I asked.

"A year, a month and a day," the Gigante said.

In the distance, dawn began to break. The giant glanced at me again.

"I will return home the corpses of my companions," he said. "We will not meet again, Queen of Callow."

"Then take you leave with my thanks," I said, meaning every word. "Your people have given Calernia a chance."

Even if both Cleves and the Pass were blighted by the rituals too, we had been pulled back from the fall to the brink.

"We have given them time," the giant said. "What might yet fill it is in your hands."

And without another word he strode down into the restless ash, leaving me behind as he moved into the shrinking darkness. I stayed standing there for a long time, until even the Sisters left me. Dawn rose, slowly, and with it came shadows. My own found me before too long, her steps soft on the ashen ground. Her gaze followed my own, coming to rest on the Hellgate.

"It is oddly beautiful," Akua Sahelian said, "for such a terrible thing."

I didn't answer. The Severance, I thought, might destroy such a gate. If we were lucky, it might even be able to do it through the locking spell the Gigantes had laid so that we would not have to wait until it ended. If we used it, though, the sword would be spent. Perhaps not materially, but as a story: it would be diluted, no longer the blade fated to kill the King of Death. I went through every Named I knew, every trick and spell and use of Light, and found nothing that could be relied on. There were only two Greater Breaches on Calernia, one in the heart of Keter and the other bloomed in the shadow of the Doom of Liesse – but there was no Warlock to divert it, this time, and even that trick had not been a true solution. The gate itself still existed in the heartlands of my kingdom, even if it did not lead into them. It had not remained there for lack of trying otherwise on our part. One after another, the solutions fell away until one remained.

"We need diabolists," I said. "Hundreds of them, thousands."

Enough that every devil that came howling through those gates could be bound and dismissed, that a more permanent solution could be devised.

"There is only one realm in Calernia, Catherine, that is the home to so many of them," Akua said.

There was an expectant shiver in her voice, halfway between fear and desire. Praes. The Dread Empire. The first crucible of my life, the fires where I had been forged. I closed my eyes, letting the rising sun wash over me, and let the decision settle.

I was headed east.

ErraticErrata

Chapter's out early for Christmas, and as my gift to you lot I'll even throw in January's extra chapter (titled Grand, from Cordelia's POV and running parallel to this story arc).

Happy holidays to all of you!

1queenofblades1

Merry Christmas!!

Liliet

HAPPY FUCKING HOLIDAYS

THANKS BUT ALSO HOLY SHIT WHAT THE FUCK

John

That was a present and a half. Hope you are safe wherever you are and keep doing what you do

Frivolous

Thank you. Happy holidays to you, too, EE.

I wonder why the Alamans were shamed, as mentioned in this chapter. I can't see the logic in it.

Did Prince Arsene really deal in secret with Keter, as I had guessed, and then got found out, or was it something else I'm overlooking?

Also, I'm totally envying the Gigantes and their perpetually pristine white tunics. Must be nice not to ever need laundry.

I am surprised that Catherine didn't take the opportunity to sidle closer to the Gigante and peek underneath the tunic. I mean, she's very short. Why not take advantage of that for once and look?

Frivolous

Addendum: Just noticed now "with only a destitute Princess Beatrice to calm them"

Obviously this means that Prince Arsene must be dead, since he is absent.

Liliet

The Alamans forces – the conscripts, specifically – broke multiple times, and in a much less desperate context than the

Callowan army (which also was re-gathered before anyone else's forces were hit by the consequences of the rout)

TheCount

Happy Holydays!

Estelulu

Merry Christmas!

qcheshire

Gods above

Burlyraven

Yay early chapter(s)!

I totally forgot that the Dead King would get a chance to retaliate. Also looks like we'll have to wait to get confirmation on Vivienne's Name, but Cat's should be coming soon, by the same token.

therealgridlock

I don't think she gets one, and I have three pieces of logic to support my thesis.

1: no named may rule a kingdom. This rule of the liesse accords means that if Vivienne, chosen princess of Callow, gets a name, she must immediately pick someone else to rule. She may refuse a name, such as Cordelia Hasenbach did, but she cannot narratively come into one without malfeasance afoot.

2: Vivienne will rule Callow after the black queen. This is narratively set in stone, barring huge upsets, prepared for books in advance. Why throw away this storyline now?

3: she gave up a name already, to be human and she realized that while her friends improved themselves, she was not, and so the skill she displays now is mere remnants of training, and personal ability. It isn't superhuman, it isn't Named, it's just human excellence.

If we combine the narrative that Cat's chosen successor will almost definitely succeed Cat, and that no named can rule, then she doesn't get a name. If we include the idea that she is simply exemplifying human excellence, like Cordelia, such that it is possible to be great without being Named, the no-name narrative becomes stronger.

Ironically, she would carve a groove through fate that others could follow, except one without cheap tricks or superhuman reflexes, and instead only hard work.

gwennafran

Merry Christmas. This came right after i had opened my other gifts. :3

laguz24

Boost. <http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

bless u

Myradmir

Wow.

laguz24

Also, this is better than crack. Just, the, aargh, so perfect, in the writing. After reading and watching so many other shows that could just be better and you can see it. This is a breath of fresh air.

Burnsy

Well.

Fuck.

Merry Christmas ya'll

ByVectron!

I really can't express how thoroughly impressive the scope of this story is to me. Foundation, HGTtG, L0tR, GoT, The Expanse, and this saga will forever be part of my recommended reading list.

Really well done, EE.

Black Spiral Dancer

Foundation you mean Craddle (Unsouled)? If not, then which series? And what is HGTtg? The rest I agree.

Sykomantis

Probably the Foundation series by Asimov. Seconded on an explanation for HGTtG

Dathrax

Hitchhiker's Guide, right?

Kellandros

Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy

Liliet

I think I'll just post my liveblog here

““The parity of light and darkness is a false perception. Light is transgressive, an imposition on the natural order, and so will always spend itself into nothingness. Be as the dark and you will be beyond struggle, ever returning when the flames die out.”

– TRANSLATION OF THE KABBALIS BOOK OF DARKNESS, WIDELY ATTRIBUTED TO THE YOUNG DEAD KING”

this is actually a really interesting thought? in context of guide in particular, where Light is known for RESTORING the natural order. something something different layers something something it sorta worked for him but also no

“The turn of the year had begun with a boy I'd thought I might save, and then a hard lesson remembered to me by the Dead King.”
turn of the year, huh guess she'd count from Foundling Day?

“Masego's spell was little more than a window between Twilight and Creation, but what it showed was... I knew the forces at work, but still the sight caused me in me a sort of primal awe. The meteors, shards of a broken star, were massive.”

OH WOW

I FIGURED IT WOULD BE MORE FIGURATIVE

“Again and again the capital and the valley around it were struck until there was nothing there but barren glass, and still in the distance stars fell. How much of Hainaut had been scoured in the span of a few moments, I wondered?”

OH BOY

on one hand, undead!

on the other hand, those villages DK left behind 😊

“It'd not been undead alone that'd still been in the city when the star fell. The Fourth Army was gone, as were most of the Hannover men and the Prince of Bayeux's army. Almost all of the Alavan troops had been lost as well, since they'd served as the Dominion rearguard, and at least half the Firstborn with them. It had been a cruel defeat before the Pilgrim began his last hurrah, but after the star had struck the results could only be called disastrous. Not a single army in fighting shape had made it out of Hainaut except maybe the Neustrians, and they'd just lost their princess.”

okay WOW
holy shit

"The Dead King, for all that he was the victor of the field, did not have an army left in all of Hainaut. The meteors had seen to that. Much as I itched to blame Tariq for what I'd lost tonight, it would have rung hollow to try it when he'd died trying to save all of Calernia.

And he had, Gods forgive me. If we'd simply evacuated, fled back to our defensive lines, then the simple amount of corpses swelling Neshamah's ranks would have been enough to overwhelm us to the south after we retreated there to lick our wounds. And once the Dead King pierced into Procer, got his hands on cities and teeming masses of refugees, then it was all over. The Peregrine had averted that doom for us all, and I held that truth close as I watched the pieces of a dead star rain down on Creation."

hahaha

yeah

this is fun

"Some of the Scourges will have made it out," Indrani quietly said. "The Hawk for sure, maybe the Prince of Bones as well."

"The Grey Legion's good as gone," I replied, forcefully calm. "That, at least, is a gain."

There had been few enough of those tonight that I would find silver linings where I could."

yeeep

"The Crab is destroyed as well," Masego noted. "Though it likely was in a practical sense even before the meteor struck it, given the amount of goblinfire burning within."

My fingers clenched. Blood dripped down from my palm onto the soft grass.

"It was a good way to go," Archer murmured. "They will sing songs of him, Catherine."

HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA

I DON'T THINK YOU THOUGHT THAT SENTIMENT THROUGH ALL THE WAY DRANI

I KNOW YOU'RE TRYING TO BE COMFORTING

I DON'T THINK IT'LL WORK WELL

"I would rather they didn't, I thought, so that I might hear him sing again instead. But I'd known deep down that Robber would find his worthy death on some battlefield or another. He'd been looking for years, trying ever starker odds against ever sharper foes. You would have hated peace, I thought. Despised it to the bone."

ok yeah fair 😡

"My cheek clenched in frustration as I tried and failed to blink an eye I no longer had."
ah yes that also happened
i love how that isnt even drama compared to the, uh, approximately everything else

"General Bagram was dead. Vivienne has saved his life from the Varlet only him to die trying to rally the Fourth mere hours later."
OOF 😡

"Indrani brushed a hand against my arm, startling me as I'd not seen her coming. I had blind spots now, I reminded myself. I'd need to learn to compensate for them."
😊😊😊
~you always did, in a different sense~

"Masego stayed, but his eyes were on the vista revealed by his spell. He'd always been the most accommodating of my friends when it came to sharing solitude. It made him the easiest to be around when grief was still raw."
♥ ♥ ♥

"Nothing would live here for decades, centuries even."
UH OKAY THEN
WON'T LIE THIS IS NOT AN EFFECT I EXPECTED

"t ended in time for me to hear footsteps approaching, the cadence of them telling me who they were before I turned. That hobbling walk was Hakram on his crutches, while the still unnaturally smooth stride was Vivienne's – she had once walked rooftops as other women did streets, and the touch had never quite left her."
♥ ♥ ♥

"Vivienne looked away when I met her gaze. Trying to avoid looking at my eye, I realized, and suddenly felt self-conscious. I would have brought down my hood, were it not too obvious a reaction."
)=
but also ♥ ♥ ♥
i love both of them

"“Enough,” Masego said, voice grown hard. “If you have the voice to ask, use it settle the troubles you bring her instead.”
I started in surprise, half-turning.

"Masego-" Vivienne began.

"She should be asleep, Vivienne," Hierophant said, eyes burning. "She insists on remaining awake, so she will, but do not mistake this for her being in a fit state. You ask too much."

I found myself both warmed and irritated.

"I can speak for myself, Zeze," I said.

"Then do so," Masego bluntly replied. "But I will not let this war drag you into the grave, Catherine. I have not forgotten what Aunt Sabah's death did to my family, and I will not allow Robber's death to bloom that sickly flower twice.""

OH HOLY SHIT

DAMN

YOU SPEAK ZEZE

YOU TELL THEM

"Masego beamed at me, which was comforting even though I knew this was probably the wrong decision."

♥ ♥ ♥

"The legend I'd set was not one I could live up to. If this campaign should have made anything painfully clear for all the world to see, it was that I didn't always have the answers. I'd pushed for this offensive from the start and even if I'd not been the only one to do so my influence had objectively been key. This catastrophe was on me, if it was on anyone at all."

kadlfja;sldkfl'asldfjl;asdjf cat

what were alTERNATIVES

you KNOW THIS

"My sentence went stillborn when I felt a shudder of indignation through my tenuous bond with the Night. Sve Noc were enraged, and though I found the shades of emotion difficult to parse I did pick up that this wasn't about the Firstborn"

oh, what? 😊

"a great spell was stirring up a storm of ash.

It was not one of ours.

"Hierophant, what am I looking at?" I calmly asked.

Masego remained silent for a time, golden glass eyes darting back and forth as they parsed the glimmers of the spell that could be seen through the ash. Thick, curving cords of runes spinning in cycles without making a sound, a dull but growing pale sphere at the heart of them.

"I am... unsure," Hierophant admitted."

WHAT

WHAT NOW

ELVES, DWARVES, GNOMES

WHAT IS HAPPENING HERE

"Cat," she said, "we have a problem."

"I'm aware," I replied, jutting a thumb towards the spell-window.

She took a glance, then grimaced.

"Cat," she said, "we have two problems." "
beautiful

"I'm listening," I said.

"The Gigantes are gone," Archer said. "All of them. I think they went back into Creation." "

...that could actually account for this maybe there arent two problems

"Hierophant, is this their work?" I asked.

"No," Masego immediately replied. "This is Trismegistan, Catherine. And I understand why it unsettled me. The elements I found familiar were of my work and Akua Sahelian's."

I blinked.

"The Dead King cribbed from your spellcraft?"

"I suspect," Hierophant softly replied, "that it was the other way around, Catherine. However unknowingly. It is not without reason that the very magic we practice bears the name of Trismegistus."

"Shit," Archer said. "This is his spellwork, isn't it? His actual hand weaving the spell, not some intermediary's." " oh-kay the worst case scenario then

"With the Sisters themselves on my shoulders I could almost call on Night the way I'd been able to before it was ruined, but my body was weak. Aching and too close to collapse. Even with Komena banishing the sensation of exhaustion, I could feel a tingle at the edge of my senses warning me how close to unconsciousness I still teetered."

Hum.

So the crows can still empower HER, but probably not anything else they could previously do simultaneously with that.
That sure is an interesting position it leaves them in :3

"I had left my staff down there, beyond the bubble, but it still stood perfectly still as if untouched by the storm. I extended my hand and moments later it was slapping against my palm, the dried traces of my blood rubbing against my palm as I pulled myself up."

yeppp ♥

"The Pilgrim had meant in the sense that if the Dead King used devils, then the heroes of the Grand Alliance would in turn get to call in angels as a superior counterstroke. Except we'd struck first, hadn't we? The Grey Pilgrim had died intertwined with the Choir of Mercy calling down his dead star, it was our side that'd broken the seal. The story's not on our side, I realized with dread. Even if Masego had proved to have the capacity to Wrest the spell, he still would have failed – the scales were tipped in Neshamah's favour for this to work, he had earned it. Fuck. And I couldn't believe it would be only the one gate either, it wasn't the Dead King's way.

"Can you see afar?" I asked Sve Noc. "Look for other gates like this, still forming.""

okay holy SHIT

0.0

"It is imperfect," Hierophant croaked out. "Unlike the closed circle that Akua made of Liesse. Not only will Keter's Due spread, it was made worse. On purpose, I think."

My stomach dropped.

"How much worse, Masego?" I quietly asked.

The last time the Dead King had opened a Greater Breach, he'd blighted most of the Kingdom of the Dead doing it. It was the reason the phenomenon was known as Keter's Due in the first place.

"I can't be sure," Masego admitted. "Perhaps as far as the defence line to the south?"

UH

"It is called," the giant said, "the Riddle of the Lock."

My heartbeat quickened.

"It's a gate," I said. "Are you telling me your mages locked it?"

"Our singers are dead," the Gigante said. "I witness only the work they gave their lives for."

My fingers clenched as I remembered that while the Gigantes had sent people into Cleves there had been no bargain for the Pass, that – I stopped. But there had been, I realized. Clever Cordelia had spent the goodwill she had won executing the Red Axe a second time to move the Highest Assembly to apologize to the Titanomachy for the Seven Slayings. They'd sent people into the Pass to fortify the Morgentor. If the Gigantes had locked all three gates, perhaps the war was not yet lost.

"We are in their debt," I carefully said.

"Aid was promised," the giant said. "Aid was given."

I nodded.

"And how long will their gift last?" I asked.

"A year, a month and a day," the Gigante said.

In the distance, dawn began to break. The giant glanced at me again.

"I will return home the corpses of my companions," he said. "We will not meet again, Queen of Callow.""

OKAY THEN

THAT IS CERTAINLY BETTER THAN IT WOULD HAVE BEEN OTHERWISE

BUT

WELL

YEAH

"Then take you leave with my thanks," I said, meaning every word. "Your people have given Calernia a chance."

Even if both Cleves and the Pass were blighted by the rituals too, we had been pulled back from the fall to the brink.

"We have given them time," the giant said. "What might yet fill it is in your hands.""

yeeeeeah

holy fucking everlonving shit

"Dawn rose, slowly, and with it came shadows. My own found me before too long, her steps soft on the ashen ground. Her gaze followed my own, coming to rest on the Hellgate."

I'd been wondering if she could help Masego but, like, decidedly NO lmao

"ne after another, the solutions fell away until one remained.

"We need diabolists," I said. "Hundreds of them, thousands."

Enough that every devil that came howling through those gates could be bound and dismissed, that a more permanent solution could be devised.

"There is only one realm in Calernia, Catherine, that is the home to so many of them," Akua said.

There was an expectant shiver in her voice, halfway between fear and desire. Praes. The Dread Empire. The first crucible of my life, the fires where I had been forged. I closed my eyes, letting the rising sun wash over me, and let the decision settle.

I was headed east."

well, this is not THE reason we called for her going east but this sure was called!

(mostly on the logic of "no her Name is coming soon also how the fuck would structure even work without going to Praes before DK is over")

Adrian_V

THANKS!!! Merry Christmas you too!!!

Now for the chapter, wow, the thing that most shocked me about the gigantes is that they call Nessy the YOUNG king, the implications are staggering. Maybe this will force the elves to actually do something? Although i think they once tried and it ended with the king losing his son right?

As for praes i wonder if DK had this pseudo planned, as an in case they do something this will at least force them to go to praes and dilute the story of me as their enemy kind of thing?

Christian Oaks

Good stuff

mavant

> after the star had struck the results could only be called disastrous groan

Frivolous

Hah. Yes! A pun! A really BAD one, haha.

JJR

It's a pretty stellar one if you ask me.

Xinci

This was lovely ty. That exert from the book explains some things, goes with the themes too. Evil tends to have lasting remnants between the various iterations. Changes to the genes that can't be healed by miracles, or beast and monsters hunted by someone later. A fitting thing for the side of the argument who is less direct in their gifts and warier of directly investing. If your side is made of droplets in the tide that will drown Creation, then it makes sense to keep the waves churning.

I do wonder then if the DK actually learned from Akuas cycling or had already learned a similar technique if he uses it for other projects. As a principle, it seems quite useful for running the Serenity with almost no upkeep.

The Dk's show of story craft here was pretty exquisite, neatly almost won if it wasn't for the right people being in the right place.

bennett palmer

The dead king didn't nearly win, he did win. Think about what he lost, long term. He lost one crab, a few powerful revenants, the grey legion, and probably an unfinished bridge that was always bait to begin with. all this adds up to very little for him. Meanwhile, the grand alliance lost the grey pilgrim, along with a bunch of lesser heroes, had many armies crushed, had night crippled, catherine and the woe are leaving the front lines to chase down praes, and the gigantes' deal to help has been expended.

Cold Cyberia

"Young King" lol.

I think Kairos' 3rd secret, that Twilight Paths also lead to places not of Creation, will come to be used against the breaches. Maybe they could redirect them, sort of like what Warlock did? Maybe even use them to get to Serenity.

A bit surprised Akua didn't try anything when the breaches were being opened. She's the finest diabolist of her generation and she opened one up herself. It was a ripe opportunity for usurpation. Then again I'm not really sure to what extent she can interact with sorcery.

Alec

Perhaps the point is supposed to be to prove that even us readers believe in Cat's story too much, but it somehow still feels wrong that Cat could be shot by the Hawk like that when she specifically said to watch out for it. When the Dead King took the time to speak to Cat a word in a language he knows only she would understand. Cat's fall is clearly the shift that changed the story here. This ending to the Hainaut arc is tragic and moving and beautiful, but it is also unsettling and off in my mind. It feels like I have been sold the end to some other story.

Matthew Wells

Also, what happened to Guillaume?

The Fresh Prince

He died, but then he walked it off

ninegardens

I mean... I feel like "I've been sold the end to some other story" and "Unsettling" is... kind of appropriate for vs battle against the dead king.

The fact that it DOES feel wrong, the fact that he DOES beat them better than expected matches with the fact that he's just... way better than the previous enemies Cat has faced.

I know what you mean on the feelings, but I kinda like it.

Daniel E

I suspected in the previous chapter that the battle of Hainaut was shaping up to be a major victory for the Dead King. Recall that he has multiple Crabs, and most likely a significant reserve force in Keter as well, while the Grand Alliance has been effectively neutered. I'm starting to think that DK might actually survive this whole affair, shunted away in his personal Serenity, with the goal simply being to elevate Catherine to a position similar to his own; a story-driven demi god(ess), of sorts.

Sinead

However, if he becomes Sealed Evil in a Can, he might be doomed if he ever stepped out of Serenity, binding him to irrelevance. He won't even be a "hidden source of knowledge" since Cardinal will be a mage academy with Masego as a founding teacher. And while he isn't Nemeshah's equal yet, he is still a peer in terms of sorcery and his teachings along with every other contribution will build a resource far greater than what Nemeshah would easily provide.

Oshi

Which is probably what will happen to him. What you cannot defeat you bind. He'll forever be the evil in a can. It's a fitting ending that he will be bound forevermore to the very world he sought to dominate.

JJR

While not his first choice of fates, being sealed in his hell kingdom might be an acceptable alternative to death. Play the role of the ancient evil that fools try to summon for their own ends for a few centuries. They get to learn that evil is not a toy as they get pulled into hell, and Dead King gets to continue existing as there really isn't an opportunity for heroes to attack him.

It goes back to his quote at the start of the chapter. Her need only wait, the forces of light that sealed him will eventually spend themselves and the dark ages will return. Even if it takes 100 lifetimes.

Daniel E

'Evil In A Can' sounds like the kind of homemade chili that uses ghost peppers and leaves you pondering the fact that you might die sitting on a toilet.

ByVectron!

So, in a pattern of three, this is his victory. That leaves only a draw and a loss for him, unless we look at previous events for either of those.

agumentic

Still not how Patterns of Three work, and it wasn't even much of a victory, thanks to Gigantes. Only one side has an army after all was said and done, and it is the side that breathes.

Juff

Typo Thread:

caused me in me > caused in me
rain own > rain on only him to die > only for him to die armies the dead > armies of the dead
ended? > ended?"
use it settle > use it to settle even tough > even though
l If this> If this
Most the people > Most of the people no remained > not remained

Crash

what the fuck

standardtypo

Typos [standard]:

caused me in me -> caused in me
rain own -> rain
only him to die -> only for him to die armies the dead -> armies of the dead
ended? -> ended?"
use it settle -> use it to settle even tough -> even though
l If this -> If this
Most the people -> Most of the people
no remained -> not remained Vivienne has -> Vivienne had
I would the find -> I would find {dust on the wind} on -> in
{I found it hard to care:} : -> ;
{she warily eyes our surroundings} eyes -> eyed {heartbeats now,"} , -> .
{Talon sunk into my flesh} Talon -> Talons
{Not, not everywhere} Not -> No

{Then take you leave} you -> your {even if did not lead into them} if -> if it

standardtypo

(See the PGTE subreddit for a script that will automatically incorporate comments like this into the chapter so that you can read it without typos).

boballab

Time for Cat to finally climb the Tower.

Matthew Wells

Nah, she doesn't want it. She'll just murder Malicia and let Black sort things out from there.

boballab

It doesn't matter if she wants it, it is the Name she is moving into. The Peregrine basically all but told us that when he looked inside her and saw her budding Name dealing with authority and in the East. The authority in the East is the Dread Empress

Matthew Wells

First of all, Queen of Callow and Arbiter of Cardinal are both 'authorities of the east'. Second of all, Dread Empress literally cannot be claimed or moved into without having a legitimate claim to be currently ruling Praes, which is something she neither wants to do nor has the ability to do, even if she kills Malicia. Staying in the Tower would mean abandoning the War, the Accords, Callow, and Amadeus.

Trebar

No, not a chance. Her upcoming name isn't just "authority in the East"... she ACCIDENTALLY Spoke to Named as strong as the Grey Pilgrim. No way in Above or Below is the Empress a strong enough Name for that, nor does it have enough authority over the Pilgrim.

Big I

Obviously this has been a really bad day for our protagonists, but I couldn't help think that that bit at the end with giants was a victory of necessity and preparedness. If Cat hadn't sent the Red Axe to the Procerans the giants wouldn't have helped. I think that reinforces her Story about the need for hard choices and the people who make them.

Frivolous

It bothers me that Catherine was in the compelled by the Greater Breaches to go to Praes to get an army of diabolists to help control those Breaches.

You see, in the recent chapter, Lost & Found, Tariq saw that Catherine's coming Name would be birthed in the east, and by something in the east.

The causality thereof sounds crazy. Does it mean that this entire horror, the destruction of nearly all of Hainaut and all the deaths of armies and civilians, were caused by Catherine's Name?

Because that is what it sounds like to me, at least a little. Causality dictates that happens before gives rise to what happens after. Catherine's approaching Name started 2 years ago and came first. Therefore one could say that it gave rise to everything that happened after.

What do you think?

Also, I'm kinda disappointed in the Gigantes. They were enormously powerful, and yet the only agency they had in this battle was as cleanup. They gave their lives to be janitors to the mess, and not even permanent janitors. Just temporary ones.

I would have preferred it if they gave their lives to destroy the Crab and win the battle instead. But I must presume that they lacked the capacity to do so.

Still disappointed, though.

I kinda suspect they knew the Greater Breaches would happen. Their serendipitous deployment to the sites of those Breaches is very very suspicious.

Sir Nil

Someone had to do it. As meh as janitorial work is someone has to clean the nooks and crannies otherwise bacteria and fungus get everywhere and starts bothering people. Their act of janitorial work probably saved the entire world, arguably a lot better than taking down a single crab.

TeK

Janitorial work is more art than act.

Liliet

I think the casualty was more like, the Name was forming in anticipation of this inevitably happening.

Casualty of Name/Role events being fucky and relying on future knowledge is nothing new. Note how there was a whole bunch of Squire claimants going to Summerholm at about the time Cat would be there – they'd have had to set out before she was the Squire at all.

Sinead

On the Squire claimants – I think they were heading there because Amadeus was heading there after Laure, not in response to Cat. Cat followed the same route by already being hitched to the Black knight wagon

I think the causality of this is that Keter always acting as the theoretical second partner in a deal (with the invite and all that) makes Nemeshah actively harder to deal with from a metaphysical perspective such that dealing with Praes was always the path forward, but Nemeshah blocked that path by swamping them with undead that were a more immediate threat. Binding Praes (and potentially the Golden Bloom) actually frees up more elements to deal with the Kingdom of the Dead.

I wonder if the end result is going to be the Drow sitting on the Kingdom of the Dead along with blighted territories acting as containment of both Nemeshah and the Chain of Hunger.

I could see the Gigantes predicting that Nemeshah would respond to any sufficient defeat with sorcery, and Nemeshah is famous for one feat of sorcery in particular, and planned accordingly.

TeK

One thing that slipped Cat's mind is that WB's comment about DK not using sorcery meant that he was not taking them as a threat...

Now, he does.

I do wonder though, if the Gigantes are spent, it means the shores are not protected. The Hainaut front is already mostly gone, how would they establish a new defensive line, if Cat also needs to take armies from it and into the Praes?

Also, I am reminded about what Bard said to William.

"They think they are special, but they are not, not really. Pattern does not discriminate between the shades, it only sees the black and white."

The Dead King takes on entire continent, the Good, the Evil and the Neutral, and still manages to hold his own. If the Pattern can be transcended once in Callow, it can be transcended again in Keter. He does not need to win, not really, he just needs to become the other side. And the Pattern will act to preserve him forevermore.

On the side note, I except that long forgotten dusty Chekhov's gun about Forever King eyeing the borders of Empire and pondering war will finally pay off. Having recently reread the PGtE (yet again) I am reminded of the sheer scope of the forethought put into this book. So yeah, still wait for a payoff on the elves.

Cold Cyberia

Damn, I forgot about the Forever King. If he got involved beyond sending a dozen Emerald Swords the situation in Praes would be even more messy. I'm not sure there's enough time for it but it would be cool to clean up the elves and reclaim the Golden Bloom.

Liliet

Shores can be held without the wards, they're a natural defensive line. Wards would have been better obviously but iirc plans for this offensive were already being made without the promise of the wards.

And... does Catherine need to take an army to Praes? Does she really? There are quite a few waiting for her there ready-made...

agumentic

They were – the offensive was approved in chapter 40, while Gigantes presented their offer in chapter 43.

And she really does. While there are people out there who she could ally with, there is no one who would just give her an army to command if she asks nicely. If she asks nicely while already having an army – probably the Third, since I suspect they went to hide in the Ways and so avoided most of the damage from the blast – well, that's an entirely different situation.

Liliet

TY!

And, well,

> there is no one who would just give her an army to command if she asks nicely.

Amadeus is still alive.

agumentic

Alive, but doesn't have an army to give.

Liliet

...except for all the ones that would go "hell yeah" at the slightest hint of muster from him? Like the Legions in Exile and the orc Clans?

agumentic

If he wanted to gather them for some nebulous plan of his, he could have already done so. He wouldn't even need to be present, just reach out. Since he opted to not do that, whatever Amadeus is doing doesn't need armies, and so he doesn't have armies to give.

Liliet

Yes, but what Cat is doing needs armies. Are you saying Amadeus won't change plans to help deal with THREE GREATER BREACHES to his west? When Cat asks?

agumentic

Depends on the plans – who knows how changeable they are, and how fast? I don't think Cat can (or even wants to) rely on "My dad will get me an army" when she is on a strict time limit to get Praes in order. And even if he can, it's not like having more armies will make it harder to conquer Praes or it's necessary to leave every soldier that can hold a weapon behind for the fronts to hold out.

Liliet

Anyway I'll just point out that most of these armies will not fight her either way

TeK

Wait till my dad hears about this!

Tenthyr

Headed east, again, to forge the last Name she'll ever wear.

hue hue

Hear me out

hue hue

Hear me out. Take contratrition lake sword, chuck it at praes capital, let the choir kill everything hue hue

contrition! Not contratrition

Silverking

Poor, poor Malicia.

Everything she has done has been in service to keeping foreign armies from marching on Praes. The loans to infighting Procer, the poisoned water scheme, the Greater Breach machine the alliance with the Dead King. All to make sure that attacking Praes is either not worth the cost or not top priority.

But now, through no fault of her own, she has found herself at the top of Cat's "things to deal with list." Life is simply unfair to a Dread Empress.

laguz24

It's unfair to lots of people.

ninegardens

Cat shows up

Cat: yo, Ally Bell's. gimme 500 of your top diabolists not to invade.

Malicia: Sure. Will that mean Maddie is pals with me again?

Cat: I dunno. Probably.

Malicia: Deal.

Cat proceeds to head up north to smash Keter using demons

Maddie and Malicia make up and become friends again

Hye and various elves kill each other, and the rest of creation doesn't need to think about them again

sengachi

Well.

Fuck.

panic

This is bullshit bordering on misery porn, and I do not care for it in the slightest.

Leblanc

It's actually just goofy i saw them losing this like 6 chapters ago not because of any foresight into the story I just know the Author can let Cat win anything so of course she lost honestly just boring.

slendyllovespie

Ok, don't know if anyone else had mentioned this, and I know the series is over; however, does anyone else think Cat is potentially following Odin's story?

She at least had the look down. Staff, 2 crows, 1 eye...

goliath1303

I sure hope you realized that the Story wasn't over after you posted this. Just in case though, you're sure gonna be happy when you see this comment lol. You still have a whole book to go!

Interlude: Flow

"If you are to win the most then you must win always, else you will find a hundred more knives pointed at your back for every victory. This is both the promise of imperial greatness and the fate of imperial death."

– Extract from 'The Behaviours of Civil Conduct', by High Lady Mchumba Sahelian

The fighting had broken out at midday and lasted until half a bell before nightfall.

Neither the Magisterium nor General Basilia had wanted to roll the dice by continuing the battle in the dark. Helikeans kataphraktoi harassed the retreating Spears of Stygia as they retreated, loosing arrows in the back of the phalanx, but after the day's losses those were but a drop in the bucket. It wasn't like the phalanx could break, either: the leather collar around the neck of every single slave soldier served as a reminder that the displeasure of their masters would be both swift and final. Magister Andras sent out crossbowmen to chase them away, but like mayflies the famous cataphracts of Helike simply danced away and found somewhere else to sting.

Magister Zoe Ixioni set down her glass of wine, having drunk as deep as she dared given the night still ahead of her. The viewing pavilion that had been raised for the members of the Magisterium that accompanied the Stygian army but would not be involved in the day's fighting – the majority of them – was rather luxurious and privately paid fund, a gesture of thanks from Magister Andras and Magister Kyra after they were appointed to command of the Stygian army. The twins had sent most of their time in the Magisterium as part one of its the lesser parties, the Herons, but they were not fools or unskilled at games of power. They were making the most of the opportunity they'd been given.

"We hold the field," Magister Gorgion murmured, drawing her attention. "Is that not... worrying?"

The young man was prodigiously fat, which Zoe had once noted to run in his family, and though he was now the head of what remained of the Laskaris she had several times regretted bringing him into the fold. Though a steady ally – he was terrified of being assassinated should she withdraw her protection – he was also nervous and hesitant, requiring constant reassurance. Would that it had been his older brother that their mother had left in Stygia, when she went out on campaign. The older Laskaris would have been a more fitting partner than the dregs the White Knight's wrath had left Zoe to work with.

"It does not matter," Magister Zoe quietly said. "This, too, serves our purposes."

The ranks of the Magisterium, by tradition, could never number higher than ninety-nine. In practice actual membership usually fluctuated between seventy and ninety, only every rarely approaching that limit, but these days their ranks were rather more thinned. The White Knight and the Ashen Priestess had slain over a third of the Magisterium in a single day during Kairos' War, and though replacements had come forward further losses had since been suffered to war and intrigues. Considering those slain by heroes had been the finest war mages of Stygia, and a great majority of the Black Vines party that had effectively ruled since the Carrion Lord's intervention decades ago, the ensuing politics had been... fluid.

As a member in good standing of the Black Vines, Zoe had certainly felt the ground grow unsteady under her feet.

The coalition that'd succeeded at taking the reins and stacking the Courts and appointments had then promptly collapsed in the wake of the disastrous campaign into Procer, leaving as successor an even shakier alliance. The Ivory Tile party had widely been seen as the only rival to the Black Vines, before the last few years of war, but they'd lost too many of their prominent members to either heroes or defections. They'd survived long enough to be the tallest dwarf, however, and to burnish their reputation in this time of danger to Stygia they had allied with the only real military party left in the city: the Herons. Though the lesser of the two partners, the Herons had only been brought into the fold at the price of their leaders, the twins of the Sideris, being named commanders of all Stygian armies in the coming campaign.

Already there was talk of formalizing the alliance, of merging into a single greater party, and in Zoe's opinion there was sense in it. The Herons typically advocated that Magisters should train as generals instead of simply leaving such duties to slaves, while the Ivory Tile was the champion of the politics of Haides the Elder – that balance in the League must be maintained, at the price of war if necessary. There was compatibility in ideals, even in the long view, which made such a merging possible. And after the leaders of the Herons had today scored a draw against General Basilia, perhaps the finest commander to come out of the Free Cities this generation, they would now have the prestige to take such a step without simply being gobbled up by the Ivory Tiles.

It was near enough to decided who the rulers of Stygia would be in the coming decade, bar disaster. Magister Zoe Ixioni watched the corners of the pavilion, where other magisters were speaking to each other in low murmurs, and smiled at nervous young Gorgion.

"Aretha the Raven, who twice defeated a Helikean field army using mostly sailors and whores, once said that in the Free Cities a general has more to fear from victory than defeat," Zoe softly said. "Commit the words to memory, Magister Gorgion."

She rose to her feet gracefully and took her leave from the young man, refusing the serving slave that came to offer her a full glass of wine and instead leaving the pavilion entirely. There was another tent, close by, where one could relieve themselves in privacy and relative comfort. Zoe began to head there but slowed her steps as soon as she was out of sight and then stopped. Before long, the woman she'd been waiting for arrived. Magister Phryne's gaunt face was said to have been made this way by the strange magics she delighted in using, for she had once been a great beauty. Whatever the truth of that, Zoe had always found her appearance unsettling. Her politics, though, were almost painfully straightforward.

"The Pale Chariot will lend its support," Magister Phryne said, with remarkable bluntness.

Zoe nodded. She'd expected as much the moment it became clear that the Herons were headed for positions of influence. The Pale Chariot as a party boasted only a half dozen reclusive mages whose personal cause was the safeguarding and improvement of magical knowledge in Stygia, so they tended to be left outside of political calculations. Which meant relatively few people bothered to notice that the only appointments they every sought outside the Court of Arcane was a single seat in the Court of Trades, which they always fought hard for. It was meant, Zoe Ixioni had bothered to notice, to safeguard their common interests in the steelworking industries whose profits happened to pay for all these costly experiments they liked to indulge in.

A detail of little import, unless you also knew that the leading Herons had strong investments in the very same trade and would not hesitate a moment to use their newfound prominence to stack the Court of Trades and award themselves all those lucrative contracts currently funding the Pale Chariot coffers.

"For which you have our gratitude," Magister Zoe said. "The Keepers?"

"You have ours," Magister Phryne said. "Amyntor Eliade is not affiliated with us."

No, Zoe thought, but he does happen to be my cousin. The magister offered a demure smile and nothing else, for over a decade of diplomacy had schooled her well in keeping her thoughts hidden.

All that was left, now, was to take the plunge.

—

Merchant Prince Mauricius did not have an office, not in the sense his predecessor did.

Though the Princely Palace was his since he had been elected to the ancient and respectable office he now held, the old merchant had bought enough servants on those grounds to know it was as a leaking sieve. Perhaps he would see to mending that, should the mood ever take him, but until then he saw absolutely no need to keep any private papers and affairs out of his manse. Instead, when he was not attending sessions of the Forty-Stole Court or giving audience in the palace he preferred to retreat to his favorite establishment – Sub Rosa, tucked away near the Irenian Plaza at the heart of power in the City of Bought and Sold. There the merchant prince sipped at his Yan Tei rice wine, imported from across the sea and served warm.

A fine delicacy, he decided, and an interesting experience. The latter was perhaps more important, to a man of his advanced age. Novelty often interested him more than simple luxuries. What point was there in being one of the wealthiest men alive, if he did not use that wealth to experience everything under the sun? This particular evening, however it was not simply for the service he had come to Sub Rosa. The obsessive secrecy of the establishment was what he had sought it out for, not the foreign drink, for the diplomats he was to meet were not of the sort that it was diplomatic to entertain these days. The Tower had few allies left, and if Mauricius was reading the currents to the south correctly it was soon to have even fewer.

When the servants finally ushered in two unremarkable young men, of dark hair and simple clothing, the merchant prince cocked an eyebrow.

"That is an impressive glamour," Mauricius greeted them.

He could almost see something around the edges giving it away, though, and held back a frown. He had begun to see much too well for a man his age, even one who had access to some of the finest enhancing rituals on Calernia. He was not certain whether or not to be pleased by the implication of that.

"Your compliment does us honour, Your Grace," a pleasant speaking voice replied. "This one humbly accepts the praise on behalf of his mistress."

The glamour fell, revealing a young man – though in a Praesi with golden eyes, as this one was, that semblance meant little – in fine red silks, dark of skin and finely formed. A Wasteland aristocrat, unlike the formal ambassador of the Tower in the city, and Dread Empress Malicia's personal envoy. The other figure remained cloaked and hooded, standing still as the envoy slid into the seat on the other side of the table. The young man had not waited for permission, Mauricius noted, for all that he was using that obsequious Praesi formal diplomatic language.

"You forget your courtesies," the Merchant Prince mildly said.

"This one was wary of waiting, Your Grace," the envoy pleasantly smiled. "For this one's mistress has grown uneasy of... long waits, in beautiful Mercantis."

It was said that the Dread Empress of Praes knew black arts that let her make a puppet of a body far away, Mauricius knew. There were a hundred rumours of the like about every one of the madmen who claimed the Tower, of course, but this one had been repeated across enough years that it had the ring of truth. Was one such body, then, under the cloak?

"Pull down your hood," Mauricius bluntly ordered.

The stranger obeyed, but it was not some dark-skinned homunculus that the Merchant Prince was gazing upon. It was, he found with a shiver, his own face. Immediately he reached for the rune carved onto the side of the table, which would-

"Freeze."

Mauricius froze. The face of the insolent youth with golden eyes was as a blank mask.

"I dislike handling such matters personally," Dread Empress Malicia calmly said. "But the free rein you have given the band of Named in the city forces my hand. I congratulate you for that much, Mauricius."

The Merchant Prince fought, strained to break the spell.

"A Name?" the Dread Empress said, sounding surprised. "Or a claim, at least. Either way, it means that Ruling you is unfeasible in the long term. Which leaves me with only the less civilized path to take."

Mauricius tried to scream as the thing wearing his face eagerly came forward, and even let out a small hiss when it lunged forward with a lamprey-like mouth and tore out a chunk of his throat.

"I do apologize," Dread Empress Malicia conversationally said, "but my diabolists assure me that you must be devoured whilst living for the surface memories to be absorbed and the shape to become permanents. I would have had you poisoned beforehand otherwise, Mauricius."

Pain, Gods the pain.

"Farewell, Merchant Prince," the Dread Empress of Praes said. "May you choose your enemies more wisely in your next life."

—

When the Magisterium appointed generals, by ancient custom these hallowed individuals were bestowed with a whip.

The reason why was simple: by law, no freeborn Stygian could serve as a soldier. To hold a military command was to rule over slaves, for which the proper tool was not sword or spear but the simple whip. Magister Zoe Ixioni has served as a diplomatic envoy for the Magisterium for over a decade and served on the Court of Manners for two consecutive terms as the formal representative to League councils – which while without practical power, was a very prestigious position – so she was quite aware of how the rest of the Free Cities thought of Stygian armies. The finest soldiers that were ever badly led, Theodosius the Unconquered had famously called them.

It was true that the Magisterium tended to choose its appointed generals for their skill in magic or intrigue rather than more straightforward military skills, which the oldest of the slave-officers of the phalanx were expected to be able to discharge on behalf of their masters. By association, interest in military matters was seen as either eccentric or outright distasteful. It was slave-work not fit for freeborn Stygians, much less members of the Magisterium. It was one of the reasons why the Herons had been a minor party, never swelling beyond nine sitters in Zoe's lifetime. Now Andras and Kyra Sideris, the same twins leading the party that had lingered in irrelevance for decades, were being welcome into the camp to raucous cheers.

Giving away all their weapons save the whips to serving slaves with great ceremony the twins took off their helmets and let the glorious black locks whip free. They were a handsome pair, nearing middle-age but still in the prime of their life and wearing their armour with an ease that hinted at the truth of the old stories saying they'd spent a few years in Proceran fantassin companies during the Great War. The Spears of Stygia that had fought and bled during the day were not granted the same welcome, simply allowed to file in through side gates so the wounded might be tended to and the irreparably crippled discreetly poisoned.

Zoe left the Sideris twins basking in their glory, instead considering the nature of what some Atalantian philosopher-priest had named the 'dilemma of the sword'. If authority came from the sword, then who could rule save soldiers? Like most claims out of Atalante, it was empty air when the priests claimed to have thought up the question: it had been at the heart of Stygia for centuries, a millennium almost. In the days after the fall of the great empire of Aenos Basileon, it was the eldest daughter of Aenia that had first risen to prominence. Ancient Stygia, under the patronage of the great cranes Retribution and Redress. The ruling polemarchs raised a great standing army and crushed the haphazard militias of their neighbours, forcing them to pay tribute, and for a time the Free Cities had been in Stygia's palm.

Until the army deposed a ruling polemarch and installed in her place a popular officer instead.

The aftermaths of the coup, which ultimately failed, broke the back of the Stygian Empire. Delos and Atalante regained their independence, the tribute system collapsed and it was made law that never again would a freeborn Stygian serve as a soldier. Slaves, owned by the council of leading sorcerer-nobles that had succeeded the polemarchs, would be the city's only warriors. Much time and thought was spent on how these Spears of Stygia would be kept under control, the methods crafted being wide and varied, but the most important of them was the collars. Enchanted leather bands that every slave-soldier would wear around their neck, which were linked to two greater artefacts: the Leashes. Through the Leashes, sorcerers could choke or kill a single soldier or a thousand with but a word.

This had solved the dilemma of the sword, some argued, but in truth it had simply moved around the pieces. It was barely a century before the first general tried to use the Leashes and command of the Spears of Stygia to take over the city by force, only stopped when the Magisterium instead choked every single soldiers in their own army to death by spell. Chastened and wary, the Magisterium ruled that no appointed general would ever be allowed to hold the greater artifacts and created the position of Keepers of the Leashes. Two Magisters, never of the same party or kin by three degrees of the appointed general, would be charged by the Court of Honours to serve as guardians and wielders of the single most important artefacts in Stygia.

Over the years additional precautions and checks had been added to the nature of the position of Keepers, but the institution had largely functioned as intended.

"It is madness, you know."

Zoe glanced at the man at her side, eyes lingering on the noble lines of his face. Amyntor Eliade was a well-formed man, for all that his family had been disgraced when his eldest sister, a recently seated magister, had attempted to abolish slavery and destroy the Leashes. Nephele Eliade had so despised chains, it was said, that the Gods Above had granted her a Name for it. Zoe, who had once counted her as a friend as well as a cousin, knew better than to believe it simple hearsay. That bout of futility had destroyed Amyntor's chances at amounting to anything in this lifetime, but Zoe's cousin had decided to redeem the family name for future generations by seeking an appointment as one of the Keepers. He would, he had told the Magisterium in a passionate speech, dedicate his life to preserving what his sister had sought to destroy.

"The world has gone mad," Zoe replied. "We do what we must to weather the storm."

"It will threaten the very foundations of Stygia," Amyntor warned. "What is it that has so moved you to act, Zoe? You have always been cautions. It cannot be the would-be Tyrant, we have known hundreds, or even the alliance with the Tower – your own Black Vines were ardent partisans of it for decades."

Magister Zoe Ixioni thought of that stately hall where the First Prince of Procer had entertained the greats from all over Calernia, where powers had sparred and found victory or loss. She thought of what had followed in the wake of those days, the Peace of Salia with its Truce and Terms. The world is changing, she thought. There would be no returning to the old ways after this, no matter what some of her colleagues might delude themselves into believing.

"The tide rises, cousin," Zoe murmured. "We may either rise with it or drown."

And Zoe Ixioni had not spent decades climbing her way to power so that she could see it all collapse over her head. Amyntor sighed.

"So be it," he said. "I expect Nephele would have smiled of it, if nothing else."

Zoe was less certain, as Nephele Eliade had been surprisingly farsighted for all her moral naivete, but she knew better than to voice the thought. She parted from her cousin, meeting Magister Phryne's eyes as she passed the other woman and receiving a nod. It was done, then. Magister Zoe passed through the crowd of servants and magisters, both parting for her, and was received with wary eyes by the Sideris twins. They had come down from their great war chariot, but both lingered near it. The prestige of the gilded thing was impressive to those easily impressed, which these days was too many of the Magisterium.

"Magister Ixioni," Kyra Sideris greeted her, tone friendly in a way her eyes were not. "Do you come to offer congratulations?"

"I do," Zoe said. "Your conduct of the battle was exemplary. All of Stygia is in your debt."

Surprise from both twins, and the wariness thickened.

"You overpraise us," Andras Sideris carefully said.

"If so, that is fortunate," Magister Zoe replied, "for you are now both relieved from command."

There was a heartbeat of surprise, then Kyra began to laugh. Her brother did not, eyes darkening.

"Such a dismissal would require a vote of the Magisterium," Andras began, then froze.

All around them the Spears of Stygia began to stream in. Armed and ready, pushing the surprised magisters that had not been part of the conspiracy away from the edges of the forming circle.

"This is treason," Kyra hissed, and she raised her whip.

The enchantments laid on it found no purchase on the collars binding the slave-soldiers, for the sorcery of both Leashes had already been used to sever the control of all lesser artefacts in the camp on the slaves.

"Surrender," Zoe gently said. "While you still can."

"We are winning, Ixioni," Magister Andras urgently pressed. "Even now the Helikeans will be considering terms-"

"Terms have already been reached with General Basilia," the diplomat said. "We will, tomorrow, offer our formal surrender and submission in exchange for which we will be allowed to rule Stygia largely as we wish."

Some small cities taken by Nicae would be returned as well, which would serve as a useful sweetener for the people when they returned home.

"That treaty will be worth nothing, when Basilia next grows hungry," Andras scorned.

"It will be guaranteed by Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer," Zoe Ixioni smiled.

The utter startlement on their faces was a pleasure to behold. The Spears began to arrest members of the Ivory Tile and the Herons, the few magisters who'd sat the fence of the coup – for this was very much a coup – looking on nervously.

"You lie," Kyra Sideris accused. "She refused the Magisterium when we reached out, what could you possibly offer that would be worth her while?"

"The Magisterium," Zoe said, "will formally abolish slavery."

In name, at least. There would be no more slaves, but there would be a great many indentured servants – it would be easy enough to simply pay slaves less than their upkeep required and let that debt trickle down to their children as it did in the laws of Mercantis. It would maintain the old practices with a deniable veneer, not unlike the practices of Ashur. If there were some troubles, well, it would not be difficult to pass laws through the Court of Order that stripped debtors the rights reserved for free citizens of Stygia and further tilt the advantage away from the freed slaves.

"You'll die for this, Ixioni," Kyra Sideris raged, fingers tight around the whip. "I'll have my revenge, I swear it."

Magister Zoe considered that for a moment, then nodded and walked away.

"Kill them both," Zoe ordered a slave-officer as she passed him.

She did not stay to see it unfold, for she had a formal letter of surrender to draft.

—

It was as the White Knight had suspected: the Merry Balladeer's song did not simply reach ears, it reached souls directly.

In other circumstances that would have been a mere interesting fact, but Antigone had been taught the 'ways-of-seeing-the-world' – there was no word in any language knew that accurately translated the word in the tongue of the Gigantes – and that meant she could follow the resonance. The Balladeer's song, a cheerful ditty from Salamans about a priest and the three goats outsmarting him, marked out every ensouled undead in hearing range for the Witch of the Woods to smash without needing line of sight. Two Revenants died before they even realized what was happening and with every Bind in a range of a mile crushed to dust the lesser dead were nothing more than a witless horde.

They had struck hard and struck fast, but there came a time where the dice had to be rolled anyhow. Only Antigone had the strength to destroy the bridge the dead were raising, but it would take her time to perform such a great working. That meant it was time for blades to talk. They found a hill with a single narrow path up and Hanno, tired of the elaborate schemes that seemed to plague the world, instead made it all simple: he and Rafaella held the path, the Stalwart Apostle saw to healing and the Balladeer sang. The White Knight raised his sword and shield, his missing fingers itching at the stumps, and let death come knocking as Antigone's spell swelled behind him.

It was the simplest kind of fight there could be: the dead came and they were funnelled up the path. And they kept coming, corpse after corpse. Revenants, eventually, but paltry things compared to the Scourges, and Hanno's sword bit deep. The Valiant Champion tossed away the born that tried them, crawling up the slope, and even as a great wyrm followed by flock of buzzards came down screaming on them the sorcery of the Witch of the Woods was unleashed. Hanno felt the Light coming, swift and clean in a way it had not been in too long, and even as in the distance a pulsing black sphere spun and began to swallow up the half-finished bridge he climbed the wyrm.

It ended with his sword going through the skull as Rafaella dragged an entire flock of buzzards into her domain, emerging bloodied and wounded but victorious even as Hanno crawled up the broken remains of the wyrm and came to stand atop the skull where his sword was still stuck up to the hilt. The Valiant Champion climbed up to his side, still bleeding even after the finest healing of the Stalwart Apostle. Some of the wounds would scar, not that Rafaella was likely to mind. The two of them stood together and watched hundreds of pounds of stones being sucked in by Antigone's great spell, ripping to pieces a great bridge of stone that must have been the better part of a mile long.

"We will have to sweep the other bank," the White Knight said. "Else they will be able to simply resume the work."

"Tomorrow," Rafaella grunted. "We fought good, but tired now. No wine here, very dread."

"Dreadful," Hanno absent-mindedly corrected.

"Not full," Rafaella reproached. "This the problem, Hanno."

He chuckled, the smile staying with him. It was an old game they were playing, but one he regarded fondly. The Valiant Champion was the sole survivor of the band he had led to defeat in the Free Cities, perhaps his oldest friend in the world after Antigone herself.

"Let's see to the others," he finally said. "We can retreat into Twilight afterwards, when-"

He froze, something flickering at the edge of his vision, and turned.

In the distance, far to the south where Hainaut lay, the night sky lit up with falling stars.

Sinead

Huh. Wasn't expecting Stygia to actually try and drag itself foreword. I guess that's the contrast between it and Mercantis in terms of who will drag themselves into the new Age, and who will be left behind.

Sinead

To be clear to any future comments, I realise that one can do really messed up things with debt slavery (look at Mercantis, or our own history), but I thought Stygia was going to be razed never to rise again. Instead, they are trying to adapt in what ever way they see as the path forward.

sengachi

I don't think they're trying to adapt at all. They're bending on a talking point so they can maintain the form and function of their slave empire. This isn't them adapting, it's them making use of a political trick so they don't have to adapt.

masterofbones

Unless the definition of "no slavery" is incredibly loose, the slaves will be allowed to go where they wish. If there is no encouragement for them to stay (like survivable wages), they will leave.

A mass exodus is inevitable if they refuse to change at all.

sengachi

It's right there in the text, the magisters will be holding them in debt bondage as legally bound indentured servants (in the real world that almost always comes with restricted movements), and will go so far as to strip rights from debtors if that doesn't achieve the desired result.

Cicero

It's clear that the magisters fully intend to make the freedom of the slaves a token charade, untrue in any meaningful sense.

And yet... words have power. Being told that they are not slaves has it's own power, that I suspect will be far harder for the magisters to control than they believe.

So while I would not call this liberation for the slaves of Stygia, I also think that is an important step on the path to that liberation. Perhaps securing this advancement is wiser than pushing further for more – since pushing for more likely will involve Stygia fighting to the death (and the death of all it's slaves) to try and survive.

jamesc9

If anyone may buy the debt of an indentured debtor, then they're positioned for something equivalent to the golem revolution in Terry Pratchett's Ankh-Morpork.

DJ

I would be surprised if Cordelia doesn't have a plan for this, honestly. I think Stygia might end up biting off more than they can chew here.

Velrix

In the middle age the peasants were free. To serve their Lord, they were bound to their birth land and were the propriety of their lordship. They needed to pay to use tools and the land that they farmed, then they needed to pay the levy. Tax and war manpower. They were traded as common goods between Lords to expand their territory and found new villages, travel without permit was a crime. Oh but they were Free.

Abrakadabra

No, what you said is false. In most of europe, the peasants had the freedom to move wherever they wanted, had their own rights, and they could become even completely free Man if they became citizens of a city (which was not easy) etc. There were places where this was not true, but mostly NOT IN THE MIDDLE AGES, but later. (Just like witch hunts, which were not the crime of the MIDDLE age but later AGES.)

Biianary

Bending on a talking point so they can maintain their slave empire is how the US did it (Watch the Netflix documentary "13th" if you don't believe my claim)

Sinead

I do believe you. The potential difference for me is that for our history, debt peonage was enforced internationally (with the various empires supporting each other in slapping all ceded territories with debt).

However here, this is a lesser polity doing the same thing, and with a lot of larger players who will scorn them.

It is progress, because it's bowing to external forces, not internal ones to make this change. The other nations will have noticed this.

Miley

They're severely underestimating Hasenbach if they think she won't know what they're up to.

onedollargum

It's a very practical guide to evil.

308924810a

If they could solve their damn problem with their army being incapable of being maintained to its fullest potential extent without taking control of the political system I'd count that as moving forwards. They might be able to conquer the Free Cities that way.

Though I guess making compromises on the appearance of their systems in order to make diplomatic gains possible is a step forwards, just not much of one without a coherent diplomatic plan.

Liliet

I mean, they're dragging themselves forward into where Mercantis has long been,

Sinead

True, but the leadership is also keeping an eye on the rising coalition and taking the path of being less aggravating as a form of survival. Whereas Mercantis thought to play both sides which had much bigger teeth than them.

So less overall social change, and more the fact that allowing external influence to bend policy like that is an interesting change that may see more rapid change in time, since this debt peonage isn't coming from a major power bloc as it has for our own history.

Liliet

Mhm, you're not wrong.

Eileen

As a wise man once said "It's not progressive if you're progressing to the place we already f*cking are genius"

Liliet

Eeeh it's still progressive-er than NOT DOING SO

AbraKadabra

Nah, it is copying. Which is in itself is a kind of slave mentality, in which you WHO copy others relagating yourself to an inferior status.

It May lead to progress, but it also can lead to becoming a sort of willing colony, which gives up its sovereignty willingly and is absorbed.

Liliet

> Nah, it is copying. Which is in itself is a kind of slave mentality

That is. Really. Not. In-theme. Here.

We're talking about people quitting being slavers.

AbraKadabra

You Just do not want to understand. A pity.

Liliet

Let's put it this way: "slave mentality" is not relevant to the question of abolishing slavery.

AbraKadabra

Oh, it is. It IS ALWAYS a relevant question.

jamesc9

I'm thinking about what humans are.

I'm thinking that we're the animals who tell failure stories around camp-fires.

I'm thinking that, if I could copy the good version of something, where someone else has already paid for all of the mistakes, then doing so is a very human plan, and also saves me from paying for a bunch of mistakes.

Abrakadabra

That is a good point.

Sir Nil

WK's meta gaming as well!

doominator10

I feel like I'm missing an interlude with a chapter title called Ebb. I know it's not that relevant to current events, but it's been mentioned together so much that it's ingrained in me now.

Matthew Wells

We already had it- a lot of people have been waiting for this chapter.

WuseMajor

It was a while back.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/07/17/interlude-ebb/>

Adrian_V

Like those 2 above already said, we already have it and this is the continuation so to speak, or in Mauricius case the other shoe dropping xD

Burlyraven

Damn, I was actually kind of digging the Merchant Prince. Definitely a scumbag, but the fun kind of scumbag.

And, oh, look, Stygia is following the example of the American South. Fun.

Liliet

I know about the abolition of serfdom in Russia instead, and it was also the same thing 😊

TeK

So, Soviet Stygia when? Between them and the Bellerophon the whole “Empire of Evil” is covered.

unrecovered

I like to think there are no direct parallels between real world and guide in that regard.

TeK

Yeah, right, like Procer is so much not HRE half it's territories are directly named after German princes.

Liliet

Bellerophon IS Soviet Stygia. We can move along to actually sane forms of government now.

TeK

Well, while Bellerophon is a take on communism (warped or otherwise), and founded by former Stygian slaves to boot, it's main theme is fighting the social system – not an economic one. Meanwhile, given how Stygian slaves are about to get screwed by “free market”, I expect they will blame not the tyranny of laws (for by law, they are free), but the tyranny of economics (which is no less strict).

TeK

Also your comment is an Offense Against People. The Glorious Republic of Bellerophon will remember that..

SNTTz

Bellorophon is the Reign of Terror France. Not every bloody revolution in history was a communist one.

Liliet

Quite possible!

It shares an unpleasant amount of similarity with USSR too, though.

asazernik

More like 1880-1917 Russia, where the underclass is technically free but as part of the same process as emancipation is saddled with debt and contractual obligations that leave them deeply subservient to the same old masters.

Alex

Ah poor Hanno. One high moment of satisfaction, clarity, and purpose – then Meteor Rain brings him crashing back to reality.

He's always so composed, I wonder what his reaction will be at Tariq's death and the devastation he wasn't present to fight against.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm more concerned about the moral implications. Tariq has done something that could charitably be considered controversial. The White Knight is in the midst of an existential moral quandry, and the elder paragon of light just committed the most widespread familicide in history. I mean I'm sure the Doom of Liesse still boasts the higher numbers, and I do believe on the whole the Dominion will survive this, but this is a hell of a time for Hanno to be confronted with something that begs to be judged (by Hanno, not the White Knight. There's nobody to flip the coin for even if it still worked after all).

IDKWhoitis

Most of the human losses were soldiers and while there will be a political clusterfuck in the South, I don't think most people will begin to question what the Pilgrim did. Rather for Hanno, I'm worried about the implications that he is now alone, to chart the course of what Heroes will act and accept in the incoming Age of Order Cat has built. The responsibility will outright crush him, because like Cat, he won't be able to deal with a simple day ever again.

What we just watched was the last gasp of the Age of Wonders, with the Giants dead and gone, with the Pilgrim smashing the stars into the ground, and the last permissible/reliable usage of Angels for possibly ever.

Hanno got to enjoy one last simple fight, just holding his ground in the face of a howling horde. But the Dead King and Cat are much more dangerous and harder to fight against. The Dead King because he is a vicious bastard that will punish his every mistake with teeth and blood. Cat because she is cruel and so reasonable. There will be a hundred petty villains and every sin under the sun, but if anyone was going to eat the soul of Hanno, it will be one of the aforementioned greats.

He will have to steel himself now and go into the breach prepared (physically, morally, and spiritually), or he will be caught flatfooted against the incoming tide and be swept away.

Chris

"Life is a pain in the ass. You work hard, try to provide.. and then, for one minute, everything's good.... You have peace"

"This isn't that minute."

Gunslinger

I guess EE wanted to go into the new year without ever having to see Flow memes again

Juff

Typo Thread:

Helikeans kataphraktoi > Helikean kataphraktoi privately paid fund (missing words?)
had sent most > had spent most its the lesser > its lesser every sought > ever sought permanents > permanent
being welcome > being welcomed single soldiers > single soldier ounce > once been cautions > been cautious will allowed > will be allowed debtors the > debtors of the language knew > language he knew single narrow > single narrow the born that > the beorn that

standardtypo

Typos [standard]:

Helikeans kataphraktoi -> Helikean kataphraktoi had sent most -> had spent most its the lesser -> its lesser every sought -> ever sought permanents -> permanent
being welcome -> being welcomed single soldiers -> single soldier
ounce -> once
been cautions -> been cautious will allowed -> will be allowed debtors the -> debtors of the language knew -> language he knew singe narrow -> single narrow the born that -> the beorn that

standardtypo

Typos [standard]:
{near enough to decided} decided -> decide {followed by flock of buzzards} by -> by a

Harrent

Hail Leviona, First Under the Flow.

RoflCat

That sounds like a joke about someone who got lake'd by one of Catherine's lakeomancy.

Matthew Wells

Well, as if being in Cat's sights wasn't bad enough, Malicia has lost all ability to scheme effectively. Seriously, shapeshifting imposter going up against the Mystery Solving Band? Next she'll be deploying sapient echidnas.

Liliet

askjflffd I know right
I actually forgot they were Mystery Solving Special starring Relentless Magistrate I just figured it was a bad plan against a five man band but ESPECIALLY AGAINST THIS ONE

Adrian_V

And with 2 named villain versed in plots (poisoner and royal magician) to add savyness? She just gifted them the story on a silver plate.

TeK

But, we now can have Scooby Doo-esque adventures in the Guide. I see this as an absolute win.

Crash

Gods, sapient echidnas WHEN? I need it now.

Malicia lost her cool a long time ago it seems, she's just been a bit slower about going the way of Tyrants it seems. Doomsday devices, absolute certainty that her plans will work and now Devil-based puppetry.

Insanenoodlyguy

She's in cornered beast mode. She's not completely lost her touch though, she just pulled a Black and aborted a name just before that would have become a problem for her. But yeah, the story is shaping now. The Girl from Callow is about to climb the tower, so Malicia is becoming the villain you remember in the story. On a certain meta level it's also part of the death throes of the Age of Wonders. Black, Cat, Akua, Abigail (Dread Empress Abdicant, who literally can't give the position away for no lack of trying), whomever sits on the throne next, it won't be how it's been up till this point and likely never will again. Malicia, in some ways more than Neshamah, is now the final champion of the ending age. Even when they know all hope is lost, those never go anyway but big and loud.

Shveiran

Though I agree with your expectations, I would phrase this not as Malicia losing her touch but as Malicia being once more proven unskilled at Story-fu. She is trying to salvage the political and economical pressure on the GA; that just happens to be the entirely wrong battle.

shikkarasu

I'm a little disappointed, since she got where she is by not repeating the mistakes of old Empresses. I've wanted to like Malicia since Book 1, and she terrified me at first, but now? Now I feel like Cat is just going to walk over and step on her. Like, not even invade Praes; just walk up the stairs with Zeze, Archer, and Nakamakua. Malicia has no Chancellor, no Calamities, and most of the High Lords would be eager to see the Tower change hands, even if Malicia has them under her thumb.

Shveiran

I didn't even think about that. Uh.
Thank you.

Adrian_V

First i thought Zoe's POV was a setup for a repeat to what happened to that Merchant prince but now i see they both saw what is coming but react differently: Mauricius thought he could game the odds and continue, basically unwilling to see an important change nor the size of the conflict and paid the price.

Zoe meanwhile sees it and realizes things have to change to survive, but doesn't see enough, it is ironic she considers Nephele naive when i think her brother is right, she would be laughing because she knows Stygia's days are counted at least as slavers. She mentioned merchantis but we saw that even Cat was surprised about the “legal” slavery so it is not common knowledge, she probably knows because Stygia is the sole/biggest partner in it. What i mean is that the rest of Calernia won’t stand for it plus in these troubled times what better cause will a ruler need that to end slavery? even Praes is against it so any new tyrant is sure to ride the antislavery wave to use it.

And i think Malicia just made a mistake, she mentioned the painted knife band as the main reason she is doing this so obviously she is going to oppose it 1 way or another, this is just recipe for them to uncover her nefarious plot.

Liliet

I would say Nephele would laugh because she would know this is the first step. It can take a while, but the step has been taken.

It’s not the best case scenario she would have wanted, no. But she would still laugh.

(Also, can I just say I’m so so glad Nephele is back in the narrative for a bit? That we learned more about her and YES SHE’S FRIENDS WITH ZOE?)

Adrian_V

That is exactly what i meant, i think something was lost in the road inbetween my mind and my fingers xD, i mean that is ironic Zoe calls her naive when the naive one here is her thinking like that and that Nephele would laugh because she could see how this would develop from here on and where is going.

Someguy

Malicia should have just used [Rule] on the Merchant Prince

Shveiran

It was unreliable against a Named.

In fact, it was unreliable around Named too. I think that’s why she went at it this way rather than risk the Royal Conjurer or someone else figuring out he was being controlled and breaking the compulsion.

Earl of Purple

It’s not even that it’s unreliable upon a Name- it’s that the heavier-handed mind control is detectable, whereas simply bidding some to Stop or Shut Up isn’t- it’s one effect, then over. But another consideration is that the Name he was growing into was Merchant Prince- another ruler-type Name, and Speaking requires authority. Malicia wouldn't have authority over the Merchant Prince, if he's a Named. Currently, her authority is that she's got a Name and he hasn't. He gets one, she loses that.

Geno

She explicitly says it wouldn't work for long.

ninegardens

I... can't help but think that Hanno's band won too easily. In the sense that... the committed enough power to the bridge that they won easily which means that they could (in theory) have committed less and still won....

And having that extra power back in H-town would have been real nice.

Liliet

I don't think so. DK attacked the weakest link – if they were weak enough for him to break, he wouldn't have made this easy for them. Either success was his win condition, and he estimated Hainaut the softer target – and it was a draw. If the bridge crew was weaker, well, they would not have had the kind of desperate reserves Hainaut had to throw at the fire to at least beat it down. That wouldn't have come to a draw.

No, this was the better arrangement.

TL;DR their opposition was not a constant – it was easy bc DK decided to not commit resources to try where he couldn't succeed. If they had been weaker they would have faced enough to beat them.

Sinead

Furthermore, they needed that bridge gone for any long term holding of that border. Witch of the Woods is one of the few engines of mass destruction available to do that (mobility was key), and thus the rest of the strategy is built around that.

Hanno and Rafella are single point defenses that may have helped shut down the Scourges, but if Hawk survived them, then the rest of the battle basically goes the same way (with perhaps Hanno taking Vivienne's place as a last charge, but with potentially less effect compared to the rising Princess (though there is a balance eith established Name versus nstionalistic pull that may make the difference here)

Side thought: is there a difference between the two?

So I don't think they swing the battle so much that Starfall would not be required. In fact Hanno superceding Vivienne might have had long term negative consequences between undermining Vivienne and influencing Arthur.

Liliet

Yeah Hanno wasn't going to do nearly as much good at Hainaut as here, either absolutely or proportionately (and proportionately tends to add to absolutely, in Guide – inverse ninja law and all).

sengachi

Hmm. I'm not so sure about that. Who could they have pulled back from the bridge that would have saved the day?

Not the Witch of the Woods. She would have been incredibly helpful at Hainaut, especially against the Crab, but without her power the bridge wasn't coming down.

Not the White Knight. Without him as a Band of Five lynchpin I really doubt the bridge would have gone down as easily. (He had to kill a freaking dragon during this operation, not many Named can do that). And while he would have been helpful in Hainaut, he would have served a similar role to Vivienne, and he doesn't bring any Crab-beating abilities to the table. Maybe he'd have taken out Hawk or stonewalled the Prince of Bones, but that's saving a few Named, not saving the battle.

Without the Valiant Champion they would have had one tank protecting the whole group, that's a non-starter. Without the Stalwart Apostle they'd have had no healing, which easily could have resulted in a party wipe. And neither could have fixed Hainaut.

The Merry Balladeer maybe could have stayed back and they'd have gotten the bridge down, just with more difficulty. But the Merry Balladeer, most especially of all of them, would not have saved Hainaut.

beleester

I would trade the Witch for another sorcerer (Rogue, maybe?), or even swap out the band entirely. There are ways to bring down a bridge other than sheer firepower, but there was basically no other way to bring down the Crab and sweep the walls of Hainaut but the Witch or someone of her caliber. And losing an entire army at Hainaut is much worse than losing a band of five at the bridge.

And not opening the can of angels at Hainaut means that the DK doesn't retaliate with demons, which means that the Gigantes are alive to fortify the border instead of sacrificing themselves to seal the breach.

We have the benefit of hindsight, of course, and Cat's plan seemed solid at the time, but I do think they could have done better in theory.

Shveiran

Well, yes. In theory.

But honestly, the lychpin were the drow and Sve Noc, and the plans the DK made to deal with them.

I don't think Hanno or even the Witch could have really changed that without knowing it was coming.

I guess their addition to the roster could have changed things so that the Hawk didn't get a shot at Catherine, which, admittedly, might have changed a lot. The DK would either not have sprung his trap or found it insufficient if the FUN was awake and kicking. And even just not having lakeomancy deployed on the army could have changed things. But that really requires optimal deployment, and that means either hindsight or a hell of Providence.

beleester

True, nobody could have predicted the trap for the drow. But even that was pretty close – if Cat had been awake, Sve Noc could have used her as an escape route. It's plausible that a little more firepower would mean that either Cat has something else to throw at the Archmage or that the Hawk is too busy to get a shot at Cat.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure the Witch would have faced off against Tumult, with similar results to the Red Flower Vales – meaning the city would still have been destroyed. And with the Witch on the field, he wouldn't have been deployed against the "weaker" Alliance players, so Akua wouldn't have gotten her shot at him first. Remember Cat's early insight: Everything DK had at Hainaut was ultimately disposable.

TeK

Nah, they won easily because with such an overwhelming defeat we're due some good news. If they spared less, they would've diluted the story. Besides, they couldn't risk DK not stacking everything on the victory in Hainaut. We know he did, but if Cat had a Practical Guide before her the Creation probably would be already under her control.

edrey

two things, a claimant for a name while that specific band is there in mercantis, it has to be the mercant, the six member of the band. also, wouldnt the augur notice mauritius death? she notice the death of ashur king after all. the second is Hanno, wasnt his personal problem a little too easy to solve or is just me? if he see hainut and the problem is back, it would be a mess

Liliet

The Merchant Prince would be the band's patron/antagonist/backdrop, a la Vetinari, not the sixth member.

Liliet

The Ashuran guy was an important ally that Agnes was most likely keeping an eye on specifically, while Mauricius is... not. Also, it's not unlikely Malicia decided on this scheme and executed it too quickly for Agnes to take notice – Amadeus's approach, improvisation beats her.

As for Hanno... yeah, that's a temporary fix. Maybe it'll be enough of a foundation for him to build up on when he's back (especially with Cat having made that pledge to Tariq, which is the reverse of her previous promise not to meddle).

edrey

It was not about preventing his death but the augur noticing his death and sending the band, after all if the augur look for mauricius fate and find nothing because is a devil now the answer is obvious unless its explained how to trick her vision.

Liliet

The band is already there...

edrey

but they hadnt reasons to attack the prince, now they have one. the point here is if the augur can find out.

caoimhinh

Hanno's problem was always a psychological one, so a change of mind solves it.

Contrary to Vivienne that had been eating at herself in depression and self-doubt for years until she lost her Name, Hanno was simply "tired of this shit" when it came to schemes and compromises needed as a political leader and pivotal figure in an international alliance.

Now he is back in simpler stuff, fighting the Enemy as a Hero and without having to think about stuff beyond how to win the battle. Even Catherine felt invigorated when she was back in fighting rather than doing rulership, diplomatic, and political stuff. To the point of saying "it's good to be home" when there was an attack to the Arsenal requiring her to battle in person.

But unlike Catherine, Hanno does not excel in that kind of stuff. She hates it, but at least she is good at it.

Hanno is a cool counselor and a people person, but from the very beginning it was stated that he is neither talented in nor willing to learn the art of political schemes when it comes to nations and organizations.

Him acting like a proper White Knight (in his mind) for once rather than being in a room making hard choices and compromises, is like a breath of fresh air for Hanno.

beleester

I feel like this is sort of just avoiding his problems, though. The big problem he's been wrestling with for most of the book is that "I do not judge" is itself a judgement call – it means you're delegating your judgement to some other entity – the Seraphim, or a mundane legal system – and that system can be fallible, so what do you do when you think the verdict is unjust? You can't answer a moral dilemma with "Try not to think about it too much and do something else."

I suppose the breath of fresh air is a good thing, since he's been stuck on that for a long time and it's good to acknowledge that even if the law is imperfect it still gets a lot of obvious stuff right, but I don't think it resolves the dilemma in a satisfying way. And I think the ending underlines that – immediately after Hanno thinks "Yes, I'm doing what is right, in the right place," he sees something to make him ask "But what if I was somewhere else instead?"

sengachi

It's interesting to think about how all these pieces are setting up the next book.

We've got Malicia making moves in the Free Cities in direct opposition to some of the Truce's Named. Definitely a tie-in to Catherine (and Black) bringing the story to Praes and Malicia's court to get those much needed diabolists. It'll be interesting to see why Malicia is so interested in the Free Cities and how that's going to come up in negotiations/war.

We've got Stygia in the Free Cities making transparently bad faith deals with the Grand Alliance. Deal which Cordelia is either swallowing out of pragmatism, or actually going to take them to task for. So that's more maneuvering in the Free Cities, they're definitely going to be a focal point.

And then there's the White Knight. Effortlessly victorious in a straightforward Band of Five mission which during which his Name fit well and came easily. Now suddenly without his mentor, his friend, and his peer. Coming back to a sudden year+month+day ceasefire (well, "ceasefire", I'm sure the Dead King's not letting up his mundane undead assaults) during which the goal will be to bring the Dread Empire Praes on board with fighting the Dead King. His role (and Role) in the coming book is not at all certain or clear.

It'll be interesting to see how all these elements tie together.

Frivolous

I believe this move by Stygia to change sides and go over to the Alliance is the meaning of this quote in Extra Chapter: Grand:

"I was following far threads," Agnes said. "In the south. They grow clearer now, fates are precipitating."

This is the first time we've seen Stygian political parties mentioned, much less named, yes? Black Vines, Ivory Tiles, Herons, Pale Chariot.

I don't believe we've seen mention of the Court of Manners, the Court of Honours, the Court of Arcane, the Court of Trades, or the Court of Order, either.

I'm afraid Mauricius never stood a chance of resisting Malicia, not without foreknowledge. If he could have hidden from her, he might have lived, but once she got within Speaking range of him, he was doomed.

It's a pity. But she kept a secret her facility with Speaking through possessed intermediaries, and Mauricius doesn't seem like the kind of person to go delving deeply into Name lore and Aspects. Too materialistic.

Frivolous

Addendum: I really want to know if what Mauricius believed in Interlude: Ebb is still true or was ever true, that the Wasteland doesn't fear Catherine.

I suspect Cat is currently not in the top 5 threats to Malicia in Malicia's own estimation, but that's only because Cat was focused on Keter, not on Praes.

Those who are in the top 5 threats to Malicia probably include Amadeus + Ranger (not sure they can be treated as separate entities right now), First Prince Cordelia, Empress-claimant Sepulchral. Maybe High Lady Wither, who has to be aware that Malicia's reign is faltering, and she was a goblin matron, with all that entails.

But not Cat. i don't think Malicia respects Catherine very much. Probably thinks of her the same way Scribe thinks of her and Akua thought of her: boorish and thuggish. Predictable.

Darkening

I mean, Malicia was pretty dismissive of her when Ime tried to warn her about Fey!Cat being crazy and ready to drop a lake on Ater at the slightest provocation. Should be interesting to see how Cat approaches it. Y'know, it's an interesting parallel that Cat is considered a prodigy at Speaking when that's Malicia's main weapon. I bet we're gonna see Malicia try to speak at Cat at some point and have her completely No-sell it or even turn it around and Speak at Malicia.

Liliet

Mauricius should have never let himself be put in that situation (a dark room NOT full of people loyal to him with crossbows trained on the Praesi dignitaries, etc)

Earl of Purple

Oh, man! The replacement of the Merchant Prince means we might get an interlude from the Relentless Magistrate's band, and that means more Poisoner. She really interests me, and I would love that.

Cold Cyberia

It doesn't feel like Hanno's internal conflict was resolved even though Light came to him more swiftly. Maybe it's because we didn't see much of his thoughts but the problem of whether to believe in the Tribunal, and what to do now that they're silent, is still very much present in the background.

It didn't look like a test of faith. Just a removal of complications until it was obvious what the right thing to do was. I'm still expecting him to go through some sort of tribulation anyway.

All that's left for Basilia is Delos, Penthes and Bellerophon. Delos was already somewhat aligned with them so perhaps making concessions would be good enough. Letting them set up the bureaucracy of her future Empire, possibly? Penthes will need to be taken by force and I'm honestly not sure about Bellerophon. I guess the People will vote on it?

Shveiran

Oh, I know what Bellerophon will do: keep being irrelevant.

AbraKadabra

Which still bugs me. Since they are so set against tyrants, why not against the dead King, WHO is the biggest of them all, and enslaves people even beyond death?

Sinead

I don't think there is a wrong choice to be had for Hanno. The battle was always going to be a multi-pronged attack that was going to be a roll of the dice if they would hold.

And that bridge _needed_ to go down.

To be honest, not having Hanno with his crisis of faith in the middle of all that is probably a good thing, since out of all the Heroes we have seen at that battle, Hanno might have been most vulnerable to despair. The others fought hard, but at least from all Named perspective, everyone was willing to roll the dice on actually uncertain odds. I don't know if Hanno would be willing to.

Plus, would Hanno have approved of "Blood and Smoke"?

As for the evolution of the Free Cities, I find it interesting the idea of fully integrating the Free City infrastructure like that. Such a vision is a good reason for the Free Cities not to have a stronger presence in the War against Death.

Though I suspect some form of failure if Cat's Bismark Forecast is actual foreshadowing.

superkeaton

Man, Black's outrage at the fortune of Heroes really makes its point clear, here. The Heroes get the easy work, while Cat's dealing with the Real Shit, costing her a personal friend, an eye, and the Pilgrim. Though likely the Dead King accounted for this, feeding them scraps while he deals with the main course.

beleester

Um, the Pilgrim is a hero. There were a lot of heroes at Hainaut, and not all of them survived.

And Black himself has probably the least grounds to complain, seeing as he's put dozens of heroes in an early grave over the years. The only reason heroes always win "in the end" is because we don't say the story is over until a hero wins. It's a trick of definitions, not a law of the universe.

Lord Haart

>The only reason heroes always win “in the end” is because we don’t say the story is over until a hero wins. It’s a trick of definitions, not a law of the universe.

Excellent point. Makes me think about the whole “godhead is a trick of perspective”, maybe this comes up more in the next book.

ChillyPepper

I think I can gander a wild guess at Malicia’s play. She will probably get a party to the tower just in time for Black ascendance, and probably forcing his hand into keeping the empire they all built somehow?

Wild guesses are my thing!

ChillyPepper

Also the music that went in my head when we flashed to Hanno.

laguz24

Ah, now does Hanno go back to Hainaut or does he decide to sweep the other bank? Even when you run from hard choices, they run right back to you.

Sinead

Hopefully he sweeps the shore, but I could see him arriving without completing the job being a thing to further add to his “crisis of Judgement”

Adrian_V

In case there is no chapter later or i just can’t read it: HAPPY NEW YEAR!!!

Epilogue

“And so Maleficent the Second said: ‘If I must burn half the realm to save the rest, then kneel before the empress of ashes.’”

– Extract from the Scroll of Restoration, fortieth of the Secret Histories of Praes

The Vogue Archive did not sleep and tonight neither could Cordelia Hasenbach.

Numbly, she walked down the mostly empty hall past the great tables bearing maps of the realm she ruled and the smaller bureaus – where, at hours other than the middle of the night, some of the finest minds in Procer tended to its regions. There were a few mages of the Order of the Red Lion tucked away in corners, having retreated after greeting her and now again simply waiting to be of use, but aside from them the oft-crowded hall was quiet. Fewer than a dozen men and women were within it, sometimes reading through the odd reports that had come in the night but more often tidying up the numerous scrolls and reports that'd poured in during the day.

Cordelia made for the back of the hall, the raised dais where her handpicked analysts were charged with sifting through a sea of ink and parchment so that they might find the catastrophes on the Principate's horizon in time for them to be averted. The First Prince had chosen five such individuals, but at this hour there was only one awake and present: a woman of an age difficult to parse, rather dowdy in appearance and of generally unremarkable looks. The sole eye-catching part of the Forgetful Librarian's appearance was her oddly beautiful eyelashes, as if they had been borrowed from a more striking woman and set on this one's face.

She looked, Cordelia had come to realize, rather like the manifest ideal of someone's reclusive, scholarly aunt. It was an appearance that would invite dismissal from many, hiding the sharp mind and utter lack of morals of the Damned. The Librarian was an exceptionally talented woman as both a scholar and an advisor, the First Prince had learned, but she was best used as part of a larger council that would temper the ruthless pragmatism of the solutions she tended to propose. The other woman did not rise as Cordelia approached, remaining engrossed in a book as she cradled a steaming cup of chamomile.

It was a small slight the Damned liked to give, one of the little games she seemed unable to stop herself from playing even when there was no conceivable benefit for her to gain, but it had remained an irritant. Usually the First Prince took the time to consider whether a threshold had been reached where the other Proceran needed to be reminded of the hierarchy between them, but not tonight. The disrespect slid off her like water off a duck's back. It seemed such a small, petty thing to even spare thought for after the news she had received.

The First Prince of Procer instead slid into one of the seats she'd had brought here, exemplars of comfort given the long hours they would be used for, and leaned back. She closed her eyes, wondering if the Heavens would take pity on her and let her fall asleep instead of remaining like... this. Numb and exhausted, feeling as if she was somehow too tired to sleep. There was a muted clap as the Forgetful Librarian closed her book – though not before placing a bookmark, the parts of Cordelia that never rested noted, which was interesting given that most Chosen and Damned seemed to have enhanced memory – and set it down, sipping with uncouth loudness at her chamomile.

The Librarian was Alamans and of good birth, meaning she was being unpleasant very much on purpose.

“Long night?” the Damned idly asked.

Cordelia did not answer for a very long time, yet she did not hear the book creak open.

“I have been told,” the First Prince finally said, “that no less than three Hellgates were opened across the breadth of Procer.”

And that was not why she grieved, for sorrow was a nation’s due but grief could only ever be personal, but it was an answer of enough gravity that it would obscure what was truly moving her. The Forgetful Librarian breathed in sharply but did not answer. Cordelia opened her eyes, finding herself being closely studied.

“All three were temporarily sealed,” she continued, “though at the cost of the lives of every Gigantes that came to our aid.”

The villainess hesitated, for though she was not a moral woman neither was she the manner of monster that bargained with devils for the lives of thousands.

“And Keter’s Due?” the Librarian asked.

In proper Proceran scholarship the phenomenon was known instead as ‘the desolation’, but since the Arsenal had begun to train wizards the Praesi terminology had seeped through. It could not be denied that Proceran sorcery had a rather religious turn to it, and as Cordelia understood it the ‘desolation’ was considered to be as much theological in nature as it was magical – a punishment by Above for the ruinous overreach of mortals. What disgusting idea, the Lycaonese thought. To punish thousands for the crimes of one, who would not even be moved by the sight of such cruelty regardless. The very definition of pointless suffering. No, Cordelia would take no issue with the use of ‘Keter’s Due’ at all.

“There are reports from both the Hierophant and the Grave Binder that suggest the effects of the Due were purposefully worsened,” the First Prince evenly said. “In each case, most of the surrounding region was blighted.”

The curse had flooded outwards. To the north the losses were acceptable, for Twilight’s Pass had already been bare rock while the swaths of western Hannover and southern Rhenia that had been lost had been poor farmlands. In the case of Hainaut, where the blight was said to have spread down to a natural fortress named Lauzon's Hollow, the loss was one still to be felt: those lands had been in the hands of Keter for most of the war. In Cleves, however? The Hellgate had been opened at the fortress of Trifelin, where Rozala Malanza had won a great battle mere weeks before, and the Due slain a few thousand soldiers out in the open where there had been too few wards. That had been the least of the losses there in truth.

The blight had also swallowed most of the fine lands along the length candle road, snuffing out the principality's breadbasket.

That meant that Cleves would have to be fed by southern principalities, which were already buckling under the strain and rebellious besides. It meant dozens of thousand of refugees forced to flee south into lands grown increasingly hostile to them. It means that Procer would have to either beg for parts of the harvest of the Kingdom of Callow which it could not afford to buy – not with Merchant Prince Mauricius having clearly laid out there would be no more loans until some unacceptable conditions were met – or there would be starvation in the heartlands of the Principate. Hannover was ash and ruin, ruled by the dead. Of her own Rhenia no lands save the city-fortress itself remained, her own people huddling in the dark beyond those impassable defences while death roamed the countryside. Now Cleves and Hainaut as well were a ruin.

The armies that had been supposed to turn the war around, to push the dead back into the lakes, had delivered instead one of the bloodiest stalemates in the history of Calernia. And Cordelia's own uncle had died in some ill-fated last charge without the break between them ever having been mended, nothing but harsh words left to part on. She forced herself to breathe slowly and steadily, else she knew she would tear up. There were too many people looking. There were always too many people looking, and she could not afford to show weakness after having forced the hands of the Highest Assembly the way she had.

"Was Hainaut a defeat, then?" the Librarian quietly asked.

Cordelia Hasenbach allowed herself a bitter smile.

"The Black Queen won the field, though the field was but a smoking ruin and many died," the First Prince replied. "Among them the Grey Pilgrim. The White Knight broke the Dead King's great bridge in the north, so the campaign can still be settled in our favour."

She knew better than to name such an outcome a victory, however. Nearly half the Army of Callow was gone, the Lycaonese forces on the front mauled and leaderless and general casualties had been atrocious for everyone save the Levantines. Who had not been spared, either, though in a different way. The Dominion was in uproar, as at least a few hundred of its Blood had died turning to ash without warning on the evening of the Battle of Hainaut. Cordelia's spies believed that everyone who could have a feasible claim to being an Isbili had died, around the time the Peregrine himself had died and brought down the pilgrim's star on Hainaut.

With the Holy Seljun dead, no legitimate successor in sight and all remaining major nobles up north fighting Keter the resulting chaos already promised to be crippling. Another nail in the Principate's overly burdened coffin, she thought, for the Dominion had been one of the last few nations with which Procer could trade to keep afloat: the coming tide of squabbles and 'honour wars' would strangle those routes soon enough.

"Trouble in Levant," the Forgetful Librarian frowned, tracing the rim of her cup with a finger. "I'm not so sure we can afford that – economically speaking, anyway. We will have to lean on Helike and her dependents to compensate."

"It will not be enough," Cordelia tiredly replied.

General Basilia, who was now quite openly mulling claiming the title of empress after having so long deferred taking up the queenship of Helike, had made great strides forward with precious little outside help. Cordelia herself had served mostly as a diplomatic broker in the matter of settling hostilities with Stygia, and now that Basilia had most of the western Free Cities under her and a sworn peace with Atalante her rise seemed difficult to stop. Luck was even on her side, as word was that Bellerophon had once more declared war on Penthes, belatedly seizing an opportunity to attack their old rival that the People had failed to recognize. It further tipped the balance in General Basilia's favour, though given the fluidity of wars in the League there was no certain outcome. Not that Cordelia expected the war to continue much longer.

Delos was too great a fortress to easily fall, but it would not stand alone against three cities and the priests of Atalante had no yearning to break a holy oath freshly sworn. It might not be that Basilia would hold all of the Free Cities, as the Republic of Bellerophon at least would fight to the death over submission, but it seemed likely that a tributary empire centred on Helike would be emerging from the aftermath of that war. Given that Basilia was friendly to the Grand Alliance and hostile to the Tower as well as eager for trade to resume, this seemed like a saving grace for Procer's ailing coffers. Except, of course, that General Basilia had spent two years ravaging the Free Cities with her wars.

Trading with a broken land not yet recovered from the last civil war that'd ravaged it was not going to be sufficiently profitable in the immediate future, not when the only Free City whose coffers had swelled was Mercantis and it was hoarding the wealth. In a year, perhaps two, this could be the miracle that Cordelia needed should the nascent empire of Basilia not collapse.

The Principate of Procer did not have a year to spare, much less two.

"Shall I send for the others, then?" the Forgetful Librarian asked. "If there was ever a reason to wake them in the night, this would be it. I have refined my proposal for the invasion of Mercantis as a stopgap solution, besides, so it might be the time for Your Highness to genuinely consider it."

She still believed, it seemed, that there was room to maneuver. That there was still a game afoot.

"One year and twenty-eight days," Cordelia Hasenbach softly said. "That is how long we have before the seals on the Hellgates break."

And what could be done in so little time? Queen Catherine had left one of her foremost generals, Abigail the Fox, to handle matters in Hainaut with the returning White Knight and bluntly informed Cordelia that she saw only one solution: she was headed for east, for Praes. She would be taking the Marshal of Callow and the remains of the Second Army with her, as well as the reassembled First. A few Chosen and Damned as well, as she intended on settling the war for the Tower and returning west with mages in large enough numbers the Hellgates could be handled by Praesi magics. The Black Queen had not pretended that anything Cordelia could say might sway her from that decision, but the part that had truly cut had been the seemingly heartfelt condolences about Uncle Klaus.

It had seemed obscene to Cordelia that the Queen of Callow had spoken more to him than she had, this last year. That she... The First Prince mastered herself, evenly breathing. The east was beyond Cordelia's grasp, it was no longer her trouble. She would see to the west as much as she still could, to her last breath, even though she knew in the deepest of her heart that the outcome was already decided. Procer would fall because it was simply no longer capable of standing. If the war was not won soon it was going to break, and the war would not be won soon. In truth it might be that victory was no longer possible, Cordelia admitted to herself. Or that if it were achieved, the Principate Procer would not live to see that achievement.

And facing that brutal truth was part of her duty, to plan for it. So Cordelia Hasenbach's mind slowly stirred awake from the numbness, considering how any part of Procer might still be saved from the coming onslaught – how its people might be saved. And there was a darker duty still, one that she despised but must consider anyway. Should the Enemy triumph, should it all come to the worst of all ends...

"Send for the others," the First Prince of Procer finally said, tone steady. "And for mage of the Red Lions as well, if you please."

The Forgetful Librarian slowly nodded, then rose to her feet to see it done. Cordelia would need to speak with a man she had hoped she would not see again before the war was at an end. Not out of distaste for him, but because of what she had sent him to guard: the ancient corpse that had once lain in the depths of Lake Artoise, and the weapon that had been made of it. For Cordelia was a Hasenbach, in the end.

If it came to it, she would do what she must: better that some of Calernia survive than none at all.

—

It was a delicate balance to maintain, to keep a civil war going without ever being at genuine risk of losing it.

Malicia liked to think of it as painting with her own blood, drawing on the famous turn of phrase by Maleficent the Second. Every success in guiding the war according to her design came at the expense of carving away a sliver from the pedestal of her perceived superior position, and should the game be kept going for too long – or defeats not of her own making be inflicted upon her – then she ran the risk of that pedestal truly being toppled. It had not come to pass, of course. The Dread Empress of Praes had begun to prepare for this conflict several months before the first sword was drawn, and she'd had contingencies in place regarding civil war for decades prior.

Agents seeded and left to grow, traitors and assassins and impostors. Bribes and blackmail, debts to call on and more highborn in the palm of her hand than anyone alive might suspect. High Lady Tasia Sahelian had seen through parts of the preparations, in olden days, but now Tasia was dead and Wolof ruled by a young man she had personally seen soulboxed. High Lord Sargon Sahelian was, amusingly enough, one of her most ardent partisans well beyond the influence she could truly exert on him. He had bloodied Wolof taking it from his aunt, so he now craved years under the protection of a greater power to rebuild his domain in peace.

And, for all that Abreha of Aksum – Sepulchral, as she now styled herself – remained breathing, east of the Wasaliti there was no greater power than Dread Empress Malicia. So long as I do not slip, Alaya reminded herself, studying the board before her. She'd always enjoyed shatranj, even when she had still been her father's daughter and not a prisoner in a golden gaol. It was a game of logic and sequence, of anticipating the movements of your opponent, which had always appealed to her. Wekesa had enjoyed the occasional game with her when he'd visited Ater, the two of them spending more time playing and gossiping over their common companions over wine than attending to the matters of state Alaya had claimed the time for.

These days, though, Malicia played mostly against herself. The Dread Empress of Praes considered the lay of the pieces, the disarray of black and white that signaled the tail end of a match closely fought, and slid her last black mage down a diagonal. Soft footsteps told her that Ime had joined her without the need for the empress to look away from the board. This was not her bedchambers, simply a study, but her spymistress was one of the very few people who had access to the enchanted secret passage whose door opened behind her.

"Speak," Malicia said.

"Our people in Procer confirmed that Queen Catherine is headed for Praes," Ime said. "Already orders have been sent to Laure by the Black Queen to prepare the supplies for a campaign in the Wasteland."

Malicia cocked an eyebrow.

"They cannot afford one," the empress said.

The intricacies of the internal politics of the Grand Alliance aside, Alaya was speaking to the plain realities of hard coin. Callow was not flush with gold, having already spent most of the coin it had received for brokering a peace between the dwarves and the drow, and Procer was so beggared these days that it was often resorting to paying in goods rather than gold for the Callowan grain and cattle it so desperately needed. In practice, the Kingdom of Callow was simply not wealthy of enough to afford a war on a second front. It did not have the steel, the gold or the manpower to attempt such an enterprise. That had been part and parcel of Malicia's strategy to contain the Black Queen from the very start: make dealing with the Tower a choice between diplomacy and bankruptcy.

"They're pulling out the First and Second Army from Procer," Ime replied. "As for coin, Duchess Kegan was instructed to borrow from the northern barons if need be."

They'd have wealth tucked aside, Malicia reluctantly admitted in a mental calculation. The lands under the baronies of Harrow and Hedges had been only lightly touched by the Tenth Crusade and their rulers had made a tidy profit selling their goods to a beleaguered south during the reconstruction of Callow after Second Liesse. More than that, they would be willing to lend. The barons were not unaware that their adversarial relationship with Catherine Foundling had barred them from the Callowan halls of power, so they would be eager to get a foot in – particularly if the debt was to be ultimately shouldered by the much more friendly Vivienne Dartwick.

No doubt a few handsome spare sons would be sent along with the coin, bearing hints that a newborn Callowan dynasty could do with an infusion of fresh noble blood. Malicia was not unfamiliar with the tactic, her hand having been sought with varying degrees of aggressiveness over decades. Organising particularly painful deaths for those who dared to insist too much had been one of the few instances in which Malicia had worked closely with the Scribe. Eudokia was no friend of hers, but the other woman had inherited that very Delosi penchant for meticulous punishment of the contemptible.

“Who will hold command?” Malicia asked, eyes still on the board.

She moved a pale knight, venturing deep behind an arrant line of pawns.

“Abigail the Fox has been left in command of the Third Army in Hainaut, so she’d dredging up Marshal Juniper herself,” Ime said, tone wary.

The empress was not so affected.

“She is a skilled tactician,” Malicia calmly said, “and a general to take seriously, but her reputation is exaggerated. Rozala Malanza would have beaten her decisively in Iserre if the Black Queen had not intervened at the last moment. Marshal Nim should be her match, if it comes to that.”

Given a decade perhaps the ‘Hellhound’ would fully grow into her talents, having been seasoned by the Uncivil Wars, but for now the experience of the commanders that had served since the Conquest was difficult to match for such a young woman. It would tell, particularly in treacherous grounds like those of the Wasteland. Still, Malicia did mourn that such a talent had been stolen away from the Empire. It had been a stroke of terrible luck, that General Istrid would die during Second Liesse and so leave her daughter adrift and her old legion easily led astray. Not the greatest misfortune to come out of that battle by any measure, but a misfortune nonetheless.

“She will be coming personally, Your Majesty,” Ime quietly said. “The Black Queen. And she pulled away two of her armies from the war on the dead, against our expectations. She is taking a much harder line than we believed she would.”

Her spymistress was not incorrect, Malicia thought as she moved a black tower near the centre of the board. The Dread Empress did not find it entirely surprising that after what the Callowans had quaintly named the ‘Night of Knives’ their queen would balk at a diplomatic resolution of their disagreements, but she had expected that Cordelia Hasenbach would push for such an initiative. The burdens of the war should have rent Procer asunder by now and forced the First Prince to seek terms, even if behind the Black Queen's back, but out of Salia there was only silence. Scribe had seized the reins of the remaining eyes in Procer, which meant information trickled east only at a glacial pace. Alaya slid a white mage, taking a pawn.

"She cannot afford a battle with either the Tower or Abreha," Malicia said. "The ensuing casualties would make impossible an assault on Keter. It is posturing, Ime."

"She thinks us weak," Ime said.

"Which will make all the stronger an impression on her when it is revealed otherwise," Malicia said. "I have no intention of offering onerous terms to turn on the Dead King, the shock and an amenable bargain will see us through."

The priority would be dismantling the Grand Alliance as continental power. So long as Callow was leveraged to leave it after the war Alaya expected that old rivalries between it and Procer would resume, most likely through competing commercial interests, and it would be child's play to cause incidents at the border between Procer and the Dominion. Her plans had not all gone perfectly, of course. The matters down south had turned against her and she would admit that the Stygian coup had been a complete surprise, but General Basilia's victories brought opportunity with them. Sponsoring an eastern alliance within the Free Cities to rival the western Helikean bloc would check Grand Alliance influence in the region.

Already the Secretariat was willing to privately entertain her envoys, worried that Delos would be gobbled up by the victorious marauding general.

"Or she could try to enthrone another in your place," Ime murmured.

Alaya's fingers tightened around a black knight. Malicia cocked an amused eyebrow.

"He has no armies, little practical support and fewer allies than I have fingers," the Dread Empress of Praes said. "Amadeus has not returned to my side, but he has not raised a rebel flag beyond that unfortunate lapse at the Peace of Salia."

Reconciliation might still be possible, she left implied. And Amadeus was in Praes, that much had been confirmed, but her once Black Knight had not made many visible waves. He had not sought allies within the highborn, reached out to the self-proclaimed Dread Empress Sepulchral or even come out of the woodworks to lead the deserter legions in the Green Stretch. The last in particular was a shame. It would have simplified things a great deal in some ways. Malicia was inclined to believe that Ranger had been an anchor around his neck, this time: for all that she was a fearsome force of violence, at the moment the half-elf was also being hunted by the Emerald Swords.

So long as she remained his companion, Amadeus could not come into the light without having those ten monsters coming for wherever he dwelled. Alaya released the knight, turning to meet her spymistress' eyes. Ime looked troubled, as she often was these days. She was growing old, for all that rituals still kept the worst ravages of time away, frailer in both body and mind than the bold woman she had been in their youth.

"You have concerns," Malicia said.

"In understand why we cultivated the perception of our weakness," Ime said. "So long as we were a genuine military concern for the Grand Alliance, I agree that we ran certain... risks."

Like Catherine Foundling gating in through the Twilight Ways and beginning to drown cities, driven to hard measures by the fear of the Grand Alliance buckling under a war being fought on two fronts. Much easier for Praes to be beset by civil strife, a threat still but only a distant one. Not urgent, an enemy that outright threatened the survival of Calernia. Not that Malicia herself did not genuinely believe that the Dead King had any real chance of winning, for Evil did not win wars, but then it was not her soldiers dying in droves. She had ensured that the Praesi civil war under her watch was to be largely bloodless, mostly fought through raids and maneuvering.

"Yet that perception may yet come back to haunt us," Ime continued. "She despises us, Malicia. She might refuse to deal with the Tower even if it's the safer path, so long as there is another path at all. Another credible candidate."

Malicia studied her spymistress. It was not assassination being alluded to here, of course. Ime had argued for it in the past but Alaya was still unwilling. Such an attempt would be laughably unlikely to succeed, besides, so long as he had Ranger by his side. Why even consider the option, with that in mind? No, it was a different sort of measure that Ime was arguing for. Alaya looked down at the board and rested a finger atop the black knight she had left behind, thinking for a moment. Sometimes childish dreams had to be let go of, she thought. Even when it was painful. There would be no returning to the way things used to be, and pretending otherwise was embracing the noose.

She tipped over the knight with a flick of her finger, the ebony piece clattering against the board.

"Your advice has merit," Dread Empress Malicia said. "Send for Marshal Nim."

Her spymistress watched her carefully.

"You'll do it, then?"

"Yes," the Dread Empress of Praes said. "I will recognize her as my Black Knight."

—

It was a pleasant night out, especially with a bottle of wine and stolen roasted chicken to gnaw on.

The hinterlands of Aksum seemed perpetually doomed to being set aflame, Amadeus of the Green Stretch mused, since a mere few decades after he'd torched them on his way to besieging the city the High Lord of Wolof was now doing the same. Young Sargon was also abducting people to fill up the city that his aunt had mutilated on her way out, however, which Amadeus found an interesting variation on the usual Praesi civil war. It was important to keep those things fresh, he felt, and Gods knew that the Dread Empire had a great deal of practice bleeding itself. The dark-haired man chewed on his second chicken leg thoughtfully, watching the smoke rising in the distance. Another village burned. They ought to get moving soon, he figured, else they would risk running into raiders.

Amadeus wasn't exactly afraid of the outcome that would ensue, but it wouldn't be subtle and that lack was a lot more dangerous than those raiders could ever hope to be.

He wasn't even halfway through the leg when he first glimpsed Hye coming up the path, noticing the splash of red blood on her sleeves when she got closer. Ah, fruitful talks then. She'd always been such a skilled diplomat, if one with a particularly narrow repertoire. He let himself drink in the sight of her for a moment, the long locks framing the high cheekbones and those clever dark brown eyes. Amadeus had seen her in everything but bare skin and moonlight to mail and cloak caked in filth, and even after all these years the faint note of wonder had yet to fade. The love of his life approached, taking a long look at him and narrowing her eyes.

"You ate both legs, you jackass," Hye Su, who some knew as the Ranger, noted.

"So I did," Amadeus, cheerfully replied. "You should have stolen your own chicken, if you wanted the choice cut."

Though he had once been known as some manner of knight, he'd never bothered with chivilary: to add insult to injury, he also tossed the bones of the first leg he'd eaten at her and watched as she easily dodged. Her lips twitched, though.

"I should leave you hanging for this," Hye complained.

"You won't," Amadeus smiled. "You got to kill something, it always puts you in a chatty mood."

"I don't get chatty," Hye denied, deeply offended.

"Of course you don't," Amadeus pleasantly smiled.

He had to duck a chicken bone, but it was a victory in every way that mattered. Though huffing while she did, she dropped at his side and the both of them sat back against the tall milestone that some ancient High Lord of Aksum had raised on the hill near the road. Hye naturally helped herself to the rest of the chicken, producing a knife so she could pop the juicy but cooling pieces into her mouth, and the two of them sat closely together under the night sky.

"So I was talking with this fae," Hye said.

"As one does," Amadeus amiably agreed.

"He had this friend that knew a friend," Ranger mused. "And they'd heard that the Black Queen, out west, she's headed our way."

"To clarify," he said, "was this helpful rumour shared before or after you started stabbing him?"

"Eh," Hye said. "You know how it is with fairies. There's stabbing and then there's stabbing."

Sadly, Amadeus of the Green Stretch did know how it was with fairies. It was only marginally better than dealing with Wasteland highborn, something that had driven him to some fairly infamous bouts of stabbing over the years.

"Shouldn't be a long journey through the Ways," he said. "Two, three months at most."

"Sooner, if Indrani's guiding her," Hye said. "She's always been a natural at pathfinding."

Amadeus hummed, amused at the understated pride in her voice. Though Hye did not visibly play favorites among her pupils, she'd always favoured those who used bows slightly over the rest.

"It is time for us to surface, then," he said. "We need to get the last pieces in place before my own former pupil arrives."

Hye grinned, all teeth and malice, and he felt his heart skip a beat. Even now, after all these years... well, he was not as young as he'd once been, but she did not seem to mind so what did he care? If anything she seemed to like the grey in his hair, which he had not known he was worried about until he felt relieved she did. It had been some years since Amadeus had last felt insecure, even unknowingly, and he had found it almost refreshing.

"Finally," Ranger said. "I've been enjoying laying low, Amadeus, but sometimes you just need to bite down on something you know?"

"I do," he replied in a murmur. "And this is long overdue."

He looked east, where in the distance waited the gargantuan shape of the Tower jutting out from Ater, and he raised his half-empty bottle of wine in a toast. When was he to settle his accounts, if not the end times?

If the song refused to leave him, then he would silence it.

ErraticErrata

And on that note we end Book VI. I'll be taking a two month break between books, so the first chapter of Book VII will be coming out on the second of March.

To all of you who've stuck with me since the beginning and to the many new readers, I hope you enjoyed this book and that you'll enjoy the closing chapter of the series even more. Happy New Year, and see you in two months!

tithin

A satisfactory epilogue.

See you in two months for the last(?) book.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

In before EE splits the next book into two books again. 😊

caoimhinh

Better that than rushing up the closure of the saga.

Seven Books and One is a fine number, after all.

Sinead

I'd think that in a published order, book 4 would have to be re-worked into two books for "Seven and One", so EE probably aiming to wrap it up in 1 book.

Aerdor

Considering the number of chapters only, book 5 seems longer than book 4 (108 for book 4 against 127 for book 5). I personally think that the books 4 and 5 can stay as they are, but it is the books 1 et 2 that needs to be put together, because they are way smaller than the other books, and because end of book 1 doesn't really feel like the end of an arc to me.

If I'm right then EE needs to make 3 more books for "Seven and One". Not complaining if he does 😊

Dathrax

Oh my Gods Below! Is Amadeus of the Green Stretch going to topple the Tower?

TheCelestialEquation

Not without cat he isn't!

Mile

Cat's gonna climb it while Amadeus chops up the base. Then she'll be at the top and he'll get the last chop in and she'll have a flying fortress because of course the tower is gonna have that enchantment.

SpaceDorf

But due to the law of Irony its the one that goes only up and down

stevenneiman

Due to your comment, It's now headcanon for me that Ficsit Incorporated exists in Creation, and the Engineer is Named. Hell, the game's tagline is a perfectly fitting Aspect lineup for her.

"Construct. Automate. Explore."

Relai

0000oooo! Need to catch up to the story XD, still at the end of book 5.

Unrecovered

Thanks for a great fantasy! Though I predict two more, one for the east and one for the north 😊

Frivolous

EE: Thank you for your work, all very entertaining.

Take care. I'll miss you.

TigerQuoll

And for the story as a whole (and the Principate-Dead-King Storyline in particular), it seems we're at that part. The night is darkest before the dawn part, aka the darkest hour part, everything is turned around but we can maybe see the beginning of the end of the tunnel part. We're nearing the climax now, at least because there is not many ways our stakes can get higher without changing a story that shines through its (admittedly very dark) comedy.

David McChesney

Appreciate your hard work! Wonderful to read.

Varil

I seem doomed to always reread this story just as it hits another yearly break. So good! I'm looking forward to the next book!

Shaerick 68

Thank you EE for such an amazing story. I've only been following it for about a year, but for some time now having a new chapter come out has been the highlight of my days. The wait for the next book will be miserable, but enjoy your much deserved break!

therealgridlock

I said I would be doing these when I finally caught up to the present, so here it is:

Typo Thread:

It seemed such a small, petty thing to eve spare thought for after the news she had received.

>Eve to ever

The Hellgate had been opened at the fortress of Trifelin, where Rozala Malanza had won a great battle mere weeks before, and the Due slain a few thousand soldiers out in the open where there had been too few wards.

>"Slain" to "had slain," or rewrite the sentence

The blight had also swallowed most of the fine lands along the length candle road, snuffing out the principality's breadbasket.

>"Length candle" makes no sense. If it is a proper name, perhaps capitalize it to denote that it is correct, otherwise "candle length road" makes more sense, or "long candle road"

It meant dozens of thousand of refugees forced to flee south into lands grown increasingly hostile to them.

>Thousand to thousands

Luck was even on her size, as word was that Bellerophon had

>Size to side that she saw only one solution: she was headed for east, for Praes.

>"For east" to either "for the east" or just "headed east," for east isn't proper

Or that if it were achieved, the Principate Procer would not live to see that achievement.

>"The Principate Procer" to either "the Principate" or just "Procer" or possibly "the Principate of Procer," i suspect either the of was left out, or this is an artefact from being undecided over whether to say the Principate or Procer

"And for mage of the Red Lions as well, if you please."

>Mage to mages, or a mage, or magi, the plurality is insufficiently specified, but if it's singular, it would be "a mage," if it is plural, it would be mages or magi. Or if it is a specific mage, it needs to be specified.

In practice, the Kingdom of Callow was simply not wealthy of enough to afford a war on a second front.

>"Wealthy of enough" to "wealthy enough," or "Callow simply did not have enough wealth"

"Abigail the Fox has been left in command of the Third Army in Hainaut, so she'd dredging up Marshal Juniper herself," Ime said, tone wary.

>"She'd" to "she's"

The priority would be dismantling the Grand Alliance as continental power.

>"as continental power" to "as a continental power"

"In understand why we cultivated the perception of our weakness," Ime said.

>In to I

Amadeus had seen her in everything but bare skin and moonlight to mail and cloak caked in filth,

>I am almost 100% certain you meant "from" instead of "but"

I didn't mention a few other things that I found personally annoying to read, since they were a matter of editing preference and not actual incorrectness, and this is a typo thread and not an editing advice thread, but there you go.

TRUELIKEtheRIVER

oh fuck

Eau Richards

EE, I love this whole work and every character in it so I thank you for your dedication to this piece of art. That said, the two month break might just end up breaking my heart and soul. I hope everyone's have an amazing 2021

Alex Straughan

Dun Dun Dun

Sir Nil

Well time for some Tower crashing.

Sinead

Here me out:

The three factions of Praes are fighting over Tower raising, and are taking so long that Callow is coming in to overthrow them all.

Hakram's Tower Raising has taken on a life of its own.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Oh that is awesome. Guess Amadeus is going to test whether the Tower truly endures.

Also great timing with end of this book

Also gonna make an early prediction that this will be 8 books long.

Juff

Typo Thread:

eve spare > even spare
What disgusting idea > What a disgusting idea
Due slain > Due had slain length candle (length of Candle road?) which where > which were
It means that > It meant that died turning > died, turning Keter the > Keter, the her form > her from so she'd dredging > so she's dredging as continental > as a continental Already the Secretariat (extra space)
"In understand > "I understand everything but (should this be "from")

beleester

>Alaya's fingers tightened around a black knight. Malicia cocked an amused eyebrow.

Seems like Malicia is reacting to herself here. Should that be Ime instead of Malicia?

Rando McRand

I noticed that as well, but interpreted it as the author contrasting the reactions of Alaya, the lifelong friend and companion of Amadeus, vs. Dread Empress Malicia, a woman who cannot and will not embrace sentiment if it comes at the cost of being able to control her empire

Frivolous

beleester: I think that is not a typo but a reflection of the difference between the woman and the Empress.

Alaya misses Amadeus. The Dread Empress, on the other hand, thinks little of Amadeus's chances.

Tarial

Wooooooooooooooooooooo !!!!!

Wonder what Cat is planning, she can't have that many body left to bleed, even if "Callow interrupt a Praesi civil war" sounds like the sort of story that would have happened at least once in their 12 (?) centuries of existence.

Wonder if Amadeus is gonna destroy the Tower, seems like a definitive way to silence a song, he ought to like the idea.

dadycool

Rebellious Callow striking against Praes? With the (maybe) installment of a more friendly ruler at around the same time, or at least one busy/uncaring, willing to cut them loose entirely, that sounds like a story with history. Also, Struggle is at the foundation of Cat's Life Story, so a half-broken Callow going up against a Praes that's far stronger than they thought immediately after their biggest failure/tragedy might not be the worst situation. Maybe she'll even take her Squire to visit a few lakefront properties?

Sinead

Nah, I don't think we'll see any installation of Praesi leadership. I think we'll see a complete disbanding of Praes into separate groups to have to develop a different system of working other than the Tower. But one where the orcs, ogres, and goblins have a better seat at the table than at the Declaration.

laguz24

I don't think simply destroying the tower will be enough to end the song. What he has to do is to get people to stop climbing. To be something more than a serpent forever eating it's own tail.

nick012000

Yeah. Just toppling the building isn't enough; it's happened multiple times before, and they always rebuilt it again, even taller than it was before, afterwards.

caoimhinh

Probably have to destroy the throne of the Empress that has endured since ancient times. It's the one thing in the whole Tower that remains unchanged, standing in the rubble each time the Tower is demolished.

TeK

The end times indeed. Procer is done, the League is done, Levant is done, Praes is about to be done. The only country that still remains in the shape of it's former self is Callow, amusingly enough.

The old order is gone, the new one is yet to come. I wonder.

If it will be truly worth it.

Hitogami

Callow has been repeatedly broken since the conquest and Cat's rise to power, they are actually just further down the path of recovery than the others.

laguz24

Also, malacia is violating the iron sharpens iron philosophy of the wasteland. If you go up against yourself or someone too much like you. You will never grow, it's time for the wasteland to learn that lesson.

Miley

I'd hope she realizes most people use stone to sharpen iron.

Hitogami

Finally an ending.

I'm honestly a bit dissatisfied with Black, he's been doing absolutely nothing and that bugs me. He'd said that he would take care if Praes and now here he is waiting for Cat to come over...

WuseMajor

Amadeus is incapable of doing nothing. The man ALWAYS has a plan and his section implies as much.

The fact that Malicia doesn't know what it is, should be fucking terrifying her, not causing her to assume he's just ...on vacation or whatever.

Crash

Malicia went over cliff on villainy a while back, she has lost perspective.

The fact she thinks she knows exactly how everything is going to play out here even as more and more wrenchs are thrown in her plans (some, she isn't even aware of because Scribe took out her eyes in the West) is confirmation enough of it. She's done.

sengachi

The implication seems to be that he and Ranger have been doing a lot that Malicia doesn't know about. We just have to wait and see what it was.

ruduen

Amadeus has been doing absolutely nothing on-screen. Off-screen, who knows what. Unlike all of the other preparation which we've seen and therefore have immediate narrative payoffs for, Black's had time to lay the groundwork for whatever large-scale plot is appropriate. And as someone on the villainous side of things...

Combine that with the fact that Malicia seems more surface-level in terms of reading the narrative while Amadeus tends to go broader and see larger-scale consequences, and I'd say that we're due for a proper reveal when he finally comes out to play.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, I knew she lost the moment she assumed Amadeus wasn't doing much at the moment.

Mike E.

As Amadeus would say... "Mistake"

irritantseraphim

He isn't "doing nothing", he is preparing and planning. With Cat coming east, the situation is now at a point where he can truly come into action, instead of being the third or fourth or fifth wheel in a Praesi civil war.

DDSK

The book comes out on my birthday 🎂

Thx a lot man 🙏

Burlyraven

I shall endeavor to hold my breath for the next two months. This next book is promising to be almost optimistic with all of the powerups, redemptions, restorations, and revolutions on the horizon.

Also, honestly, Alaya is coming across as almost a cartoonishly villainous in this. Kinda refreshing, actually.

Insanenoodlyguy

The age of wonders died when a Tyrant let a Hierarch judge angels, but an age doesn't die all at once. It's still in it's death throes in many ways. As THE Evil nation, Praes is a huge part of that age, and so despite Amadeus working very hard to keep exactly this from happening, she's taking on the roll of that Villian in a last stand of not only herself but her empire's very way of life. Naturally the weight of that is making sure this is gonna be loud.

WuseMajor

Heh.

Alaya made the same mistake Cat did.

She tried to play things such that the other side would be forced to the negotiating table, but misjudged the situation, failing to realize that the negotiating table was never really an option.

You have incurred the Long Price, Alaya. And you'll be paying it sooner or later.

Also... I mean, you're right when you say that assassinating Amadeus was never really an option, but ...he's been in hiding with the most dangerous woman on the continent for over two years now and you don't actually know what he's planning.

This should fucking terrify you.

You, you of all people, know both what he's capable of and the fact that he's incapable of not planning something.

And he likes Cat better than you.

....Also, I get that you're hurting Cordy, but “seemingly heartfelt?” That was a needless jab and it displays that you still don't get her. That was genuine and she'd be hurt that you thought otherwise.

Oh. Huh.

Alaya doesn't know about the Hellgates. I bet that would change her math big time. It would mean that, at this point, Cat can't afford NOT to be in charge of Praes or allied to the leader of the nation, because only the collective knowledge and mages of Praes could even give her a chance at closing those things. And you've screwed yourself out of ever joining the alliance, so there's really only one option left, isn't there?

sengachi

Huh. To expand on your comment about the Hellgates leaving no option but for Cat to war on the Tower, I wonder if Nemesah did that on purpose?

He probably has a number of ways in which he could take advantage of the Grey Pilgrim's escalation opening, but he specifically chose Hellgates, the method which forcibly drags Praes into this mess kicking and screaming.

anon

Wasn't there a clause in whatever pact he made that said he couldn't invade Callow and Praes as long as Malicia was alive?

sengachi

Oh why there was. It was such a lovely clause crafted to ensure that Praes got to sit on the sidelines fat and happy while the Dead King fought the whole rest of Calernia.

Such a shame, such a pity, that Nemesah's actions would result in the Grand Alliance turning their eye on Praes and directing some attention there too. Really, it's just a tragedy that his Evil back-stabbing ally's "leave me out of this" clause doesn't also protect Malicia from Catherine deciding to attack her.

ninegardens

I mean... if Cat shows up and is like "Yo, we need you to join us in warring on the Dead King, otherwise we'll knife you" And Alaya be like "Sure; you want some mages? I got a couple legions of diabolists out back" Cat would be like "Your a bitch. Thanks. Let's get moving, times a wasting."

sengachi

I mean that's the outcome we'd all certainly hope for. But I wonder if that's even possible. Even if Malicia did agree to help.

After all, Malicia has been so extravagantly back-stabby and front-stabby and side-stabby that I'm not sure her agreement to help could be believed. Especially considering she started this. Any commitment by Malicia to contribute diabolists in the Grand Alliance's defense is almost literally unbelievable. To the point where accepting and potentially getting knifed might be considered a worse risk even than assaulting the Tower.

Like, even if there's only a 10% chance they assault Praes, dethrone Malicia, and come out of this with enough of an army and enough Praesi diabolists to stop the Dead King ... I might take those odds, even if Malicia was promising me she'd just capitulate and help out because this new move by the Dead King is too threatening. Because I'd rate those 10% odds as pretty comparable to the odds we'd survive accepting Malicia's "help".

mavant

Confirmed: Malicia' spirit animal is a porcupine.

Crash

beautiful.

sengachi

Ohhh, Malicia doesn't even realize that Amadeus lost the Black Knight mantle a while back, does she? That he's now Named only insofar as he's a Dread Emperor claimant.

.... orrrrrrr, I guess he's not looking to climb the Tower, but to topple it. Permanently.

Well. If there's a person in the world who has a shot at ending that story, it would be Amadeus, the blackguard who conquered Callow.

irritantseraphim

I agree with you that he is a Claimant to the throne of Praes, having that damn song (The Girl who climbed the Tower) in his head all the time.

And I guess that from the chapter part from his view, we can easily deduce that Maddie will not climb the tower and make his seat up there but that he will tear down that tower and grind the remains to dust and sever the ties of stories that make Praes erect it again. So that there will be no more Dread Empire.

Insanenoodlyguy

I wonder though, what kind of name he'll get for doing that. Cause doing something like this could still make you something, and he's already growing into a name...

irritantseraphim

Some twist on conqueror or destroyer. I doubt he will claim the throne. I think he would rather install someone who follows his interests.

WuseMajor

I dunno. The theory that he becomes Dread Emperor Benevolent is actually fairly compelling.

Lord Haart

I used to think so but honestly his actions in Procer say otherwise. He's a bit too personal in his feelings – I think he's very much in the role of Cat's father, regardless of how much he's willing to admit it.

Destroying the Tower to end the song might not just be about denying the Role to himself or Malicia. That Name seems to be a trap and I think he wants better for her.

Meanwhile, Cordelia is becoming Dread First Prince of the West and is gearing up a flying fortress of her very own. Her ends differ from Malicia's but they are increasingly the same creature.

They both represent real threats to the fire of life in Calernia, one like sulphur, one like water, and in the meantime Nessie is the darkness itself. But I think even he is aware that without light, dark is meaningless too.

Mental Mouse

Malicia knows, that's why she knows she can replace him. Presumably this is similar to when Amadeus raised the Squire to claimant status.

JJR

The tower has apparently been trying to serenade Amadeus with that song about climbing the tower for however many decades it's been. And he's about ask it to cut it out in a way that can only be done by packing the ground floor with goblinfire.

sengachi

Amadues, give his sappers orders post-victory: "I want other goblins to hear of what happened here and weep pitiful tears knowing they will never see such total and magnificent destruction, and I want the green to rise high enough into the sky that people stop thinking 'The Black Queen' when goblin fire comes up."

shimizubad

And then Cat throw the first vial of goblin fire

shimizubad

I would say Robber but unfortunately he's not with us anymore

egregiousmiscellany

I'm sure he's slinking around in the hells somewhere. He'll come out in a burst of hellfire to help when those breaches open back up.

Bighomer

Happy New Year all! Enjoy your break EE!

The Tower is so going down this book

Daniel E

So here's a thought: Can Ranger's Aspects be used on her own senses? Like, can she use Transcend on her tongue to experience a taste of chicken that no mortal could comprehend? Inquiring minds need to know.

Sinead

Yes. That is why she is so ing smug all the time.

She literally breathes different air than the rest of us.

sengachi

Maybe, maybe not, but I'll bet she can do it while cooking, for a similar experience.

mavant

What happened to Klaus's final letter to Cordelia?

mavant

Oops that was supposed to be a top level reply...

Daniel E

But since you're in this thread, the answer is 'Ranger ate it'.

Cold Cyberia

I feel like Ime is a pretty good gauge on Cat's reputation in Praes and it leans towards: "don't fuck with, she'll murder your city". Imo the High Lords will fold like a stack of dominoes if it ever looks like she's winning.

As they say, better to be behind a Tyrant than before them.

Insanenoodlyguy

Unfortunately, Cat lost. A lot of people are going to assume that that's robbing her of her momentum and they are seeing her last desperate grab in the twilight of her time, because that's how the sort of role she's had would go if she was straightforward Prasei villiany. So she's gonna have to show them the hard way.

agumentic

She didn't, though. Even in this epilogue, you can see Cordelia saying "The Black Queen won the field". Sure, the field is a blasted wasteland that cost many men, but that's nothing new to villains – I feel like they in particular are more likely to concentrate on the "won" part. Certainly, the epigraph says exactly that, and Maleficent II was one of the best rulers Praes had.

Insanenoodlyguy

A lot of people will not consider this a win, herself included.

imagesbe

The vast majority of people who don't consider it a win will consider it a draw, including herself. So even then she didn't actually lose.

ninegardens

So... something no one else seems to be mentioning here... Malicia's plan seems to be "Surrender to the GA terms in the most annoying way possible, so that DK is defeated, but the GA doesn't stab us later."

Maddie's plan seems to be "Welp, the end times are coming, so I might as well break the tower on my way out."

Uuuummmmm... one of these plans gives Cat exactly what she needs. The other is needlessly destructive and time consuming, and may well get a bunch of the needed diabolists killed.

Also, Maddies plan was literally "Chillin like a Villian until my daughter decides to ditch the war vs DK and come help out?"

Seriously?

Like... he couldn't even be bothered sending her a message to say "hey kid, I got an awesome plan for fixing Praes; just free up some time in your schedule and we are gonna have ourselves a great super fun revolution"

Wut?

It makes no sense that he wouldn't at least communicate what the hell was going on.

He had two entire years.

... I do like the explanation for why the civil war has been going so long though. That is hilarious, and totally in character, and a very smart move on Malicia's part.

Earl of Purple

That's not what he's been doing. He was waiting, I would guess, for a change in the status quo. For Malicia to slip or Sepulchral to do something big. Malicia had things too much in hand for that, however, as Amadeus probably should have realised. But those blasted Emerald Swords possibly hindered him a bit.

Mile

Amadeus doesn't seem like one who would wait. Setting up pieces for a dozen traps though, that sounds more likely.

Insanenoodlyguy

You misunderstand. What he's been doing is setting up dominoes. In several places Malicia things everything is okay, there's a great potential for it all to come tumbling down. Of course, a domino cascade can be stopped if you react fast enough and put a finger in the right place, or knock a few over sideways so the chains can't continue, so you don't just start it do it when somebody who wants to stop it is in the wrong place. Amadeus just found the right moment to start tipping.

Sinead

Considering that Amadeus championed a school of sorcery at Cardinal, I don't think he's looking at bleeding the diabolists like you are suggesting.

Meeble Moo

I'm so excited to see Praes again! Alaya and Amadeus are always exciting povs, although my heart is still breaking at how much has broken between them.

The one thing that bugs me is Alaya's plans. She knows Amadeus better than anyone except Hye or Scribe. He's been laying low for two years; she should know that he must have something in the works, and that whatever it is won't be small. But she's not taking anything of the sort into account, and that just ... doesn't mesh well with how sharp and perceptive Alaya always is. And while naming a new Black Knight is painful emotionally, since I still mourn for the old trust between Alaya and Amadeus, it's not momentous enough to match the forces that are converging on Praes.

Zach

The thing about the Black/Malicia relationship is that there hadn't really been much in the way of trust between them for a really long time – Black just convinced himself that things were still good, because he has a tendency to be irrational when it comes to family/loved ones.

The impression I get is that Malicia had basically been "broken" for a really long time (basically since whatever she experienced under the previous Dread Emperor) and Black was just in denial about it.

shikkarasu

I don't think she's broken, she just learned different lessons than Amadeus during the war. He learned that anything

Doomsday-adjacent is doomed to fail and take its orchestrator down with it. She learned that Evil does not win wars, and to wars must be discouraged.

If she really was broken by her past she would dwell on it more, but she canonically doesn't consider her past trauma more than once every few months/years. That is the behaviour of someone who has mastered their fear/pain, not bottled it up.

No, Malicia and Black just didn't see eye to eye, but he was willing to work within her Empire since she is a better Empress than he would have been Emperor. She just never told him about half her irons in the fire and overestimated his tolerance for her approach to Rule.

WuseMajor

In some ways, it's really funny that Malicia still thinks that, given that her army won the war with Callow and Cat has been winning every war she's been involved with, or at least pulling out a draw.

...No wait, not funny. Tragic, that's the word.

TheCount

Happy New Year!

Hope you can enjoy this two months, what with the general craziness of life nowadays.

Thank you for your great work!

Curious if Book VII will be the last or not, what with it focusing on the war on Praes AND the raid on Keter still a far away goal...

Also, we got to know there is only 10 Emerald Swords remaining.

And no sightings of the Wandering Bard...that worries me greatly.

Bakkasama

So, did one of Malicia's marshalls/general get the Black Knight name or did I get that wrong?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I thought what she meant was she'd try and recruit Cat by offering her the job. It's the kind of audacity one expects of Praesi, but Malicia has to know by now that it won't work. Your interpretation seems substantially likelier.

caoimhinh

Malicia is going to anoint Marshal Nim as her Black Knight. Which she is likely hoping will give her the Name, thus gaining a more powerful pawn. Nim is the one Marshal that always stayed in Praes, and if I remember correctly, she is an ogre.

shikkarasu

Two points that I am stoked for, Narratively.

- In chess the Knight is the only piece that can threaten the Queen without being threatened back. This makes it the only piece one might promote a Pawn to in place of a Queen.
- Maddie predicted in Decorum that Hanno would have a pattern of three with a Black Knight, just not himself.

smibd

I've been thinking that a lynchpin of Black's strategy will be to bring ogredom to the table. Since we were recently told that, 'ogres are never on anyone's side, because no-one is on ogre's side'. Destroying the Tower and bringing all Greenskin to a seat at the table in the New Praes will most definitely be in their interest. So I think if you're right, Malicia is gonna be Backstabbed big-time herself by her new Black Knight.

caoimhinh

Seems like Nim is a claimant for it, but still hasn't been able to get it.

Malicia is probably gonna try to strong-arm the process of Name acquisition by formally anointing her as the new Black Knight. Who knows if that's really gonna work.

One thing that I wonder about is that Malicia said that ruling is unfeasible on Named, a couple chapters ago when killing Mauricius. And Nim has been implied to be the Marshal of Praes on which Malicia had her claws deeper in, as she was the one Marshal that always stayed in Praes protecting Malicia. This new Name might be something that makes Nim... rebellious.

Frivolous

I believe Malicia doesn't know that Catherine's upcoming Name was sparked by the need to put the East in order, and she also doesn't know that the Name will finally finally manifest in the East.

Reason: All the above seems based on the assumption that Malicia can negotiate with Catherine. Catherine's Name won't be the kind that compromises. It will be the kind that rules.

Supporting quote: Scribe had seized the reins of the remaining eyes in Procer, which meant information trickled east only at a glacial pace.

Analysis: Malicia isn't getting much news from the war against Keter. She may not know about the Hellgates. She may not even know yet that Tariq and Klaus are dead.

Malicia also isn't talking much if at all with Neshamah. If she were, she wouldn't be depending on spies for intelligence.

In other news: I was surprised that the very slow civil war in Praes was Malicia's own doing. I thought it was Amadeus's doing.

I was also surprised that Nim became Black Knight sometime during the 2+ years since Amadeus lost it. First ogre of that Name, yes? First Ogre with a Name, too, as far as we know.

Amadeus and Hye seem awfully carefree for homeless people on the run. It implies that things are doing according to Amadeus's plans.

Also what was a faerie doing that Hye stumbled across one? Or did she just go into Arcadia to kill something for stress relief?

caoimhinh

Well, the only ones to know of the moment that sparked her nascent Name were Tariq and Hanno, on account of being the only two people present when it happened, and the only one to know that it would ultimately coalesce into form in the east was Tariq, and he only knew that by peering directly into her soul through the Ophanim.

And he died little afterward that same night.

There's simply no way for anyone in Calernia to know those pieces of information.

It doesn't seem like Nim became a Black Knight already, rather she seems to be a claimant for it, but apparently needs Malicia's help to get the Name. Malicia's official anointing of a Black Knight might strong-arm the process.

Cold Cyberia

There's been ogres with Names before. It's mentioned somewhere in the first book; they get Names even though there's far less of them than orcs.

I suspect the Wild Hunt will say hello during the eastern expedition, hence the fae.

nipi

Wonder if our clever little (former fae) fox will make an appearance

mavant

What happened to Klaus's final letter to Cordelia?

Shveiran

It was never written, as far as I know. It was mentioned only as something Klaus composed in his head but could never quite bring himself to put it to paper.

Though I certainly hope he actually did offscreen, me being a big softie and all that. It would be so awesome to see Cordelia read it.

Darkening

It's funny, the Dead King's whole schtick originally was that he wouldn't go to war unless he was simply the ally of another villain that would act as the Big Bad for story purposes so he could make some gains while the inevitable loss occurred to that villain instead. And look, here comes the day when Malicia gets to reap what she sowed playing Neshamah's patsy. Honestly, I'm really interested in how Malicia getting removed would affect the conflict against the Dead King on a meta level, once he no longer has that fig leaf to hide behind and he goes from secondary villain to Bigger Bad, at war with the entire continent. Will he stand down? Negotiate? Push on, confident he's won enough ground already to carry the day? I expect there'll be at least a token offer of negotiations. Really, when it comes down to it, Neshamah isn't what Cat's personal story revolves around, it's always been about Callow and Praes, which is why her name requiring her to go East makes a lot of sense. So really, for the story of PGtE, Cat resolving Callow/Praes and the dead king deciding to pack it in and go back to being the slumbering evil would kiiiind of work? I dunno. This war's been ruinous enough that I suspect Calernia would love a chance to get things in order without continuing to bleed an entire generation out in the north.

FableWright

Have you ever heard of the Long Price, son?

WuseMajor

Honestly, the Dead King has crossed enough lines here, that he's definitely become the Big Bad. Whatever happens at this point, he's not going to get to just go back to being the slumbering evil.

Styn

Ive been reading this for years and never did a reread, two months is a great time to do so. Have a restful and deserved break!

ChillyPepper

Is... is Cat getting an Empress name...?

Mental Mouse

Not if she can help it, but she's going up against Bard here.

FableWright

Have you ever heard of the Long Price, son?

FableWright

Whoops, new to wordpress accidentally responded to post rather than a comment. Shame I don't know how to edit or delete this.

Miley

Next time, in a Practical Guide to Evil.

Malicia: O Catherine Foundling, I declare thee my Blackest of Kniggits!

Cat, aside: (Is this an insult? I am already a queen! Very well then, 2 can play at this farce.)

Cat: Then as black knight, I declare praes is at war with the dead king! I require every single doabolist we have posthaste, to defend the portals he hath opened upon the lands O wish to claim and then give away to the Drow.

Malicia: wut.... (pikachuface)

Miley

Oy! Samshit! What's the idea changing I to O?

Anyway... who would have expected the new Drow nation may just become a part of the Empire? They do seem to have the mindset for it. Or maybe they'll be a nation in the north in lands that the empire claims to own but dares not enter, like the Golden Bloom north of Callow.

Miley

Oy! Kun-hee! What's the idea with autocorrect changing I to O?

Anyway... who would have expected the new Drow nation may just become a part of the Empire? They do seem to have the mindset for it. Or maybe they'll be a nation in the north in lands that the empire claims to own but dares not enter, like the Golden Bloom north of Callow.

Miley

Oh it was lag, not a filter... oops

aran

Wait, is Malicia intending to make Catherine Black Knight? Can she DO that?

Catherine already seems to be coming into a new name, she's the ruler/leader of two other nations, and she's basically planning to kill Malicia besides. The story for her to suddenly become Malicia's subordinate again just doesn't fit.

Necrologist

"“Your advice has merit,” Dread Empress Malicia said. “Send for Marshal Nim.”

Her spymistress watched her carefully.

“You’ll do it, then?”

“Yes,” the Dread Empress of Praes said. “I will recognize her as my Black Knight.””

She wouldn't need Nim to recognize Catherine as her black knight. She is recognizing her highest martial leader as her black knight. Nim.

Darkening

I believe the person referred to was the Marshal, not Cat.

Sirharixx

“on his way to besieging the city the High Lord of Wolof”

“in everything but bare skin and moonlight to mail and cloak caked in filth”

I think something went wrong in both of these sentences ?

ohJohN

This is how I read those sentences, with clarifying punctuation/fixes:

Shveiran

So much interesting stuff.

Personally I'm a bit miffed at the actual aftermath in Hainaut. I think there were a bit too many twists without proper foreshadowing, something that is extremely rare in these books. But the whole

CatherineIsSnipedEvenThoughSheKnewThereWasASniper-

DeadKingCapturesSveNoc-

PilgrimFamiliicidesTheIsbiliAndNukesEverything-

NeshamahOpensThreeHellgates-

TheTitansSacrificeThemselvesToStall-

OhNoesNowWeTotallyNeedDiabolists sequence was... a bit of a stretch?

I don't know. It felt unsatisfying to me. I don't know if it is a problem of foreshadowing or something else, but it felt forced.

It leads to the set-up of Catherine finally returning to Praes – and it gifted us amazing scenes like Klaus and Robber's deaths or Vivienne steadying the frontlines – so I don't think the direction is wrong, but there is something in the execution that didn't sit right with me.

I think it's part me expecting Catherine to play a bigger role and instead seeing her put down hard by the Hawk without understanding why she didn't have contingencies or why they didn't work, and part me not being reminded often enough that the DK was sitting on the Nukes and waiting for an opportunity to bring them to bear.

I think it wouldn't be too hard to fix, but I do think it needs a few adjustments.

TeK

Agree on the whole Hainaut bit. The lack of proper foreshadowing was what took the sails out for me as well. The actual amount of twists is normal for the usual PGtE fight, let's be honest, it's on the level of Liesse and below the Graveyard, but damnably the most of twists came seemingly out of nowhere.

Like, what makes Hainaut so special it can trap a goddess? Dunno. Cat getting sniped is strange, given the kind of blows she shrugged off. I can hardly contain the irony of her getting shot with an arrow in the head after failing to wear helmet to battle. The Sisters going into a probable trap after THEIR SAFEGUARD HAD BEEN INCAPACITATED? Not the smartest move all around, but it's never even acknowledged until after it blows in their face. Seems weird.

It just feels rushed. Not like GoT season 8, but comparable. That EE takes two month of rest rather than his usual one should be a hint. I begin to suspect he just wants this series to end. It's overdue.

ninegardens

I mean... a lot of this WAS foreshadowed.

The Titans closing hellgates was explicitly foretold by Augur. Sve Noc being vulnerable, and having difficulty fighting the DK has been mentioned before (What is it, "the basis of sorcery is to usurp")

The hellgates themselves were explicitly foreshadowed by Bard "Where are the demons cat?"

The sniping of Cat wasn't, but then again, "hawk is gonna snipe shit" explicitly was, so...

Shveiran

I agree, to an extent, but the thing is, there is a difference between establishing something is possible, and foreshadowing.

Foreshadowing is, ultimately, making a promise and following through. This orphan down on his luck is going to marry into riches, or maybe he'll realize the real riches were his friends all along, or maybe he'll reach for more than he can handle and it will end in tragedy. All these can be good stories; but a reader needs to be able to tell, subconsciously, which one he's reading. Only subconsciously, ideally.

Mind you, a lot of this comes down to feelings; if the last chapters felt good to you, more power to you!

Speaking personally, they didn't. It's not that I was surprised: I'm often surprised by the endings. "Cat becomes Fey Queen of Callow" was not how I expected the third book to end.

But that is not the point: the point is that, to me, the surprise didn't feel good because (again, to me) it felt like a very different story than the one I thought I was reading.

If that was just me, well, things are probably good as they are. But if others did, maybe the foreshadowing needs a little tweaking?

ErraticErrata

I took two months after the last book at well, there's a lot more to get in order for the later books of the series. And

I'll thank you not to make assumptions on my behalf, especially when they're wrong.

TeK

Well, I do apologize. It was very rude of me, and uncalled for.

TeK

That being said, I want to say that, despite my nitpicks above, I do consider this series to be a genuine masterpiece and personally rank it among the classics of fantasy. I am, frankly, in awe of your writing talent, and consider that, in time, you will be remembered by the humanity as a whole. So yeah, looking forward to your next work and all the best.

Victor

Mabe the situation can be interpreted as part of the death of the Age of Wonders?

The Pilgrim sacrifices himself as an attribute of the dying Age, forcing the inevitable outcome.

Rubies to piglets (thank you, Catherine!) he anticipated that Neshamah would be forced to quickly retaliate with something grand by his nature. It could have triggered:

- A “cleaning of the board” for new stories to emerge or to give the Above a proper backing later
- The Wandering Bard may be forced to act against Neshamah at last
- A releif for the Drow front

Cat had at last received her arrow. It was inevitable and Archer has warned her many times about the possibility of such a situation. Incapacitating Cat could have been also a way for Creation to save a large part of the Night (should she be awake during the Sve Noc capture – it could have been ripped out of her).

Also, as previous practice shows, Cat learns to turn her permanent wounds into something greater and more powerful later. An artefact (like a bastardised version of Masego's eye) could be crafted, etc.

From another point of view the situation looks like something tipped the scales during the battle, something that we do not know of yet. Like the Nerazim decided to act against Keter while Neshamah's attention was away. Something needs to destroy the other 9 Crabs in the narrative.

The chapter did leave a feeling like a punch in the gut though. Like a Story broken before it reached its culmination. If it is explained later – this could be another masterful stroke. The story may still be a total tragedy in the end with a morale that in the end Death wins and no matter what you do – it will not be enough.

Sorry for my English – it is not my native language

Shveiran

Also, Ranger text is identical to Archer's.
I don't know how I feel about that.

I'm not sure what Malicia is hoping to achieve here.
Naming Mashal Nim her Black Knight gets her... a Named? But Cat has a team of Named, who have been honed by years of killing Revenants NO MATTER WHO SHE ACTUALLY BROUGHT. She has lorded over the Villains of the Grand Alliance because she is the toughest bitch among them. And she thinks a wet-behind-the-ears Black Knight is a challenge?
I mean, as an opponent to Juniper, sure, Nim is a threat. But he doesn't need a Name for that.

The whole sequence seems to suggest Malicia thinks this Naming is closing some avenues, but I don't see it.
How does the very murderable Marshal getting a Name change anything substantial?
Did someone spot her plan?

TeK

I think the Nim Knight is more of a statement, like posting a picture of you and another girl after you broke up with your ex. To close the window for reconciliation. And also close it for Black Knight to be able to claim his Name back. That is, assuming she knows he lost it, because it may very well be just establishing a claimant to weaken him.

TeK

More importantly though, this is an ogre getting classically Praesi Name. Ogres are very rarely Named to begin with, on par with orcs in that regard, and giving one a Name reserved for humans probably is another brick in the foundation of New Praes, along the Orc Imperial Governors and Goblin High Lady.

nipi

So is Black going to settle accounts with Malicia or or The Tower? Break the seat of power heroes failed to scratch?

nipi

Also waiting for Cat to bring the sentient tigers into the fold.

Matthew Wells

Bold of you to assume that Amadeus doesn't already have them ready to deploy through Arcadia.

TeK

But what they don't know is that they already secretly betrayed them to Malicia.

Matthew Wells

Well, they think it's Malicia. It's actually Traitorous in a wig again.

Hakram the Goat

"Seven Books and One "

That would be awesome. I can even picture the titles:

Book 7 – LongCat Makes Malicia Pay Long Prices

Book 8 – Dead King vs Grand Alliance 2: Electric Boogaloo

I'm really hoping Malicia gets her teeth kicked in by... everyone. I want the Woe to team up with Amadeus/Ranger to crush her and the Dead King to backstab her. I'm still pissed that she killed Ratface >:(. Small slights, long prices bee-yatch. And merking our tasty (according to Cat lol) talented treasurer ain't just no small slight.

Hell, I'm still mad about Nauk's death, though I'm not sure who to blame for that. The Summer Queen and Winter King maybe? I don't think Cat'll get another shot at them unfortunately, or if she would even take it if she got one.

Not too broken up about Nilin since he was a traitor though. Robber's death was glorious. He probably got the best ending out of all of Rat Company so far, though I doubt it can be beaten. He is, after all, the most honorable, honest, merciful goblin of the House of Lesser Footrest.

PinkUnik0rn

I am pretty sure the Dead King vs. Grand Alliance is somewhat finished. It is not about the ending, I am just pretty sure that conflict between Praes and Callow is the cornerstone of the whole series. There it started and there it will end. Im not saying that Dead King, Chain of Hunger or Golden Bloom are of the topic, but they will appear as a part of a larger scheme. I am personally betting on Malicia betraying Big Ol'Bones in one way or another, taking his power and becoming the Greatest Dread Empress, finally giving into the O.G. Dark Side. And Catherine will have to be the one to take her on. I bet my left testicle on this.

Frivolous

Amazing how fast January has gone, and now we're in the middle of Feb, with only a few more weeks to resumption of the Practical Guide to Evil.

I hope that EE is getting good rest and remains safe and well.

robber

(Quiet rhythmic sound of a blade sharpened by a practiced hand, then deftly sheathed; a creak of leather)
