The thing is that he cheated not only tactically but also narratively. The spell he used was intended to kill a villain, with the lack of drama associated with a minor villain character dying offscreen to another villain. Black used his own magic to convince the spell that was already destined to successfully kill someone to a target who normally had more plot armor. It's worth noting that he still, even if unintentionally, targeted the least fan-favorite-y of Hanno's gang. He might have had tactical reasons in his own mind, but he passed up the entertaining boistrous bruiser, the funny mage, the entertaining (even if she's also a nasty person) Bard, and the one male character who's gotta be the heartthrob for any audience members who swing that way.

Cpt. Obvious

The spell was intended to kill someone. It was targeted at Sabah through scribing her name (or was that Name?) into the ritual. As I understand it Scribe had Assassin sneak in a hair from the Ashen Priestess into the ritual focus providing a physical link that's easier for the magic to follow than going by just a name. Wekesa mentioned that the ritual was sloppy which probably was why they could change the focus like this.

This was also a pretty massive ritual that feed on the blood spilt by nine caravans, so it's not like Warlock can just whip something like it at will. So it was a bit like a perfect storm.

The Tyrant tries to kill Sabah using a huge but sloppily crafted ritual. Amadeus figures it out. They happen to have something from a hero that can act as a link and Assassin can place it. A lot of pieces had to be in place for this to work, so don't expect to see it done again anytime soon...

Cpt. Obvious

Oh, and they couldn't target the Wandering Bard as she tends to disappear when attacked. Besides even if they had a sample from the WB she no longer inhibits that body.

Blinks

Except they know all the heroes in the good guy party and it's not as if Praes is going to have troubles with human sacrifice.

It's basically just reduced the Hero party to a complete non-issue. At all.

Why should Black fight them, struggle with them? Pull up a load of sacrifices and take them out one by one. Job done.

Climax of a story or not, it wasn't her story. She wasn't involved. A named shouldn't die as what was, basically, an afterthought. It reduces them in the story to little more than chaff to go along with the others.

It also raises the question of with the First Prince is still breathing. If a ritual like this can kill a Named then why bother with assassins? Just nuke her from the next country after. She's not even a Named.

I find it a terrible direction to go in.

esryok

My reading is that they can't just get a pile of bodies and murder any old random Named. The ritual was a part of how Warlock killed Ashen Priestess, but it wasn't the entirety of the process or even the most important part of the process.

Paraphrasing Cat's list of "How to kill a God," the process involves: misdirection, violence, and earning it in the eyes of Fate. Maybe this kind of ritual could successfully (directly) target a new hero, but if they went after Hanno's party? Black & co. seem confident the only reason it worked was the Tyrant vs Praes story.

As for the First Prince, she will see your premeditated murder and raise you an Augur.

corrado alamanni

Bard is best girl I do not approve

Darkening

Oh wow that last part. Is Black gonna clean up the calamities before he goes out? The last time he nearly died that went on a rampage, and he's trying to leave a legacy behind, not a go out in a blaze of destruction. Huh.

Darkening

On another note, as much as I don't want Cat to be the one to kill Black, I feel like him getting stabbed to death with the knife he gave her would be incredibly dramatically appropriate.

matbag248

Maybe he asks her to do it?

Byzantine

Earlier in the story it was noted how every one of the Calamities left means to be stopped, in case they ever becomes corrupted somehow.

I suspect the one for Black is going to fail and Catherine will be the one who has to kill him.

Big Brother

Maybe not stabbed to death, that's a pretty brutal way to do it, and highly inefficient, which he'd disapprove of. A steady slip between the third and fourth ribs from behind for a quick death would probably sit better with him, if he had to die by Cat's hand.

haihappen

The "Stabbed by his own chosen successor"-trope enhanced with "Killed by the first weapon he ever gave her". Yes. But, good things come in three's: "Disobedience by sacrifice" -> Malicia orders Black to kill Catherine, but in Black's understanding, that would lead to the annihilation of everything that he spend his live achieving. So, a choice must be made.

Ethesis

Better is Cat gathering the woes to find a different name and to subvert fate so Black doesn't die.

KageLupus

Only way I see that happening is if the situation devolves into Black needing to pass on his mantle to Cat, in which case things have truly gone tits up. Although that would be a pretty powerful narrative. It would almost blur the line into a heroic sacrifice, but the end result is to empower a new villain who is going to keep trying to bring the whole Good v Evil narrative crashing down.

... Hells, that actually doesn't sound that unreasonable now.

Nairne

"Ethesis

matbag248

I don't think Cat will kill Amadeus, unless someone also kills Scribe. Else she would die and we have many more battles to go through.

On a side note, I was rereading some of the chapters in book 2. I found this:

Gods Below and Everburning, what manner of wicked things I wouldn't do to have cavalry like that.

She did get her cavalry, just had to do a little spot of treason or dipped a toe in the treason pool.

Kingbob12

Assassin has a truly macabre sense of humor. And Cat is building the exact same cult of personality that bonds her with her Named as Amadeus built with his own so long ago. Scribe could so easily be Adjutant here. Scary thoughts.

Snoogle

Scribe is not a full-on Calamity. They are 5: Black Knight, Ranger, Assassin, Captain, Warlock. Scribe is a 6th, sort of not-really-but-barely honorary Calamity.

Cat has her 5 Woes if I'm reading this story correctly: Squire, Hierophant, Archer, Thief, and Adjutant. Meaning there would also be room for a 6th, honorary, not-really-but-barely Woe.

How many people love Robber again?

haihappen

Everybody loves Robber.

Akim

Lets goat the Author in doing this

Rnt169

I know I do, a lot.

stevenneiman

I'm trying to decide which of the Calamities he would be equivalent to. He has aspects of Ranger and Assassin both, and his position as the sixth pseudo-member is like Scribe, but all of the equivalents are already filled since Hakram pulls double duty as both the Scribe and Captain equivalent. I guess that means the teams might not match up perfectly 1:1.

Nairne

Adjutant is Scribe – a few chapters before he just threatened Thief in a similar manner if she ever betrayed Cat.

Jakob Israelsen

Didn't Warlock do something similar? Or did he only do that for his son?

stevenneiman

Cat has described Hakram as serving both the roles of Scribe and Captain to him, being both a fearsome warrior to fight beside and an invaluable administrative resource. As for the others, Masego is clearly her Warlock, and I'd say that Thief is her equivalent of Assassin (though the parallels are the weakest for that one) and Archer is her Ranger, complete with training from the cheese monster herself and with hitting on the equivalent of Black.

Soronel Haetir

Black has still given Cat no real reason to want him dead, he has, in fact, supported her in pretty much everything she wants to do. As I recall he as much as told her that even the treason of forming her cavalry unit could be smoothed over. And the things she doesn't like were not his idea or recommendation.

Just like Black told Cat he would not lie to her because both the lie and the truth would be revealed at a terrible moment for him I just don't see his machinery spitting out an answer that turns Cat against him before something else kills him.

Byzantine

I get the feeling if Cat kills him it's going to be a matter of necessity. Black corrupted by something, as she almost was.

It's the only way I can see her managing to kill him without it backfiring horrifically, no matter how much Black tries to account for it.

LaNuup

Right now Cat Cat is in no way capable of killing Black. Both Hierophant and Archer would not support her and Hierophant probably even directly oppose her. And Black has an advantage concerning information, resources, and personal skill and forethought.

And all of this is not even considering that Cat lacks a motiv. On the other hand constructing a motiv would be simplicity itself for Black if he actively wanted her to kill him.

Adept Arcanist

Yeah, if he dies I figure it'll either be in a grand heroic sacrifice to buy Cat the time to escape and continue their work, or else some sort of quiet mercy-killing where he asks her to wield the knife herself.

Either way, I'll be heavily surprised if him asking her to kill him/let him die doesn't lead to one last repeat of "a monster" "the very worst kind" as a response to him telling her to let her father figure die.

JC

Amadeus is terrifying.

Still, isn't Champion on her way to kill Captain?

LaNuup

She was on her way to intercept Captain. But considering Captains second form she is faster and more mobile than Champion, whose Name and abilities seem to go into the line of being an immovable opponent.

Doesn't help when the Bard can just Wander her anywhere the plot needs them to be.

RandomFan

I'm pretty sure Wander doesn't work on the rest of the group, or everyone else would be nigh-impossible to deal with. She didn't use it with William, after all, and I can see a lot of uses for it on attack.

wirelessgrapes

Holy fuck, I really need to see either the Bard's or the White Knight's reaction to this.

haihappen

That makes for an interesting YouTube reaction video... (oh how i despise those, shall their makers burn in the ninety-ninth hell)

PingleBerry

This will be....interesting

OldSchoolVillain

I suspect that the intervention of the Gods Below was neither the Dead King nor Triumphant, may she never return. I'd bet that the Gods Below waited, let the Wandering Bard build up weight in the narrative and accumulate a metaphysical debt, and then responded in a long game in the form of Amadeus and Catherine Foundling.

haihappen

Isn't what the Diabolist is cooking up a direct consequence of the Bard's meddling?! If there is such a thing as karmic debt, the Bard could try to achieve Balance by making bad stuff happen?

More likely "It's all part of The Plan."/"For the greater Good!"

Matthew

The Bard desperately needs “cartoonish evil” to win so Akua is totally acceptable.

Akua confirms the story. Black makes the story irrelevant.

Shequi

Killing the Ashen Priestess is disrupts the White Knight's 5-man band, but at the cost of setting up the Hedge Wizard with a Revenge motive against the Calamities for killing her sister.

LaNuup

They can not know for sure whether the Calamities or the Tyrant killed her, so if the revenge does not work in a very unspecified way, like kill the man who killed my sister, instead of kill Warlock for killing my sister, he should be more or less safe.

mechanicalrain

It's completely plot dependent, if it's convenient for the Hedge Wizard to be used to kill off a character, that's what will happen. I mean, I'm hoping the whole bunch of heroes die quickly, as they're a rather unlikable bunch (at least IMO), but I'm expecting them to kill a couple of the Calamities.

---

Hanno now leads what's pretty much three comic reliefs against an enemy that doesn't dick around as much as the Tyrant did. Either they automatically adapt, upgrading the Champion to a monster hunter and the Hedge Wizard to a revenging archmage, or Kairos turns the entire setup on its head in some unexpected way.

---

The urge is stronger when we see the Keeper of Stories on screen herself, but I still wish for Catherine to Take whatever Aspect allows her to transfer her consciousness, and then force her to Wander into nothingness.

haihappen

More likely Catherine would Take her knowledge, and her head would explode. If not, she would die not much later of alcohol poisoning.

Rnt169

I love the fact that the conversations are done in a very convincing manner, i.e. with very little explanations in them (since they know each other well, realistically very little needs to be said explicitly), with just enough hints for us to understand the plot, rather than conversations being the tool to explain the story.

vietnamabc

OTOH, 3 books and only now we know the name of Scribe. The lack of details is really maddening, Amadeus just casually dropped in major details and we won't see its effects until much later.

haihappen

Scribes name being Eudokia was known much earlier...

sheer_falacy

"He rules Helike," the Black Knight said. "Occupies Atalante. Has a representative from Bellerophon, struck a pact with Stygia and prepares to siege Nicae."

Eudokie nodded without a word. She'd understood the order perfectly.

She may understand the order perfectly, but I don't. What does it mean?

(Also, incidentally, there's a typo in her name there)

He takes after Theodosius the Unconquered and wants to lead the Free Cities.

taborask

I'm really confused at how they figured out that the Wandering Bard is behind all this, and that her Name allows consciousness to carry over. Is she supposed to actually be ALL bardic names? Also, when he says that he's dying why would she jump to the assumption that Catherine would be coming for him? Or that he'd just let Cat die?

I get that Black and Scribe have a whole "we've been at this for decades so most things don't have to be said explicitly" But it feels like they're jumping to impossible conclusions

haihappen

Black told Cat as much that many of his predecessors were killed by their Squires...

TideofKhatanga

The Calamities spent a lot of time studying Almorava of Smyrna and did it again with Aoede of Nicae. That they went for her first when they attacked the heroes in "Appellant" is telling. They can't have missed the very strong connection between her and Aoede of Nicae, both Wandering Bards have the same personality, quirks and methods. Considering that they knew a lot about how Almorava's Name shaped her life, it's only a matter of time before they guess that Aoede is effectively the same person in a different body.

From that point onward, wondering just how many lives the Wandering Bard has lived is the next logical step. Black considers her the most dangerous hero he's facing, and I'm surprised that they haven't yet developed a rivalry of sort.

As for Catherine killing Black, it's also logical. There's only one true way for the Squire to become the Black Knight. If the Black Knight has to die while his Squire is alive, then she must be the one doing the killing, else the story is improperly told and we can't have that. So, when Amadeus says he's about to die, it's normal for Eudokia to immediately think that Catherine will be wielding the knife.

Matthew

There's nothing that says the Squire has to be the one killing the Black Knight.

The wise old mentor dying by an enemy's hand while his squire is not quite ready is... very cliché.

<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/MentorOccupationalHazard>

Seriously, all that has to happen for Cat to get the title is for Black to die while she lives.

Shequi

>>> Black considers her the most dangerous hero he's facing, and I'm surprised that they haven't yet developed a rivalry of sort.

Good point. They are both the "Mastermind" Role/Archetype of their respective side.

TideofKhatanga

Reply to Matthew: the wise old mentor dying by an enemy's hand is a Heroic cliché. The last time Cat exploited a heroic storyline (finding a sword in a stone), the world tried to rewrite her as an heroine. And Amadeus mimicking Good methods to achieve his goals is the reason he's so much physically weaker than any previous Black Knight.

Catherine can become the Black Knight without killing Amadeus herself, but she'd have to actively avoid that storyline and she'll be much weaker for it. Partly because she's a Villain. Partly because Black Knight is a Praesi name and the proper way to earn those is the Sith way. They both know it. Considering that Cat has often thought about how she's going to kill Black and his most loyal friends, and that Black himself is now planning to murder his entourage so Cat can survive killing him, they both seem to want it to end this way.

Initially, I thought that the Guide would sidestep that issue by having Cat transition into something else (like a human version of Warlord), but after all the heavy foreshadowing we had, I'll be quite surprised if the current Black Knight survives this book.

Matthew

In Reply to Khatanga

The question is can Black subvert "the story?" The whole goal for Black and the empress has been to make Praes no longer a name based empire but an institutional one. We already have an example of that in Procer which is nominally good, but names are just the cherries on top rather than being crucial to its governing structure.

As such, both Black and the empress have to know that retiring the Calamities eventually was always part of the plan.

The "story" sets up the villainous names in such a way that even the most successful villains will be killed by their own side eventually. That is if Good fails to win directly.

There is no way that Black and the Calamities haven't discussed this and have not figured out a way to say "Screw that!"

Having the Woes fight the Calamities is a victory for "the Story." Having Black kill the Calamities preemptively to save the Woes is still a victory for "the Story."

Black is not going to let "the Story" win. I am also reasonably sure that the Empress and Warlock are on the same page about not letting "the Story" win. Scribe should be on the same page as well. They all know that they are fighting "the Story." Cat killing Black would represent a tactical setback for our forces of free will and institutionalism. There is no way that Wekesa and Malicia would let it become a strategic defeat for their entire side retaliating against the Woes.

Hell, that would be a great reveal.

Bard's plan is to sew dissension in the ranks by forcing Cat to kill Black through some circumstance, setting up the Calamity vs. Woe showdown which would doom the new Praes... Only to find out that Malicia, Wekesa, Sabah, and Hye are all pre committed to not retaliating over this because their whole bit is using rationality... (though never those words) to subvert and defeat "The Story."

Sean

@Matthew

Subverting the story seems to be Black's, and to a somewhat lesser degree, Malicia's primary motivation. However it seems like the rest of the calamities are more motivated by personal loyalty than mission.

Akim

In reply to the question why there is no rivalry between Bard and Black :

The wandering Bard sees the Dread Empress as her rival. Not her Minions. Black is but a very important Piece to her, but not the Player.

Mental Mouse

More fool her....

taborask

You'd think Eudokia would have been prepared for it then, since she must have known that was a very likely scenario (and more importantly, that Black probably expected it to happen)

TheCount

1st: thank you for the chapter erratic!

2:

Cat's plans to make a "peaceful" Calowan and Prasei relationship... but its also stated (in book 1 at that) that black and the calamities dont have a place in that plan. Black also tells Cat about his "master", the previous black knight who died in a battlefield, surrounded by the enemy, because of his own overconfidence, despite/because his powers to topple tower(s) with one swing. Black also had a talk about this very topic with catherin somewhere...the same chapter he is talking about his "master" iirc.

3:

Warlock made it quite clear Cat's soul would suffer for a looong time if she killed Black and she also figured that scribe would want to kill her if she killed Black.

4:

i think bBack will kill his friends, because they would hunt Cat even if he explained everything to them, even his acceptance, if not desire for it to happen so.

Cyrinx

Am I the only one that thinks that Ranger is the counterpart/foil for the Bard? One is the elusive prey, never being able to be truly killed while the other is the relentless, unbeatable hunter?

Makes a lot of sense to me.

And Black commenting on how many loved ones he has to kill could hint at that he plans to kill Ranger, in an effort to even the scales between Good and Evil – to have a weight/right to be able to kill off the bard for good? That taking on Ranger doesn't go without sacrifice is made clear by now too...

Pentrose Son of John

No, I had the exact same thought.

Both have been around for we don't know how long, and seem undefeatable in rather different ways.

Wandering Bard may be taken down, but she always comes back. Her powers are subtle and best wielded behind the scenes. Ranger is, in many ways the exact opposite.

It's Interesting to note what do different people know about the Wandering Bard. William considered her pretty much an average heroine, albeit a bit meta. Akua noted that the entire bardic Name family had more insight in the workings of Fate than the average archmage, so she probably does too. The Empress mentioned to Cat that Bard can change faces, and given that Scribe tells Black the same, we can assume that the Dark Council in general thinks they are dealing with a Named with a disguise/redesign Aspect. The Bard herself casually dropped in the conversation with Kairos that she was around to see Treacerous, and elves regard her as an older entity.

Also, Bard being the counterpart to the Dead King confirmed? He too is immortal and can change faces, according to Ranger's Interlude. That would also explain the same personality persisting through all iterations of the Name, instead of a few more epoch-appropriate versions with ever-expanding lore library. Rebirth as opposed to avoiding death and all that.

Oshi

You're assuming the Dead King is aligned with the Gods Below. All signs point to it being more of a he's to fucking scary for anyone to keep.

The whole undeath/diabolism deal he has doesn't scream 'neutral' to me. Given how at least on Calernia those are attributes of a villain, he must have started off as one. Tower still keeps contact with him, he openly admires Triumphant and heroes wage crusades against him. All that points to him being a villain successful enough that Gods Below don't see the need to evict him. After all, we haven't seen any direct action from either Gods so far, since the whole Fate gamble only allows them to bestow power on lesser agents (angels, demons, devils, Named, good/evil races). They may think that letting one of their own to run a lesser Hell instead of its native devils is an acceptable deal.

Also, another possible parallel is that Willian states that all four crusades against the Kingdom of the Dead were led by heroes sworn to Contrition. Bard muses when going to meet the White Knight: "Contrition, in the end, had not done the trick. Maybe Judgement would." It's possible that in counterweight to Trismegistus conquering a lesser Hell, She of a Thousand Faces got to strike the deal with Hasmallim (at least until Catherine got them whipped). I mean, it's not like dealing with Choirs is that common: the Good counterpart to diabolists are priests, who channel the powers of Gods Above, not summon angels themselves. Also, don't forget that Eleanor Fairfax was sworn to Contrition. That might have been Bard's doing too.

Naeddyr

I'll just interject here a thing:

I have the impression that being Evil is not necessarily the same as being aligned with the Gods Below. We know that the Gods Above are the control freaks who want to nurture humanity by controlling them, and that the Gods Below want humanity to find its own way. Evil with a capital is not evil because the GB want them to be assholes who go around murdering orphans for the fun of it, Evil with a capital is evil because it has become the side of the Dichotomy that is allowed to express that side of humanity. Small-evil is a hurdle for humanity to ascend, not the goal. The goal, I think, is a humanity that is not beholden or needing of gods.

The end result would be a humanity that is moral and good by its own volition and its own strength. Cat, who has absorbed that and is, relatively speaking, a good person, while still working and siding with Evil against the GA, qualifies perfectly well for Evil as long as she follows her own path and follows her own selfishness.

Similarly, a Dead King who gives the middle finger to the GB is also an epitome of Evil, just a much more evil one considering the whole genocidal madman thing.

Just focusing on "Cat is a relatively good person" bit:

The Guide has been pretty upfront about Team Calamity being both Evil and evil, and Team Woe isn't much better. I mean, Catherine is vicious, spiteful, cold, tyrannical, manipulative, and murderous. *She is not a good person.*

Of course she's also an absolute delight and I want her to keep doing her thing, but that's because this is a wonderfully clever story, not because I want people like Cat to succeed in general.

To Naeddyr:

> We know that the Gods Above are the control freaks who want to nurture humanity by controlling them, and that the Gods Below want humanity to find its own way.

What? I thought that this whole 'Fate' thing was about Gods solving their gamble by means of mortal champions with limited resources. After all, all the guidelines the GA gave people (with churches, sermons and all that) are community centered, not some direct orders.

Closest things the heroes have to superiors are angels, and we've only seen one Choir, Contrition, whose entire thing is to recruit people who want to amend the wrongs they condoned. While they are essentially robbing people of their free will by showing them the world as they see it, Masego specifically mentioned that both angels and Demons are driven by absolutes and thus harmful to people, not because they explicitly want to rule them.

In contrast, the Gods Below have no organized religion and don't grant prayers for free, all the while bestowing their blessings on people who bend others to their will. The whole "turn an entire kingdom into undead puppets" thing doesn't scream 'find your own way' to me.

Did EE ever confirm that interpretation or are you making stuff up to make the protagonist's side look better to the modern reader?

Komploding

I understood the Dead King to be the same person since the beginning seeing as how he transformed himself, his kingdom and those within it into the undead, I find it likely that Cat is the counterpoint to the Wandering Bard, as she was originally supposed to lead the lone swordsman's band of heroes but instead is a villain and has the power to (according to Queen of Summer) change the narrative like the Wandering Bard, except Cat does it in a much more direct sense. Maybe the Gods below needed to wait this long to oppose the Wandering Bard was so that it was possible to affect the story in a direct manner?

---

Just above every visionary Named thinks they have a means to tug the plot their way. Cat crossed paths with the Bard three-ish times, is simply too young to be the sole counterpart the millennia-old heroine, and we don't know to what extent she can warp stories she has no Role in. I know that "but it would be so coooool" is a legit reason for things to happen in the Guideverse, but the entire world shouldn't necessarily turn around our story's protagonist. A sense of bigger things happening outside of the frame is a big part of this story's appeal too.

James, Mostly Harmless

Bard is a lot scarier than she appears, especially if she has been working for the Gods Above for as long as Black thinks. However, I have a sneaky feeling that when Bard finally comes into direct conflict with Cat, that Cat will subvert Bard's story to her own ends!

Euodiachloris

Black is already quite happily throwing indirect spanners Wandering's way to warp her plots. Or, something like spanner-spewing landmines, at least. 😊

And, if he wants to be killed by somebody other than Cat, there's a certain Bard connected to a White Knight he can think circles around... White Knights also traditionally go after Black ones and either kill them or get killed by them, and visa versa. Why not use it to shield Squire?

Kidnapping part of Wandering's plot and using it for his own gain might be juggling matches in a fireworks factory, but if he can balance the cost-benefit to both sides to create a one-one draw that amounts to a nul, it could be worth it. *shrugs*

Mike E.

Do we know Black's aspects? Is his eidetic/photographic memory and ability to analyze data just him, or what he got when he became the Black Knight?

Also loved the whole analysis and subverting of the ritual. I believe EE has stated that Assassin has been on screen, we just didn't know it was him/her. I am so curious as to who it actually is...part of me is wondering if it is actually Scribe.

ficial

I wonder if Assassin has some kind of Fight-Club-ish split personality, where the person who is Assassin doesn't even know it, and Assassin per se just takes over for a bit when there's work to be done.

KageLupus

When Cat first meets meets the Empress, there is a line about how Cat has already met Assassin. They specifically use a masculine pronoun, saying that she has already met "him". Thief also refers to Assassin in the masculine when she says that she met him. That isn't to say that Eudokia isn't some kind of front, or that Assassin being a man isn't misdirection, but I don't think it is super likely.

Idan Dor

Black's aspects are, as stated in the Epilogue of book 1:

The moment his agents had gotten him the news he'd felt his Name react. Lead. Conquer. Destroy. All three of his aspects were awake. He hadn't felt this alive in decades, and even as the south of the kingdom he's conquered resumed the war he'd won he felt a strange joy welling up inside of him. Interesting years were ahead. And this once, just this once, he was willing to break a rule of his. Baring his teeth at the Heavens, Black dared them to deny him.

"Just as planned," he said.

Lead, Conquer and Destroy. The memory thing is probably more of a thing he gotten from his time as a Squire with the whole standard Learn schtick.

As for the assassin, I'm assuming it's the blackguard lieutenant as his name was mentioned but then he never really did anything. But him being Scribe is still possible.

Shequi

Lieutenant Abase, was I think the name of the only Blackguard Member we've actually "met" on screen.

IncognitoMe

My theory for Assassin is that we've seen him as one of the people surrounding Cat when she was a brawler in the pit and not yet apprenticed to Black. Point in favor of this are the files on Cat and Black's mentioning of a preemptive strike to take her out to prevent her rise as a hero. Yes, the files we're probably made by Scribe but Assassin might have done some scouting.

Also, it might be that we have only seen Assassin in disguise as the nature of his job demands him to be secretive.

Going with Assassin's humour I'd like to imagine him as Zacharis, the drunk healer from the pits, having PTSD from his time training assassination from childhood and subverting this trope of being this mysterious inescapable entity that kills everything in his way as a ruthless and cold contract killer. Alcoholism might be his Name-strengthened quirk, like Cat's mouthing off and hand clenching.

I mean, having the most competent killer pose as some incompetent healer would embrace the irony that he's always showing in his kills.

I do see the points to Scribe having Assassin as a second persona, but there are too many points against it:

1. Scribe mentioned she joined the Calamities years after they toppled the Empire from Nefarious and the five Calamities got their Name from the Chancellor, so Assassin must have been around earlier.
2. It's been mentioned that no one can hold two names at the same time (though multiple personalities might subvert this, but come on, that'd be a cheap cliché twist).
3. I have some more points but it would just be such an obvious and easy conclusion to the whole thing if Scribe was Assassin and I want to be intrigued.

One of the main points of Scribe being Assassin though is a quote taken from the prologue of book one:

"Warlock cast a look around, looking for the fifth member of their little band and coming up empty."

They specifically mention Scribe, Warlock, Black and Captain and it would just fit coining the five Calamities before introducing the concept of their merry band to us. What do you guys say?

Soronel Haetir

I suspect Assassin is the Blackguard officer we've seen a couple times. Low enough in the ranks to go unnoticed around Black but an officer so not likely to be questioned if he says "Lord Black told me to go take care of ..."

Snoogle

Black's aspects get named in a chapter I've forgotten the name of but I believe it was somewhere in the Callow Civil War, they are Lead, Conquer, Destroy.

If you want to see Assassin on screen, my best guess is to go back to chapter 1 when a "silent silhouette in a dark cloak" helps up the would-be rape victim. I mean, Black said that one of the men should take her home, but there weren't any other blackguards around during the incident if I remember correctly... So that would be my personal best guess.

If anyone has a better idea, shoot.

Snoogle

I just noticed my answer is nearly identical to the one written by Idan Dor. How do you delete stuff here?

Darkening

Lead. Conquer. Destroy. Destroy's probably a lot like Cat's break, lead and conquer are a bit more up in the air. Maybe Lead helps him with planning when he's Leading a group or an army? Conquer is probably a combat boost of some sort.

Nairne

Now that I think about it, it would be pretty scary if Ashen Priestess died so Hierophant can't take her miracles for himself, effectively weakening him in the long run and possibly denying The Woes any resurrection miracles.

I agree, that it would be interesting to see a heroic interlude sometime soon to get a feel of the heroes reaction to the Ashen Priestess dying. I'm also curious who they will blame, would make me smile if they cast blame not only on the Tyrant and Calamities but also on the Bard. That would make it easier for her to manipulate them (to a certain extent though).

Aw damn... now I want another chapter to read...or more like a whole another book to read... ://

Soronel Haetir

Didn't Warlock do something similar? Or did he only do that for his son?

Wekesa 's threat regarding Amadeus was far more explicit than for Masego.

Blinks

Ah, i think Black just noticed the problem with regards to his friends and his successor.

As to Catherine killing Black while it is fairly in theme for the Squire and the Black Knight neither of the two holders of those particular Names are ones to follow stories unless on their own terms and Cat doesn't actually want to kill him. It's hardly as if she longs for the power he holds.

nobodi12

What about Robber being the Assassin. Since no one has seen him he could have been a Goblin or an Orc. And and Robber is one of the few goblins we haven't heard aging.

esryok

Robber thinks privately to himself about his age (way younger than Assassin) and childhood, not to mention he's performing shenanigans in Callow + Arcadia while Assassin is doing his thing in the Free Cities.

*Maybe* Assassin has Bard-level teleportation and shapechanging powers, but more likely they are two separate people.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

shana

Using the Rule of Three and the stories put out so far, I'm starting to think that we might get a bait and switch of sorts. Heiress moved up, Masego moved up, and I think before the end of the current conflict Cat will too—but a Squire currently has two particular options: Black Knight, as she's been groomed, and "White" Knight. Given her current alignment, "White" won't necessarily make her a Hero if she transitions that way.

I have to wonder if we won't be seeing a new Name: Winter Knight. Adjutant has already demonstrated that there's a new tide of roles coming, and I'm optimistic that this book will have some fascinating twist.

Big Brother

Squires also served under Kings and the occasional warrior Queen. There's probably precedent somewhere for a Squire to be named as the legitimate heir to a King or Queen, and thus transitioning into that Name. The Heavens already tried to offer Cat the name of Queen, maybe she'll Take it this time, serve as Malicia's Callowan counterpart, and act as the link between Praes and the "Good" nations.

Bookworm

I have read most of the comments and doubt many will get to this one. Just a two observations. The line that strikes me most out of this interlude is the following:

"The word for 'bard' we use comes from Old Miezana," he said.
"Language has evolved, even in our lifetime."

Isn't the real question the etymological origin of "bard", as all Names are archetypical descriptions, in a way. It's all about association. What was "bard" associated with when it became a Name?

In our world, the word's origin revolves around concepts of "praise". There is a Slavic outlier indicating "sacrifice" also. This indicates one possible direction toward which the Name is moving.

The second observation is the title of "cadenza" which is an ornamental, sometimes improvised, piece in music that does not affect the underlying structure of a song. In other words, this chapter is pretty and very enjoyable, but of little substance in terms of the Story/Plot.

esryok

I think "Cadenza" is in reference to how the Calamities managed to kill the Ashen Priestess without the Bard stepping in. The efforts to orchestrate and subvert the murder-ritual were a story about conflict between the Tyrant and the Calamities, apparently distinct from the story about the Free Cities civil war.

That the ritual was turned to target the Ashen Priestess *was* an ornamental, possibly improvised detail that didn't affect the underlying structure of "Calamities beat the Tyrant."

I wonder if she was unable to perceive the villain vs villain narrative, or if it was just the "cadenza" she was blind to?

Rnt169

definition: a virtuoso solo passage inserted into a movement in a concerto or other musical work, *typically near the end*.

Rnt169

So maybe this chapter indicates that Black Knight's career is coming to an end and maybe is a tribute to his career: i.e. his swansong

TheTime

Here is a theory – there is no Providence. It's just the Bard, always was the Bard, arranging for lucky "coincidences" for their dear heros. Maybe it's one of their aspects.

Soronel Haetir

Sorry, not buying. It's been described how a hero can learn overnight how to use a power that would take a villain a decade to master among plenty of other interventions by the gods above.

stevenneiman

The Bard is one of the most effective agents of the Gods Above, but she (or possibly it, I don't know if we've confirmed that it's always female) is far from their only agent.

Евгений Пермяков

Went through comments and ...

Amadeus do have my sympathy, but there are other reasons to make it unlikely for him to be killed by Cat, at least at the moment. Their stories are, at the moment, rather unrelated. Current Cat's narrative is about her war with Arcadia residents and, to some extent, Diabolist. If she grows within current narrative, her name should be related to said narrative and not Black's succession.

Furthermore, if we look at her Name aspects and that of Black, Black is clearly tied to military and more specifically, to army, while Cat is not. Theoretically speaking, I could imagine her coming into name of the Ranger, as Cat's aspects fit.

I can see two prominent theme's in Cat's current narrative: war with magical denizens and protection of her property. The first could result in Names of Paladin (and it would be hilarious), Exorcist, or other variation of a Purifier. The second narrative is a common trope for heroes and various ruler names, so Queen is not off the table. interestingly, it could be acceptable for Malicia as Empress is still above a Queen. Finally, Cat is caught up in fae business, In particular, Cat 'always had a ring of a heir of a fae', so if this sticks, she will be tied into Fae.

Darkening

Evil gods need paladins too.

stevenneiman

I would strongly suspect that her Name will be something new, or at least something revived. Not sure about the name itself, but I agree that it is probably related to defending her people. It might also be an old Callowan Name traditionally but not explicitly tied to Good.

Juniper

One thing no one has speculated on that I've read.... Is who is the counterpart to Malicia for Cat? Or perhaps she is simply part of the next set to serve her?

Blinks

Cat is her own Malicia.

nipi

Black cant loose. Hes got perspectives:

Question

Searched but could not find it, does anyone remember which chapter was it in that Black's "Lead" aspect was revealed?

---

So far we've only seen him use Destroy, which works similarly to Break and can disperse other Named's Aspects. I wonder if Conquer holds some stolen power in it...

esryok

At the end of Book I's epilogue:

The moment his agents had gotten him the news he'd felt his Name react. Lead. Conquer. Destroy. All three of his aspects were awake. He hadn't felt this alive in decades, and even as the south of the kingdom he's conquered resumed the war he'd won he felt a strange joy welling up inside of him. Interesting years were ahead. And this once, just this once, he was willing to break a rule of his. Baring his teeth at the Heavens, Black dared them to deny him.

"Just as planned," he said.

stevenneiman

I don't remember the chapter name, but I remember that it mentioned all three of his Aspects together. You could do a google site search for "lead conquer destroy" and it would probably come up.

shankarsivarajan

" 'Kingdom Below?' Scribe said."

Is this the "Kingdom Under" of the dwarves?

stevenneiman

Depending on how the Fae work, there's some chance that Kairos and Amadeus are at some point in the process going to be going "WTF where did the sun go" and assuming it's sorcery performed by the other side.

Or maybe Black will have seen that coming too.

Not\_a\_robot

So I'll be completely honest here and say that the Ashen Priestess was by far my favourite of the heroes' party and I'm sad and completely bummed out that she's dead now. Bleh. *blows raspberry*

Seriously though, amazing chapter EE. Thanks as always.

frolamiz

Thanks for the chapter!

Given how ash is often associated with resurrection, I think it is possible for the ashen priestess to come back at the worst possible timing. Resurrection may even be one of her aspects.

Dan L

So... Black's looking for a force on the side of Evil to counterbalance the Wandering Bard. One that masquerades as a Named and joins existing groups, but isn't really part of the core dynamic. One that appears precisely where she is needed as if by great magic, and never intervenes physically. One that operates in the background arranging pieces on the board, and claims a Name that heavily involves manipulation of narrative.

And he is having this conversation with

SCRIBE.

ArkCthuul

Exactly my train of thought. 🤔

So much potential for double crossing, I shudder merely thinking about it.

Also this chapter was wonderful again :8

Warren Peace

"I am dying, I think," is a rare line where it's actually appropriate for a character to murmur. Otherwise, I don't think that word means what you think it means.

Murmur, (n): a soft, indistinct sound made by a person or group of people speaking quietly or at a distance.

The key here is soft and INDISTINCT

Warren Peace

I found this chapter rather hard to follow. All the different place names run together, like the 5 the Tyrant is associated with. I know they're all supposed to be distinct, but does that actually matter?

Then this chapter seems to INTRODUCE TWO WHOLE NEW RACES, via offhand remarks that lack the context to make sense of them. So the Kingdom Under is distinct from the Dead King's kingdom? Black's comments seem to imply the K.O. is dwarves, at least in a generic sense, but nothing along those lines has been mentioned before, so it's confusing. And now Drow are a race in this world also? This was a very poor way to introduce these brand new ideas

The drow have been brought up a couple of times, most notably when Diabolist hired a band of drow mercenaries as part of her army defending Liesse.

Dwarves were first referenced in Book I, when Black was explaining that Praes is a backwater kingdom that stands no chance against either the Kingdom Under or the civilization of the gnomes.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

That's good to know, for sure, but I don't think it detracts from my point any.

Raved Thrad

Damn. I actually feel bad (well, a little bit) about the Ashen Priestess dying, if only because she seemed the most competent of Hanno's band. Still, killing the healer first IS always good, sound tactical doctrine.

vuthuha912

I know that the Tyrant is good but him making a play to get a Hierarch despite all the disadvantages that he is facing as a Villain is quite cool. However, I still think that Black needs to be careful since a guy that can plan that far ahead can't be just a normal Stupid Evil Villain.

I don't really know how to proceed currently. On one hand, aiding the Tyrant so that the Evil side in the League can stand against the Good and stop the entire region from joining in the Crusade is logical.

Yet, aiding the Tyrant too much and letting him dominate the League is not a great long-term move as the Tyrant is a Chronic Backstabber. He will betray his "allies" when it is the most inconvenient for them. Still, if he left the situation to play out on its own, he runs the risk of the Tyrant dying and leaving the entire region falls into the hand of Good.

Villainous Interlude: Thunder

"We have grown to mock Tyrants for they are mad but that is a very dangerous thing. A madman thinks the world other than what it is, and in a mortal that is a harmless thing. Not so in one who moulds Creation to their will, as all Named do."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

Anaxares had been named a general, at the Tyrant's orders. Sixty-seven, the diplomat mused. He was now technically committing treason under sixty-seven different articles of Bellerophan law, and starting to wonder if he would reach a hundred before he died. His remains would be on trial for at least a decade, and he did not envy the Defender Against The People who drew the wrong lot and was made to defend his rotting corpse. It seemed to few, to have grown from middling fifty counts of treason to over sixty when made to serve in a foreign army. The law codes were in need of revising. It should have landed him roughly in the eighties. The mere fact that no difference was made between officer grades was a glaring oversight, and if allowed a few moments to make a statement before the kanenas summarily executed him he would jot down a few notes on the matter.

"Pay attention, Bellerophan," General Basilia barked. "This is important."

Kairos' foremost commander was currently attempting to teach him the basics of war, as he would apparently be given command of five thousand men during the assault on the walls of Nicae. When Anaxares had asked the boy why, morbidly curious, he'd been answered only by off-putting giggles. Troubling.

"I will not. I am a diplomat in the service of the Republic," he said. "Anyone but the officers drawn by lot learning military tactics is illegal."

The woman glared at him, sceptical.

"Are you telling me your shithole of a city doesn't have career officers?" she asked.

War Is Of The People, Served By The People And Ordered Only By The People.

"That would be setting apart individuals from the rest," he said, somewhat offended on behalf of Bellerophon. "This learning can and should only be temporary, removed after it had seen lawful use."

"Gods, no wonder you fucks have never won a war," the general said, aghast.

Anaxares narrowed his eyes at the wicked foreign oligarch. It had been determined by the Will Of The People that enough draws counted as a victory, and therefore proof of the superiority of the Republic in all things. That this was factually incorrect by the standards of wider Calernia was irrelevant to the purposes of this conversation.

"Who do you even learn from?" Basilia asked.

"Bellerophon has secured the finest military manual in existence to train its officers," he replied.

"Manners of War by Tyrant Theodosius?" the general asked. "I suppose the Ars Tactica by the first Terribilis would be close enough."

"A Hundred Victorious Strategies," Anaxares said.

Ah, that made sixty-eight. Leaking of military information to The Deceived Servant Of A Grasping Despot. General Basilia's lips twitched as if she was trying very hard not to weep or laugh.

"Isabella the Mad's book?" she asked, voice rough.

"She was the only one to ever defeat Theodosius on the field," the diplomat said.

"That's, uh, a very generous assessment of the Maddened Fields," General Basilia said, and tried to pass her convulsive laughter for a cough.

He sighed. Mockery, he thought, was the last refuge of those afraid of the First And Mightiest Of The Free Cities, May She Reign Forever.

"Well, at least you haven't learned any bad habits," she said. "You won't be on the first wave over the walls, anyway, if you listen to your commanders you should be fine."

"I will not," Anaxares said.

The woman frowned.

"I will actively attempt to hinder your victory, should I remain in a position of authority," he informed her serenely.

"I'll remove you from command," she threatened.

"Do so," he said. "Please."

Was there a lawful difference between having temporarily served in a foreign army and remaining in service? Ah, yes, the third amendment. Unfortunately it only applied after death, with the assumption being that any Bellerophan committing such treason would immediately be killed before trial could take place. Another area in need of clarification to be pointed out to the Republic.

"The Tyrant has his reasons," Basilia finally said. "He sees further than anyone else."

"He is drunk with power," Anaxares told her gently. "And quite possibly mad."

"They're all mad, diplomat," the woman said, smiling. "That's why they win. Theodosius took on the entire Principate at its peak and walked away the winner. That takes something stranger than courage. Oh, we have the finest army on Calernia don't get me wrong. We can handle thrice our number in what everyone else has to field. But it's with a Tyrant on the throne that we shine, and it was the fortune of my life to be born under one."

Anaxares was not unaware of the blinders the Republic had set around his eyes, though he'd never seen the need to attempt to take them off. It was his first time, however, seeing the same thing on the face of someone not from Bellerophon. How strange, that they too could have faith in something greater. It took the diplomat tipping over a carafe of wine over three maps and wilfully misremembering the names of his commanders before the Helikean gave up in schooling him. Kairos sent for him, but when he entered the tent there was no sign of the Tyrant. Seven people stood stiffly under the silk panes, eyeing the embroidery with cold mistrust. And good reason. It was gold thread, a blatant misuse of wealth that should be in the hands of the people.

"Diplomat Anaxares," a woman said, tonelessly.

Kanenas. She was not even trying to hide it. The others all had that muted look on their faces that would have betrayed their function as well, had the Bellerophan been traitorous enough to attempt to find such a thing out. Anaxares did not bow, for that was a foreign flourish judiciously disposed of by the Republic. All men were equal, even with those who could kill him with a thought.

"I have committed treason on sixty-eight counts," he said, and calmly listed them.

The longer he spoke, the more the tension left his shoulders. It was not that Anaxares had ever expected to live through any of this, or even dedicated a great deal of thought to the matter. It was, after all, out of his hands. But it was a relief, that this strange affair finally be closed. That his fate had been left dangling had been a burr in his boots, an irritant. His existence and the contradiction it represented to the truth of Bellerophon should not have been left so long unanswered.

"If the Republic is willing to provide ink and parchment, I have comments to submit to the eyes of the people for after my execution," he said.

He'd never considered using Helikean tools. No proper Bellerophan would have read anything written with them. The seven kanenas studied him.

"Your pending execution has been suspended by vote," a man said. "Your services to the people have made you a Person of Value."

The diplomat watched the seven other people in the tent. They stared back, unblinking. Something rose inside of him as the silence continued, something he had not felt in a very long time. He'd thought the years had scoured it out of him, but perhaps that had been vanity. It was not hope, of course. He had no use for that. It was anger. Harsh, unforgiving fury. How dare they? How dare they turn on what they should be, on everything they should stand for?

"No," he hissed. "This is unacceptable."

"This committee has been empowered to record and respond to your words," the woman who'd spoken earlier replied flatly.

"There is no such thing as Person of Value," Anaxares snarled. "If the people have decreed this, the people are wrong and in need of purging. We are a Republic of laws. I have broken these laws. I must be executed according to them."

"To go against the Will of the People is treason," another woman said.

"Then execute me, by all the Gods," he shouted. "The people have committed treason against the Republic through this vote. This is how he wins, you fools. By bending what we are. It only needs to happen once and everything we've built is stained."

Eyes hard, he stared them down.

"We are the Republic of Bellerophon," he said through gritted teeth. "We do not compromise. We do not make exceptions. I will slit my own throat before allowing this."

"Correct," the man said.

"Correct," another man said, and a woman with him.

"Treason," the woman from earlier replied.

The air in the tent grew thick with sorcery as all seven kanenas went still. Something broke with a sickening crunch behind the face of the three who'd agreed with him. Anaxares did not look as the bodies dropped. Citizens did not get involved in the debates of the kanenas, or the grisly ends they inevitably came to.

"You are forbidden to commit suicide by law," the woman said. "And to wilfully take actions that will result in your death as well."

"You can't do this," Anaxares said.

He was genuinely afraid for the first time since boyhood. This... Gods, what was this? It was wrong, all wrong, something had broken and he needed to Mend it.

"We do nothing, diplomat," a man said. "The People Have Spoken."

They left him there, shivering in his own sweat. His hands shook and he had to sit for his legs would not longer bear the weight of him. Nightfall was coming, and with it the assault on Nicaw. The armies were gathered, but he cared nothing for it. Yet he would have to lead the soldiers, for if he did not the Tyrant might decide to kill him and he was forbidden by law to chance this. The boy. The boy was behind this, one way or another. Kairos was waiting for him on a throne that overlooked the walls, all grey stone with a dozen gargoyles fanning him and feeding him grapes. He had a cup in hand, though not of wine. Juice of some sort.

"What did you do," Anaxares demanded. "What did you do?"

The Tyrant of Helike laughed, laughed with his red eye shining and his weak arm clutching at his robes like claws.

"Oh yes," Kairos Theodosian murmured. "You'll do nicely."

"You've tainted us," the diplomat said.

"I gave them what they wanted most, deep down," the Tyrant said. "Under all the laws and the lies."

A gargoyle waddled up to him, stone wings folded over its back, and offered a wineskin. The Bellerophan saw it too well. His eyesight should not be this good, all these minute fractures in the bespelled rock should never have been noticeable. That realization brought exhaustion with it that had him half-toppling on the platform the throne was set on. He took the skin and drank deep, drowning and drowned.

"Would you like to hear a story, Anaxares?" the Tyrant asked. "It's a thing of beauty, this one."

"This must be unmade," the diplomat begged.

"Oh, it's too late for that," Kairos smiled. "Much, much too late. This story, my dearest friend, is about three people."

Anaxares' hands were no longer shaking, his body numb at the horror of what was happening.

"The first is a monster," Kairos said. "She's not like the others monsters, though. She has no face and as many lives as there are stars, and behind those veils only one single burning desire. It's a thing I can see, you know. What people Wish. And when I look at her, what I see is glorious."

"The Wandering Bard," Anaxares croaked.

"Now, this monster she has plans and plans and plans," the Tyrant sighed admiringly. "So many irons and so many fires. She doesn't care about any of us, when it comes down to it. All she looks at is the line in the sand that's just a bit above the reach of high tide, and we can't have that now can we? She's not real picky about what she'll use to wipe it away, practical creature that she is."

Kairos leaned closer, grinning widely.

"Let me tell you a secret, my friend," he whispered. "She's already won. The opposition was watching the wrong fire the whole time, and the intricacy of the trap is exquisite. She made the kill without them ever seeing her."

"She's losing," Anaxares said. "The Calamities killed one of her heroes with your own sorcery."

"No no no," the Tyrant said. "You're looking at it all wrong. Even if my pretty little mages had been untroubled, the Beast would have survived. The Healer should have too, life split in half with her sister. A touching story of sisterly love, if you care for that sort of thing. She didn't because she was a sacrifice. Her weight was stolen, because there was another use for it. With nothing you can only trade for nothing."

"Then you are a pawn as well," the diplomat said. "In the Bard's game."

"Funny thing, control," the boy mused. "Everybody thinks they have it. Because they follow Fate or fight it, because they see the lines or make them. No one is in control, Anaxares. Not even the Gods, otherwise what would be the point of Creation? We're not the answer, we're the question. The book even says so."

The cripple hacked out a laugh, patting himself.

"She thinks I made you to kill me," Kairos said. "She's wrong, my dearest bosom companion. I'm not some Praesi of the old breed, oh no. I have more unusual ambitions. But here I am, getting ahead of myself. We have a story, yes? The second person is not a person at all. He is a thing."

The hate and contempt in the boy's voice had an almost physical weight to it.

"He thinks he's a person and that's the most disgusting part," the Tyrant smiled. "Cogs and wheels and he started out thinking it was about being right, about being fair, but it hasn't been like that in a long time. He just wants to win, but it's a kind of victory that means nothing at all. That poor, blind pile of cogs."

Kairos chuckled.

"He thinks what runs him is reason but that is a conceit," the Tyrant said gleefully. "That will sting, when the lie is stripped away. He thinks he's above pride, you see, but that's about all that's left of him because he thinks everyone lives by his rules, Anaxares. Even if the ends aren't the same, he thinks the means are."

The boy's good hand rose, fingers walking the arm of the throne like some small nimble creature. The odd-eyed villain snapped his fist shut instead of walking it off.

"Just like that," he said. "Plot and plan and seize a crown at the end, even if this one isn't really a crown. More like an agreement, and you know I have a weakness for those. The old Emperors, they got it. That the Empire was the tool, not the aim. But in his little head Praes is the centre of the world, and as long as he thinks like that Aoede is going to whip him again and again, if you'll forgive my language."

"She's going to kill him," the diplomat said.

"Of course not, my beauteous blooming flower," the Tyrant tutted. "Nothing so crass. She's going to hurt him. And when the cold thing turns into a wounded animal, well, that's when he starts making mistakes."

"And the third person is you," Anaxares said. "Pulling all the strings."

Kairos turned to him then, and the smile on his face was one of pure and childlike joy. The Bellerophan had never seen anything half so terrifying.

"Gotcha," he said, like a child pulling a prank.

The cripple shivered under the setting sun, his face almost feverish.

"I heard a story about one of the first kings of Helike, once," he said. "His father had gathered a great menagerie of animals, it goes. Peacocks and great lizards, gazelles and aurochs from all over Calernia and beyond. And one lion as well, brought in as a cub. It lived in a cage all its life, fed choice cuts of meat meant behind bars. So the first thing that king did, when he took the throne, was open all the doors."

The Tyrant hummed.

"I heard a lot of reasons why he might have done that," the odd-eyed boy said. "Revenge on a father who cared more for animals than him, getting rid of expensive frivolity and even because he believed caging animals was wrong. I think, though, that I understand him. Just a little."

Kairos leaned forward.

"I think what he wanted was to see if a lion was still a lion, having lived in a cage all its life," he confided. "I think he just... wanted to see what would happen."

"What did?" Anaxares asked, tone rough.

"The lion slaughtered them all," the Tyrant of Helike grinned, and the red in his eye was an endless sea of blood. "Nature tells, my friend. Nature always tells."

The boy's grinned widened, long and sharp and pearly white.

"I wonder what your nature is, Hierarch."

It was a title and a curse, the ruling seat of the League that had only once been filled since the founding.

It was all these things, but most of all it was a Name.

danh3107

Ho boy, this was foreshadowed heavily, but it still took my breath away.

TameCurtsy

I completely missed the foreshadowing. Where was it?

Idan Dor

I know of two:

Most of our resident Bellerophan are Villainous interludes, only his first two appearances are not.

Second, last chapter Black mentioned that he thinks the Tyrant is attempting to become Heirarch of the free cities. After wondering that, he wondered how the Tyrant managed to assert so much control and power over Bellerophan (which hints they might be the usual bottleneck).

Anyone spotted more?

Hakurei06

"This is Anaxares, my most trusted advisor," Kairos grinned. "I abducted him. He's not very happy about it."

The dark-haired woman squinted at him, slurping her cup loudly. For a moment Anaxares could have sworn she was entirely sober and studying him with a piercing gaze, but then she choked on the liquor and the moment was gone. She thumped her own chest until she stopped coughing, spilling biscuit crumbs everywhere.

Warren Peace

How is that big blockquote supposed to apply? It seems completely irrelevant, it has nothing to do with foreshadowing the Hierarch

David

Well, there are ways to see a blossoming Name, and given her nature, it would be reasonable to assume that the Wandering Bard has access to those abilities. Likely, she saw the early seeds of it, and caught on to what everyone's favorite Tyrant was up to.

TeK

It is obvious that Tyrant wanted to become the Hierarch himself, but alas, his most trusted advisor schemed to betray him and take the title for himself. This is an Evil trope, which Tyrant specifically set up to drag Anaxares into a Name. Hence, foreshadowing.

goliath1303

Is honestly impressive how often you talk down to people and belittle/dismiss their ideas and speculation while never managing to actually be in the correct side of the guess. It seems like it's a feedback loop for you or something.

You take a strong and aggressive stance against somebody's idea/s.

You're proven wrong.

Next time you have a different idea than another poster, instead of disagreeing politely and having a discussion where you present the tasks why you believe what you do, you double down on that aggressiveness and attack them.

Rinse, repeat.

Do you do things in this format so that you don't have to actually price and defend your reasoning? It sends like it. It's like you think of you don't ever present your predictions, you can't be wrong and if you attack someone else's and they're correct, oh well. They're not gonna call you or several chairs later and say "See Warren, I was right!". If, however, they're wrong you can say "I told you so!", thereby feeling like you won something. Completely ignoring the fact that you "Told them so.", but were wrong 10x as often.

stevenneiman

@Warren Peace it's exactly the sort of thing that Traitorous would do to set up the person who hated him most of anyone in Calernia to the position of power that everyone thought he was gunning for himself. We'll have to wait and see where in all the hells he's actually going with this, but it is a Traitorous style of scheme.

Darkening

Wow. What *will* he do now that he's been made the head of a nation and violently rejects the very idea of such a thing. Huh. I might have expected him to get a name, but this is a very odd turn of events. I can't wait to see where it goes.

Alex

I like how Person of Value initializes to PoV, which is a pun on Point of View. Anaraxes is our point of view character for things pertaining to the Tyrant.

taborask

I honestly didn't see this coming at all, though it feels kinda obvious in retrospect. The Tyrant might be my new favorite villain

wirelessgrapes

I'm trying to think of what ability the Tyrant has in the story. First off, he's right. This is a story, no matter how different it seems from other stories. The difference in this story is that everyone is still fighting the story, but when everyone is fighting the story, the only thing that changes are the roles. Regardless of how 'ahead' everyone thinks they are, there is still going to be a final hero, there's going to be a final stand.

And that 'final hero' is Cat.

Tyrant, with his WISH aspect, gains Medium Awareness (<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/MediumAwareness>), and so he sees what he shouldn't. He sees little bits and pieces of the story, and he's decided that there's no use in fighting it. He's hoping that, in the end, he's the protagonist. He's running a Deadpool style, in which, if he's funny enough and crazy enough, he can be a protagonist. If not, well, then he's gonna wreck some shit. If Amadeus has accepted his death because of the story he was forced into, Kairos has acknowledged that he must lose because he's the Tyrant. He's Akua with less ego and preternatural foresight.

In the end of this story, with everyone trying to skirt the rules and play their own game, there can only be one person who truly changes the game. Amadeus knows this is Cat. He knew it when he gave her the knife. He knew it when he found her in the alley.

I don't think that he planned to meet Cat. This is a story not unlike any other. When Creation makes a story, they make a story. What I think happened, is that he looked over a scouting sheet on Cat just before he arrived in Laure at the beginning of the story. Whether he wanted to double check the potential heroes in the city, or because his Name forced the story, once he walked past an alley and saw one of the potential Named in an alley, with a knife to her throat, he knew that she could be the protagonist, **his** protagonist, if he just stepped in. He was fully prepared to let her go to War College, because that could be a story in itself, but the opportunity was there, and so he intentionally signed his own death warrant as the Mentor in exchange for immortality in the Practical Guide to Evil.

He's just too arrogant to admit it.

When it comes to the Tyrant, he's the one who is breaking the fourth wall. He's seen what lies outside of Creation, and the existential crises that would arise from it. He's Crazy Sane (<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/CrazySane>), because he knows he's either going to lose or be crazy enough to win.

And so, the Heavens always win. Since this is a story about breaking stories, Masego will probably break the walls of Creation in the final conflict, and allow Cat to truly break the story. But, if this story is about breaking stories, a finale that involves breaking the overarching story **is** the story. No matter what, the forces beyond Creation wins.

If Creation is the process to find whether Good or Evil is better, the answer is that there will always be shades of gray, and only in balance can we find the best way of life.

Or it's 42 if Creation is secretly just a Deep Thought calculation.

*wirelessgrapes*

Another line about Cat that I want to add:

If the story is about breaking stories, then the origin has to break origins. The final hero of a story breaking story has to be a unique origin. They can't be from their own nation. It takes someone who is formed by breaking the trope to break the tropes.

soonnanandnaanssoon

I'm gonna tie Cat's Role and Name progression into this discussion too. Word of God has stated in 'Villainous Interlude: Decorum' that the Name 'Grey Knight' (which a few people has suggested) does not exist due to the lack of cultural drive for the Name. If Cat is to truly break the story, one part she'd break would be the transition from 'Squire' to 'White/Black Knight'. Based on excerpts from the quotes of chapters, could it be that her future Name is indeed, 'Foundling'? The sheer number of people she has influenced in Callow/the Legions/Tribes/Clans, giving her a cultural weight strong enough to turn her name into a Name?

wirelessgrapes

I actually don't think Cat will ever transition. There's power in a transitory name like Squire. She's not restricted in ways that Amadeus is, and there's a story in a young up and comer being the underdog to beat everyone. The moment she "graduates" her name, is the moment that she is part of the game, and not the outside factor that separates her from the rest of the bigger players who manipulate stories already (Amadeus, Bard, Cordelia, Tyrant)

taborask

Damn. Up until now, I had no idea where this story is going but I think you're right. I'll eat my own hat if at some point Kairos doesn't stare down the camera and say something like "This isn't just a story, WE are a story, and the readers of that story are watching us right now"

Jonnnnz

I think that you are giving the Tyrant too much importance. His strategy is a failing one (as has been pointed out already), doubly so since he admitted the Bard's inevitable victory.

But I think that what separates Cat and the Bard is that they haven't set an end goal for themselves but rather think in terms of affecting long term change on people. The Bard, being forced to see things through the perspective of heroes sees the inevitable failing of villains, while Cat sees the inherent impotence of heroes. They may want the same thing, but the gods have had centuries to twist the Bard into an agent of their agenda, just like they have the world to some extent (with the Queen of Summer hinting at that). On the other hand, Cat wants humans to stop depending on stories and gods. This is the big clash at the end of it all.

Yeah, Tyrant knows he lost, but he has to have some kind of hope, or at least he had to when he started. To be Named in general, you have to be willing to take Creation and change it with nothing but your own two hands. He just sees the futility in it. I'm glad we didn't see stuff from his perspective, cause that would've broken a lot of good foreshadowing in terms of the world building.

Cpt. Obvious

I think you are wrong about Named needing to have the will to change creation. Heroes are chosen by their Gods to do the Gods will on creation. And the classical Villain, at least the Praesi kind, "knows" they will never be able to win. It's in all the stories they have ever heard growing up. The Villains scheme until the strongest or smartest of them remain. Then they raise terrible armies of undead, massive flying forts, schools of flying piranhas and whatever else they can dream up. Only to go to war on Good and end up killed by Heroes or backstabbed by their "friends". They all know that's what awaits them, yet they take pride in being the best villain possible with the most ambitious and insane plan. That they fail isn't important as it's a given from the moment they got a name. The important part is that they fail as magnificently as possible.

The pinnacle of the classical Wasteland Villains career is to be able to stand at the top of their tower cackling madly as the last of the heroes finally brings it all crumbling down. It's how Villains end. The only difference they make is in the history books. The story stays the same.

Heroes are empowered by their Gods and are not supposed to rebel against the order of things.

Among Villains there will occasionally be someone who does break the mold and tries to change creation. Amadeus is one, as is Cat. Alaya might be one, but the rest of the Calamities and the Woe aren't really in it to change Creation, but rather they are drawn along by Amadeus and Cat.

Dainpdf

Black knew about Cat beforehand. He knew she had the potential to become a hero and went to kill or recruit her. There is an Interlude showing Scribe telling him about her. Also, of course that's the way the Tyrant sees things. He's clearly a megalomaniac. His prescience may be heavily distorted by that.

ravin

can u link in that interlude?

Adarsh

Yeah, I did not see this one coming.

Soronel Haetir

Interesting that Kairos so misreads Black's assessment of Praes, even as he understands his mindset so well. Black is fully aware that Praes is insignificant even on the continent, let alone the rest of the world. A great deal of his strategy has revolved around not ticking off the major powers.

Byzantine

But also interesting he seems to have gotten a pretty good read on the Bard, though I suspect his ultimate assessment is off as well. Black is not really the Bard's enemy. Catherine is. They just aren't aware of it yet.

Byzantine

Oh gods.

The Tyrant is going to betray everyone. He's going to break the Bard too. And he just gave a Name that has not existed for thousands of years to someone who should never have had a chance at having one.

This is going to be interesting.

Oh, and Diabolist? Sorry, but the Tyrant just pretty much secured top old-school villain.

Nehemiah Newell

Well, yes, but while I hate both Diabolist and Tyrant, I hate to hate Diabolist, while I love to hate Tyrant. Like, Diabolist has consistently been the least interesting of the antagonists, while Tyrant is a joy.

I'm glad to see his game remains good, and hope he hangs on long enough to be an enemy of Cat, rather than a far off event.

vietnamabc

Diabolist is there for the little shit Joffrey experience and being a training wheel for Cat, Tyrant is the real deal. Also dat moments when both the GM and the player goes meta and rule-bending to the max.

onedollargum

The Diabolist is the Eric Sparrow of this story =P

Warren Peace

what the fuck is an eric sparrow

Alyxe

I waaaas going to whine about seeing the post notice, taking awhile to go to the link and finding it gone but.. can not, after that. Wow! The Tyrant is definitely shooting up my favourites now with this. And Anaxares, Named and Aspected like that?!

Bravo... well done, good sir, well done.

Arnunart

So anyone else think ranger is dead? Because her fighting the queen of summer and getting hit with a curse at the right time would be the thing that could kill her. I mean you make a mistake fighthtjngng a god and well you die.

Idan Dor

Damn, you might be right! Fuck, remember Scribe's statement from last chapter? Something like I will kill Catherine if she holds the knife and if I fail, Hye will not? Of course Hye has to go first. Damn!

RoflCat

I don't know if it'd be Ranger, if anything Malicia seems more likely as a target between her having less combat potential and has shown to be able to fail (Warden extra)

And if Malicia is gone this way, it can lead to Cat vs Diabolist for the throne (alternatively Cat defeat Diabolist, but appoint Black as Emperor instead, possibly getting some points with Scribe and Ranger for it and still leave herself free to run Callow)

Warren Peace

no. something that major wouldn't happen just out of the blue, randomly. unless you can point to some foreshadowing everyone else has missed?

Dotorator-1 47

did the Tyrant made himself second in command so he can be "the Dragon" (<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/TheDragon>)?

edrey

now that was dramatic, if warlock dies, making masego the wizard's nemesis or akua's father becoming the new warlock would be the most logical right?

so what is the goal of kairos, how he will betray the bar? the general was right the tyrant is just great

Warren Peace

there is no Apprentice currently

Cpt. Obvious

While I can't see Masego transition from Heirophant to Warlock, to me that would seem like a step down, Akua's father was once considered the equal or possibly even better than Wekesa. So if the Warlock were to die he would probably be able to grab that Name. While he lacks the ambition he would do it for his daughter. And Akua certainly have ambition enough for the both of them.

Naeddyr

That's a strange and roundabout way to become Hierach. It probably IS a title for a Diplomat, but I'd expected to see a transitional period.

Is this how it is with other title Names? People get them ""de jure"" even though they're not even close to being qualified / ratified / thronified yet, and then they have to fight for it? Suddenly, a man living on a farm is tired of the civil war raging through his home and becomes King. Three candidates for Emperor fight until one of them WANTS it more than the others.

Strange Roles lying in stories distributing Names is no basis for a system of government. Supreme Executive Power Derives From A Mandate From The People, Not From Some Farcical Narrative Performative Omen.

vamair

I don't think that a man on a farm can be The King. On the other hand, if he started a rebellion and is leading it, then it's completely possible for him to become King even before he's crowned. Though even in this case he has to do something to prove he's the true King. Draw a sword from a stone, for example.

Yotz

Any oaf can draw a sword from a stone, to judge trueness of the King on that is a blunder of legendary proportions.

Now, on the other appendage, if A Man From A Farm would be able to _put_ a sword in the stone...

Idan Dor

That is such a good monty python scene, just watched it again. It is also surprisingly extremely relevant with the Hierarch being Bellerophan and actually chosen by The People, however misguided they might be.

Transitional period may still be going on. Remember, Cat got her Learn as soon as she woke up from the Name dream and Rashid seemed to have some Aspect too, seeing as he was fighting better in a room full of goblinfire than in a camp while using his stealth trick. Given that both the current war and the Name of Hierarch are confined to the Free Cities, there may well be another claimant waiting behind the walls of Nicae.

Other possibility is that the mess that was Catherine's claiming the Name of Squire (for and a half claimants, a hero on the loose, a quarter of the city on goblinfire) was due to its ties to the larger conflict. Power calls to power, and so the three Named fighting in Summerholm later meet again to fight over the future of Callow in Liesse; an episodic villain hired by one of them to get rid of another and killed by the third has enough narrative weight left in her to posthumously claim a Name herself, even if for a short time.

In contrast to that, most of the setting up for electing a Hierarch happened offscreen: the offer to the good members of the League probably included formally giving reins to a third party, so they wouldn't commit blasphemy by taking orders from a villain. Likewise, the whole period the kanenas were delaying Anaxares' execution they were probably observing his changes of personality from being carried by the current of his people to proclaiming that both people and kanenas are wrong in breaking the law for him. The transitional period happened, it just was artificially put together by the Tyrant as he conquered more and more of the League for his friend.

Also, note how starting from "Stormfront" all his interludes are explicitly villainious, as opposed to the neutral one he shares with Cordelia Hasenbach and a nameless prologue to the current book.

TideofKhatanga

Oh gods. I have no idea what's going on anymore, most theories I had now lay in shambles and I'll need to read half the story again keeping this chapter in mind but, gods, it's awesome.

Shequi

So Kairos has opened the cage of Bellerophan Laws, and Anaxares is out amongst the prey.

Mend... Interesting, as a villainous aspect. Hierarch is going to be a fun one to watch.

nick012000

>Mend... Interesting, as a villainous aspect.

Personally, I'm wondering if he can do the same sort of things that Josuke Higashikata from Jojo's Bizarre Adventures could with it.

No healing for the villains, remember? Hes also not a mage (otherwise he'd be a kanena), so that road is also closed for him.

Though, it's a pity that the last scene in this chapter doesn't have a window for Anaxares to fall out from.

Euodiachloris

I suspect Anaxares is only a Villain from a specific point of view. From his own, mainly – Mending the rule of law on behalf of others with no wish to take power yourself... is not typically Villanous. He shares a lot with Cat: to save Callow, she consciously decided not to pick Hero. He may not have chosen to go Named, but that's kind of the point – Bellerphoran culture doesn't go in for personal choices on this. He's the Reluctant Anti-Hero/Villain/Whatever they need, whatever they thought they wanted or were going to get.

To save what he can of Bellerophan Democracy from itself (and the Tyrant), I think Anxiares is going to pick "anything that has a shot". Even if that's tipping the board. 😊

NerfContessa

Yeah, hell shake up a lot of. Things.

mechanicalrain

I wondered in previous chapters what would be the impetus behind the diplomat being granted a name, and I must say, the fanaticism and iron will he's shown in the chapter has been astounding. His display of desperation and utter willingness to die is probably what will drive him in his role. Bravo for this chapter!

vietnamabc

OTOH, that means this dude is the perfect person to sic on the Fae, guy is so steadfast that Fae trickery just wash over his head.

-Mech-

I wonder if he'll be successful or not so much in his role, considering he fits both a tragedy and a villainous tale.

And yeap, he probably has a huge advantage in any contest of wills. There's the drawback of his principles and morals not being developed solely by himself, so as to speak, but the underlying tone of self-sacrifice he takes makes him an underdog in a way. No matter way this goes, he's certainly an interesting character, and its unfortunate that he's purely a side character to drive the plot forward.

James, Mostly Harmless

The Tyrant has long known that he will die young, but I get the feeling from this Chapter he will die soon, so he created Hierarch as his successor to carry on the fight against the Prince and Praes.

Phantom

I must have lost track of the story somewhat, but I am sure that I remember reading the title of Hierarch in the story's chapters before this somewhere....

Idan Dor

It was mentioned at least once in a top of the chapter quote about diplomacy. That's what I remember, anyhow.

Imagination

"We make the shepherds kings at the end of our stories because they already know how to lead recalcitrant, bleating creatures of limited intellect."

– Prokopia Lekapene, first and only Hierarch of the Free Cities

The Hierarch is the leader of the collected Free Cities.
Anaxres is the second Hierarch to have existed.

Shequi

There's another one as well:

"Diplomacy is the art of selling a deal you don't want to people you don't trust for reasons you won't admit to."

-Prokopia Lekapene, first and only Hierarch of the League of Free Cities

From <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/08/26/chapter-22-just-according-to/>

The one about Shepherds is from <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/02/22/chapter-2-might/>

I also now understand why the First Hierarch has a name that's taken from 2 empresses of the Byzantine Empire...

Burnsy

So, somewhat relevant to this. I just finished compiling all the chapter headers, organising them and formatting them to tv tropes. They're over on the quotes page, I think I've got them all. but if anyone spots one missing then go ahead and shift it over.

*Phantom*

While I remember those quotes, those chapters seemed to be quite far behind than I recalled about seeing that title.

I assumed that it's most likely mentioned by Black somewhere in the previous chapter or someone else more recently.

mupi

It's in the previous chapter ("Cadenza"), Black and Scribe are discussing the Tyrant's plans:

--

"He aims to be Hierarch, then," he said.

How the Tyrant had managed to exert pressure on Bellerophon enough they would agree to this would have to be found investigated. Such a lever was too useful to be left solely in the boy's hands.

"Assuming he secures all the votes," Amadeus said. "Intent?"

Apparently, Black was wrong ...

*Phantom*

Nice thanks, no wonder I felt like I have seen that title so recently but can't find it.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Addicted

I wonder what cats FALL would do to rangers TRANSCEND

Bell Towers

Now I'm even MORE worried for Sabah and (the tiniest bit) for Warlock, but I'm also thinking this might just be really good feels bait.

I mean, the Lone Swordsman made some pretty big claims from a position of power and he had the stones to follow through ("let's kill a calamity, guys" "let's bring a literal angel into creation" "we're gonna start a crusaaaaade") and Cat dropped him like dirt in the end. Black has Cat's deviousness x1000 and his compadres are monsters in their own right so things might still go their way.

This chapter was Amazing btw, did not see that Name reveal coming.

randomcommentername

In rereading I've noticed something strange; in the Precipitation interlude, Anaxares makes references to Bellerophon being landlocked. In the maps, it is surrounded on three sides by water. Typo, misdrawn map, or more evidence of the 1984-esque indoctrination of Bellerophon?

Jonnnney

Bellerephon is a single city in the middle of a peninsula. So the city and it's sphere of influence is landlocked.

Author Unknown

Wow. This was awesome. I loved the stubborn little diplomat and now he becomes Hierarch. Ahahahahah.

Can you imagine trying to get him to give an order?

"What is your command?"

"No man is above another! No man has the right to command another! Follow The Peoples will!"

"The people will you to give us a command."

"Execute them all! They have strayed from the path!"

Or how about negotiating a treaty? Or any number of things. I'm so looking forward to seeing more of Hierarch.

Gunslinger

Holy shit did I not see this coming. I mean I expected he'd get a name, just didn't think he'd get THE name.

Sinjako

The Tyrant's perspective on Amadeus is completely spot on. To others that say Black knows his insignificance, He really doesn't. His Praes-centrism comes through in his world view( Boohoo villains always lose, i just wanna win.

Sinjako

Wait a minute. The Tyrant comes off as the Joker from Batman. If that is true, then Amadeus would be Evil! Harvey Dent (Two-face), Anaxares is Harley Quinn (SO many similarities), I'm not sure who the bard is (Ra's al Ghul?).

Oh my god, Catherine is Batman (The dark knight).

beleester

I thought Hanno was Good Two-Face? "I do not judge" and all that.

Soronel Haetir

Okay, something we've been told is that what separates Named from everyone else is will. Anaxares would seem to put that on its head, he is admirable in his steadfast belief but he seems to have exactly zero will of his own.

Does Kairos actually have an aspect that can foist a Name onto such an unlikely recipient?

RandomFan

He has the same will I think a lot of heroes have: A steadfast belief in the way things should be, and a certainty that when they aren't that way, they need mending. But he has a lot of will to make things the way they should be, it's just that he trusts outside sources to dictate what that is- like the White Knight does.

Lynx

I don't dislike interludes but... 2 in a row? If it gets to three I'm afraid I'll suffer from cardiac arrest.

rangamal thenuwara

They are there to let us know what is happening in other parts of the world and also give us info on how their world works. And he also make sure to finish sub-arcs within the story before going through interludes so that we don't have cliffhangers.

Nastybarsteward

Is the HIERARCH definitely a villain?

Idan Dor

Anaxares has been getting Villainous interludes for a while now (all of them except his first two appearances), so supposedly (at least for this one) the answer is yes.

Not necessarily an Evil style name like Praes' names, but remember that Bellerophan itself is "aligned" with Evil even though it is nothing like Praes' style of Evil.

Naeddyr

Rereading the thing again, noticed a big character mixup in book one:

in the chapter where sergeant Kamilah is introduced (rescued during the wargames), she's not mentioned later in the book at all, so I thought she was an abandoned character seeing as how 'sergeant Kilian' was there immediately after, but searching the blog she's mentioned in later stuff, and Kilian is a lieutenant so you've just automatically written "Kilian" instead of "Kamilah" in that chapter.

Karmagator

Wow, the comic relief became a named and thus relevant to the story... this is great 😊

Shawn Panzegraf

Eh,
As someone who actually thinks Ranger is cool, I probably shouldn't be surprised I'm also in the minority that's not terribly fond of this Tyrant/Anaxares thing. The Tyrant has had some amusing moments, and one cool one when he called down lightning, but his doings feel more like a distraction than anything else to me.

Like it or not, Diabolist's magical whatsit is the biggest magical happening since the Dead King's rise turned the capital city Keter into a hellscape.

Honestly, I only find the Tyrant relevant insofar as he's clogging up events as to whether or not Cordelia is going to get her Crusade versus Praes. More than that, the Tyrant's views aren't even internally consistent from one moment to the next. He despises Black for being a passionless gamer of the Story/Role system, but doesn't hate the Wandering Bard a trillion times more for essentially being the automated, semi-autonomous Course Correction Mechanism of the Heavens? He's disgusted that Black isn't a person in his view, but thinks he is. Yet that same disgust doesn't find purchase in the being who swaps faces & identities like other people change clothes?

I love the Guide, I really do...but the Tyrant stuff doesn't really add a lot to the story for me. No other major personalities from the Free Cities supposedly so integral to Procer being able to make a Crusade work. The only member of the White Knight's band with a memorable personality is the Hedge Wizard(ess).

Maybe it will all connect up in some awesome way down the line, dunno. Just know I'm MUCH more interested in the Catherine Chapters. The Free Cities conflict feels very bland. A prop to keep the Calamities outta the catastrophes going on in Callow.

With so much rampant destruction, I'm finding it hard to see how the Free Cities won't be too war-weary and treasury depleted to sign on for Crusade.

From Cordelia's point of view, the conflict in Free Cities is relevant only to securing the border with Helike. They wouldn't contribute to a crusade anyway, since they typically are too tied into they own squabbles to send a big enough force to Callow. Still, an active Tyrant in Helike would also make it impossible for Cordelia herself to commit.

As for inconsistent views, it's more of his personal bias against people who don't want anything for themselves (remember how he called Dorian out on the same thing he hated Amadeus for), turned into an Aspect of his own. Tyrant doesn't hate Black Knight because he games the Fate, or because he strayed from the old ways of evil, but because he keeps his objectives fluid, because he makes compromises. On the other hand Kairos can comprehend Bard's desire (presumably, destabilize the evil nations) and since she influences the Fate indirectly, she's never actually been confronted on that point, and from his point of view it's a sign of keeping to her desires.

Oh, and it's nice to finally see someone call Amadeus out on some hypocrisy in regards to his own importance. By the looks of it, at least some of Tyrant's plans will bear fruit, so if Black subverts all the flags and actually sees through it, I will be very disappointed if we won't see him laughing at having misread his 'ally' so much.

All in all, I think the main difference is that you have been reading it as a part of the main story, while I've been reading it as central points of a side plot in the same world: it's not necessarily worse only because it's not an underdog story.

burguulkodar

Funny thing to say, since my two favorite characters are Ranger and the Tyrant. Masego gets the third.

Dylan Tullos

Well, that answers Black's question as to how the Tyrant managed to gain Bellerephon's support. Oddly, Black was thinking in Traditional Evil terms, such as mind control or threats, while Kairos simply engaged in practical politics; it's a lot easier to get Bellerephon to buy into the idea of a Hierarch if the man with the Name is going to be a native son. I think this may be the first time we've seen Black completely blindsided, and it suggests that he really isn't as well prepared to deal with Kairos as he thinks he is.

vuthuha912

I think the Tyrant really plays up his Traditional Evil character so Black is blindsided by it. He even compared Tyrant to the Heir. From Black's POV, someone like that is unlikely to do so much for the benefit of another person.

Malicia and Black built their relationship based on a shared dream, friendship, and trust. It is not like Tyrant and Anaxares are friends. The Tyrant is incapable of having an actual real relationship because he is playing a role all the time. Black Knight is both a machine (Carrion Lord) and a person (Amadeus). His friend and Cat loves the person, not the machine. Tyrant is so into his role that there is barely any humanity left in him to form actual attachment. Therefore, it is very unlikely that he would give so much power to someone.

Still, Tyrant is spot on in his analysis of Black. Black really considered his Praes as the center of his world. Praes is his greatest love. His goal is for the country to pull itself together and stop shooting itself in the foot. Black is arrogant, not in the sense that he thinks his ability is better than everyone else but that he thinks everyone else will act like his expectation regardless of their own motivation or feeling. His friends should not be upset when he dies, they should not act irrationally and threaten Cat because it won't benefit Praes. Cat will kill him even if she does not want to because killing him benefits Praes and Callow. It is like he expects everyone to discard their personal feelings for their end game (or what he believes to be their end game). There is this disassociation between him and the world around him. I wonder if his Name is reinforcing this problem of cold detachment. It is a lot easier for a hero killer to be detached from his victims. He can't have a bleeding heart and be a stone-cold killer at the same time.

And he is actively enforcing this detachment on his own. The way he keeps himself from monologuing, keeping his emotions bottled up, doesn't indulge in anything aside from a little awful wine and occasional pranking, etc. Black is trying not to be human since he believes that this is the fastest way to his end goal. But, he is still human and one day it is going to be too much and he is going to break.

He is too used to following his way that he does not even stop to think whether the end is still worth it or not. Is his end goal Praes really worth all his friends life? If he finally reach his goals but all his friends are dead then it is still worth it or not? What's the point of a better Praes if everyone he ever care for is dead? It would be a meaningless victory but for the Black Knight, victory is the only thing that matter while Amadeus slowly dies inside that role. The road of darkness can only lead to hell. Once Sabah or Wekesa is dead, he will get it. It might be a little late but you are never too old to learn.

Black is too Batman in his approach. Thus, Joker-like villains i.e Tyrant and Bard are his weakness. He is incapable of imagining their end game so his prediction of them is always going to be insufficient. Who can blame him? The Bard and Tyrant are very odd. Tyrant's end game seems too broad, anything goes for him. The Bard is also the same. It is best that he ignored them and focus on his own objective. Don't try to predict them, just do what you think is right.

"Nightfall was coming, and with it the assault on [Nicaw->Nicae]"

Poor Anaxares. I think he's one of my favorite characters. The surreality of his life is just hilarious, and the surreality of his thought processes even more so. He's convinced he has a death sentence, and all he can think is that the laws aren't well enough written if he's got twenty less charges of treason.

ArkhCthuul

That was.totally bonkers...In a good and Evil way, well.done!

Poor.Hierarch...

Exec

Brilliant. I honestly thought that Anaxares was just comic relief, but this development is so much better.

burguulkodar

Now that the Free Cities actually have a Hierarch, what will he set out to do? Attack? Defend? Promote democracy far and wide?

I liked the Name transition, but I still don't understand how exactly he will be able to find his own Free Will from now on and do the choices that are necessary in a war or in politics in general. He seems too brainwashed for that, but perhaps he has the potential hidden within.

Always wondered how the kanenas reached consensus on things. Simple majority, losing side is instantly executed? Damn.

Villainous Interlude: Calamity I

"That's the thing with invincibility. You have it until you don't."

– Dread Empress Prudence the First, the 'Frequently Vanquished'

Nicae had been built thrice, with three different intents. The original settlement had spawned from the federation of a handful of fishing villages banding together to facilitate trade with the Baalite colonists settling the shores of Ashur after having absorbed or exterminated the tribes that lived there. The shape of them could still be seen, the three largest of those villages having over the centuries grown into the three ports of the city. The second time had come after Stygia took half the infant Free Cities by military force, back in the ancient days where they were the only Calernians to have a standing army. Nicae was occupied for decades, until the Stygian army attempted to force their general onto the throne of Stygia and the chain of events that would lead to all freeborn Stygians being forbidden to take arms began and heralded the collapse of the fledgling Stygian empire. The office of Basileus was proclaimed as absolute ruler, tall walls built to shield the people from marauders and a war fleet built. What was left of that intent was now known as the Old City, the beating heart of power in the maritime city, raised in old stone and winding streets.

The third and last time Nicea was built anew was after the Second Samite War, when repeated defeats at the hands of the Ashuran fleets proved the ruling Basilea's incompetence in matters of war beyond question. So the office of Strategos was born, the admiral who'd managed to bring them back from the brink give control over all military affairs and promptly overstepping his given powers by raising a second set of walls to circle the slums that had grown past the old ones and ordering the construction of the Greenstone Rampart. A set of greenstone towers jutting out from the sea and protecting the three ports, warded intensively and bristling with dwarven engines. There had been foresight in this, in Black's opinion. Though Nicae had never won their wars over rule of the Samite Gulf in the centuries that followed, the Greenstone Rampart ensured the city itself never fell from the sea. Ashur had to settle for terms instead of subjugation, and Nicean sails continued to be seen in every ports – if never quite as free to trade as they would have liked.

The city had been built to resist armies not led by villains, unlike the hardened castles of Callow, and it showed. If Summerholm had been assaulted by a handful of floating towers as Nicae was, the Royal Guards would have been focusing trebuchet fire from the positions behind the walls to bring them down before the outer rampart could be overrun. All that the Niceans managed was sporadic ballista fire that did little more than chip at the foundations. The massive ramps being tugged forward by enslaved citizens of Atalante and Delos lumbered forward, archers killing the slaves by the score by barely slowing the advance. A mistake, this. They would run out of arrows long before the Tyrant ran out of expendables. How it would unfold from there was as good as writ, if the heroes did not get involved. The Stygian phalanxes would climb the ramps and scatter the mercenaries and militia that held the rampart, forcing the Niceans back behind the taller walls of the Old City as the Helikean army passed through the gates untouched. From there, it would be butchery. The armies of Helike were better fit for field battles than siege, but their infantry was hardened and well-armed.

The famous Helikean horse would not be able to bring their full strength to bear inside cramped streets, would not be able to use their devastating combination of horse archery and spears, but they would run down scattered mercenaries like animals. This was the writ of the battle, as it stood. The only question was of where the heroes would intervene to attempt to turn the tides. The outer walls seemed the most likely stage, for whether it held or broke would decide the battle. Yet the towers were hero-bait in its finest incarnation. Amadeus was not unaware of the tactical advantages that having a force in the sky gave, against a mundane army, but there was a reason he'd stamped down on any notion of the Legions of Terror fielding them. There were practical concerns, like the logistics of feeding a host that was leagues above the ground and the requirements to raising such a fortress in the first place, but most of all it was that flying fortresses tended to crash. It was like hanging a sword with rope above the heads of the men in that fortress and sending a formal invitation to any present hero to cut it. Whatever fleeting advantage was gained by the fielding of the fortress was inevitably overshadowed by the massive costs incurred when it was brought down.

"Slid past their wards," Wekesa whispered in his ear over the enchanted piece of silver he'd inserted under the skin. "Someone tried to improve them recently, but their caster has more breadth than depths. Scrying patterns in place."

"Locations," Black said.

"Hedge Wizard is headed for the towers," Warlock replied after a moment. "Valiant Champion with the Proceran fantassins on the wall. Can't find the White Knight or the Bard, though the scrying grows unstable over on three, twelve to fifteen diameter. I'd say our boy Hanno got his hands on an amulet to scramble us."

Tricks rarely worked twice on heroes. It would have been overly optimistic to believe that the enemy would not seek to neuter the tactics they'd displayed last time, even if this was only a mildly effective parry. As the communication spell that connected Wekesa to Amadeus and Sabah was derivative of scrying, it was likely it would be made ineffective when the Duni engaged the White Knight. Only inexact sorcery prior to the distance being closed could feasibly be deployed.

"No sign of the Ashen Priestess?" Amadeus asked.

"Not a one," Wekesa confirmed. "She might actually be dead, Amadeus."

"I imagine she will be," the Black Knight replied. "Until it is decisive for the heroes that she is not. Too many third aspects remain unknowns for us to assume we've seen the last of her."

"Once in a while," Warlock said amusedly, "we do take Creation by surprise. We might have gotten lucky, for all you know, hit some weakness we were unaware of."

"We do not belong to the side that gets lucky, my friend," Amadeus murmured.

The villain closed his eyes, weighing his options.

"Sabah, keep an eye on the walls," he said. "Do not back the Tyrant against the Champion unless it is a certainty the city will hold."

"And if he's about to die?" the Taghreb replied through the spell.

"Let him," Black said. "Our only concerns are that Nicae falls and the White Knight dies. He is essential to neither."

"I hear you," she said.

The instructions were enough that she would be able to tap into Obey, if it proved necessary.

"Wekesa," he said.

"The Hedge Wizard again, I'm guessing," he mused.

"Yes," Amadeus confirmed. "And more. Red Skies protocol."

There was a lengthy moment of silence.

"We haven't gone that far since the Conquest," Wekesa said, and his voice was pleased. "You're certain? No collateral damage concerns?"

"Reputational damage is irrelevant if the Tyrant becomes the Hierarch of the Free Cities," the green-eyed man murmured. "All targets of opportunity are fair game. Use what you will, save for what falls under the Dark Day protocol."

"Ah, you sweet thing," Warlock drawled. "I have been meaning to try out a few spells."

Power bloomed in the distance. The stars above them began to grow crimson, staining the night, and the Black Knight moved. He had a hero to kill.

He'd crafted another decoy, for he had no reason not to. As expected, the Hedge Wizard ignored it. She flew directly for the towers, her great wings flapping on one of the three dozen open scrying links he'd crafted. It had taken decades to refine this particular method of farsight, creating runic arrays that would grant him eyes wherever he needed them without actively needing his attention and steering. It was also one of the reasons Wekesa rarely took the field in person: the arrays were exceedingly easy to disrupt, if found. Using distractions to keep the enemy guessing at his true locations while he worked his Gift from behind wards was the most effective use of his abilities. Warlock did occasionally miss the vindictive pleasure of incinerating the opposition in person, but he was no longer a young man. Incautious villains did not get to live as long as he had.

"It will be good night," he smiled, watching the battle unfold.

How long had it been, since Amadeus had granted him this much leeway on the field? Too long. Oh, his old friend still forbade the use of any sorcery that would grow unchecked if not stopped and any permanent rifts in Creation, but Wekesa was not eager to use the spells that would fall under the Dark Day protocol. Magical plagues had a nasty habit of growing beyond anyone's control, and only a fool would expect to keep a leash on a permanent portal linking to another dimension. The Dead King had managed it, some Soninke argued, but even millennia past that man's apotheosis mages still sifted through the remains of his reign to advance their craft. Warlock was disinclined to renounce his humanity for another form of immortality when villainy alone could yield the same results, properly used. It was a poor man's escape of the Final Shackles, anyway. For all his power, the Dead King remained undead. His nature had grown eminently less changeable, his ability to learn crippled, while humanity... Humanity was such a miraculous fluctuating thing. Tikoloshe would not have remained so eternally fascinated by it otherwise.

Behind his wards, watching it all, Wekesa stroked his beard and found three opportunities. The first was the outer walls. Sabah had yet to get involved there, and so he need not be worried about her being caught in the crossfire. Dead under the walls, killed in hatred. And now the Stygian phalanx was marching up the ramps, more blood would flow. Power was largely irrelevant to what he was setting out to accomplish, for the kind of force that could be gathered by mass sacrifices and theft of godhead was a blunt instrument. It would be used then spent, leaving the practitioner that called on it spent as well. No, what he sought was affinity. Finding similarities on both sides of the boundary before thinning it enough the realities grew muddled and overlapping. It was not a flawless method, of course. There were an infinity of Hells and more adjacent dimensions than even he could discover, but he could only use those he knew of. Knowledge, as in all things, was the great limitation.

Wekesa knew many things, though, secrets old and new ripped from ancient tomes and the minds of lesser gods alike.

"Imbricate," he murmured.

Two-hundredth and seventy-third Hell. The realm of slaughter unending and meaningless. On the weaker side of the scale, weak in devils and imprisoned souls both, but it was so very close. The Tyrant was responsible for it, stripping this battle of much meaning save his own whims. The blood across the field and walls shivered, then boiled. Guiding the alignment took all his concentration, balancing the power he was willing to invest through the runic arrays to the depth of imbrication that was useful. Creation and Hell snapped into place, and his lips quirked. Men rose around the ramps and on the wall, missing limbs and bleeding and every one of them dead. The corpses took up their weapons, broken or whole, and those that could not struck with bare hands instead. Driven by endless hatred the dead turned on everything in sight, including each other. Screams and chaos spread across the battlefield, but Wekesa paid no attention. The imbrication would fade away within the hour, and needed no more supervision from his will. Now, where was the little Wizard?

Inside one of the towers, if the trail of her Name could be trusted. Which it could not, given there were tricks to fake this and given the nature of her Role she was all but mandated to have them. An interesting thing, this Name. The Hedge Wizard relied on providence more than the average hero, in his eyes. By Heavenly mandate she would always have the exact trick needed to escape the trouble she was in, more irritatingly hard to kill a pest than any save a bardic Named. Abandoning subtlety was occasionally needed to deal with the likes of her. The Tyrant had lost his finest mages, and so his floating towers were even more unstable than ones the heroes had wrecked at Delos. No doubt the boy expected to detonate them at some point in the battle, and Wekesa would grant him his wish this once. Delving past the outer wards was a thing of ease, given that there were Helikean standard and so a century of learning behind anything come of the Wasteland, or even Callow for that matter. Callowan Gifted were largely amateurs borne of a particularly shoddy apprenticeship system, but centuries of being assaulted by Praesi mages had forced them to develop very effective, if simplistic, warding schemes.

Actually attacking the core was unnecessary. The conversion array that kept the tower afloat was so flimsy any proper disruption would lead to cascading failures. Wekesa's own offensive, meant to manifest limited kinetic force within the range of a mile at a regrettably high conversion rate, shone and one single rune in the tower's array was damaged. Thirty heartbeats later the tower exploded, heated rocks carving a swath of destruction in the outer city. Civilian casualties, he noted, would not be light. Ah, well. It wasn't like Amadeus was trying to annex this one. The scrying spell he had pointed at the location blanked until he adjusted the parameters, reforming to deal with the arcane energies still filling the air. The Hedge Wizard had been inside, he saw. Yet remained largely unharmed by the explosion. Half-phasing into Arcadia, by the likes of it. Clever, but given the unstable nature of the tower's array the energy would have scattered across the spectrum. She would have been affected. The Hedge Wizard, running across floating tiles, began to head for his decoy. Warlock smiled fondly. Trying to trace his location through it, was she?

"Ah, youth," he said.

He'd cleaned off the rust. It was time, he supposed, to get serious.

The young woman was bleeding, bent in a corner and moaning in pain. The White Knight slowed as he came by her and came close. Amadeus raised an eyebrow, but Hanno was not so foolish as that. The sword cleared the scabbard in an instant, cutting through the animated corpse's neck. A twist of will had the other three corpses he'd scattered across the rooftops pull the triggers of the crossbows just as the hero's sword began to touch flesh. It was not enough. The sword flashed out and parried the two bolts that would have taken him in the back, letting the third pass him by for it would not have touched him. Mistake. The third bolt hit the goblinfire ball he'd put inside the woman and green flames erupted instantly. The Light formed a blinding halo around the White Knight before the fire could touch him, the Heavenly power soon devoured but allowing him to retreat without it touching his flesh. There was only so much of the Light the man could call on without hollowing himself out, but Black knew better than to turn a death match with a hero into a matter of endurance. That way lay the wiping of a bloody lip, a trite quote from the Book of All Things and an improbably second wind when he himself was at the end of his rope.

The three corpses leapt down the rooftops and ran towards the White Knight, open and clearly visible wounds across their bellies. The kind a villain might put a ball of goblinfire in, if he so wished. Amadeus had not, of course. It would have been a waste of substance he had a limited stock of as well as the introduction of an uncontrollable factor to a battlefield where precision would be key. But Hanno could not afford the chance, and so he backed away to give himself room. Mistake. Amadeus' shadow snaked across the gloom behind him, puncturing the loose pavestones and detonating the demolition charge under his feet. The explosion would have earned broken bones from less powerful a Named, but for a White Knight the only advantage won was toppling him. Another twist of will and three crossbow bolts whistled at his prone form. He rolled over at the last moment, evading all but one, yet that last bolt struck his arm. Not his sword-arm, unfortunately, but he would have to deal with the wound regardless. The three corpses retreated out of sight. Hanno ripped the bolt out of his arms and cauterized the wound with Light, predictably.

"Is this all you amount to, Black Knight?" he called out. "Smoke and mirrors, ambushes and a handful of tricks."

As if engaging a hero on their own terms was anything but sheer stupidity. The provocation was not a very skilful one, a betrayal of the man's youth for all the danger he represented. Amadeus gave him what he wanted. From the ruins of a home across the street, a corpse in armour identical to his plate strode out. Unsheathing a plain steel sword, the undead offered Hanno a mocking blade salute. The hero charged, but he had learned. He flared the Light before coming close to the puppet, shrugging off the crossbow fire from the other dead. Mistake. There was no need for him to arrange detonation when the hero's blade was wreathed in Light. The sword went clean through the plate and the goblinfire blew, spreading across the edge. The White Knight hastily dropped it, and there went the shapeshifting weapon that was of clear Gigantes make. The hero's lips turned to a snarl and he made a blade of Light. A liability to exploited. Killing heroes, in Amadeus' eyes, was much like peeling an onion.

Layer by layer it went, until all that remained was the weeping.

Gods, she'd forgotten how nightmarish it got when Warlock went off the deep end. The sky had gone red and the dead were rising. Typical. That strange Levantine girl was having the time of her life with it, though, and so was the Tyrant. He'd begun screeching about treachery from his hovering throne, pleased as a cat that got the cream. The boys were underestimating this one, she thought. Amadeus thought he was straight out of the old Imperial mould and so doomed to shoot himself in the foot at his moment of triumph, but he did not smell of that kind of crazy to her. Whatever schemes he had going, and Sabah did not care to parse out the insane maze that would be, she doubted they would involve rising too high. He was the kind of irritating prick that made a virtue of defeat and pissing everybody off, just like the Heir had been. And Wekesa, well, he did tend to think that everybody that wasn't a mage was a little slow. Considering he'd been set to starve or freeze to death in the Wasteland while on the run as Apprentice, back when he'd met Amadeus, she was a little amused at how he kept turning up his nose at practical skills. Like starting a fire without getting a devil involved.

The Champion kept the wall afloat when the mercenaries began to run by using an aspect, though Sabah was too far to hear what it was. Whatever it'd been, though, it had turned Proceran rabbits to lions. They were carving their way straight into the Stygian phalanx, not that the Tyrant seemed to care. When it came to the two of them, the Taghreb judged it an even match. The heroine never managed to land a proper hit, but the beams of light the villain used hardly scuffed her plate. Sabah sympathized, having taken a swing at the muscled girl herself in the past. Anything but the war hammer the Levantine with the badger helm walked off: it was like hitting a wall. A different story when the Beast came out, but there weren't a lot of things in Creation that could ignore Sabah when she let that loose. Captain sniffed the air, and grimaced at what she got from it. Brimstone, and the red in the sky was getting deeper. Sooner or later something nasty was going to start raining down. Better if she could finish off her heroine before it got to that.

She seemed like a good kid, the Champion. Heart in the right place, spoiling for a fight the way the young ones often were. Heroes still cutting their teeth tended to think they were invincible, before running into their first proper villain. Those that survived that emerged stronger from the experience, and there lay the problem. Sabah didn't particularly care if someone worshipped the Heavens instead of the Gods Below. Her people's deities were most loved when they were looking somewhere else. Imagine the kind of pricks they'd be if we weren't on their side, Sabah, her mother had been fond of saying. The issue was that when heroes got a little killing under their belt they tended to go looking for a bigger fight, and right now Praes was the biggest fight to be had on the continent. Except for the Kingdom of the Dead, but who'd be dumb enough to try that? Hye didn't count, she had an odd knack for killing things she shouldn't in the place where she should have godsdamned common sense. Still, it was a shame. The Champion truly did seem like a good kid.

Sabah had killed a lot of good kids, over the years.

Didn't particularly enjoy it, but if the choice was between the people she loved and some young fools who thought they could fix the world with a spell or a sword, well, that wasn't a choice at all. World didn't really want to be fixed. Wasn't supposed to be. But the broken chariot kept on rolling down the road, so why fuck with what worked? Amadeus had tried it for forty years and he'd had good days for a toil, but a lot more bad ones. Wekesa had understood quicker, washed his hands of the whole thing and instead taken care of his son and his experiments. But Sabah wasn't willing to let Amadeus into the deep end with only Eudokia to prop him up, so Captain she had been. Was and would be. Sometimes that meant doing things she didn't like, but she doubted anyone in the world enjoyed their work everyday. She got her hands bloody, but it could have been worse. The truly dark things Amadeus always did himself. He'd never been one to let others do his dirty work for him, if he could avoid it. Sabah watched the fight on the ramparts turn, biding her time, and she was not made to linger.

The Tyrant summoned a stream of what looked like spectres – he'd regret letting something like those loose with Wekesa on the battlefield, she mused – and while the Champion held the mercenaries around her died until she was forced to retreat. Best keep an eye on that, Captain mused. Wouldn't do to let the girl meddle in Amadeus' fight with her leader.

Sabah followed the heroine into the streets, eerily quiet for a woman her size.

I wonder what Hierarch can even do...

And of course, RIP Sabah.

Unless something surprising happens. While this story tends to be tongue-in-cheek with the meta knowledge of narratives that all the characters seem to have, it's (regrettably) stuck to a fairly predictable pattern so far.

Jedidusk

The Hierarch can Mend.

Ethesis

I now fear for Warlock.

danh3107

Hmm, another deathflag for Captain. Another week to wait...

edrey

well, the bard told the champion about monster stories, so is likely a trap, from a miracle or magic, probably the first, the pristeness is alive and waiting( hiding with divine protection or something) because magic or explosives can't hurt the beast( maybe before she transform) and i really don't see warlock getting killed or losing control of his magic and killing captain, no matter how much the storie help the wizard

lennymaster

It was stated in the last chapter that the Priestess is ACTUALLY dead. Bard directly or inderectly took the opportunity, sacrficing her, to use the presence of her and her Name in the world and story to do something. Some have argued in the comments that it was for killing Ranger by weakening her or strengthening the Summer Queen during their fight to get the dangerous wildcard she represents out of the game.

edrey

it was stated by the tyrant, no a hero, they can't kill captain without her miracles, or something of the same level, and warlock making a mistake with his magic is stupic, so how are they going to kill a calamity without a foolish deus ex machina?

Duckie

Who says the Bards goal is to kill them? At least for right now I don't think it is. From what I understood in the last chapter with Tyrant. It looks more like they want to corner the Calamities, they wan't to force them to go crazy again. They will do that by wounding Black severely with what ever power Bard got from killing the Priestess. Bards goal probably is more along the lines of creating Choas to ignite the will of others to fight for the "greater good" in this moment at least. What better way to kick off a massive Crusade then to have a city wiped out by raging lunatics from the evil empire. Sense the summoning an angel thing failed to start it. Then again one of them might die while going crazy..

Cpt. Obvious

WB said she'd hurt Amadeus where it counted, through the ones that he loves. He loves Hye (Ranger) as his lover and partner when she lets him. He loves Wekesa as a brother. His relationship with Assassin is an unknown. And finally there's Sabah. She is a mother figure for all the Calamities, and all of them love her. Catherine loves her!

If the Wandering Bard want to screw with them so they lose their focus then Sabah is the target to go after. Captain is the one of the group who's closest to Black. Much like Hakram is Cat's shadow Sabah is Amadeus rock.

Warren Peace

Really? Is the Bard even concerned with the lv.1 fight going on in Arcadia right now? Directly concerned, that is. I don't see why she would go through such trouble for something so tangental to the main story, from her perspective. Sure, either participant could play a minor role in important things to come, but the Queen has Arcadia as her true home, and Ranger has clearly indicated that she isn't interested in taking a leading role in the shaping of Calernia.

in fact, I can think of several reasons the Bard might have for preferring to keep Ranger around and living, safely stowed by her lake.

goliath1303

It's too bad you didn't list any of the several reasons you can think of...

I think the complete opposite argument could be made. Cat is the main character of this story so I think it could reasonably day that what's happening in this chapter is "something so tangental to the main story" when compared to what's happening with/around Cat & Co. You really can't see any reason why Bard, whose consciousness we've recently learned STRETCHES BACK FARTHER THAN RECORDED HISTORY and, as confirmed by the Tyrant, has a master plan she has been working on for a very long time, might seize an opportunity to take Hye off the board permanently? The person who is Chaotic Neutral incarnate? If I were making a play that involved offing any of the Calamities, especially Amadeus, making sure she isn't around to avenge that death would be my #1, #2, and #5-20 wishes. Taking somebody like her out isn't something you can do on a whim, but if a promising situation presented itself so close to the time that plan was going to be initiated it would be crazy not to seize it.

For the record, I don't actually believe that that's what's going on here. I just like playing devils advocate and really hate how dismissive you are of other people ideas while not providing any of your own beyond vague and mostly empty half-guesses. Even when you do venture a sliver of a prediction you don't provide any reasoning to it, yet are so quick to jump down other people throats and tell them they're wrong. The worst part is that normally(I know this isn't the case here, but my point stands.) you direct more of your attack towards the person commenting than you do the actual comment itself. So that previous paragraph was an example for you to look back on and get an idea of how to discuss ideas with fellow people.

Unmaker

@Duckie

Bard plans to wound Amadeus by forcing him to kill all the people he loves. That was one point made in the last Villainous Interlude: Bard somehow set up the situation where the White Knight could not officially engage the Black Knight in a pattern of three, which means the White Knight will engage Catherine, which would destroy Amadeus's plans (I consider that Catherine is an essential part of Amadeus's plans). So the Bard essentially made Amadeus choose between his plans and his loved allies and Amadeus chose his plans without hesitation.

Ethesis

Catherine becomes the Winter Knight who need not be a hero to also be the White Knight.

That is fraught with perils.

maresther23

What if Bard's plot is whatever she did in the Epilogue of Book 2?

Morgenstern

I'm seeing Warlock getting killed for a long time... though maybe not quite so much anymore now that Apprentice has taken another name. But still... the man is just aching for it, feeling too secure despite all his 'wouldn't do to get careless, what with being old'.

if i remember correctly, unconquered champion was the one who sent black to a pocket dimension causing captain and warlock going crazy, for three days i think

Rnt169

Very intricate story telling, after the last three chapters I have realised how much hints and foreshadowing is given. Pity we can't go through this like a book, serialised stories are a bitch when you have to keep track of so many tidbits. Here's to hoping EE can publish these books in good time.

Big Brother

I'm curious how I can earn the title "The Frequently Vanquished" That in itself seems like a tale worth telling.

Morgenstern

Well. Someone who loses a lot, but always comes back.

MagnaMalusLupus

"Ah, but being defeated was always part of my plan! Yet another glorious victory for the Empire."

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful

Book 3, chapter 6

She was probably the one who opposed King Albert Fairfax of Callow, the Thrice-Invaded, author of the quote from the chapter twenty one:

"To conquer until all of Creation is desert or province: that is the ideal of Praes. Mock their failures if you must but do not ever forget their victories.”

imbricate (verb): arrange (scales, sepals, plates, etc.) so that they overlap like roof tiles.

Interesting choice of Aspect for Warlock, there. I think “overlap” or “overlay” would probably work just as well and be more understandable, but maybe he has other powers derived from it besides his ability to overlay different planes over the top of each other, like the ability to grow a set of scales over his skin as armor.

Morgenstern

He’s made to seem like (having been) a scholar – thus, a bit stranger words seem to fit perfectly, imho. 😊

Warren Peace

E.E. is the king of arcane words with meanings that don’t have anything to do with their apparent roots, like fantassin.

goliath1303

Once again, wrong. First of all imbricate makes sense in the example shown here(I’m betting it also has more ways to be implemented that we haven’t seen yet.) because Warlock is sorting through the overlapping dimensions and then thinning the barrier between Creation and the one he chooses.

Secondly though, and this is the real kicker, fantastic isn’t something EE made up out of whole cloth. If you type that 1 word into Google the first result is the wikipedia page for “Infantry” which is pretty telling, but a few results down it shows that its a French word with this definition: “fantassin (Fr.). A foot-soldier. This term is derived from the Italian fante, a boy, the light troops in the 14th and 15th centuries being formed of boys who followed the armies and were formed into corps with light arms, hence the origin of the word infantry.”

So at this point, I’m 90% sure that Ranger is already dead:

1. The Queen of Summer is part of Cat’s story. Ranger can’t kill her before her big confrontation with Cat, it would be too anticlimactic. At the same time, Ranger’s Name won’t allow her to retreat or give up once she’s set her eyes on a new target. Therefore, the only possible outcome of their battle is Ranger being killed, or somehow made unable to continue pursuing the Queen. The Queen has no reason to imprison her, and imprison someone like Ranger is an exercise in stupidity anyway, so the only other real option would be for Ranger to sustain a crippling injury.

2. Ranger has bound herself to the Calamaties, and the Calamaties are clearly on their way out. Someone last week was speculating that the way Ranger has lived for so long is by never allowing herself to become seriously involved in a story. But then she joined the Calamaties, and now she's involved in Cat's story as well. Even someone as insanely overpowered as Ranger can be defeated if the story demands it.

3. Building on that, Ranger is pretty stupidly overpowered. There has to be SOME limits to her power. If she can kill the Queen of Summer, then what can't she kill? She becomes a walking deus ex machina.

4. There are some pretty damn suggestive quotes from the last couple of chapters:

"Let me tell you a secret, my friend," he whispered. "She's already won. The opposition was watching the wrong fire the whole time, and the intricacy of the trap is exquisite. She made the kill without them ever seeing her."

"Even if my pretty little mages had been untroubled, the Beast would have survived. The Healer should have too, life split in half with her sister. A touching story of sisterly love, if you care for that sort of thing. She didn't because she was a sacrifice. Her weight was stolen, because there was another use for it. With nothing you can only trade for nothing."

...

"She's going to kill him," the diplomat said.

"Of course not, my beauteous blooming flower," the Tyrant tutted. "Nothing so crass. She's going to hurt him. And when the cold thing turns into a wounded animal, well, that's when he starts making mistakes."

And today:

"That's the thing with invincibility. You have it until you don't."

Everyone thinks Sabah is going to die, but they thought that before, too. Black has been doing this for a long time, and he's really good at it. He's not going to miss obvious death flags, he knows how to avoid them. But while he's all busy paying attention to the Tyrant and Sabah, the Bard snuck off and set in motion the events which will lead to the death of the one person he never even thought was in danger.

JC

Oh nice.

Snoogle

That is actually really possible.

I've found that EE usually puts at least 4 hints of foreshadowing for any major event going on. Up to 3 I can therefore put away to coincidence (since some of those don't necessarily talk about Ranger) but this makes 4 that could hint to her... I'm really curious now. Up until this comment, I didn't think Ranger could ever be defeated but now... You raise some interesting point.

Ethesis

True, but I'm hoping that having the sun stolen lets Ranger survive this.

haihappen

Could also be Warlock. Since he was the one to divert the death-curse to the Ashen Priestess, the Hedge Wizard now has a "Heroic" motivation, i.e., avenging her sisters death, to kill him.

But otherwise: I dig the angle to target Hye. Her death would wound Amadeus the most, of all of the Calamities. Because of their past mentor/lover-relationship, and that she is the most "invincible" of the Calamities.

Also, I love that our very informed Villians missed the Hierarch Name being already taken and still operate under the assumption that the Tyrant is aiming for that. Otherwise they would probably change their game. All their projections are wrong...

Truth be told: I have no idea what the Tyrant's End Game could be.

Pretty sure the Tyrant's end game is to be the guy who caused the second Hierarch in League history to happen and go down in history as such. Immortality through legend, not through the physical body.

Euodiachloris

I'm also betting Tyrant isn't getting a full picture, either. And, although he knows that, he is still falling into the trap of thinking that knowing about the dangers of going meta makes it easier to avoid them for the time being. 🙄

RoflCat

Given that the last time Scribe mentioned killing Cat if she poses a threat, Black considered having to kill her/Ranger to keep Cat alive because Cat is more important for his plan.

If so, Ranger dying would certainly hurt his emotion, but it won't hurt the machine that much.

If Bard's goal is to return Praes to the way of Evulz (since she protected Diabolist), I think her real aim should be Malicia who's the other center of the Reform.

Kill Malicia, have Diabolist or someone else equally Evulz take the throne, and then Cat and Black will be forced into a civil war to dethrone that person.

Ethesis

How did the Tryant get so powerfully smart and understanding?

He is young and doomed and already seems a match for the Calamities as a team –and determined to take them out.

Morgenstern

I don't see why Ranger would have to KILL the Queen. The Queen can very well survive to take her place in Cat's story – all Ranger really needs is a TRINKET, like with the eye she took from the Prince of Nightfall... And anyway, fae always seem to come around again with each new cycle, no matter how gruesomely they were killed the last time, so there's another way around in there. *shrugs

Morgenstern

That said, the quotes you gave D0 seem pretty for implying Ranger and not just any other one of the Calamities. But Wekesa and .. Ally, was it? are his oldest friends – so it might apply to them as well, not just to his "one true love".

Warren Peace

I think you mean Hye?

Warren Peace

No wait you were referring to Malicia's given name, Alaya

Liver

Now that you bring it up, it does seem likely. Ranger inadvertently setup what usually is a teacher that saves the new generation and then stays behind and sacrifices herself to the Big Bad. And if there is anywhere where story trumps power levels, it is Arcadia.

There is tidbit from book 2 i remember that supports this. Black said "I pity anyone fool enough to try." to anyone that would try to hurt him though Ranger so attempts on Ranger's life are not things Black is concerned with.

I also remember Bard saying that she is a pebble and i think William thinking that "a pebble is all it takes to break a machine". I can't see to find the passage, but that means Bard as already picked up a "break Black" flag. Black is only one so far with any machine symbolism with his name.

Warren Peace

I appreciate the organization of your comment, it makes debunking it so much easier 😊 I'll go point-by-point:

1. As someone else pointed out, Ranger's goal is likely not to kill the Summer Queen, but to claim a body part for jewelry.
2. Ranger had once bound herself to the Calamities, but she has unbound herself since. She's made it clear she's the Lady of the Lake now, not a Calamity anymore.
3. Narrative-wise, is there a better way of preventing this than by banishing herself to her own quiet domain, and only flexing that over-poweredness to defend her own turf? A.k.a. exactly what she's doing. I suppose you could argue that by taking on Summer Q. in Arcadia, she's outside of that protection, but come on. Since I've negated points 1 and 2 already, this on it's own doesn't suggest anything.
4. All of the quotes you picked are operating under the assumption that the Bard is directly concerned with the 1v.1 fight in Arcadia, and I don't see why she would be. I just finished writing about this in another comment though and I don't feel like tapping it all out again, but it's just a bit further down.

This is how it makes sense to me, but what do I know? I thought Heiress transitioning to Demonic Girl or whatever was so plainly stupid as to not be worth even considering, so me thinking something is stupid isn't a good reason to dismiss it apparently.

nick012000

Also,

I’ll point out that we know all of the Ashen Priestess’s Aspects by now: she had Heal, Burn, and Begone. I don’t think any of those would contribute well to self-resurrection. Not unless someone brings her back as a Dark Souls-esque fire zombie or something, anyway.

Oh, wait, Warlock just cast a spell to reanimate every dead body in the city.

Imagination

While Begone was formatted like an aspect, it was explicitly described as just one of many miracle that the Ashen Priestess could call on. We don’t know clearly one way or the other.

thespaceinvader

I just checked the chapter and Begone is definitely referred to as a miracle, rather than an aspect. It’s pretty explicit about when aspects are being called upon, in that fight.

Besides, Black’s point is that there are too many third aspects that they don’t know, not that they don’t know hers specifically – they’ve only seen 2 each of Hanno’s (Ride, Recall), Irene’s (Burn, Heal, even if Begone is an Aspect it was not witnessed by the Calamities directly), and the Champion’s (of which we only know the name of one, Oppose, and potentially now the third which might be something like Rally), and they don’t know any of Hedge’s or the Bard’s, and nor do we.

That’s more than enough room for one of them to have an Aspect or a trick that could resurrect someone. Albeit, the Tyrant’s chapters make it clear that the Ash Priestess is as gone for good as anyone gets in this story, he doesn’t know that.

RandomFan

I’m pretty sure we know she still has wander- she’s been pulling tricks tied to that, and i think we got a confirmation of Wander in her last iteration- but yeah, they wouldn’t know for sure, and she hasn’t visited them again.

Shequi

Black has misread Kairos over the Name of Hierarch, then. That means there's a variable in the battle he's not accounted for.

TideofKhatanga

That also means that "reputational damage" will come bite Praes in the ass. If Warlock does something over the top, it won't be hard to convince Hierarch that a crusade is in order.

beleester

Is Hierarch really the crusading sort, though?

To Anaxares, all the other nations are Corrupt Foreign Despots, Wicked Foreign Oligarchies, etc. etc. Not something that the Free Citizens of Glorious Bellerophon should concern themselves with. He's basically fanatically Lawful Neutral.

So, about the foreshadowing we got in this chapter.

My guess about how Sabah will die is that her first Aspect (and the only one we have seen her use) will fail her, since she's relying on it too much.

Note how Black formulates the orders that would allow her to tap into Obey:

- 1) Wait near the point of the main assault on the walls.
- 2) Support the assault only if it fails.
- 3) The objectives of the mission are to take Nicae and kill White Knight, so she doesn't to protect the Tyrant.

Now, while Captain is not a program and doesn't necessarily behave according to the letter of the orders, but I'll remind you that the order that she used to power her Name on transitioning was as simple as "Whatever is there, win. Come back to us." And now Amadeus forgot (or "forgot") to include the second part on their biggest operation since Conquest, and with the Bard on the field to boot.

What I'm thinking will happen is that since Champion isn't really going to hold the walls all on her own or interfere with the Knights' duel, no orders actually apply to her, so Sabah has two useful Aspects left at most, and Champion already demonstrated that two of her own Aspects are suitable for fighting the Captain in close quarters. Whether Rafaella transitions mid-fight, has a story-powered trap or simply has a way to use the third Aspect for scoring a decisive blow depends on the Bard, who's now either observes the Knights, the Captain's advance or is talking to the Tyrant.

Though I'm still hoping that Anaxares will be able to Mend her at the last moment.

OldSchoolVillain

The thing there is that Captain also still has two of her own Trump cards hidden away. She doesn't really obey that much herself, she just taps it when Black orders her to. Even aside from that, The Beast is still on the field and available as a sort of fourth Trump card that Captain can call on when she needs to, which gives her another advantage. Whether it will be enough, when the Heavens so casually bestow New Powers as the Plot Demands, remains to be seen.

alegio

This feels dangerous for Warlock, dunno why.

Warley Echeverry

I feel so bad that my first ever comment on this story is a problem I have with it, but I've been reading since the beginning and noticed something strange. Where are all the other NAMED. In Chapter 1, Catherine, before she was Squire, mentioned that she'd thought that Booker was a Name at first. And later in the story we meet Augur, who seems to be the only fully non-combat Name. In these last few chapters we meet Hierarch, who's implied to be a civil leader and not really a military one.

What this all implies is that:

#1: Names are more common than we've seen, otherwise Cat would never have thought Booker was one.

#2: Named don't HAVE to be warriors, and therefore be killing each other all the time.

So my question is, are there no legendary teachers in this universe? No fishermen? Sailors? Beggars? Doctors? It seems like every story ever in this world is about war, and there's no stories about shepherds or explorers or anything else.

If there were, even if Named were blisteringly rare, the vast majority would be non-combat classes, since they aren't killing each other.

Warley Echeverry

Edit: completely forgot about Scribe being a non-combat class too, but that's still begs the question of why there aren't more.

---

Well, Fate is a gambit that centers around the conflict between Good and Evil, and combat is the easiest way for a Named to contribute to that conflict. All noncombat Named you mentioned are either support (typical healer Names, Augur) or administrator and leader for one of the sides in the conflict (ruler Names, Scribe, Chancellor).

It's not Arcadia for everyone and their mother to have a Name, only the resolute people representing a tendency supported by either Gods qualify. And since it's stated in Cadenza that divine interference is roughly symmetrical in amounts of power granted (not in methodology), if you grant a power to someone not inclined to fight, nothing stops your opponent from propping up someone who'll eventually come and straight up murder your Fisherman or Beggar.

Remember, Named aren't just characters in stories, they are the ones who qualify for the patterns already entrenched into Creation and spread by the word of mouth: each one is a protagonist for at least a couple of stories of their own.

By the way, the tendency bit is why Bard is so stupidly overpowered: she's not just a counterpart for the immortal lich in Keter, not just the one who decides which story will catch on and which will be forgotten: her Name represents everyone who's ever told a story.

Warley Echeverry

That's the point, it's not a conflict between good and evil.

It's been reiterated several times through the story that the Gods below and the Gods above aren't at war. They made a BET.

Their bet is about whether Good or Evil will triumph in the end and it seems like a lot of the "neutral" stories would be perfect for that.

blitzbasic

Cat was young and inexperienced and had no idea how the world works. What chapter one cat thinks about names doesn't have to be true.

beleester

Selection bias. Even if there is some sort of legendary Beggar, a Herschel of Ostropol type who's famous for outwitting the rich and powerful in funny ways, we're not going to hear about him, because he's going to take one look at the Praesi and say "Nope." There are better people to beg from than the ones who think that torture and murder is a jolly good time.

Likewise, maybe there's a Sinbad the Sailor type who's having swashbuckling adventures in far-off lands and bringing home cargoes of exotic spices, but unless Catherine or one of the Heroes has an urgent need for The Best Sailor Ever because they need to assault a port city or something, they're not going to meet them. This is a story about kingdoms going to war, so any Names we encounter in this story are going to be people who can go to war.

More generally, I'd point out that you generally don't get stories told about you unless you have **something** important at risk. The sailor who has a safe, profitable voyage probably isn't The Sailor. That doesn't necessarily mean all Named are fighters, but it means that it's inherently a high-risk profession and they've got to be able to handle it.

Lynx

**Dies**

nobodi12

Stop playing with our feelings. Each chapter is "pray the gods below that the Calamities survive this one"

arancaytar

This chapter is a bit of a reminder that no, just because practical evil doesn't kick dogs when it is not cost-effective, that doesn't make it not evil.

Soronel Haetir

Something I don't understand is why this particular battle is even being fought. Did Nicae decide to buck the League and reject the Hierarch vote? Seems like that would wreck the League.

OldSchoolVillain

I think that the Tyrant just needed to INVOLVE all of the Free Cities in order to enable the Name of Hierarch. That's what scribe suggested in her last interlude (Cadenza, I think?)

Dylan Tullos

This chapter demonstrates why I'm still cheering for Team Good rather than "Practical Evil". Warlock is utterly indifferent to the people he kills; he could murder half of Calernia to advance his magical knowledge, and his only concern would be the difficulty of repeating the experiment. He's basically a magical Josef Mengele.

The Tyrant's description of Black as a "machine" has never seemed more accurate. Black is so focused on accomplishing his goals that he's lost the ability to truly care about anything else. It wasn't that long ago that he was considering how to arrange the death of his closest friends to prevent them from getting in Catherine's way.

Sabah is nicer, but she admits to making her living by "killing good kids". She's not concerned with right or wrong, only with "us" and "them". Though Captain doesn't believe in Black's grand plan, she follows him anyway, shedding the blood of people who haven't done anything to her because her friend asked her to.

Villains have a protagonist-centered morality. As long as they get what they want, other people really don't matter. I'm looking forward to the moment when Black suffers the same grief that he's inflicted on countless innocents throughout his career, and all of Calernia learns that the Calamities aren't as invincible as they claim to be.

OldSchoolVillain

I understand where you're coming from, but also you should keep in mind what team "Good" has enabled in the story. William callously tortured enemy officers to draw out his target. He set a city of innocents on fire and risked wiping it out entirely in a (fortunately successful) attempt to weaken Warlock. He summoned a mind-raping Angel to another city of innocents to start a crusade. The Bard enabled Diabolist to become what she is when she stopped the elves from killing her. She carelessly enforces the status quo of war and conflict just to keep her side on top. She backed and even pushed William's mind-raping-angel plan just so maybe her side could scrape a win either then or in the future.

Part of the moral of this story is that being 'righteous' isn't enough. Being Good isn't enough. Yes, the calamities are Evil and cause mass slaughter but their intentions – at least, Black's intentions, and therefore the rest of the party – is to preserve and defend Praes, their homeland. The calamities have a purpose behind the fires that they start – the side of 'Good' starts fires because their opponents are Evil and for them, that's all that matters.

In short, A Practical Guide to Evil comes across really as a gray-scale world where Good Is Not Nice and sometimes Evil is the best option.

Dylan Tullos

OldSchoolVillain:

You make excellent points. I'm not so much for Team Mind Control as I am looking for an alternative to Team Practical Evil, and I find the current champions of the Gods Above a great deal more tolerable than the Lone Swordsman. The White Knight isn't perfect, but he hasn't yet tried to turn anyone into a meat puppet with an angel pulling the strings.

Black's intention is to defeat the Narrative of the Gods Above and free Praes from its role as the eternally defeated villain. Warlock's intention is to enjoy his marriage, raise his son with love, and conduct experiments that involve mutilating human souls and live vivisections. He couldn't care less about Praes, and Sabah seems to be in it primarily because she's besties with Black. Black is a well-intentioned extremist, but the rest of his party isn't interested; they do evil things because they feel like it or because they want to help their friend, not because of any concept of the Greater Good.

I think it's important to distinguish between the Bard and the Lone Swordsman, who seem to be lacking in the free will department, and the Good characters who have reasonable, sane goals. Cordelia is quite understandably upset over the Dread Empire's decision to fund Procer's civil war, and she is dedicated to protecting her own nation, just as Black and Malicia seek to protect theirs. The White Knight's party is full of Named with solid motives and intact personalities, not angelic chew toys. I'm not going to cheer for the mind-controlled tools of the Gods Above, but I honestly prefer Team Flawed Good to Team Practical Evil.

Also, loving Anaxares as Hierarch. A devout believer that fanatically rejects the very concept of hierarchy is now in charge of the League! One reason I love the Tyrant so much is that he just has so fun with it; Black may be more practical, but Kairos just loves what he does.

vuthuha912

Your view is so clear that it is refreshing.

I just know that Black method of ruthlessness is going to bite him in the ass later. He is too focused on his goal yet kinda forgets the true reason behind his goals? It is like he loves his country because he loves its people – Sabah, Wekesa, Alaya, Scribe, etc. Yet, on his way to building a better world for them, he faces the choice of having to harm them. It sounds ridiculous but actually happens a lot. Like, a father constantly working to give his daughter the best life possible but doesn't spend time with her. It calls "this mistake the head for the tail" in my country. It is dangerous because the consequence can be very, very subtle and by the time you fully recognized what it is, there is no way to change.

Black has never faced a steep enough consequence before. Everything he sacrificed is his – his consciousness, love, emotion, enjoyment in life, etc. It is acceptable until it is not. The moment the consequence spread to his friend, he is going to break. By then, it might have been too late. I know it is going to destroy him. He is a human, not a machine.

I am looking forward to him recognizing that victory with such a high price is meaningless. It would be messy and fun as hell. Even though I love him, I think the pain will be educational.

I always think there is a place for ruthlessness but in the end, compassion needs to be the core for success to be long-lasting. Currently, Black is a little too deep in his role – the heartless monster whose only purpose is to achieve victory for his side. He is slipping more and more into ruthlessness just to win and he needs to stop before it is too late. I wonder if he should try to befriend non-Names to gain a better perspective and keep himself from going too far, like a Morality Pet. He has Malicia but she has ... other problems ...

As for the side of Good, if the hero is Superman or Captain America then I am going to support him wholeheartedly. It feels insulting that William is even considered as a hero compared to Cap and Superman. Even Xun Yu from Ravage of Time – the lighter version of Black, is better than these heroes.

Personally, I like Cordelia enough but she is playing with fire. A common enemy is a good solution to the problem of civil war but bringing religion into the mix is not going to end well. Not to mention, a common enemy doesn't always work. Just look at China. The first thing many well-educated officials do when faced with a formidable enemy is to sue for peace, take bribery, sabotage their own side, betray their leader, etc. There is an abundance of cowards and fuckwits throughout history. You never know which one you'll get to deal with. Procer need time for the population and the economy to recover and did a whole lot of preparation. 10 years is the minimum period. If you don't have enough grain to last the entire population for at least several years then don't even bother trying to fight. Your starving population will cut your head off before your enemies can. War is not a political game. It is serious business and Cordelia might be treating this too lightly.

Shawn Panzegraf

Time to weigh in:

The White Knight better than The Lone Swordsman? However screwed up William was (and summoning the Angel of Mind Rape is pretty screwed up) Hanno literally decides who lives and dies based on a COIN TOSS! Hanno is Two-Face without the outward scarring. His POV Chapters talk about how he believes taking action based on his own idea of right and wrong is "Surrendering his sword to Chaos."

Put more simply: Hanno is not a Moral Agent of ANY sort. If the Gods Above give him the itch to pull out his coin and toss it while in the presence of someone he's just met, who he's seen do nothing which is either good or evil, if the Coin lands Crossed Swords Up, Hanno is going to kill that person without a qualm. Every single bit of White Knight PoV we've gotten has emphasized Hanno's belief that only the Heavens should decide who lives and who dies. He blames free will itself for the death of his mother.

By comparison, William Bin Laden was a paragon of morality. Hanno wouldn't even strike at the Tyrant (who he was aware had started aware and was besieging the city the Heroes had chosen to defend FOR FUN) until he saw the result of his Coin Toss.

The Wandering Bard allowed Diabolist's rise, simply to further her own ends.

Ashen Priestess, Hedge Wizard and Champion have reduced themselves to little more than Igor-like henchmen of Hanno the Enemy of Free Will.

The current crop of Heroes have all the likability of a case of the crabs, with none of the fun that went into becoming infested with them.

Warlock is the epitome of Evil because he didn't break down into tears over the fact his striking a military target would cause extensive civilian casualties? Well then, I suppose we should run out and paint the words MASS MURDERER on the doors of the veterans who made up the bomber crews during the fire-bombing of Dresden. It's the same thing, right?

Sabah is doing what pretty much everyone does. Choosing those she loves over those she doesn't. If Black and Wakesa were the town's blacksmith and alchemist respectively, she probably wouldn't ever kill anyone. Her family chose a warlike path, so she decided if it takes piling up a mountain's worth of dead Good Kids to bring them home safe in the evening, it's worth it.

I can't honestly say if someone I loved was doing something I thought immoral that I would let them DIE if someone tried to stop them from doing that immoral thing. Black and Wakesa are creatures of extremes, so Sabah has been forced to take violence to extremes. She isn't glorying in the thought of ripping the Champion to pieces. It's simply an ugly, unwanted chore that needs doing in her mind. It doesn't make her morally commendable, but it's hardly a cloak of Unspeakable Evil either.

So long as whoever represents Team Heavens are enemies of free will, in my mind all things are permitted to tear down said enemies of free will. Even Cordelia Hasenbauch doesn't want her Crusade because Praes is doing Evil. She wants to USE a coalition of other nations to strike Praes down PREEMPTIVELY, in order to safeguard her country. (For those who want to say "Well, Malicia started that by turning the Calamities loose on Procer before the Conquest of Callow, and then by funding the Proceran civil war: Let's remember that Procer has a reputation CENTURIES in the making of cold-bloodedly grinding other nations under their bootheels via cat's paws, proxies, and surreptitious financial investments. Cordelia herself acknowledges Procer's reputation is so bad that the Gigantes will kill any one of her people ON SIGHT. Procer has done everything in its power to keep the Free Cities the unstable collection of shit-holes they are, again for centuries.)

Yet Cordelia has the mind-boggling gall to claim the Mandate of Heaven as justification to deliberately engineer a continent wide Crusade that will DIRECTLY kill millions of innocent people, and kill tens of millions more due to the famines and plagues that inevitably follow that scale of warfare in a Medieval setting.

Why? "Because the madmen are coming." Except they aren't, and Praes ISN'T coming. It's the same sort of high-minded pretext would-be conquerors always proclaim. A Crusade versus Praes will by necessity involve an attack on the breadbasket of Praes: Callow. Sure, sure, Cordelia will shed a few crocodile tears for the tens of thousands of Callowan farmers and their families that will starve the winter following her resource-denial slash-and-burn campaign, but she'll have Uncle Klaus give the order with a clear conscience and go to an untroubled sleep that night nevertheless.

stevenneiman

As I understand it, the difference between Good and Evil is that Good tries to serve the Heavens, while Evil is allowed to serve its own ends, with little import placed on what those ends are. For that reason, Black and Cat are both evil, even though Black regularly uses genuine improvements to the standard of living as means to an end, and Cat's ends are about improving things for her people out of genuine (if ruthlessly calculating) benevolence.

I'm still not sure what exactly the Tyrant wants, but I very much doubt that it's anything good for the Heavens, so he is Evil.

On the other side, Hanno, Cordelia, and the Bard all serve the Heavens instead of choosing their own goals, though only the Bard really understands what that means, and she's even less human than Black.

The interesting thing is that of that list, one of the villains is the only one who considers the deaths of innocents to even be a negative consequence of her plan, everyone else just considers whether mass murder is the most efficient tool to achieve their objectives, and Kairos might or might not do it anyway because it's funny.

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegraf:

The White Knight may have surrendered his free will to the Heavens, just as the Lone Swordsman did, but he hasn't done anything particularly unethical. Hanno hasn't targeted civilians, subverted anyone else's free will, or done anything except fight the Tyrant and his soldiers in open battle. Until his ethics are tested, we can't actually know whether he would kick puppies or burn down orphanages because an angel told him to. As of now, the only person he's done his coin flip on is the Tyrant, who practically has EVIL written on his forehead in giant flashing letters.

I find his band quite likeable and entertaining. Ashen Priestess is (or was) the big sister, the responsible adult babysitting her enthusiastic but frustrating little sister and the Champion. I cracked up when the Champion suggested that only the wimpy Free Cities version of the Book of All Things prohibits cannibalism. I'm pretty sure that they're fighting Kairos because he's obviously, gleefully evil, not because Hanno told them to.

Warlock mutilates souls and conducts vivisections people while they're still alive. As I said before, he's basically a magical Josef Mengele. There's a major difference between being willing to kill civilians as part of a larger war and being utterly indifferent to the loss of human life, and Warlock clearly falls on the wrong side of the spectrum. He doesn't care about right or wrong, good or evil, only about his husband, his son, and his freedom to gain more knowledge, no matter how many innocent people he has to murder or experiment on along the way.

Out of all the Calamities we have a viewpoint of this far, Sabah is the most sympathetic. But her entire moral system consists, as you say, of "I'm going to look after my people and too bad for anyone else." You're right to say that we all care more about some people than others, but most of us don't let our friends lead us into invading other countries and murdering people who've never done anything to us. And if we do, then we're bad people, because right and wrong aren't dependent on who your friends are. Peer pressure is not an excuse.

Black couldn't care less about how many terrible crimes Procer has committed. He's not seeking revenge on behalf of the Gigantes or the Free Cities, and he deliberately funded Procer's civil war for the single purpose of destabilizing the Princedom so that they couldn't interfere while he invaded Callow. There's nothing "preemptive" about her planned Crusade; Praes delivered the first blow, and she's going to do everything in her power to ensure that they won't be able to attack Procer like that again.

Also, the Dread Empire really doesn't want to argue that the historical crimes of a nation should be held against it. They're the ones who crucified their way across all of Calernia before half of the world finally brought Triumphant down. If you want to say that modern-day Procer is evil because of actions that Cordelia herself admits were wrong, then modern-day Praes is in a far worse position, because they've done nothing but kick puppies for the last several thousand years.

Praes conquered and occupied Callow within living memory. They're a nation with a long history of seeking to unjustifiably invade their neighbors, and they recently succeeded in a big way. You claim that the madmen aren't coming, but a Praesi Villain is summoning demons and raising her own flying fortress in the heart of Callow. Is the rest of the world supposed to stand by while Diabolist does her best Triumphant imitation?

Black invaded Callow, slaughtered their army, and subjugated their people. In the process of doing this, he also funded Procer's civil war, leading to the deaths of tens of thousands of Proceran conscripts and farmers. Apparently, the rest of the continent is supposed to shrug and accept this, as though Praes has some kind of divine right to invade their neighbors and pour gasoline on civil wars without consequences.

Though you're entirely right to point out that peasants usually suffer most in wars, I don't see what Cordelia's alternative is. Behavior that is rewarded will be repeated, and allowing the Dread Empire to keep Callow permanently would only encourage their expansionist tendencies, making it only a matter of time before the next Dread Emperor/ess starts looking at the Proceran border for their next conquest. Any reasonable ruler would recognize the Procer needs an independent Callow to keep the Dread Empire in check, and Cordelia Hassenbach is nothing if not reasonable.

I got the impression that the Heavens were actually guiding the results of his coin flips, though. In that case, it would be perfectly reasonable to decide whether to kill people based on that.

stevenneiman

We should know soon enough who's right. If the Ashen Priestess makes a dramatic reveal, then we'll know that Black was right and he didn't really get a kill, meaning that most likely it was just a slip-up on the Bard's part or that she couldn't intervene. If the ashen Priestess is properly confirmed dead and the Hedge Wizard comes out looking for revenge, then that probably means that Kairos was right about the Bard trading her for something or someone else. Maybe Hye, maybe not.

ArkhCthuul

The whole chapter I was waiting to read a "and then x happened and (S)He died."

Phew, damn suspense...

Single I don't like ranger much and an off screen death would fit her well, I really hope its her...

green

more and more I'm wondering what the Bard's game is here. what did Tyrant see when he saw her Wish? and for that matter... what is Tyrant's "lolplanlol"? despite his deliberate wacky insane hijinks, he's obviously got one—and it isn't what anybody is expecting. is Tyrant playing Bard, or vice versa?

the thing about Worm was that it started with a small piece of a small story, but by the end the story was shown to have been far larger than anything that could possibly have been imagined in the first book. here, I think we're starting to get glimpses of that larger story, and it's going to be stranger than anything hinted at so far... and possibly much, much worse.

GOOD TIMES LOOKIN' FORWARD TO THE RIDE W0000

Villainous Interlude: Calamity II

"Who should really be afraid, between the dragon and the peasant with a sword?"

– Dread Emperor Reprobate the First

The Hedge Wizard was attempting an offensive. Wekesa was more irritated than worried, but these things had a way of growing out of control if allowed to go unchecked. The girl had used an aspect relating to conversion to survive the trap laying behind his decoy, an expected outcome though the specifics of her counter had come as something of a surprise. It had been a mistake on his part to strengthen the detonation in hopes of an early crippling: she'd made the power her own and promptly shoved it through an exotic spell formula. Proceran-derived, by the looks of it. Interesting, that. Practitioners of the Principate had been heavily influenced by the Gigantes traditions that still lived strong in the Titanomachy, though they still subscribed to the much-maligned Pelagian theory of magic. When it came to broader sorcery they were far behind Praes, but there were few their match when it came to enchantments. The sleeping spell Wekesa had used to keep the Hunter under control last year, for example, had been a modified take on an old Proceran enchantment. Removing the requirement of true love's kiss had been a stark improvement, even if it weakened the overall strength.

That the roots of the Wizard's formula were in enchanting had been obvious. The only way she could have successfully used an amount of power that large and unstable was by forcing a strict condition on it. Two thirds of it had gone to waste regardless, but the remainder had covered seven miles in search of the assigned criterion. She'd found five instances, because Wekesa wasn't a fool and he'd laid false trails. Running after the relays of false positives would keep her occupied for the moment, until a proper response could be mustered. This was, in the end, the limitation of the branch of sorcery the Soninke had chosen to master. It lacked the immediacy of more direct magic. Wards and boundaries required outside factors to be accelerated in forming or a great deal of preparation. The raging dead on the walls had returned to the grave, by now, and it would be a quarter bell yet before the Red Skies were ready for actual use. Watching the scrying screens in front of him, Warlock tracked the silhouette galloping across the plains towards his second relay.

She'd chose the shape of a horse, this time. Shapeshifting had always an interesting branch of magic, in his eyes, but ultimately a dead end. It was fixed to the limits allowed by creational laws and even High Arcana could at most allow slight deviation from this. No shapeshifter could take the shape of a dragon, for one, or even most creatures with sorcerous nature. The physical and metaphysical composition was too different, and something could not be made of nothing – particularly if that something had markers fundamentally different from anything else in Creation. Warlock put the thought aside. He would return to those experiments soon enough, after this little dust-off was settled. His son had sent him promising results before Wekesa had to leave for the Free Cities showing that tapirs, unlike pigs, would gain wings but not the ability to breathe fire if infused with enough sorcery. That meant there was a qualitative difference between what lay at the heart of a dragon and – ah, yes, distraction. Warlock tapped into one of his inert arrays with a thought, arranging the runes through the medium of High Arcana.

He'd have to use his own will for this, which was unfortunate. Wekesa was aware that few aside from the oldest Soninke bloodlines and the purest of the Taghreb had as much power to call on, but it was still a limiting factor. No mage had endless power, and burning out when calling on the kind of sorcery he did would have... dire consequences. A circle of runes formed in the air above the shapeshifted wizard and locked with a hum. A hundred times the gravity should be enough to turn her to a smears, he estimated. The array triggered without missing a beat, but the Hedge Wizard's form shimmered. Instead of being plastered all over the grass she reappeared three feet to the left of his spell, human again. Warlock raised an eyebrow. That had looked like teleportation, but it was mathematically impossible. Adjusting the nature of the scrying array, he dismissed the gravity circle and studied the sorcerous trail. Ah, displacement. She'd let the power push her through the half-existing space between dimensions. There must have bled, or she would have reappeared directly outside his spell instead of drifting to the side.

Drumming his fingers thoughtfully, Wekesa tapped into another inert array. A different approach, then. Direct applications had proved ineffective but perhaps indirect would see better results. A bag of tricks as eclectic as hers would not come without drawbacks, which made it an obvious avenue of approach. Forging four runes of containment on cardinal points, Warlock crafted an inwards zone of disruption: within the boundaries, all power would be randomly amplified and diminished. His lips half-quirked when he saw the tiles she used to walk across the sky rip straight through her sleeves in their uncontrolled expansion, exploding in a shower of shards when they forcefully surpassed their capacity. The Hedge Wizard used the blood from the cuts in her hands to trace a line across her face, and to his displeasure this sealed all power on her. She ran out of the boundaries dictated by the zone, unharmed save for a few cuts. Warlock dismissed the spells, glancing at the seven inert arrays that remained around him. He could, of his own capacity, use perhaps another four workings of this calibre without being at risk of burning out.

The girl was proving to be troublesome. The Wizard of the West had wielded ten times her raw power, but he'd been... brittle. Breakable, when outplayed. This one was weaker but fluid, and Wekesa wondered if that was what she'd always been meant to be. The White Knight had been gifted an aspect that made him extremely versatile, a way to compensate for Amadeus' massive advantage in experience in skill. The Champion was apt to weather great violence and had previously been paired with a powerful healer that dabbled in offensive miracles. The fighting elements of this heroic band, by the look of it, had been crafted specifically to kill the remaining Calamities. It wouldn't be the first time the Heavens attempted such a trick, but it was the first instance in decades where the band managed to come together before core members were eliminated. A greater degree of caution on his part was advisable.

Warlock began to insert his will into an array, but ceased when he felt his relays being tapped into. The girl had found one of them, and instead of following to the next in the line was... mapping out the inner workings? He saw her lips move on his scrying screen, reading the word. Learn. Wekesa's face creased in wariness. It was one thing for a transitional Name like Squire or Apprentice to have that aspect, quite another to see it in a full-fledged Name. Ranger was living proof of how dangerous it could be, given enough time to accumulate weight. The Hedge Wizard smiled in triumph, then created another relay to add to his own system. Using that, she immediately followed the current down to his current location. Her face appeared on the scrying screen ahead of him, looking back.

"Found you," the heroine said, eyes hard.

She'd used her second aspect, Warlock mused. He could return the courtesy.

"Link," he replied.

Laws were nothing more than boundaries, and it had been his life's work to learn the manipulation of those – even the law of sympathy. This was his most abstract aspect, but perhaps the most dangerous. It allowed him to create sympathetic links between entities that, by right, should have none. In this case, one of the remaining floating towers and the relays the Hedge Wizard had just taken over. Idly tapping a rune, Warlock used his access to trigger the collapse of the tower and the power raged through the connection. The impact was brutal. Her right shoulder, the entire arm and part of her rib cage simply... evaporated. The heroine threw up blood and Warlock began crafting an array to finish her off, but she managed to whisper one word.

"Repurpose," she said.

The same conversion aspect as before, he deduced. The leftover wisps of the the tower's power – and ah, it had collapse on the city as well, though not exploded – came together like blue smoke and reformed the mass she had just lost. The result was more magic than flesh, he noted, but it would allow her operate well enough. Not a single-use aspect, then. Neither was Imbricate, which made them an even match in this regard. Wekesa leaned forward, breaking the scrying connection and ignoring the battle. She had earned his full attention.

Ride would have been a lethally dangerous aspect, in the hands of another hero. It leant a sharp increase in speed, armament that ignored enemy armour and and protection that nothing short of concentrated spellfire would be able to dent. It was wasted on the White Knight. The man had spent too long learning the skills of others and neglected his own abilities, turning an aspect that should have been a near-unavoidable killing stroke into a weak gambit unlikely to ever draw blood on another Named. Shadows hooked through the window and dug into the walls, dragging him through the space and tossing him straight through the door in the back of the house. Brushing off wooden shards, he landed one street across and through the opening watched the White Knight pulverize the entire wall in a blinding flash of light, the aspect dimming after it had struck a target. Hanno landed in a crouch as Black sent out his shadow tendrils, green eyes seeking structural weak points. Two sharpeners detonated a heartbeat later and the roof collapsed on the hero's head as the villain made for the rooftops. Better to change his angle of attack before reengaging.

He'd already baited out one aspect without using any of his own, though admittedly two of his three were less... direct than those of his predecessors. Lead strengthened whoever he led on the field, but had no real use in a duel such as this, and while Conquer was currently sharpening his physical strength and reflexes it would do little else in this kind of situation. The aspect was better fit for war than skirmished between Named, a reflection of his departure from the traditional role of the Black Knights of old. As for Destroy, it was best employed as a tool for denial of enemy abilities. Anything it could accomplish on a purely physical level could be accomplished by more mundane means he had available, and should he ever attempt to use it in direct opposition to a hero's aspect the difference in power would see him promptly crushed. Or worse, corner his opponent badly enough they would have to learn new abilities on the spot that he had no solid measure against. It was a balancing act, this, where he must carefully lead the enemy in a position where they could be killed without ever overpowering them by too much.

The most effective moment for the kill was usually when the hero had pulled out their trump card, or just after they had, and even then there were risks. Should he ever fail to manage a killing stroke then, the situation could be reversed in a heartbeat.

Now, with Ride taken out of the equation the second stage of this fight should be approaching. The moment the White Knight was put in a dire situation he would tap into the aspect that leant him the different skillsets he'd used to recover from his incoming defeat in their last duel, but this was not a state of affairs that should be approached lightly. For one, Hanno would become exceedingly difficult to contain the moment he began using these other skills. The loss of his enchanted weapon should hinder him, the very reason Amadeus had arranged its destruction, but it would have been foolish to assume the man could not produce similar results using the Light. It was, after all, the very stuff of the Heavens shaped by will. Maintaining it had to be tiring, however, and this had been a side-benefit to be achieved by getting rid of the artefact. Amadeus knew better than to attempt to win through heroic exhaustion, but slowing down the enemy was very much possible. And if the White Knight attempted to compensate for that by using his Name, well, he would be effectively hollowing out his own power and heading directly for a collapse down the line. That would be another opportunity for a kill, in Black's experience, if he was quick enough.

The dark-skinned hero emerged from the rubble without wounds, dark eyes searching for the opposition. Amadeus exerted his will and one of his two remaining corpses moved behind the shutters of an empty house, drawing enemy attention. He struck in just that moment, staggering four blades at calculated intervals. The first held by a tendril was parried when the White Knight immediately turned to face him, the second would have struck at the weak point of the greaves but was avoided by a shift of footing and the sword he swung himself was caught in hand. Mistake. His shield struck the hero in the chest, taking advantage of the weakened stance to throw him off his feet, and the fourth blade plunged down from above and went straight through the plate. Goblin steel scraped against the collarbone instead of carving it. He'd been imprecise, and so lost an opportunity for a deeper wound. Unfortunate. Amadeus gave ground immediately and the shadow-held blades retreated with him, just in time to avoid the burst of Light the hero detonated in his wound to seal it.

A costly way of healing, this. The touch of the Heavens on mortal flesh was never light, or without consequence. Amadeus could see the function it was meant for, though. If the White Knight was truly meant to face Catherine after she'd succeeded him, then he gave the man six in ten odds of winning a duel against her. His apprentice still had the nasty habit of overcommitting at close range once she'd drawn blood, and a semi-offensive form of healing like this would be damaging to her. Combined with her lack of experience with different kinds of Named, the White Knight's aspects would gain him a decisive advantage in a clash. As usual, the Heavens stacked the fight before the fight ever happened. Best he never let it come to that, for everyone's sake. Catherine was too important to die at the hands of some hunting dog of the Seraphim.

"Thousands will die tonight, because you keep me from checking the Tyrant," the White Knight said, circling around him.

Heroes did have a fascination with talking, didn't they? Black reached for the bundle of power he'd left in the second corpse that remained, watching through its eyes. Sixty to eighty heartbeats before it arrived, depending on the struggling. Running out the hourglass by talking was acceptable.

"I have no personal enmity with anyone here," Amadeus said calmly. "And this war is not of my making."

"Yet you participate in it," the White Knight pressed. "You have responsibility for this. Guilt."

"I've been afflicted by many things, in my old age," Black said. "Guilt is not one of them."

"And you believe this makes you better?" Hanno said.

"Oh, I am very much a monster," Amadeus conceded, reluctantly amused. "But then so are the things you serve and yourself as well. A mere different shade of barbarity hardly puts you in a position to lecture, White."

The hero would have replied, but Black's undead cleared the corner and the man went still. The corpse held a struggling woman in its arms, knife at her throat.

"Surrender or she dies," Amadeus said.

The man went directly for him, without hesitation. The Choir of Judgement did not suffer lack of decisiveness in its servants. A twist of will saw the woman released and she fled straight to hero and now that had him hesitate. A different matter, a hostage and an innocent in need of protection. The White Knight was not the first hero sworn to Judgement he had fought. Their kind was taught to think of people in particular categories, and during that heartbeat the hero had to readjust his assessment of her. In that very moment Black struck, blades in motion. One tendril was sent directly towards the woman's back, slowly enough Hanno could parry it if he moved there.

"Recall," the hero said.

He blurred in motion, shaft of light lashing straight through the shadow holding the sword as he protected the civilian. Spear-wielding skillset, possibly a lancer. High mobility, expect piercing strikes. No wound, but Amadeus' base objective had been achieved regardless. Now the more difficult work could begin. In silence, the green-eye man advanced.

It was getting warm out, and not just because Sabah was swinging half a hundred pounds of solid steel at the kid. Warlock's ritual with the sky was getting stronger, getting closer to what he'd pulled at the Fields of Streges. It was only a matter of time until the rain of fire began, and anybody's guess if he would limit it to just that. Captain wasn't eager to start dancing around tower-sized burning rocks falling from above, but she was no stranger to it either. The Valiant Champion was way ahead the curve even for a hero her age and she'd learned from their fight at Delos, but she wasn't used to fighting an opponent like Sabah and it was costing her. That shift in her footing, right there? It was meant to deal with something Captain's size, yes, but something on four legs. A monster, not a person. The hammer ploughed into her shield and tossed her into the wall, though the thing didn't break. She'd learned the trick for putting Name power into weapons since they'd last fought, though she used it to strengthen the steel instead of add sharpness to a blade the way most Named did.

Given another few years, this one would have been a right terror. She hit like godsdamned trebuchet and her defence got stronger with every scrap. Sabah had fought quite a few heroes meant to stand and deliver, over the years, but this one was head and shoulder above the rest of the crowd. She could take punishment like a Holy Shield and still swing like a Blood Sword. At least she didn't go berserk like the latter. Even with the Beast out Sabah had found him hard to put down when he started spasming and his body unhinged. Those people from around Hedges were weird fucks, even for Callowans. Still, tonight was tonight and not in a few years. The kid was still out of her league for now, and down an aspect as well. Sabah hadn't had to use one of hers yet, though since this was their second scrap she'd probably have to at some point. The more you fought heroes the more of a pain they became, as a rule. Putting some length to her stride, Captain moved to strike while the iron was hot.

The first hit the Champion ducked under and it put a hole in the wall, but the second nailed her to the floor through the shoulder. Didn't break bone, though. Fucking Name strengthening. Sabah kicked her in the stomach but she brought up her shield in time and it just blew her back a few feet.

"Good fight," the Champion praised, grinning through her badger helm. "Getting blood flow."

"You've got the most potential to grow out of your band," Captain replied honestly. "I'm glad we're fighting now and not after you went adventuring a few years."

"Life is adventure," the girl philosophized in broken tradertalk. "Kill many things back home. Much slaughter of other claimants."

Well, they did say the Named of the Dominion were closest to the old breed of heroes. The ones who'd gone traipsing like well-armed vagrants around Calernia, killing dragons and looting every tomb in sight. Before the House of Light had gone and civilized them, like that entire religion wasn't about licking the feet of the angels telling you what to do. Sabah had never understood why anyone would pay a tithe to be given sermons, but people out of the Wasteland did tend to get strange ideas in their heads. Captain usually left the statecraft to Malicia and Amadeus, but she did know that when it came to commerce middlemen always screwed the buyers. Why most of Calernia wouldn't think to apply something that simple to the Gods they kept to, she had no notion.

"I don't suppose you could just go back to Levant?" Sabah asked. "Leave the Empire alone. I'm fairly sure Black would not pursue if you just stuck to your borders."

"Eh," the Champion refused. "Much boring. No good fight there. Procer all peace-talking, now. You legend, Biggest Girl! Many songs for slaying of you, and drinks without pay."

Not talk about the power of friendship or justice to be served, which she had to admit was rather refreshing. There were only so many times you could get those speeches before they kind of... melded together. About half of them quoted the Book of All Things, too, and Sabah hadn't read that so she never got the references. She sighed.

"I apologize, then," she said. "Because I don't think this ends well for you."

"You much kicking of my arse," the heroine ruefully admitted. "But I Valiant Champion, not no-balls Arlesite. I stand, and Exalt."

Second aspect of the night. They were doing brisk business. Sabah watched the ripple go through Creation and frowned. Domain, huh. Champion types did tend to have those. Amadeus had been caught in the Unconquered Champion's pocket dimension a few years back and Sabah had... not taken it well. Wekesa hadn't been able to locate him at first, so they'd had to face the possibility he was dead. She'd lost control of the Beast when she'd been told the news, and woken up to a butcher's yard of half-eaten corpses. She still had dreams about that, sometimes. She'd not been that out of control since she'd been a young girl. If Warlock hadn't started carving into the soul of the hero's childhood friend to find a hint about what the nature of the dimension was, the others might have thought him dead too and that would have gotten... bad. If Ranger had come down from Refuge to avenge him, she didn't think Vale would have survived it – or anyone trying to get her to stop, for that matter.

The girl's domain was just an arena, Sabah saw. Old sunny stone with empty stands stretched in a long oval, but maybe not so empty as they seemed at first. If she sharpened her ears she could almost hear cheering and applause. The two of them were standing in sand, and the Valiant Champion raised her axe. Her movements were more fluid than before. She was probably stronger inside here, a sharp increase of everything as long as the domain held. Fit with the word, anyway. That poor kid. She'd picked her grounds, yes, but she'd also taken Captain somewhere she didn't have to worry about the consequences of going all out. It was one thing to lean into the Beast when there was a risk she'd end up eating a portion of Nicae. Another when it was just the two of them. Sabah rolled her shoulder, and dropped the hammer.

"Unleash," she said, and the world went red.

First update of the month, extra chapter! This one is titled "Dues" and it's from the POV of Thief.

Alright Sabah gets to cut loose some, I like her beast perspectives, they're always fun. These heroes had a lot more fight than I expected.

intermediarywebserial

Unleashing before Champion gets her third aspect out is a big risk here.

NerfContessa

Not to mention that fighting a champion in an arena as a monster is... A story she doesn't want.

JC

RIP Sabah? She even noted how the Champion seemed to know how to fight against beasts. Though I'm not sure what kind of monster tale ends in a gladiator's ring.

Wekesa seems to be falling into a classic story. Dropping scrying means he doesn't know about Sabah disappearing, right?

Interesting exposition about former 'murderhobo' heroes, as well as how these heroes seemed designed to take the Calamities out. The Heavens are cheating bastards!

Looking forward to next update. I expect a few of the Calamities to die there.

I hope this is the tale of Androcles and his lion, though what my associations with gladiator games tell me is that she tries to reduce the narrative weight of Sabah being another person to Sabah being a challenge. Unfortunately, she had to step in that one.

stevenneiman

On one hand, this is the power that killed a god in single combat and I don't think Champion has the power to match that, but on the other hand I think you might be right about this turning into a glory match with a big scary monster, and Sabah did seem to miss the fact that she just gave the Champion a chance to use a useless specialty.

greatwyrmgold

The murderhobo influence is clear, but a lot of classical heroes (from Heracles to Beowulf) did much the same thing.

usernamesbco

Murderhobos, and I think I caught a reference to Cú Chulainn's ríastrad.

"Sabah had found him hard to put down when he started spasming and his body unhinged."

Cpt. Obvious

Gladiator arenas are usually not a good place to be for beasts and monsters. Also remember that this arena is the Valiant Champions domain. It exist to be the arena where the Champion fights monsters and men in glorious battle to the death in front of the clamoring audience. It's where the fights always are grueling, the participants matching in power and skill, and where the Valiant Champion, though both bloodied and bruised, stands as the ultimate champion of the arena accepting the adoration of the audience. That is this domain's only purpose and as that's the only story that ever has been told here it runs deep. This is not where Sabah would want to be. And I don't know if the fact that the Champion is specialized at fighting beasts slipped her mind because of some aspect of this domain, if the arena called to her beast or if it simply was the feeling of freedom from the risk of going postal on innocents that made her release the beast. Whatever the reason I don't think it was the smart thing to do.

I think she fell in the trap of trusting to much in her Name powers rather than skill and experience. Black has been preaching this to Cat over and over. She was slowly winning as herself. She wasn't outclassing the Champion but constantly coming out on top of their exchanges.

nehemiahnewell

Things are getting worse, each of the Calamities seems to be maneuvering themselves to the point of their own loss here.

nick012000

I dunno. I looks like Warlock and Black Knight are winning their fights, to me. Hedge Wizard can only use each magical trick once, after all, and now that her arm's made of magic, it's entirely possible that Warlock would be able to use that as an opening to attack her. Remember when Black mentioned to Cat that if she got a necromantic leg, a sufficiently skilled magician would be able to turn it against her? I'm not sure what'd happen if he used Link or Imbricate on her arm to link it to one of the Hells, but I doubt it'd be pleasant for her.

Matthew

Warlock and Black are winning slow and steadily. Creation has altered heroes so they will have counters to the Calamities' "murder by numbers" toolset.

Now, I don't think the counters will work. Black and Wekesa will pull it out.

I think the people saying Ranger is going to get killed are correct.

I suspect the Calamities are going to have to "Be the Villains" and pull some raw power down to win.

But, I think that the Calamities are going to have a Pyrrhic victory where, despite winning here... the "Calamities" will be finished as a unit.

haihappen

The hedge Wizard accomplished what she was meant to: distract the Warlock. Now, the other Calamities are without magical support.

She may not be meant to defeat the Warlock, but she is the perfect match to grab his attention.

As for Sabah, yeah, she stepped right into the trap. An obvious trap. She noticed herself that he was more akin to fight monsters than humans, and she transformed into one to fight him... *sigh*

As for Black, his measured no-risk approach seems doomed to backfire at some point. Perhaps by taking too long one of the other get killed, and he loses his cool?

Also, we are missing one Calamity: Assassin.

Is Death Made Flesh maybe kept in reserve as an evil deus ex machina?

lennymaster

Matthew: Champion is female. I think it was even mentioned somewhere that White's Band of Heroes having only him as male and Priestress (deceased), Champion, Hedge and Bard as female Heroes was some kind of counter to Black or Squire.

taborask

We know one of them is going to die, but at this point it's anyone's guess

nehemiahnewell

Captain had a death flag earlier, but her lose would hurt, but not threaten the Calamities. It also wouldn't really mirror the lose the Heroes had. I'm guessing Warlock. I don't think they could survive long term without Wekesa, and he's the one who seems to be slowly be being outmaneuvered. Also it could lead to a scene of his final spell going utterly out of control, to the point where the damage leads to further problems down the road.

Blinks

You could well be onto something there. Warlock is Black's oldest and possibly best friend. He's also essentially the "oh shit" button.

Akim

You mean the atomic football

edrey

well, with captain there are two possibilities, one is the priestess is alive and inside of the pocket dimension, two she will release the pocket when the hellfire and more fall from the sky and kill her. the lost of contact is a clue. for warlock, he lost his "eyes" and using the towers that the tyrant own is a mistake, with a heroine who is lead by providence and can LEARN well that is a problem black should had destroyed the talisman and contacted the others that is a mistake for him

stevenneiman

To be honest, I give each of the Named involved an independent 1/3 or so chance of dying, including the already supposedly dead Ashen Priestess. I'm almost certain at least one Calamity will survive, but beyond that I wouldn't take bets on any of it.

Darkening

The Tyrant's comments a few chapters back about them, "Watching the wrong fire all along" and such made me and a bunch of other people think the Bard's done something to Ranger using Ash's death. It would certainly fit with his comment about making Black a wounded animal instead of a brilliant strategist if they killed the woman he loves.

Blinks

The worst part of reading these, is getting to the end and having to wait.

Soronel Haetir

At least this wait will only be a couple days instead of a week like when the first couple books were being posted.

vietnamabc

Man anyone read Champion's dialogue in Arnold's voice? (even though she is a girl)
Damn let it never be said that Heaven does not cheat, also really good observance of Sabah to compare Angels with salesman, Heaven is practically a pyramid scheme.

Kai Wingless

Personally I give her a thick Russian accent.

edrey

so white aspects are ride, recall and protect(?), no surprises there wizard's are learn, repurpose, only two for now, she is dangerous but she needs to grow champion's is oppose, exalt and one similar to lead( the one she use last chapter and captain didn't hear), she could be tricky captain losing control maybe is the clue here

edrey

Repurpose, what a mistake

Naeddyr

I bet you did that on porpoise.

stevenneiman

I'd actually bet on something like Slay for Champion. It would fit with the monster hunter theme, and would be a nasty trump card to pull out in a situation like this. I'm guessing that the inspiration thing is a secondary gubbin like the way that Willy was also a human lie detector (despite the fact that none of Swing, Rise, and Triumph could give such an advantage). In general, the heroes seem more prone to get sweet perks on top of their Aspects. Besides, I wouldn't be surprised if she could inspire others just through being a hero alone, since she's dealing with people who revere heroes the same way Basilia does Tyrants.

Mental Mouse

Not Protect... we'll see White's third aspect in a bit, it's a weird one.

nick012000

Am I the only one who's seeing more and more of the Stand Users from Jojo in the Black Knight? Not just the way he uses his shadow, but also the way he fights enemies that are stronger than him with wits and cunning.

Akim

Without going meta on who will win.

I love the way you pin down the personalities of every major character and even or especially Warlocks SysAdmin take on fighting makes him scarier than anybody else. Because with all his power he would rather nerd out than to fight.

Sadly there will never be a peaceful meeting between Warlock, Hierophant, Diabolist and her father and Hedge Wizard and the possible Wizard of the West. No MagicCon.

Maybe someone should mention the Idea to Amadeus. Every named magic user taken out without ever using violence.

stevenneiman

I just realized that Heiropphant will get a sudden power boost as soon as he meets back up with dad, since he's got a collection of dead gods.

And now I can't unsee the image of an ancient demon in a trenchcoat asking Masego "Hey kid, you want to buy some miracles? First one's free."

Haihappen

"He, wanna buy some Miracles? No? Also got some minor gods, spirits in a bottle and some grade A paradoxes. Thats the real shit man!"

Burnsy

What are the odds that innocent bystander of Blacks's is Assassin, ready to stick a knife in the White Knights back?

Zaits

Given that killing the White Knight by making him call on his Aspects and kill before he gets his second breath, too high. Thanks for pointing it out!

blitzbasic

Do we know the gender of Assassin? The only one who saw it and lived to tell is Thief, but I don't think she was specific in that regard.

OldSchoolVillain

Assassin was a shapeshifter. Possibly a case of Every Assassin rather than simply The Assassin. I can't see the hostage being assassin though – Assassin wouldn't have bothered struggling while out of sight, and also this would be an open appearance midbattle. Their skill set is better applied to eliminating wounded but recovering Heroes afterwards.

Alternatively, it IS Assassin, and the White Knight kills them after they attempt to backstab him. As I said, their skills aren't suited to open combat, and the loss of his Shadow (possibly his Scribe as well, if those theories are correct) WOULD make Black a great deal weaker by forcing him back a step and slowing him down in the future.

In her POV chapter, she saw Assassin first as male, then as female, then as indeterminate gender, and I believe as speaking with a dozen different voices as well. My guess is that they either have some kind of disguise Aspect, or that their identity can shift entirely.

nipi

Nah. Probably just a preprepared and instructed civilian. I can totally picture Black saying: "When my undead releases you run to the hero. Trying to escape before that would be unfortunate."

Unnamed goblin

Sabah: I'm not locked in here with you, you're locked in here with me!

narcoduck

Tyrant is of course absent again. This probably means he's about to win, and both Black and Bard will lose important pieces soon.

Mike E.

So we learn that Ranger has Learn, explains why she is so OP as hell...decades of using that aspect instead of just having it while in a transition name.

nipi

Ummm... We learned all of Rangers aspects back when she went to play at the Dead Kings mansion. Learn, Perfect and Transcend.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/01/04/regard/>

Mike E.

My memory isn't THAT good 😊 If I had just binged to this point likely would still be fresh, but I got stuck into the weekly wait for it in the middle of the war college.

Mike E.

Also, only 3 Calamities involved in this fight, so one more Calamity interlude that closes the battle out?

Phantom

Since it is said that the heroes are tailored to fight against the calamities.

It made me worried about Sabah was she was sent to another ring, because the valiant champion was said to fight like she was fighting against beasts and she still had her third aspect hidden too.

nipi

I wonder if Unleashing The Beast is a smart move against a hero who is experienced in hunting beasts?

nipi

Also been wondering about the hooks Malicia has placed in the Legions. Wonder if she has tried putting one in Cat? I mean she did always feel like kneeling and stuff when around Malicia.

Letouriste

Normal reaction before a ruler^^, I don't think that work on named but I could be wrong.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Letouriste

Had difficulties to start reading^^ I expected things to turn bad in the chapter:)

I think no calamities will die here but hierophant and the tyrant will grab all the benefits.

Sabah should survive this, she only used her first aspect right? I guess she will turn things around with the third we don't know and survive without killing the champion.

Assassin don't have any screen time yet so I don't know what his position in the plan is...maybe bail black out if things turn bad? Or counter the move of the tyrant in some fashion? If that's the second then he will fail.

Black win or loss don't matter much in this fight, he can't die and the danger lie elsewhere. even if the white knight die the plot don't change much. the heavens just need another hero in a few years. maybe one different from the norm, a last try.

Warlock is the most in danger I think, but this chapter seems confirm the hedge wizard is only there for hinder him and break the link between the fight. so warlock is not the target. the tyrant should move in the blind spot the heroine created, under advices from the bard.

The tyrant can't know the situation for ranger, not even the bard can given she is not in creation and the bard power seems limited to creation because we never seen her in Arcadia...for now at least. So ranger should be safe from his plan...

He plan to hurt black and black don't care much about himself. we don't know at all his relationship with assassin so he should be safe for now (didn't read the chapter with thief so that could change there).

So the possible targets are scribe, warlock and Sabah.

Warlock is very unlikely so there are two possibilities:

- tyrant kill Sabah after the fight against champion, using the distraction of warlock and the fatigue of Sabah. She seems to be the sort to die in a trap.

- tyrant kill scribe after using hyerophant like smokescreen for his actions.

Probably one death given all the foreshadowing. Black should have predicted the attempt and collusion with Bard but his information about hyerophant is wrong so that blind spot is worrying (I think scribe has been tasked with observing the tyrant and his army but her spies are out of the game already) Ps: I really like Sabah: ( I want her to have some peace out of the fights for a few years after Black's death if he dies. Maybe dying in the final war cat is waging

Letouriste

Wow I have written so long I change of POV in the middle^^
I can't see scribe dying here, she has uses in the story yet

Should be Sabah after all: / or no calamity at all be just a very big wound on one of them?

Dylan Tullos

I can't help feeling that this whole engagement is a mistake.

Black and the Calamities have lasted this long because of their proud tradition of unfair fights. Look at their first engagement with the White Knight's party; they wait for the Heroes to tire themselves out, take them by surprise, and control the entire engagement from start to finish, retreating the moment it looks like things might go against them. Even then, that fight was far more "fair" than usual. As Warlock points out, the Calamities prefer to isolate and slaughter new Heroes before they can even meet up with other Heroic Named, depriving opposing parties of essential members before the conflict even begins.

This time, the Calamities are going in against a party that has the advantage of having fought them once before and survived, with a Tyrant who's openly planning to backstab them. Black is cut off from communication with the rest of the party, and they're all fighting separate battles, unable to take advantage of their decades of experience working as a team. So far, all of them are winning, but they won't be able to call for help in the event of a sudden change.

They need to engage as a team, under circumstances they control, with a clear line of retreat. Instead, they're stuck in a situation where they have to fight one-on-one against the opposing Heroes, in a chaotic warzone, with their retreat endangered by the Tyrant's forces. For the Calamities, winning isn't primarily about improvisation; it's about rigging the game from the start, so that the Heroes are hopelessly outmatched before the first sword is drawn. Black's victory at Streges was won on the training grounds of the War College, in the relentless training and planning to create professional Legions of Terror designed to defeat Callow's traditional army.

This isn't a battle where some casualties are acceptable as long as the objective is achieved. Every one of the Calamities is an irreplaceable resource, an essential part of a team united by shared experience and loyalty to Black. If the Heavens lose Hanno's entire party, they can simply recruit new Heroes, but the Calamities are the most formidable Villains since Triumphant (may she never return). Black can win the battle, defeat the White Knight's party, and accomplish every one of his objectives, but he still loses if a single Calamity dies.

limlimrevolution

I agree with you completely about the nature of this fight being very ill suited to the strengths of the Calamities. The Heroes are specifically tailored to counter each of their specialties and fighting styles, the Calamities are being forced to fight separately, and the battleground is full of chaos. Not to mention Tyrant somewhere in the background just waiting for the perfect moment to backstab them. This is the kind of fight that the Woes keep finding themselves in, where the odds are very heavily stacked against them and they have to improvise to pull a victory out by the skin of their teeth. Black and his crew have been around long enough to know better than to get into these kinds of fights in the first place. Now the trap is starting to close in on them and I just hope that they can get out of it in time.

ArkhCthuul

Ohuh

The way this is written let's me fear for all three, sou fiend!

Also, Exalt? Given the source this now seems like a younger Solar battling an older Lunar...and that's not a nice picture for Sabah...

Shawn Panzegraf

Uhh, did you actually read the Lunar Exalted supplement? A Pre-Betrayal Lunar Exalted, versus a newly Exalted Solar would result in the Solar being turned into a fine red mist. The new Solar's only shot at survival there would be if they happened to be the reincarnation of the Lunar's mate, causing the Lunar to either go easy on them or have an emotional breakdown.

Returning to the Guide-Verse: I don't think Black loses a Calamity here. The death of the Ashen Priestess was a strike at Sabah that got redirected. I'm pretty sure what the Tyrant "purchased" with that was his new pet Hiearch.

Beyond that, the Bard's machinations have met with far too much success so far. (William's failure to foresee Cat going Sword-in-the-Stone on him wasn't in the Bard's wheelhouse.)

Even Heroes, even THE Meta Hero, can't have it her way ALL of the time. The Story of Practical Evil fizzling due to a nudge from the Bard and a villain so Classic Evil he makes Diabolist look Practical just...there's no (as the Bard would say) SHAPE to it.

What there IS a Shape for is the complete collapse of Black's intended strategic objectives for going into the Free Cities in the first place. The Calamities don't have nearly the narrative weight there that the Tyrant has...and the attempt to stillbirth Cordelia's Crusade was doomed from the moment the Conquest succeeded.

The Story of the Calamities is the Story of a unique Villainous Band. They're meant to fall in the Crusade they never could've prevented...not unravel during the B.S preliminaries. That's what the Bard wants of course...because in the event the Calamities live to fall during the Crusade, Cat picks up the torch and carries Practical Evil onward, ever onward.

The Tyrant is too damned ridiculous to be able to be the ruin of a Calamity. Even with the Bard's Monster Hunting Lessons, the disparity in skill and power between Sabah and the Champion is measured by order of magnitude. Going Arena Domain just slows the bleed, or at least it should.

Likewise Warlock...for all that he's been more taxed this battle than at any time in recent memory, has decades of skill and experience over Hedge.

IMHO, these aren't the sorts of "Villains are overwhelming Heroes, triggers improbable Heroic power-up" type conflicts. They're inexorable grindaways by veterans over rookies.

Finally, the Heavens played EXTREMELY fast and loose by finger-snapping these custom anti-Calamity Heroes into existence. Giving the Gods Below equal opportunity to get absurd on behalf of THEIR champions.

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegraf:

Tyrant specifically says that it was Bard (the monster with as many faces as stars) who let Ashen Priestess die so that she could use the power of her sacrifice. She'll be the one making the purchase, not Kairos.

I'm confused by what you're saying. So far, the Bard hasn't been having her way all of the time, or even most of the time. The Calamities beat her during the first rebellion in Callow and Catherine killed the Lone Swordsman. We still don't know what her plans are in the Free Cities, though Tyrant says that she's going to kill a Calamity, and that Black is completely unprepared for whatever she's planning.

Agreed that the Villains are steadily winning so far. The problem is that Bard knew they'd be winning, and has something planned. Her strategy isn't to let the veteran Calamities inevitably grind down her capable but inexperienced band of Heroes; it's to let them get tired and distracted before she springs her trap. We don't know what she has prepared, but she's not going to just throw a weaker team of Heroes (they lost Ashen Priestess) at the same people who beat them last time and expect a better result.

Every time Black complains about the Heavens cheating, I want to laugh at him. This is the man who slaughtered Callowan knights and peasants with Legions that outmatched them so badly they might as well have been unarmed. He's the man who systematically murders individual Heroes before they can even find their team, and he sends Eyes of the Empire to find potential Heroes and kill them before they can even discover their powers. The very concept of a "fair fight" is disgusting to Black, but he has the audacity to whine when the Heavens do their best to create a band of champions that he won't be able to slaughter.

We have good reason to believe that Bard wants to kill a Calamity, and she's not going to fight fair. Even if each Calamity outmatches their opposite number among the White Knight's party, the fight is close enough so that both Sabah and Warlock are tired and distracted. All it takes is one push at the right time, one slip at the wrong moment, and Black's little team will lose both an irreplaceable member and their reputation for infallibility. Once that happens, it's all downhill from there.

Panic

So I am starting to think that maybe all three will die.

Captain already has the death warnings since before and is now a monster on all four in a arena vs a Hero who is more used to fighting beasts.

Black is fighting his good counterpart and he already told us as much that he would die soon.

Warlock fighting someone who is a very good counter to him magic wise.

Plus fate can't allow there to be two different teams of Villains working for the same side while Heroes only have the one team. Forcefully balancing the scales and all that.

Miaow

This is all misdirection. Sabah may have death flags but she will live and probably kill the Valiant Champion. Black doesn't die to White, that much is almost certain (especially with White throwing his aspects in so fast). Warlock has the toughest fight on his hands and the fewest aspects in reserve, but I don't think he dies—Hedge will just distract him long enough that the Tyrant will do something bad for both sides.

Ranger, however, is becoming narratively inconvenient due to her nature as an extremely overpowered fighter—in other terms, she's a walking deus ex machina. So far, she's been kept out of the story by her lack of interest, but her involvement in the wider plot could only be described as "bullshit" and as the stakes rise, the likelihood of Ranger getting involved—if only to bail out Black, one of the few things she actually gives a damn about—goes up. So Ranger has to be written out somehow, or "Why doesn't Ranger just solve the plot" becomes constant fridge logic.

Of course, given how Ranger's been established, the narrative wouldn't be plausible if she just died anyhow. She could be put on a bus to some kind of extradimensional hunting trip, but that would be a cheap plot device. So my bet is that while Black is obnubilated with the Free Cities, the Bard's plan is to eliminate the most dangerous of the Calamities, who is also the one Black least expects to be in danger, and of course, the one whose death will hit him hardest, since they're lovers.

In addition, Ranger dying in Summer is likely because it has to be the Squire who fights the final confrontation with the Queen of Summer in Creation to close that story, not Ranger killing the Queen in Arcadia. Also, what Ranger is doing is fundamentally foolhardy—she expects to pull through because her entire role is about getting stronger the stronger her opponents are, but Bard has pulled some strings behind the scenes so that her Learn-Perfect-Transcend powerup won't be enough this time.

Ranger being the Bard's kill is the best match, I think, in terms of both Catherine's story and the Tyrant's PoV we had. The only other possibility, I think, is Assassin being killed off somehow, but that would seem random. The Calamity who dies is definitely going to be one Black doesn't expect, not one he took a calculated risk with.

lennymaster

I would agree with you on all points, but Ranger is also the least likable of the Calamities. Even Assassin, while there is little to be seen of him yet, has the wierd charm of killing his targets in such humrous and humiliating ways going for him.

Shawn Panzegraf

@Dylan: I'll have to disagree with you about the Bard having her own way. As I said, William's failure to protect the Angel of Mind Rape until it could manifest was just that, HIS failure. Every step along the way, the Heroes danced along to the Bard's tune.

As a Bardic Hero, the W.B is essentially a general. She doesn't possess the means to remain materially involved once the planning is over and the outcome of the battle has to be left in the hands of her subordinates following her plan(s). So far, the Bard has been able to get pretty much every Hero she comes in contact with to follow her directions, with few if any questions asked.

As for the Black Knight slaughtering peasants and hopelessly outmatched troops, I would respectfully point out that the residents of the Kingdom of Callow were the ones doing the slaughtering of Praesi, generation after generation after generation. Callowan Knights broke Legion lines so regularly that when a single Legion finally managed to retain cohesion in the face of repeated heavy cavalry charges, they gained enduring fame throughout the Empire for doing so.

In this last Chapter alone, Warlock mentions the Wizard of the West had TEN TIMES more power than him or Hedge Wizard. The Conquest wasn't some effortless rolling over of Callow. Callow kept on doing things the way they always had, while Black redesigned the entire Praesi war machine from square one up. Even then, Praes didn't overpower Callow. They beat them via superior tactics and strategy.

As for Black killing Heroes before they can get their feet under them, and his apparent dislike for fair fights, the reason is brutally simple. The Heavens NEVER fight fair. Hanno is described as having "more than ten times as much raw power" as Black. Hedge Wizard spits on the very idea of magic being an intellectually intensive practice in a field so vast that true mastery can come only via specialization. Instead she can blithely whip out literally ANY spell effect her little heart desires once a day. That's not even a hard limitation for Hedge Wizard, as she demonstrated while evading Warlock's energy-dragons using small variations on spells to get around the "Once Per Day Rule." The Champion has already DOUBLED in strength just since hers and Captain's last fight a few weeks earlier.

As if the Villains being flatly outclassed in terms of raw power every single time by Heroes isn't enough, Heroes can do things like learn in a day and a night a skill that would take a Villain decades to master. Hell, as Hanno so crassly demonstrated all a Hero has to do to invoke invincibility is commit a heroic act that should result in the hero's death 100% of the time.

Villains come to every single fight outclassed in every material way...Even then, the SINGLE material advantage they have that Heroes don't (remaining in their physical prime until slain) can be turned against them. If they employ so much skill it utterly blows the doors of the Heroes immediately, Heroes invariably rise from their beating, wipe off their bloody lips, quote the Book of All Things...and then roundly annihilate the Villains due to a sudden inexplicable power-up.

In a world where what passes for natural law decrees "Every tangible advantage shall ALWAYS lay with the Heroic Named" nothing a Villain is capable of can be construed as actual cheating.

The Heavens never, EVER send their Heroes forth to do battle without first cheating for them in every conceivable way.

With Hanno, we're even seeing the Heavens violate the one territory where it was possible for a Villain to gain superiority over a Hero. Skill and Experience. One RECALL Aspect, and Hanno can call on the skills and powers of any of a thousand different Heroes. Hell, Hanno doesn't even have to pick a single Hero to emulate. Instead, he's able to switch from one to the next like flipping a switch at combat-speeds.

Black's complaints aren't "whining." I'd be pissed too if I'd redesigned the very Modus Operandi of Evil itself, and the Heavens just shrug, snap their fingers and POOF...Instant Squad of Customized Calamity-Killers. Reality itself bends at greater than ninety degree angles to keep the advantage with Good.

Which, incidentally, is why I believe the existence of a truly courageous Hero is flatly impossible in the Guide-Verse. It doesn't take courage to join the side that will bend reality at every turn to make things come out golden for you. Killing immature Heroes isn't cheating. It's eliminating cheating reality-benders before they figure out to start really bending reality in absurd ways.

"It doesn't take courage to join the side that will bend reality at every turn to make things come out golden for you. "

Except for the part where the last dozen or so people to join that side got killed by the Calamities without accomplishing anything meaningful. Did you forget that part? The entire reason that Cat decided to go with Team Evil instead of adding her body to the pile of dead heroes? The "bending reality" isn't anywhere near as powerful or effective as you make it sound – it just keeps it from being an outright curbstomp.

And it's not like it's exclusive to the Heavens either. Evil can accomplish pretty much anything so long as they call it "the first step of my evil plan." And Cat has made a career out of twisting heroic tropes to Evil's advantage (Struggle was as much of a "heroic second wind" as we've seen any of the actual heroes get.)

Also, I'd take the Calamities' internal monologues on what heroes are like with a grain of salt. Of **course** they're going to think that it's unfair whenever the Heroes give them a challenge. Because they're obviously perfect and free of weaknesses, so the heroes **must** be cheating, right? Nobody's ever gotten a second wind or attempted to change tactics in a real fight, ever. /s

It's not cheating, it's just having a Name. Anyone who has a Name gets three free cheats, plus extra cheats whenever the audience is feeling sympathetic. Heroes are just better at getting audience sympathy, because they're, you know, **not evil.**

It only became stopping the Villians from curbstomping the Heroes since Black and Malicia created practical Evil, before that the only time the Villians actually won was with Triumphant (may she never return) and that led to a crusade that saw Preas damaged to a point it did not recover for generations.

And all of this still leaves the ridiculous power advantage, their absurd magical weapons (wich always fail or turn against the Vilians that try to wield any at the most inopportune time possible), the Heroes inexplicable powerups and practical invincibility in the face of absolut Bravery/Stupidity.

And no, it does not take any bravery in the Guidverse to be a Hero, not because of golden luck, but rather because of their UNQUESTIONABLE, HEAVENMANDATED MORAL SUPERIORITY.

No questioning of ones purpose or righteousness, no questioning of sacrifices made or caused. Yes they feel bad for a time, they scream to the Heavens: "WHY!?", but in the end some angel, another Hero, some random/wierdly wise old geezer/merchant/smith/guard/healer or just strait up friggin Bard show up and assure the Hero they are doing the right thing/sacrifices are unavoidable/war is war/ the Villian would cause much worse destruction if left unstopped or the most cheat of all answeres, "Then do better next time!", and boom the Hero can continue on as before reasured and unshackable in their goal.

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegrab:

When I get my own way, I usually get something I want. Bard hasn't gotten a free Callow, and she hasn't killed any Calamities (yet). Nice as it is for her to be able to get Heroes to dance to her tune, winning requires those Heroes to beat the Villains. As of now, none of the Hero parties that she's supported have actually won.

I'm somewhat confused by your statement that Callowans have been slaughtering Praesi for generations. Well, yes, when the Legions of Doom invaded Callow, the Callowans did slaughter them, in the same way that homeowners would shoot an invader who broke in and charged them with an axe. It's called "self-defense".

In any case, I wasn't criticizing Black for using the resources he had available to set up one-sided and brutally "unfair" conflicts. I was criticizing him for the obvious hypocrisy involved in hating the Gods for being "unfair" to the poor, persecuted Villains while he himself has made a career out of being "unfair" to the isolated rookie Heroes he puts down before they even have a chance to learn how to use their powers properly. Obviously, the Gods are going to use every tool at their disposal to ensure the victory of their chosen champions, just as Black uses every tool at his disposal to ensure the victory of the Calamities. The fact that they have more tools does not make them horrible, horrible monsters, no matter how much Black whines about it. (Their apparent fondness for Mass Brainwashing does make them horrible, horrible monsters, but that's not what Black is complaining about.)

Black beat Callow because he had a better army and a better team of Named. Callow traditionally beat Praes because they had better armies and better teams of Named. The Dread Empire's addiction to fielding incompetent hordes and making overly complicated plans is not Callow's fault, and they're not somehow "cheating" for taking advantage of Praesi stupidity. Defending your home from an invading army is not a crime.

Warlock says that the Wizard of the West had ten times more power than Hedge Wizard. That doesn't mean he had ten times more power than Warlock, who obviously has more juice than Hedge. We don't see her raising armies of the dead or blowing up floating castles with a single spell, do we? We don't know whether the Wizard of the West was stronger than Warlock, but it clearly didn't help him, since Warlock outmaneuvered the Wizard and destroyed him at Streges. Notably, Warlock doesn't spend all of his time complaining about how he can't possibly beat the mean overpowered Hedge Wizard, who can perform any spell once a day. He just gets down to beating her.

When Black faces Callow's rebellion in Book I, he assembles overwhelming forces, calls upon the assistance of veteran Named that the Callowans have no possible answer for, and utterly defeats the rebels without fighting a single battle in the field. From the perspective of a peasant going up against the Carrion Lord, Black might as well be a God Below for all the chance they had of winning. Does Black send most of his Legions home so that they can have a decent chance? Does he fight powerless and blindfolded so that some peasant with granddad's old spear might actually kill him? No, because Black isn't an idiot. Neither are the Gods Above. Both of them are evil with a small e, but they all understand that war is not a game and that there are no prizes for good sports.

I was going to respond to your last point at more length, but I see beleester beat me to it. How many Heroes does Black have to kill before he stops whining? He's been on top for twenty years, he's filled entire graveyards with the Named who tried to free Callow, and he's created the most powerful Dread Empire since Triumphant (may she never return). Things didn't come out "golden" for the amateur Heroes the Calamities massacred, and it took extraordinary courage to even take up the mantle of a Name, knowing that the boogeyman was going to come for you the moment you did. I think that you just refuse to give Heroes credit for anything, no matter how much they deserve it, because you agree with Black that they're "cheating". All I can say is that if they paid money for those nasty reality-bending cheat codes, then they deserve a refund.

The Gods Above have done some legitimately awful things. Their angels mind control entire cities, and they deliberately sabotaged Praes's agriculture and population growth to drive future conflict. However, they are not somehow "bad" for ensuring that the Heroes who serve them are as well-equipped as possible to survive and win, and their Heroes are not "bad" for taking full advantage of the resources they have. If I was in a war, and I had powers that allowed me to fight more experienced enemies, I would use them as extensively as possible. When my enemies complained that it was somehow wrong for me to use my cheaty reality-bending powers, I would laugh at them.

War does not destroy the concepts of right and wrong. It does, however, destroy the concept of "cheating". William is wrong to use angelic brain bleach on an entire city. He is not wrong to fight Catherine with a magic sword or super healing powers. William has a job to do, and he's going to do it as best he can. If Catherine is angry over the fact that he gets more help from the Gods Above than Catherine does from Those Below, maybe she should have signed up with the other team.

She dislikes the fact that he has those powers. Guess what, Catherine? You're ridiculously OP compared to the vast, vast majority of people in Calernia, and you've never listened to a single complaint about how wrong it is for a young girl to get all of these advantages just because she has a Name. You can't turn around now and insist that all of your special powers are wonderful and righteous, but that horrible Lone Swordsman is just terrible for having more than you. It's like listening to someone who inherited a hundred million dollars insisting that it's those awful billionaires who are preventing us from having a more equal society.

He wasn't complaining about the heroes using unfair tactics, he was complaining about how Good had an unfair advantage, and that heroes got what they got for free.

For a better comparison, imagine if you were a master of video games, but were poor. You started playing some "free to play" MMO, and reached a level of skill completely unmatched by anyone else on the server. Now imagine that every day you had to struggle to beat incompetent noobs because they were willing to spend money on pay-to-win features you can't afford, and you know that one day you'll lose a fight, and with it all the respect you've earned as the best fighter in the game, because someone who was willing to shell out for those advantages came at you with skills that were mediocre instead of bad. And when they did they would probably say something stupid like "Git good".

Now imagine that that game was the entirety of existence, and that if you ever lost a round you or one of your few loved ones would die, probably an unpleasant death. That's what Black is complaining about.

I do think that Black was in a culture where no matter what you did you can only end in failure so he is a little salty that the other side seems to have it so easy. You know the grass is greener and all that. Besides, as a Villain and the military leader of an Evil country, he can't just praise the other sides while recruiting so he did some 'creative reframing of the truth'. It is true that he works really hard for those victories, he just simply doesn't mention the other side's effort. Smack-talking your opponents is stable in any battle be it in ideology or sport.

I like Black a lot, but, just because I want him to win, does not mean I am incapable of seeing his faults. I do think he should have been there for Malicia – advise her and push her to stop f**cking around with the Trueblood. Not to mention interfering in other land politics too deeply is not a good thing. The Tyrant can handle it, just go home and let him do the hard work. Also, most of his friends don't really share his dream for the country. He should find some other friends who actually share his goals. Cat is a little young and a Callowan, Malicia is too far away. Some Praesi who won't be affected by Name and are not in the military would be nice – you need different perspectives after all.

Black Knight is not a good name if you want to change your country. It is too aggressive in nature and military-oriented. If Chancellor did not have treachery written in the job description, I think he should consider it. Chancellor in our country isn't the one who deals with the nobility, the Emperor did because the noble directly threaten Imperial power. The Chancellor advises their leaders on policies, logistics, and strategies. With Black loyalty, Malicia might be able to overcome her predecessor's fate. Zhuge Liang was a proper Chancellor, he can lead the troop and administrate his country just fine.

The thing about heroes is that they actually are almost as brave as the villains. It takes courage to charge the machine gun nests even if you have reason to suspect that you might be bulletproof. The thing is that their bravery is likely to get them more than a good fireworks show as they go up in flames, since the Heavens cheat on their behalf. Also, heroes usually have far less raw power than villains, but raw power is a funny thing in Creation since being outmatched is in most cases an advantage. The Wizard didn't have ten times Wekesa's power, he just had ten times Hedge's power and didn't use it as well. The other thing is that Heroes tend to be given a lot of things that villains have to earn or take for themselves, and even beyond that they seem more likely to get extra stuff, like the way that William basically had a fourth Aspect that let him detect lies.

All in all, I would describe the heroes as being like a GMPC that the GM has decided is going to win this fight, and they're willing to cheat to do it. They might even give them worse stats than the players have, but they'll make up for it with GM fiat that things go their way, and occasionally roll dice out of view and claim they came up 20. The way to win is to somehow sucker the GM into thinking that they've been winning, by a small margin but enough that they don't have to adjust anything, then reveal that you had a hidden advantage that can end the fight in one round before they can respond.

Bonesawer

I think that most people are missing that Black wins a mixed victory regardless of the outcome of this conflict. While the loss of Captain and/or Warlock is a serious loss for the current Empire, it saves significant destruction in the future once Black is dead. They are the most destructive and emotional of the Calamities, and the ones that need to go first in the sequence of Calamitous deaths for Catherine to take over with a minimum of conflict.

It seems unavoidable that at least one of the Calamities will die in the current or immediately subsequent conflict, given the weight to the Story of Catherine's band gaining (though not yet earning) their Name. My bet on the first Calamitous death is Warlock, given the recent full ascension of Hierophant. I would dearly prefer it to be Captain, as I certainly want to see Warlock see Hierophant.

stevenneiman

That... actually makes a lot of sense. I wonder if Black would be cold-blooded enough to kill his allies if he knew they would rampage out of control once he died.

I do agree with you in the hope that Wekesa gets a chance to see his son again. I think he would die happy if he could see that Masego's already taken a Name as cool as his own, and one that's only going to grow stronger with age (especially once he has a chance to raid Wekesa's lab for more miracles).

stevenneiman

Typo thread:

"There must have {been} bleed"

"but it would allow her {to} operate well enough"

"The aspect was better fit for war than [skirmished->skirmishes]"

"she fled straight to {the} hero"

"The Valiant Champion was way ahead {of} the curve even for a hero"

It's kind of interesting how they respond to the slaughter Black considers necessary. Black doesn't seem to count it as a plus or minus, Captain mildly regrets it but just considers it the stressful part of a job she chooses to do, and Wekesa is having a wonderful time unleashing the full horror he's capable of on an area full of civilians. Well, maybe not the full horror, but even he considers Dark Day protocols scary. The fact that he just casually figured "oh, slaughter unending and meaningless should do the trick" for causing a bit of chaos on the walls really brought home how inhuman the Calamities really are.

I say they go for the kill of Scribe. It would hurt the most to loose her.

Villainous Interlude: Calamity III

"The truth of monsters is that, in the end, they die. If they didn't we would have to call them gods."

– Eudokia the Oft-Abducted, Basilea of Nicae

The Beast moved, but Sabah was within it. It was not control, for control was an illusion, but it was enough. She could yet think, even with blood and heat pumping in her veins. The Valiant Champion screamed a war cry and swung her axe, but what did the Beast care for this? The enemy steel dug into her flesh, blood and fur spraying, but with a roar she bit down on the hero. The shield gave under her fangs, even with the strength of a Name behind it, and she crunched into the plate before throwing the Champion to the side. The Beast had wanted to swallow the girl whole, but Sabah knew this would have been a mistake. Covered in blood and spit, the heroine rose to her feet. She began to speak but the Beast huffed out a laugh and struck again. The wound the axe had carved was already healed, the intertwined madness and power within her growing with every moment. The heroine raised the broken remnant of her shield but a shoulder bump was enough to send her crashing into the walls of the arena

Stone broke, bone broke and the scream whetted the Beast's appetite.

The Champion was better at fighting beasts than men, but Sabah was not like anything the girl had ever thought before. Of all the Calamities, only she had embraced the old truth: if you were strong enough, even Fate broke under your teeth. Fountains of sand exploded behind her as she charged and the heroine hastily leapt onto the stands. The cheering sounded, oh, and the clapping as well. The Beast roared and it drowned out all the worlds. Claws scrabbling against the stone rails, Sabah gave when the enemy tried to use to high grounds to strike at her head. Tail twisting behind her, the Beast paced the sands of the arena and waited for the Champion to come down. The girl was catching her breath, though. Wasn't moving. The Beast crouched, then leapt onto the stands. Benches and flickering silhouettes shattered as she rolled onto the stone, rising back to her feet. The sun came down harshly, blinding her, but Sabah sniffed the air and felt the wounded enemy coming closer. Petty arena tricks.

Clawed paw rising, the Beast struck down into the stands. The arena shook. Again and again she did, until the entire wing collapsed beneath her in a shower of stone and dust and sand. The glare of the sun was gone, now, and she saw the Champion hopping from ruin to ruin. Shaking herself clear of the dust, Sabah forced her will onto the Beast. Claws closed around stones as she rose onto her back legs, tossing chunks of rocks the size of houses at the heroine. She dodged the first, swatted aside the second but was buried under the third. The Beast licked its chops in satisfaction and leapt onto the stone, shattering it and the stands beneath it. There was a tunnel underneath and the Champion flopped down onto the ground.

"Rally," the heroine gasped.

She shone like the sun and all the flickering silhouettes flocked to her, filling her until her strength swelled. Her armour was smoking, her axe shaking with barely held power. Sabah recognized the aspect from earlier but the Beast cared little for the detail. Her paw whipped out from the outside, tearing through the outer wall of the tunnel and sending the Champion flying again. She landed on her feet at the very top of the stands, where the domain ended, and charged back down. The Beast sniffed the air. Blood, blood and ruin. The heroine's strength waned and her little world with it. Sabah leapt down onto the sands and let her tail sweep a trail behind her, turning to watch the enemy. The Champion did not flinch, and followed her without hesitation. The Beast wanted to be a thing of teeth and claw, but Sabah thought otherwise. Her long legs swatted at the sands, sending up a cloud, and in that blinding curtain she struck. The heroine stood fast, both hands on the handle of her axe for her shield was long gone. The shining blade cut through the Beast's leg, but Sabah did not pause. She rolled over the heroine, and the wild joy of hearing bones creak and plate give filled her senses.

It was a wonder, that even after calling on an aspect the Champion was strong enough to throw her off. The Beast hit the wall and howled as her leg grew back, bone and flesh sprouting from the cut. The heroine's breastplate was dented, and her lips dripping with blood. It was enough to make the Beast hungry. Sabah stalked forward and waited for the heroine to charge. The sweep was not meant to hit her, just force her into the right place. Claws closed around the struggling heroine, and the Beast swung her down at the stands. Again and again and again, until there were a dozen gaping holes in the stone and only then did she toss the girl up in the air. The Champion rose higher and higher in the sky, until she touched a ceiling that wasn't and crack snaked across the firmament like it was a pane of glass. The arena shattered, and the smells of smoke and death wafted to the Beast's nose. They were in the city again, where they'd first crossed. The Beast roared, and went for the kill.

Sabah watched.

It had been a very long time since Wekesa had found an opponent this troublesome. He'd grown arrogant in his old age, it seemed. Come to believe that a mere few layers of deception would be enough to keep a hound of the Heavens off his back. This entire battle was something a tactical mistake, in his eyes. This was far from the first time the Calamities split to deal with a heroic band, but the circumstances were not in their favour. Amadeus was adamant the White Knight had to die, however, and in this Warlock was not inclined to disagree. Not as long as Masego was attached to that Callowan slip of a girl. Promising as the young villains assembled around Catherine Foundling were, they were not ready to deal with this calibre of heroic opposition. Better to crush the Wizard to dust here so she would never be a threat to his son. Crushing a rune-covered stone in his palm, Warlock murmured an incantation and watched a bubble form around the Hedge Wizard. A derivative of the effect demons of Time could have, this, at least in theory. Actual observation of such a specimen would have been too dangerous even for him, as the Fourth Hell was nothing to trifle with.

The heroine was stuck, at least for now. He immediately gave ground while weaving High Arcana, the seven spears of red flame that formed sinking into the bubble. It was a crawl, from his perspective, but it would not be from hers. The Wizard moved, inch by inch, and the bubble popped. She had, it seemed, seized the guiding flows and broken them. Unfortunately for her, that did nothing about the spears. She twisted around most, but one took hit her in the shoulder and another in the leg. That should have crippled her, but the illusion she'd replaced herself with broke instead. The heroine stood a foot to the side, panting. Wekesa frowned and penned her into what he'd come to call a quicksand ward. It didn't prevent anything, not exactly. It simply made any exertion of power or movement much harder than it should be. Against a practitioner of limited power like her, forcing a burnout was a perfectly viable strategy.

"You killed my sister, you monstrous old fuck," the Wizard gasped. "You're not walking away from this."

Buying time to cast with distracting words. He'd pulled the same trick many, many times.

"I'm rather surprised it stuck," Wekesa noted. "I suppose once in a while luck smiles on the opposition."

Her spell flared into existence. The Liessen Chisel, by the looks of it. One of the better Callowan works, an old favourite of the Wizards of the West. It had been crafted specially to cut apart the stabilizing elements of wards, but to accomplish this it did require a certain of raw arcane power. She'd chosen poorly, given the ward around her. Her spell collapsed the ward and a heartbeat later her wrist bones both snapped. She screamed, but did not stop casting. Heroes had an irritating tolerance for pain. A mundane mage would have lost the thread of whatever they were casting when inflicted with such a distraction. High Arcana runes bloomed in front of the both of them.

"She was better than any of you," Hedge hissed. "She was good."

"She was Good," Wekesa corrected. "And evidently not quite better enough to avoid the Tyrant's ritual."

Her eyes went wide. Ah, she hadn't known that bit had she? There was more than one intent at work in this band of heroes. That light delay in working her will gave him the initiative. The red flares formed around the heroine's head, the intensity of the glow they produced varying wildly. She finished her spell a moment later and the moment the power took shape all three flares exploded into a cage of red. The green smoke she'd crafted went through the bars, but she was forced to dismiss it and create a cone of force around herself to avoid being incinerated. Wekesa's spell would have fed on both of her castings, which should earn him just long enough to craft something more powerful while she got rid of it. Duels between Gifted were very much a game of shatranj, in his experience. Reacting to the immediate movements of the pieces without glimpsing the long-term intent was a good way to end up dead.

"You're not invincible," the heroine barked. "I just need to find the right trick."

The red cage transmuted into red smoke a moment later, but he placed the last rune and four bands of transparent force formed around the wrists and ankles. They tightened without any need for prompting, crushing bone. Amusingly enough, what part of her wrists that was not powdered was now almost reset from the initial snapping. Warlock could have gone for a more lethal working, but he was wary of committing to such before she'd used her last aspect. Each of them had called on two, and the odds were that the loser of his duel would be the first to give in and call on the third. His own loss, he knew, was unlikely at this stage but very much a possibility. He'd already begun to prepare an exit strategy in case it came to that. The Hedge Wizard wrapped strings of sorcery around her limbs to keep them working, so naturally Wekesa inserted a little gift into the spell and turned them into angry snakes. He felt sorcery take hold of his own limbs and almost smiled. Ah, a transfer. Classic Stygian work. He did not bother to craft an answer: the third layer of the wards on his person prevented the spell from ever going through.

"Have you ever considered," Warlock said, "that there is no right trick? That for all the gifts the Heavens have dropped onto your lap you could die here tonight?"

The blue pane of light hit her head-on, sending her stumbling to the ground, but her limbs shapeshifted into some sort of lycanthropic derivative by the looks of the hair. Interesting, considering under most recorded instances lycanthropy was a curse and not a natural state of being.

"They don't really encourage you to think about consequences, do they?" Wekesa continued blithely. "Your masters, that is. Perhaps you-"

He paused, then chuckled.

"Oh, you crafty child," he said. "You almost had me there. Almost."

Hellfire was a drain, usually, but with the Red Skies so close to the boundary it was barely an effort to form them. The smell of brimstone filled the air and the crimson flares devoured the spell she'd formed while he talked. Not one he'd ever seen before, this, though the shape had similarities to Keteran formulas. Cascading of some sort? That would have been very dangerous, if it had it the wards on his body. Instead the hellfire engulfed the girl and she dropped to the ground. Another three heartbeats before she died of it, and he prepared to counter whatever trick she'd use to get away from certain death. That was not, as it turned out, what he should have prepared for. A beam of light hit the downed heroine, and it took Wekesa a heartbeat to parse out the sequence. This particular spell was, in theory, an offensive one. But it had a central sequence in the formula modelled after a miracle, which meant... the hellfire gutted out and the Tyrant grinned, lounging on his floating throne above them.

"I have come to betray you," the cripple cheerfully said.

"Alas, I am surprised," Warlock replied sardonically, and snapped his wrist.

The throne exploded and the boy went flying. That, he reflected, had been worth the seven hours of preparation. The Hedge Wizard was back on her feet. If they thought two of them would give them an advantage, they were sorely mistaken. They'd only given him more to work with. There was a soft sound at his back and the villain turned. An empty bottle of wine had been dropped on the ground. The Wandering Bard, if he had to venture a guess. The heroine cursed and shot him a glare.

"I'll be back," she said, and wings sprouted from her back.

She shouldn't have taken the time to talk, he mused. He finished the spell before she'd risen more than a foot into the air, and the sliver of darkness touched her back. Every wound he'd inflicted with his sorcery tonight reopened and she dropped screaming. The Tyrant was back on his feet and trying something. Dangerous for his age, this one. Another runic stone broke under his grip and the bubble formed before both it and the villain disappeared. He should be stuck in Arcadia for at least a few moments. Things had grown out of control, here. If both enemy factions were on the move and even the Bard had played a hand – and wasn't it fascinating she would have had the chance to do that even with Assassin after her? – then the others were in danger. Time to wrap this up.

"Reiterate," the Hedge Wizard croaked out.

Ah, there was the third. Light collected around her body, a different take on the spell from earlier that had reformed her missing body parts. Warlock brought down his hand and the hellfire spear drove through her skull.

"Consequences," he reminded the dead heroine, and made sure there would not be enough left for a resurrection.

Amadeus was faintly amused at the notion of anyone trying to kill him with a bow when he was a known acquaintance of Ranger. The volley of Light arrows trailed behind him as he ran across the rooftops, splitting tiles and thatching both. An archery-based Name, this one. Warlock had been the one to kill the last Archer, but the green-eyed had tactics to deal with the likes of this. The shadow tendril tossed a brightstick in the White Knight's face, himself avoiding blinding by pushing a sliver of Name power into his eyes to blind them preventively. A heartbeat later he'd gained his sight back and three swords whistled towards the sides of the hero. Change. Still blind, Hanno batted away the blades with his bare hands and tugged at the length of one. Amadeus immediately cut it, forming a branch from another tendril to catch the falling blade before retracting all of them. Hand to hand fighter, if he was not mistaken. The Levantines were known for those. Black attacked again, eyes sharp. The enemy was shifting between skillsets more slowly, now that he'd gone beyond twenty. Thirty in a night might be his limit, though that was not an assumption to be relied on.

The blow dented his shield, and did not even require the Light to do so. Dangerous. Amadeus tossed the now mostly-useless tool in his opponent's face and placed his blows. Blade to the ankle, avoided. Blade to armpit, parried bare-handed. The crossbow bolt from the last tendril hit the back of the knee but failed to penetrate. The villain clicked his tongue disapprovingly. That had been almost point-blank, meaning Name power had been at work. He ducked under an open palm that would have collapsed his throat, pivoted around the hero and rammed his blade under his arm. The White Knight danced away but his bare hand was cut by one of the blades coming around. The second should have punched through the back of the knee, Name or not, but the hero deftly stepped atop the blade and flipped away before Black could cut the connection and make him fall. Breathing hard, the White Knight raised both hands above his head and a greatsword of Light coalesced. Change. Not a known quantity, this skillset. There were greatsword wielders among the Lycaonese to the north of Procer, but the Principate was ever thin on Named.

A probe, then. It was worth sacrificing his last corpse for what would be learned. The undead charged out of a ruined house from behind the White Knight and was cut down without a second thought. From too far, Amadeus noted. The greatsword had lengthened. Not something he would be unable to deal with. The Black Knight advanced cautiously, shadows stirring behind him, and the greatsword rose again. The Light flared, and for a heartbeat the shadows he manipulated were lit out of existence. Amadeus did not miss a beat, for he'd been waiting on such a trick since the beginning of this duel. The few heroes he fought more than once all tried it, thinking him crippled without his additional limbs. The moment where White was occupied amplifying the Light, he accelerated and closed the distance. The greatsword came down, longer than before, and when he sidestepped the cut it twisted and turned to a lateral blow. He leapt and his armoured boot landed on the White Knight's faceplate. The roiling Light had the goblin steel smoking, but he used the man's head as a stepping stone and leapt again.

By then the shadows had returned to him.

The blade drove itself into the White Knight's back, piercing a lung before the Light burst out and scrapped it. Unfortunate, though inevitable. He only had so many blades hidden in his shadow, and two thirds were already gone. There was limited space inside, unfortunately, so decisions had to be made about what occupied it and there were tools more versatile than swords at his disposal. The White Knight's stance adjusted as Amadeus landed fluidly on the ground. Change. Seven heartbeats for the full shift, this time. The hero was overusing his aspect. A single longsword of Light, this time, held in one hand. The villain raised an eyebrow, recognizing the stance from the very recent past. The Lone Swordsman had used it, in Wekesa's illusory reproductions of the tussle in Summerholm. That had interesting implications. The White Knight was using the skills of Named, then, as he had suspected. William of Greenbury had been largely self-taught, meaning there was no teacher, mundane or otherwise, to draw these skills from. It was quite possible Hanno was limited to heroes as well, dead ones in particular. That this could be done at all set an interesting precedent, one he would have to ask Warlock to look into.

Black let out a long breath. He was beginning to tire as well, though he'd conserved his strength as much as was physically possible. He was no stranger to working through tiredness, and how he would not to compensate for it. The White Knight strode forward at a swift pace and swung. Amadeus stepped out of the blow, circling cautiously. The Lone Swordsman had been heavily dependant on his blade, as he recalled, which was a limitation the one made of Light would only work partially around. Was it worth trading a minor wound for a more severe one? No, that was hurried thinking. The moment he began to bleed the tide began to turn. He feinted to the side and was immediately parried, or would have been if he hadn't dropped the sword. He twisted to catch it with his other hand and reversed the momentum, but he'd made a mistake. He'd taught Catherine too much, there were similarities in their ways of fighting. And the Lone Swordsman had duelled her several times before dying. The boot caught him on the shoulder and he only barely managed to land in a roll, backing away hurriedly as the other man advanced. He had wondered with the White Knight would rely on the skillset of a relatively green hero.

Hanno was not without cleverness, and unlike his first aspect this one he had fully mastered.

Still, this was an avenue to exploit as well as a weakness. Bringing back to mind the few sparring sessions he'd had with his apprentice before she left to quell the Liesse Rebellion, Amadeus adjusted his angle. Feint to the side, but he let the prompt parry pass him by. The second feint where he pretended to attempt a similar manoeuvre to before, the White Knight ignored and instead darted the sword of Light at his neck. Black caught the wrist and there was a heartbeat where the both of them were going through sets of instincts. The hero acted first, giving in to them and using a counter that would have worked perfectly if Amadeus had been inclined to continue fighting with the same fondness for close range as his student. The punch went wide, for he was already backing away and freeing the wrist. Instead he angled his blade to the side and carved into the White Knight's throat, the full weight of his body pivoting behind him. Blood sprayed out as he gave ground, closed by a burst of Light. That would have been a kill, on a lesser hero.

The White Knight opened his palm, and there was a silver coin in it. Amadeus let all other distractions fall to the wayside. The coin spun in the air, one side with laurels and the other with crossed swords. It fell back on the palm, swords up.

"Amadeus of the Green Stretch, Black Knight of Praes," the White Knight said.

The point of the sword went through the roof of his mouth. Amadeus withdrew his bloodied blade and put the full strength of his Name behind the swing, but when he touched the neck it bounced off. Something infinitely larger than him swatted him down and he was thrown down onto the pavestones. They collapsed around him, the ground shaking. Seraphim. His plate was ripped open and he was bleeding from the eyes and mouth. The White Knight was collapsed as well, a mere five feet away, but it might as well have been a mile.

"Formulaic aspect," the Wandering Bard said. "You're a little young to know about those, I suppose. Should have let him finish, Big Guy. You don't interrupt the words of the Choir of Judgement without a price."

Black closed his eyes and sought out his surroundings for a corpse to raise. It was deserted of anything, dead or alive. He got on his knees, spewing blood and shaking. She could not intervene directly. If he managed to strike the final blow before the hero recovered, this could still be salvaged. Sinking into his Name he called on the shadows, but they did not heed his will. He'd exhausted all he had simply to survive the blow from the Seraphim, damn them and damn him and damn them all. Creation ripped open in the distance and howling winds spilled out. The Tyrant of Helike fell out, without visible wounds. Amadeus closed his eyes. Solutions. Or a way to turn this into a mutual defeat, should this prove impossible.

"Well isn't this is a mess, if you'll forgive my language," the Tyrant grinned. "Your ornery friend with the spells cost me a Wish, but it was worth it to see all this with my own eyes."

He still had an aspect. His other two were done, but Destroy could still affect the situation even if he could not. Affecting a physical structure? There was a half-collapsed house close enough he might be able to make it collapse onto the White Knight. The backlash from using the aspect without a speck of power to his Name would likely kill him. Alternatives were needed. The Tyrant strolled to the unconscious hero and with a groan slung his arm over his shoulder.

"I'll just be taking this," the odd-eyed boy said. "Don't mind me, carry on."

"Enemy," Amadeus croaked. "He is your enemy as well."

The Tyrant shrugged.

"Why do you think I'm doing this?" he said. "Given long enough you might figure out a way to kill him, and it's not like this one can do anything about it. Can't have that, can we?"

He pointed his thumb at the Bard, who waved cheerfully.

"Until next time, Black," the boy smiled, and dragged the hero away.

For a moment Amadeus considered collapsing the house, but this was mere petulance. With another Named shielding him, it was a guarantee the White Knight would survive. There was a loud crack from the rooftop. The Bard, he saw, had a bag on her knees. There were walnuts inside and she was breaking them open before popping them into her mouth.

"That's going to cost me, you know," the Named said casually. "It was supposed to be Hedge, but your Warlock is a fucking terror lemme tell you. Makes the old country proud."

Nothing good could come of listening to bardic Named, but he did not have the power left to shut down his senses.

"Would you like me to tell you how your friend is going to die?" the Bard asked.

"Bluff," he said. "Champion does not have the skill or story to handle Captain."

"She's not fighting Captain," the Bard said. "She's fighting a monster. 'swhy I picked Champion. The domain, big guy. She was bound to let out the Beast in that."

The White Knight was finally far enough that his amulet ceased taking effect.

"Warlock," the green-eyed man said. "The Bard is here. I am incapacitated. Sabah under threat."

"Amadeus," his oldest friend's voice replied. "She's..."

Black closed his eyes, and that was the only moment of weakness he allowed himself. The grief, the fury, it all went into the box and he closed it shut. All that remained was the cold clarity that was his only remaining safeguard. Green eyes opened, turning to the Bard. She broke another walnut, chewing it loudly.

"You still don't get the story that made it happen," she said.

"The caravans," he said, but did not elaborate.

There was something here he was missing. Pieces to the puzzle.

"You don't speak Levantine," the Bard said. "Or you'd know their word for maiden doesn't have a gender. Meaning's closer to 'virgin'."

Lack of sexual congress alone became the qualifier, if that was true. Every caravan had a single individual leading it, he remembered, men and women of different age and origins. Amadeus did not speak any of three major Levantine dialects, or even the Baalite tradertongue they'd been influenced by. There had been no need, and so many other things he had to learn.

"Monster took the maidens, and repeatedly, so that's one," the Wandering Bard said. "Now, I needed a monster-killer and she's the closest thing we have left to one of those. That's two."

He might as well have wielded the blade himself, he thought. He'd killed her one order at a time.

"Third, I needed the monster to be the one attacking," the Bard continued nonchalantly. "That was the easy one. Love, Amadeus. Love always fucks you over. All I had to do was suggest Champion join White after the wall fell, and your dear friend stepped in."

It wouldn't be enough, Amadeus thought. They'd only fought once before, and not on that story. There lacked weight. The old thing wearing a girl's face smiled, nut cracking in her hand.

"You could say it was a team effort, pulling it off," she said. "Our little secret, right?"

He did not reply. Engaging her any further could only be to his detriment. Warlock would be coming in all haste.

"I'd say sorry, but you brought this down on yourself," the Bard said. "I could probably destroy you in full, big guy, but that would take time. And effort. So I'm going to give you advice, instead."

The Wandering Bard leapt down from the rooftop, half-falling. She came close, kneeling at his side.

"Go home," she said. "Murder your little friend in the Tower and reign until someone puts a knife in your back. You're not as good at this game as you thought you were."

Hatred, Amadeus thought, was pointless. A bias that brought no benefit. And yet.

"But you won't, will you?" the other Named sighed. "You don't negotiate."

She rose back to her feet, brushing away walnut shards.

"I doubt we'll meet again," she said. "And fucking Kairos slipped one by me, so I'll have my hands full."

The Wandering Bard looked down at him, shoving her hands in her pockets.

"This one feels like a sin, doesn't it?" she mused. "Remember that, when the gears start turning."

Arawn Emrys

What I'm taking from this is that Bard is The Story itself rebelling against Black's attempts to change it. He's reached the point where he is a real threat to the way the world works. Not just his plot with Cat, either. That scene a few chapters ago with the Praesi noble thinking about how he's changed the empire. He's managed to destroy the Chancellor, and to fundamentally alter the roles of the Black Knight, Dread Empress, and Warlock. He was actually doing it, changing the story. I'd say that Traditional Evil is something created by the Heavens as much as the heroes. It gives the illusion of rebelling against them, and the appearance of freewill, but it's just as locked into the Story as anything else.

The Heavens themselves seem to be very much against Free Will in mortals. Look at the two Choirs we've seen so far. One rips out the free will of everything in the vicinity, and the other is represented by a hero who literally refuses to make a decision on his own.

reveen

Depends on what you mean by free will. Does a rando norm trying to survive Diabolist's crazy or living under Black's jackboot have any more freewill than the Names do? Villains and Evil are defined as wanting to gain power and lord it over those weaker than them, they're just as likely to strip people of self-determinism as the heavens. Except the heavens are in the wrong because they dare do it to the Ubermensch?

Dana

And let's remember that the Ubermensch are only Ubermensch because they embody stories. If Black cared about rebelling against the narrative in principle rather than out of megalomania, he'd be like Cordelia and not be a Name – but he needs/wants it for some reason.

As for the "Free Will" point, I think it's pretty clear that neither "the Heavens" nor "the Hells" represent that. The gods that didn't believe in interference are...well, presumably not interfering. (And to the extent they have a champion, one suspects it's Cordelia.)

Dylan Tull

"With some the word liberty may mean for each man to do as he pleases with himself, and the product of his labor; while with others the same word may mean for some men to do as they please with other men, and the product of other men's labor. Here are two, not only different, but incompatible things, called by the same name – liberty. And it follows that each of the things is, by the respective parties, called by two different and incompatible names – liberty and tyranny."

– President Abraham Lincoln, "The Wolf and the Sheep"

This is exactly why I don't buy into the idea of Villains bravely resisting the tyranny of the Gods Above. It's not that I don't think they have solid arguments against the Heavens; clearly Good is not particularly good when it comes to respecting free will. I simply don't see the benefit in replacing manipulative divinities with arrogant Nietzsche-worshipping Villainous rulers.

Very early in the story, Black claims that his side (Evil) believes that the strong have the right to change the world. The Gods Above also believe this. Of course, Black considers it unfair and "cheating" for the Gods Above to use their superior powers to deny him the right to do as he pleases, while he thinks that it's natural and right for him to use his superior powers to deny everyone else the right to do as they please.

Abrakadabra

You Just believe what Lincoln said, huh? Ohink for yourself, for gods sake!

tynam

Black doesn't think that is natural or right for him to use his powers. He thinks he's a monster. He just thinks that's an acceptable price to pay.

stevenneiman

Evil believes in free will for those willing to use it. In practice what this generally means is that the most powerful and ruthless people are allowed to dominate those who can't fight back, but in theory a place like Bellerophon or even a functional anarchist state fit the bill. Overall I would describe Evil as taking free will to the extreme where it becomes self-destructive because given utter freedom certain people will choose to restrict the freedom of others. In contrast to purist Evil, Black's Evil actually forms a nice middle ground where people are allowed some freedom of expression but still given enough structure to their lives that the system is stable.

Good is about everyone serving Good, which can mean that things sort of work out in a make-the-trains-run-on-time kind of way when everything goes according to plan, but when it's challenged as Evil has always had the purpose of doing, it's willing to turn to tactics potentially as bad as or worse than those of Evil, and it does so in an organized fashion.

HandyCapped

Each and every one of you have forgotten one very important thing. Free will and the power to act upon it are two completely different things.

greatwyrmgold

Just because one side is assholes who don't respect free will doesn't mean the other side does.

Eldritch

Jeez. The 'hero' talking about how love is a weakness, and taking ruthless advantage of it. There's a story there, and it ends with the bard insane, villainous, and then dead.

While I agree that Sabah's death is somewhat anticlimactic and am a bit disappointed by how it turned out, I have another comment/question to raise:

Does Hanno/White Knight's healing actually have any consequences, as was previously stated? Because he's taken so many wounds now that he's had to heal like that, and the text before now has implied that the flesh there is "healed" but stiff and ruined and can't be healed any further. At this point, with the amount of crippling/maiming/mortal wounds Black's inflicted on him over multiple fights, if his healing technique actually does screw him over somehow he should be well into screwed over territory.

Obviously it doesn't NEED to have such consequences, as Heroes are OP and we have William's RISE example. But Hanno seems to lack a healing aspect like that, and his technique was outright stated before to be dangerous and more of a stopgap measure. His body should be covered with these scars and barely able to move, by the previous description of its side effects.

Also, I was confused about why a Seraphim can intervene directly when judgment is being passed, but I guess this is just a new rule that Black didn't know about (hasn't he fought Judgment-aligned heroes before? I could've sworn that was stated somewhere).

Dana

It's a consequence of White Knight's "Formulaic aspect", right? I don't think that was Bard joking. Maybe it means that when White Knight is caring out some essential trope – e.g., "My Name is Inigo Montoya. You killed my father. Prepare to die" – he's uninterruptible.

Which is the perfect aspect to fight Cat with, to be honest, since she literally can't not make snide remarks disparaging that kind of thing.

Byzantine

I suspect she can be snarky. It's physically stopping him that's a problem.

reveen

That. Was. Beautiful. Ice fucking cold actually. I love Bard.

jtebb2

Interesting,

I've never hated Bard more.

Sabah was a decent woman, a wife and mother, a devoted friend and soldier. Don't get me wrong, I won't pretend that she was an innocent or that Champion didn't have equal justification to kill her. I won't even take issue with Bard knowingly sacrificing the "maidens" to enact her plan. It's part of her agenda and I can respect that even if I disagree with her. What makes me despise her, what fills me with disgust, is that she stuck around to gloat. She takes pleasure in Sabah's death and she takes greater pleasure in the pain it causes her friends. From a villain that would be expected, if not acceptable. From someone who claims to be on the side of good, it's hypocrisy of the highest order. She is every bit the monster Black is and worse.

Black deals with his enemies because it is necessary to fulfill his agenda, but he doesn't take pleasure in the pain he causes on those who have not wronged him personally. Bard does, she will kill whoever she needs to to fulfill her agenda, and she will revel in the suffering of her enemies.

Long story short: If bard were a hero, then killing Sabah would be an unpleasant chore, not a delightful escapade. Since killing Sabah was a delightful escapade, Bard is not a hero.

Long Story even shorter: Bard needs to die badly.

ereshkigala

I don't get it. How did Sabah die? Not only was she winning, but the Beast shattered the arena thingy too.

Dylan Tullos

"The Beast had wanted to swallow the girl whole, but Sabah knew this would have been a mistake."

"The arena shattered, and the smells of smoke and death wafted to the Beast's nose. They were in the city again, where they'd first crossed. The Beast roared, and went for the kill.

Sabah watched."

My best guess is that Sabah could beat the Champion as long as she was controlling the Beast, but lost when she became a bystander, observing rather than directing the Beast's instincts. Beast probably ate Champion whole, just as it wanted to in the first place, and some combination of the monster-killing story and her own powers enabled Champion to kill Beast from the inside.

reveen

Sabah launched Champion up into the air above her.

And to use Smash Bros parlance, I bet Champion has a pretty good Down Air.

ereshkigala

Yeah, the air-tossing was pretty stupid. I mean, she was already smashing Champion repeatedly to the ground. Why not continue until she died? In the arena, nobody else could interfere.

stevenneiman

She's a monster dehumanized in the eyes of Fate and the audience, fighting against a noble but clearly outmatched hero with no hope of victory. Not only that, but Bard managed to finagle it into a story about that monster claiming maidens and then assaulting the city and facing a hero specialized in fighting monsters.

Terribilis the Second made it a policy to refuse better odds than that, and he was right to do so.

mupi

On the gripping hand, it wasn't the Beast/monster who killed the maidens. The story makes it clear that there's a separation between Sabah/Captain and "the Beast" This separation, while not "physical" in the Guideverse, is still an important part of the narrative; it carries story-weight – and it's something the Bard wouldn't be aware of, wouldn't be able to account for. I also seem to recall that the Beast killed a god in one of the Interludes; if you can kill a god, it's going to take more than a good story to take you out (the weight of monster/maiden/Champion is just that, a story. Cat has shown us how easily a story can be captured and subverted. What story subverts monster/maiden/Champion? How about "hopelessly outmatched plucky band of (anti-)heros escapes an overly complicated trap set by a conniving monster who has been manipulating events for centuries"? We've also already seen Warlock survive a story-weight blow. Finally, Sabah hasn't tapped Obey yet, and Black consciously made the decision to continue, even knowing that there was a trap intended for Captain. Even if he didn't know the exact nature of the trap, the fact that he consciously proceeded anyway has Weight to it, the kind of weight that can affect a Story, and he carefully arranges matters so that Captain can tap into Obey, without giving explicit orders that would give additional weight to the maiden/monster/Champion story. Therefore, I wouldn't be surprised to find Captain survives her encounter.

Having said all that, Black knows he's on his way out. If he is on his way out, then the Calamaties must be on their way out. Indeed, if 'the Woes' are to succeed, the Calamaties must be gone, or at least mostly gone (Ranger is disconnected enough from the Story to not matter, though as noted numerous times, if Cat kills Black, she would definitely be Interested again). Black knows this, it's heavily foreshadowed in his thought about "how many of his friends would he have to kill..." What better way to steal the weight of a story than turning your enemy's plot around so that they think they are winning, but in fact, each of their victories actually gains you something long term? (cf the battle between Cat and Juniper at the War College. Juniper gave Cat a series of wins, in order to gain the only victory that mattered in the end). So, I won't be surprised if Captain actually does die here.

stevenneiman

Mind you, we don't know Sabah is dead. We have Bard claim she set it up, half a sentence from Warlock, and no on screen confirmation. Not only Heroes have a tendency to survive supposed off-screen deaths.

Shawn Panzegraf

Gotta say, I hate W.B and Hanno so very much. The one claims to be a Hero, but persuades other Heroes to commit atrocities. While the other is Two-Face without the talking to himself and facial scarring.

I really don't get how anyone can think the Heroes are the good guys. Every bad thing Diabolist does Bard is a direct accomplice to by preventing Diabolist's assassination. She talked William into summoning the Angel of Mind Rape by comparing it to Eleanor Fairfax doing it to stop hundreds of children per year being turned over to the Dead King as tribute.

Really hoping Sabah isn't dead. Her conduct during the fight with Champion was anything but monstrous....

It's a brilliantly well done plot arc. Creating characters readers love to hate takes a special talent 😊

reveen

Have we been given any reason to believe the Heroes shouldn't do everything in their power to bring down the Villains? Even if their actions are unsavoury? God knows the Calamities would be willing to do things just as bad and worse, for far worse reasons. Even if Black is the biggest Cinnamon Roll character in history, which he isn't, I can't see how you can view what happened here as anything but karmic, regardless of whether or not you like it.

We see the forces of good do nasty stuff and we're all look 'oooh, how mean of them' but in reality we're viewing the story from the perspective of the ideological forces in opposition to good, and have seen very little of how the larger cosmic game is being played out.

Dylan Tullos

reveen:

Well, I personally believe that there's an important difference between "unsavoury" and "mass mind control". To me, that kind of mind "adjustment" is worse than murder; instead of killing someone, you're taking away all of their choices, making them into a puppet of Contrition who has no ability to choose Good or Evil anymore.

I'm not rooting for Team Calamity, and I do agree that the Villains are quite capable of doing horrifically evil things in the name of their generally selfish and unpleasant goals. I just draw the line at remaking people into things so that Good can have a successful Crusade.

When Good dropped the hammer on Black in this chapter, I cheered. They were harsh and ruthless, but Black finally (hopefully!) suffered a karmic defeat. But karma is what happens to you as a result of your decisions, not what happens to a nine year-old who gets drafted into the Crusade when an Angel shows up to brainwash them into repenting of their "sins" and fighting legionaries with their bare hands. Even though I want Evil to lose and I don't buy into Black's complaints about "unfair", turning cities of people into mind-controlled zealots is just unquestionably evil.

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegraf:

Two-Face's coin is governed by random chance, while Hanno's coin is directed by the Choir of Judgement. There's an important difference between deciding who lives or dies based on an actual coin flip and respecting the decisions of an angelic jury that specializes in judgement. Your criticism is only valid if you think that the decisions of Angels are somehow more fallible than ordinary human jurors; if they are as or more capable than regular people, than Hanno is simply executing the decisions of a court of law.

You make a strong case for Bard being evil; between deliberately sparing Diabolist and evil mind control, she's clearly not good in any sense that regular humans would find reassuring. (I don't think it was Eleanor Fairfax that summoned the Angel of Contrition for the Crusade against the Dead King. She was involved in the First Crusade, and the Dead King's Crusade was much, much later).

Sabah's conduct wasn't monstrous until the end, when she let Beast take over. One slip may have been enough to doom her. As for "loving to hate", I've been waiting for a Calamity to die for a long time. I was hoping for Warlock, who cheerfully mutilates souls, but Sabah's death brings us one step closer to his end; they worked as a team, and the loss of each member renders the whole group that much more vulnerable.

AbraKadabra

Hanno is worse Than two face. Two face at least trust to chance. Hanno trust in a fokkin alien to make the right decisions while he himself stnds aside and hipocritically does not own up to the decision and the guilt involved in said decision that léads to taking a life. I did not take the life, it was the angels decision, therefore it is all good. I am Just a tool, a cog in the machine, as some war criminals said in real life.

alegio

I dont think Sabah actually died, she never used all her aspects and being a diferent entity from the beast should help her a little against the story.

And damn Wekessa IS brutal.

Jago

It is possible that the Beast died, but Sabah survived. They are separated enough that thre a chance Sabah will survive even without the Beast

Jago

Actually, it can be that simply Sabah has lost control and is slaughtering everyone.

The Warlock message doesn't give any definitive information:

"Amadeus," his oldest friend's voice replied. "She's..."

Nash Equilibrium

I find it interesting that there's been so much speculation on Sabah's death, considering all the other implications happening in this chapter. The most major being the pretty strong likelihood that the Bard just started a pattern of 3 with Black. Her line about "This one feels like a sin", and the rest of the monologue strongly apes the pattern of 3 between Cat and the Lone Swordsman, with her first victory sounding somewhat similar.

Additionally, it would explain why no pattern of 3 formed between the Black Knight and the White Knight. If the White Knight isn't the leader of his band in terms of narrative weight, then a pattern wouldn't form (just like why no pattern formed between Adjutant and Thief, there wasn't really any narrative there) so White couldn't form a pattern with either Black or Tyrant, explaining why the latter doesn't see the White Knight as a threat. I'm not sure whether this plays into the Tyrant's comment on the weight of the Ashen Priestess being stolen by the Bard, but it would be a convenient explanation.

With regards to Sabah, we really don't have enough information to know whether she's dead or not, especially because there is a precedent for people being trapped in Domain Aspects for days at a time, so while we know she exited the aspect, we don't know when. Also, considering how patterns of 3 have worked in the past, and how the Bard works, it would be quite fitting for her to create a pattern where Black's loss is relatively light, so that when Black has his chance to win, her loss will be equally so. I'm making some assumptions based on the pattern between Akua and Cat here, where her "loss" in the first book was so meaningless as to not really even qualify as such within the narrative, so when she got her "victory" via Chider, it was equally meaningless. If that is how these work then that would be right up Bard's alley to do, so that Black stays out of the picture for a while, allowing the Crusade enough time to build.

Either way, I'm looking forward to the next chapter, though I'd love to have it go back to Cat now.

Tohron

Was about to mention noticing the potential pattern of 3 with Bard and Black myself. Given Bard's general story awareness, it seems like that's a known risk on her part, and her comment about "I doubt we'll meet again" seems like she'll be actively avoiding any more encounters with Black Knight to avoid having that potentially reach its conclusion.

goliath1303

I took that to mean that Black won't be meeting this specific incarnation of the Wandering Bard again.

Shawn Panzegraf

Why do I support the Calamities and demonize the Heroes we've seen?

Let's see: Black pretty much emancipated the entire Orc race. His/Alaya's/The Calamities reforms of Praes have, at every turn, been designed to stamp out the repellent "Classic Evil" elements. Malicia's most recent coup demonstrates this effectively. Akua's mother/Family have been sitting on the largest convergence of Devil and Demon-summoning capacity on the continent. By goading a coup into existence there, much of that diabolic potential for destruction was exhausted, with little cost to regular people.

Yes, Black orchestrated the Conquest. One can easily argue however that bringing the repeating waves of attack by Praes and defense by Callow to a close, he actually saved vastly more lives in the long run than the Conquest took. We KNOW his methods stopped the practice of sacrificing thousands of lives to power flying death-fortresses and the like.

Meanwhile, all we've seen from the Heroes is some domestic terrorism and LITERALLY will-less adherence to the Kill List of the Heavens.

In point of fact, the only Hero we've EVER seen do anything that actually helps regular people is Thief, with her Robin Hood-esque behavior Assassin scared her out of continuing. (And Thief is currently wondering not only if she's a Heroine, but if she EVER WAS)

Yes, Black and the Calamities do bad things...but the result of those bad acts are generally a net increase in quality of life for more people than are harmed by their actions. Heroic bad acts, on the other hand, have no such evidence of benefit.

Look at the Crusade launched when Eleanor Fairfax, the Queen of Blades had HER turn and SUCCESSFULLY summoned the Angel of Mind RAPE. MILLIONS of people, most with nothing but the divine zeal which had burned free will from their souls, throwing their lives away hurling themselves at the Dead Kingdom. Which did nothing but give the Dead King a mountain more bodies to corrupt (and is probably where he got his last crop of undead ex-Heroes Ranger took out during her last visit.)

Black & Co are at least trying to do something different. That's commendable enough in a world where, prior to the Calamities, NEITHER side seemed to care in the slightest about regular people.

Killing Heroes before they can get rolling simply prevents exactly the kind of carnage William's utterly pointless rebellion causes. (Even William as much as admitted his figurehead King, and dependence on Proceran silver gave him doubts. He brushed them aside with moral platitudes and an "It will all work out somehow, if we can just kick Praes out of Callow" delusion.)

I support self-determination. Black seems to support choice, provided it falls within the bounds of not destabilizing the Empire. (Every government in history that lasted long enough to merit a page in a history book took a dim view of sedition and armed civil rebellion, including enlightened Western civilization governments.)

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegraf:

If the Dread Empire didn't want huge numbers of Praesi and Callowans to die in an endless cycle of invasions, they could stop invading Callow. Generally, the people who are at fault for thousands of years of war and bloodshed are the ones who keep attacking their neighbors, not the people who are trying to defend themselves.

The same logic applies to rebellion. If the Praesi wanted Callow to stop rising up against their occupation, they could try not occupying them. What are the Callowans supposed to do, meekly accept the occupation and collaborate with their new foreign overlords? When you conquer a people by force of arms, you can expect violent resistance. There's something wrong about a way of thinking that insists that violence used for the purpose of conquest is perfectly legitimate, but violence used for the purpose of resistance is somehow bad or wrong.

Black is quite fond of using terror as a weapon himself; he hanged rebels before the Lone Swordsman hanged legionaries. If his opponents choose to adopt his methods, how does he have any right to object?

I'm pretty sure that Malicia's actions didn't result in increased quality of life for Procer. She poured fuel on a major civil war, leading to tens of thousands of additional deaths at a conservative estimate. There are as many people in Procer as there are in Praes and Callow put together, and neither Malicia nor Black considered their well-being when they were doing their best to destroy the Principate. Obviously, "caring about regular people" is not their priority, or they wouldn't be taking part in actions that harm so many innocent peasants.

Eleanor Fairfax wasn't responsible for the Crusade that reached the walls of Keter. That said, I find the Heavens' use of mind control just as morally depraved as you do. I just don't confuse believing that the Heavens are small-e evil with believing that Team Practical Evil is somehow good.

There's something fundamentally flawed about a way of thinking that blames the oppressed and not the oppressor for every act of violence. Praes invaded Callow, murdered entire families for the crime of plotting rebellion, and sent in noble governors to loot and terrorize the country. They provoked rebellion, then systematically murdered anyone who had the audacity to demand their country back.

You say that Black supports choice "within the bounds of not destabilizing the Empire". Translated, that statement means that Black supports choice as long as no one does anything that gets in his way. The moment they do, he reserves the right to murder them and their entire family with no hesitation or remorse. "Stability" is the traditional battle cry of every tyrant throughout history, and Black is no exception.

You say that every government disapproves of sedition and armed civil rebellion, and that's true. Every government does disapprove. It's just that some governments do nothing to provoke such a rebellion, and others invade their neighbors, put them under foreign occupation, and then get mad when the people they murdered and looted have the nerve to fight back.

Abrakadabra

Bullshit. Read again please.

Jago

Just to point it out, Dykan, you are forgetting that Praes has a very strong reason to invade Callow, one that has worked for plenty of populations during human history: they need to eat!

Praes is incapable to produce enough food to feed all his population. And the "Good" kingdoms have done what they could to stop them from trading for food.

And Procer has tried to invade and subjugate Callow plenty of times, so you are berating Praes for something while considering it normal for Procer.

Neither side is good or respects the common people, but Blak and Malice want stability and that will make the life of the normal people better on the average.

Deviant Loader

It was mentioned in the story that heaven cheated by using Bard, I dunno why but I guessed that heaven recruited some bad character in hell to do their bidding, and this therefore explained why the Bard was acting like a villain and using their tactics to fight them back instead. It also explain why the Bard was allowed to drink and engage in debauchery.

I understand that in the story, Black disliked to be used as a prop to further the story of other characters like other villains, but by reading the comments, I felt ironic that people predicting that Black is either going to die how it was going to be as a story like a mentor, or to be used in some way to further Cat's character or used as background character in some way.

Dylan Tullos

Deviant Loader:

As we see with the Lone Swordsman, some Heroes are allowed to behave in anti-Heroic ways. They don't have to be paragons of Goodness to serve the Heavens.

Also, "Hero" does not mean "monk". Heroes are required to fight Evil, not swear oaths of sobriety and abstinence.

Black dislikes being used as a prop by the Heavens; as we see, he's quite willing to use himself as a prop to further his own schemes. Catherine represents the next step in his grand plan, and Black's comfort and importance are entirely irrelevant compared to Black's victory. Villains who need to control everything and be the center of everything can never accomplish anything; once he chooses Catherine, Black is happy to give her center stage while he works in the background to ensure her success.

Jonnnnz

Ok, I have an issue. The Bard is a hero because gods picked her to carry on with their plan. She can't be a hero because she cares about people; the Tyrant made that clear. But the gloating monologue after executing someone's friend makes her no more a hero than Akua (a person the Bard never tried to stop). She's in clear villain territory on every level other than who she chose to fight (and choosing Black over Tyrant and Diabolist means that she isn't fighting to protect, as is the narrative necessity for a Hero). I'm lost here, really.

Dylan Tullos

Jonnnnz:

The Bard is an agent of the Heavens, but I don't think she's a Hero. Heroes are the actors, playing their assigned roles according to the will of the Heavens. Bard is the director, ensuring that the Story has a proper ending and that the status quo is preserved.

As long as you think of Bard as a Hero, her behavior is going to be confusing. Once you think of her as a different kind of agent, with a different set of rules and restrictions, her behavior makes sense.

OldSchoolVillain

That actually makes a lot of sense – Bards in some contexts are used by both sides, so it being a neutral name means a lot of her actions fit, and would allow her to make the moves that a hero can't.

Shawn Panzegraf

Dylan Tullos:

First: In the ONE concrete instance we've seen of organized decision-making by Angels, they flatly attempted to violate the rules because they didn't like that Cat refused to become their new Contrition-Muppet. If the Angels are willing to violate rules, and (as was said when some of the Choirs were described earlier, "Those touched by Judgment...Did not survive the experience if they were found wanting." (Direct quote)

So, Angels only support the rules so long as the results dovetail with their agendas (That's our sample size.) According to the Author, the Choir of Judgment is also willing to kill people simply for not meeting or exceeding their moral standard.

From these things I conclude that the Angels controlling Hanno's coin have no more right or moral justification to call on Hanno to kill if they're supposed to be on the side of good. They're doing basically what Black does when he dispatches Assassin after a target. If the one is Evil, so is the other.

My objection to Hanno rather than the Choir of Judgment is based on Hanno actively believing the use of free will in matters of life and death to be nothing more than "Surrendering his sword to chaos." Hanno's loss of his mother left him with a need for meaning and direction, and just like the parasites of Contrition, the Judgment Choir leaped in and used this damaged man as a headsman.

Even worse, I think Ashen Priestess and Hedge Wizard might've actually been the only "Heroes" we've seen in the story interested in, you know, actively propagating good for non-Named. Champion was just a Klingon with rabies, looking for the bigger better fight. They drank Hanno's Kool-Aid and died for it.

Bard wants everything in black and white. So does Diabolist, and her mother before her. The problem is its down to shades of gray, but Bard will dip the agents of the Heavens in Evil-Sauce if it gets her the tidy black and white narrative she wants.

What I wonder lately is if BARD has free will. If so, by what premise does she actually justify all this death and horror? Even if the Heavens record-breaking cheating stops the story-altering of Black and his people...someone is going to emulate them eventually because they've been more successful than anyone but Triumphant (or more successful if you subscribe to Malicia's "I'd rather rule Praes forever, than the continent for a year.)

Shawn Panzegraf:

The Angels are at war with Black, and by extension Catherine. Right and wrong still exist in war, but there are no "rules".

Catherine is an enemy combatant, and they have the right and duty to kill her if they can manage it. I object to the Angels using evil mind control, not to the Angels doing their best to stop Catherine from gaining a huge victory for Team Practical Evil.

If you're arguing that the Angels are morally equivalent to Black, I would agree. That's why I think this is a story about Evil vs Evil, with both sides being morally depraved and generally terrible people. It's just that Protagonist-Centered Morality has us cheering for the viewpoint characters.

Good point about Hanno. I don't object to him judging the Tyrant, because Kairos is pretty obviously guilty, but the fact that he thinks of using his own judgement as chaos is damning. Now that you mention it, I can see a pattern of Angels using people who have lost faith in themselves, taking advantage of their desperation to create perfectly obedient servants.

I agree with you about Ashen Priestess and Hedge. They were trying to fight Tyrant, which is commendable. As for Champion... well, she's honest about what she is. Levantine Heroes belong to an older school of heroism, where the Named are driven less by a sense of justice and more by a burning desire to punch the biggest monster and then drink all the beer. Worth mentioning that we don't know if she's dead yet.

Breaking Calernia out of black-and-white thinking is vital if any progress is going to be made. The underlying problem is that Black is, well, Evil. He's not Stupid Evil, but no Callowan or Proceran is going to look at the Calamities and say "Hey, maybe mutilating souls isn't that bad!". It's a little bit difficult to change people's thinking when you self-describe as a "monster". No matter how successful Praes has been at convincing people that they're not Stupid, it's plain that everyone still believes that they're Evil. How would Cordelia have managed to ally Procer with the Levantines and Ashur, if they didn't believe that Black's Practical Evil was a threat to the entire world?

There is no such thing as "cheating" in war. There are good actions and evil actions, right and wrong, but "cheating" simply does not exist. Black uses every tool at his disposal to secure victory, and so do the Gods Above. They simply have more tools at their disposal. Black is not obligated to be fair, and neither are the Heavens. No matter how much he whines about it, they're doing the same thing he is; trying to reshape the world to fit their desires. The only crime of the Gods Above is being more successful than he is.

hihihi, Archer referencing Sterling Archer LOVING IT!

Looking back at the last Heroic Interlude, Bard asked the Champion about monster stories. I missed that bit of foreshadowing.

Beautifully done chapter.
Nothing more to add, really. A whole.

Honestly Captain had so many death flags that I was hoping you were pulling another fast one on us...

Would've been hilariously unexpected if the Calamity that died was Assassin, the only one with no flags, getting off-screened like everything else he does.

Wow i didnt know that i want bard on a pike as much as Akua....

Still don't understand what exactly Kairos "slipped by" the Bard. Was it Anaxares becoming Hierarch?

Hold on — *squints* Coincidence or not?

Eldritch

Jeez. The 'hero' talking about how love is a weakness, and taking ruthless advantage of it. There's a story there, and it ends with the bard insane, villainous, and then dead.

vuthuha912

Well if anyone has to die, Sabah seems like the one with the least amount of importance. Warlock is the mage, Black is the army, Malicia is the queen and Scribe is the Spymaster. However, Sabah is the heart of the Calamities, her death would f**ck Black over emotionally. He can't win forever — there is always a bigger fish.

He made a mistake but he is not paying for it, Sabah is. It should push Black into training for a new and better generation to take on his mantle.

It is so tiring, isn't it? You and your friends did all those horrible things to win and to help your country. Yet, your team at home is busy tearing everything down while you are gone. If Black gave up on Praes after 40 years, I would not blame him. If the Calamities just retired after the Conquest, Sabah would still be alive right now. You are more than 60 years old, Black, maybe 70 years old. You should retire after the Crusade if you have the chance.

Chapter 33: Promises

"No matter how good the horse, it can only bear one saddle."
-Callowan proverb

Our march through Summer had taken a month, from the perspective of Creation. Longer than I would have liked, but still miraculous compared to how long it would have taken me to come down from Denier the old fashioned way. Juniper agreed.

"Hugging," she sneered. "You've gotten soft, Foundling."

It was awkward embracing an orc with a solid two feet on me and broad as a barn, but I put the effort in. For all that the Hellhound mocked me, her grip was tight as well. We'd not gone this long without seeing each other since the Fifteenth was founded.

"You haven't," I said. "Gods, what do you eat? It's like they carved you out of slab of muscle."

She tried not to look pleased at that, but I'd been dealing with wilier operators of late. My general was a refreshingly open book. Ratface had apparently gone mad with power since I'd suborned the Smugglers' Guild to him, but since he'd abused his power to find me a fresh crate of Vale summer wine I was going to let that one go. Pouring myself a full cup of the pale wine, I allowed myself a little sigh of pleasure after sipping the alcohol. The stuff I'd dragged with me through Arcadia just wasn't the same, mostly cheap red vintages from the south. The two of us claimed the folding chairs in her own tent, not having bothered to gather people in the larger command pavilion. We'd have a proper briefing with the others at some point, but I wanted to talk with her before Marshal Ranker and the Deoraithe were dragged into the conversation.

"You'll have news for me," I said.

She grunted in assent, sniffing at her goblet full of aragh before downing it. A sure sign this was to be informal: Juniper never touched anything stronger than watered wine in the usual officer meetings.

"Holden is back into the Imperial fold," she announced. "General Istrid and her legions annihilated the fae garrison and are now fortifying the grounds."

It was one of Juniper's little quirks that she only ever referred to her mother by her rank even in private. As for what she'd told me, I was pleased. I needed to herd the Summer Court through known grounds and allowing them two footholds into Callow would have muddied the waters. Now they'd have to come through Dormer, which made it a great deal easier to plan for them. It was shame three legions and some of the finest battle commanders in the field had to be left where I couldn't use them, but anything less and I was fairly sure the Summer Court would try to force passage. After our last scrap they'd be wary of picking a fight with the Legions of Terror on a chosen field, though. They might win but their losses would leave them too weak to be able to handle the army I'd assembled. Some days it gave me pause, that I'd become someone who could use twelve thousand veterans of the Conquest as a mere deterrent. I'd come a long way from pit fights and waiting tables.

"Losses?" I asked.

"Light," the orc noted. "It was only the bare bones of a garrison. You kicked the hornet's nest when you invaded Summer."

"Oh, I pissed them off way beyond that," I grunted. "I've got a Princess of Summer in chains, Juniper. They'll be out for blood."

"Keeping that prisoner secure is a logistical nightmare, I'll have you know," the Hellhound growled. "Kilian and half our mages had to be set aside permanently so we'd never lack practitioners for the rotations."

"It'll be worth it," I said. "Largest bargaining chip I could get my hands on short of taking the seat of the Summer Court itself."

"You assume the fae can be bargained with," the Hellhound said.

"They always cut deals, it's in their nature," I said. "And if for once I can avoid having to pay the price by scraping myself raw, I'll have no complaints."

"Devils and fairies always get more than they give," the orc warned.

"Then it's a good thing I stole a lot of their shit," I replied bluntly. "I don't mind overpaying as long as I get what I want."

I'm not going to get stuck in games with them, Juniper. I'll get exactly what I need not try for an inch more. Only way I can get away without getting fucked too hard."

"We'll get nothing if we're not winning," she said. "Don't lose sight of that."

That was the Praesi way, wasn't it? No, maybe not Praesi. The way of the Legions, Black's way. Compromise could be reached, but only from a position of strength. On their own terms. Our way, I must confess. Kilian hadn't been wrong when she'd said I had no taste to compromise when I could get things how I wanted them instead.

"Masego's getting ready for the Queen," I noted. "Or as much as he can, with an entity like her."

"The Hierophant now, I hear," Juniper said. "Fancy Name. Never heard of it before."

There was hint of doubt there. Older Names, those better known, tended to be more powerful than relative outliers like my friend's. They'd accumulated more weight over the centuries, greater legends to draw from.

"He'll pull through," I said. "Always does. But I'll admit, for this kind of work I almost wish Diabolist was on our side. There's a lot of bad to be said about the old school, but they have a peerless record when it comes to things like this."

"She might pull it off," the Hellhound said. "But whatever she gained from that victory she'd use to screw us the moment the battle was over."

"I know," I sighed. "The competence doesn't come without the rabid crazy. And speaking of dear old Akua, where the Hells is she?"

"We have no idea," Juniper grunted. "Scrying doesn't work, and the last time we had eyes on her was when she took Liesse above the clouds. She could be anywhere by now."

I frowned.

"She can't stay up there forever," I said. "She's got over a hundred thousand mouths to feed, and if she starts dragging civilians to altars she'll have riots on her hands."

I wasn't sure what a riot would look like a dozen leagues above solid ground, but I'd guess it wouldn't be pretty. Akua's mind was like a sack of angry, treacherous badgers but she wasn't stupid. She had pretty thick blinders on, sure, but I'd never seen one of her schemes collapse on its own. She wouldn't be nearly as dangerous if they did.

"Ratface says she can manage two months at most," the Hellhound said. "A guess based on what she reported to your Ruling Council when she was Governess, with the assumption she was lying through her teeth on the numbers."

I'd trust the Taghreb's judgement in this. He was a middling tactician at best but when it came to supplies and logistics, there was no better man in the Fifteenth. I'd been lucky to get my hands on him back at the College, and even Juniper occasionally offered praise of his abilities. Never where he could hear, and always tempered with generous criticism about his more underhanded dealings, but that my general said anything at all was telling.

"So now we have to guess at the where she'll be coming down," I said.

"We don't know enough about what she's after to be remotely accurate," the Hellhound grunted. "Will she be after supplies? If so, Vale will likely be the target. Is she aiming to cripple the Legions in Callow, to carve a realm from the ruins of the south? If so, she must turn her eyes to Holden."

"Or she could be after sorcery," I said.

"Legion mages don't have the learning to even try to unpack that," Juniper said. "You'll need the Hierophant to write a report about possible targets."

Then I'd need Hakram to go through it and cut out all the unnecessary parts Masego would have added, I noted silently. Odds were Hierophant would write me a damned volume with an annex twice as thick. The Soninke was ridiculously wordy, when given ink and parchment. I drank deep from my cup, mood soured.

"So we have a month before the Queen of Summer can enter Creation, if Masego is to be believed," I said. "Then another month before Akua drops down from the sky to fuck everything up, as is her sacred and solemn duty."

"Busy year," Juniper snorted.

"At least Procer hasn't invaded," I said, trying for a bright side. "And no one's unleashed a demon in a year."

"High Lady Tasia did, in Wolof," the orc reminded me.

"I can't believe I have to lower my standards lower than they already are," I complained. "Well, nobody's opened a permanent portal into the Hells. There. I refused to go any lower."

"Give it time," Juniper grinned, ivory fangs flaring.

She'd meant it as a jest, but there was too much truth to it for me to laugh.

It would be two days before the armies marched south, beginning the trek to Dormer. We were still waiting on supplies and we had a horde of wounded to deal with. I could have begun to put a dent into the pile of urgent scrolls that no doubt awaited me, but for tonight I decided I'd done enough. My body could go on, but I was exhausted in a deeper way. There were only so many twists and turns I could take before it was too much. I slogged my way back to my tent, painfully aware that no one would be awaiting me inside. I'd passed by Ratface's quarters beforehand and ignored his many requests for me to look at the books in favour of bullying him to hand me another bottle. Juniper and I had polished off the last one after she'd finished her aragh, talking for a few hours until it got dark. It still amazed me that the two of us had gone from being at each other's throats to people who could actually enjoy the other's company, no matter how much she insisted otherwise. It was rare thing for me to seek two bottles in a day, but I had a feeling I'd need another drink if I was going to sleep at all tonight. I could still smell the incinerated corpses of the soldiers I'd failed in Arcadia, the hundreds that had died at the whim of two vicious creatures beyond my understanding.

There were Gallowborne around my tent and I spent a few moments chatting with them before going inside. They'd gotten off light from the last battle in Arcadia, and Tribune Farrier was already recruiting to fill the ranks left empty by the dead. I hoped the volunteers would understand what they were in for. I'd gotten half my retinue killed because I'd been sloppy and arrogant, and while I didn't intend to ever make that mistake again there were harder fights ahead. I wished Black was there so he could tell me about his own guard. He'd had his for decades, he must have known ways to keep them safe without making them irrelevant. Or maybe he didn't. My teacher might not share my qualms about people being killed in his name, not even people he knew. I'd gotten harsher in the last few years but I was still a long way from being iron as cold as the Black Knight. There was no candle lit in my tent, but to a Named that made no difference. That was why I saw the silhouette sitting on the edge of my cot, and though for a hopeful moment I thought it was Kilian the notion disappeared when the details sunk in.

It was a woman. Soninke, dark eyes, and while shy of pretty not exactly ugly. I'd seen her before, known her under the name of Lady Naibu. Lady Deputy, in Mtethwa. My hand left the grip of my sword and I inclined my head respectfully.

"Your Most Dreadful Majesty," I said.

This was Empress Malicia's own puppet, the soulless flesh simulacrum she could use to be two places at once.

"I've already told you there is no need for such formality," the Empress dismissed, using someone else's hands.

I glanced at the flaps of the tent but the Gallowborne had yet to move.

"You may consider this a private audience, Catherine," Malicia smiled.

Fuck. My tent was in the middle of an army over thirty thousand strong. The boundaries of the Fifteenth's fortified camp were set with wards Masego had designed personally. I had thousands of sharp-eyed goblins running around. And yet there she was, on my own godsdamned bed. This could have been an assassin and no one would ever have known. I wasn't ashamed to say that it was almost enough to scare me, this reminder about how far the Empress' reach went. I set the bottle on the table and ripped out the cork.

"A glass as well, if you please," the Empress said. "It has been ages since I've tried anything from Vale."

And she knew my favourite wine. I wasn't even surprised, to be honest. Black had already told me he'd had a file about me before I ever became the Squire, and it was pretty much a given the Empress would have one twice as thick somewhere in the Tower. I poured her a goblet as well and handed it to her.

"Thank you," she said. "I hear you've finally met Ranger."

I blinked.

"This is turning out a lot more civil of a conversation than I expected," I frankly said.

The meat-puppet chuckled. It would not do forget that was what I was looking at, to be taken in by the charm and the pleasantries. I was dealing with a woman who'd hollowed out a body of its immortal soul for the sake of convenient conversation.

"Did you expect me to come storming in, demanding justifications?" she said. "The Empire is a balancing act, Catherine. I do not introduce weight without careful consideration."

There was silence after that, until I realized she was still expecting to answer her first sentence. Gods, I was exhausted. And near enough to tipsy.

"She came real close to killing me," I said. "Just for suggesting I could help her in a fight, if I'm not mistaken. She's not much like the stories."

"I am not particularly fond of her myself," the Empress said. "And not only because she attempted to talk Amadeus into running me through and seizing the throne after the Conquest."

I grimaced. I'd gotten hints from Scribe there'd been undercurrents of that in the past, but never heard it so bluntly stated before. Or been sure the Empress knew of it.

"She's a monster," I said. "Bad as the Diabolist, in her own way. I don't get why Black likes her so much."

"Love," the Empress said. "It is love, my dear. She's an extraordinary creature, I'll grant that. Her little philosophy is what drew him in, and eventually what parted them."

I raised an eyebrow. That the puppet managed to see that in the still-dark tent was another detail I filed away for the future.

"Be all you can be," Malicia murmured. "Do anything you want. If someone stands in your way, end them. If you cannot, respect that rule until you can end them."

"That's just anarchy," I said. "I won't lie and say I don't break laws when it's useful, but I still recognize there's a need for them."

"It is easy to believe your whims are the only law of Creation, when you grow powerful enough," the Empress replied. "She will kill herself sooner or later, crossing something she could not afford to cross."

"She got into a death match with the Summer Queen," I said. "I doubt that'll do the trick but she won't walk it off easy."

I was getting tired of standing up with a goblet in hand, so I downed the wine and grabbed a chair. I set it to face the Empress, sagging against the wooden frame.

"Hye always did overestimate herself," Malicia shrugged. "A matter of little import, in the end. She's remained in her little hovel in the woods for decades and shows no sign of greater ambitions."

I could have told her otherwise. That Archer believed her teacher was the best thing to come along since the Gods had whelped Creation, that I'd lost three hundred soldiers because Ranger couldn't be fucked to do anything about them. But those words I kept for people I trusted. I respected the Empress, what she'd accomplished and the people she'd crushed to get where she was, but I didn't trust her in the slightest. So instead I leant over to grab the bottle and filled my goblet. Fishing out a satchel of wakeleaf from my pocket, I grabbed my pipe as well and looked at Malicia.

"Do you mind?" I asked.

"By all means," she said. "A filthy habit, but one I tolerated in Wekesa for over forty years."

Good enough. I struck the match and lit the dragonbone pipe, taking a deep breath. Time to get to the meat of this conversation, I believed.

"I created a chivalric order," I said, and blew out a stream of smoke.

"I am aware," the puppet replied. "The obtainment of cavalry, I do not begrudge you. We've never managed to secure more horses than needed to replenish the ranks of the Thirteenth Legion without risking rebellion. But this is more than cavalry. It is a Callowan institution."

"You tried to kill it," I said bluntly. "The both of you. It failed, so I'm making use of it instead."

Malicia raised an eyebrow.

"Another decade and it would have disappeared painlessly," she said. "It takes coin to train armed men, Catherine. Their means had to be running low, especially given the numbers you managed to gather."

That was true enough, and the reason the knights had approached me in the first place. A little more honesty, then. I drank from my cup and chose my words carefully.

"I won't allow them to disappear," I said. "They're a keystone of what Callow should be."

"There lies the issue, my dear," the Empress said. "The abolition of the Imperial governorships, I can stomach. You will have to be publically given sanction for it and pay for the gain of authority, but as a tool they have effectively run their course. The forging anew of a Callowan state, however, is a different matter. In large part your people have defined themselves as nation by their resistance to outside invaders. Some of which currently occupy the country."

I pulled at the pipe, inhaled the bitter smoke and let it out.

"I've never called for rebellion against Praes," I finally said.

"That is irrelevant, and untrue besides," she replied flatly. "You've preached the destruction of the aristocracy of the Wasteland, which cannot feasibly be achieved without warfare. That is rebellion, no matter your semantics. Even if you personally never raise your banner, Catherine, you will not live forever. Your successors will inherit a well-armed and centralized ethnically Callowan state, trained at the expense of Praesi gold in the methods of the Legions. It is a certainty they will seek independence, by force of arms if need be."

I grimaced. She wasn't wrong, not entirely. Fifty years for now, if I got myself killed, I could easily see the next Governor-General call on mostly Callowan legions to give Praes the boot. And it was not the outcome I wanted, seductive as the idea of a resurgent Kingdom was sometimes. Even if they managed to win, which I knew better to assume, half the country would be ruined for a generation. And should they succeed, it would just be going back to the old cycle of invasion and death, the plague on my birthplace I'd taken it upon myself to end.

"I tried the Ruling Council," I said. "It failed, Malicia. Badly."

"You botched the Ruling Council," she corrected. "It could have been in the palm of your hand, but you disdained the methods to see this through. All the while chipping at Praesi authority by hanging one governor after another. It was a functional method of rule, Squire. You dislike Wasteland influence, but you seem to forget that we won the Conquest. I've already compromised a great deal. Almost more than is reasonable."

"You also engineered the destruction of an entire culture," I bit back. "You won, yeah. But I'm not in this seat across from you because of my sunny personality. I'm here because you want Callow to be brought into the fold without having to put down another dozen rebellion and assorted heroes. You had to know there would be costs to that."

"Then present me with alternatives," Malicia said. "I could attempt to craft one myself, in truth, but that would be a mistake. If you want to hold the power and authority you do, both granted to you by the Tower, then prove you deserve them. You are not a partner, if I have to salvage your every blunder. You are a burden."

That was harsh, but I recognized it for what it was. An invitation. An opportunity to actually become a player in Imperial politics. That wasn't the kind of offer that came twice in a lifetime. I set aside the half-empty cup and breathed out the wakeleaf smoke.

"Name me Vicequeen of Callow," I said.

"An empty title," she replied. "Your Governess-General will be doing the governing while you lead your legion."

"I won't keep it long," I said. "A few years at most. And you'll have set the precedent that the Tower appoints them."

She did not reply but studied me instead, which I took as prompting to continue.

"They have to be Callowan, that's what I ask," I said. "You still get to pick someone that won't hinder Praesi interests."

"And the knights?" she said.

"Folded into the Legions," I said. "Malicia, you and Black have occupied this country but you haven't really made use of it. You got taxes out of the governorships, but what else? If all you want is to shake a land until gold comes out, there's easier targets. You can still get your cut from the viceroy, but there's so much more that could be had. How many Callowans are really in the Legions, aside from the Fifteenth? There should be a portion in every one, even those in the Wasteland. Callow has population on par with Praes, and if you don't need to use your armies to keep it in check that population goes to fill your armies. You could get cavalry that doesn't need to eat its full weight in meat every month. Hells, you could start fielding priests with the Legions if you name someone who has pull with the House of Light. But to get all that, you need someone Callowans will actually listen to."

"And you can accomplish all this?" the Empress said. "Without breaking from the Tower?"

"Yes," I said hoarsely. "No matter who gets in my way. Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation."

On the second evening I'd ever spent with Black, I'd remembered a sermon from the House of Light. One about the really dangerous devils. How they gave you exactly what you wanted, and let you find your own way to the Hells with it.

I took her hand anyway, Gods forgive me.

PingleBerry

That...went far better than expected.

stevenneiman

Cat's dealing with someone who is viciously rational, and who has a surprisingly similar list of goals even if they're prioritized differently and pursued for different reasons. Of course, she's also just been told that this is, if not necessarily her last chance to get things right then close to it. And I'll eat my keyboard if Malicia didn't work at least one way to force Cat to do something she doesn't want to do in there somewhere.

haihappen

More Like Malicia is warping Cathrine perception and options so that Cathrine will do what is necessary to achieve what is "right" or "the only way". Without Malicia ever misleading oder coercing. Malicia and Black operate on from the same book on this one I believe.

danh3107

Real apt there at the end, deals with the devil and all that.

And another week we wai-no wait, I'm having flashbacks to before we hit the capstone in patreon. Thanks Patrons, you guys are wonderful.

Johnnnny

It isn't actually Cat that's making a deal with the devil for getting everything they want here 😊

Byzantine

Indeed. This story will almost certainly end with her Empress, or at least having held the title.

Malicia is making a miscalculation.

ArkhCthuul

Agreed, yet I think they're both the Devil and the poor drive woman dealing with him. Ehm her.

Gunslinger

We're inching closer to the 3 chapters a week milestone too.

rangamal thenuwara

Yay, $525 now. $225 more.

DroughtBringer

Nice chapter.

1shot4living

It may have gone better than expected from Cat's perspective, but Malicia still plans for her to be beaten by Diabolist. No matter how that plays out it won't end well for the agreement she just made.

lavos

I was under the impression the plan was for Diabolist to make her weapon, use it against Catherine then Malicia walks in and takes it to use as deterrent. Ideally just long enough for Catherine to take the place of it.

Pipiemman

Don't forget that Cat told Archer that she doesn't think that either Black or Malicia are in control. Meaning she probably doesn't actually plan on continuing to be under the Dread Empire, or at least not under Malicia

Evgeny

Callow has a well established place in the world order : a shield of Procer against Praesi. This is not a comfortable place. Within Dread Empire Callow has no established place, so Cat can carve out one. And since a great reformation is going to happen anyway, it is much easier than it could be.

Putting it simply, Callow's perspective in Dread Empire looks much better than independently or under Procer. This makes any attempts to leave Dread Empire questionable. But playing a political game within Dread Empire is something Cat should look into.

Dylan Tullos

Evgeny:

Previously, Callow's place was as Procer's shield against the Dread Empire. Now, they serve as the Dread Empire's shield against Procer. In either case, they will serve as the battlefield in a major war.

Callow's position in the Dread Empire has changed drastically. Previously, they were an occupied province that served as a source of food and money for the Wasteland. Now, though they're still under the Dread Empress, they have their own ruler and army, and they don't have Praesi governors running their cities. The problem with that kind of change is that it could go either way; even if Malicia keeps her side of the deal, there's no guarantee that her successor won't decide to put Callow back under Praesi nobles.

An independent Callow would have to fight the Dread Empire regularly, but out of seventy invasions, only two have succeeded. Would it be better to fight every generation than to submit and hope that the Dread Empire will continue its current reasonable politics? Fighting can have a high cost, but so can surrendering and hoping for the best.

@Dylan

> Now, they serve as the Dread Empire's shield against Procer.

Nope. Black said pretty clearly what Dread Empire needs Callow for. Food source. Farming. And to do farming, Callow needs to be relatively safe. One of the reasons Black operates in Free Cities is to make life miserable for Procer, so it couldn't try anything funny.

>even if Malicia keeps her side of the deal, there's no guarantee that her successor won't decide to put Callow back under Praesi nobles.

There are several way to deal with this. For example, number of nobles might be greatly decreased and existing Callow nobles need to marry some Praesi nobles, forming stable alliances.

> Fighting can have a high cost, but so can surrendering and hoping for the best.

Again, we are talking about feudal society. Even if Malicia tries to build a national state, it is a long way in the future. Feudal states are very loosely bound, and allow huge amount of infighting. Meaning that Callow has plenty of opportunities to carve out a place for itself in the Empire.

Being a major rich province in an empire definintely beats existence between two large states.

Dylan Tullos

Evgeny:

The stupid website won't let me reply directly to your message, so I apologize if my response is in the wrong place.

You make excellent points. There are real advantages to being a member state in an empire that isn't Stupid Evil, especially when your alternative is fighting that empire every generation. If Praes maintains a loose grip and continues to let Callow have their own ruler and preserve their own customs, that could be a deal that Callowans could live with.

However, the advantages of the deal don't remove the underlying problems. As you say, intermarriage between members of the nobility is often a valuable way of creating ties between different parts of an empire. But Callowan nobles wouldn't last a week in the Wasteland; they're simply not accustomed to a society that has turned poisoning into an art form. The underlying religious differences also make it difficult, since most Callowans would object to marrying someone who openly worships the Gods Below.

The greatest danger isn't the Praesi nobility, though. It's the real prospect that the next Dread Emperor/ess could simply declare that Malicia's changes were over. The fundamental problem of autocracy is the whims of the autocrat, and there are plenty of Praesi who would gladly support an end to the current trend of Callowan integration. If that happens, Callow would be in a very bad place, and they wouldn't have an easy way of getting out.

Also, there's no guarantee that Procer will cooperate with Black's plans to keep Callow safe and use it as a source of food for the Wasteland. Since we have "Uncivil Wars" on the horizon, the Dread Empire might not be in a position to protect Callow from Procer. In a Cold War that could turn hot, there are disadvantages to being in the middle, especially as an ally to one side.

George

Ehh, the way I remember it, it's not so clear cut what she plans, but I'll have to look back at it I guess. Her main goal there is usurping Diabolist's weapon, which Cat will certainly be happy to not have in the hands of Diabolist.

nehemiahnewell

She plans for Catherine to provoke Diabolists weapon, to give creation an example of it's use, but Catherine is still the tools he has at hand to seize it.

Byzantine

She doesn't want Diabolist to win – just to last long enough to use her weapon once.

Pipiemman

I've wanted to mention this awhile ago, but this is the first Catherine chapter we've had in a little bit. I only noticed during her fights in Arcadia, but Cat's title is the Duchess of Moonless Nights; a moonless night is the darkest night of the months and could thus be called a black/the blackest night. So her title is pretty much Duchess of Black Nights which feel too close to Black Knight to me to be a coincidence.

What do other people think? Am I just making an over complicated conspiracy theory here?

(Also like that her last aspect is the antonym of the last aspect of her first main rival. Fall versus the Lone Swordsman's Rise)

stevenneiman

I'm pretty sure the black night/Black Knight thing is a coincidence, but now that you mention it the Fall/Rise thing probably isn't.

My guess as to Cat's final title is that she'll end up with some kind of synthesis of Callowan and Praesi virtues, possibly even a combination of a Callowan and a Praesi Name, like Grey Knight. She's always derived strength from the duality of being a Villain with actively benevolent intentions and occasionally heroic methods, so it would fit for her Name to reflect that.

Two Woes already have entirely new Names, and there's implied to be a very good chance that both the Black and White Knight Names will be up for grabs soon.

Of course, she might just go with a classic and simply become the Black Knight.

nick012000

I think it's more likely that she'll go straight from Squire to Empress of Praes.

Part of the national culture of Praes is that anyone can take the Tower, if they're driven and powerful enough, no matter what their background is. If Callow is to become truly a part of Praes, if Callow is to dream the Praesi dream, a Callowan needs to take the Tower.

soonnandnaanssoon

Grey Knight is, unfortunately, a Name that is not going to exist. EE stated it in the Comments section in Villainous Interlude:Decorum.

I agree with the Callowan-Praesi culturally mixed Name theory, but apparently it just isn't Grey Knight.

If she becomes the Night Knight I'll die of laughter.

Nobody is going to draw the connection between Cat's title of "Duchess of Moonless Nights" and "the darkest night" which is what one of the, I believe, Driftwood Soldiers carried Ranger when Catherine & Co. first entered Slade. Specifically he said that Archer couldn't go any further because she "smells of the darkest night" which was exclusive by her taking Cat about Ranger stealing the eye of the Prince of Nightfall every time Winter comes around.

I think the Truebloods were basically dealt with as of "Closure". So, now we know that Diabolist's plan involves opening a permanent portals to one of the Hells, and that Cat still doesn't know how to keep her mouth shut. She probably never will, that may be against the nature of her name at this point. The mention of fielding priests of Light and knights with blessed armour in the Legions of Terror makes me think that Cat is going to break something in the setting's overarching story. Good and Evil characters can ally in some circumstances but, for Good and Evil institutions to work together long-term and on a large scale, there's some serious reframing of the narrative to be done.

Also, Malicia has to be aware that her Squire is going for her seat now, even if said Squire doesn't know it yet. There's only one person in the setting that has the power to transform Praes and Callow as deeply as Cat plans to, and do so "without breaking from the Tower" and "no matter who stands in [her] way".

usernamesbco

"Well, nobody's opened a permanent portal into the Hells."

BumblingBehemoth

This is more of a question for last chapter but is it possible that Hakrams Name could be transitional like Cats and with the death of Captain he could acquire that Name? Only thinking this because they both serve similar roles to Black and Cat

soonnanandnaanssoon

Imo, Nauk feels a closer parallel to Sabah than Hakram. Both suffer(ed) from a berserk-state (Red Rage Vs Cursed), both are deeply loyal to their respective leader figures, both have had experienced suppressing their berserk state via following orders from their leaders (Nauk in book 2 in Marchford after Nilin's death Vs Sabah as the Cursed), both are heavy-hitters. Add to the fact that the name Captain was sort-of ripped out of an Orc god, the Name sort of comes back full circle if Nauk becomes the new Captain.

BumblingBehemoth

Yep yours is better lol

crazedmoth

On the other hand, Sabah was always incredibly powerful, she had a name before becoming Captain, and she was highly relevant to the then-protagonist, Black. Nauk... hasn't really been important to Catherine or the story for a very long time.

werafdsaew

She told Malicia she'll give up the Vicequeen title in a few years, but she told thief that she's not surrendering authority ever again. So she's lying, but to whom?

RoflCat

To be precise, the conversation was

"By the end of the year, there will be no Praesi governor in Callow,"

"I'm not talking about the governors," she said. "I'm talking about the Ruling Council."

"It's done," I said tiredly. "I tried, it failed. Come sunup the two of them will be dead and I'm not surrendering that authority ever again."

I think by this Cat means that no Praesi influence is going to rule Callow, which she does reiterate to Malicia here:

"They have to be Callowan, that's what I ask," I said. "You still get to pick someone that won't hinder Praesi interests.")

reveen

Uh oh. I think Squire just fucked up!

It's very likely the Malicia already anticipated what Catherine wanted, then put on a song and dance about being annoyed with her. All so she can manipulate Cat into thinking she just convinced the Dread Empress to make a deal. Malicia just turned Catherine and Callow in it's entirety into her direct puppet to use in her own ambitions as she sees fit, while giving Cat the illusion of being in control.

It's important to remember that for all she's accomplished Cat's still a kid vs an adult who's been at this her entire life. At the age Cat was getting into back alley fistfights for money Malicia was pulling off tricks like this in her sleep. All Cat's hard edged practicality makes her precocious, not a peer.

Here she basically just doomed her ambitions for a stable Callow under Praes from the start. Praes isn't going to stand for it in the long run, either New Evil takes and Callow is gradually chipped away, or it fails and whoever takes over from Malicia burns it all to the ground.

Meanwhile, this deal basically obligates the entirety of Callow's forces to Malicia's side in the coming Uncivil Wars. I hope Cat enjoys fighting other people's battles for them.

werafdsaew

Remember her chat with Thief? Praes will burn the land on their way out if Procer succeeds in liberating Callow, and she does not want that, so she's obligated to fight Procer anyways. I also doubt that Malicia is going to be a part of the Uncivil war; it looks to me that that the Uncivil Wars is going to be about who is going to succeeds Malicia after she's killed for whatever reason.

blarg2429

Agreed. They're called the Uncivil Wars, after all— an obvious play-on-words in relation to the term "civil war."

Dylan Tullos

reveen:

I agree that Catherine is way out of her league negotiating with Malicia, but this isn't a terrible deal. Yes, Catherine is obligated to fight for New Evil in the coming Uncivil Wars, but she was always going to fight Classic Evil. And since she's going to be on Malicia's side, the Dread Empress won't object to her restoring the Knightly Orders or creating a Legion with a majority of Callowans.

I agree that, in the long term, New Evil is going to be bad for Callow. However, the long, proud Praesi history of backstabbing and civil war suggests that there will come a time when the Wasteland is too busy fighting itself to pay attention to Callow. Once that happens, the reforged Knightly Orders and the new Callowan Legions can drive the Praesi out and restore the Kingdom. Catherine may be drinking the New Evil Kool-Aid, but there's no guarantee that future Callowans will magically forget their deep and abiding hatred for the Praesi, especially once they have the strength to do something about it.

The Lone Swordsman's rebellion was morally flawed because it relied on mind control; it was flawed in practical terms because he didn't have an army that could fight the Legions. Malicia seems to be willing to let Catherine build that kind of army. Once enough Callowans have served in the Legions, the Praesi won't enjoy the qualitative advantage that made the Conquest possible. Even if she doesn't intend to, Catherine may be the person who makes Callowan freedom possible, despite her own defeatism.

The problem with the deal is that it shines a giant spotlight on Catherine and her actions. Before she had a great deal of freedom to get away with shit because she's just one piece of the political structure of Callow's occupation. Now she's going to be the direct contact between the Tower and Callow's rulership and expected to make the kingdom toe the party line. Malicia is going to want to grind down Catherine's idealism and make her more of her servant and Catherine can't do a thing against it because now if she's pushes back against the Tower then all of Callow is pushing back against it.

Catherine was better off trying to make the system work as just a disciple of Black, building up her reputation and slowly infecting the system with her agents until Malicia's position becomes less stable and Catherine can take power easier. This is too much too fast and I genuinely don't think it's occurred to Catherine that her ambitions would need decades and decades to achieve like it did with the Empress herself.

Also, I suspect that if Malicia survives to fight the Uncivil Wars or the Crusade she's going to try to use Callow as a bulwark and Catherine as her attack, and in the process grind down Callow's population, armies, and resources

Evgeny

I think you mix Callow culture and Callow state. Cat doesn't give a damn about the second, and rightfully so – states are in a constant state of flux in feudal settings and doubly so in fantasy feudal setting. Callow culture, on the other hand, is something Cat want to preserve, and Malicia doesn't have much objections against it. In fact, Callow culture, with less emphasis on backstabbing, might be preferable for Malicia.

Admittedly, Malicia wants Callow culture to change so it better suited Praes political structure. But again, cultures always change, and fitting into Dread Empire is not a bad deal on its own.

Dylan Tullos

reveen:

You're right, there are big costs associated with being Vicequeen. Catherine won't have nearly the same freedom of action that she had before. But that's a natural consequence of acquiring more power.

As a disciple of Black, Catherine couldn't abolish the system of Praesi governors. She couldn't restore Knightly Orders and preserve that vital aspect of Callowan culture. Now that she's Vicequeen, Malicia is going to demand a price for everything she does, but she has the power to do far more than before.

Ultimately, this isn't about Catherine or Malicia. Both of them are going to die sooner or later. What matters most right now for Callow is repairing the damage Praesi occupation has done to Callowan culture and building a military force that can protect Callow's people. In time, that military force could be turned against the Dread Empire. Without a modernized, capable army, and a people with restored confidence in Callow's ability to win military victories in the field, no rebellion is possible. With a revived sense of Callowan pride and trained soldiers; well, Catherine may be a dedicated collaborator, but she won't live forever. Hopefully her successor will have more courage.

Evgeny:

However much Malicia may appreciate having subjects who don't view scheming and backstabbing as the most honorable of professions, she's rightfully troubled by the fact that most Callowans view her as an unholy abomination in service to the vile Gods Below. Traditional Callowan culture has many things to say about the Dread Empire, none of them good.

The problem with separating Callowan culture from the Callowan state is that being Callowan requires some form of resistance to the occupation. No proud people could endlessly submit to foreign rule and foreign taxes without losing their pride and identity. By allowing Catherine to replace the Praesi governors, Malicia has agreed to let Callow be ruled by a Callowan, which is a minimum requirement for national self-respect.

Callowans probably don't care that much about which dynasty rules them. But there's a world of difference between disinterest in the internal squabbles of Callow's nobles, all of whom worship the Gods Above, and being forced to submit to your hated foreign enemies. The Praesi are always waiting their chance to stab Malicia in the back, but the Callowans are much more likely to stab her in the front. There's no magical way for Malicia to keep the elements of Callowan culture that she likes, such as loyalty and honesty, without also keeping the elements she doesn't like, such as the proud Callowan tradition of fighting the Dread Empire.

Evgeny

@Dylan

>Traditional Callowan culture has many things to say about the Dread Empire, none of them good.

Traditional Russian culture has many things to say about their government, none of them good. The internal opposition is close to non-existent, the clowns wearing this suit are just that: clowns.

Same potentially applies here. In feudal society, a peasant only cares about his immediate suzerain.

As for potential rebellion... The only thing Malicia needs to do is to forge strong economical ties between Callow and Dread Empire. Doing so was the idea anyway. With strong economical ties, noone in power would find a rebellion profitable, ergo, won't support it. So, Dread Empire would need only to deal with occasional heroes.

MetruX

I don't know, but seems to me that everyone is forgetting something that Malicia said, showing her thoughts. You see, we talk about what will happen after Cat... But Malicia herself made her Name crippled, to give Praes to the institutions, instead of to the Tirant. The big thing is: Malicia KNOWS there will be an after her, and maybe both of them knew where Cat will go after Vicequeen... I mean, both sides agreed that the precedent is that THE TOWER chooses the title holder, not Malicia herself. Thus, Cat can not only be aiming for that, knowingly or not, but Malicia probably knows that, and knows, as much as Black does, that to "win" she'll need her dream to survive her. Likely, Cat will succeed both their dreams.

nehemiahnewell

No, Malicia intends to live forever. She wants long term stability, but that because she intends to be alive to enjoy it. The legacy dream is Black's, not Malicia's. Though Malicia only gets what she wants if Black gets what he wants – as everyone has implied, any 'true' visionary could overthrow her – she's more Chancellor than Dread Empress in a lot of ways, and that isn't a role of direct power.

Indirect power in spades, but it requires that everyone else keeps playing your game, rather than flipping the table. People like the Black Knight, they're the ones who stop the table flippers. Malicia isn't doing it on her own, though.

Dylan Tullos

nehemiahnewell:

I don't see much point to Villains having an extended lifespan. I suppose that in theory they can live forever, but in practice most of them don't last as long as normal people.

Being Dread Empress and wanting to live forever, or even a really long time, are mutually incompatible goals. There are an extraordinary number of people with the motive and the means to plot the assassination of the Dread Empress, and sooner or later one of them is going to succeed. A truly brilliant Empress might live for a century or two, but the sheer number of enemies and plots ensures that you'll slip up eventually.

Actually living for thousands and thousands of years means abandoning power and deliberately isolating yourself from anyone who could hurt you. Black has accepted a shortened lifespan as the logical price of having the opportunity to change the Dread Empire, while Malicia hasn't yet realized that no amount of brilliance can keep her safe forever.

Shawn Panzegraf

The thing about Callowan national identity being tied to the resistance of foreign invaders is that Callowans have NEVER had a palatable alternative to constantly defending themselves from would-be conquerors. A Callow that sees even two or three generations where the entire country doesn't get wrecked, and instead the professional soldiers keep the country from being wrecked might well be more palatable to the mid-level merchant from the Weaver's Guild...or even the six hundred bottom-level weavers just interested in their families having enough to eat, and their children having an opportunity at something better than they themselves had.

Give the people that, and I think you'll find a cosmopolitan disinterest in which Gods are worshipped by the ruling elite will become the norm for most people.

vuthuha912

I really think that Praes should have integrated the culture between the two countries more than they currently did. Yet, the problem is the Truebloods, they are too dangerous for Callowan. It is like delivering a goat to a tiger. Trueblood will eat Callowan alive. I always wonder if you have a country that has a tradition of cavalry then why don't you use it. Probably because Black was afraid that they will rebel if he tried too soon after the Conquest. It takes time to forge a better relationship between Praes and Callow, the foster system, educational system, and military are supposed to be the tools for integration.

If the Imperial Governors were doing their jobs instead of trying to line their pocket then Praes would have succeeded. Urg... those short-sighted fools.

The only thing that keeps Praes from success is Praes and its culture of backstabbers. The moment those two Wastelanders on the Ruling Council attempt a coup, I know that Praes is not ready. No truly clear sight people would decide to have a coup at a time like that. They should have tried to work with the rest and aid the Legions to put down the rebellion immediately. Forging loyalty and a relationship with the other side are more important for the future of Praes. Showing Callow that Praes would keep their end of the bargain and that they can be trusted to work for the benefit of both Callow and Praes. But no, they just have to backstab for such meager and short-term benefits.

Black and Malicia need to spread their ideology to others. Maybe they already did with the Legions but the state bureaucrats seem to lag behind in this matter. Seriously, if only two people are seriously trying to change Praes then no wonder you guys fail.

Chapter 34: Talks

"Tonight we must speak of Callow, that stubborn graveyard of empires. Princes and princesses of Procer, we must now admit this truth: we have lost an entire kingdom to peasants and bandits."

– Beginning of First Princess Éloïse of Aequitan's speech to the Highest Assembly, on the subject of withdrawal from occupied Callow

"HAIL!"

Three thousand swords rose in salute, bare steel shining under the sun. I'd read about this, in what few records of the knightly orders still remained. A steel avenue, they called it. An old tradition born under Elizabeth Alban when the Queen of Blades had annexed almost a fourth of what was now Procer in a series of lightning-quick campaigns. It had only ever been used to honour ruling kings and queens of Callow, and now I was being greeted with one. The bluntness of that defiance was almost refreshing, since they had no idea I'd just been granted vicequeenship of the Callow. I'd talked a good game to the Empress, but I wasn't unaware that by founding the Order of Broken Bells I'd saddled a hungry tiger. Now I had to ride it, or be dragged down and devoured. I wondered if rulers ever truly managed to be in control, sometimes. Malicia and Black certainly gave off the impression they were, but how much of that was a front? The more authority I gained the less I felt like I held the reins.

Brandon Talbot looked better than he had last time I'd seen him, a filthy prisoner in the underground gaols of Marchford. His dark beard was cropped closely, his hair combed with care and he now stood with his back straight. Proudly. I had no trouble believing a woman like the Countess Marchford had thought he would make a worthy successor to her title. His plate was of Callowan make, of lesser steel than what the Imperial forges could make but covered in hymns of the House of Light. Old, it was easy to tell, but recently polished and very well-maintained. There was no telling it had been used in battle a mere few days ago, much less against the likes of the Summer Court. I strode down the steel avenue and he fell in at my side.

"I hear congratulations are in order," I said.

The man inclined his head.

"I will only remain as Grandmaster of the order for a few years, Your Grace," he replied. "Until a younger candidate can be raised to take the title."

He'd been elected by acclaim, as I understood it, in large part because he'd been the one mad enough to walk into Marchford unarmed back when Juniper was running it. That kind of risk-taking always earned some respect from soldiers, in my experience, especially with the kind of stakes he'd been playing for. Another hail sounded when we passed the end of the twin rows, headed for open pavilion that was the command tent for the Order of Broken Bells. A pair of tall banners trailed the wind to the sides, showing a pair of cracked bronze bells set on black.

"We would have flown your banner as well, Your Grace, but your quartermaster informed us you have none," he said.

I kinda wished I'd been there for that conversation, Ratface of all people trying to explain to a highborn that I might have a demesne but I'd not actually bothered to get any of the symbols a proper noble considered their due.

"Never got around to it," I said, entering the pavilion.

Robber had put a goat skull on a pike and tried to pass it for my heraldry, but Hakram had him assigned to latrine duty for a week in reprisal. Ah, Adjutant. He'd taken to my petty kind of justice like a wolf to a limping lamb.

"House Talbot has been dissolved, but it would be an honour for you to claim our sigil," the man suggested.

An arched silver bridge set on blue, if I remembered correctly. There was worst heraldry to be had – the rulers of Hedges had sheep as theirs, which boggled my mind – but it wasn't mine.

"That won't be necessary," I said politely.

No wine at the table in here. Right. Callowans didn't usually start drinking until the evening, and and it wasn't even noon yet. Even if the knights had been dispersed in the countryside for over two decades, I couldn't help but notice their chairs were nicer than mine. Except the one I'd looted from Summer, anyway. That one was sinfully comfortable and I actually slept better in it than my own cot. I took the seat at the head at the table and Grandmaster Talbot seated himself at my right. I slapped down a sheath of leather on the table and took out the parchments within, Aisha's beautiful Lower Miezian cursive filling it.

"You've officially been granted the rank of commander in the Fifteenth Legion, Grandmaster Talbot," I said. "You've got more three times the men under you a commander usually does but you don't qualify for legate rank, much less general."

"Because I am Callowan," he smiled thinly.

"Because you never went through the War College," I corrected. "You don't know shit about Legion tactics. You'll still counted as a member of the general staff, though, so you'll be in the high-level briefings as the commander of our cavalry contingent."

Aisha had bitterly complained about the bureaucratic nightmare that was getting a mere commander that kind of clearance, but she'd gotten it done anyway. I could have just waved around my seal and gotten it done on my personal authority as the Squire, but I didn't want to go that far unless I was forced to. Juniper already gave me enough lectures about how far we'd strayed from traditional Legion structure, and it would look better to the rest of the generals out there if I at least pretended I cared about the proper way things were done. The noble read through the papers, then glanced up.

"This states I have been given leave to organize the Order's command hierarchy as I wish," he said.

"The Empire doesn't have a precedent for a cavalry contingent this large," I said. "Even the Thirteenth Legion only has a thousand riders."

He nodded slowly.

"Knightly orders were limited to a thousand full-fledged knights, under House Fairfax," Grandmaster Talbot said. "One of the reasons there was such a wide variety."

I was a little amused he was tiptoeing around the reason for that. Under the Alban dynasty the orders had been much larger, but there'd been a bunch of small-scale conflicts between them and nobles, both sides arguing the other was overreaching their authority. Triumphant had razed the whole squabble to the ground, but when it had begun to pop up under Eleanor Fairfax's grandson he'd stripped the orders of their fortress holdings and severely limited their size. A dozen of small orders was a lot less dangerous to the nobility than three or four large ones, and easier to fold under the command of the crown when invaders came knocking. Traditionally it was the crown prince or princess who'd held command, a tradition that ended when Juniper's mother had shattered the charges of the Shining Prince at the Fields of Streges right before a goblin slit his throat.

"Banners of a thousand," Brandon finally said. "Under my ultimate command. We still have many squires in our ranks, and a single battle was not enough to season them."

"Get it written properly," I ordered. "And get the parchments to Staff Tribune Bishara before nightfall. She'll be expecting them."

"A very talented woman," Talbot said approvingly.

There was a look in the man's eyes I wasn't unfamiliar with. Well, Aisha was exceedingly pretty. I doubted she'd be interested in a Callowan twice her age, but him looking wouldn't hurt anyone as long as he kept it mannerly.

"A detachment of five hundred could be arranged to serve as your personal guard," he said, putting away the parchments.

"I already have a retinue," I said, raising an eyebrow. "Red shields, golden noose on them? They're hard to miss."

"The 'Gallowborne', yes," he said. "Criminals and Praesi."

"I've trained a lot of them myself," I said calmly. "On foot, I'd put any of them against three of yours. I doubt there's any company on Calernia that's been through rougher fights."

"They're sharp men, I'm sure," the Grandmaster said. "But a match for five hundred knights of Callow?"

I drummed my fingers against the table.

"The Gallowborne," I said, forcing the calm to stay even as the temperature in the pavilion descended sharply, "are my retinue. They've been mine since I snatched them from the gallows, Talbot. They've bled for me. They've died for me. And they will remain at my side until they can no longer serve."

I was uncomfortable with how possessive that had sounded, and the bearded man did not speak of the matter any further. Eager for a change of subject, I cleared my throat.

"You told Adjutant you needed to speak with me," I said.

There was a reason it wasn't Hakram handing him the paperwork, and it wasn't because I'd been looking for a sword salute. Though I wasn't complaining I'd gotten one, either.

"There are matters it has been brought to my attention you left unfinished, Your Grace," he said. "I understand we are at war, but they still need to be dealt with in haste."

I leaned against the back of my chair.

"I'm listening," I allowed.

"House Foundling," he said, and grimaced. "Forgive me, but that it an orphan's name. It is not fit for the ruling dynasty of Callow."

"What a funny coincidence," I drawled. "I am an orphan."

"You share that name with thousands of others," he said. "Your Grace, you must consider the difficulties this will cause. Taking a reigning name is in order."

I drummed my fingers against the table, again. A sliver of my opinion of this whole bullshit must have shown on my face, because the knight had to repress a flinch.

"As of last night, I am the Vicequeen of Callow by official sanction of Her Dread Majesty Malicia, First of Her Name," I said. "Not queen, though. My successor to the title will be chosen by the Tower, when I see fit to surrender that position. There's no need for a fancy dynastic name."

"Your Grace-" he began.

"The title will remain in Callowan hands," I interrupted flatly. "Compromise was reached. Leave it at that. To be frank, Talbot, you're not really qualified to weigh in about the shit that goes on that high up. I've survived dealing with the High Lords by stabbing them repeatedly and publicly until they got cautious. They would swallow you whole and spit out your bones."

He seemed a little offended by the brusqueness of that, but he'd have to make his peace with it. What I'd said was very much true. If I put this poor bastard in a room with Akua Sahelian she'd have him on permanent puppet strings before a quarter hour had passed.

"Your line will still rule Marchford in perpetuity," he said. "The name matters, Your Grace."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"I became Named as Catherine Foundling," I said flatly. "I will die with that name as well."

"There must be records of your birth parents," he tried desperately. "A Deoraithe name will not be as well received, but it is still something."

"As far as I'm concerned, the closest thing I'll ever have to a father is down south killing fools," I replied coldly. "And he doesn't have a last name. Born a farmer, you see. As for the people who birthed me, they are strangers. I owe them nothing and will take nothing from them."

The man bit his tongue, but it was clear he wanted to argue.

"I am not a noble, Talbot," I said. "I don't really like them, as a rule. No offence meant to you in particular. I've bled for every inch of power I have, and the notion of anybody just... inheriting theirs has grown repulsive to me. There will be no restoration of highborn power in Callow."

"You will still reign, Your Grace," he said. "You must realize that certain measures have to be taken to cement your legitimacy."

I peered at him closely, and read the deeper hesitation there.

"Oh Gods," I said. "You want me to get married."

"The baron of Hedges has a son your age," he pressed on. "All the branches of House Fairfax were exterminated after the Conquest, but there are remains of other ancient lines. Duchess Kegan is the foremost remaining Callowan noble, and a direct marriage alliance with the House of Iarsmai through a cousin would yield great benefits."

"You can't be serious," I said, mildly horrified.

"I am given to understand you might prefer the company of women," he said delicately. "There are certain miracles known to the House of Light that could make such an arrangement feasible."

"I go both ways," I replied faintly. "But that's not the issue here. I have a – I'm not looking for anyone, Talbot."

"I have heard that you keep company with a Duni, yes," he hinted. "You would not be the first ruler of Callow to keep a paramour, if you'll forgive my crassness."

Merciless Gods. I was eighteen, so I supposed in the eyes of the remaining nobles I was fair game in the marriage alliance market. Callowans got married a lot later than Praesi, since unlike the Wastelanders we didn't actually breed bloodlines, but nobles did tend to be ahead of the curve in that regard.

"That's not happening," I said flatly. "And this conversation is over."

I wasn't getting saddled with a lordling or a child anytime soon, no matter what people might want. I honestly wasn't sure I wanted to ever have kids, and even if I did make that decision down the line it wouldn't be to pat some fucking aristocrats on the back. There were a lot of things I was willing to bargain with, but who shared my bed wasn't one of them. Brandon Talbot's lips thinned, but he did not argue.

"I'll get heraldry done," I sighed, throwing him a bone as I rose to my feet. "Get the paperwork to Aisha, Grandmaster. We'll speak again at the staff meeting."

I could not get out of that pavilion quickly enough.

I'd chosen to hold this meeting under the stars, since I felt most comfortable at night these days. The bonfire crackled, flames high and occasionally licking at the roots of the tall oak that oversaw our little quiet corner of Creation. Masego had slapped down some complicated-looking wards the moment he'd arrived, not even bothering to vocalize an incantation. His new Name came with some perks apparently. I took a moment to let this all settle in. It was the first time all five of us were in the same place, in Creation at least.

Archer was seated on a wide branch above us, because she never wasted an occasion to literally look down on everyone else, and with a knife in hand she was carving what looked like like a sphere out of dark wood. Her ochre skin looked ever darker at night, and though she'd left her longcoat and silver mail behind in favour of a woollen brown tunic and trousers, she'd kept the dark green scarf that she usually covered her lower face with around her neck. I had a much better look at the curves on her, without the armour on, and she winked when she saw me looking. I turned away. Because it was in Archer's nature to be a bloody pest at all times, she made a point out of dropping the wood shavings on Masego's head until he got tired of asking her to stop and put up a translucent pane of sorcery over his head.

Hierophant himself looked... strange. Familiar yet different. He wore a black cloth blindfold over his glass eyes, but sometimes bits of red and yellow light could be glimpsed through it. His hair was still long and braided but the shining trinkets he'd once worn in them had been replaced by dull bars of iron carved with runes. His usually colourful robes had been traded a black tunic that made him look like a chubby crow when he was sitting, but actually lent him something of a presence when he was on his feet. The Legion-issue boots were an amusing last touch to the ensemble, worn down as they were. His fingers kept twitching, as if to reach out for something no one else could see.

Hakram sat at his side, his heavy plate made something else entirely by the ravages of the battles we'd been through. The goblin steel had been darkened by Summer flame, twisted by heat not of Creation, and though it still fit with padding under the metal the appearance reminded me of the steps leading to the Tower. The obsidian that had been warped by sorcery, shaped into silhouettes of weeping men and women one must tread on to rise. Adjutant had gone through the crucible of fire and become stronger for it. His Name pulsed steady to my senses, firm yet oddly serene. His hand of bones was eerily still, reeking of dark sorcery anchored into his very Name. His eyes were dark and still as ponds, the fangs glinting in firelight still bloody from his supper.

Thief sat across the fire from me. I'd never been in her presence long enough to notice before, but she didn't hold herself like a commoner. I'd had etiquette lessons at the orphanage and I recognized the same marks on her, in the way she kept her wrists straight and her back as if leaning against a high chair. Her leathers were loose, but I could tell we shared a body shape. She was taller than me, since it was basically divine mandate that everyone but goblins be, but not by as much as the other. Dark hair and blue-grey eyes that were always moving, always looking for movement. Pale fingers were toying with a carving knife that was clearly sapper issue: she has wandering hands, this one, and a habit of picking up knickknacks. Must have been part of her Name, because it seemed too compulsive for a mere habit.

Five Named were sitting around the fire. That was, I knew, no small thing. Even more now that Ranger had tossed us a name, turning the curse of the Queen of Summer into something more. The Woe, she'd called us. It had felt like a pivot then and still did now, the beginning of something larger. What it would be, I was almost scared to find out. Hakram tossed up a wineskin at Archer, which was enough to distract her from pissing off Masego for a bit. I took that as my cue to begin.

"So, on our first outing together we robbed Summer of what appears to be its literal sun, before capturing a princess of the blood," I said. "I'm not one for omens, but it strikes me as a good note to begin on."

"Lies and violence," Archer cheered, dropping the wineskin on Masego's shield.

The Soninke mage snatched it, taking a gulp and coughing when it went down the wrong pipe. Apparently a fresh Name didn't mean he could handle drink any better. Good to know. I felt Thief glance at me, raising any eyebrow at what Archer had said.

"Archer is a horrid wench, and whatever she says about mottos is not to be trusted," I stated.

"Well, it's still better than sullen," the Named in question mused.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"I expected something more... professional," the Thief finally said.

I raised an eyebrow.

"Did the Lone Swordsman run that kind of crew?" I asked, genuinely curious.

"No," the heroine conceded, "but your band was a step ahead of us the whole time. I always thought it would be rather business-like, on your side."

"You thought we were a step ahead?" Masego croaked, wiping his mouth.

Hakram snorted.

"We strolled from one disaster to another, trying to keep the fires from spreading," the orc said, sounding amused. "Mostly fires not of our making, I'll add."

"Haven't been in this outfit for long," Archer said, "but it hasn't struck me as overburdened with plans."

"That's going a little far," I intervened, mildly offended.

"We got into Skade by writing on a scrap of parchment that we could, Catherine," she pointed out. "Don't get me wrong, I'm on board with our whole 'that's stupid enough they'll never see it coming' way of going at it. But masterful schemers we are not."

"You had us dead to rights at Summerholm," Thief frowned.

"We only understood what was happening after the city was on fire," Masego said.

"And we got blamed for that, after," Hakram added.

"Everything in Liesse unfolded according to your plan," Thief tried.

"Arguably. Though she did get killed," Adjutant said.

Archer's eyes swerved to me.

"Wait, you died? Have you been undead this while time?" she asked. "You don't look it."

"Resurrected," I replied.

She looked even more dubious.

"You're a villain, Cat," she said. "That's not exactly in your wheelhouse."

"Yeah, the Hashmallim weren't real pleased about it either," I grunted. "They threw a fucking fit."

"Is that how that happened?" Thief frowned. "I did wonder. You talked a Choir into breathing second life into you?"

"Talked is a strong word," I mused.

"We've settled on 'bullied'," Hierophant contributed helpfully.

"You bullied," the Thief said slowly, "the entire Choir of Contrition. Into resurrecting a villain actively trying to oppose them."

"Not even the Lady of the Lake fucks around with angels," Archer said approvingly. "That's actually impressive."

"Don't bring Ranger into this," I grunted. "She came a heartbeat away from slicing my throat open the only time we met."

"Oh, she's always like that," the other woman dismissed. "Don't take it personally. She once threw Tinkles out a window for hitting on a trader girl instead of practicing his stances."

"I'm glad he was sloppy, then," I admitted. "Hunter was hard enough to put down as he was."

Thief blinked, then looked up at the woman on the branch.

"I forgot," she said. "You are an apprentice of the Ranger as well. You must have known him well."

"He was only around for a few years before joining up with your little rebellion," Archer shrugged. "Of the Lady's five pupils he was always the odd one out. Not surprised he ran off, though it was still monumentally stupid."

"He was," Thief began, looking for a diplomatic word, "different."

"Half-naked," I said. "Half-naked is the term you're looking for."

"I never minded the sights, Catherine," Archer grinned. "The man had a body worth a stare. The bells, though, and the tattoos? Gods, it was like he was trying to ruin his looks."

"The tattoos weren't a Refuge tradition?" Thief asked, looking surprised.

"Is that what he said?" Archer snorted. "No, they aren't."

Masego cleared his throat politely.

"This conversation is both baffling and horribly tedious to me," he informed us. "I believe you were addressing us, Catherine?"

"Right," I said, and immediately delegated. "Hakram."

The tall orc straightened, putting aside the wineskin he'd been hogging this whole time. Thief had thawed a bit when we talked, but her guard went right back up when she turned to him. There was story there, I thought. Adjutant must have had one of his little talks with her at some point. I trusted him, so I wouldn't meddle, but I'd have some questions to ask my second.

"We currently have two threats that must be dealt with," Hakram gravelled. "The first is Summer Court and its queen. The second is Akua Sahelian, lately the Diabolist."

"The villain that let the devils loose on Liesse," Thief said, eyes gone cold.

"That's the one," I said. "And believe me, devils are some of the milder stuff she's thrown at us in the past. You've gone to the city yourself, I hear. You saw what she's up to."

"Some sort of ritual," the skinny Callowan said. "It involves Deoraithe that are part of the Watch, and that's about all I know."

I glanced at Masego, who somehow picked up on it. That was going to keep being creepy for a while.

"While I've not conducted such experiments myself, I've read the notes my father has on the Watch," the mage said. "They are connected to a deity of unknown nature, and gain their supernatural abilities by binding themselves to it through rituals they call Oaths."

"Our best guess at the moment is that the Diabolist is trying to get at the deity through them," I said.

"Considering the massive size of the array she created in the city," Masego said, "she will need at least a lesser god to empower it. The scale of the effect might be comparable to that of the creation of the Kingdom of the Dead."

"Liesse is also currently flying," Hakram said. "Which will make it difficult to assault. That aside, the city's current location is a mystery."

I met Thief's eyes.

"I'll have my people look into it," she said.

I nodded.

"Much as I hate giving Akua a reprieve, she's not the most pressing threat at the moment," I said. "Summer's out for blood, and its Queen will be crossing into Creation about a month from now. What we can do about her is not inspiring. Masego?"

The dark-skinned mage smiled thinly.

"Given at least three days of preparation, I can buy us a quarter bell before she breaks through my wards and massacres every single one of us," he said.

"That's reassuring," Thief said cuttingly.

"Not great, I'll admit, but we still have two cards in hand," I said. "First we have the Princess of High Noon, which she really needs if she doesn't want to get knifed by Winter after we're all dead. And we have the sun, courtesy of your kleptomania."

Thief looked faintly amused, but did not reply.

"So," I smiled. "We've got the whole night, and wine I really doubt was legally acquired. Let's see if we can think of something to avoid dying horrible, horrible deaths. The floor's open, my friends."

Great things happen around campfire circles after dark, great and terrible things.

wirelessgrapes

Well, time to trawl through the older chapters to find the first time the Calamities all sat around a fire.

sheer_falacy

I think that's going to be nontrivial, since Assassin isn't exactly around them a lot. Or is in disguise for it, which is equivalent for us.

snarky

Assassin was disguised as the campfire in all the flashbacks

stevenneiman

In Ranger's first interlude, all of the Calamities except possibly Assassin were in one room together. However, I have no idea if Assassin was there, and I don't think Scribe was. There was also the Name dream where Black first met Wekesa before he was the Warlock, but I don't think that any of the others were there.

ArkhCthuul

My thoughts exactly.

Another food for thought chapter.

I love it when I have a lot of finished ones to read...

Adarsh

I wonder how Ranger stacks up against her mother.

And honestly the fact that he is confident about holding off a god for any period of time tells me his power has increased quite a bit.

stevenneiman

I think he's at his strongest against anything that vaguely resembles a god, capital or lower case g. Besides, that's with preparation, and he hadn't even HAD the Name long enough to prepare anything with it when he first went up against the Queen of Summer.

JK

Hearing it in their words, the way Cat and friends have managed to pull things together seems suspiciously like the divine providence that we keep hearing about and keeps heroes working. Plus the resurrection... there might be something more afoot than just being skilled.

wirelessgrapes

We already know that this is Cat's Story, because we're reading it. It's a Story about Stories being pitted against one another to fit an atypical Story. There has to be the overarching Guidelines to the story, but the Story itself takes a new shape. So, you take the parts that are normally in a Story, and fit them into the Structure in a strange way to build yourself a new one. We have the team build now, and there has to be some plot armor, because this is Cat's show.

Gunslinger

Stories aren't limited to heroes alone though the heavens do cheat quite a bit. If you remember the formation of the Calamities had a lot of providence in it. Essentially I guess if you're role has narrative weight then you can twist fate around to augment it

sheer_falacy

They're being kind of self deprecating about it. Yes, there's a lot of improvisation, but they absolutely do make plans and put effort into them. They got into Skade with a handwritten note because they thought about how the Fae would respond to a handwritten note, not because they randomly tried it.

There is some amount of "this is Cat's story" at work, but a lot of it manifests in the form of competent people putting effort into winning. The fact that they banter is not mutually exclusive with it.

Also, Lies and Violence can be a pretty effective strategy.

Dana

They're the protagonists of the story... and they're getting the kind of breaks that protagonists get. Heroes typically also have to make plans and put effort into them to win, despite the whining.

The meta-irony is on point.

Levi Kalden

Self deprecating humor is some of the best

amc

is that an intentional impression? (I mean, yes, it's accurate; but are the Woe being explicit about it to gain "rag-tag-band-of-..." status?)

Interesting: Cat is way more deferential to the Juniper & "Legion way of doing things" than she is to Calloway's.
Probably because it doesn't cost her anything.

stevenneiman

Juniper's telling her that she's a soldier and should act like it. Even if that's inconvenient it's also reasonable. Talbot was telling her that because she's sort of a noblewoman she needs to prioritize her people's dumbest expectations above her own happiness.

Cpt. Obvious

And she despise the idea of nobility inheriting political power and status rather than earning it. By folding the Broken Bell into the Legion she makes their upkeep a matter of state finance rather than being dependent on the support from the nobles. This will also mean that squires can be requited from the entire populace rather than just from those who either have the family finances to support them or has a noble as a patron. That way their loyalty will in time shift from the nobles who sponsor them to the state of Callow or the Legion if that's how they end up being financed. This defang what's left of Callowan nobility who historically has been able to withhold the knights under their command as a way to control the ruling king or queen.

Personally, I would've liked to see Robber as a Named and part of The Woe, but I suppose this may be for the best. I just hope that the rest of Cat's High Command don't get shoved into obscurity. They deserve a fair share of the spotlight too

Big Brother

Well, we know Juniper survives the upcoming Uncivil Wars, and probably has an important place at Cat's side as her Robber is probably the Cat version of Marshal Ranker. An impossibly old goblin leading an extremely dangerous Legion. All goblin sappers, knowing Robber, each almost as crazy as him.

stevenneiman

I think Robber will be the Woes' sixth ranger, same as Eudokia is to the Calamities. Whether he'll take on a secret goblin Name, develop a new Name like several of the Woes have, or just remain a badass without one is yet to be seen.

Gunslinger

Haha Thief's induction was great to read. Also I'm curious to know what the "miracle" that Talbot suggested was.

By the way in Thief's dialogue it says Choir of Compassion. I think it should be Contrition.

I'm betting that miracle is just supposed to make sure that Catherine would be able to actually impregnate a lady. Keeping the bloodline alive if she wasn't willing to compromise to a purely political marriage with a male.

And of course, if she would actually care for that.

stevenneiman

Cat had a falling out with Kilian over the issue of using human sacrifices to power a spell that would fix her fae problems (By either turning her all human or all fae, I forget which), and to my recollection she's still on good terms with Aisha.

Cpt. Obvious

I'm posting a pointless comment, but Killian was talking about using a ritual to strengthen her Fey heritage in order to be able to release it instead of getting caught in mid transition when dipping too deep into her magic pool. It would allow her to use a lot more magic and gain some Fey advantages such as flying, regeneration and probably glamor. Probably also a stronger affiliation with some elemental magic.

A lot of speculation has been about what court her Fey blood comes from. Her hair color and the fact that it takes on the appearance of fire when she tries to double dip in her mana pool makes it likely that her Fey ancestor was of the summer court, which should mesh well with her slinging fireballs around.

Oh, and she would probably be suffering from the story weaknesses of the Fey...

Nafram

It's going to be tough for Talbot to adapt, but he'll come around, I believe. After all, he was the one who dared offer the Knights to Cat.

Of more import is that plans, beautiful plans are being crafted and preparations are underway. I'm looking forward to see the Woe in action

James, Mostly Harmless

Now that Cat's army has escaped from Summer and has a respite from marching and battle, I hope that we get to see recent events from Duchess Kegan's and Marshal Ranker's perspectives. Kegan already thought that Cat was a monster, and that was before she defeated a Summer Princess and stared down Summer's Queen!

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

colm

Anyone else picture her heraldry as something a goat goat standing in green flames?

colm

*as something like.

sorry for the typo. I was using a phone.

narcoduck

There's a shutterstock for that.

nipi

I wonder if it should have blue eyes now? Like the flying unicorn or whatever she raised from the dead.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

This looks more like an insect than a goat. I'm not sure the artist has actually seen a goat skull before

Shequi

If I were designing Catherine's Heraldry (and I am...), I'd use the (undead) Horse and Goat as the Supporters, not as a Charge.

The themes you would want to bring out on such a shield would be the associations with (Goblin)fire and the (moonless) night. Something like:

"Divided per Fess Flamme, Sable et Vert, the division inferior by one fifth. In Chief an Annulet Argent Luna in Eclipse flanked by two Mullet Argent"

In simple terms, a Shield, divided horizontally into Black (upper) and Green (lower), the dividing line being 2/5ths of the way up the shield and stylised as flames. In the upper half the moon in an eclipse flanked by two stars.

jonnney

I think you would need to have the broken remains of Angel, Demon, Faerie, Hero and Villain involved in some way. It needs to be something that evokes the sentiment, "Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in creation."

stevenneiman

Well, it is now.

ereshkigala

MOAR AWESOME!

I hope we eventually get a prequel with Black forging the Calamities. I also hope it'll be as awesome as this.

Jworks

Do we know how many of the 5 have transitional Names? Obviously Catherine and Masego (previously), but what about archer, adjutant, and thief?

RandomFan

I believe, though I may be mistaken, that all the listed party members do not have truly transitional names. Then again, Heiress was a far more active threat when she had a transitional name, outright setting what is the second most dangerous monster on a city. I'm probably subconsciously judging by power manifest, which is wrong.

I don't know what they'd transition to, though.

kanadaj

I feel that apart from Squire (obvious), Archer might actually be a transitional Name towards Ranger.

RandomFan

I feel that Archer is transitional towards Ranger, but only in the same way that Black Knight, Chancellor, presumably Warlock, and Diabolist all can transition into Emperor/ Empress. I might be over-estimating Archer here, or over-estimating the inherent power of Ranger's name, (that while most Rangers are not Ranger, they have their own things to offer) but those are my thoughts on the matter.

The same applies to the others at the campfire- there are transitions available, but the names themselves aren't designed to grow into something more. Thief could steal a crown, Adjutant could become Commander, and so on- but all of that is optional, and the names are at mature power levels already- except for Adjutant, as a new name, and possibly Hierophant, as an obscure name. Both might need more time to build fame to be a fair match for things like Diabolist or Tyrant on power alone.

That's just my interpretation though, I may be wrong.

stevenneiman

I'm pretty sure that everyone except Cat has permanent Names now. All of the transitional Names we've seen so far have been clearly transitional just from what they're called. A Squire is an attendant to be mentored by the Knight and presumably someday become a Knight him/herself. A Heiress is someone in line to claim a title, and an Apprentice is of course someone who learns from a master to do the same thing they did. Now that Masego has made the transition from Apprentice to Heiropfant, I'm pretty sure that the Squire is the only one who's still got a transitional Name. Adjutant, Thief, and Archer all seem like things that someone could be their entire life after they've become them, and if anything Heiropfant seems like an old hero or villain's Name, which fits the way that Masego will grow into it. I actually suspect that Heiropfant is the most dangerous of the Woes in the long run, since I'm pretty sure he has either Learn or an Aspect that has the same potential like Dissect or Analyze, and while it might be harder for him to find appropriate test subjects, I expect him to make up for it in the sheer power that they provide him.

Jabes

So, while I have been reading the comments a lot, one stray thought has occurred to me that I have not seen mentioned at all... what would happen to an emperor or empress with a trustworthy chancellor? Namely, the chancellor is supposed to rule, think about who has been ruling this entire time... and we know his time as the black knight is limited, but maybe not his time alive, even freeing the name for his apprentice...? Other than that, I have enjoyed the series the entire time, but this past book has been amazing! Thank you!

RandomFan

I bet that Amadeus would rather die than become Chancellor- but he's okay with making a sacrifice to achieve his ambitions, so it's not inconceivable.

Morgenstern

Far as I remember it was stated somewhere that Black is acting as the actual *Emperor* and Malicia is the one who would fit the role of Chancellor, even though she is the Empress by Name...

Morgenstern

Which would fit to the Bard lately calling him out on it, saying he should "just kill this little friend of yours" and sit on the throne himself, at home, until someone stabs him in the back, aka 'end the charade' because 'you're not as good at this [storytelling /-twisting] as you thought'...

Jabes

Why would he rather die? He has been ruling already, he has been doing a lot of "meta" work (by which I mean he has worked to reform bureaucracy, the military, laws, and even taxes), and it would allow him to really reign in the power of the nobles. He has not personally led the legions except in very specific cases since Malicia was confirmed as the Dread Empress, even, so it would be more like what he is now, other than the hero hunting. It would even be a great way to hand things off to Cat.

RandomFan

Because Amadeus has a distinct disdain for politics with nobles, the very bread and blood of the Chancellor role, and while he has the gifts for it, it's probably a very distasteful option. The thing is, he wants to do something that is incredibly out of character for a Chancellor, I'm pretty sure just from listening to it: Nuke all the nobility.

I mean, he wouldn't be bad at it, but it has a lot of the things that make him angry in its very core, even if it is an option.

stevenneiman

The problem, though, is that Black and Malicia basically killed the Name, and made it a crowning achievement having done so. Besides, I'm pretty sure that the Role of Chancellor is to stab the Tyrant in the back, and while Black might be able to get away with setting up a coup so that the story will stumble because it expects him to follow through, i don't think he could pull it off if he did take the Name of Chancellor.

nipi

I fear Cat is on the path of committing the mistake of many great rulers – not leaving a competent heir/successor.

If Malicia ever chooses the next viscount then the prosperity of Callow and its identity will not be high in her list of requirements.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Says who? If she was that indifferent why bother with Catherine in the first place? I'm pretty sure Malicia, if she even outlives Cat, is very interested in keeping her bread basket happy and not rebelling

kanadaj

You don't need an heir when you have the plot armor.

nipi

@The Warren Peace NFL Report
Happy yes. Callowan no.

I doubt its in Malicias long term interests that callowans maintain a separate identity from the rest of her empire. Cat was opposed to having callowans turned into praesi.

Shequi

And yet Catherine is taking the route that the Empire already takes. The Soninke, Taghreb and Duni don't think of themselves as less than Imperial citizens, but they are all distinct human ethnicities within the Empire.

Cat's method, applied properly, will have Imperial Callowans in short order; a distinctly Callowan grouping, but without any desire for independence.

Fern

You're looking at it the wrong way. See, Cat is taking Black's approach to politicking: namely, building institutions that hold up on their own without being babysitted by one Named man or woman. Cat's trying to set it up to where even if Malicia picks the slimiest fuckboy in Callow she can find, Callow/Praes will still survive as an institution.

Good nations survive because of good leadership. Great nations survive in spite of any leadership, good or bad.

jonnnney

Cat's has a greater concern than appointing an Heir. She needs to fundamentally change the story of Praes and Callow. If she can create a story about Callow becoming a strong and fundamental part of the Empire and she can have an entire generation of Callowans who believe in such a story. Then a successor will occur naturally from the narrative just like the name of Adjutant appeared due to the reforms.

Ben

I get that you plan for the worst, but Catherine doesn't seem to consider Ranger killing the Summer Queen a possibility. I wonder why that is. I get that there is a big step up from prince of Winter to the queen of summer, but the fact that Ranger can mine for jewelry from a winter prince's eye socket should give Catherine some hope.

ereshkigala

Yeah, no. The Princes and Princesses were a major threat to Cat and friends, but one that could be fought and defeated. The Queen OTOH comes in and casually annihilates everything not shielded by Ranger without even trying.

That's an order of magnitude more power.

RandomFan

It probably does. The fact that *all Ranger took* was an eyeball should remove some of that hope. The queen would need to make Ranger kill her, or Ranger would need to want to, or the queen would need to be dangerous enough that fighting to maim wasn't an option.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Awesome chapter! LOLed standing in boring lines this morning

Shawn Panzegraf

I gave this some substantial thought before commenting, The miracle Talbot was suggesting can't be something intended to target Cat directly. Talbot's a Knight, and his training probably leaves him at least as aware as Cat that (using the example Cat herself used in Arcadia, when thinking about how nice it'd be to have a set of magic-countering armor like the knights have would like just leave her with charred skin from the House of Light prayers etched into said armor to give it its power) that Villain + House of Light miracle = Bad thing happening to the Villain.

Talbot was also still recommending Cat marry a guy, despite thinking her being a lesbian would be the impediment to the production of an heir.

There's also the fact that Talbot didn't suggest Cat marry a highborn woman. Propagating a bastard with a woman she isn't married to wouldn't really help the legitimacy thing.

Wild as it may sound, I think Talbot was suggesting some (temporary) sort of gender-bending shenanigans. I can still think of stumbling blocks for that theory, but Talbot mentioning marriage to a highborn male that he doesn't think Cat would bed as a lesbian for the purpose of cementing at least her bloodline for Marchford seems at cross-purposes.

Fern

seems pretty cut-and-dry here: this story's world is much more laissez faire about same sex relationship, and nobles seek power through any means. To the young Talbot man, using a miracle to become a woman would be worth it if it meant s/he could marry the new ruling Queen of Callow.

Not\_a\_robot

Or it could be a miracle that allows a lesbian couple to produce offspring, as discussed higher up in the comments. Becoming female wouldn't really make Cat like you, I think; she'd consider it both an insult to her intelligence as well as a blatant attempt at manipulating her through her sexuality.

Soronel Haetir

The chapter I would love to see is Masego with Wekesa and Tikoloshe after the transition to Hierophant. Although with Wekesa off in the Free Cities and that campaign not looking so great for the Calamities I'm not sure that will actually come about.

stevenneiman

I expect that multiple of the Calamities will die, but I really do hope that if Wekesa is going to die he at least gets to have his proud father moment first.

Al

I get Cat protecting the Gallowborne but... she coulda folded 100 knights or so.

Crop of the crop

Call 'em "Gallowriders" or sth...

Just my $0.02

Love the Woe interaction, looking forward to meet their 6th ranger!

jonnnney

She is already on thin ice by creating the knightly order. If she puts them in her retinue then it will look that much more like a full on rebellion.

Fern

I like how Cat's toolbox is a variation on Black's, even though both are focused on having a wide toolbox. Black is more focused on removing obstacles and conquering/destroying objectives, so he gets the Calamaties (destruction) and Scribe (occupation). Cat is focused less on power and more about adaptability. Her whole group is geared towards projecting hard and soft power through improvisation and causing as much chaos (mostly by repurposing other people's plans) as possible. That one of her first aspects was Take is telling, I honestly think Masego got Heirophant more as a result of Cat than anything else.

RandomFan

I might be able to agree, but he's always had an interest in the otherworldly, so he also deserved it on his own merits. He was raised by an inhabitant of the hells, he's been studying a demon, he's probably been involved in dissecting at least one god- fae might be icing on the cake, and he might be more qualified and interested for having joined Cat, but he doubtless could have earned the title on his own merits, given time.

If he was supposed to be with Diabolist in a "heroic cat" timeline, between the hells, the demons, the god and the fae, he'd probably wind up with it anyways, since he'd be seeing all the same stuff.

Besides, Diabolist is taken, and he doesn't seem like the sort for patricide.

Soronel Haetir

Agreed that Masego's not the sort for patricide, for one thing there is nothing that action would bring him that he wants that he could not obtain just as easily in some other way. And it would bring all sorts of trouble (even with graduating to Heirophant I believe he is still using his fathers and uncle Amadeus as a shield).

Masego is simply far too much a bookworm to desire power for its own sake.

jonnnney

I think Masego was always on the path to get the Name Hierophant. He simply obtained the name much faster since he is allied with Catherine. Not only was he able to experience things that he would not have in his lab, the Queen of the Fae, The library of Winter, A demon of corruption, the corpse of an angel, etc. But he also gained the backing of a story. A different kind of Villainous group needs a different kind of Caster backing them up.

stevenneiman

Personally, I think it was kind of inevitable, considering his parentage. Wekesa didn't really fit as the Warlock, he just took it because it was the most powerful magic-based Name available. He'd always been much more about the research and learning that the Name allowed him to do than the red skies that are his actual job as Warlock. Close enough for a guy who didn't have anything better, but once Cat started spawning entirely new Names around her there was no way that Masego wasn't getting in on the action, especially since he didn't even have the chance to be a Warlock since his father was alive and well.

Random passer-by seeing Cat's group in action: Whoah

And that's why they're called the Woes!

reveen

I can't help but shake my head at Catherine's stubbornness here.

I can understand being uncomfortable with a marriage, but accepting a dynastic name would be at least a little something to fulfill the cultural and political expectations of being a queen. Her ambitions for Callow to be a client state of Praes and not just a nation under foreign occupation are best served by working within the cultural and political context of Callow. This isn't just stupid random bullshit, these are important cultural touchstones of the country that will help cement her rule on a psychological and cultural level.

If she can't swallow her pride and put down a few of her Legion trappings she should have had Kendal made Vicequeen with herself as governor. But instead she wants to accept the high profile symbolic title for herself without wanting to change herself to best make use of it.

If she can't start using soft power and keeps using violence for her solution to everything all she's going to build in Callow are graveyards.

Cicero

Isn't what Cat's story is partly about? Doing things differently? Look at it from her perspective? She has seen only noble houses as mostly horrible way of governance, so the idea of building her own must disgust her. It would change her story from a nobody to a noble.

reveen

Her deal is wanting to work within the existing Praesi system to make things better, and there's no real reason not to apply that same thinking to Callow's traditional political system. Or she could just try to brute force Callow into her own little despotism, but that's not going to be the stable system she wants.

And the entire point of joining Evil is doing things that she finds distasteful to achieve her goals. It's kind of hypocritical to stop the buck here at having her own noble house when she's already stepped over piles of corpses to get where she is.

amc

But, you forget that she's trying to keep Malicia and the Tower friendly. It's a different story if the ruling Empress names a martially-talented orphan as her governor-general (and then vice-queen), than if the Empress names a noble. 'There is power in stories', etc.

OldSchoolVillain

You realize that Cat took the title of Vice Queen because she was the only one Malicia would accept in the position, right? To put it in Story terms Cat is the Empress of Callow while Kendall is the Chancellor. Kendall runs the country while Cat sets out long-term sweeping policy, such as becoming a true piece of Praes. She doesn't NEED to swallow her pride and become the perfect noblewoman because A) she has Asha to deal with them for her, and B) because she ISN'T trying to lay down a dynasty. Worst case scenario she goes to the nearest imperial orphanage and picks out a next-generation version of herself.

That . . . actually might be interesting. A line of Foundling Squires and Black Knights in MarchFord, rather than a bloodline.

Metruux

It seems to me you're quite the extremist. She isn't. She isn't even working towards having a line of succession, she just took the position to create a precedent, that both Callow is ruled by callowans, and the ruler is chosen by Praes, thus making them both connected while still maintaining Callowans culture. She DOESN'T wish to stay in this position for long, and neither to become a noble herself, so why bother with noble costumes?

Shawn Panzegraf

Honestly, the solution is easy. Get over her outrageous level of hypocrisy about Killian wanting to do the *exact same thing Cat's done, REPEATEDLY* (Killing people to further her goals), and then reconcile with Killian. As Vicequeen, she can grant Killian a title, and marry her. THEN the House of Light could work their mojo on Killian.

If all Cat wanted was to get sweaty, Archer would oblige her. So would many of the other human females in the 15th (few as they may be). Cat may not be a great beauty, but for women from Praes power is quite the aphrodisiac.

Cat doesn't seem heavy into the casual bed-buddy thing though. The numerous times she notes she'll be going to bed alone, that her tent is empty, or that no one is waiting for her add up to her missing Killian IMHO.

I think Killian wants Cat to prove she wants to be with her enough to bend on the use of sacrificed murderers and rapists. IMO, Killian is far more aware of the inherent double-standard Cat's been applying. Cat's outrage at the idea of humans sacrifice might've held more weight with Killian if the Squire hadn't started a very bloody rebellion for use as a stepping stone.

amc

besides, i could have sworn that it was mentioned somewhere early on, that Cat is bisexual (not necessarily gay). I guess, the fact that the cast has only ever seen her with Killian, just gives the impression.

Tal Morgan

The tragedy is that, at least as far as titles are concerned, Talbrot has a pretty solid point. The kind of chaos Callow has undergone, a few nods to tradition like that could be a much-needed stabilising factor. Inherited titles might be ripe for abuse, but they do at least tend to cause less rampant upheaval than “whatever you can claim by might is yours by right,” something I suspect Callow would appreciate.

Euodiachloris

Hmmmmmm... no. If Cat throws her “foundling; orphan; could be anybody” status away simply to make chummy with the upper crust, she cuts herself off from her own sense of identity, not to mention the very roots of her own Story (in her head, she’s not rising simply to be a rags to riches Cinderella who will live happily ever nobily after with oodles of children to ensure a legacy – she’s got far more than that tale on her plate).

For her, chuckling “Foundling” out equates to yanking some of the batteries out of her Role while she’s busy using it. Bad Things, nothing but.

Chapter 35: Questions

“To bargain with devils is to paint with your own blood: the greater the work, the harsher the price.”

– Dread Empress Maleficent II

I shivered in discomfort when I crossed the boundary into the prison. It felt wrong in a fundamental way, and if I’d not already gotten enough hints that becoming the Duchess of Moonless Nights had changed my nature in some eldritch way this would have done the trick. There were worrying aspects to that. I’d already made sure that cold iron didn’t really hurt me more than any other kind, but Masego was of the opinion that spells crafted to affect entities not of Creation would sting a great deal more than they used to. Given that diabolism as a sorcerous discipline dealt with exactly that, I was going to have to take a few precautions before dealing with Akua. Who was now Diabolist. If she could be sure she could grab a godsdamned Hashmallim before even coming into the Name, she could deal with my bastardized fae title: those two things weren’t even close to being in the same league. I shook away the thought. The place where I now stood wasn’t another dimension, not exactly. The way Hierophant told it, if he was to keep the Princess of High Noon contained he very much needed for her to be in Creation.

Her power was lesser here, a large part of it surrendered to cross a threshold she did not belong on this side of. If she was in a pocket dimension, however, then all bets were off. Even after being robbed of the sun, Princess Sulia was absurdly powerful and she might just rip her way through the wards with her bare hands if she needed to. So the prison my mages maintained was on Creation, a complicated array that had me reaching for a drink just to look at the plans of. I'd forced Masego to use progressively smaller splurges of magic babble until he found the right metaphor: the whole thing was a drain, more or less. A bunch of escapements had been attached to her that bled out power as quick as she regained it, dispersing it into Creation. The results weren't pretty: the grounds around the prison were alarming to look at, a circle of land that grew, got overripe and died in the span of a dozen heartbeats. And then again, and again, and again.

Ratface had poked his nose in and asked whether the phenomenon could be used to accelerate crops, and gotten the reply that it could. But the crops would be, essentially, plant-shaped dust. And possibly poisonous as well, because why wouldn't the fae make this as horrifying as possible? I'd left the quartermaster plotting with Pickler about possible uses for it, catching something about 'targeting farmland' but also 'spoiling rations'. Should have expected that, really. It was the Praesi way to look at things best left not meddled with and ask 'can we make a weapon out of this?'. That's how you lot got the Wasteland, Ratface. They were still a step short of cackling and attempting to steal another country's weather on the villain ladder, but I'd remind Hakram to keep an eye on those two anyway. The last thing I needed was a bunch of Summer-birthed plant monsters running amok in Callow when we finally gave the Courts the boot.

The Princess of High Noon was still hovering in the air, runic shackles on both her wrists and ankles. She was awake now though. Her hair was fire, much like Kilian's when she drew too deep on sorcery, but that was where the resemblance ended. My... Senior Mage looked human, though more delicate in her bones than the average Duni. There was nothing mortal about the looks of Princess Sulia, though: she was power made flesh, a blind sculptor's dream of what people would look like.

"My warden visits," the Princess of High Noon said.

"That'd be Hierophant," I replied easily. "Though I suppose the responsibility ultimately lies with me."

"Have you come merely to equivocate, Duchess?" the fae said. "If so, spare me your presence. Better silence than your ramblings."

"I came to talk," I said. "I happen to have a few questions for you."

"And I will indulge you in this?" the princess mocked.

"Could be I'll have you tortured if you don't," I noted.

The mocking smile did not wane in the slightest.

"I have been under the knives of Winter across many, many lives," she said. "Anything mortals could muster would be childish imitation."

"Speaking as someone who's been on Masego's operating table, you are very much mistaken," I said. "And that was when he was helping. But you're right. I won't have you tortured. I don't really condone the practice, as a rule."

"Then the King of Winter has left traces of who you once were inside this misshapen carcass you wear," Princess Sulia said. "Rejoice, Duchess. You are less an abomination than you could be."

"Again with the abomination talk," I said, rolling my eyes. "That's no way to treat someone come to bargain with you, Sulia."

She actually laughed at that. It didn't sound like a person's laugh, more like exhaustion and heat and the clash of steel against steel.

"You have already struck bargains, mortal," she sneered. "Two that my eyes can see. I wonder what you promised Larat, to have him risk my wrath on the field."

That was the Prince of Nightfall's name, I was pretty sure. The Winter King had mentioned it once, but the whole getting my heart ripped out afterwards adventure had ensured it didn't have a place of honour in my memory.

"I'll trade that secret, for questions answered truly," I said.

Her eyes turned to me, and if I had not stolen a mantle of power I suspected it would have physically hurt me to meet her gaze. Even as it was, it pricked behind my eyes to match her stare for stare.

"I do not often bargain with your kind," she said.

"I imagine the while incinerating them on sight thing limits your options in that regard," I replied drily.

"There is little of worth to be found amongst mortals," she shrugged, or tried to.

Her bindings didn't allow a lot of room for movement. Normally she wouldn't even be able to speak, but Hierophant had released that binding before I came in.

"Nine questions," I said. "And I will give you the terms of my bargain with the Prince of Nightfall. You are to answer them to my satisfaction, or they will not count."

"You seek to rob me, child," she sneered.

"I already have," I replied with my most unpleasant smile. "Yoink, remember?"

Her face boiled with anger and I cursed myself mentally. I really need to learn to shut my mouth when treating with monsters. If I'd managed to not fucking declare war on the King of Winter halfway through our conversation, in the middle of his very seat of power no less, I'd still have an actual heart instead of whatever he'd shoved into my chest.

"Enjoy that transient victory, Duchess," she said. "Summer comes for you now, and there is no escape."

I sighed.

"You know, I don't actually want to fight you people," I said, using 'people' in the loosest sense of the word. "You invaded my home without provocation and started butchering everyone that didn't kneel to a queen from another realm. I'm not Ranger, Sulia. I don't get into death matches with demigods for the bragging rights."

"You think we want to stride this godforsaken wasteland?" she burst out. "Creation is madness. The disorder is like an itch none of us can scratch, and the people —"

She bit her tongue, glaring at me like I'd forced her to speak up.

"Nine questions," I repeated. "For the terms the Prince of Nightfall gave me."

I paused and hastily continued.

"With the previous stipulations added," I finished.

I still had the pact the King of Winter had forced on me to barter with if that wasn't enough, though I'd rather avoid handing a potential weakness like that hand wrapped to one of my most dangerous enemies. The Princess of High Noon was supposedly terrible at scheming, but the rest of Summer was bound to have some noble that was a fair hand at it. The fae grit her teeth, but after a long silence calmed herself.

"I accept this bargain, as the terms were stated," she said.

Gods, finally. I'd been after answers since the moment the damned Winter Court had popped up in Marchford and so far had gotten only cryptic comments for my troubles. I'd thought about getting my hands on a Winter noble for interrogation more than once, but I wouldn't be able to trust answers from someone too low in the pecking order – and a Count was probably as high as I could aim to grab, even now. The Princess of High Noon was second only to the queen, in the Summer Court, and probably the least tricky operator I could hope for at that hallowed height.

"Why did the Summer Court invade Callow?" I immediately asked.

"It was an obligation," Sulia replied. "As Winter was waging war upon Creation, so must we. Her Majesty chose Callow as our enemy, and I know not her reasons."

That explained, to an extent, why the Courts could be both be fighting me when Masego had said they shouldn't be able to attack the same target. If Winter was fighting Praes and Summer was fighting Callow, the difference should be enough to appease whatever arcane rules they obeyed to. It also confirmed that the Summer Queen was up to something: she hadn't been forced to pick Callow, and I doubted she'd made that decision without a reason. That meant there were two fae rulers trying to get something out of my homeland, and in both cases I had no real notion of what that was.

"When the queen lives as a princess, what is her title?" I asked.

Seven questions left. This one came at Hierophant's request. He'd told me he would have a better idea of how to counter the queen if he knew what form her powers usually took.

"Princess of the Morning Star," the fae replied through gritted teeth.

Hadn't liked that one, huh. She clearly knew why I'd asked. I'd wonder about exactly what the implications of the answer were when I had mages with me to make sense of it.

"What forces remained to the Diabolist when you left the field at Liesse?" I asked.

Six questions left. This one she took better than the last. Akua had not made a friend there, looked like. She usually didn't.

"One greater devil," the Princess of High Noon said. "No more than six thousand mortals. Twice this in undead and lesser devils."

Good. This wasn't anything I couldn't deal with, considering the armies I had at my disposal. I'd have to be a raging imbecile to think this was all Diabolist had at her disposal, but it should make up the bulk of her strength on the ground. I mine could beat hers, all that was left was the battle between trump cards. That one would be harder, given how long she'd had to prepare, but I had four other Named on my side. My bag of tricks went a lot deeper than hers, these days, and if that failed I had the right kind of people to smash my way into a victory.

"What is your plan to escape this prison?" I asked.

Five questions left, and she looked furious. Had she really thought I wasn't going to ask that? I'd been dealing with the Ruling Council and the High Lords for over a year. Green I might be, but I wasn't that green. She really was terrible at this. Or simply not used to bargaining from a position of weakness, I thought. What were the odds she'd been in a story that went like this before? I very much doubted she'd ever played a question game with Winter, if the talk of torture was any indication. There was a very real chance she was flailing because she'd never stood on grounds like these before. You and me both, Sulia. I was just better than the fae at keeping my head above the water.

"I am transmuting the flesh of my left arm into power not siphoned by your array," the princess said. "It will allow me to break through the wards eventually."

"Answer's incomplete. When will you be done?" I pressed.

"In a month," she grunted.

It figured. She would probably have broken out in the middle of our tangle with Summer and wrecked our armies from the inside. Hierophant was going to have to take care of this somehow. Now, for Juniper's question.

"There are golden fae in your host," I said. "What are their weaknesses?"

Four questions left. When they'd fought against the legionaries under Nauk, they'd ripped straight through the men until Masego and I had dropped a pair of surprises into their formation to take their pressure off. They seemed to be the equivalent to the Sword of Waning day that Winter fielded, though a great deal more dangerous. Unlike the deadwood soldiers they fought in a real formation.

"The Immortals are bound to the Queen of Summer," she said. "Should she die they will perish as well."

Hardly a weakness, that. There had to be more to it.

"And?" I prompted.

"They weaken away from Summer," she grudgingly added. "They carry banners with shards of the sun, but should these be destroyed they will lose much of their power."

And now my mages had a target. Progress. I'd covered everything I'd been asked to find out by others so far, which left me four questions to try to ferret out what I personally wanted to know that didn't qualify as an 'immediate concern'. By the standards of my officers, anyway. I was of the opinion that the answers that would win us this war weren't numbers or weaknesses.

"What does the Summer Court mean to do with Callow, if they take it?" I asked.

Three questions.

"The taken territories are to be made part of Arcadia and Summer itself," the princess said. "Along with all those who live in them."

I closed my eyes, mind spinning. The Winter Court had tried to do something similar, I was pretty sure. During the attack that I'd gone into Arcadia to end, the fae had brought a shard of Arcadia into Creation. That had failed, but the Winter King had taken me as a vassal afterwards, binding Marchford to him through me. If Summer was after the same ends, then that lay at the heart of the plays on both their parts. If Summer grew larger, then the balance between it and Winter swung in their direction. It might even introduce fresh stories to the Court's advantage, and would explain why the Summer fae had been forcing Callowans to swear fealty to the Queen of Summer in my reports. I was still missing something, though. If grabbing land had been the objective, why had Winter struck one of the most fortified targets in Callow? The Fifteenth had been at Marchford for months before they began their attacks. Sure it would have been easier to cross there, but Summer had proved it wasn't impossible to do so in other places. If Winter had opened a gate into, say, Vale? They might have grabbed the entire central plains of Callow before the Legions could react. Sulia had already stated that Winter had been the ones to begin this dance, which brought forward even more questions. He hadn't been the one reacting, meaning it had been a deliberate choice.

"Why did the King of Winter target Marchford, specifically?" I asked.

Two questions.

"I cannot know for certain," the princess said.

"Your best guesses," I grunted.

"The boundaries were thinner there, making an invasion possible," the fae replied. "Or he needed a Named in his service to act in Creation without crossing himself."

Shit, hadn't given her an actual number of guesses. Just plural, so she got away with two. It wasn't worth using another question to ask for what would be more speculation on her part. I might have misread the situation, I frowned. When Summer had crossed, they'd had the weight of symmetry on their side: Winter was at war on Creation, so they must be as well. That might have made it easier for them to leave Arcadia, and they'd certainly been better at it. They'd spread a lot quicker and in several places compared to Winter's one failed beachhead. Since the Winter Court had been the ones to begin the pattern, and an unprecedented one at that, they might not have had another choice than to go for the lowest-hanging fruit that was Marchford.

Then again, if I put myself in the King's boots, what better target than Callow was there? On Calernia, at least. There was no other territory so divided and recently weakened by war. If he'd pulled this shit in the Principate, he would have been in a great deal of trouble. The Free Cities, maybe, but there were far more players there and a larger amount of Named. All he'd have to deal with here was a Squire with her crew and the Diabolist down south. My people were untested, many recently come to their Names and Akua had 'going to rebel real soon' good as stamped onto her forehead. It occurred to me, at that moment, that I might be the cause of all this. That I might have ensured the Winter Court would invade my homeland and force Summer to do the same by allowing the Liesse Rebellion to happen in the first place. I'd put blood in the water and the monsters had tasted it, taken it as invitation to come out and play.

"Merciless Gods," I whispered.

Thousands had died, in the rebellion, but how many more to the fae? All of southern Callow had been occupied. My own legion had come under assault. Hells, I'd created the perfect conditions for the Diabolist to try her crowning scheme and there was no avoiding the truth that putting that madness would be bloody work. I'd let a hero go, once, and spoken words to him. Years later and Callow was still paying the price of that decision one corpse at a time. I took hold of myself. I could not afford to show weakness in front of a Princess of Summer, even one my prisoner. I met her eyes and saw she had missed nothing. She did not delight in my horror, but neither did she shy away from it. I need to know, I thought. To get at the bottom of this, before it was too late. This was larger than fae plying their usual tricks. Both Courts were playing for larger stakes than I'd thought.

"If either Court keeps part of Callow," I asked hoarsely. "What happens in Arcadia?"

One question left. The Princess of High Noon smiled, slowly and broadly.

"I do not know," she laughed. "Nothing, my queen says, for it will pass. Everything, your king says, for that clay has never been shaped."

I felt like I'd been handed the last piece of a jigsaw puzzle, the one that made the shape of the whole clear. The Winter King didn't actually care all that much if I could force out Summer. He'd prefer it, because then any advantages that would come into being would be entirely on his side. But even if I failed, as long as I lived he still had Marchford and a Named he could influence. He would have an even deeper connection to my city than Summer would manage with their stolen territories, if he kept my heart. It dawned upon me that, as far as he was concerned, he had already won. It was just the degree of victory that remained to be determined. The Prince of Nightfall had compared the fae of Winter to foxes chewing through their own keg to escape a trap, back in Skade. Willing to destroy something part of them to escape a greater doom. And I'd seen, when I'd become the Duchess of Moonless Nights, the unending circle that was the lives and deaths of the Courts. The outcomes were always fixed from the start, but that was because in that circle there were only known quantities.

If I became part of that, if Callow did? In Arcadia, the Summer Queen had said the 'story would correct itself'. She thought this attempt would fail and everything would return to the way it used to be when the wheel turned again. She was just playing out her role as assigned to her, Summer Ascendant destroying everything in its path. But the King of Winter thought he could escape the wheel, and was gambling with the lives of everyone in Callow for his roll of the dice. It didn't matter so much that he beat Summer so long as an outcome without precedent lay at the end of the road. Even if he lost, he could be born to a different story when the wheel turned. If the wheel turned, which would no longer be a given. I'd been looking for a master plan in the Praesi tradition this whole time, but there'd never been one. It was just a desperate man throwing stones in a pond so the same old reflection would stop staring back at him. If a single thread of fae influence remained in Callow by the time this was over, it might be enough to drag then entire country into the mess. I had just become the greatest living liability to peace in my homeland.

I had to break them both, the royals on each side. Destroy everything that they were. The consequences otherwise were beyond what I could easily understand. I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. The Summer Queen. She would be the lynchpin of this, as the only one of the two I could reach.

"Sulia," I said. "What is the role at the heart of the Queen of Summer?"

My last question. My most important.

"Threefold are the duties of the Laurel Crown," she said. "To destroy Winter. To protect Aine. To see the Sun victorious."

Three, always three. And I would need them all in my palm, if I was to bend a god to my will.

"Now complete your end of the bargain, abomination," she hissed. "You've had your fill of me."

"I will take the crown of seven mortals rulers and one, to lay them at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall," I said.

Her face went still. A glimmer of something like fear passed through those shining eyes, and shit that wasn't good at all.

"You know not what you have promised," she said. "This must not come to pass."

"Then tell me why," I said.

Silence, silence and hatred.

"I thought as much," I murmured. "Sweet dreams, Princess of High Noon."

I left. I didn't look for my friends, though I felt the urge. Right now I felt too disgusted with myself, with them, with everything I had wrought since I first became the Squire. I loved them, and I should. I'd paid an ugly price for them. How many lives I claimed I wanted to save had I traded away to have them at my side? I sought someone else instead, someone who would not pick at the loathing. I needed advice, and I had the puppet of one of the greatest living rulers in Calernia within my reach. I found the woman waiting in my tent and sat down in front of the body Malicia was looking through from far, far away.

"You said you would teach me, once," I told the Empress. "So teach me now. I need to outwit a god in the flesh, before a moon has passed."

Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name, Tyrant of Dominions High and Low, Holder of the Nine Gates and Sovereign of All She Beheld, watched me for a long moment.

Then she smiled.

danh3107

Merciless gods that spooked me, as befitting of the season.

"Lo unto those who willingly seek evil, for their gifts are always given with a smile."

NerfContessa

Yep.

But, like with almost all cats decisions with what she knows at the time her only option with even a smidgen of choice init.

Darkening

Well, that's ominous as hell. Wonder how 'ruler' is defined. I mean, the principate is overflowing with princes, but maybe it has to be true overlords? Hm. Probably not, she'd have to hit... what, every kingdom on Calernia for that? There's not *that* many nations around. I can't even guess what giving Nightfall a bunch of crowns would do... Make him the Winter King forever? Perhaps with him as king winter tends to win and Sulla doesn't want that? Mm, he's a bit too martial for that if Winter's success tends to rely on their superior scheming. Also, holy hell does Ranger come for his eye when he's the king? I mean, Archer did say every time.....

stevenneiman

I think that giving him the crowns would mean that he would claim the power of them for Winter, which would shift the balance of power permanently in Winter's favor. What I think the Winter King is actually hoping for is to push the situation into something where the stories will destroy him utterly, rather than just killing him until Winter comes again and he returns as a Prince.

Alternatively, he might be hoping to merely grant the Prince of Nightfall enough power to ensure that he becomes King every time and that disrupting the pattern that much might destroy him (the current Winter King that is). He doesn't want to win, he wants the cycle to end, or at least to leave him out of it.

nehemiahnewell

Yeah, Cat's thought, that she can 'fix' this by killing the Winter King and reclaiming her heart, seems hopelessly naive. Treachery is the nature of Winter, and I don't think 'survival' is important to the King at this point. If she's of winter, and she takes back her heart, Winter still has her heart through her, and there's a symmetry to her becoming Queen of Winter and Queen of Callow at the same time, and then setting both aside at the same time.

It would be the perfect gamble that screwed her over – she needs to keep the vice-queenship for several years to get her ducks in order, but she can't hold it without tying Callow to Winter through herself. Not to mention she's having problems, if mostly subtle ones, with how much 'fae' she holds now. More and she would have to desperately deinvest herself of it, even if it cost. Fae is as limiting as Undead, in its own way, and we have the Warlocks thoughts on that subject.

I doubt the King is the only one to feel that way either. I suspect whatever Nightfall is attempting is equally hubristic, and equally unconcerned with his own survival. What's getting the Black Knight into trouble is his assumptions that other people have long term priorities like he does. It only fitting Cat gets into the same kind of trouble with the same kind of assumptions.

Theo Promes

Yeeees, Malicia ftw. the lady who climbed the tower with her brain. This will be fun.

x

Malicia is not the girl who climbed the tower.

She ruthlessly took it through murder and deceive like each emperor before her.

MrPicklesAndTea

That's how climbing that tower works silly.

narcoduck

So who actually started first? In Chapter 7 elaboration, Rider says "If Summer is at war, so must be Winter" but now Sulia says "As Winter was waging war upon Creation, so must we"

Also, Princess of the Morning Star? Ominous

rangamal thenuwara

The Winter King and Prince of Nightfall conspired to fool their own army into invading the creation first to change the story?

edrey

at first i thought the forever king had a hand in this but until now we know nothing unless the queen had fallen for him and that is her reason, we have to wait for the queen to answer that and for morning star, if i recall correctly it's the simbol of lucifer, fallen angel, demon king so if you ask me she is the perfect sacrifice for akua to open a portal to hell

callmesteve

Yeah, we already can guess that's one of Diabolist's goals.
After all that babble on the rules of conversion and how it was so difficult to open a portal, the fact that she's building a massive ritual (and the flight one was lesser!), and the fact that Foundling stated that at least no one has opened a permanent hellgate...

There will be at least an attempt.

nipi

Cat wasted a question there. She already knew that answer.

Shequi

Rider didn't actually say Summer was at war; he just said that if one was at war the other had to be.

Dragrath

Well The morning star at least irl is Venus which has long been associated with beauty. Or at least until we actually visited the place and realized it is a literal depiction of hell only worse... That and the name does have a connection to the devil's name before his fall so yeah lots of ominous grounds but with the added perks of divinity based around beauty..
So I am quite curious how the name will play out in a story all about names and roles.

pyrohawk21

That is NEVER a good sign. And dear gods am I scared to find out just what giving the Prince of Nightfall the crowns of 8 mortal rulers will do to, and probably through, him...

x

And ONE, I guess that'll be either the head of summer por winter.

stevenneiman

No, it specifically said MORTAL rulers.

edrey

well, i think is the free cities, 7 cities and anaxeres as the head with a crown no crown

nipi

7 mortal rulers and one. The last one doesnt have to be mortal.

callmesteve

Yes, seven mortal rulers, *and one*. That sounds like an important distinction even beyond the usual "year and a DAY" counting used in that sort of thing. Normally these big bargains have that, but here it seems even more.

I suspect that it's some sort of story or rule of ascendance, where he gains power over all creation (pun intended, and maybe it's that way on purpose), or at least can stop the battles going on. It might also be sacrificial, since I somehow suspect that sort of power would be tied to/countered by an impermanence in the form of his death, but all heck is likely to break loose.

It is likely a symbol of fealty to him, or in proving that he (well, his champion) can defeat the others, making him the ultimate ruler.

I keep hoping that she finds a way to take out both sides in truth, but it's going to be tough. Some of the shenanigans she has pulled are epic, but taking out Arcadia (is it possible to do that for good)? That is really one for the record books. Still, the fae are not as fun to read about as some of the games that she has played against mortal opponents. Those at least are both more unpredictable and less impossible to defeat. The fae and elves have the deck stacked too far in their favor, though I suppose that's also a reason to take them down.

My guess is she manages to do it, but then Diabolist uses the distraction to open the gate and the fourth book will be in one of the hells.

I also hope that she can repair her friendship with Killian. That was rather sad. There weren't really any good options for that battle.

Jago

With Thief in her group, there is an interesting trick that Cat can try, depending on the burial uses of the past: robbing 8 graves of kings, possibly people whose line and kingdom have ceased to exist centuries ago. That will neuter the symbolic value of the crowns while fulfilling the letter of the bargain.

MetruX

Just reading late the last chapter when this one came to pass... I must say that I'm already imagining how she's going to twist those three to beat the Queen...

Byzantine

I don't think she wants to beat the queen. She wants the King and Queen to destroy each other.

rangamal thenuwara

Yeah, most brute-force/straightforward way to solve her dilemma would be to betray Winter and with the support of Summer defeat Winter and force Winter King to release Cat and then back stab Summer. I guess that's where the teachings of Malicia will come in handy? Or maybe that plan requires too many things to go right – making it just wishful thinking?

callmesteve

That both sounds more fun (read as controlled chaos) and more likely, considering how she fights. First a big crazy mess and on-the-fly planning, and then a drag-out fight where she refuses to give up. That sounds more like it will lead to the aforementioned event.

RoflCat

Destroy Winter – technically Cat's goal is now to destroy BOTH Summer and Winter, to ensure neither have a lasting hold in Creation as well as sorta fulfill Winter King's desire of breaking the loop.

Protect Aine – never going to invade that anyway, no problem here

Sun victorious – I think Cat might use Sulia's sun on Akua, to 'defeat' her thus making it a victory for the Sun. (I feel like Icarus story would work, with the sun burning away whatever sorceries Akua used to keep the city afloat) Though in order to do this and makes it fulfill the Queen's role, Cat might have to make Sulia the Queen instead.

nipi

There are a lot of Callowans in that city. Cats not going to be all that keen on dropping it from the sky. Well not before an evacuation through a portal or something an even then its her city. Those are expensive to build.

callmesteve

A portal like the one that Akua is planning to create?
Admittedly, that one likely goes to a hell...

nehemiahnewell

Hmm, a mix of answers we already know, and hints of things to come. I'm surprised she needed the question about the Winter King, as he basically told her just that, while the bit about the crowns is ominous as hell.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Nine is thrice three, and thrice three is a killing stroke according to Villainous Interlude: Cadenza. The nine questions to kill Arcadia.

nerfworld

That's some heavy foreshadowing for sure, now putting money on squire never being a knight and just becomes next empress

callmesteve

Somehow I don't think that would happen. She seems like a hero in that still. She'll break down what needs to be, but once done she'll likely pass the role to someone else. She is mainly really good at fighting and accidentally good at politics (sorta), but she really hates the latter, and ruling in general. The former is also frustrating to her because she is always outnumbered and hates losing both the sacrifices she must make and the losses in war, ESPECIALLY against people like Heiress who don't care about casualties so long as it gets them what they want.

So, since she uses the Gordian Knot approach, I suspect that once she gets all the (other?) insane murdering astartsbay out of the picture, she will toss it back, maybe even to Malicia, if she can really be trusted to continue to break the cycle of win/loss AND be nice to Callow while at it. If not, I suspect she will stay loosely affiliated with a similar goal, and try to break the whole story for good.

At that point, it sounds to me like the only possible successful outcome is to break all magic and make everyone normal, without villains or heroes, but that seems like there should still be a better outcome than I am thinking of. I really hate "The Magic Fades" as a theme, and it's overplayed. It is also too predictable an ending to be worthy of this work so far. So, it almost can't happen because PG2E won't play anything that we expect, unless this really is what we don't expect since we expect it and know that it won't be used for that reason... but that way doth madness lie. I'll say that, meanwhile, expecting the unexpected is not truly expecting, since it is still unexpected even if it's expected, or else you'd know what it is. So, hopefully, that part won't change.

This awe-inspiring twist of always winning in a way no one expects seems to be the true subtext of this work so far: Gambit Rouletting into a seemingly normal ending, but before it happens, twisting it into a new and awesome one.

The win at the battle of four armies, or whatever it's called, where she beat Akua that first time: She played them all and then took a draw, but she got a really good commander and her own army out of that against all the odds and Akua's cheating. The win against the Lone Swordsman: She wrested control of that ritual from both him and Heiress, shutting his plan down hard and getting herself resurrected by ripping off an angel, the torturing the ever-living crap out of those responsible.

So, I can hope that the ending to this will be similar, where the cycle of fighting can die out, AND Names stay. Perhaps they can get new ones that are also suited to peaceful use. The argument between the gods is also interesting; the dark ones want man to learn, not follow. This may mean that if evil wins or breaks the game, that there might be something more after.

I hope that the next arc ending is similar to the others. I / like/ the serious-but-mostly-nonlethal approach so far, and really hope that Foundling does not suffer a major loss in the process of delivering a good arse-kicking. I don't know how that will go: Around this time, there's usually a dark-before-the-dawn moment when people close to them are hurt, but that is tricky. On one hand, it seems like it has to be played to remind her of the stakes and give resolve (and remind the reader that it's not all sweetness and light), but she has that already, it's horribly sad and upsetting to the readers too, and there does still seem to be a noticeable lack of sweetness or light (hellooo, this is about a villain...), and she just had a bunch of her army TPK'd by the fae queen. Maybe that counts? Also, that trope is used in near-literally every book of this genre, so perhaps the genre-breaking will come in again? Crappy stuff is bad, but crappy stuff that we can partially guess feels worse. I dislike when the plot suddenly gets all dark because everything else has already happened and the stage has to be set for the real big bad. The plot might be some shade of grey because of all the stuff Heiress has done and what bargains Foundling has to make, but PLEASE don't take that next step. The previous (4th) paragraph highlights why I like this. It's tough, and not always all shiny; but she always has an epic win. Changing this would break *this* story for me.

Another note is that this normally applies to heroes. What does an antivillain get? Do they get similar treatment since nothing goes well for them, or does it not apply because it's hero-only? Would it imply that she is still somewhat heroic? She is already enough disadvantaged without losing someone.

Oh, dear, it's going to be Killian, isn't it... No Name, currently distanced, currently no purpose save as a mage, emotional attachment AND no way to make it up after she's dead... ohcrap. I really hope that this does not happen to anyone..

D. D. Webb

It is redundant in this of all stories to say "that's not good," but damn, that is not good.

callmesteve

Awesome! You read this too? I need to catch up on TGaB again...

Byzantine

So, anyone care to find the story to see what has her so spooked about that promise?

Spinner335

Mwahahahahahahaha

TheCount

hehe...heheHEHEHEE*maniacal laugh*
ahem

even if by symbol only, giving him the crowns would make him the ruler of the kingdoms they are from, as he can appoint the new rulers, who would (most likely) need to swear fealty not to the king of winter, but to the one who is the prince of nightfalls... giving him easy acces to creation.... or the ovnership of most of calernia...

but thats just my opinion, would you like some tea?

Bonesawer

woot-WOOT! This was a masterful chapter.

Sean

It feels like Malicia and Black have fulfilled one of their greatest ambitions. They've crafted a weapon with which to break the story in one of the most fundamental ways that could be imagined. Her name is Cat, and she's about to commit theocide.

shimizubad

the term is deicide, but besides that, I think you're right

nipi

So a possible next name for cat Deicide or maybe just God-slayer?

callmesteve

I do suspect that was the goal, yes. I think even Malicia could not have done it, and may try to stop her in the end, but ouch. She's a villain/hero hybrid, and I suspect that those circumstances are going to be innately important to whatever she ends up. It's also dangerous to her sanity, and the safety of, well, everyone. Fear the decent person, for there is not limit to what they can do if they feel they must...

Hopefully it does not result in Black's death, though. He's been expecting it, but what if there was no chain of three because Foundling will get White first? That mentor role does tend to lead to death for them, but if Foundling CAN get a new name that isn't Black Knight, perhaps it will be short-circuited. Masego got Hierophant, a power upgrade that still leaves Warlock alive. If there are any parallels, she'll get a new (in both senses of the word) Name that leaves Black alive. It would also be funny if Black can be proven wrong or outmaneuvered in this.

Again, Black's death seems unnecessary (he thinks it is, but Cat's MO is to get new endings that work out better than expected) and it would be an expected event. It would break more precedents (both in and out of the story world) if he survives, the new breed of villain is attempting to be one where they work as a team and don't try to kill each other off (Not quite the same, but I view replacement as similar; they actually are friends and not like Sith lords), and it would both give her more supporters and be a happier event. That assumes that the story does not want to make a turn for the dark. I always worry about that.

stevenneiman

As everyone else has already said, that is ominous. I'd love to find out what exactly will happen when the Prince of Nightfall gets his seven crowns and one, but I doubt it will be good (or Good) for anyone involved.

Onto my usual business, the typo thread.

"she might just rip her [ay->way] through the wards"

"Again with [he->the] abomination talk"

"I imagine the [while->whole] incinerating them on sight thing limits your options"

"[I mine could beat hers,->if mine could beat hers,/Mine could beat hers;] all that was left was the battle between trump cards" depending on whether it's a conditional statement or two assertions.

edrey

great, cat had go from "only taken what i need" to "i need to kill all royals" and about her been part of winter, it should end if she change to other name so for the next arc she should be a full fledged knight

Dragrath

That assumes she will ever be a true knight as I feel she has broken so far from the mold that any name she gains may be unpredictable after all she has been raised to break stories not to carry their mantle forward.

RoflCat

If anything, she already paved a path for her to become a ruler Name with the Sword in Stone before.

So far I've seen 4 ruling names that Cat has had contact with in some form.

Queen – the time the Harshmallim attempted to convert her to Good.

Empress – the tower song

Warlord – At least Hakram and Juniper already call her that.

Matron – Ranker

But if she's going to break the mold, I get a feeling whatever her name ends up as there'll be a massive twist to it.

Like if she does become a Knight, it'd be something like Rogue Knight.

Dread Queen (not Empress)

etc.

callmesteve

I call Warlord, Knight, or Foundling. It really would be a great twist if those pre-chapter blurbs don't just refer to her by name, but Name... I should check. How do they refer to other Named?

Warlord could be fun since it fits well and only orcs could get those before. She gets along well with them, and orc names are actually back again, and the only-for-orcs bit simply makes it more likely because of how she tends to break things like that. It would be a great warning to the others, too, since they'd have to take notice that a human got a terrifying ORC Name.

Knight would be neat since she trained as a squire and combines elements of both good and bad – thus she can't truly be either black or white. This way she avoids becoming the indoctrinated Good or replacing her mentor Black. It would imply that she actually broke this role too. (Perhaps a better name would be Grey Knight – she sees the world in shades of it already (Good is not good, and Evil can be), and it's quite a powerful role. Lots of authority and some measure of autonomy, since she would be solely bound by her own ethics.)

Foundling would also be an interesting one. I have no idea what it might actually do, but she's been fairly well foreshadowed to get it. It is interesting in its own right since it implies that she has formed a new Role that no one has ever used before by dint of her... unique... methodology and ethics, and it implies her heroic origins (what else does an orphan become?). It also means that she has moved so many people by what she has done that it warped her name and status into a Name. Better yet, she can squash those annoying people bugging her about heraldry and so forth (I imagine that if she gets a full name, the people bleating about marrying her off will disappear in fear of an... accident). If she gets THAT as her Name, she gains enough power she can ignore them, yet it is also a permanent uncomfortable reminder of who she really is: The peasant-hero who broke (will break?) the nobility. She even has a pipe for them to smoke it in.

H.

Seven mortal crowns, and one.

Seven mortal. And one more *who isn't*.

Cat just vowed to defeat the Dead King, he who Ranger invades for fun.

And she didn't even notice! Really, *really* not a good oath to have sworn.

Gunslinger

I'd say the summer queen would factor into it too. That's probably what freaked Sulia out.

Morgenstern

As would the Winter King... And probably some other smaller gods as well, who knows.

callmesteve

I almost suspect she'll fail, but steal her heart back later and kick the crap out of them for it too.
She's allied with Thief as well... Does she need to do it personally?

Phantom

The mention of the the Princes' Graveyard, in the top quotes before might gave a hint to what had happened to Cat trying to acquire the crowns.

edrey

no, the prince graveyard should be in the war with procer, killing the prince of hanoven, the uncle of the first prince, this arc shouldn't be that long,

nipi

- 1) Throw an existing kingdom into chaos.
- 2) Induce it to fracture into smaller kingdoms.
- 3) Take the crowns of the rulers of said kingdoms. Dont necessarily even have to kill them. All that was asked for were the crowns.

2xMachina

Even better: Crown 8 village heads as Kings under Cat. Take back the crown and pass it to Nightfall. Promptly dissolve the 8 Kingdoms.

Unoriginal

Won't work like that, this is the kind of story there is a villain smart-ass who makes an enemy of the hero to be that way, by for example saying (the villain) saying that he would let the heroes family go before promptly dropping them off a cliff. This isn't an exact comparison but its the general way stories flow and what might work in stories for heroes doesn't always for villains even in Arcadia.

Anyways, while the Fae might have to accept such a technicality it's not a good idea to borrow trouble, much less from the Fae.

Unoriginal

Wrote that really fast and didn't spell check until after I posted so here are some corrections for my other comment.

Won't work like that > It doesn't work that way

This is the kind of story there is... to be that way > This is the kind of story where the villain is a smart ass who makes an enemy of the hero by for example telling the hero he would let his family go before promptly dropping the family off the cliff.

beleester

Even symbolically giving the Fae a crown might be a problem, given how they run on stories. We've seen the characters make things happen by doing things that *look* like stories even if they really aren't. Cat managed to make herself a Duchess by taking the Duke's signet ring. And she got her victory in Liesse by declaring herself heir to the throne of Callow and pulling a sword from a stone, even though the kingdom is long dead and the sword wasn't set up for that purpose.

ForgottenToupee

So the thing that sticks out to me the most is that Sulia won't tell Cat why the Prince of Nightfall must not get those crowns. Unless it's a magically significant thing that Maesgo will explain, I kinda think it's something Cat also has the power use since she is Winter and Named. Otherwise, there wouldn't be a problem with telling Cat, right?

callmesteve

Ooooh, interesting...

thatthing

Love your story, thanks for the chapter.

Q this chapter

"Threefold are the duties of the Laurel Crown," she said. "To destroy Winter. To protect Aine. To see the Sun victorious."

....

"I will take the crown of seven mortals rulers and one, to lay them at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall," I said.

/Q

Most obvious 'plus one' crown, but not certain. The Laurel Crown belonging to the former Princess of the Morning Star.

Implications of that name are unclear to me, as a Lucifer link (angel and demon both, Diabolist?) seems too far-reaching and planet Venus unlikely.

Q ch 13

"If I were a prince," the King told me, "I would be the Prince of Bleak Solstice. Some of that remains even under the Deadwood Crown."

....

"I charge you with the defeat of Summer, Catherine Foundling. I charge you with the making of peace, exacted from the battlefield."

The other the Deadwood Crown belonging to the former Prince of Bleak Solstice.

Wiki. ""The Solstice occurs twice each year (around June 21 and December 21) as the Sun reaches its most northerly or southerly excursion relative to the celestial equator on the celestial sphere....the term solstice can also be used in a broader sense, as the day when this occurs. The day of the solstice has either the most sunlight of the year (summer solstice) or the least sunlight of the year (winter solstice) for any place other than the equator.""

Do we know the in story season/date? And in a month?

Also, in the first book there was something of a Lost Crown (bar?), which i suppose referred to the Crown of Callow?

Fun times ahead.

Big Brother

I feel like the Seven Mortal's Crowns and One are a way for the Prince of Nightfall to become the Winter King AND let him step into Creation with his full power.

But, what happens if the crowns are laid at the feet of, say, a quarter Fae from Summer. There's quite a bit of weight to a Duchess from Winter offering what is essentially a Champion's Tribute to a member of Summer. Because a Champion conquers the lands and hands the rights to their liege.

Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name, Tyrant of Dominions High and Low, Holder of the Nine Gates and Sovereign of All She Beheld, watched me for a long moment.

No, Beheld.

Nastybarsteward

So, the heads of seven mortal rulers. Can the plus one be his own head, neatly placed atop the seven others, at his own feet...? 😊

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Nocebo

Well, getting the crowns won't be THAT hard with Thief around

TideofKhatanga

Especially since Thief has one herself.
I wonder how precisely defined is "crown" there. There's probably seven countries on Calernia that use crowns as their currency.

nipi

Cat hands the Prince of Nightfall 8 coins and walks away laughing.

Well probably not.

Misterspokes

The promise is for the Crowns of Seven Mortal*s* rulers and one. Why can't it refer to the choirs of angels whom Lord over Creation in Control of the Narrative? The and one could be any of the semimortals we've met, including the king of the dead, winter king, summer queen or even someone like Malica to represent Evil...

callmesteve

Yesss... Is that not a typo after all... That could get REALLY bad.

jonnnney

Does anyone else think the seven mortal rulers are the 7 high lords of Praes?

I really REALLY want Cat to become the Gray Knight.

also... oh. oh SHIT. now I think I'm beginning to see what the Wandering Bard is working towards, and what she's afraid of. how far will this ripple go? how far has it already gone?

ArcWraith

Seven mortal rulers and one? That could be miscellaneous rulers across Calernia, but I think its more specific. I'm guessing he wants the Free Cities. 7 cities, and one Heirach.

Chapter 36: Malice

"It is impossible for the Empire to make an appreciable gain so long as this gain is a loss to every other nation on Calernia. To remedy this, we must discard the traditional lines of allying only to Evil polities and make it so that it is in the interest of other powers for us to rise."

– Extract from 'The Death of the Age of Wonders', a treatise by Dread Empress Malicia

"When beginning a scheme, one must first consider the desired outcome," the Empress said. "All other practicalities are derived from this, and determining whether that outcome is feasible at all is the most important part of the process."

I'd lit candles, tired of the gloom inside my tent even if I could see through it. Malicia had taken one of my folding chairs and somehow managed to make it feel like a throne just by the way she held herself – through another woman's body, no less – while I'd dropped into the seat forcefully borrowed from the Count of Old Oak. 'Looted' was such an ugly word. I'd used one of the candles to light up my pipe and propped up my feet against a low stool. Black had never insisted on a formal setting for his lectures and the Empress seemed inclined to continue along the same lines. I'd laid off the wine for the night, deciding the wakeleaf would be indulgence enough. At this rate I was going to run out of satchels of the stuff, though now that Ratface had the Smugglers under him getting my hands on more shouldn't be too troublesome. Still costly, though. Letting out a stream of smoke to the side, I drummed fingers against the ornate chair arm. I knew what I wanted, I was just pondering the right phrasing.

"I want the fae out of Callow and their influence removed," I said.

Malicia smiled. It wasn't breath-taking, not the way I knew she was in person, but just looking at it made me feel at ease. Comfortable. Like I was sitting across from an old friend and not one of the most dangerous women alive. It was the smile of someone who had studied the image that best brought out those feelings and crafted a flawless replica to wear. The Empress was made up of smoke and mirrors in arrangements that had been refined for decades, an illusion masterful enough that it remained effective even while I knew what she was doing. She was everything Akua Sahelian wanted to be, and wasn't that a terrifying thought?

"You are using an absolute, Catherine," she chided. "Avoid these, for they leave no room for compromise. You should be aware, by now, that there is no such thing as an absolute victory. The Empire conquered Callow through overwhelming military victory, but did this remove the realities of its occupation? Compromise, much as you dislike it, is a necessity. Without something to offer as boon, your enemy has nothing to lose. This ensures from the beginning that your opposition will be entrenched."

"The Imperial governorships don't feel like a compromise, from where I stand," I pointed out.

"Because they were not a compromise with Callow, whose perspective you still espouse in large part," Malicia replied. "They were the boon granted to the High Lords after they were denied the direct subjection they believed their due."

I grimaced. Praesi aristocrats ruling over Callowan cities would have been... bad. The way the histories said the Proceran occupation had been, and probably even worse. When Callow had been divided into a handful of principalities under royals that displaced the old aristocracy, the entire kingdom had been in state of constant simmering rebellion. The knightly orders turned bandit against the foreigners, Principate dignitaries were knifed in dark alleys by everyone from thieves to merchants and fields went untilled as farmers disappeared into the countryside rather than toil for the invader. It hadn't been great battles that saw the Principate withdraw but the constant grind of attrition on every facet of the occupation.

"That would have been disastrous," I said.

"Very much so," Malicia agreed. "That is not to say the governorships were not designed to quell unrest, of course. It is not happenstance that Imperial governors were only granted four year mandates, or that Amadeus was given authority to oversee them."

I drew on my pipe, looking for the meaning in that. Four year mandates. From where I stood, what did they mean? The sweet smoke hung in the air before my eyes for a while, until I dug far enough back in my childhood I could get a handle on what she'd meant.

"Mazus was hated," I said. "But every four years, there was hope he wouldn't be given another mandate. That his abuses would come to the attention of the Tower and that he'd be recalled."

"Impermanence," the Empress said. "That was the key. The belief that the enemy could be removed, if they were patient. And who did you look to for salvation, in this matter?"

"The Tower," I said. "Black."

I kept my breathing steady, but my blood ran cold. Every time I thought I understood the breadth of the plans they'd made to keep Callow part of the Empire, I found another hidden knife. It was deceptively simple, wasn't it? If the heroes that popped up failed and failed visibly, then relief had to come from another source and the only one available was the Tower. Imperial governors had been allowed relatively minor abuses that filled their pockets and kept their families happy in the Wasteland, while my people were taught to look for deliverance in Ater one mandate at a time.

"To conclude this matter," Malicia said, "that is why your abolishment of this system is not offensive to me. I no longer need to appease the High Lords, for as an internal threat they are ended for the foreseeable future. The remaining objective is to stabilize Callow as part of the Empire, and you represent a valid alternative in this."

I dimly realized, in that moment, that this exchange had not occurred naturally. She had, even before first mentioning the occupation, known how I would react to that mention. The Empress had then used what I'd say to lead into what was both a lesson about what I'd come to her for help and a gentle reminder of the political currents I'd have to deal with when getting Callow back on its feet after all this. Gods. It was such a little thing, but such a telling one. That a woman I'd barely spoken to a handful of times could predict me this easily and fold that into a broader intent without missing a step. I cleared my throat.

"No absolutes," I conceded. "I want the fae physically gone from Callow and any harmful influence removed."

"Good," Malicia smiled, and for a fleeting moment I was reminded of sunny days on the docks and the first girl I'd ever kissed.

There'd been seemingly genuine joy on her face and for a heartbeat I'd believed it. She wasn't using sorcery, I knew that. There was no artefact or Speaking at work. She could spin me around with just words and body language. I wondered if it was more effective because I was Named – I'd not been able to study people so closely or accurately, before becoming the Squire. I'd become more sensitive to details, and that sensitivity would feed straight into her game: I'd grown used to listening to my instincts, and my instincts told me what I saw was true. Gods, if that was true then she'd managed to turn one of the basic advantages every Named took for granted into an edge for her alone without exerting so much as a speck of power. I reached for the bundle of Winter inside me, let the freezing cold flow through my veins. I was careful not to let the bleed affect the temperature, since it would be as good as sending up a written notice of what I was doing. The icy sensation spreading through me brought some much-needed clarity with it. I pulled at my pipe to hide the vapour that would have come out of my mouth amidst the wakeleaf smoke.

"Then let us speak of the entities that would stand in your way, should you seek to achieve this," the Empress said.

"The Winter Court," I said. "The Summer Court. Possibly the Diabolist, if she goes full opportunist."

"These are entities that will actively oppose you," she said. "Extend your perspective, my dear, to those who do not want you to fail but may withhold assistance for their own interests."

I frowned.

"The Dark Guilds," I said. "Some of the upper echelons of the Legions of Terror. I'd say the High Lords, but you seem to have them in hand."

"Those of them that would invest in seeing you defeated have already done so through the Diabolist," Malicia said. "You may consider the aristocracy of the Wasteland as no longer in play. Let us begin with the lesser liabilities. How can you clear them away?"

"I have no leverage on the Guild of Assassins," I admitted. "Haven't found a real way to affect them aside from threats. The Smugglers have been scared into cooperation. And for the Legions, doing anything there is like throwing a stone in a glass house."

They answer to you and Black alone, so meddling never struck me as being in the cards."

"That is because you still think of yourself as a separate entity from the Empire," the Empress gently said. "Discard this perception, Catherine. A few scrying sessions making it clear that you speak with my authority end the issue entirely. If I am to rely on you, as you wish me to, learn to rely on me as well."

I balked, more out of habit than any reason I could express in words. I fiddled with the shaft of dragonbone and forced myself to seriously consider what the Empress had said. Had I ever really considered myself as part of Praes? I already knew the answer to that, deep down. I'd taken my first steps onto this path with the notion that I would join the Legions to gain authority and then use this authority to change things in Callow. The heart of it had always been that I'd be part of the Praesi hierarchy without ever belonging in it. I'd stuck to that, even as the situation changed month by month. I'd relied on Black, sure, but only to teach me and shield me from other Wastelanders. Even when I'd forged the Ruling Council, the motives for its structure had all revolved around limiting Praesi influence in my homeland. There was a reason it had stung back in Laure, when Thief had called me a collaborator. I still saw the Empire as the enemy and for years I'd been dancing from one flourish of rhetoric to another to avoid owning up to that, because almost everyone I loved came from it. Saying I didn't oppose Praes, just the parts of it I found unacceptable. That I was willing to live with what it could be, if not what it was right now.

But I was running out of excuses to not make use of the parts of the Empire that I'd already said I believed in. I wasn't above throwing around my weight as the Squire to get my way, because I'd always thought of the Name as mine. But it wasn't, not really. Praes at large listened to the Squire because she was the apprentice to the Black Knight, the leading villain of the next generation of Calamities. The moment I'd taken Black's hand I'd chosen a side for everyone to see, and lying to myself about it wouldn't get me anywhere. I couldn't have the authority coming from being part of the Tower's rule without actually being part of the Tower's rule. It wasn't a nice thought. It was bitter, and it felt like I was spitting on everything I'd ever dreamed of as a girl. But it would work. And if I kept mouthing off to heroes about how their pride and principles just got in the way of getting the shit that mattered done, then I had better be ready to follow through. Otherwise I should not have lived this long.

"Then please do so, Your Majesty," I said, taking a deep breath. "Can I assume you have leverage on the Dark Guilds?"

"Malicia," the Empress reminded me. "Call me Malicia, darling. And I have a few irons in the fire. Scribe was the one to call them to heel after the Conquest but I've people in their ranks. Enough that a message can be sent."

I breathed out. There were only smouldering remnants in my pipe, so I took a last pull from it and set it aside. The smoke drifted lazily in the candlelight, a wall that would do nothing at all to protect me from the woman in front of me.

"That leaves the worst three," I said.

The Empress shifted slightly in her seat and I side-eyed her. There was something... In some intangible way, I felt like I could trust her more now. Also like I should take my feet off the stool and straighten up. The Winter cold wavered when I realized exactly what she'd done. She's mimicking Black's body language, I thought, horrifyingly impressed. If they were closer in height I might never have noticed. There was an amused glint in the puppet's eyes when I stared at her face. She knew perfectly well that I'd noticed.

"We arrive at the interesting part," the Empress said. "Before touching upon how these entities can be affected by us, consider their nature as agents and how this informs their actions."

My brow creased.

"I'm not sure I follow," I said.

"As an example, let us study Cordelia Hasenbach," Malicia said.

I leaned forward interestedly. It wasn't everyday I got to have an assessment of the ruler of the Principate from the mouth of the very same woman who'd been fighting her across the continent for the better part of a decade.

"At first glance, dearest Cordelia is the most powerful individual on the surface of Calernia," the other woman said. "She commands the largest and wealthiest nation on the continent, her armies are recently blooded and her personal diplomatic reputation is pristine."

"Procer's isn't," I immediately said. "The reputation, I mean. No one that has a border with the Principate remembers them fondly."

"Indeed," Malicia smiled. "The history of the nation she rules does influence what actions she can and cannot take. At a more basic level, consider the limits of her position. Cordelia Hasenbach is Lycaonese, the Prince of Rhenia. Her support base is primarily Lycaonese as well, which means it is poorer and less populous than that of her internal opposition. She can only project military strength temporarily, for the Lycaonese armies are needed at the northern borders. What does this mean for her position in Procer?"

"She has rich, powerful rivals," I said. "And she needs to keep them in check if she wants to keep her throne."

"Precisely," she smiled. "To compound the issue, the civil war that Amadeus initiated and I fed has ravaged large swaths of the Principate, leaving her with large amounts of dispossessed and unemployed soldiery. She is unlikely to face open rebellion, as it would be reputational suicide for any ambitious rival to try to remove her by force after the last decade of war. Yet if she does not deal with this issue, she risks being set aside in favour of a ruler that will."

"So she needs to keep her soldiers busy and out of her lands while she rebuilds the Principate," I frowned. "Then why Praes? Why Callow? There's easier targets. Sure her reputation will take a hit if she scraps with Levant or the Free Cities instead, but it's kind of expected of Procer they're going to be real pricks to their neighbours."

"We now return to your earlier insight about reputation. If Cordelia acted as you said, she would face the same issue that the Empire traditionally does," Malicia said. "She would stand alone. Make no mistake, Catherine, Procer has been greatly weakened. It cannot afford war on more than one front, which is certain to erupt if the Principate turns expansionist again. The Calernian balance of power would be shattered if she was allowed to make gains."

I chewed on that. Hasenbach needed a war, but she also needed her other borders quiet. Which meant a target that didn't worry everybody else, and the way she could accomplish that was...

"A Crusade," I sighed. "It has to be a Crusade, from her perspective. She can't not be at war and she can't take on any of the southern nations without pissing off the others. But if she's fighting Praes, not only can they not backstab her they might actually have to help."

"And so we come upon the nature of Cordelia Hasenbach as an entity," the Empress said. "She must be at war, but cannot be at war with a nation that is Good. These are the rules she has to obey."

"It's why she can meddle in the Free Cities but only to back the faction fighting Helike," I said. "Otherwise her southern borders catch fire. She has to fight against Evil or her alliances all collapse because no one can trust Procer."

"Have you wondered why I never expressed fears of you attempting an independent Callow, Catherine?" Malicia smiled. "This is the reason. Assuming you achieved that result and even sought to remove the impetus for Imperial invasions by trading us grain, you would still have to face Procer. You are, after all, a villain. An acceptable recipient of dear Cordelia's wrath from a diplomatic perspective, and from a political one a long-term threat. Procer cannot afford another hostile border, from a purely logistical standpoint. It needs Callow to be Good and at war with Praes, to keep them both in check."

That made it twice that she'd turned an offhand example into a pointed lesson as to where I had to stand. As I understood it this was unusually straightforward for her, but I wasn't surprised. She would be tailoring her approach to who she was approaching, and I wasn't unaware I reacted best to people being direct. The part she'd left unspoken was that if Callow with me at the head was at war with the Principate, it would be without the Legions backing me. That wasn't ending well for my side, and since Praes wouldn't be able to tolerate a Proceran protectorate just across the river that meant Callow would once more become the battlefield of the continent when the Tower made its move.

"Point taken," I said. "Nature, huh. The Summer Court is the easiest to figure out. The Queen has three rules that bind her, I've been told: destroy Winter, protect Aine and 'see the Sun victorious'."

"All points of pressure you can feasibly reach," Malicia said.

"I've got the sun stashed away, so I can bargain with that," I said. "Threaten to destroy it, maybe? I get the impression to actually do that in Creation would be a very bad idea, but it wouldn't be the first time I lied to a god. The other two are a little trickier."

"As I understand it, my dear, Winter is not a static state," the Empress said. "It is transient, fated to come and pass. You do not need to think of destruction as requiring force. If what Winter is no longer corresponds to what Summer believes it should be, that may very well qualify as 'destruction'."

"You mean force it to pass into Spring or Autumn," I said, taking a look at the notion. "I'm fairly certain the seasons only shift when either Summer or Winter has lost the war. I'm not sure that's feasible."

Malicia smiled warmly.

"It would be a mistake, to believe yourself bound to the traditional fae outcomes," she said. "This entire affair began by one of the Courts believing these were not impossible to avert."

A way to make Winter no longer Winter. There might be something to that.

"That leaves Aine, the seat of Summer," I said. "I can make gates so getting there isn't impossible, just... really stupid. There's no winning a fight there, and the fae can cross back into Arcadia much easier than they come into Creation. It won't be undefended."

I paused.

"I'll need all three, if I'm to force the Queen's hand about anything," I said. "She's not really a thing that gets compromise. Anything less than complete failure, anathema to what she is, and she'll just keep on slugging."

"If your strength is insufficient, borrow strength," Malicia said. "She has enemies as well, does she not? If I understand your plan correctly, this assumption lay at the heart of your taking prisoner the Princess of High Noon. Should Summer fail to secure her return, should they lose too many soldiers, they will afterwards fall in the face of oncoming Winter. This is one of the limitations she must abide."

I spared a moment to hope my intentions weren't this fucking transparent to everyone out there. I would have spared another to be intimidated by the fact she'd understood my plan without being involved at any point in the making of it, but I'd grown dull to that breed of surprise by now.

"Winter winning fucks it all up too," I said frankly. "I'm not sure if worse is the right term, but it will definitely be a similar yet different shade of godawful."

"Let us speak of Winter, then," the Empress lightly said. "You have treated with the King of Winter in person. Become bound to his Court, in part, and fought at the side of his greatest captains. What did you glimpse from this?"

"Take two vicious, spitting furious cats and shove them in a bag," I said. "Then add that it has been there since time literally immemorial. The King's the cat real desperate about getting out of that bag."

"A colourful description," Malicia said, arching an eyebrow. "Yet short on useful specifics."

I almost laughed, until I remembered how fucking dangerous it would be to actually like this woman.

"He doesn't have a plan, I think," I said. "Or his plan was just to drag Callow into this mess and he doesn't really need to control what comes after that. He wants out, Malicia. I don't think how he gets out actually matters all that much. And that he thinks that way at all is scaring the other fae. I don't think he's supposed to."

"That," the Empress said quietly, "is worrying. Wekesa once told me that Arcadia is akin to a first draft of Creation, and mirrors it still. If Winter is meant to be the reflection of villainy, and yet bound to it, there are... implications."

I didn't have to look all that far to find the villains who'd made the largest mark on Calernia in the last century, so her meaning was pretty clear.

"It's not that clear cut," I said. "The parallels aren't so direct. But it's crossed my mind, yeah."

"A matter to consult more sorcerously-inclined minds over," Malicia finally said. "Desperation is a useful tool, Catherine, especially if it can be given outlet. If your read of the creature is correct, it is the easiest of your obstacles to bargain with."

I grimaced.

"He has my heart," I said bluntly. "And I don't mean that in a romantic sense. Ripped it out to make a point which, uh, complicates negotiations a bit."

The Empress smiled, almost fondly.

"I sometimes forget how much Amadeus has left his touch on you," she said. "Catherine, one cannot always deal from a position of strength. That is mere vanity. And doing so does not mean the negotiations will be at your expense."

"Fae always screw you on deals," I reminded her.

I'd always thought that Black's quirk of lips was terrifying, the blade-smile that always heralded something dark happening to someone he thought deserved it. Looking at the Empress' face then, the languid and almost lazy amusement, I found something to match it. This had been the closest to a glimpse of the person underneath the crown I'd gotten since I'd first met her, and what I saw there had my fingers itching for a blade.

"Darling, you forget what side you chose," she drawled. "You stand with the Dread Empire of Praes, Catherine. We have murdered gods and made doorkeepers of demons. We have tricked angels into damnation and made orderly host of the hordes of Hell. Fae?"

She smiled amusedly.

"Fae will be a pleasant reprieve from the High Lords, my dear. Let me show you."

Fuck, I thought. Now I like her.

Agreed.
Lovely chapter.

No matter how much I know it's a bad idea for Cat to like her, I can't bring myself to disagree. Now we're getting a closer look at the woman who's changing the story of an entire nation, possibly the world eventually.

callmesteve

Exactly. I still can't really read her, though. I think that's the point, actually.

To some extent, she really IS evil and manipulative, but even those who might not like that still have to agree with what she wants.

But with Cat and Malicia working together... Cue Jaws theme...

Also: I can't help but liking her either....

vietnamabc

So that is why all spies are assumed to be compromised when Malicia talks to them directly, the lady pretty much weaponized charm.

Also Winter = Old Evil really wants out, I think the guy see that the board is about to be wiped so he want to be out of the game, I think Bard would try something like Hashmallin but on much larger scale, like Judgement Day types of board-wiping since there's no way Good can win conventionally now, Evil has entrenched way too deep, its influence is too wide to contain now so we need a hard reset.

stevenneiman

I don't think he's trying to escape a sinking ship, so much as one that's been stuck in the doldrums since time literally before time. I doubt that the Bard is planning any kind of nuclear option since she's bound by the traditions of Good, since in a sense she is the traditions of Good. If she was, I think that the King of Winter would deliberately put himself in the blast radius just to have it over with.

Christian Oaks

Lol talk about wrong for the bards desire for a nuke

Cpt. Obvious

A lot can be done that's technically Good, but is objectively evil. The Wandering Bard has been around for a very long time and knows all about the technicalities of Good and Evil...

vietnamabc

Calling Bard Good is really stretching it since her recent actions don't really seem that heroic to me, baiting William to brainwash a city, throwing Hanno to crazy evil Tyrant and putting the two sisters to sacrifice is what Evil and general douchebag usually do. Even Black does not throw his teammate to the wolves like that.

About Winter even if the board is reset, I think the guy will still be reincarnated and stuck in the new cycle so this is why dude want out now and not later since there is not much of a later.

benthelynx

Hitler is a perfect example of the rationale of the greater good.

Ed

Vietmanabc -You've made a very common mistake there 'good' does not mean nice. They were the sacrifices that had to made so that the greater good was served and evil could not prosper. Those that gave their very lives should have done so gladly in the knowledge that their sacrifices would make a difference in the eternal fight against evil.

Robert Allaband

There is a saying that goes something like this: To plumb the true depths of Evil you must first strive to do the greatest good. There is also the quote by Nietzsche that definitely applies to the Wandering Bard who appears to be an immortal soul that takes over mortals bodies: "He who fights with monsters should be careful lest he thereby become a monster. And if thou gaze long into an abyss, the abyss will also gaze into thee."

The Wandering Bard is a much greater monster than the Calamities because she will do the most despicable things all in the name of the "Greater Good".

Levi Kalden

In that sense she is somewhat of a mirror to Cat

Mike E.

The road to Hell is paved with Good intentions...

Dainpdf

That, plus she's the most proficient Speaker around, that we know of.

callmesteve

Not to mention that she does not need to Speak (at all, not even the normal kind!) to compromise; she can do it wordlessly. I still think she did not do that *here*, though. Cat is probably too useful on her own to be put on strings like that, plus it's unnecessary. She already wants to do something very much like what the Empress does, or at least it would go that way eventually. That's not to say that she has not been backdoored (Ew, not THAT way!) by the Empress; I am sure that Malicia would make sure that someone who is that dangerous would have a hidden control so that she can't turn, even if it's unlikely. Remember Masego and that exploding pendant...

stevenneiman

Bard is a perfect example of the difference between good (the concept of morality as understood by people outside the Guideverse) and Good (the divine faction within the Guideverse). Remember that the brainwashing superweapon that the Bard wanted William to unleash was literally Good incarnate.

The thing about the Bard is that she'll do horrifying things in the name of Good, because all she cares about is doing her job of making sure that the stories run smoothly and the villains lose. She doesn't care any more than Black does if her method of winning causes harm to the innocent, and if anything she has more destructive means available since a villain's nastiest tricks are all inevitably self-destructive.

jonnney

The bard is a viscous bitch, but with her lifespan her fear is a valid one. Her main fear seems to be of what happens after Malicia, Black, and Catherine create a Empire that fully absorbs the strength of Callow. She fears that after than power is solidified another Triumphant will arise and with twice the land manage to turn Calernia in a world power solely devoted to evil.

tynam

Bard doesn't appear to care whether Good wins, as long as everyone keeps playing the same game. Her problem is that Malicia and Black changed the rules and she doesn't want the new variant to catch on; it would end the gods' experiment.

danh3107

Fuck, /now/ /I/ like Malicia, at least even more than I did already.

Naeddyr

Tricked Angels into damnation? Oh my, I don't think we've heard that one before. 😊

Thanks for the chapter. You really want to like Malicia, and for Malicia to like Cat. Cat is probably a fresh of breath air, so I'd guess Malicia is somewhat fond of her, though of course her perspective might be Praesi noble enough not to.

stevenneiman

I think Cat reminds Malicia of Black, and Black of Ranger.

Letouriste

Maybe cat would remind ranger of malicia?^^

Cpt. Obvious

Cat is a mirror image of Malicia, if that mirror is tinted, comes from a fun house and had a run in with an exploding undead goat carrying a satchels worth of goblinfire.

nipi

@Letouriste

That would not be a good thing for Cat.

The quietist

I don't think she does LeTouriste, Ranger's main objection to Malicia is she doesn't get hands dirty while Cat most certainly does.

callmesteve

I like to think that is the case. It's hard to tell, but they might legitimately care. I am pretty sure that despite their positions and their side, it does not stop them from still caring.

Perhaps more so in the Empress' case. With so few true friends and having to constantly babysit a rabid sack of nobl – uh, / badgers/, perhaps she would value friends more. However, it evidently does not stop her cryptic mentor/chessmaster act, apparently.

Cpt. Obvious

She's played the Game for so long I doubt she can feel friendship with anyone she hasn't known for at least ten years. And even then I don't think she'd trust them. There were some glimpse into Malicias thinking way back when we learned that she's got her hooks into all the officers in the Legions. We also learned that she didn't fully trust Amadeus not to blow his top if he learned that she had installed a form of mind control in people he considered close friends. But she felt she needed that extra layer of control if Amadeus one day would turn on her.

Malicia simply doesn't do "friends" anymore.

stevenneiman

That last line had me wheezing with laughter. Excellent work as always, EE.

callmesteve

Quite.

Burnsy

I like her too.

...Goddamn she's good. Shes the tyrant of an explicitly evil empire who clawed her way to the top with the sole motivation of making Evil as a very concept more powerful AND I LIKE HER.

haihappen

Helike is not always on the side of Evil. It flip-flops depending on who is in charge.

frolamiz

I think he meant tyrant, not Tyrant =)

stevenneiman

Despite the male and female versions of the title being "Dread Emperor" and "Dread Empress", the gender-neutral term for the Named ruler of Praes is "Tyrant". This is kind of confusing given that it's also the only term for an evil ruler of Helike, but I don't think either nation consulted the other when it was deciding what to call it's Evil rulers.

Cpt. Obvious

Well in Helike tyrant is not only a job but also a Name. The job kind of comes with the Name...

callmesteve

I am not sure she's trying to improve /Evil/ per se, save for the fact that she got drafted much like Cat, and it's simply the only side she can be on, and the only one to work from to fix things. It's more like she's just trying to break out of these stupid wars and get everyone to behave nicely, albeit with Evil tactics.

Oh, wait, she's trying to turn the Dread Empire into a bureaucracy... Nope, still Evil!

jonnney

I do like her, but while she is definitely trying to make Praes more powerful she isn't too concerned with evil. While the Tyrant is a soldier for the gods below in a war to control creation Malicia doesn't care about the gods above or below. That is actually the main way that she is similar to Catherine, while the traditional Villain declares war on half of creation the girls who climb the tower are willing to make war, or even peace, with any and all of creation in order to attain their goals.

nehemiahnewell

Catherine and Malicia, sitting in a tree. Pe el oh te te ie en ge.

Gunslinger

Holy shit is Malicia awesome. Using her body language itself to exploit named.

Gunslinger

Also I feel like time has been passing on Cat's side but any of them are yet to hear of Captain's death. I wonder if it has already occurred at the time of the current chapter?

stevenneiman

We don't have 100% confirmation that she will die. Really, it comes down to whether being the Bard offers protection against the way that things always go to shit when you gloat. Regardless of side, what she gave Black was nothing if not a villainous monologue, and those aren't even a good idea in real life where reality itself won't conspire to screw you if you give one.

Misterspokes

I love that Malicia is like "Bitch, you forget, we're the Black Tower, the premiere source of Grade A, Unrefined, Captial E, evil on the continent; now that you've made it clear you've thrown your lot in with us, we'll be sure to fix that little problem you have with one of the 4 nastiest fae in existence..."

callmesteve

That is a good summation.

narcoduck

Man, Malicia is really living up to her boasts. Really shows why the Dread Empire is at its most powerful since Triumphant which took a continent wide rebellion and two foreign empires to defeat. Makes one wonder where those two foreign empires are now...

Jonnnney

I believe one has fallen apart, the founders of ashur, but the other is still chugging along with a villain and a hero sharing leadership.

vietnamabc

Yeah how does it work in realities? Are Good and Evil divided into 2 parties and they debate on the Assembly like democracy?

Letouriste

No I think the hero lead the country in the sunlight whereas the villain take care of managing it in the shadow.each one take care of the flaws and limitations the role/name of the other have. this is also possible the equilibrium is different for each generation of partnership

*benthelynx*

Perhaps think Arutha and Jimmy the Hand (Raymond E Fiest)

jonnnney

I would guess that good rules the cities while evil conquers their enemies. Could also be an evil sorcerer working with a good warrior.

*Evgeny*

My, my. Haven't Cat just found a new love? That would be interesting.

This talk makes me think about how Arcadia relates to Creation, in a fundamental way. Stories are said to be the grooves in Creation, and Arcadia seems to have nothing to base itself on but stories.

If you tried to draw a graph of how much the Fate affects the world (and could compose a solvable equation for it), then Creation would be the family of solutions that peaks on Fate-influenced points but ultimately approximates zero over infinite stretches of the graph, since it has a material world to fall back on. Arcadia doesn't, and so its family of solutions would be the one with cyclical graphs that never cross the x axis (never fully become real). They can become close enough for an entity on the border to cross from one group of stable solutions to another. but doing so would bring a whole new unexpected set of outcomes.

If we go back to the 'groove' metaphor, humans can be represented by a ball rolling into the groove, capable of going in different directions inside of it and even of leaving it given enough speed. The fae, on the other hand, are more like a patch of earth lit by a candle standing on it: their actions and thoughts are shaped by the story they are in. Akua's father mentioned that a fairy isn't different on material level from a stone in Arcadia, meaning that what makes them semi-sentient is purpose (defined by the Story) and power (granted by the Role they are playing).

This, however, is a theory, which is why i have to ask. Erratic, is there such a thing as uninhabited part of Arcadia, or a wood falling in a forest without anyone to hear it doesn't exist there in the first place?

Cpt. Obvious

It seems unlikely erraticerrata will ever answer this question, so I'll post some thoughts about the Fey.

It seems they are fully conscious of the stories and has played them so many times they've run out of possible variations. Summer wins. Winter wins. Sulia is defeated. She wins. She never gets sent there. The trader sells the flask of dragons tears or not. They've played all the roles. Made all the choices and knows what comes next.

That's why they got so confused and even scared when Cat and friends inserted themselves into the story they were playing. Suddenly the script was changed and they had no idea what would happen. For the first time in a long time something was changing and they had no idea what would come from it.

That, changing a story is something that they can't do. But that doesn't mean they aren't sentient.

Rani

Cat/Malicia new OTP.

frolamiz

Thanks for the chapter!

frolamiz

If you apply the same logic to Malicia, you understand why she want so much Demonist's weapon to prevent the war with Procer. She need the permanent threat of Procer's invasion, but prevent it from happening to keep Callow and Cath under the tower.

Unnamed goblin

Nice reminder of Who is the Boss here.

Morgenstern

*sigh

Really? She leaves out the business of Prince of Nightfall plus all those crowns? Even though she JUST came from Sulia who basically TOLD her what bad, bad shit that means, one that even Sulia is scared by? -- One would think that would be something to MENTION to someone like Malicia, when having THIS talk about important problems, especially in the context of talking about problems to be expected from Winter... *sigh

Brian P.

Cat's got a month to defeat and/or trick two minor gods and their entire armies while retaining enough forces to then immediately go fight against an Evil Diabolist that controls a flying city, and you want her to take on side projects?

jonnnney

Just a guess here. I think the seven mortal crowns are the crowns of the seven high lords. . (Some people think it is the free cities, but about half the city-states don't have individual rulers.)

Promising a Fae the head/lives/souls/crown of all the high lords of Praes isn't something you mention to the Empress of Praes.

Dylan Tullos

And at last we reach the moment when Catherine accepts her leash. She's been dancing around the subject for a long time, trying to pretend that she's not a creature of the Tower, but she's finally realizing the truth.

Every one of her "rebellions" was within the limits of what Malicia had already planned for. Even if she acted sooner than Malicia anticipated, Catherine was always going to end up as Queen of Callow, regardless of what title she used. She became a servant of the Dread Empire the moment she accepted Black's offer, and now she's one of Malicia's most useful tools.

Catherine wants to pretend that words like "collaborator" and "traitor" don't apply to her. In reality, she's turned Callow into a province of Praes and trapped her people in service to the Tower. When Malicia falls- and she will fall- Callow will be caught in the Uncivil Wars that follow. I don't think trading a Praesi invasion every generation for a Praesi civil war every generation is the best of trades, but Catherine seems to be stuck with it.

esryok

Perhaps her reasoning is that proper integration with the Empire will help to pacify it. Black told us the story of Praes is to grasp and Callow to be grasped. If these stories are transcended as Cat intends, there's room for the next story to be a bit less bloody.

Dylan Tullos

esryok:

That's a good theory. Maybe Catherine is right, and an Empire with Callow will be a little less inclined to infighting.

But stories are powerful, and they have the ability to take new forms over time. If Praes's role is to grasp, and Callow is no longer available to be grasped, what will stop the new, larger Dread Empire from grasping at Procer?

The Story right now has Praes as the Bad Empire, and Callow as the Good Kingdom. However, Black's whole strategy depends on nations being capable of changing their Roles. He wants to make it so Praes doesn't have to be the Bad Empire; the Story might force both Praes and Callow into the role of Designated Villains, leaving the Principate as the Heroes.

esryok

I agree. If Team Evil fails to fundamentally change Praes at the same time as it digests Callow, then everybody loses except the Bard.

Makes me wonder whether a Crusade would help or hurt Team Evil's story. On the one hand, a holy continental alliance descending on the Empire sounds pretty bad. On the other hand:

- Praesi High Lords are currently subdued
- Callow's ongoing anti-Praes narrative was just suppressed (according to Black, at least)
- Praes in general is easier to govern after (during?) a major conflict
- The Callowan tribes drew together while opposing Praes & Procer. Now the Principate is giving Praes+Callow a common enemy.

A crisis is an opportunity, indeed!

jonnnney

The problem with the crusade isn't the war itself. The problem is it allows the first Prince to fully solidify her control over the whole Principate and heal the wounds caused by decades of civil war. Furthermore it unites all of the good nations into an alliance similar to the free cities which will likely grind down Praes over the following decades.

callmesteve

Both of their goals are to make sure that Callow is well-enough integrated that any wars are external only. Also to make sure that IF Malicia ever falls, that it does not take out the Empire, far as I can tell. I am not too certain that it's possible for Malicia to fall for quite a while.

callmesteve

See Lord Vetinari for more on THAT one...

Now I know what this reminds me of!

vietnamabc

So does that make Cat captain Vimes?

stevenneiman

The POINT is to turn Praes and Callow into a single unified, stable whole that isn't going to have a bloody rebellion every generation. By providing a reasonably stable source of food for Praes and producing a unified if not uniform culture, Malicia hopes to create a state which can actually keep itself under control, even after the people who set it that way leave the scene.

Whether that's actually going to work out at all is another question entirely, but I wouldn't say it isn't possible that it will work.

Abrakadabra

You should read more history. Being stuck between two great powers is BAD for your nation.

usernamesbco

Idk, I saw a lot of Cat realizing just how much Malicia (and Black by extension) have manipulated Callow in general and her in particular. Even before the story officially started, she was being manipulated into joining the Legion.

It's been mentioned before that Cat will take what she can use, and break what she can't use. She's being useful for now, but I'm wondering if Malicia may have shot herself in the foot with this little power play here. She doesn't have the relationship with Cat that Cat has with Black, there's no real foundation there.

Even Black usually takes a light-handed approach, excepting the hanging incident in Summerholm (which was later justified and basically forgiven when Cat realized William and Good had suborned her free will). Black giving her the tools she needs and letting her do her thing are making her feel grateful and beholden to him, while I think Malicia's more controlling approach is going to make Cat ornery.

alegio

I have always felt chills when the Calamities get serious and/or talk about their intentions, Im just gonna say that Malicia didnt disappoint on that front.

Spinner335

I suppose the winter thing makes sense. The King of Winter seems to be imitating Black as best he can, they both after all want to break the cycle.

Rodrigues

There was nothing left to imagination huh? I'm kind of sad that there was nothing that we could figure it out by ourselves. everything was interpreted for us readers ;/

callmesteve

Not the crowns. I still wonder what Role that will play...

benthelynx

I'm left wondering if the chapter name is merely a play on the empresses name or what more will be revealed?
And if there is more, how will Black respond?

nextgidea

"It is impossible for the Empire to make an appreciable gain so long as this gain is a loss to every other nation on Calernia. To remedy this, we must discard the traditional lines of allying only to Evil polities and make it so that it is in the interest of other powers for us to rise."

Since Evil is mandated to be defeated again and again by its role and narrative in the Story, how does it vanquish its opponent? By making sure that Story breaks and the cycle is broken.

Herein you can contrast and compare Praes and Winter. Both have realized that odds are stacked against them in current form, and have decided to change Fate themselves. But how they do so, is very telling. [Whether the fact that both realized at same time is due to inter-connection between Arcadia and Connection is entirely another matter]

Winter has decided that it will win the war against Summer (or at least not lose it). Whereas, Praes has decided that it will have Good as an ally, or at least as someone who does not make it their life's aim to oppose them, and even may help them to rise in strength.

[ They started by setting itself as salvation – Corrupt Governors? Black is Answer, Feeling rebellious? Squire is the solution ]

It seems to me that while several details are handicraft of Black, overall brush strokes and Political framework have been much likely Malicia's.

*****

There is lots of other stuff in the chapter which gives food for thought. I would need time to gather my wits and think on that...

Fanon

We've seen Papa Black as he trained Cat, now we see Mama Malicia being an equally reassuring and absurdly competent parental figure as she helps Cat deal with her heartache~

Darkening

I was rereading this and saw the line about making winter not be winter. I'm... curious, what effects placing Summer's sun in Winter's sky would have.

vietnamabc

Praise the Sun! All shall be well.

Byzantine

Probably explosive, given this is Fae magic we are talking about.

nipi

Just a random Question. Do mountain goats exist in this world?

Cat could use them to upgrade her undead goat bombs:

jonnney

Better yet, see if Hierophant can figure out how to give them wings. Flying undead suicide goats.

stevenneiman

Now that I think of it, just one of those would be enough to bring down the city for anyone who has sufficiently little concern for civilian casualties. Goblinfire really is a massive factor in the way that tactics work because you can't rely on vast magical power to deal with it since if a goblinfire bomb goes off in just the wrong spot (which Fate can occasionally guarantee), it can turn the most powerful magical array into nothing but more problems.

nipi

I don't know. The Goats probably wouldn't have the instincts to use their new limbs and thus the same would apply to Cat once they are undead.

Jabes

I was so glad to hear Cat finally facing her own hypocrisy. That she finally has to accept Praesi, not just view them as tools, has been something I have been hoping for.

Aotrs Commander

Huzzah!

Now, THIS is what I've been longing to see since... Pretty much the start of the story. Finally... FINALLY, Cat and Alaya are on the same page... Because, as daft as it is, as dangerous as Malicia is... She ISN'T Cat's enemy, and heck, even thinking her of such is a path that will lead right back to square one. (And a reason why, personally, would very much NOT want to see Cat become Empress.)

Watching people realise they are on the same side and ganging up is one of my favourite things in the world and it so very rarely happens on the villain side of things.

Also, a terrible thought occurs... Cat+Alaya... That's kind of scary...! (Unlikely, but it'd be fracking interesting to see...!)

I wonder if Cat realises that culture changes over time, and the inevitable result of their path will see a change in the culture of both Praes and Callow towards a new, more unified culture...?

green

oops... meant to leave the comment from last chapter on this one. oh well! XD

Abrakadabra

So. If Winter is the reflection of Evil, but the Winter King wants to end it all, Than he is basically a reflection of Black, right?

Chapter 37: Procedures

"Truth and silence lie better than the silvermost tongue."

– Soninke saying

It was a little odd to be half-naked in front of three people, but the only person that was feeling awkward about it was Hakram. The moment I'd begun unbuttoning my shirt he'd cleared his throat and looked away, and had been staring at the ceiling of my tent for a solid half hour by now. Considering I had it on good authority – Robber, ever up for a bit of gossip if it was at someone else's expense – that he was still sleeping around on the regular his prudery for this was pretty amusing. As for the other two, well, Masego couldn't have been any less interested in tits if he tried and this wasn't anything Kilian hadn't seen before. I shifted on the stool at the memory of some of the instances where she'd done a great deal more than just looking and Hierophant clucked his tongue disapprovingly.

"Don't move," he said. "This is delicate work."

I'd have to take his word on that, since I couldn't actually see what he was doing. He was prodding around the area of my heart with a long oaken wand covered in runes that was entirely ignoring my flesh, pausing now and then to look at the collection of hovering runes in the air by his side. Kilian was crouched at his side, forming a ball of light over her upturned palm. They'd said it was because they needed a 'point of comparison', though they'd been vague about what exactly that meant.

"It's not grounded in the heart," the Senior Mage frowned.

"Agreed," Masego said, and I felt him poke something inside me.

Runes shifted in the air and the redhead inhaled sharply.

"That should kill a human outright," she said. "It's enough sorcery to turn all the liquids in her body to ice."

"Named, Kilian," the blind Soninke reminded her. "And this 'moon' seems to have been purposed to regulate the energies."

I cleared my throat.

"So you have answers for me, then," I said.

"We can confidently say that your third aspect is bound to your title of Duchess of Moonless Nights and not the heart replacement the king forced upon you," Hierophant said. "A fascinating piece of work, that."

"So when I get my heart back," I prompted.

"You should keep the aspect, assuming you remain the Duchess," Kilian said. "Though it will severely limit your abilities."

I met her eyes, but she turned to look at the runes.

"The moon the King of Winter placed inside you serves two purposes," Hierophant elaborated. "The first it to mimic the role in your body your heart would. Fascinating, as I said. I did not believe the fae had so keen an understanding of human anatomy."

"And the second?" I said.

"You might consider it a heart in the magical sense," Masego said. "All the Winter power that you can bring to bear is siphoned into it, then released for your use natured in a way that lessens the damage to your body."

"That feels like something that's going to fuck me over when I get my actual heart back," I said.

"Without that filter I'm not certain you will be able to use your third aspect," Kilian said. "I've never seen the direct aftermath, but I was given to understand it is a domain?"

"And I definitely know what that is," I lied. "Pretty sure Hakram doesn't, though, so to be polite someone should explain."

"Actually," the orc began, but I shushed him.

"It's all right, Hakram," I said. "We're your friends. You don't need to pretend with us."

"I explained to you what that is mere months ago," Masego said, sounding surprised as he eyed the orc. "Perhaps you should drink less. It's beginning to affect your memory."

Adjutant glared at me helplessly and I grinned.

"I'll keep an eye on him, I promise," I told Hierophant.

The dark-skinned mage nodded, then looked up at me through his eye cloth.

"Creation is, in essence, matter with a set of rules imposed by the Gods upon it," he said. "A domain is when an entity, in this case you, temporarily overlays different matter and rules over it."

Well, that sounded mildly blasphemous. And incredibly dangerous.

"In your case, 'Fall' appears to create a bubble of empty darkness where you may use Winter energies to lower the temperature beneath what should physically be possible," Masego continued. "Unusually offensive in nature. Most domains provide different territory and a comparative advantage to the entity that creates it."

"It shouldn't be possible for a Squire to have a domain at all," Kilian said frankly. "Transitory Names are not strong enough. Domains usually belong to lesser gods, full-fledged Named late in their career or particularly ancient monsters."

"It's a rare ability even among heroes," Masego noted. "Aside from the Champion lines in Levant and allegedly the Saint of Swords, there shouldn't be any other living human practitioner."

"Then how did I get one?" I asked. "I didn't exactly rub a lamp and make a wish to get this, Hierophant."

"Djinn were usually bound to urns, not lamps, and did not grant wishes," Masego replied absent-mindedly. "It does occur naturally in some entities. Every dragon has a domain at their heart of their body, it's what allows them to breathe fire. And Father has theorized elves essentially become a living domain when they get old enough."

"You have a pretty good look at my body right now," I said, raising an eyebrow. "See any scales or pointy ears?"

"No," Hierophant told me seriously. "And I would be able to see them even if they were invisible."

I saw Kilian's lips twitch from the corner of my eye.

"Now," Masego muttered, "this is not conclusive by any means but I do have a theory."

"All my ears are listening," I said.

He stared suspiciously at me but I gave him my most innocent smile. His frown deepened, so maybe I needed to put some work into that.

"I believe this to be a leash," Hierophant said. "You are given powerful abilities, but to make use of them properly you must give the King of Winter foothold in your soul. Removing that foothold turns what was once an asset into a liability, giving you strong incentive to remain bound to him."

"There's more to it than that," Kilian said quietly, and Masego seemed surprised.

The Senior Mage flicked her fingers and three rows of runes parted from the rest.

"I've never had occasion to do a full mapping ritual on my father," the redhead said, "but this corresponds more or less to how his body reacted to fae sorcery as a halfblood. Higher tolerance, but there's no actual attempt made to make it harmless. In someone born, that's only natural. But in an artificial construct?"

"Power limiter," Hierophant said, glass eyes gleaming under dark cloth.

"Your saying he screwed me," I said.

I paused.

"More than previously believed," I added.

Kilian nodded slowly.

"When you draw deep on the power, you must get backlash," she said.

"My blood starts to freeze," I admitted.

"You were crippled," Hierophant said bluntly. "You have the power of a Duchess to draw on, but if you actually did so it would kill you. It explains why you were at such a disadvantage fighting that Summer duchess in Arcadia, when in theory you should have been on even footing."

"Countess at most," Kilian said. "Your domain allows you to fight out of your league but the King made certain you would never be powerful enough to be a threat to him."

I clenched my fingers. This shouldn't have come as a surprise, even if it did. I'd been so focused on how the threat was my stolen heart that I'd never thought to question the additions to my power I'd discovered. Archer had told me that the Duke of Violent Squalls was supposed to be one of the big names in the Winter Court. Someone who was supposed to turn the story back to war if the fae that ruled Winter was trying to avoid it. There was power to that kind of role, and by taking his title even in a different form I should have swung a great deal harder than the average duke or duchess. I'd thought it was because I wasn't really fae, but evidently there was more to it than that.

"Can you fix this?" I finally asked.

Masego smiled.

"If I were still the Apprentice, no," he said. "But such miracles are now within my purview. I will need preparations and the process will not be gentle, but it can be done."

"You'll still get backlash," Kilian warned. "You're a mortal bearing a fae title, that much is unavoidable."

"The proportion of power than can be drawn before backlash could be increased tenfold, at the very least," Hierophant said. "A Duchess in full. You've an unusually tough constitution, you should be able to weather it."

"Ominous," I said. "Get this ready. The sooner we get it done the better."

"It could be ready tomorrow, but three days hence would be easier," Masego said. "For ritual purposes, the new moon will benefit me."

The mage got back to his feet, adjusting the black robes over his corpulent frame. Kilian followed suit, brushing back red hair in a gesture I followed with my eyes out of habit. Masego left the tent without bothering to excuse myself, entirely forgetting Hakram was still in here. The redhaired mage lingered for a moment.

"Catherine," she said.

I hesitated.

"Dismissed, Senior Mage," I replied.

Her face shuttered and she gave a stiff salute before leaving. I began to button up my shirt again, fingers almost shaking. That had taken more determination than I'd expected.

"You decent?" Adjutant asked.

"Never," I drawled. "Villain, remember?"

"No one's a villain every hour of the day," Hakram grunted. "And if you're being lippy about it, that's a yes."

I struck a suggestive pose when he turned, my top two buttons still undone, and he groaned.

"Just too much woman for you, I understand," I said sympathetically.

"You're barely half an orc," he gravelled.

"I'm vicequeen of Callow, you savage," I grinned. "That could be construed as treason."

"If you have me arrested, who will handle the paperwork?" he said.

"You have always been my most loyal," I hastily replied. "Never doubted you a moment."

The orc snorted and reached for the carafe of wine Masego had refused to let me touch. He poured two glasses and pressed one into my hand. Oh dear. That was the herald to a serious conversation, wasn't it? The joke about his drinking habits died unspoken on my tongue.

"We haven't talked about it," he said.

"The heart?" I said. "It hasn't been a priority so far, to be honest. It was functional and there's other fires to put out first."

"Cat," he said flatly. "You know that doesn't work on me."

My lips thinned. No matter how well it served me, there were times I wished he was just a little less perceptive.

"There is nothing to say," I grunted.

"It's a nasty habit you have," Hakram said. "Thinking admitting something hurt you means you're weak."

"Already got that speech from Masego last year," I sighed. "I cope. We're in the middle of a godsdamned war, in case you hadn't noticed. This is so far down the ladder of shit I need to deal with it's not even worth mentioning."

Hakram drank from his cup and I did the same.

"You were happier, with her," he said. "Everyone saw that."

"Happy doesn't come into this," I barked. "I didn't sign up for happy ever after. The colour of my cloak's a bit of hint there."

"Bullshit," Hakram said, and it was vehement enough I flinched. "That's an excuse and you know it. Fix this or don't, but do not pretend that being a villain means you have to be miserable. You know that's untrue."

"What the fuck do you want me to say, Hakram?" I hissed. "That I miss her? It's not exactly fucking riddle when I feel like I put a fresh knife in my ribs every time she's in the room."

"That is a start," the tall orc gravely said.

"She wants to cross a line," I said tiredly. "I can't stop her without doing the same. Talking's not going to change any of it, so this is just salting the wound."

"I understand she wants to do a ritual," Hakram said cautiously.

"She wants to slaughter people like animals," I spat. "To get rid of whatever it is that screws her up when she draws too deep on magic."

"Human sacrifice," he said. "How many?"

"I didn't ask," I said. "It doesn't matter. One would be too much."

I eyed him, saw the lack of expression on his face.

"Gonna take her side, are you?" I bitterly said. "Say I've done worse. That it makes me a hypocrite to find even the idea repulsive."

"You assume much," Hakram said. "Do you think Callowans fed most the altars in Praes? Wars with the Kingdom came once a reign, Catherine. In peace they looked for fodder in the Steppes."

That have me pause, because he was right. I had assumed, deep down, that no one born on his side of the Wasaliti would really get where I was coming from. One of the reasons I'd never talked about this with anybody. It had been extremely presumptuous of me.

"I'm sorry," I said quietly. "I didn't mean-"

"I know," he sighed, fangs flashing. "I will not pretend my people are anything but red-handed, Catherine. We have fed upon mankind since the First Dawn. We kept slaves and sacked cities, splattered blood across the writ of Creation. But this, we understand. The Miezans taught the Wasteland to hate chains, and in turn the Wasteland taught us to hate the altars. When Lord Black decreed the Legions would no longer bleed their own for victory, he earned deeper loyalty than he understood."

I looked away, because I knew that Black hadn't done that because he thought it was right or just. He'd thought it necessary, that those rituals were a crutch that did more harm than good. He probably knew that already. Most of the orc generals likely did as well, but to greenskins action always mattered more than intent.

"I've killed people," I said. "A lot of them. Because they were my enemies, because they were in my way. Sometimes even to make a point. Guilt, what was actually deserved, I stopped bringing into it somewhere along the way."

Hakram drank and did not speak.

"I started the Liesse Rebellion," I admitted suddenly. "I let the Lone Swordsman go after starting him down that path. Because I needed a war to rise."

The orc set down his cup.

"I suspected," he gravelled. "It was too personal for you. More than it ever was when you were pruning away the undesirables in Callow."

"In sparing him, I killed thousands," I said. "I used them as a tool. And that's despicable, Hakram. I hate it, that for a moment I stood in the same place the High Lords do when they decided to hike the taxes or murder a few of my people for convenience. I think that's the line I can't live with crossing. Being the kind of person that doesn't see people as people, just objects."

"The kind of person that would use killing others as fuel for a ritual," he said.

"I know it's different for Praesi," I said. "You read Black's journal, same as me. There were years where sacrifices for the fields were all that kept famine away, and I won't cast stones at people doing ugly shit to survive. But there's no need for that anymore. Not if the grain can come from Callow instead. But it's still done, and there has to be a point where culture isn't an excuse anymore, right? Gods, if it was someone's culture to eat fucking babies does that mean I just have to smile and pretend it's not vile? Because there's a lot of that going around, Hakram. The Matrons are our allies, so we have to pretend the things they do every year to boys just like Robber because they're boys aren't revolting. Ratface's own father tried to have him knifed in his bed because he was inconvenient, and I'm supposed to just laugh it off and say 'that's the Taghreb for you, there they go murdering again'? Fuck, I've done dark things but at least I don't pretend it's all right for me to have done them. I don't encourage it."

Gods, but it felt good to actually say that out loud. Because I knew who I'd sided with, and now more than ever I knew who I answered to. But there were compromises that rankled. Things I had to pretend I didn't see because I couldn't pick every battle that should be picked and still think I'd win. That was the thing, with stories. They never told you that the ogres had kids that would starve without a father or that the valiant knight that helped you was part of a larger institution that might trigger civil war if left unchecked. If you wanted a clean ending, one that didn't leave a bad taste in the mouth, you had to end the story just after the victory. Otherwise you got to see that you could win loudly once, send Evil skittering back into the dark, but that everywhere across Creation there were lesser evils taking place every hour of every day and there wasn't much anyone could do about it.

"Ah," Hakram said softly. "You hadn't realized."

I looked at him.

"That Kilian is Praesi," he said. "With all that entails."

"She doesn't need to do this," I said, almost pleadingly. "She's not as powerful as she could be, it's true. But she's still better than the average Legion mage. If it came down between her dying and the ritual being made, Gods forgive me but I'd do it. Because I'm in love with her, and I'm selfish and I'd rather be a monster than lose her. But it's not going to kill her, to be who she is. This is just wanting more for herself at the expense of others."

"She can do it legally," Hakram said. "Using death row criminals at auction."

"I know that," I said through gritted teeth. "And I know that the people who'd bleed wouldn't be choir children. That they'll die anyway, probably on another altar in a way that benefits someone else. That even in Praes you don't get the noose lightly. But if they hang, Hakram, that's law. That's the exercise of justice, or the closest the Wasteland can have to it. There's a difference between hanging someone for a crime and slitting their throat open so your magic comes more smoothly. And it stings that I shared my bed with someone for more than a year who doesn't get something that basic."

I drained the rest of my cup.

"Gods, is human sacrifice too low a bar to set?" I said, and I felt exhausted. "Because in my enemies I'll live with it. Until I can make them stop, and I will. But Kilian's on my side. Used to be a lot more than that. And I refuse that this should be who we are."

I looked at the orc.

"What's the point of any of this, if we're just the High Lords with a nicer reputation?" I asked. "I'm not better than her even if she does this, Hakram. I'm probably worse, if a count can be kept for things like this. And we both know I'll do worse things before this is over. But I won't put on a smile and pretend this is all right. I'm not willing to be that person, not even for Kilian."

The tall orc finished his cup.

"This is," he said, "half the conversation you needed to have. Perhaps you should seek the other half."

He left the tent, left me alone with the words I'd spoken still filling the silence. They were no comfort. Never had been.

Thanks for another chapter. C=

Stephen R. Marsh

A solid half the conversation indeed.

danh3107

>The Saint of Swords

Hah, I get that reference.

Great Chapter as usual

JC

What is the reference?

Byzantine

Probably a Fate/Stay Night reference.

A Domain in this story is roughly the equivalent to a Reality Marble in the Nasuverse.

nick012000

Emiya Shirou from Fate/Stay Night, I think.

Kai Wingless

I remember watching this scene, but with a different set of subtitles. The line "Have you enough swords, King of Heroes?" was such a good line. The official subs don't hit quite the same way, I think. Though there's no way to fix the activation speech, lol. Just have settle for the fact that Japanese poetry doesn't always translate to English in a meaningful way.

danh3107

It's most likely Unlimited Blade Works, from Fate/Stay Night. The domains are very similar to the magic called Reality Marbles.

MagnaMalusLupus

Regardless of anything mentioned by others about the anime series, the term Sword Saint is attributed to the Japanese swordsman and author, Miyamoto Musashi; aside from writing a book on tactics still read to this day called the Book of Five Rings, is also considered to have been the greatest historical Japanese swordsman. Complete bastard too, but undeniably good at killing.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Wait, Fate AND Stay Night are one thing? What is it, a book? An anime? I've never heard of it

Byzantine

@ Warren, since it won't let me reply directly:

Fate/stay night is one particular entry in the Fate series. Technically I'm referring to it by the first path while the actual Reality Marble only gets called on in the second path, but meh.

It's generally a visual novel series that at various points has expanded into anime, movies, and games.

Shequi

Hmmm. I suspect the above are correct about the anime link, although my first reaction to the phrase "Saint of Swords" was to the Shogun Executioner from C&C, which first appeared in the mission "Behold the Mighty Saint of Swords"

Darkening

Hm. A little insight into Cat's current moral status, a promise of a power boost soon, and a possibility of her getting drastically weakened when she gets her heart back later. Not the most exciting chapter, but certainly some important moments in it. At least if she does get nerfed over this domain thing once she gets her heart back, she can always transition to get a new and improved set of aspects.

Dainpdf

I'm just waiting for Masego to get the ritual ready and it involve bleeding a score of people. And then Cat will have an aneurysm.

JackbeThimble

One of the reasons Cat likes Masego is that he hates human sacrifice too. Mostly as a matter of professional pride rather than morals but still.

Clint

I'm just getting tired that in every arc this same physical/name nerf keeps happening in different ways , it and the bard are becoming repetitive to me

Jago

The Bard is repetitive by nature. Probably Cat has a problem with that, it is how this universe works, it tries to put up sequences and the first nerfing of its third aspect set up that.

It can be a sequence of three struggles against a power that tries to remove her third aspect: first time she loses it (a loss), the second time she gets it but it is nerfed (a draft), the third time she gets it and it is very powerful (a victory).

wirelessgrapes

Actually seeing Cat's thought process is interesting. She makes some good points, in that she can't just be the High Lords with a nicer bow. I have the view that she needs to refuse the sacrifice, because otherwise she'll lose her 'Good Evil' Story tag. Heroes fight adversity, not hurt others to go around it. Maybe the sacrifice won't ruin it, but you have to have a red line somewhere, other wise you end up with the Red Line Fallacy.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

She doesn't need to be so controlling about what someone else wants to with their own life, but she IS Named I guess

Darkening

Is it really being controlling to other people to simply refuse to closely associate with people that commit human sacrifice for personal gain?

Dylan Tullos

The Warren Peace NFL Report:

Cat isn't upset over what Killian is doing with her own life. She's upset over what Killian is doing with other people's lives; specifically, murdering them to give herself a power boost.

The Gallowborne are criminals, and they'd be the first to admit that they deserve a noose. But It's one thing to kill a man, or even to sacrifice a human being in a moment of crisis. It's another to think of people as objects to be traded.

Cat is a general and a ruler; she'll sacrifice her people when she needs to. Killian thinks like a slave trader, viewing people as commodities that exist for her convenience and profit. These mindsets are not compatible.

luminiousblu

"But It's one thing to kill a man, or even to sacrifice a human being in a moment of crisis. It's another to think of people as objects to be traded."

Is it really? Like no, is it REALLY different? Generals go to war thinking of numbers, not names. It's 'acceptable' to lose 4000 people in this battle, we have enough to go on. We'll 'let the javelinmen screen the heavy infantry', because we'll 'only lose 200'. Rulers will say, 'we can let the people in the north starve, because they're really not that important to our infrastructure and it's either them or the south'.

Killing a man who is already legally dead is not particularly bad, in my eyes. If they're going to die anyway they may as well be made useful.

burguulkodar

For me it's like using the dead corpses of dead row criminals into fertilizer or involuntary/unwilling organ donors after the sentence. They aren't BEING killed for that reason, but since they will get killed anyway, might as well do things useful with their bodies/organs.

In the case of Praesi, the energy of death can turn into a magic power. It's very much alike. It's not using their souls, or so I understand. Just the energy of the ritual.

Dainpdf

She doesn't want to be just the High Lords, but I think it's more from a "I wanna be able to live with who I am" perspective than just "I need this story practically so I can achieve my objectives".

Gunslinger

Catherine's getting a power upgrade. Wohoo. Though odds are of good of course that something horrible will go wrong leaving her with another headache. We are still after all on the kick Cat side of the plot curve.

Also reading Cat's reading made me flip flip over her anger. At first I did consider that Cat has done plenty of murdering and soul tearing just to make a point. But then the last point about the issue, about Killian not even understanding why it is a bad thing was pretty convincing. At least in the sense that her reasoning makes internal sense.

On a side note, she had no qualms using that poor summer Duke as portal fuel. Grooves in creation they may be but Fae are still sentient beings.

danh3107

It's Been hinted that Fae are in fact, not actually sentient at all. Warlock compared their internal workings to being little different than a stone in arcadia.

LM

Fair. But I took that to mean Arcadia itself is sentient

Shequi

That wasn't Warlock, that was Akua's First Mage / Father.

vamair

I don't really see why the noose or guillotine or whatever is better than the altar. Is it because sacrificing people create incentives to condemn more people to death and for lesser crimes than usual and therefore warps justice?

Dainpdf

I think that's it.

It stops being "the State removes you because you are a threat", with punishment foreseen in law, and becomes "the State denies your humanity and deems you a resource because you committed a crime, plus we need some blood for the blood god".

RandomFan

Either that, or there's some religious symbolism. Maybe the church of light believe, or even hint that it condemns the sacrificed to hell, in certain circles, or the folklore says the same. If it has lasting post-mortal consequences... well.

Daemion

As Cat has said, using the fae in a ritual was a bad thing. She is aware of that. The sticking point between Killian and her is that Killian sees nothing bad or wrong in killing people for a ritual.

It's necessary evil vs. institutional murder.

It's a matter of morality based on cultural differences. Killian's morality has been formed as she grew up in an evil empire where there is no great significance given to human lives... while Cat grew up hearing religious and heroic tales in which human lives were always important.

Honestly, I don't see how they can bridge these differences. Even if Masego found a way to unlock Killian's potential without spilling any blood, Cat would still know that Killian is a person who doesn't mind ritual sacrifice for personal gain.

letouriste

maybe EE will give us the answer wednesday:)
i am honestly curious about that too.

the story can go a lot of ways:

- killian could die in the next battle(would lead to cat regretting things)
- cat find a right way to do that(on enemies?)
- cat or killian get convinced by the other somehow
- they both agree to find another way
- they definitively break up but in good term
- other ways?

KageLupus

It would almost feel like a cop out at this point, but I really do think that Killian is potentially on a path to gain a Name herself. After Masego transitioned into Hierophant the role of Apprentice should be available again. And here is Killian, working under and with a Named mage to increase her knowledge and power.

The two main reasons I can see for her not to become the new Apprentice are that it would too neatly sidestep the current moral dilemma her and Cat are in, and that throwing in a new Named would throw off the current five man band. They already have a mage in Hierophant and we have seen what happens when a group has redundant members in it (Bard v Bumbling Conjurer). Killian deserves better than to play second string even after gaining a name. And would be more than rife for a tragic murdering if the story called for it.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Everyone here always thinks their favorite character is about to become Named, or already is Named, or whatever stupid ideas. Look at how commenters talk about Robber, if you can without barfing all over your monitor.

Shequi

There are at least 2 claimants for the Name of Apprentice – Killian is one, but Masego has his assistant Fadila Mbafeno who might try to Claim it, and as far as we've seen if there are multiple claimants there's usually only one survivor...

stevenneiman

Fae are definitely sapient, but I'm honestly not sure if they're sentient, with the exception of the Winter King. In any case, they're still inhuman monsters in a way that death row inmates will never be. Also, it might affect her perspective that her most loyal troops were originally death row inmates, and I'm not sure if that bias is unreasonable.

onedollargum

You might have mixed up sapient and sentient there. :3

The gallowsborne are living proof that there can be redemption in service. Not that value = morality, but I agree her history with them is likely a heavy influence.

I wonder if Hierophant needs human sacrifice for his upcoming ritual...

Dainpdf

Our Fae are Philosophical Zombies. Although, given this is Akua's father, he just might not recognize the sapience of anything he deems convenient to bleed.

2xMachina

And then Mesego brings human sacrifices to the ritual to remove Cat's limiter.

"What? I thought you knew"

Engineer

Huh, Cat still has qualms about human sacrifice? Murder is murder, whatever your justifications for it and as she said herself: "justifications only matter to the just". So, follow your own advice Cat.

Letting those convicts die without utilizing their inevitable deaths for a better purpose seems like a terrible waste of a perfectly good power source. Did she forget the upcoming slugfest with Diabolist?

I'm fairly certain Black would not approve.

Dainpdf

Cold blooded murder is different from killing in the battlefield. Killing an enemy because you need to, in a matter of life or death, is different from slaughtering for convenience.

Even from a utilitarian point of view, Cat is a ruler and as such her actions define what is acceptable justification for actions.

burguulkodar

For me it's like using the dead corpses of death row criminals into fertilizer or involuntary/unwilling organ donors after the sentence. They aren't BEING killed for that reason, but since they will get killed anyway, might as well do things useful with their bodies/organs.

In the case of Praesi, the energy of death can turn into a magic power. It's very much alike. It's not using their souls, or so I understand. Just the energy of the ritual.

Dainpdf

Ignoring the fact that you seem to have posted three identical replies to three different posts...

The problem with using the corpses of death row criminals (beyond the fact that the death penalty is barbaric) is that it creates perverse incentives. Prison labor leads to increased imprisonment.

Levi Kalden

That is sadly the problem with morality. You have to draw the line somewhere because morality isn't a thing of logic. Some people will see the line drawn to late some to early (I belong to those) because otherwise you will not stop. I don't think she picked the right fight since I agree that a resource should be used if it doesn't change the outcome (in this case the persons death). But I have to admit the hypocrisy in my own morality as it is formed from many different influences. Therefore I can't condemn her for this flaw even if it's there

Myth

The hypocrisy is strong in Cat. Human sacrifice is wrong but forcibly removing the soul from someone for being allied with your enemy isn't?

That aside, enjoyable to read yet one of the weaker chapters so far in my opinion. Also I am getting the feeling that Diabolist wont die in this book. That it will end with the defeat of the Queen of Summer and King of Winter.

RandomFan

Keep in mind, if there's any spiritual consequences from being sacrificed, they're probably permanent, while Cat said that the soul removal thing was temporary, followed by a proper killing or return to a living body. Still horrible, but in a different way.

Still, I'm blaming Church of Light brainwashing that seeped in through the cracks.

Dainpdf

She needed the soul removal to win that fight, which is a pretty major one. She can argue it was necessary evil in order to defeat Akua, who is okay with unleashing demons on people. Plus, she fixed it later.

This is just Killian wanting a boost and just not seeing what would be wrong with sacrificing a few people for it.

Petya

Err, he meant the removal of soul of one of Aqua's generals, for the sake of revenge in the AFTERMATH of the battle. She just torn out the soul of living human being instead of swiftly killing him for the sake of PETTY REVENGE. But I may got something wrong, because I honestly do not see anything wrong with using death row prisoners for sacrifice. It is akin for me to donation of your body for science, or for organs to save another human live. Meat is meat, death is death. If it comes anyway, you should use the heck out of it. The corpse is hard to offend, usually. Also, having the literal fae mage on your side might just as well save a few more lives of her legionares, and by extension – civilians. Also also, it can be used as a narrative element to be used against the Court of Summer, if Kellian fae form is any indication, we all but directly told that she is a descendant of Summer. And, would you look at that, a love between a Summer and Winter fae, you can even scramble it to be a pivot to allying both courts, preventing and effectively winning the war, while reaching the wishes of Winter King, and how many lives that could save (and/or endanger) is anyone's guess.

But to be fair, I also tend to see no reason in funerals and general traditions associated with death, aside from being a useless waste of resources. Turning bodies into the soilent green or fertilizer, while not spending so many land or money on cemeteries is really usefull, and I can't find the reason it is not wildly implemented, aside from general stupidity of population. And I also would not see necromancy as anything Evil, if it existed. A large chunk of humanity seem to agree with me on the terms of necromancy though.

Dainpdf

Donation of bodies to science is generally voluntary on the part of the deceased (prior to dying, of course) or their family. Not decided by those in power.

burguulkodar

For me it's like using the dead corpses of dead row criminals into fertilizer or involuntary/unwilling organ donors after the sentence. They aren't BEING killed for that reason, but since they will get killed anyway, might as well do things useful with their bodies/organs.

In the case of Praesi, the energy of death can turn into a magic power. It's very much alike. It's not using their souls, or so I understand. Just the energy of the ritual.

Bonesawer

I'm seriously looking forward to the sucker punch that Cat's power boost needing blood sacrifices is going to bring (I'm guessing but it seems too narratively perfect for EE to pass up). I hope she comes down on the 'accepting blood sacrifices' side of the fence. It's just too morally inconsistent, and more importantly impragmatic (against the heart of the storyline groove she is following after).

Bonesawer

*inconsistent/ impragmatic not to

Dylan Tullos

Bonesawer:

The issue here isn't whether Cat is willing to do evil things to protect Callow. That's one of the major themes of the story, and she's proved many times that she's willing to cross the line. If that means performing one blood sacrifice, or a hundred, Cat will do what she thinks is necessary.

Cat's problem with Killian isn't that she does bad things; Cat admits that she's done far worse. The cause of their division is that Cat knows what she's doing is evil, while Killian sees absolutely nothing wrong with taking a man's life to give herself more power. Cat and Killian are both pragmatists, but Cat does evil for a good cause, while Killian is willing to do evil for purely selfish reasons, without even acknowledging the harm her actions cause to real people.

People aren't objects. Even when she treats people like objects, Cat understands this. Killian doesn't. Ultimately, no relationship can survive that kind of difference.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I don't think it's so simplistic. This isn't about morals at all, at least not at its core.

I think it's more that Cat sees Kil as her connection to being "pure" or "innocent", and if Kil goes through with the sacrifice ritual, she can't represent those things to Cat anymore. Really Cat is being disgustingly controlling here, asking Kil to be something she's not for the sake of Cat's subconscious dissonance.

Dainpdf

Perfectly captured the essence of Cat's argument there. Black's plan of making sure all of Cat's inner circle are Praesi tests her again and again, grinding against her morals and worldview.

Much like when she associates Black with a father figure, she tends to forget who she's dealing with. Malicia also got plenty of use out of that.

letouriste

i still don't see why they could not just take some of akua confidants for the ritual. If they are her enemies that should be okay?...i think^^ hakram is pretty cool here:D

"Considering I had it on good authority – Robber, ever up for a bit of gossip if it was at someone else's expense – that he was still sleeping around on the regular his prudery for this was pretty amusing."

that sentence was complicated;) you forgot an " , " between "regular" and "his prudery" i think.

stevenneiman

I think that Hakram's Role is tied to supporting his CO (Cat) whatever she does, and not in changing her course. Like Eudokia once said about her own place on the team, without Hakram Cat would do the same things just not as well. It makes sense that he gets her to confide in him and put her thoughts into words, since he knew that the repressed emotion was tearing her apart. Now that I think of it I wonder if this is one more attempt by Fate to railroad her into a redemption story. Often villains who became Evil for noble reasons (which there's no argument Cat did) are forced back to the side of good when they feel hostility or betrayal at the discovery that one of their Evil companions did something that even they find morally repugnant. Sending it from her love interest is just twisting the knife, but it would make the feelings stronger and the redemption more likely, if she was the sort to go for this. Doesn't matter of course, since turning Good wouldn't accomplish anything and Cat wouldn't throw away everything she's worked for over an estranged love even if it would.

As far as typos go:

"Every dragon has a domain at [their->the] heart of their body" there's other ways to correct this, but that's the simplest

"The colour of my cloak's a bit of {a} hint there."

"It's not exactly fucking riddle when I feel like I put a fresh knife in my ribs every time she's in the room." I'm not exactly sure what this was supposed to say

Also, I think that the proper word is "prudishness", not "prudery". It's clear enough, but it reads a bit weirdly.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

They can't use Akua's goons for the sacrifice ritual because Cat has stupidly gone and entrenched herself in this position, and it doesn't have anything to do with the original problem anymore. Any compromise that ends with the ritual happening is a loss for Cat now. Her feelings on compromise have been discussed completely I think.

People do stupid things when their insecurities motivate decision making, and Cat is no exception.

Cayle

Dead is dead. It seems so hypocritical and pointless. Catherine is like a bloody vegan in an abattoir, killing is fine but eating meat is wrong.

RandomFan

It's probably Church of Light Brainwashing, abet done manually. Sacrifice probably is an act of worship to the gods below in their book, while the death penalty is absolutely okay.

In fact, I don't know what the consequences of Human Sacrifice are, but somehow I get the impression that it looks, to a Callowan, at least, more like dealing with something else than ripping out the life force and transmuting it. If there's someone at the other end of that trade, then it's dealing with the dark gods directly, which is unprecedented for her. Also, it might mean condemning souls and not just lives.

Dylan Tullos

Cayle:

Dead is dead. If the only way for Cat to stop Akua was to make a hundred sacrifices, she'd do it.

This isn't about the sacrifice; it's about the mindset. For Cat, taking life is something you do when you have to, to protect the people you serve. For Killian, taking life is something you do for the sake of convenience, because it provides a benefit. Cat thinks of human sacrifice as a crime she could commit for the greater good, while Killian thinks of it as an expensive good. Like many Praesi, she rejects the concept of morality outside of "good for me or the people I like" or "bad for me or the people I like". Cat does evil things, but she hasn't rejected right and wrong, and she hasn't reached the point of thinking of people as cattle.

Cayle

What is need? Those governors she crucified were pretty inconvenient wouldn't you say?

She's tying her concept of necessity to some ideal greater good (for callow) scenario. When she met Black she cut a throat for power. She saved the Lone Swordsman knowing how many would die from it. She's sacrificed people many times now and she'll do it again.

Dylan Tullos

Cayle:

That's a good question. For Cat, "need" is about what the people of Callow need. For Killian, "need" is about what she personally needs.

Cat understands that crucifying people or sacrificing them on an altar is small-e evil. Killian does not. People she doesn't know are objects, stepping stones that she uses on her rise to power. Cat also uses people, but she doesn't dehumanize them in the same way, doesn't make them automatically less than her simply because she has power and they don't.

Cat's moral system assumes that life has value, and that it can only be taken for good cause. Killian's moral system assumes that she has value, and that people she doesn't know personally exist for her convenience. Cat is a moral pragmatist, seeking the Greater Good for her people, while Killian is essentially denying the humanity and reality of other people for her personal profit. The slave trader metaphor is the best one I can think of to describe how Killian thinks.

Blinks

Motives matter. Reasoning matters. You start looking at people as nothing more than ways to increase your power that's an awful step to take.

Dead is dead simply doesn't cover it.

There's a difference between killing someone for giggles and killing someone for a crime. Especially in a world where good and evil are legitimate and verifiable things.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Let's be clear here: motives matter TO YOU. Do not take it farther than that. This very chapter mentioned that to greenskins, motives really don't matter. How did you miss that?

Blinks

In a world with good and evil?

Motives matter to more than just ME.

Kadath

Cat's been avoiding Killeen because she doesn't want to be convinced by her point of view. She's afraid of slipping even further than she already has.

Fanon

For the sake of my KilliCat ship, I'm perfectly okay with human sacrifice!

I really hope Cat's ritual also requires human sacrifice and that'll force her to allow Killian's as well.

It'll also force Cat to admit how selfish she is, that it's okay for /her/ to sacrifice lives for the Greater Good, but won't allow others to do the same.

That corruption of morals sounds absolutely delicious 😊

OldSchoolVillain

Cat does indeed sacrifice for the "greater good" (if not the Greater Good). The problem here is, as some people have stated, that Killian isn't making these sacrifices for a greater good, she's making them to solidify and increase her personal power, with no stated motive in how she plans to *use* that power. That's the issue Cat has – opposite of the Orc mindset she noted earlier, she's looking at the intent behind the action, and Killian's is evil. Not Evil, the way Cat and Black work, but plain evil in the way that Akua and Lady Tasia (gods below rest her soul) and hells, even Triumphant – may she never return – worked.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Big Brother

Cat's heart has been replaced with "The Moon." Maybe Killian's can be replaced with the Sun they stole from the Princess. With Hierophant performing a ritual in three days time on the New Moon to increase the limit on Cat's Fae power, he could possibly follow up with a ritual to bind the Sun to Killian at Dawn. There could be significance in that. The Dawning of a new Power in the Summer Court coinciding with the actual dawn could lend great weight to Killian in the story, and help Cat break the cycle of Summer and Winter.

Fanon

And if that and KilliCat happens, Summer and Winter will be parlayed through romance, further breaking the cycle of conflict!

OldSchoolVillain

More likely they'd end as star crossed lovers. Cat could only bear Princess Sulia's WINGS for a few moments, how well do you think Cat and Killian would be able to bear each other's touch with that kind of equal and opposite power?

nipi

Hmmm... Wasnt Kilian close to a name. There might be hope of her surviving such a procedure.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Not that I remember. Do you have any evidence from the text—NOT speculation from the peanut gallery—to support this idea?

kinigget

I see

So it's less the practice itself, though she does still find it utterly abhorrent. The bigger problem is the attitude

Congratulations Catherine, you managed to have the one objection thst doesn't make you a hypocritical

And at this point, I think she'd settle for getting Killian to understand her objection

kinigget

There's also the fact that for Killian this actually isn't about convenience or personal power. It's about being worthy to stand beside Cat.

See, compared to the vast majority of mages, she's well ahead of the curve, but compared to Cat, she's falling behind. As much as cat might say that it doesnt matter and that she doesn't need this, she's still **badly** missing the point. She's not seeing how important it is to Killian to be able to match the girl she loves

I do believe there's an understanding that can be reached here, where Killian acknowledges that this is a wrong, and Cat acknowledges why Killian is willing to do it anyway.

Not\_a\_robot

Wasn't it stated somewhere that human sacrifices messed with the immortal soul of someone? If so, sacrificing someone, no matter how evil, condemns them to an eternity of torture and robs them of the ability to redeem themselves in a next life. Considering Cat's attachment to her own redeemed death row inmates, her refusal makes even more sense in that case.

RandomFan

I don't believe that it's ever been confirmed, but I've been throwing around the idea that at least the myth is there, even if it's impossible or against the rules.

RandomFan

I actually don't believe that's the case, because that strikes me as horribly unlikely, but it wouldn't surprise me if both forces of evil and forces of good have claimed it at various times. I mean, for good, it means that the villain must be stopped, and for evil... it's terrifying, the idea of that. So both sides have propagated misinformation on it for so long that most people have a negative gut reaction to the very idea.

reveen

If Killian can't understand why you feel the way you do then she's not worth your time. Like, Cat might say "I'M IN L0000VE", but that's the fact that she's still pretty much a toddler talking. She's known Killian for, what, a couple years? Just because you've screwed someone doesn't mean you know them.

pato

I just recently realized there are some interesting parallels between the history of Calernia and the Crusades in the 11th century. Was this intentional?

Praes = Islamic empire, Procer = Europe

I'm really disliking Cat's romantic sidestory here. Especially when it's distracting me from the actual plot I care about,

Shrike

Nice Three Worlds Collide reference 😊

Shawn Panzegraf

What I don't get is that Killian isn't talking about scooping up some innocent virgins to sacrifice. Remember at the beginning of the story, the two Legion members Cat killed with the knife Black gave her? Even with Black hearing the confession of the legionary who covers for his serial rapist friend by having killed numerous rape victims, and catching the other legionary in the act of attempted rape and conspiracy to commit murder, the penalty was going to be a mere five years imprisonment.

If serial rape, conspiracy to commit murder, and multiple counts of second degree murder are only worth five years in prison under Praesi law, extrapolate from there what one has to do to actually get condemned to death. Likely mass or extensive serial murder, rape-murders etc etc.

My point here is that if Cat saw ANY of the men or women condemned under Praesi law to die committing the acts that got them death sentences, she would kill them without even benefit of trial, and without a qualm.

These monsters forfeited their humanity long before the Praesi incarcerated them prior to their imminent executions. They are absolutely going to die anyways. Why is gaining a positive benefit from killing a monster that will die whether you purchase their last few hours of life or not wrong?

Cat can talk about how when she kills its to accomplish a greater good all she wants, but what she really means is she reserves the right to murder to further her agenda to herself.

Beyond this fact, Cat stated herself that if the ritual was necessary to save Killian's life, she'd go ahead with it herself. Every time Killian draws too deeply on her magic, those wings try to appear, Killian goes into seizures and then collapses, helpless for the next several days. Mage lines are priority targets in battle. ESPECIALLY versus a Praesi enemy like Diabolist, who has an intimate understanding of Legion doctrine. All of Cat's other mages are also War College graduates, ie Praesi. Does she think any of them are going to risk their lives to haul Killian to safety mid-battle WHEN, not if, one of her collapses occurs when the Fifteenth is being pressed hard?

Diabolist has already considered killing Killian to hurt Cat. Her taunt in the Hashmallim chapel about having turned Killian into a ghoull says as much. The fact she was lying at that time doesn't mean she hasn't given the idea further thought.

Much like Harry Potter breaking up with Ginny Weasley didn't make her any safer from Voldemort because one's nemesis doesn't read memos regarding the current state of their nemesis's romantic relationship, just because Cat and Killian are no longer sleeping together doesn't mean Killian isn't still marked out by Cat's enemies as someone to kill in order to hurt Cat.

If I were Killian, I would find the notion of unnecessarily suffering a malady that leaves me helpless as a newborn babe for days at a time every time I go the extra mile with my magic to serve Cat's interests utterly intolerable as well. Cat is asking Killian to continue running unnecessary risks with her life for the sake of Cat being morally comfy. It's bullshit, and demonstrates Cat doesn't really love Killian, and never loved her. Love makes you put the other first before yourself. If you aren't willing to do something you find morally detestable to remove a clear and ongoing threat to the life of the one you claim to love, you don't really love them in my view.

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegraf:

First of all, the Praesi "justice" system isn't likely to be particularly just. Remember the chapter where we got to meet the city guard? The commander was completely corrupt, and her guardsmen were basically henchmen who did whatever their boss told them to do. I don't think these are the kind of people who fuss about whether accusations are fair or not. So Praesi death row is probably going to be a mix of really horrible criminals and people who annoyed someone powerful and got accused of a really horrible crime.

But Cat's problem with Killian isn't that she's killing condemned criminals for the Greater Good. As you say, Cat's done that herself. She would understand if Killian did the sacrifice to strengthen her ability to better serve the Fifteenth and fight Diabolist. Her problem is that Killian sees absolutely nothing wrong with killing people to gain power, that Killian fundamentally views people she doesn't know as livestock who exist to give her a benefit.

Cat is willing to hurt and kill people to make the world a better place. Killian turns people into objects who don't matter, and she uses them for her benefit. Both of them are willing to perform similar actions, but their mindsets are so different that there's no room for compromise. If circumstances were different, Killian would sacrifice Callowan rebels just as easily as she killed Praesi criminals, and she wouldn't have the slightest qualm about murdering Cat's people to gain power.

Your definition of "love" requires someone to surrender all of their beliefs and principles as soon as it's convenient for the person they love. If Killian was making her living as a slave trader, would Cat be expected to accept that as well, in the name of "love"?

Life for people like Cat and Killian isn't safe. Their job requires them to risk their own lives. Cat risks her life for a higher purpose, to improve the lives of the people she knows and cares about, as well as people that she's never met. Killian does not care about the lives of people she's never met, and she doesn't understand that sacrificing them is evil. Cat will do evil things when she has to, but she understands that they're still wrong; Killian doesn't seem to grasp the concepts of small-e evil and small-g good. They're just not morally compatible.

Thankfully, Cat isn't willing to surrender everyone she is and become the worst kind of Praesi just because her girlfriend thinks that would be convenient. She would kill to save Killian's life, but she won't smile and pretend that murder isn't wrong so that she can have a relationship with someone who feels that way.

Cayle Brown

Thank you! It's driving me crazy that people keep minimising Killians issue.

georgeoswalddannyson

Killian always comes across as pretty mature, and level headed, at least way more than Cat about lots of stuff. I'm looking forward to see them have heart to heart and seeing where she really stands on this.

glassgirlceci

Ugh, I'm really sick of Cat's hypocrisy here. I mean, the fact that I loved her and Kilian together plays a role, but still. I honestly am surprised that she still has this sticking point.

d0m1n1c

I still don't understand why she's okay with Orcs eating people, but not okay with human sacrifice; hell, she even used baby eating as an example for something worse.

I don't see a distinction between ordering her orcs to, as a fear tactic, eat the people they were going to kill, and potentially using those same people as fuel for rituals.

OnneWerda

I wonder why the three people that Black sacrificed to save Cat after her first encounter with the Lone Swordsman didn't come up in that conversation.

Cotillion

I'm on my... third? Reread of this series and this objection of Catherine's never made much sense to me, but I think I've finally got it. The use of death row prisoners in Praesi society has parallels with the for-profit prison system, in that the ability to use these criminals to the gain of society creates an incentive to make sure they continue to exist. I think that this is one of the rare occasions where EE has missed the mark on making their point – this chapter could use another pass-through to try and restate Cat's argument on this. Looking at it from the perspective of a for-profit system makes Cat's argument much more consistent with her own morality, because the entire point of the Guide is about how systems and patterns force behavior, and how to break or transcend those patterns. The practice of bleeding prisoners over altars in order to gain an advantage is a systemic problem with the institutions of the Dread Empire of Praes, and this is what Catherine takes exception to. Her character is about using abusive systems to break those same systems, which is why she rationalizes her own atrocities.

Chapter 38: Host

"It is said that the founding First Prince spoke of Procer as a great tower, every principality a stone raising it to ever greater heights. I have found the sentiment more poetic than accurate. Procer is no single tower but twenty-three of them, and their owners constantly steal each other's stones to rise at the expense of the others."

-Extract from 'The Labyrinth Empire, or, A Short History of Procer', by Princess Eliza of Salamans

Even having kept out most of the general staff, the pavilion was crowded. Enough that we'd had to bring in a second table to shove at the end of our usual one, a ramshackle assembly Pickler had covered with a tablecloth in a move that fooled absolutely no one. It made me want to wince a little, considering who was seated around it. We were looking like disorganized amateurs to some of the most powerful people in Callow. The wine, at least, they couldn't complain about. Northern red, because I sure as Hells wasn't breaking into my own stash for the sake of people I mostly couldn't stand, but decent vintage and cooled by mages. I'd helped myself to a cup early because I already had a feeling this conference was going to scrape my nerves raw. If there wasn't frost on something before this was over, I owed Hakram more than I should have willingly bet. I'd stolen a horse – with wings, even – from Arcadia as well as gems and my favourite chair, but I had no illusions Zombie the Third would still be in one piece when the dust settled this year. That meant buying another charger, and those were costly.

To the left, Duchess Kegan Iarsmai of Daoine was seated, managing to convey general disapproval at the existence of everybody else without her face actually turning up in a sneer. I was reluctantly impressed by the feat, which was magic in its own right. Her second had taken a chair for once, the hooded and silent man I'd taken way too long to learn was called Commander Adair. The head of the Watch, though his title was just that and not a Name. That hadn't always been the case, historically speaking, but as far as I knew the last Commander had been killed by my own teacher years before the Conquest. Something about skirmishes with the orc clans that lived in the Lesser Steppes had prompted him to step in, and explained how Black had forged bonds with prominent chieftains like Grem One-Eye and Istrid Knightsbane before the Praesi civil war.

To the right, the senior officers of the Legions of Terror had clustered. Marshal Ranker was at the heart of them, not even her blackened twisted hand managing to make the sight of a wrinkled goblin her size perched on a cushioned stool entirely humourless. She'd brought her own Staff Tribune and on her other side sat General Afolabi Magoro. The dark-skinned man had been less than fond of me even before I'd publicly spanked him for speaking out of line, and since then never faced me with anything less than the blank emotionless mask that was taught to all Soninke highborn from the cradle. Tonight, though, there was something wary about him. The Empress had been good as her word, I mused. Malicia had whispered in the right ears and made it clear that those who did not fall in line behind me were earning her displeasure as well as mine.

It would be a lot easier to dislike the monsters I worked with if they weren't so competent, I thought.

Adjutant was seated at my left, a courtesy offered to Juniper who'd taken his usual place at my right instead. If the Hellhound was nervous at the prospect of addressing hardened veterans most of which outranked in both formal authority and experience, there was no trace of it on her broad face. The only cup of wine my general had taken had been duly watered, and left mostly untouched. Of her general staff, only three had been called to sit across us. Ratface, though mere a Supply Tribune, had the place of honour. The report he was slated to give was by far the most important. Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara flanked him on one side, here as much because she knew the duty rosters of the Fifteenth like the back of her hand as because I intended on picking her brains about the people here after the conference was over. The last addition was Grandmaster Brandon Talbot, and it had been a row to get him a seat in here at all. Juniper had made it clear she didn't trust him in the least, commander or not, but I'd stood my ground. The same reasons she disliked him were why he needed to be in here: he was a voice for the Callowans, something none of my other senior officers could feasibly pass for. Considering more than half the Fifteenth had never stepped foot in the Wasteland, there was a need for that now. The Hellhound might not like it, but it was the truth.

It was more people than I would have liked, for a conference this sensitive, but the realities of the situation had imposed. The soldiers gathered outside formed the largest host Callow had seen since the Conquest, but it wasn't near as united as the forces that had fought. A little less than half of them were Deoraithe, loose allies to me at the best of times, and the chain of command on the Praesi side was a fucking mess. That I was on top, no one could deny. Under that, though? Marshal Ranker had everyone else beat in rank and seniority, but Juniper commanded the largest legion by far and answered to me alone. Afolabi wasn't a contender in this sense, but he had connections in the Wasteland and his Twelfth had gotten off the lightest casualty-wise from our expedition through Arcadia. That Kegan openly feuded with Ranker and spoke to Juniper like she was a particularly stupid child had made any attempts to keep things civil in the past a throbbing headache.

"All right, everyone's here," I eloquently begun. "We'll begin the march south tomorrow at dawn, but before we do it's time everybody was brought in on the campaign plans."

"That would be pleasing," Duchess Kegan said coldly.

"Unorthodox, making plans without your senior commanders," Marshal Ranker added.

I reached for my cup, and reminded myself I still needed those two. It wasn't feasible to shove them both in a bag and run away with their armies as they fought inside.

"Our operations are contingent on factors none of you have the clearance to know about," Juniper growled.

"A Marshal of Praes lacked clearance?" General Afolabi said.

I turned to Adjutant.

"Hakram, you seen my pipe?" I nonchalantly asked.

The Soninke stiffened in his seat.

"In your tent," the orc sighed.

"What a shame," I said, and gave Afolabi a friendly grin.

I could have done without the approving look from Kegan, or Talbot for that matter. Just because I was stepping on the fucker didn't mean I was any fonder of the rest of them.

"Before we set out, certain logistics have to be seen to," Juniper said. "Our host currently numbers near forty thousand soldiers. The battles in Arcadia saw an unusually high proportion of wounded, many with wounds that are beyond mage healing. Supply Tribune Bishara, report."

Aisha inclined her head a fraction, then addressed the table in a calm voice that was very clearly trained.

"As you are all aware, the Imperial-held city closest to our camp is Vale," she said. "Though it is not garrisoned at the moment and has proved recalcitrant to assist the Legions of late, this situation has been remedied."

Marshal Ranker eyed me.

"You have people in the city?" she asked.

I raised an eyebrow.

"In a manner of speaking," I said.

To be accurate, Thief had people in the city and she'd gotten in touch with them. That she'd been able to do that at all had interesting implications. Namely, that the Guild of Thieves had access to a form of communication swifter than riders. It couldn't be scrying, since they shouldn't have the mages for that and scrying was a lot less common than my exposure had led me to believe. The High Lords used it and so did the Legions, but outside those ranks it was actually fairly rare. Less now than before I'd been born, since the Warlock had published a spell formula on par with the ones the old Wasteland families had kept to themselves, but in Callow there weren't a lot of mages that could scry. Same with most nations outside our borders as well: the highest tier of practitioners in Procer and the rest might know how, but even then not as proficiently as Praesi. The knowledge had been slow to trickle out of the Empire, though it was only a matter of time before it did. Still, that Thief had a trick that worked along same lines had been both intriguing and helpful. She'd contacted the guildmaster in Vale and gotten the man to pass the messages I needed.

"Though we will detach two mage lines to keep the worst of the wounded stable, treatment will have to be deferred to outside institutions," Aisha continued.

I felt more than one look cast towards me at that. Though she'd not spoken the name, none of these people were unaware that 'outside institutions' meant the House of Light. Brothers and Sisters sworn to the Heavens, healing legionaries of the Tower. It wasn't without precedent on individual basis, I knew from my childhood in Laure, but cooperation that open certainly was. I'd had to reach out to Governess-General Kendal to get that stone rolling, since she had pull with the priests. I spent more time negotiating than stabbing people that deserved it, nowadays, which never failed to foul my mood even if it was necessary. My Staff Tribune inclined her head again, her contribution finished for the moment. Marshal Ranker was the first to speak up.

"Akua Sahelian," she said. "Do we have a read on her locations? I dislike sending off wounded without escort until we know she'd not going to ambush them."

"Nothing solid," I said. "Unless Duchess Kegan has something to share?"

It was an open secret among the people in the pavilion that what Diabolist was up to involved fucking with whatever empowered the Watch. She might have means to keep an eye on the other villain we didn't know about.

"She's still in Callow," Kegan reluctantly said. "We know nothing more."

"So far the Diabolist has avoided direct confrontation with the Legions," Adjutant gravelled. "While this cannot be relied on, if she seeks to damage the armed forces of the Empire she has better targets."

The three legions in Holden, under Juniper's mother. They'd been warned to keep an eye on the sky just in case.

"Wounded legionaries and a civilian city are an easy target," General Afolabi said. "If ritual fodder is what she seeks, Vale is wide open."

"The Diabolist can strike any city in Callow if she wants," Juniper grunted. "There isn't much we can do about it. Vale is still the best bet for our wounded."

I drummed my fingers on the table.

"I've seen the most of Akua of anyone in this room, as far as I know," I said, leaving a heartbeat for someone to disagree. No one did. "From what I understand of her, she's not going to actively harm Praesi military strength unless it's set against her. No matter what she's cooked up in Liesse, she's going to need the Legions in the coming years. She wants to be in charge of more than just a flying city and for that she needs armies."

"You believe she means to overthrow Her Dread Majesty," General Afolabi said.

He didn't seem particularly surprised. Whether it was because he hid it well or because of course Akua was going to try to take over the Empire, I couldn't tell.

"She'll need more than Liesse if she wants to breach the Tower," Ranker snorted. "Even if the Empress doesn't dig into the nasty stuff down in the vaults, it remains the most heavily fortified place on Calernia."

"Better schemers than I have failed to predict what Diabolist is after," I said flatly. "Guesswork will lead us nowhere, and we have more pressing concerns."

I glanced at Juniper.

"The supply situation has been addressed," the tall orc said. "Supply Tribune Ratface, elaborate."

The Taghreb bastard smiled lazily.

"We've been in touch with the Legion headquarters in Ater and they're sending rations and armaments down, but it'll take at least three weeks to get it all in order," he said. "Until then, we'll be relying on brave Callowan volunteers to ship us food down the Hwaerte."

"You mean smugglers," Talbot said, lips thinning.

"Food is food, Grandmaster," Ratface replied, managing to make the title sound like an insult. "Unless you would prefer magnificently legal starvation, of course. That could also be arranged."

Ranker's Staff Tribune coughed into his hand to disguise a laugh, but his Marshal didn't even bother to hide her smirk. Fucking Hells, you'd think a literal god out for our blood would be enough to make them stop sniping at each other for a week.

"Ratface," I warned.

"No offense was meant, my good knight," the Taghreb apologized.

I turned a dark look on him and he made an effort to look a little more contrite. We'd be having words about this later, and by the face Juniper was making that would be after she got done with him.

"You're all aware we'll be marching on Dormer," I said. "We'll be keeping to the river as we go down, for ease of transport. It'll delay us some but if we keep the pace we'll arrive at the city in time to pre-empt the Queen of Summer."

"Yes, the Queen," Duchess Kegan said. "She has already demonstrated her ability to wipe out hundreds in moments. How is this do be dealt with?"

"I expected Warlock's boy to be here to explain that," Marshal Ranker noted.

"Hierophant is currently making preparations," I lied.

Masego had bluntly told me he would rather set himself on fire than attend the conference, and I'd chosen not to fight that battle. This was delicate enough a balance without bringing his lack of social graces into it. The only worse idea I could come up with was bringing Archer, who by now would already have hit on two of them and brawled with a third.

"We will be bringing outside pressure to bear on Summer as we engage them," Adjutant said.

Ranker's eyes narrowed.

"Fae," she said. "You dealt with Winter again."

"I employed the services of a talented negotiator, this time," I replied vaguely.

An understatement. I'd never seen the Empress in her element before, and it had been an... eye-opening experience.

"We don't need to exterminate the enemy host," Juniper said, as if she'd seen nothing difficult about tearing through a bunch of demigods and their mostly invincible magic army. "But a position of strength will need to be achieved before we can force terms on them."

"They won't fall for the same tricks twice," Ranker warned.

"They lost most their winged knights," Grandmaster Talbot said. "But the golden fae proved unusually resilient."

They'd wiped out three quarters of Nauk's force while simultaneously handling the Watch and a brutal pounding from Masego, he meant. They'd been hard fuckers to deal with.

"They're called the Immortals," I said. "And we found a weakness."

"Their standards," Juniper said. "Getting rid of them will sap their strength."

"If this is to be a victory, that must take priority," Kegan said. "I will not send the Watch into the grinder twice without assurances."

"Hierophant will be busy handling the Queen, but I will be deploying Named to settle the matter," I said.

"The nature of the planned engagement has not been touched upon," General Afolabi said.

"We meant to assault Dormer directly," Juniper said.

Ranker scoffed.

"And give them walls?" she said. "That'll double the butcher's bill."

"Open field won't work for us," I said. "We don't have twenty thousand Winter fae in the woods ready to pop out. If we're to have any chance of beating them, they can't be in a position to bring their full force to bear."

"I've read the accounts of the siege in Arcadia," the Hellhound said. "It stood out to me how ill-equipped they were to deal with Legion siege tactics."

"Summer's not used to being on the defence," I said. "And they've never seen anything like goblin munitions or our engines."

"Both of which we could use from our own fortified position," Afolabi pointed out.

"Fae will be weaker in Creation," Kegan said. "The possibility of a field battle has perhaps been too hastily dismissed."

"Your Deoraithe are not trained to deal with the kind of quick redeployments flight allows the fae," Juniper told her bluntly. "Your soldiers would be a liability."

Duchess Kegan looked down her nose at the orc and smiled mockingly.

"Perhaps a more experience voice could weigh in on the matter, girl," she said.

The temperature in the pavilion cooled and the Deoraithe's eyes turned to me.

"General Juniper has more experience than you," I smiled brightly. "Since being appointed at the head of the Fifteenth, she has won three pitched battles and a siege. What great victories do you have under your belt, Duchess?"

Ranker's vicious satisfaction was palpable.

"Lady Squire speaks true," Afolabi suddenly said. "Summer has demonstrated it has trouble dealing with unorthodox tactics. I would prefer the walls be ours, but penning them in the city would rob them of several advantages."

I was feeling generous, so I'd chalk that up to him deserving his rank rather than the Empress having had a word with him.

"You have something in mind," Ranker said, studying me. "For Dormer. I'm assuming more elaborate than tossing sharpeners at the walls."

I leaned back into my seat.

"Summer has some skill with fire," I said. "But then, so do we."

Gods, I thought, it's never a good sign when goblins grin like that.

More Yoink? At the rate we’re going Thief is going to have so much magical stuffs in her space that she might as well call it mini-Arcadia.

BryceWilliam

Cat.. Cat.. are you SURE its a good idea to be throwing around goblin fire in Arcadia?

Darkening

She’s not talking about Arcadia. The fae are occupying Dormer, a Callowan city, and I think another city too? Though that might have been retaken. Either way, she doesn’t plan to fight the fae in Arcadia again, since that would basically be suicide via fire goddess. On that note: HAhahahahahahahahaha I can’t wait to see how the summer fae react to actually finding themselves vulnerable to burning when they’re used to being fireproof and burning other people. It’s gonna be hilarious.

Matthew

It was already established (I think honestly rather lazily) that the Summer fae can be burned. During the battle in Arcadia, the Legion mages roasted a bunch of them.

Darkening

Pretty sure they were just using the concussive blast from the fireballs to knock them out of the sky rather than burning them. I could be wrong, but I don't think so.

narcoduck

Geographically speaking, where are they now? They're closest to Vale, but they're going to march due east to the river and continue south along it? Seems like a long detour to Dormer.

Luxuria Tenebris

Looking at the map i have to guess that; 1. There are rivers, not on any of the maps they are talking about, or 2. They are closer to the main river, but Vale is the best place to send them, since the other cities are harder to reach for some reason

The legends of the Goblin Fire Knight.

Gunslinger

I wonder if the Empress knew about Cat's promise to the Prince of Nightfall. It seems like a pretty big thing to leave out and would have factored into any negotiation with Winter.

Also any theories as to the Diabolist's eventual location? The most obvious answer would be Dormer, right after the Queen has been dealt with but I doubt it would go that way.

Hakurei06

I'm not sure if she told her, but I wouldn't be surprised if she knows anyway.

vietnamabc

Obviously Cat has disclosed it but the author has not showed here, like we still do not know exactly about the negotiations between Malicia and the Fae.

Nairne

It would be quite fitting with how Cat handles things to have the Summer Queen get bound by the Diabolist just after the fight with Summer finishes.

OldSchoolVillain

That's some (literal) Firepower that Cat really won't want Diabolist to get her hands on. Cat wants Summer to be weakened but still capable of bleeding Winter badly enough to make the Fey a non-issue for the time being and give her the opening to reclaim her heart.

stevenneiman

I'm not sure as to the location, but I have a sinking feeling that whatever Akua does is going to include figuring out some way to hack the Watch. At best Cat will be out one very useful and versatile tool when their power is removed, and at worse they'll fall to Akua's control and wreak havoc when Cat is least expecting it. Or maybe Cat will be expecting it and she'll already have a contingency lined up.

gingerbread_man

The time for another city burning incident has come. It was inevitable really.

There was a murmur of approval from the ranks, though some filthy traitorous elements dissented.

"Fear the goats," someone called out. "The one true motto of the Fifteenth."

I personally like :You're all amateurs

Theo Promes

I'd suggest Firestarters, but cat would probably veto that, claiming she didn't start it at all, thats not how it was.

I'm probably missing something. Why is the Empire trained to deal with these redeployments while Deoraithe is not?

Kingbob12

the Deoraithe fight mostly from the Wall they man, they aren't really a traditional army.

narcoduck

I think the idea is that no one is trained to deal with the Fae on an open field (insert Game of Thrones meme). From what I've seen, the Watch depends on being more mobile than their foes which kind of falls flat against flyers. I read it as telling Kegan not to be overconfident in her army's strength and not try to take the Fae on their chosen battlefield. Instead, the Legions will start a siege battle which is **their** strength.

Euodiachloris

The Empire has used air power before... in civil wars, no less. They know all about flying fortresses of doom. Both visible and invisible.

The Legions probably have a file (or eighteen) on aerial tactics. 🤪 Speaking of; anybody know where Scribe is, just so I can dodge-roll in the right direction away from her? ;P

Engineer

I really wonder why the Goblins didn't get a red letter when they invented Goblin Fire. Oh sure, those lawn loitering Gnomes will rain death and destruction upon you for building a goddamn farming machine, but make a Fire that can burn almost anything and everything in perpetuity and the Gnomes are like "Meh"?

I'm willing to bet an aspect that there is a story there.

Big Brother

Can Aspects be gambled? That'd be a nice interesting twist if that came up in a betting pool.
"Alright, we've got 7 months wages on the Summer Queen biting it, 12 months on Diabolist swooping in at the last moment and claiming the "technical" victory like she did at Maechford, and a, uh... What's this? Who's the jokester betting an 'unclaimed third Aspect?' ROBBER!"

Nemo

There's a story, but it's not a new one. They're doing it because if you want to keep people backwards for some reason, the farming machine is a much bigger deal.

Think about what Black would say. (Though Amadeus of the Green Stretch is probably the more relevant name here.) Him and his notebook with the column on the Empire's arable land by year. Goblin fire lets you win battles more dramatically, and it might change the outcome of a war here or there. Whatever. An agricultural revolution lets you support a larger population with fewer farmers. And then you get to specialize, and you get more occupations that society barely had a few generations ago when people were peasant farmers by default, and you start advancing even faster.

Maybe all EE was thinking of is that in our own history the Industrial Revolution started with farming machines. Maybe the Gnomes only flattened it because it was a warning sign that more was coming. But I'd rather think it's important in its own right, because nothing I'm saying would have escaped the characters.

darkening

Black's explanation was basically that alchemy falls under magic and the gnomes are only concerned with Science. Beyond that I dunno.

Akim

So, Ratface, what's the current pool on Akua turning up in Dormer?

darkening

I'm guessing nobody's enough of a sucker to bet against that. Just on what she'll do there and when.

Isa Lumitus

Somehow, I have this image of Diabolist using Cat's love of goblin fire against her. Mostly by trying to convince the Matrons that Cat is seeking the formula so that she can produce it herself in whatever quantities she needs.

Chapter 39: Exposition

"It's hard for people to understand what it means to have been part of the Fifteenth. We were farmboys and thieves, not people that were ever supposed to matter. Fodder for noose and ledger. But then she came along, and told us we were to be the doom of gods. Heavens forgive me, but I believed her then and believe her still."

– Extract from the 'Forlorn Memoirs', author unknown

The banners flew tall in morning wind, carried by the Gallowborne. Two banners now, for I had not forgotten my promise to Talbot. A silver fifteen in Miezan numerals set on black was the herald of my legion, the standard under which it would fight until we were all ground to dust by time or steel. I kept to the colours, but by emblem was different. Silver scales shivered over us, measuring a crown and a sword. The sword weighed heavier, as much on cloth as it did in Creation. House Foundling's words were sewed under them, the one debt I owed Akua Sahelian I would never be able to repay. Justifications matter only to the just. Grim words, perhaps, but none had rung more true since I'd taken the knife and the offer behind it. Juniper had not commented on them after an initial guarded glance. The two of us marched with the vanguard, though when we came in sight of Dormer she would retreat to her command post to rule over the battlefield. The Hellhound killed with her mind, not her hands. She was more terrible an opponent for it.

Ahead of us lay plains that had once been green, before Summer came to own them. Now half the land was scorched black and the rest lusher than was possible in Creation. Orchards bore fruits regardless of the season, fields already harvested grew again tall and golden wheat. There would be food shortages, in the coming months. My homeland had seen war twice in three years, this one even more devastating than the last. Even if the blackened earth was made cultivable again, how many of those fields would lack men to till them? Summer had killed many, harmed more and I knew Akua would bring deeper wounds still. She was of the old breed, the one whose madness was worthy of some awe if only for the scale of its folly. Walking the aftermath of Three Hills I'd gotten a glimpse of what that felt like. Seen fate written in mud and blood and eerie green flame, and though doom had lurked in that vision when I'd thought of embracing it I had felt so gloriously alive.

I'd fought battles since then. Desperate ones, and the pull of that first moment had long faded. It would have been a lie to say I did not still relish in victory, in breaking whatever lay in path, but I had been tempered by so many dances on the blade's edge. It was one thing to gamble the lives of strangers for your purposes, to risk it all on a roll of the dice, but I'd come to dread it. I'd won more often than not, so far, but how long could

I keep that up? My mistake had been coming to love them. It was also my last saving grace. How easy it would have been to become like Black, utterly divorcing affection and necessity, if I'd not found a family in my companions. My teacher had done great things, by embracing that cold unfeeling clarity. But atrocious ones as well, and I would not follow him down that road. The more my Name and the mantle I had stolen from Winter set me apart from humanity, the more I understood I had to grasp tightly onto it. The thing I'd become otherwise would care nothing for what I wanted to build.

"We've come a long way from the College, haven't we?" I said.

For once, Juniper did not chide me for being foolishly sentimental. The Hellhound had been my opponent once, I thought, if never quite my enemy. It felt like a colourless dream now. I'd grown to rely so much on her that I'd feel lost if she was gone.

"Didn't think much of you, back then," she grunted. "Too mouthy. Not as clever as you believed you were."

"I never did manage to get the drop on you, after the once," I chuckled.

It was a strange thing, recognizing that someone was cleverer than you. And Juniper was, I would not deny it. It wasn't so clear-cut a thing as most people pretended when posturing, of course. Cleverness was no perfect shield. The smartest woman in the world could be outmanoeuvred by a fool, under the right circumstances. Or by luck, or by a myriad other factors that no one ever really liked to talk about. But the fact remained that Juniper saw things I didn't, when it came to strategy. Pondered a few steps deeper, arranged her thoughts more clearly. Diabolist did the same, when it came to plotting, and it had little to do with her Name. There was always someone better. I'd felt slighted by that when I was younger, as if just by being me I had to be the best at everything I undertook. Nowadays I just felt relieved, that I had someone at my side who could steer us away from the mistakes I would have made. Was there anything more worthless than pride, if the cost of it was the death of those precious to you?

"You always get strange before battles," Juniper sighed. "After too, sometimes. Like you're far away."

That was pretty funny, coming from a woman who was in the custom of finding high ground to sleep on whenever a fight was finished. And that was without mentioning how she'd apparently napped through the latter part of the Battle of Marchford.

"You're odder than me," I said. "Calm as you are. Nauk can't stop grinning for half a day before a battle."

"Hakram doesn't," she said.

"Hakram's different," I replied.

She grunted, conceding the point.

"Used to think he was a coldblood," Juniper admitted. "Everything was surface deep with him. Nothing real under."

Coldblood. A disease of the mind, I'd been taught. People who felt less, didn't get remorse or really understand consequences. Adjutant had told me some things in the dark that let me see why she'd thought him one. What she'd taken for absence was just apathy.

"I take after my father more," the orc said.

I looked at her, surprise. She rarely talked about her family, and what little she did was only about her mother.

"He's the one who raised you, right?" I said.

"Until the College," she said. "He's always been... calm."

"So he lost the rite of raising," I said.

The orc looked amused.

"Read that in a Soninke book, did you?" she said.

"Taghreb, I think," I shrugged. "I had a lot of books plopped onto my lap before meeting you, the titles kind of meld together nowadays."

"The custom exists," she said. "But only Praesi think it's common. If a couple needs to fight to choose who'll raise the child, they shouldn't be having children. It's a sign of immaturity."

"Well, I learned something today," I mused.

She bared the faintest hint of her fangs in what I knew to mean amusement. Or flirtation. Probably the former, all things considered.

"I have it too," she said suddenly. "My mother's blood. The battle-joy."

I studied her in silence.

"I was born for this," she said. "Of this. It's what I am and I can't remember ever craving anything else."

It was always hard to tell with orcs, but I thought she looked uncomfortable. Almost ashamed. No fangs visible, hairless brows pressing together.

"We're supposed to want glory for the clan," she said. "To make our own grow stronger. But all I saw were fucking huts and cattle and I couldn't wait to leave. I almost ran away, when I was younger. There's only so many times you can sketch out formations in the dirt before you feel choked."

I knew that feeling. I had followed me in Laure, when I was waiting tables and picking up bruises in the Pit when I should have been in the Wasteland, learning at the College. Like I was just wasting away my days. That I should have been out there doing something, anything but just sifting through the muck to earn enough coin to really begin my life.

"I hate the orphanage, at the end," I quietly said. "It wasn't that they were out to get me, it was just..."

"In the way," Juniper finished. "Quicksand you'd get stuck in if you waited too long."

She laughed hoarsely.

"I used to fight battles in my head when herding aurochs," the orc said, almost sounding like she was mocking herself. "All the victories of the Conquest, how I could have won them better."

"I kept a tally of who I'd kill when I had the authority," I admitted. "Mazus was always top of the list. But then he hanged, and it had little to do with me."

Juniper hesitated.

"What Lord Black was to you," she said. "You were to me."

My face flickered in surprise.

"Not a mentor," she growled, but the irritation petered out. "The offered hand, I mean. If I hadn't become your legate I'd be a junior officer in someone else's legion right now. I never thanked you for that."

"Don't," I said. "I wouldn't have gotten this far without you, Juniper. Stings to admit it, but it's true."

"Wouldn't be the same without you either," she said. "It's not about the rank, Catherine. The rank is just what gets me there. I want..."

There was something burning in my general then that I'd never seen in her before. I'd seen her cold and amused and furious and irritated more times than I could count. I'd even seen her tender, though only with Aisha.

"More," she said, sounding angry at the inadequacy of the word. "Three Hills, Marchford even Arcadia. No one's fought like that before. We get to make that. They'll study our battles, centuries from now. Some other girl stuck herding godsdamned aurochs will think about our mistakes, how she could have outsmarted our opponents."

"Making history," I mused.

She laughed.

"Fuck history," she said. "We're changing the face of war. And it's just beginning, Catherine. The storm ahead will make this all look like drizzle."

Ahead was Dormer, the full might of Summer and the Queen that ruled it. But she thought beyond that, and so did I. The Diabolist had carved doom out of stone and sorcery, and she would not quietly into the night. And on the horizon, Procer sharpened its blades. In a year or ten, the Principate would come calling and with the greatest army on the face of Calernia. There would be heroes in that host, and not like the ones I'd killed. The real legends, the heroes weren't bound to small stories like mine. The Calamities were the greatest monsters of the age, but they'd lived so long because they kept their wars small and their enemies distracted. One day the great Named of the other side would come forward and the old wars would be born again. Those that warped the lands, flattened mountains and burned cities. I'd have to be ready for them, for the people who wanted to make my home the battlefield of the continent again. If I could not have peace in truth, then I would settle for the peace of the grave.

It was the kind of victory I'd been trained for.

"I don't think," I said quietly, "that we'll be remembered fondly. Not you, and certainly not me."

"Ah," Juniper of the Red Shields smiled. "But they will remember us."

Silence reigned for a long moment after that, more comfortable than I would have thought. The Hellhound wasn't someone who felt the need to fill the air with words when she had nothing to say. Something I'd grown to appreciate, since Archer had joined by band. The quiet was how I came to hear it even though the wind blew the other way and we were ahead of the thick of the host. The Fifteenth and its allies trailed at our back like a great snake of glittering steel, and it was from my legionaries that the song came. Lightly, at first, the words indistinct even to my Name-sharpened ears. But after the first time it was sung, thousands more voices joined in. Even the vanguard around us.

"I was born out in the green where their banners flew high
And the boots of the great lords they did tread over us
Oaths we made and service gave, kneeling to the oldest lie
But now the world's turned around and we sing this chorus."

Orcs and goblins. Soninke and Taghreb. But, most of all, Callowans. The muster of my homeland sang, light and bright but there was such anger underneath. It scared me. My veins sang with it, but it scared me.

"Come forth you old devils,
Bring out your lesser evils
Blight the skies and the land
You'll be met sword in hand

One day your children'll tell
Of the deep and rebel yell,
That on his field so sombre
Conquered host of horror."

Juniper looked up at the sun. The red-painted steel had warmed over the march, though like most orcs she did not sweat easily.

"I wondered if they'd sing it," she said.

"You knew about this?" I said quietly.

"Aye," she said. "Nauk penned part. Named it too. In Dread Crowned."

Gods, what had I unleashed? I'd thought I understood. That I had crafted an escapement for what would have made Callow claw at itself, a release that would let it change and escape the curse that defined it. But it wasn't just Callowans that sang. Greenskins and Praesi joined their voices to the chorus, and though their anger was of a different make it was no less harsh for it. There was a story the House of Light liked to use in sermons. That on the day of the First Dawn, the Gods Below had created all the evil in the world and released it. The Gods Above had caught it all in the box without a lock, and Creation would have been as the Heavens had the first of men not opened it, seduced by the whispers of devils promising godhood lay within. That was why the brothers and sisters taught rules, the priests said. So that on the last of days, when Good triumphed, the evils would be forced into the box again. Again it would be without a lock, but mankind would have learned. They would not open it again.

I'd carved a crack into the box and now the insides were spilling out. It hadn't been evils, inside. It had been anger. Bitter old anger that had not before been given a banner to rally under. It had one, now. It flew behind me, scales that weighed crown and sword and found the crown wanting. There was a promise there I had not meant, but was written for all to see.

"On the plain where folk were fair we stood and greatly slew,
And by the ford a score devils with a great demon too
Prince and page and swordsman proud to our steel they all fell
The world stolen we take back and damn you all to Hell

The chorus came again. My blood ran cold, and pressed against my ear the Beast laughed. It was awake, alive and savouring every moment of this with malevolent glee. Blood, it whispered. There will be blood over this. The Fifteenth Legion sang, and declared war on the mighty of the world. My general was looking at me.

"You promised a revolution, Warlord," Juniper said.

She bared her teeth, perfect ivory fangs.

"We will not settle for anything less."

She laughed, harsh but joyous.

"Did I not tell you?" she said. "They will remember us."

It spread. To the legionaries of the Twelfth and the Fourth, men and women not bound to me. To the Deoraithe, though not as many. I had gathered forty thousand soldiers to my banner, and they sang of treason to the morning sky. I could hear refrains in it, slivers of people I knew. Robber's sharp, vicious smile as he whispered they kill us for sport. The fever in Ratface's eyes as he said they'll never stop unless we make them. Pickler's warning, echoed in every chorus. It'll be to the death, Foundling. Do not begin this lightly. I'd spoken the words. Those had consequences, for Named more than any other. If you employ violence, the Empress had told me, in violence they will follow. I had not made peace. I had traded one war for another, and this one would be a thousand times bloodier than the last. I would be woe unto all I beheld, the Queen of Summer had so sadly told me. There had been a weight to the name when it was granted to me and finally I was feeling it in full. I'd thought I owned this, because I'd been the one to speak the words. That I could control it. Oh but the arrogance of that. You couldn't break open a dam and order the river.

I had taught them this. And Gods, they had learned. One decision after another, spitting in the eye of gods and compromise both, and I had promised them that if we paid the butcher's bill we could change the world. I'd told Archer that there was something happening in the Empire beyond any of us. That they were not in control. Neither, I understood then, was I.

"Be they high or resplendent our oaths stand taller still
And in the west do quiet lie graves we have yet to fill
Learn ye mighty that from Tower's shade to vales of red
The Fifteenth by call of horn stands ever crowned in dread."

The song carried us all the way to Dormer. Behind broken walls Summer awaited us, a riot of silk and steel not of Creation. We had made good time, as it was not long past Noon Bell. We had until dawn before a god in the flesh came to destroy us.

It was no longer, I thought, the worst of my problems.

1shot4living

Took me a moment to find the rhythm, but when I got the song going in my head... Damn

Thenre

I could never find the rhythm. Still bone chilling.

Amelia

It's come out you Black and Tans, I'm almost certain

Tetra

Damn, that's what I was singing it to in my head, then I reach the end and see your comment. Interesting how we both thought that

Dainpdf

I used mostly the rhythm of Panzerkampf, by Sabaton. It works very well for the longer lines.

ArkhCthuul

Yeah, that chapter alternating gave me the chills and the feels.

Wow....

Hoactzin

I half expected Cat to get a new name at the end of this chapter.

OldSchoolVillain

I think she will after all. This isn't the first time she's been called Warlord, and now she has forty thousand soldiers from all the races of the empire raising her as exactly that.

Gunslinger

The author was pretty explicit that Warlord was solely an Orcish Name. She might be called Warlord but it lacks the cultural weight that the name needs.

nipi

Nah! I think she'll get something more ominous. She does have slaying gods on her to do list.

James, Mostly Harmless

Nipi, Godslayer has a certain ring to it! If not as Cat's Name, then as the Fifteenth's name for they are slayers of devils and gods.

Zach

good god I'm happy the author doesn't take the advice of their comments section

greatwyrmgold

It's a neat name for the Legion, though. A bit on-the-nose, but at this rate it won't be inaccurate much longer.

Dainpdf

Warlord is an orc Name though. I don't think she can. Looking at her situation, I'd think she'd become Revolutionnaire or something of the sort.

Duckie

Yeah considering the author made it clear that Warlord was an orc name. I imagine she wouldn't get that. I would have to agree it would have to be something along the lines of rebellious naming. Catherine the Usurper has a nice ring to it.. While it is true its not her goal to take over anyone's throne. Her name has shown the ability to out right steal/ copy someones power which in a way is usurping their authority as a named. Sense their powers are supposed to be unique to just them. While she now also leads an army of people who are actively singing songs of rebellion. But who knows what it really will be i'm pretty excited to find out. Hopefully we won't have to wait long.

nipi

I dont think Malicia would be comfortable with the name Usurper. Governor has already been banned.

Barthumphries

"The author was pretty explicit that Warlord was solely an Orcish Name. She might be called Warlord but it lacks the cultural weight that the name needs."

How many orcs does she have following her at this point? She is the heir to Black, who is heralded as the Savior of the orcs. And she's continued his reforms. In this chapter, we specifically heard orcish voices blending in with all the other voices.

Warlord Catherine the Necromancer, Queen of Marchford, Duchess of Moonlit Nights, Empress of the Tower.

She's going to need more training to get that necromancer bit, but it's her evil heritage and she's going to need more power some day.

Wombat

This just gave me the shivers

TheCount

I was born out in the green where their banners flew high
And the boots of the great lords they did tread over us
Oaths we made and service gave, kneeling to the oldest lie
But now the world's turned around and we sing this chorus."

Come forth you old devils,
Bring out your lesser evils
Blight the skies and the land
You'll be met sword in hand

One day your children'll tell
Of the deep and rebel yell,
That on his field so sombre
Conquered host of horror.

On the plain where folk were fair we stood and greatly slew,
And by the ford a score devils with a great demon too
Prince and page and swordsman proud to our steel they all fell
The world stolen we take back and damn you all to Hell

Be they high or resplendent our oaths stand taller still
And in the west do quiet lie graves we have yet to fill side note, who wants to bet that the rhythm of the song Cat heard is the same as this one?

cause i'll take *that* bet

James, Mostly Harmless

This should be accompanied by "I am the Common Man" by The Worms of the Earth" (listen here <https://youtu.be/QRARHJE9Las>, but originally by Clam Chowder who did a much better version).

Dainpdf

I accompanied it in my head with instrumentals by Sabaton XP

Nguyen Hong Hai

You need worthy opponents. So we are entering the end of Book 3?
I think Book 4 will be about Procer.

Oshi

Book 4 will be Cat claiming her new name and defeating the White Knight. Book 5 will be Procer.

ayon96

There will only be four books

erraticerrata

There will be five. Not sure where you got this idea.

Lhomp

I think this book will end in a three way battle between Summer, Diabolist and Catherine's forces, Black will die and it will be the trigger for a Proceran crusade.

Dainpdf

I don't think Akua will come out so early. She might, but it just feels like she's a longer term opponent.

You know somehow I think Akua will lose her body and her dad but the soul shall remain. She has that horcrux thing going on.

Can we get a bonus chapter Friday???? Pls

benthelynx

Another excellent chapter.

Also I think you meant she in this sentence:

““What Lord Black was to you,” he said. “You were to me.””

Taelel

I keep seeing The Beast being mentioned but i have no clue where it came from 😊 i mean Cat's Beast not Captain's

Imagination

It's her anthropomorphising her Name.

Imagination

Nope, personifying her Name.

I always get those two mixed up.

nipi

Hmm... Now that I think about it the Champion might be bad news for Cat aswell.

George

Nah, only if she gives full control over to the monster, like Captain did at the end there.

OldSchoolVillain

Unlikely. Aside from the fact that 'creation disdains such reputation,' Captain's Beast was unleashed, not chained or channeled. They were one, but at the same time, very different. Cat's Beast is shackled to her, leashed in an entirely different way. She may let it out occasionally, but ultimately she doesn't let go the way Captain ever did. If the Champion even survives Black (I doubt it), then she and the Bard will be in for a nasty surprise should they try the same story to take down THIS monster.

kinigget

Cat's only goal this entire time has to been to keep Callow above water

She's con promise most of her principals, turned against the light, and unleashed a civil war

Through all of it she tried to claim that she was different. That while she served the Tower she was still somehow *better*

Meanwhile, while she wasn't paying attention, she managed to gain the utter loyalty of the 15th, and influence far more

Largely without meaning to, she gave a new generation something to rally around, a cause to fight for

And only now does she begin to understand what she has wrought

The world is changing

The Calamities brought change, but even they could only go so far

Cat will see it done

nipi

Well calamities are events. They happen and then people pick up the pieces. But woes? Woes might not be as flashy but they do persist.

*Grins evilly.*

Dainpdf

I don't think she has their loyalty so much as the symbols she created do. That's why she says she has no control. She can steer the cart a bit, but there are no breaks.

Author Unknown

Every time there is a new chapter, I am blown away by the writing. Wow, just wow.

James, Mostly Harmless

Bard made many mistakes in Villainous Interlude: Calamity III (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/10/04/villainous-interlude-calamity-iii/>), but this chapter illustrates her worst mistake: assuming that Black is her enemy. Black, as terrible and powerful as he is, is merely a herald to one who will shake and reshape worlds. John the Baptist if you will, or Sauron in his role as Herald to Morgoth.

Dainpdf

John the Baptist as in Cat's followers will co-opt Black's movement after he is dead, or Sauron to Melkor as in she corrupted him and he will survive her?

In all honesty, she is more the Sauron to his Melkor than the other way around.

nimelennar

Damn. Between Cat's Fifteenth, and the changes made by Malicia...

I think they were right, back when Cat let the Swordsman go, that this is a redemption story. Not of Cat herself, being redeemed from a villain to a hero, but of an entire Empire, being redeemed from Dread to Heroic.

Nguyen Hong Hai

So my dear Bard, is this lore good enough for the annals?

Gran

I have to admit I'm rather disappointed with Cats characterisation these past few chapters. And for what I hope is good reason.

It's like you decided that Cat was getting too Dark and so she had to have /so,e/ kind of standards, just because everyone needs them. And then decided to do it in the worst possible way. With judgemental preachiness and glorifying the ever sought after inner "humanity". I have to admit I absolutely hate that trope. The glorification and obsession with being "human" (but only a certain type of course) and all that comes with it in these stories. It's a very very overdone trope at this point. And one that I can't help think Authors fall back on when they feel they've pushed themselves into a corner with their characterisation and so need an easy out to make their characters "better" without actually doing any of the work of characterisation and how that should change based on the plot and the person, and instead just throwing a basic idea of "humanity" into the person so that they can change in whatever way you like. After all the very idea is absurd, I'm not surprised however that even in a fantasy world and a world of might and magic and Names so different from ours it comes out in the generic fantasy way of being "better" and being "good" even though it's not out that way. What a disappointment.

I get that Cat will likely continue to grow and do more and more but at this point she's feeling more memetic than anything. "Cat can do anything because she's Cat!". "Cat will change the entire world in her image because she's Cat!". "When the story ends Cat will rule over the ashes and everything will be amazing because Cat will put all the things in the world we've been taught to see as wrong right!".

I hate to say this because I actually really liked her character up to this point but I'm really beginning to hope she actually loses something soon. She just keeps seeming to pull wins out of her ass. Everything that seems like a loss is just a small set back for an even bigger win later on. No matter what happens Cat will win in the end is how this Story just seems to go and it seems rather obvious that at this rate even the characters acknowledge it. A lot of the sense of overall suspense has left the story. Sure in battle people may get a bit worked up but we're all sure Cat will pull something out of her ass at the exact moment she needs it to win and it's beginning to take a lot of the actual punch out of the story...

reveen

I'd be content with Cat winning all of her battles, but having to watch war grind away her friends, allies, her country and everything she loves and ultimately having to face the fact that her ambitions are a fire that will ultimately consume everything she cares about.

But we keep getting excerpts from books in the future written by people who we shouldn't be sure if they'll live or not talking about how still totally awesome she is in hindsight.

Dainpdf

It's the nature of villainy, isn't it? That you keep winning... Until you don't. Take black for example.

I do agree that setbacks are necessary... Losing Killian was something. Also hints at more principles than just "I want to stay human!"

Metrux

I see you have A LOT of misconceptions, but unfortunately I'm neither a native english speaker, nor a man of letters. So, to put it bluntly: There is a reason there exists common tropes. It's because they work. And this, this here? Even though it IS Cat's story, it is so much more about the tropes itself. We follow her story, to better get to see the world of these books, and the way it unfolds. Is it a common trope to refer to humanity? Yes, absolutely. But it isn't wring here, and neither is it "better" or "good". This humanity is what separates her from the mechanical thoughts of her teacher, and from the unnatural way of the fae, and she was approaching both of them. She was human before, and, technically, still is, so clinging to parts of who she was before all that, is clinging to her humanity, not in a general sense, but in her very own brand of humanity, that she has ALWAYS had. She isn't "backing out of going too far", she's taking who she is in her own two hands. So, my little rant over, just to make it clear another point: No matter what you think, you CAN'T change the story, it is the author's right to make as he sees fit, you liking or not, but we CAN influence him, and this kind of rant just makes people sad, doubt themselves or full of anger. So please, stop trying to change things your way, enjoy the ride, if you can, and let erraticerrata give us this story, the way he saw it since the beginning.

Letouriste

I totally agree with you:) what erratic has already written should be enough for people to trust him about not destroying the interest in his novel.

Dana

See, I've just reconciled myself to the fact that Cat is the final villain of this story and we're getting it from her perspective. I have no sympathy for Cat at all & I root for her ultimate hero opponents (primarily Cordelia, but also White Knight). I relish any of Cat's losses but accept that at this stage of the story, they're few and far between. Adversity is for heroes – right up until the ending.

nasiba

Cat is the "hero" of this story so if you continued to read it, you are going to be disappointed. I find those few who read this series and insist they are rooting for "the heroes" to be just... weird. This isn't a story about Heroes, I mean, it's called the Practical Guide to Evil (doing wrong right). It's safe to assume that such a story is going to throw doubt on the very black and white absolutes that you cling to and question that very duality. Which it has done, repeatedly, so I can only imagine you are willfully ignoring it hoping that somehow the author is going to undo everything he has written so far and have the "Heroes punish the Villains". That isn't happening.

Barthumphries

I'm not the person you're responding to but Car herself has suggested that she might be the final villain and other villains have also suggested that.

Saktiwijayarahman

Fifteenth is so badass right now that if they got any cognomen less than Victrix or Rapax later, I'll be quite mad.

Can't wait for the next chapter!

Nguyen Hong Hai

15th Legion – The Godslayers

Nairne .01

That was very nice. I want more.

reveen

Took her long enough to figure it out. All Cat has accomplished in the end is helping set up the next big war, and possibly the one Callow or the world will never recover from, and neither she nor the Fifteenth are prepared for it. They've fought a whole bunch of minor wars and big flashy battles, but they haven't really experienced Capital W War. The kind that people don't go around shitting and giggling about how awesome it was afterwards.

Dainpdf

Well unless the really big players like the Gnomes, Dwarves, Elves, that sea empire etc get involved, it's still a minor skirmish on the global scale, no?

reveen

It's not about the scale of the war, but how long it lasts. All Cat's victories were in short flash in the pan slapfights where she wins when she kills all the other guys, she hasn't really experienced a prolonged large scale conflict. There's no fancy trick or tactic she can pull out of her ass that can deal with the realities of hunger, disease, refugees, attrition, and psychological trauma. She'll have to deal with the fact that sometimes just winning battle after battle isn't enough to win a war in the long term.

It may seem that she's some big badass Great Commander, but in comparison to what the world has in store for her she's still playing war games.

Letouriste

Sure you are right about that...but so what? She will struggle^^ and she will go even more in the deep end.i'm really curious about where this story will go and how

chris S

Is this a modified version of "Come out you Black and Tans"?

Letouriste

Yes,erratic said that in a up comment

I have been thinking on Cat's reaction to first hearing "In Dread Crowned." Martin Luther must have had a similar reaction as the Reformation grew ...

Fits pretty well when singing it to the tune of Come out Ye Black and Tans.

Unmaker

The Named in Procer have always been about defiance – of Good, of other Named, of the ruler of the moment, of fate (e.g. Tyrant), of the natural order, of each other, etc. You name it, they have defied powerful forces. The Calamities have shown you could defy powers by being smart, not just by being powerful, but they are still the elite defying the elite.

Now Cat has taught and brought that same attitude down to the common man. She has taught them they can defy, too. Every ruler, noble, and Named on the damned continent should be getting cold sweats from this.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Yeah weird with Black and Mally since they used to be dirt-poor but all their friends are in high places and they don't really connect with their old towns than the whole Praesi.

You know those pictures that look like a bunch of random dots until you look at it through a red filter, and then you can see it's a picture of a dolphin or something? This chapter is the random dots, and the title is the filter that shows you how you're supposed to look at it. I can't think of many authors who would even attempt something like this, let alone succeed so completely at it. That book Tom Robbins wrote entirely in 2nd person comes to mind (you're a middle age overweight hispanic woman, IIRC).

This chapter also reminds me of All The Pretty Horses for some reason (the book, not the movie). I haven't untangled why yet, but I'm pretty sure my subconscious does have a reason. It's late, maybe I'll know in the morning.

I'll come back later to read everybody else's comments, I wonder how much of the discussion is about how much of a fucking masterpiece this shit is xD

greatwyrmgold

I keep thinking that Juniper seems like the best candidate for a third Named in the Fifteenth. I think I've even figured out a name that could fit; she's too divorced from the orcish tradition of war to be a new Warlord, never mind that the culture that birthed the name is a thousand years dead. But she's close enough for a War- name (other than Warlock) to fit. And given that Juniper's whole existence focuses on mastery over tactics, strategy, and logistics, I'd say Warlord would fit her like a glove. Better than any other Name I've thought of, for sure. (And like Adjutant, it implies a position running the army rather than as a warrior.)

Chapter 40: Rising Action

"When approaching a siege, a general must draw distinction between tactical and strategic importance. The costs of a victory on the tactical theatre of a campaign may yield defeat on the strategic one."

– "Considerations on Warfare", by Marshal Grem One-Eye

Most towns and cities in the south were lightly fortified, but Dormer was an exception. While it was true that since House Alban had united Callow there'd been relatively little war in the south, the barony had roots than ran much further back than that. In the days when the Kingdom of Liesse had held sway over the south, clashing with a stubbornly independent Marchford and the encroaching Kingdom of Laure, Dormer had been made vassal to the rulers of the south by force of arms. That submission had never sat quite right with the rulers of the city, and they'd rebelled against the kings of Liesse several times. It all went back to the Wasaliti river and the island it flowed down to: Mercantis. The barons of Dormer had old ties to the City of Bought and Sold, and grown wealthy as the middlemen between it and the rest of Callow. Wealthy enough to afford tall walls, and later a fortress to overlook their demesne. There'd been little need to keep improving these after the unification of Callow, though, and revenue had been hurt by the tariffs set from Laure that had the coin going into the pockets of House Alban instead.

The city had grown beyond the ancient walls, with most of it now outside the grey stone and the fortress behind it. It was not a particularly large city, truth be told. At its peak after the Conquest there'd been perhaps fifteen thousand souls living there. Now there were more than twice that number of fae holding it, and no trace of the Callowans that should be there. A disquieting thing, that, but also a relief of sorts. If some of my countrymen had remained inside, I would have hesitated to use some of the more brutal tactics in my arsenal. Considering the opposition, that might have been costly. I'd beaten Summer once before, in Arcadia, but I'd done so relying on tricks and a story. I wouldn't have the benefit of either here, and that meant having to crush them the old fashioned way. I did, however, have some advantages on my side. The first was that this was a siege.

I'd grown up thinking of the Legions of Terror as a field army, but that was a somewhat false perception. It was true the Legions were most remembered for the Fields of Streges, when they'd near wiped out the armies of the kingdom, but most the battles in the Conquest had been sieges. The Blessed Isle, Summerholm and Laure. The campaign against Daoine in the north had not been so clear-cut, but it had involved taking the Wall. To understand the Legions as an institution, I'd come to realize, I had to keep in mind what Black had crafted them for: conquering Callow. Warfare in the kingdom had been deeply influenced by the nature of constant invasions, most of them Praesi. The cities of the west and the north were hard fortresses meant to resist Praes until House Fairfax could send an army to turn back the Legions, and so Callowans had grown adept at making fortresses. Our mages had learned protective magics and wards, passed down sorceries meant to banish devils and disrupt great rituals. Our armies fielded more heavy cavalry than any other on Calernia and around the professional core that had been the Royal Guard, massed volunteers had formed the bread and butter of Callow's hosts. All of it evolved to beat the large mage and villain-led hordes that used to be the staple of Praesi armies.

When the Conquest had begun, what House Fairfax faced was an entirely different beast. Orcs no longer used as meatshields for better-trained humans but armed in good steel and taught to stand in ranks. Goblins, once little more than expendables sent to die against walls or let loose on the countryside, instead turned into crossbowmen and sappers. Mages no longer standing at the back to unleash rituals but massed in the ranks to replace a few dangerous tricks by continuous deployable firepower. Summerholm, the famous Gate of the East, had fallen not to devils and flying fortresses but trebuchets and ballistas backed by full encirclement. The Legions of Terror had been built to take some of the most heavily-fortified cities on the face of the continent, and while the tight formations they used on the field were less effective in city streets, those narrow passages where were munitions and mage lines shone.

The second was that I was dealing with an enemy who knew little of this breed of warfare. The winner of the war between Summer and Winter was decided either behind closed doors or on a battlefield, not by borders and walls. The forces of the Count of Olden Oak had taught me a hard lesson when I'd taken the Gallowborne scouting in the grass, but when we'd assaulted his fortress his army had crumpled under the pressure. Summer was not meant to be on the defensive, and what I'd come to consider the greatest weakness of the fae was that they were not adaptable the way a mortal host would be. They would have learned from our clashes in Arcadia, of course. They weren't that crippled by their nature. But when faced with an unknown, something unprecedented, they tended to revert back to pattern. That made them predictable, to an extent, and the handful of monstrous tacticians I had on my side could make a lot out of the enemy being predictable.

I knew better than to think I knew all the cards the other side had to play. Even putting aside the fact that the Queen of Summer was on her way and she'd be a whole mess of her own, I'd glimpsed powers in the dream that had followed my becoming Duchess of Moonless Nights that I'd yet to see them deploy. They were out of princes and princesses to lead them, but there was at least one Duke left and they were not entities to take lightly. Summer, by now, would be desperate to take back the Princess of High Noon. They wouldn't be pulling any punches, and even though crossing into Creation would have weakened them this time I didn't have Winter to use as fodder on my flank. It'd be my armies that took the brunt of the losses, and like the Summer Queen I couldn't afford to take too many of those. Not when Diabolist was still on the loose, growing more dangerous by the day. On the other hand, I also couldn't afford to be overly cautious. If the fae in Dormer weren't in deep trouble by the time their Queen popped out, she wouldn't even consider treating with me. Which I really, really needed her to do. Actually taking her out was beyond my capacity. The best Hierophant could do was delay, and when that failed it would swiftly begin going downhill for us.

It was Marshal Ranker that opened the dance.

After the first few fae patrols were repulsed by sheer numbers, Summer had retreated to the city. No sign of the Immortals yet, which we'd taken to mean they would be behind the walls. Thief and Archer were already gone to deal with that. Out in the streets and houses we'd could only see Summer regulars, and those were the first obstacle moving forward. Hard to gauge numbers on grounds like those, but there should be at least thirty thousand. Using the buildings as cover, they would turn Dormer into a butcher's yard if we advanced. So we take away the cover. The trebuchets let loose and the ballistas with them, ripping through the centre of the outskirts. Houses collapsed, a handful of fae crushed, and the sappers began their work. The ballistas were faster by a fair margin, but it was the trebuchets that did the heavy lifting. Stone after stone, they began reducing the outer city to rubble.

"And now we see if they take the bait," Hakram gravelled.

I hummed but did not reply. The Gallowborne had given the two of us wide berth, save for Tribune Farrier. He carried my banner, though he'd pass it when we entered the fray. Juniper had predicted that after we began smashing the outer city the fae would try to grab back the initiative by breaking our siege engines. For the average Legion of Terror, that would have been a problem. We were lighter on archers than most Calernian armies, since mage lines effectively served the same function. Wouldn't be the case for us, though. We had something the Empire had never fielded before: the army of Daoine. Flatly inferior to legionaries when it came to heavy infantry, save for the Watch, but when it came to archers? They'd used longbows to defend the Wall for centuries, and fae were nothing new to them. It might be greenskins that had tried their borders most of the time, but Praesi had made attempts too. There wasn't as much difference between winged devils and fae as the latter would like to think.

"And there they go," I muttered.

Ten thousand wings lit up and the Fair Folk rose into the sky. The height of the flight would be the most pressing issue, here. It wasn't like the Deoraithe could shoot halfway to the moon, while fae could just pour arrows downwards while staying out of range. That was our first trap. Hierophant wouldn't be taking the field for most of this battle because I needed him to control the three wards he'd prepared, and I watched the soldiers of Summer as they flew straight into the first of those. They didn't have time to ever fire a volley before a buzz so loud it was half a thunderclap filled the air. Their wings winked out for two heartbeats, then the buzz sounded again and they reappeared. Only a handful fell, making it to the ground before being filled with arrows. An oscillation ward, Masego had called it. He'd essentially made a massive rectangle in the sky where ever two heartbeats the flow of sorcery would be disrupted. I'd asked him if he could just shut them down, but apparently that would have been too much of a drain to maintain. Even with the new Name he still had limits.

What it accomplished was make it exceedingly hard for the fae to just hover over the engines and leisurely set them on fire. If they wanted to make a dent, they'd have to descend into arrow range. Our little surprise spread chaos in their ranks. Half kept trying and failed repeatedly while the rest went down out of the ward's area and began to trade fire with the Deoraithe. They had the better of it, to my distaste. Kegan's soldiers were spread out, tight ranks would have been a written invitation to be hit with the fire arrows, but a loose formation was far from the equivalent of flying in the godsdamned sky. As soon as the situation steadied below, the fae who'd been struggling with the ward joined the others and I watched as five knots formed led by fae nobles. By the feel of them, nothing higher than a baron.

"That," I said, "is going to be trouble. Ritual?"

"Close enough," Hakram grunted. "No more than twenty in each formation. We'll hold."

We'd better. The battle was going to get a lot harder if we lost those trebuchets. All five knots formed large spears of flame easily the size of ten men in a line, and after a heartbeat they shot down at our five trebuchets. My fingers clenched as the projectiles fell, crackling loudly until they hit thin air. The shape of blue domes covering our engines shone as the fae sorcery tried to tear through, and though they shivered in the end they held. Close. Much too close for comfort. The entirety of the Fourth's mage contingent was feeding those shields and the fae had almost broken through anyway.

"If they keep pounding away at us with those I'm not sure we'll hold," I murmured.

"Hope Marshal Ranker read them correctly, then," Hakram replied.

The old goblin, when going over the battle plan, had made one prediction: they will not be willing to get into a slugging match. Whoever led the host of Summer would be trying to minimize casualties at all costs, and that meant backing away from tactics that were effective if they got too expensive. The Deoraithe continued to trade arrows, losing two men for every fae they took, and I grimaced. We couldn't afford to slug it out for too long either. Another volley of flame spears descended, and finally we have answer. The Fifteenth's mages had gone through the College same as any other legion's, with one major difference: Masego. Who was occasionally willing to throw my mage lines a bone in the form of a ritual, if he was in the right mood for it. In Marchford, when it had become clear that our numbers in legionaries had far outgrown the quantity of mages that traditional legion structure dictated we should have to match it, Juniper and I had diverged from standard doctrine. We'd consolidated them under Kilian and drilled them in use of rituals. Now we'd see if that was going to pay off.

Two massive javelins of lightning formed above our shields and struck across the sky. The fae scattered around them even as the Fourth's mages desperately tried to keep the fae fire from reaching the siege engines. The javelins blew and streaks of lightning spread, killing scores of Summer soldiers but failing to disrupt any of the knots that forged the spears. And so now we begin our staring contest, you Summer fucks. There were only so many times the javelin ritual could be cast before my mages started burning out and dying. They knew that. I knew that. What they couldn't know was how many times they could. If they were lucky, they might shatter our shields and torch our siege engines before their losses got too high. Or we could trade blows for an hour as they racked up casualties they couldn't afford. Another wave of fire, lightning gave answer. My mages aimed at a knot this time, and killed a few. Useless, as it turned out. If the way a handful of fae from the ranks went back to fill the numbers was true indication, any of them could participate. It must be the barons that were the key.

Two more exchanges. On the last we lost a trebuchet, damn their stubborn hides. The moment the spear went through and touched wood the entire damn engine turned to ashes faster than I could blink. My mages weren't fools, though. On the first round they struck the sides with javelins, herding fae towards the centre, and when they struck there with the second they did real damage. After one success, the fae dug in. A mistake. At least a dozen of Ranker's mages must have died when the shield broke, but the rest went to reinforce the other shields. Another two exchanges where they failed to break through, and I smiled coldly. They'd blinked first. Of the ten thousand who'd come there must have been a little less than eight thousand left, a trade that had cost me at least two lines of mages and over two thousand Deoraithe archers. More of the Summer soldiers had died to the lightning ritual than the bows, by my count. We'd starkly underestimated their agility.

The fae did not retreat. They flew north, and landed on the plains behind us. That, we had seen coming. There were few things more dangerous to a besieging army than being hit in the back as they stormed the walls. I'd wanted to keep at least two out of the three wards Masego had judged he could handle to bolster our offensive, but Juniper had talked me out of it. There was no point in breaking through ahead if our back was collapsing, she'd said. Our second trap was in that very field where they'd landed.

The Fourth under Ranker and the Twelfth under General Afolabi stirred and began to march against the fae at our back. They numbers less than eight thousand, considering Ranker had a chunk of her sappers manning our engines and all her mages shielding them. The Fourth would be significantly weakened because of it. But the cognomen of Afolabi's Twelfth was Holdfast. Defence was their speciality, and that was what the two legions had been charged with. A holding action keeping the fae tied up. Masego abandoned the ward in the sky and activated the second one. Wind howled across the plains, surging forth from a line ahead of the two legions. Though it wouldn't kill anything, by our reckoning it should make flight all but impossible and for the fae to keep in tight ranks exceedingly difficult.

There was a drawback, of course. It needed Hierophant's full attention to keep active, and that meant it would cease when the Fifteenth made for the walls. That was the bet we'd made: by the time the engines had finished demolishing us a clear path to the walls, the fae at our back would be in bad enough a position that the two legions holding them would no longer need the help. Risky, Ranker had called it. If we were wrong we'd have to pull back some of the Deoraithe to bolster them, and there was chance if we did that we wouldn't have the numbers to punch through into the inner part of Dormer. It was coin flip. We could not, in the end, predict everything. For one, none of us had thought they'd sent fae nobles out this early. When we closed on the walls had been my own call, and that mistake had come mighty close to fucking us over. Even now, I winced at the notion that General Afolabi was going to have to deal with five barons. The ward could only help so much. If I hadn't sent out Archer already I would have told her to back him up, but the chalice had already been filled.

Even under bombardment by Summer, the engines had not paused. How long had passed, since the battle had begun? At least an hour, maybe more. The trebuchets had levelled us an avenue and cleaned fae out of it, but it would take hours longer yet. We should be done before nightfall, unless we were disrupted. Behind us the two Legions of Terror dug sixty feet behind the edge of the wards and let the fae come to them. It was bloody work. The Summer soldiers found that the empty space beyond the ward was a meat grinder of sharpeners and crossbow bolts leading straight into tight ranks of heavies, and hundreds died before they stopped rushing into the killzone. After that, though, they wised up. Masego's ward was a line that couldn't cover the entire plain. It couldn't even be a curve, since apparently for arcane reasons that would have been much harder to maintain. The fae began going around and the fight turned truly nasty. General Afolabi pulled back sappers and crossbowmen to back up the regulars he sent to block them, but that weakened his centre. Enough that two of the barons got a foothold.

Those were, to put it bluntly, beyond the ability of munitions to deal with. One of them lit up like a golden bonfire of gold and torched through a solid hundred heavies before being driven back by the Twelfth's mages. The other one screwed with the ward, bending the wind across a dozen feet of the line until it turned around and blew into the lines of the legion. Fae began pouring through immediately and it all went to the Hells after that. Twice, as the hours passed, I almost went to reinforce them. Both times Hakram held me back. We couldn't afford for me to start using my aspects yet. I would say this for Afolabi's legionaries, they stood their fucking ground. When the fae formed a beachhead and it looked like the centre was going to collapse, four lines of heavies went into the thick of it with lightning bolts clearing them a path. There were a few sappers behind their shields, and though half the heavies got wiped in a single stroke of the sword of the baron twisting the wind the goblins threw a dozen demolition charges at him and blew half his head off. Of that near one hundred legionaries that went in, less than twenty made it back to their lines. They'd bought General Afolabi the room he needed, though. The moment the ward returned to full effectiveness, he plugged the gap and forced back the other baron with concentrated spellfire.

An hour before Evening Bell night began to fall, and by then the field was littered with dead. But Ranker had accomplished what she'd set out to do. A straight line to the northern gate of Dormer had been carved out of rubble, the fae still in the outer city split on both sides of it.

"Our turn, now," I quietly told Hakram.

"Do or die," he said.

I gestured at the Gallowborne, and the Fifteenth stirred to march. To war, to Dormer, to doom. Whether it'd be theirs or ours, I could not yet tell.

First update of the month, you know what that means. Extra chapter is titled "Background", from Hakram's POV. As always, it's in the Extra Chapters tab but here's the link for the lazy:

Man that was exceedingly brutal, summer doesn't mess around.

Robert Allaband

Yes they did and that wasn't brutal and they are going to pay for it. Summer is planning their battle around the last Duke, which will be hidden inside of the city, expecting the Barons outside to hold the Named in place and then when they are worn down he strikes. They are counting on Catherine's old weakness, that while she has the title of a Duchess she only had the power of a Countess, and they won't find out different until it is too late because they are messing around out there instead of forcing the fight. They never should have stayed in the city and forced on open field battle, where they could have forced the pace. Never let your enemy pick the battlefield, Catherine wanted a siege where she was the sieger and got it. Brutal is what you are going to see what happens to the Fae after Catherine beats the Duke, that is what is going to force the Queen to negotiate.

Dainpdf

One would assume the fae would be able to feel her power level, no?

Robert Allaband

No, not unless they can get close and have th time to do an examination like Masego did or until she uses it, that is why she didn't intervene with the barons.

Her third aspect is tied to the power granted as the Duchess of Moonless Night and in the extra chapter Masego very bluntly states that the work he did on her made her more 10 X more powerful:

"I had it under control, before Masego did his heart shenanigans," she complained. "Now it's like I'm starting from scratch."

I love this book.

I doubt the answer to whose doom it will be is one or the other. Who's defeated might vary, but they were both doomed when the summer queen named the protagonists the woe. If not before then- depending on whether the summer queen just recognised what was always true or made it so.

Robert Allaband

The Summer Queen didn't name the group The Woe, Ranger did:

The Summer Queen uses woe as a curse, Ranger used it as a name and the way to tell is the capitalization of the word woe. Queen small w means it is not a name, Ranger capital W as you use in a proper noun that is a name.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/18/chapter-32-close/>

Also Cat tells you straight out Ranger named them:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/10/11/chapter-34-talks/>

Unorginal

I would still argue it was the summer queen who named the group as a whole. The calamities, for example, took their name from a similar speech by the chancellor of the time and considering how this is a world run off of plot-onium you can bet that things happened that way for a reason.

Mostly, this is an argument over semantics but I stand by my argument that ranger merely recognized them as the woe rather than dubbed them so.

Jonnnney

I might be alone on this, but there was way too much exposition and explanation for the amount of action we got. The history of Sieger tactics that we largely already know, the makeup of cities that aren't on the battlefield, 3 too many paragraphs about the wards, a good half the chapter was just mental masturbation on Catherine's part.

Dana

Agreed. I got bored and skimmed it.

Barrendur

@Jonnnney:

I agree with you; I, too, think this was one of the least substantive or significant updates we've had in some time, and found it disappointing, especially coupled with the soggy "Old Folks at Home"-style bonus chapter. However, balance between action and exposition is fiendishly difficult to achieve/maintain even in a conventional novel, and I can only imagine how much harder it is in serial form, with no editing, no rewrites and no take-backs possible... just an ongoing demand for timely updates.

Yeah, Chapter 40 and the Bonus Chapter were a disappointment this time, but it doesn't happen often and there are readily understandable reasons when it does. Let's thank Erraticerrata for the story, but still suggest he give his balance a nudge in the "significant" direction.

narcoduck

Agreed. I feel Erraticerrata was just trying to get through the boring opening salvo of the siege, and the tone suffered for it. For example, Dormer is a major city but I don't have a particularly vivid picture of it like I did for Leisse. And the commentary on the siege read as a particularly detailed outline of what to write.

If everything happening within this chapter is within Catherine's expectations, I think a writing style like Interlude:Commanders would have worked well, but instead of commanders, have the POV switch between the footsoldiers at each front: a goblin from Ranker's Fourth manning a trebuchet, a Soninke mage casting part of the ritual under Masego, an orc holding the line with Afolabi's Twelfth, maybe even a Gallowborne charging with his queen into a deathtrap.

Contrasting the New Praes's siege of Summer Fae holding a Callowan City vs the Summer Fae's siege of Old Praes's holding of a Callowan City (from Akua's chilling interlude) is a missed opportunity I think.

Just my two cents.

reveen

Well, trying to just get through a siege kind of misses the entire point of having a siege to begin with. Sieges are all about sitting there waiting for someone to break or make a move. I feels like we're trading the realistic implications of the situation the writer chose to put the characters in for the sake of spectacle. Which in turn is sacrificing tension for the sake of having characters do cool shit.

Narratively, sitting down for a siege would be a great way to actually build up the Far threat and allow for the coming explosion of conflict to boil, and there's no narrative benefit to skipping over all that aside from giving the audience the junk food of having the protagonists blow through loads of mooks.

OldSchoolVillain

The problem is that Cat doesn't have time for a regular siege. The Queen is arriving at Dawn, and if they don't have summer on the ropes, Cat's army is fucked. She explicitly states that in this chapter. Also, part of a siege is forcing the enemy to use up their supplies, which is impossible with Summer, because they can just open a portal to Arcadia for more rations, weapons, ammunition, etc.

reveen

Go away Watson. We're talking Doylist here.

The issue is that certain types of military actions fit into certain narrative purposed to direct the course of a story. For example, having the main characters get ambushed is a good way to introduce an upheaval to the story and shake up the readers expectation of the characters being safe. A classic example being the Uruk Hai attack that breaks up the fellowship in the Lord of the Rings. But in order for this to land you have to follow through with the logical consequences of the event. If the characters get ambushed but just kill all the bad guys and go skipping off in their merry way there's no point to it.

A siege is almost the opposite, it's something that bogs down the momentum of the story, and gives the opportunity to get some downtime, build the tension of the story, and let conflicts simmer until everything explodes into violent. This just skips right to the violence without having built tension beforehand to make it impactful.

I enjoyed the extra, but I agree this felt sort of without impact. Probably because the casualties weren't on the 15th so I felt sort of distanced from them all.

Barthumphries

There's no point in achieving a Pyrrhic victory. Wikipedia says:

> A skilled commander, with a strong army fortified by war elephants (which the Romans were not experienced in facing), Pyrrhus enjoyed initial success against the Roman legions, but suffered heavy losses even in these victories. Plutarch wrote that Pyrrhus said after the second battle of the war, "If we are victorious in one more battle with the Romans, we shall be utterly ruined." He could not call up more men from home and his allies in Italy were becoming indifferent. The Romans, by contrast, had a very large pool of military manpower and could replenish their legions even if their forces were depleted in many battles. This has led to the expression Pyrrhic victory, a term for a victory that inflicts losses the victor cannot afford in the long term.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Thanks, I know what a Pyrrhic victory is, I just didn't get that from the sentence at first. It's structured oddly, like there's a misplaced modifier or something

Not\_a\_robot

Knowing what we do about fae nobles, the fact that the Twelfth managed to take out a Duke with no help from a Named except for that wind wall is incredibly impressive. I really think that some of the stuff on this chapter lacked the oomph needed to make it truly memorable, because what actually happened was amazing.

Prediction: the summer queen is dead. Ranger killed her. That's edgy you don't see the Immortals.

It's going to be very funny.

The only problem is if that's the case, who is holding the army together?

Chapter 41: Turning Point

"Better behind a Tyrant than before them."

– Praesi saying

The right to lead the vanguard, as always, belonged to Nauk.

The orc legate was not as clever as Juniper or careful as Hune, but when the time came to hammer in a door there was a reason he was the man we sent for. More than any other orc I knew, Nauk had no give in him. He was stubborn and aggressive and his men loved him – even the humans, which was no given for a greenskin commander. In Arcadia he'd lost three fourths of his jesha to Summer regulars and the Immortals, and his men had stood their ground without flinching. How many hosts in all of Calernia would have done that, in the face of those kind of casualties? The Battle of Four Armies and One had effectively ended his command and we'd had to repurpose another jesha for him to lead, but he'd taken the reins swiftly. It helped that half the two thousand he now led had been under his nominal authority before I'd taken him north to Laure. Still, if it had been another officer I would have been wary of making them the tip of the spear when their forces were still unblooded and fresh to his command. Not with Nauk, though. What Summer did not kill today would become my vanguard in the wars to come.

My sword hissed against the sheath as it was bared, Hakram hefting his axe at my side. It would be the two of us, in the beginning, without the Gallowborne. The kind of fights I'd be seeking were not ones you took mortals into, however well-trained. Behind us the legionaries of the Fifteenth advanced in tight ranks, shields hefted. Heavies in the front with sappers behind them, about to find out if the tactics Juniper had crafted to deal with fae were effective or not. Our engines had demolished us a clear path to the walls and split the Summer regulars in two, but it would have been madness to assault the ramparts without a solid beachhead. That meant getting in the thick of it, for good or ill. The enemy was not slow in giving answer. Darkness had fallen, but for a heartbeat it felt as if day had come again: across the city flames bloomed and arrows rose into the sky. I was familiar with that trick by now, the fire-driven arrows that detonated upon impact. Watching them tear through the Gallowborne had made sure I would never forget.

Masego's third and last ward activated with a sound like a massive siphon. The arrows flew unabated, but the flames were whisked out of existence. Fire suppression ward. It would cripple our mages as well, prevent them from using fireballs, but Summer lost far more to this than we did. That Hierophant had triggered this one meant the legions at our back had lost their best defence, and all I could do was pray they'd thinned the fae enough they'd be able to hold without it. The dice were thrown, now, and there was no use giving it any further thought. Juniper would handle the rest. Arrows clattered against shields behind us, the testudo formation drilled into the legionaries sparing them from the worst of it. I heard Nauk scream for his men to pick up the pace and left him to it. Hakram and I had other duties before us: we were, it could be said, going hunting.

"Where to?" the orc gravelled.

I'd closed my eyes, letting Winter flow through my veins, and opened them only when I found an answer.

"West," I said. "Close to the river. Baron or unusually strong lord."

"It'll be good to shake the rust off before we take on the real threats," he drily said.

We left the road and took a corner around what smelled like an abandoned tannery. Wasn't surprised it was this far out. Most Callowan cities had laws forcing trades that produced fumes that dire to remain on the outskirts, no matter how useful. The streets out here were little more than dirt paths between wooden shacks, most not even broad enough for the two of us to pass through together. Though our entry had not gone opposed, Summer did not disappoint: by the time we reached the first broader street, we ran into our first ambush of the night. The only warning was arrows whistling, betraying the location of silhouettes standing over thatched roofs with bows in hand. I stepped to the side without missing a beat and Hakram had been moving before I'd even noticed. Archers on top, but there would be more. A dozen emerged from abandoned houses at our front and back, swords in hands, as the archers smoothly nocked their second volley.

"See Adjutant, they do love us," I mused. "There's a party and everything."

"Don't play with your food," the orc chided.

We split without needing to warn each other. Fighting with Hakram was like having a third arm, had been ever since he came into his Name. The archers were not amateurs: they aimed where we'd be, not where we were, and even adjusted for swiftness above that of mortals. Not well enough, though. I was quicker than I'd been before Masego had tinkered with my heart, and Adjutant had reflexes that were above even my own. He used his Name more efficiently than me, I'd come to suspect. Hakram barrelled into the fae swordsman, axe splitting open a skull before the arrows even struck ground. As for me, I glanced at a sidewall and made the wager it would survive my weight. A leap saw my foot land on the side of it, then another had me landing in the midst of the archers. They reacted smoothly, swords bared in the blink of an eye, but there were only six. My shield swung out to crush the skull of the one closest to me, and it might as well have been an eggshell. I turned a blade aside and carved open the fae's throat, spinning to turn the swing into another. They barely had time to raise their swords before three were dead.

The ease of it scared me. They had been difficult to deal with, once. Now I broke one's wrist with my shield, pierce into the second one's eye with the tip of my blade and the third made to retreat. A flick of the wrist and a blade of ice and shadow took her in the back of the neck, snuffed out instantly. The last fae did not even have time to curse before my shield smacked into his face, breaking the chin and crushing the windpipe. Magic made flesh or not, there was no walking that off. Hakram was a whirlwind spinning amidst struggling fae, taking a life with every stroke, but I glimpsed arrowheads through a window at his back. They had, it seemed, kept back archers. I let out a long breath and pushed a sliver of power into my legs. The leap sent me sailing into the air, tearing through the wall and landing on my knees in a shower of shards. Three inside, I saw. One lost his wrist to the first flick and I spun. Second was thrown out the window with his skull crushed by a shield bash. Didn't even need to kill the third. I backed out of the house and let it collapse onto him. That'd been a load-bearing wall, apparently.

"Retreat," a musical voice called out.

I was watching the man it belonged to before he even spoke. The fae around Hakram scattered, though not before his axe harmstrung one's leg and his boot came down to crush her skull. The fae was the one I'd felt earlier, a tall pale man with grey hair that looked made of granite.

"How many titled nobles do you have in the city?" I asked.

"Enough to break you," the fae smiled. "Her Majesty will take your head personally."

Shame I didn't have the time to hack off that one's limbs and bring him back to Masego so the mage could dig out the information.

"Well," I said. "One less after this."

I didn't actually see the arrow coming, and that was telling. It was utterly silent, and all I managed was to have it strike my shoulder instead of my back. It punched straight through plate and I grimaced. He hadn't come alone, and no regular had done this. I broke off the shaft and ice spread over the wound, sealing it shut.

"I think," Hakram said calmly, "that there will be no need to seek them out."

On the outskirts of Dormer, five fae stood around us. One was on the rooftops, green-haired and from the looks of the longbow in his hand he was responsible for that friendly tap I'd just received. Two more in the streets, dark-skinned and wafting smoke. They looked liked twins, one a man and the other a woman, each armed with a short spear and a blade. The last one looked like a Yan Tei, honey-skinned and utterly hairless. She had a short sword in one hand, and a thin wheel of pale steel in the other.

"All right, so," I hummed. "Correct me if I'm wrong."

I pointed my blade at the twins.

"Baron and baroness," I said, then moved to the longbow man.
"Count."

I mulled over the rest a heartbeat.

"Smug weaponless man's a jumped-up lord, and the one who brought a wheel to a swordfight's a countess, but one ahead of the curve," I finished.

"I am not jumped-up," the grey-haired fae hissed.

"That's exactly what you'd say if you were, though," I gently told him.

The smoking twins grinned, and Gods was I glad Archer wasn't there to make something of that. The one who'd looked at what made wagons move and thought 'I bet you could make a weapon out of that' offered a half bow.

"I am the Countess of Wrathful Skies," she said. "Second-in-command to this host. Should you surrender presently, I can guarantee you will not be tortured prior to execution."

"Ah, the Praesi gambit," I mused. "Always a crowd-pleaser. I'm going to have to reply with the famous words of the Duke of Violent Squalls."

Silence reigned for a moment.

"You have not said anything," the man with the bow said.

You had to love that about the fae, if nothing else: you could always count on them to feed you the line.

"Neither did he," I said. "Because I killed his smug ass."

Now that the usual diplomatic niceties were done with, I imagined negotiations were about to break down. Best get ahead of that.

"Think you can handle the twins?" I called out to Hakram.

"Long enough you'll kill your way through the rest, at least," the orc agreed.

And then they tried to shoot him, because they were just terrible diplomats. I got a better look at the arrow, this time. Entirely wood, and wreathed in green light. Likely had to do with the Count's full title, whatever that was. In the heartbeat where Adjutant moved so the shot would skim his pauldron instead of tear through his shoulder, the rest of them moved. Grey hair called on something that had the ground around him denting and every stone in sight turning to dust. The Countess' wheel began spinning and lightning gathered along the sides of it, growing larger by the instant. The smoke wafting from the twins thickened into a cloud that enveloped them entirely. I cracked my neck. This, I thought, was going to be a memorable ride. Best get it over with quickly, or we'd be too battered to handle whatever Duke actually ran this show.

I went for the archer first. If he was actually a Count it was dubious he'd be a pushover in close quarters, but neither Hakram nor I could afford to be watching for arrows at all times while dealing with the rest. Moving faster than anyone should be able to within the bounds of Creation, the green-haired fae had another arrow flying before I'd even made it to another roof. For a moment I thought he'd missed, but he'd never aimed for me at all: the house I was going to use as a stepping stone fell apart in a cloud of dust and I cursed. All right, so they weren't idiots. Which was a real shame. Idiocy was a trait I prized in people trying to kill me. Wrathful Skies attacked before I could change my course, landing at my side wreathed in lightning. When she struck, it was with two blades. One made of steel, going for my throat. The other, lagging slightly behind, was made of lightning. I made the mistake of parrying the short sword and in that instant the lightning connected with our weapons, coursing down my blade and sending down horrid pain and convulsions across my body.

First time I'd ever got hit by a lightning spell. I would not recommend the experience to anyone. I managed to duck the arrow the other fucker shot at my back, but when it struck ground instead green sorcery glimmered and it grew pins like a porcupine.

"Shit," I eloquently grunted, and threw myself to the ground.

A storm of arrows burst out and flew in every direction. A least five hit my plate, and if I hadn't gone down would have gone straight through the aketon into my flesh. I rolled to avoid the lightning wheel coming down on my head but that thing was trickier than it looked: when it touched the street a wave of lightning spread from the point of contact and had me convulsing again. This, I thought, was not going according to plan. Because all of this clearly just wasn't enough, stone powder coalesced above me and formed a massive obelisk that... dropped. Lightning first, I thought, gritting my teeth. I reached for Winter and frosted shadows formed an envelope around my body. They got burned through as swiftly as I willed them into being, but that bought me just long enough to scrabble out of the way of the obelisk. It turned to powder immediately, but I had other problems on my hands. I dropped my shield, since in the face of lightning it was just a liability, and grabbed the Countess of Wrathful Skies' wrist when she tried to swing down at me.

Steadying my footing, I rotated and threw her right into the trajectory of the arrow that was meant for the back of my neck.

A green shimmer and it was gone, because the bastards weren't going to make it that easy on me. Stone powder formed around me in the shape of a bubble. Containment, huh. At least they were taking me seriously. I released the shadow envelope and backed away, but the powder followed. Their first mistake of the night. He should have readjusted instead. The Countess had landed on her feet and her wheel rose up, gathering ever more lightning. Another arrow flew silently towards my chest, but I wasn't falling for that one twice. My wrist flicked with unearthly precision and I slapped it aside. When the smaller arrows burst out, it was too far for any of them to hit me. He did not retire that trick. Might be he can't when it's already been loosed. The stone had caught up to me, by now, and Wrathful Skies had a streak of lightning floating above the wheel that looked like it was going to sting. My opening.

"Take," I said.

The Countess' eyes went wide as I claimed the sorcery above her head, for just one moment wresting it from her control and tossing it straight at the fae lord trying to contain me. Struck him right in the chest with dark satisfaction. I was moving before my most dangerous opponent could react, and the lack of arrow to duck had me surprised until I heard Hakram's hoarse grunt. Shit. I didn't have time to spare a look as I avoided stepping stones entirely and leapt straight at the archer. I got a boot in the helmet for it but caught it with my hand even as I began to fall, drawing on Name strength so even from that awkward position I managed to snatch him off his foot and swing him down behind me. Right into the face of the the Countess of Wrathful Skies, as she prepared to run me through. The two of them were smashed to the ground in a pile of sprawling limbs. I thinned my lips, well aware I couldn't afford to use Fall on these two even if it would be a near-guaranteed kill. I needed it for the Duke. Shot a spear of ice at them out of spite and immediately moved towards the lord.

He was back on his feet, in a narrow alley between two houses. The powder formed a wall in front of me but I sped up and went through before it solidified. Hastily he dragged it back to him and shot spears of stone at me, the first at feet height and then rising. Panting, I threw myself into a slide and narrowly went under the bottom stone. I landed in a crouch in front of him and even as his skin turned to stone my sword came up. Straight through the belly. He gasped and I rose as I withdrew the blade, cutting straight through his neck in the next swing. The head rolled on the floor, and there went the first of my opponents. The walls to my side groaned, and I cursed when I saw the arrows groaning from them. Fuck, could he pull that on all wood? Furious at the waste, I dug into Winter and froze both walls before he could get the arrows flying. Another twist of will had the walls collapsing, and even as the houses followed I turned to face the other two remaining. The Countess kept her lightning wheel close, and not powerful enough to be worth stealing. She'd learned. Not that I'd Take it lightly, anyway.

I could get another two uses out of that aspect tonight at most, and every one I used on these was one less I could pull against the Duke.

"Yew," the Countess said. "Travel. She'll target you otherwise."

"I would never," I lied.

The possible count hesitated, but then lay hand on a wooden wall and disappeared. Well, fuck. That was going to be a pain to deal with. There was smoke in the distance where Hakram was fighting the others, and I could hear rhythmic singing in a dialect of Kharsum I was unfamiliar with. If he was well enough to sing, I decided, I could afford to be careful dealing with these two.

"You are Duchess of Moonless Nights in truth," the Countess said. "Reports of your power were greatly understated."

"I'm just putting my whole heart into it, this time," I sharply grinned. "So, have you distracted me long enough for him to line up his shot yet?"

"Why," the fae drily replied. "I would never."

What I'd meant to do was duck the arrow then kick it into the Countess' face to make me an opening. It started going wrong on the first part: while I avoided the arrow by a hair's breadth, it was already growing pins. I had to roll through a window into a house to avoid the storm, and Gods Below was that a mistake. Everything began growing spikes a heartbeat later.

"I have made better tactical decisions in the past," I conceded out loud.

I managed to tear through the door in time to avoid the worst of it, but worst was a relative term when even the bloody door was shooting arrows at me. About six of them stung their way straight into my back, through plate and aketon both. A lot more worryingly, Wrathful Skies was waiting for me in the street with the wheel raised. There wasn't so much sorcery there it would be worth stealing, and that moment of reluctance cost me. A dozen tendrils of lightning struck out and the better part of them managed to hit me. The really dangerous part, I managed to realize even as my body screamed, was that the spell was continuous. The other fae slid out of a wall to my side and nocked an arrow but let it gather green light. Ominous.

"Take," I gasped.

The Countess immediately cut the lightning, but it wasn't her I was going for. For an instant I felt the green light and knew whom it belonged to: the Count of Green Yew. His title spoke to growth and wood, to- pain spiked my thoughts, scattering them. There was no fire in this, but it was still born of Summer. Anathema to what I had become. It had been enough anyway. The power I'd taken disappeared from the bow and I shoved it into the same door that had wounded me. Tendrils of wood rose and caught the lightning, freeing me. A heartbeat later the arrow struck where I would have still been, but I was already moving. The Countess' sword rose to parry my own, but it was only steel at this very moment and in a contest of strength, I trumped her outright. Her blade driven back she began to step back but I caught her throat with my bare hand. Lightning flickered as she called it back from her wheel into her body but it was much, much too late. My fingers clenched and a sickening crack resounded as I snapped her spine and pulped her throat. Before her body had dropped to the floor I was turning to the Count of Green Yew, but he was already gone.

Retreat? It would be hellish to go through this city with the fae popping out of every house to take a shot at us. No, can't be. Summer doesn't retreat, not like that. He could, however, have decided to kill Adjutant so the twins would be freed to act against me. Shit. Aside from the fact that if Hakram died I was going to murder every last one of them, from the first fucking regular to the Queen herself, fighting blind like the smoke-using fae must impose was one of the ways I most hated fighting. I'd grown too use to relying on my Name-sharpened senses. There was no time to dawdle. The smoke cloud was easy enough to find, and I legged it towards there. I kept a eye on my surroundings as I did, wary of an ambush, but I had forgotten one fact about fae: they flew. Three arrows landed in a triangle around me, and the pins grew a heartbeat later. Heart sinking, I froze them. I'd already used more than I'd wanted to, and I still had one other major draw to deal with before I got to the Duke. At this rate I'd be dead on my feet by the time I got there. On the other hand, at this rate by the end of this all that would be left of the Summer Court was going to be three guys and a graveyard.

Small comfort. The Count of Green Yew was flying half a mile above me and already nocking an arrow. Making my way up there was going to be tricky, against an opponent that specialized in range combat. The first house I chose to use as a stepping stone was collapsed before I even touched it and I had to resist the urge to flip him the finger. Discarding the fanciness, I created a circle of shadow in the air and leapt atop it. I was going to stab the bastard even if I had to claw my godsdamned way up. The second circle I made, even as I dismissed the first, was torn through by an arrow. I fell back to street level and took a deep breath. That fucker. I was going to have to make multiple platforms every time, wasn't I? Drawing the power, I blinked at what I saw above. He has to see that, I thought. But the Count shot another arrow at me instead, and even even as I danced away I was laughing.

The lower edge of the trebuchet stone caught him at rib height.

I got a glimpse of red splatter and white bones before it got out of sight, and faintly made note to find out what goblin had made that shot so I could order them promoted. Hells, if I could accomplish that as vicequeen without burning too many bridges I was going to have them made count. They'd sure as Hells earned it. It was harder to find Hakram than I'd thought, after, because the smoke had dissipated. I found Adjutant panting and bloodied in a marketplace, his armour black as coal and his face bearing nasty wounds that were going to scar. His dead hand gleamed strangely, at least the parts of it I could see. Most of it had been shoved through the baroness' eye cavity. Gods. My second didn't fuck around, when he got serious. He ripped it out in a shower of gore and crouched, almost too exhausted for words.

"Had to use Rampage," he croaked. "Kept Stand. Think they were weak for barons."

I offered him my arm to grasp and helped him to his feet.

"Dipped a little too deep as well," I said. "Hopefully the others were more conservative, otherwise even if we take out the Duke we'll be wiped when the Queen comes through."

"Plan's not to fight her," he said.

"And those always go so well," I drily replied. "You up for a run? We need to catch up to Nauk."

"I'll live," he said. "No inner bleeding. Is it possible to bruise your kidney?"

"I think mine is permanently blue," I said amusedly.

We made our way back to the main path, and only had to stop twice for him to retch. There wasn't a lot of blood in it and Hakram was an orc, so I wasn't overly worried. His people were built resilient, and Named took that to an extreme. That part of the city had already been secured, though the vanguard was long gone. It was the Deoraithe that held it now and they made way for the both of us. Emptying his stomach had put Hakram back on his feet, more or less, so he was spared the indignity of my holding him up all the way to the front. Nauk found us before we found him. The fae, I saw, had razed a ring of houses around the city wall. There must have been a moat as well, once, because I saw a pit around even the gates that had been burned clean. It was empty now. The Fifteenth had dug in their positions around the edge of the wall, trading sporadic crossbow fire with the fae above. No sign of the Immortals on the walls, which was relief and worry both.

"Cat," Nauk grinned. "Good hunting?"

"We cleaned house in the west," I said. "Can't answer for the rest."

"Whatever you did there, it collapsed their flank," the legate said. "We hold most of that side now. To the east we've got ten thousand holding a neighbourhood near the walls. Deoraithe failed to break through, but they're contained."

I raised an eyebrow.

"And the rest?"

That left ten thousand missing.

"They tried another run at the trebuchets," Nauk said. "We lost another two and half our ballistas, but they were beaten back. Saw them fly behind the walls."

I grimaced. That was a lot more fae in the inner city than I'd wanted to deal with.

"The Immortals?" I prompted.

"We think they hold the castle," the orc said. "To make sure the Queen has foothold when she crosses."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"Doesn't matter," I finally said. "We break through now. What time is it?"

"Midnight Bell was an hour ago," Nauk replied.

Then we needed to hurry. Behind the walls would be an even uglier fight.

"Scry Masego," I ordered. "He's to dismiss his last ward and join us for the push."

The legate bared his fangs.

"Wade in their blood, Catherine Foundling," he said.

"Gods, I hope not," I replied. "Hakram spends long enough cleaning my armour as is."

The grin I got was worth the words, considering the casualties his advance must have caught. When I found Adjutant again the Gallowborne were already with him. Tribune Farrier saluted, and promptly handed me a shield. It had, I noted, my very fresh heraldry painted on it.

"Figured you might break your first one," the dark-haired man said.

I thanked him decided not to tell him it was actually fine and that it had just entirely slipped my mind to double back to pick it up. I rolled my shoulder and took a look at the walls. Those might take hours to breach, if we let the trebuchets do the heavy lifting. Even more now that we'd lost over half of them.

"Cluster tight around me," I ordered Farrier. "Shields up. They'll be aiming at us all the way."

"They always do," the Callowan smiled. "And yet, here we are."

I smiled back, though the affection was short-lived. There were a lot of new faces among the men, and I knew exactly why. I took the lead, Hakram at my side and the Gallowborne at my back. The fae on the walls only fired a few arrows at us, though that'd change if they saw we didn't retreat. I closed my eyes and let Winter loose. I took a step, and ice rose. One step after another, a stairway of ice rose in front and then above the gates of Dormer. It was, I knew, wide enough for three hundred men to go up. It was burning through my reserves, cooling my blood. It was also how my armies were going to take the city.

I advanced, and the Fifteenth advanced with me.

Metalshop

Fantastic chapter.

danh3107

I don't think reading about Catherine killing people in awesome ways will ever get old.

-Mech-

Trebutchet to deal with flying enemies is a hilarious method, I'll admit, although whoever made that shot has some ridiculous aiming. I mean, how would you even adjust your aim that well lol

Jordan

Im starting to suspect that Robber is developing a name too, but it's already been pointed out that her goblins are extraordinary.

wirelessgrapes

You mean Pickler? Robber's the guy who steals shit and ganks people in alleys, Pickler is the genius builder.

TideofKhatanga

I'm convinced that both Robber and Ranker are Named already. We'll probably never know about any of it since goblins don't speak about that to non-goblin.

In fact, we have no confirmation that goblins even have Names but the shit Preserver is supposed to be and to do pretty much scream Name. With the way goblin treats names in general, I wouldn't be surprised if all of them turned out to be Named in some fashion.

SpacyRicochet

@TideofKhatanga

That's not likely to happen. They were subject to slavery and experiments for way too long under the Praesi before Black. If a lot of them were named, you could bet that the Praesi would've found out on the operating table.

Robber getting a name? Hopefully yes! Thief could use a right-hand and a jar of extra eyeballs.

George

A great deal of study and practice, a mind more suited to it than a human's is, and a story in your favor in a place where that matters.

LaNuup

I just think that once in a while even Cat side gets a lucky shot in. That one was probably not aimed at the Count

Letouriste

Who else? I don't think any other targets were nerby;)

LaNuup

I expect the legions to still bombard known summer locations and there was after all a whole eastern front to bombard.

Dana

Once in a while? Eh, Cat gets tons of narrative breaks going her way.

Cpt. Obvious

She cheats to win almost every one of them.

Shequi

"Do you know what we call flying soldiers on the battlefield?"

"Air Support?"

"Skeet."

<https://www.schlockmercenary.com/2011-05-28>

Flying targets can be more predictable than ones on the ground, especially if they just hover; they sacrifice cover, after all.

beleester

You're still targeting a man-sized target with a weapon meant to target castles. Even if you can predict exactly where they'll be (and that's a feat in itself, given that a trebuchet doesn't have a sight or rangefinder so all you can do is eyeball it), the machine itself needs to be precise enough to hit that location reliably.

callmesteve

Good choice of reference, there. Hope we don't get the one about friendly fire and close air support...

Caine

Hitting an airborne target with a trebuchet on purpose is simply not possible. It's either Name fuckery, magic, or coincidence.

stevenneiman

I think that might have been more story-driven than a matter of accuracy. Whoever made the shot might not have even been aiming for him. After all, it was really funny, won a fight that it was kind of inevitable they would win anyway, and this isn't the first time that we've seen some improbable ballistics to hilariously win a fight against a minor antagonist.

callmesteve

That goes up there with the crossbow bolt to the hero's throat during his monologue. Unconventional (for there) tactics are hilarious.

I would also like to see Pickler, Juniper, and Robber get Named. That would be both what they deserve and an even better underscoring of just what Foundling is able to do.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Bantering during a fight eh? Black would be displeased.

sheer_falacy

He's fine with banter when there's a point to it. She knew the enemy was talking to get their ally time to attack and thought she could take advantage of the attack. She was wrong, but still.

stevenneiman

Dealing with inhuman abominations like Fae, Cat becomes the protagonist almost by default. Protagonists can get away with witty banter, especially when they're also the underdog, and even when they're outmatched Fae have enough arrogance to trick the story into identifying their enemies as underdogs.

naturalnuke

Phase 1 of the great goblin conspiracy is complete.

Perihelion

"The Countess immediately cut the lightning," "Tendrils of wood rose and caught the lightning, freeing me."
Is the continuity kinda messed up here or am I just misunderstanding?

Letouriste

I want the goblin who made that shot to become named:) would be nice to have a new goblin in the story^^

Ps: by named I mean him coming back later in the story with a crafted personality

callmesteve

That'd work too. If he ever gets a Name as well, though, it should be something to do with ballistics. Artillerist, maybe? Something to be able to target anything with any or improvised weaponry would be hilarious. "Called shot to the face, with half a cow!"

Urist

I somehow feel like the basic idea behind the Gallowborne was lost at some point in the last months. They just seem like an elite unit and personal guard rather than a way to put criminals through the meat grinder. Why would they only be replenished after they suffered losses? Either there are criminals who are in need of punishment or there aren't

Cpt. Obvious

It started out that way. But when they proved that they were not going to break it changed not what they are but what they are seen to represent. They are still Gallowborne in that they owe their deaths to Cat. Not their lives, because those were left in the gallows. And now they've become known as the personal troupes of Catherine Foundling, (vice) Queen of Callow who has been clawing back control of Callow from the Tower. At least that's what a lot of Callowan believes.

So I bet most if not all the replacements are Callowans who specifically ask to be placed in the Gallowborne, swearing away their deaths even though they're not convicted to a death sentence.

That may be seen as the company losing its point, but it also means they have transitioned from being a punishment detail to an elite unit sworn to serve Cat in whatever role she needs, including dying to protect her and her plans. If they remain around long enough their story will grow to allow them extra weight in future battles.

Question is how long Cat can stand having people sign away their deaths this way.

alegio

Is it just me or is Hakram getting better at the whole "out of screen" fighting thing?

stevenneiman

His role is to deal with problems so Cat doesn't have to. It makes sense that he would be extremely dangerous any time Cat just leaves a fight to him so she can deal with someone else. Basically, it demotes them from being in the category of antagonists and major challenges to the category of paperwork and cleaning Cat's armor.

Though considering the kinds of stuff she's managed to get on it, cleaning Cat's armor is an accomplishment in itself.

nipi

Been pondering on the: "I will take the crown of seven mortals rulers and one, to lay them at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall,"

Not a native English speaker but couldn't Cat interpret it as laying the crowns at his feet and feet only?

BumblingBehemoth

By that logic she could just steal 7 crowns and lay them at his feet without having to first take their city/lands/throws.

BumblingBehemoth

Which I would actually be down for. That would be hilarious

That Hakram uses his name better is not really surprising. Cat is still in a transitional name and the Name of Squire just doesnt fit her anymore. She leads a complete Army and has more strength than she should have + doesnt really do stuff a squire would do. So yeah her name isnt really fitting for her anymore. When she transitioned she will probabaly so much more powerful, because then her name is actually something thats fits her. I mean yeah she got the NAmE Squire with her own work and made it her own, but she just isnt a squire and i think this mindsets hampers the power of a Name. So yeah i am looking forward when she transitions. Probabaly around the time she beats Akua.

Chapter 42: Plateau

"Ah, but every palace you destroy has to be rebuilt! You've single-handedly pulled the Empire out of a slump, hahaha. Once again sweet victory is mine."

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful

The sappers strapped the demolition charges against the guildhall's wall and scuttled away as fast as their feet could take them. The moment they'd gotten clear, two apple-sized balls of flame bloomed and struck at the munitions. Stone shattered, though few shards went in our direction – the goblins had long mastered the art of shaping the direction of the blasts. Two dozen regulars charged into the rubble before the dust and smoke cloud had settled, running into stiff fae resistance. This far into Old Dormer they'd started to hole up in the larger buildings, turning them into strongholds they used to sally out at the Fifteenth when our lines drove past them. My eyes sharpened and I made out the silhouettes in the smoke. Less than thirty, regulars one and all. The few set up on a balustrade were going to be costly to dislodge, but I couldn't afford to stick my nose into every fight. I let the crossbowmen have at them as my legionaries rammed their shield wall into the enemy on the ground floor.

I'd left Hakram behind when we'd taken the walls, and hadn't seen him in the better part of an hour. The fighting there had been brutal, especially with Masego's ward gone, but Nauk's vanguard had punched through and carved us a beachhead on top of the ramparts. It had been grim work after that, driving them back inch by inch until the enemy commander sounded a horn and they retreated into the inner city. The battle for Dormer was being fought on three theatres, now. Ranker and Afolabi held our backs, the Deoraithe infantry had resumed assaulting the fae dug in the east as soon as the siege engines had turned their fire there and now the Fifteenth was spilling into Old Dormer like a flood. The flood, unfortunately, had eventually run into dike. It would have been too much to hope for that the last stiff opposition we'd run into was the Immortals, holed up in their castle.

The most ancient part of Dormer was, I'd come to realize, built around a handful of low hills joining into a larger one. The baronial castle was atop that, overlooking the old city and the port, and just like Whitestone Quarter back in Laure the wealthy estates had clustered around the seat of power in the city. Weren't a lot of high nobles this far south, but there'd been wealthy merchants and those who'd once been landed knights before that status was burned out of the social fabric of Callow. The Fifteenth had overrun most of the lower level of Old Dormer in swift order, save for a few strongholds that were being bloodily taken piecemeal, but it had stopped cold in face of fae lines on two fronts: the port and the lesser hills. The fucking nobles had built walls around their estate, because naturally it wasn't enough to be rich you had to keep the rabble away from your statues and gardens too. Nauk had lost a full company trying the lowest hill, wiped out in a storm of flame faster than they could scream, before pulling back.

The port was crawling with fae, and I'd bet that was where the ten thousand who'd bailed from the second run at the engines had gone. Regulars alone the Fifteenth might have managed to drive into the river, but as it happened the rivers was swinging back. There was a Count in there who had water sorcery, and the prick had been cautious enough so far we hadn't been able to reach him. When I'd gone to lead the charge he'd surrounded the entire port in a wall of water twenty feet high, and while I could have probably forced my way through that I was unwilling to exhaust myself on a second stringer. I'd linked back with the meat of the Fifteenth under Legate Hune and scried Masego, diverting him in that direction. It'd take a while for him to get there, though, so I'd gone with Hune's boys to bring down the last few dug-in fae around the port. I watched in silence as the legionaries finished clearing the guildhall, and nodded in approval at the light casualties. Only five dead, and with the mage line close by the wounded would be back on their feet soon enough. Speaking of the devil, I thought. A thickly-built Soninke with lieutenant stripes on her shoulder and the light armour of our mage contingent was making her way to me. I turned without needing to be hailed, and discomfort flickered across her face.

"Ma'am," she saluted. "Lord Hierophant had sent word he's near the port, preparing a ritual to make a path through the water."

I rolled my shoulder absent-mindedly.

"Then let's give him a hand," I mused. "Any word from Adjutant or Archer?"

"Last report has Lord Adjutant in pitched battle with a Summer baroness near the hills, ma'am," the mage replied. "Neither the Archer nor the Thief have been in touch."

It'd been over half a day now, I thought. Any longer and I was going to have to get concerned, though worrying for Archer was not unlike worrying for a forest fire at summer peak – it was usually wiser to worry about the fire than for it. As for Thief, well, of all the Named I'd come across she had the most splendid survival instinct. If Diabolist ended up breaking the world, Thief would be the last human alive to share it with rats and cockroaches.

"Tell Hune to back up Adjutant with whatever mages she can spare," I frowned, and looked around.

Hard to tell my way around an unfamiliar city, though the massive water wall in the distance was a bit of a hint as to where I should be headed.

"Should I send word to Lord Hierophant you will be reinforcing him, ma'am?" the mage called out as I began to walk away.

"Let it be a surprise," I said. "He loves those."

"You know I despise surprises," Masego said, glaring at me.

Impressive, considering he had no eyes. He was getting better at that. I clapped his shoulder, and even being careful nearly sent him tumbling to the ground.

"What happened to your spirit of adventure?" I replied.

"That's a myth," he said disdainfully, slapping away my hand. "Father's dissected several heroes and never found any trace of it."

Ah, Warlock. If I was the kind of girl to pray, I would that I never had to go digging through that man's basement. I had a feeling whatever I'd find there would give the Tower a run for its money in the 'horrors beyond understanding' department.

"It's a metaphor," I said. "I know you don't know what those are, but-"

I grinned at the deeply offended look on his face and barrelled on before he could interject.

"- I just don't have the time to educate you tonight. Your ritual is ready?"

"Yes," he glared.

"Go on, then," I said, vaguely gesturing. "Do the thing."

The water rampart loomed ahead of us, showing no sign of collapsing on its own. It bisected houses in some parts, and the legionaries had checked inside only to find out it had gone straight through stone and wood. I didn't have the heart to ask if any of my men had been in the way when it was made. Runes bloomed around Masego, and it was difficult for me to keep their image in my mind. High Arcana, then. A curtain of transparent power made a tunnel through the water across the length of the street as Hierophant's face creased in concentration. After a moment, he relaxed. Good enough for me.

"It's a figure of speech," he said.

"No idea what you're talking about," I airily replied.

A full cohort was already forming ranks in front of the tunnel and without missing a beat I took the lead. The commanding officer was a hawk-faced Taghreb, and like most my staff would have been too young for his rank in most other legions.

"Captain Fazil, Your Grace," he introduced himself when I glanced at him.

"Keep your ranks tight and your shields up, Captain," I said. "This is going to be a ride."

His lips quirked in that subtle Praesi way denoting polite amusement.

"Well," he said. "Can't be worse than Marchford."

"I hear that," I muttered.

I'd say this for the fae, while they were a pain to deal with at least they weren't godsdamned demons. I was really hoping Diabolist was out of those to call on, but stood ready for bitter disappointment.

"Shouldn't we be behind the shields?" Masego said after catching up to me. "That is what they're meant for."

"Chin up, Lord Hierophant," I said. "Make it look like we know what we're doing."

"I thought we knew what we were doing," he said.

He glanced at me worriedly and I whistled loudly.

"Catherine, tell me we know what we're doing."

"FORWARD!" I screamed, unsheathing my sword.

"I could be in my tower," he complained. "My nice, comfortable tower. Fadila never takes me to battles, you know. She makes me tea. She keeps very tidy notes and lets me sleep in."

I didn't bother to suppressed my snort of laughter at that, letting out ring loud and clear. That must have left an impression on the fae awaiting us on the other side of the tunnel, because their line wavered at the sound. I felt the first volley before they let it loose, the blooming of power just out of sight. With trails of flame the arrows filled the tunnel with burning light that reflected eerily in the waters around us. Slow, compared to how they'd felt when I first encountered them. It was easy enough to pass under the curve when I picked up the pace, though most hadn't been aimed at me. The sound of sorcerous shields pinging told me Masego had seen to that, at least for now. I ripped into the frontline like storm, silhouettes flickering one after another as I immersed myself into the reflexes of my Name. One, two, three and what was the point in keeping count? They came and died. The flowed around me, after a while. Made room, and that was when I realized they'd known ranks would do nothing to stop me. I could see the long warehouses of the port in the distance, and atop them fae stood in knots. Spears of Summer flame were being formed, like the ones they used to pound at the siege engines.

If I actually got hit by one of those I wouldn't die, I didn't think, but I wouldn't be getting back up on me feet for a while either. They'd meant, evidently, to draw me in and keep me pinned. Arrows from all sides flew, and I had to conceded that if it'd been just me they might well have caught me with this. I wasn't, though. Alone. Sorcery slithered around me, shining blue, and began to spin blindingly fast. The arrows struck it first, and were drawn into the spin flawlessly. The spears struck one after another and flame filled my field of vision for long moments – but, in the end, was drawn in as well. The spinning ended abruptly, and a forest of arrows clattered against stone as Masego made his way to my side.

“Reckless,” he chided.

“Kept them busy,” I replied.

I’d bought my legionaries their beachhead, and wasn’t going to hold their hand through the rest of this. The Count had been the problem here, and with Masego backing me we should be putting him down in short order.

“By the river,” Hierophant said. “I believe he’ll be releasing the wall soon.”

“That doesn’t sound like a good thing,” I grimaced.

“The sheer weight of water will crush anything near it,” he noted. “A shame we’ll be otherwise occupied; it would have been interesting to witness. It is quite rare for water sorcery of this scale to be used save by the Ashurans, you know.”

That would have been interesting enough a line to warrant encouragement if we were drinking in a tent, but we had other priorities at the moment. I took the lead and we advanced towards the river. It was different fighting with Masego than it was with Hakram. Hierophant had been with me since my first real campaign, true, but we’d only really began fighting together near the end of the Liesse Rebellion. It was in the months after that we’d developed the technique, and it hadn’t been truly tested yet. Tonight would see to that. The theory was simple: Masego was a fortress, and I was the garrison. Panes of solid light forming a rough sphere around us hung in the air as we moved forward, and I darted out of their protection to clear the way whenever we met opposition. Arrow fire petered out after the first two volleys did nothing to dent our defences and the fae came in close quarters instead. That was my part to deal with. My shield caught the edge of a swinging blade and forced it down, my sword point taking the fae in the throat before I lightly stepped back. Another filled the void before the movement was even finished.

“Clear,” I called out.

The panes flickered out of existence and as I stepped aside Masego finished murmuring an incantation, a burst of howling wind tearing into the mass of fae before us. Doubtful it’d killed anyone, but it did buy me room. I sallied out the moment the burst ended, blade high and carving through the fae that tried to plug the gap. Moments later I saw movement in the distance from the corner of my eye and calmly retreated just as Hierophant restored the panes of light, safely behind the walls as the arrows burned harmlessly. It was a slow way forward, but for foes who'd never faced it before it was very, very hard to deal with. The two of us ploughed through fae lines even as my legion fought in the distance, clearing two streets in a row with only minimal exertion. The dark-skinned mage didn't even look winded. I could feel the bundle of power that was the Summer Count near the water, but frowned when I saw there was a row of back-to-back warehouses in the way. We'd have to go the long way around if we kept to the streets, and that was more time than I cared to give the enemy. Cutting through a fae's wrist and half-stepping back behind the panes, I spun the blade slowly to limber my wrist. There'd been a lot if killing tonight.

"Warehouse to the left," I said. "Burn."

Masego looked at the wooden walls and raised an eyebrow, red runes lighting up around him. The smell of sulphur spread thick in the air and even as the panes broke, a stream of black flame emerging from his hand and turning into a snake with gaping jaws open wide. The construct tore through the warehouse wall, the crates piled behind it, what looked like dried fish hanging from the ceiling and then the second wall before disappearing in a flash. The fae had been ready for us, this time, and arrows flew the moment the shields were gone. I stood vigil, blade scything through the first few in perfect arc and a twist of will flash-freezing the few that hadn't take care of. The panes were back before a fuller volley could be sent and we resumed our advance, going through the still-smouldering shortcut. The moment we saw the inside was empty of fae our pace went brisk, though Masego stilled before we left the warehouse and finally reached the docks.

"Now," he said. "Cat, he's not releasing it. He's repurposing it. Hid the intent from me by delaying 'til the last moment."

"He's going to smash us with it," I sighed.

I broke at a run immediately and the overweight mage followed as best he could. The Count stood at the edge of the docks, alone, and I thanked any Gods listening for the fae pathological need for melodramatic scenes. If he'd had an honour guard of Summer soldiers this would have been a lot harder. Turning too-large deep blue eyes on us, the fae smiled gently.

"Welcome, Duchess of Moonless Nights," he said. "Allow me to-"

By the time he'd gotten to the word 'Nights', I had the sharper out of my satchel and lit. The toss was a beautiful arc that would have the explosion happen right in his monologuing face. A tendril of water snaked out of the river and caught it before, though, the munitions never detonating.

"This is-" the Count began.

"I'll handle the water," Hierophant interrupted, tone interested as he looked behind us.

"Would you-"

"I've got him," I replied, and charged with my shield angled up.

The first tendril of water was caught on it and ricocheted upwards. I smoothly spun around the second and leapt over the third, landing in a roll at his feet. His hand whipped forward and there was a gargantuan groan but the distinct lack of downing that followed meant Hierophant was good as his word. My shield caught him on the shoulder and I felt bones break. He didn't even try to fight the impact, allowing it to throw him into the river. He landed on his feet, never actually going through.

"And now-"

I followed, letting Winter flare under my feet. It froze the water on touch just long enough for me to be able to make it from one stride to the next. I was on his chosen grounds now, though, and it showed. Instead of the handful of tendrils I got a full three dozen, coming in a flawless circle. Couldn't afford to slow down or I'd sink, so I'd have to time this just right. I picked the highest tendril and froze a smooth shard of it, then leapt atop the attack meant to kill me. Immediately the others adjusted course towards me, but while his sorcery was versatile it was too slow. I wasn't surprised Princess Sulia hadn't taken him to the Battle of Four Armies and One, the Winter fae would have eaten this one alive. My sword came down as I fell atop him, cutting straight through his shoulder and the pale blue mail that covered it. The Count screamed and before I could response I was thrown away by a waterspout, the back of my plate dragging along the length of the docks and ripping through the planks. Fuck, that hurt. I'd cut off the arrows the Count of Green Yew had shot in there, but there were still bits inside and they'd wiggled horridly into my back muscles. I got back on my feet slowly, keeping a sliver of attention on the presence in the back of my head. The fae was in the air, now, red and gold wings keeping him aloft.

"Finally," he hissed. "This is absurd. You have no respect for the proper courtesies, child. What do you have to say for yourself?"

"One day," I replied, "you guys are going to stop falling for this one."

Zombie the Third ploughed into him from the back, screeching loudly as his wings flapped and the hooves smashed into shoulder blades. My mounts must have weighed twice as much as he did, and fae or not that took a toll. The Count plunged into the docks headfirst with a broken back, and much to my amusement got stuck between the planks I'd already ripped. I didn't waste time on anything fancy and just punched through the back of his neck with the tip of my sword.

"Godsdamnit, Catherine," Masego moaned.

Oh right, he still had all that water to deal with. I guided Zombie into landing at my side and dragged the Count's broken body off of the docks just in case leaving it close to river would heal it somehow. You never knew with fae. Hierophant's arms were held up and shaking as he dealt with what looked like a small lake of levitating water. That was a lot bigger than I'd thought it would be. I, uh, left him to that. It looked under control. He eventually managed to make an escapement that slowly emptied the water back into the Wasaliti, though he was panting by the end of it. I patted Zombie's back.

"Who's a good abomination to the laws of men and decency," I praised it. "You are."

It preened, blue eyes glittering.

"Are you indulging yourself?" Hierophant said, sounding like he was rolling his eyes.

No there was an image, but I didn't linger on it because I stood frozen.

"I, uh, didn't make him do that," I admitted quietly.

"Her," Masego corrected.

"How do you – never mind, I don't want to know," I muttered. "They don't usually do that."

"Your necromancy has grown different than Uncle Amadeus'," the blind mage mused. "That has interesting implications."

"This," I decided, "feels like an issue for Tomorrow Catherine to deal with. She'll bitch about it, no doubt, but she hasn't had to kill her way through a fucking army of murderous fairies so screw her and her whining mouth."

"Usually when villains started referring to themselves like this, it is before they go deeply and irrevocably mad," Masego informed me. "It is a well-documented phenomenon."

I could always count on this one for reassurances, couldn't I? I was picking my particular shade of scathing sarcasm when movement above stilled my tongue. To call what was happening there flying would have been somewhat generous, I decided. It was, if anything, falling at a slightly forward angle. I imagined the fae's ability to flap its wings was somewhat affected by the fact that Archer had sunk two knives in its back and was trying to guide it with them. By their angle, they'd come from the castle. That was good. The way the fae died in mid-flight was slightly less so. Archer's lips moved in what was no doubt a vicious curse and she jumped after retrieving her knives, spreading her arms wide.

"She's aiming for us, I think," Masego said, frowning.

"Going to hit that warehouse instead," I noted. "Her ride died too early."

We began to stroll towards the likely end of her trajectory when Hierophant suddenly smacked a fist into a palm.

"I could ease her way down, like I did with you," he offered.

He had, huh. I gauged Archer's fall. Nowhere as bad as mine would have been, though she'd bruise for sure. And if I remembered correctly, after catching me the wench had dropped me.

"Nah," I smiled. "I'm sure she has it under control."

Twenty heartbeats later Archer crashed through a thatched roof in an explosion of straw and wood. Masego and I casually walked into the warehouse and found her lying sprawled on broken crates full of salmon. She moaned.

"You didn't catch me," she accused.

"My hands were full," I said.

"You could have sent your horse," she bit out.

"It's a sensitive soul," I defended. "Didn't want to risk hurting it."

"Ugh," she groaned. "You two are the worst."

I looked around and found no sight of her expected shadow.

"Where's Thief?" I asked.

"Last I saw her she was telling me I was a horrid idiot who didn't understand the meaning of stealth and that I deserved to die," Archer mused. "She was smiling when she said it, though. I think she's warming up to me."

I coughed to hide my laugh.

"I'm sure she is," I lied. "How much did you get done?"

"Right, report," Archer breathed, vaguely flapping a wrist at me instead of rising. "So, we stole a bunch of banners and planted the goblinfire but then we ran into these guys. So Thief was all like 'Archer, you peerless beauty whose approval I secretly crave-"

"Sounds just like her," I said flatly.

"- we should run'. But then this guy was all like 'Yeah, you better run'. So, you know, I shot him in the eye. And I'm going to be honest with you here, Catherine, they didn't take well to that. At all."

"You don't say," I murmured.

So that was why Black never took my reports unless he had a bottle of wine at hand.

"So anyways this other guy comes in and he's all 'I am a Duke, the Queen is going to kill you all', you know the usual stuff. So I tried to stab him but he threw me through a window and then set fire to the stables I landed in. Now," Archer firmly stated, "I could have taken him."

"Of course," I agreed, without the faintest hint of irony.

"But I know how worried you get and I'm a good friend, so I came back instead. Grabbed some fae, stabbed it to get its attention and now here I am."

She flapped her hand again.

"Report over," she cheerfully told me.

I ripped a salmon from its hook and threw at her head, ignoring the loud protests about respect due to those wounded in the line of duty.

"Masego," I said. "Please heal this idiot, then scry Hune's staff. Adjutant is to drop whatever he's doing and wait for us at the frontlines. It's time to end this."

The fae, I learned when he got in touch with Hune, apparently thought the same: the Immortals had come out.

It went downhill from there.

danh3107

So that was just level one huh, time for Catherine to light the bonfire and spend her souls.

nineran

But if she rests, the enemies respawn! :laugh:

ArkhCthuul

Hehe...Actually once our GM did exactly that.
"This is no d and D dungeon, morons, be glad there are only twice as many now!" were his words, to be exact.
Only one of us survived that dungeon...

Letouriste

That GM know his stuff:) must be fun

Cpt. Obvious

And more than four years later I finally got the joke.

Big Brother

I love Archer so much. How can I get that level of attitude in my life, as a friend or SO?

nesquarx

Be very careful what you wish for.

Big Brother

If this is the first time one of my wishes gets granted, I'm perfectly fine with that. If I can survive being hit by a bus and having a 400+ lb boulder roll over me, I might be able to survive Archer.

Thenre

Be the change you want to see in the world.

Big Brother

Oh, you don't want me to start acting like Archer. That's a recipe for chaos.

Gunslinger

Ohh this is brilliant. I had my lips wide grinning the entire time.

Ohh and vote for The Guide here <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

stevenneiman

Thank you for the reminder. We're currently in fourth place, which is pretty cool.

Robert Allaband

We all knew a larger quantity of Goblin Fire was going to come in someplace and burn the city down. Now we know where.

Saktiwijayarahman

Ah, Catherine and her sense of humor never cease to amuse me. That last line sounds ominous, though. Can't wait for the next chapter.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Cat shot first!

nextgidea

Time for some verifiable predictions:

Book V is not going to be about Procer, or at least they will not be just about Procer. Big Bad would be certainly something much much higher tier. My Top predictions:

- * Elves of Golden Bloom
- * Golem Nation
- * Dead King
- * Calamities including Ranger Plus Malicia and Scribe

Book V would see some enemies turned friends. I think Diabolist and Wandering Bard are my top picks here. (and I believe that Tyrant would not be joining them – too different)

*****

In the short term, I am feeling really stupid, since I am guessing at this point I should have been able to guess what Cat has told Thief to do in this battle, but I have absolutely no idea.

JK

Thief was going to steal the standards that give the Immortals power.

Morgenstern

Yeah, that one was pretty obvious. Though there might have been a "side contract" not quite as revealed. 😊

Nguyen Hong Hai

Also when will know how was the talk between Cat and Killian before the fight?

Cpt. Obvious

They were short and nonexistent.

Someone has a problem talking of her feelings, and someone else feels she's massively disappointed the other but can't really understand why...

Sebastien

I agree diabolist has a chance.
But as more or less an eternal being for good, I am not sure I see how bard switches sides

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I like you and all, but calling yourself "an eternal being for good" is a bit extreme don't you think? XD

Sebastien

Perhaps an eternal being for passing fair?

nipi

Golem Nation? Where has that been mentioned?

I really doubt that Diabolist or that bard will become friends.

Big Brother

Think he meant Gnome Nation.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Can't be gnome nation, the gnomes have powered flight and shit, they are an order of magnitude stronger than anyone else

Sadpanda

Don't the Gnomes literally destroy whole civilizations that get too powerful? I think they are way above any of the others.

Dainpdf

They destroy civilizations that get too technologically advanced. Whether they can take on stuff like the original elf nation, the kingdom under, the kingdom of the dead or the Hegemony easily remains to be seen.

Snoogle

I'm continuously in stitches over the interaction between our happy villains. The banter in this story is simply divine.

Pipiemman

The thing I think I'm most curious about is Catherine's changing/changed necromancy. I don't know why, but my first inclination is that it's not just a quick but somehow name driven. (The current) Black may not have any special connection to his mount, but horses to be tied pretty closely with their knights. Maybe this is a precursor to Catherine getting a counter to White's Ride aspect?

Or maybe it's just nothing to do with that and the main focus should be on the necromancy itself, not the horse.

Keyen

It has been a while we know Cat's Necromancy is special. Masego told her she shouldn't be able to use it on living limb (when she use it on herself). What happened here is actually the reverse. The limbs were something living which could be used as something dead, and the horse is something dead which has some living tendencies.

Big Brother

Well, Cat's already drawn 2 new names into her group, Adjutant and Heirophant, maybe she's moving into a new one as well. This is gonna sound cheesy as a French social gathering, but maybe Death Knight? She does seem to have a tendency towards spreading Death and Chaos wherever she goes lately. Personality in undead constructs and self-necromancy are pretty useful in that regard.

Keyen

I don't think the tendency she has lately (namely her obsession with crushing anyone named) is a good sign. One of the possible ending I see to the story would be a "lich ending" (alliance with the Dead King), where anyone is dead (so nobody can get a name anymore). Since she is using ice, shadow and necromancy, it would fit perfectly. She just need a very traumatic event (for instance, she loses her friends during the Crusade) and she can be rolling with that.

MetruX

That... Actually sounds like something that could happen. I won't be betting on that, ohh no, but it is a possible outcome, with plenty foreshadowing... And one I would very much like more than Black Knight. I mean, she is all about breaking the classics, so staying in a classic Name sounds... Meh, it wouldn't be so fun. Still, with erraticerrata, you never know, it might aswell be Black Knight in a way never seen xD

mavant

I'm crossing my fingers for Queen of Air and Darkness.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Where in any Calernian culture do you find a "Death Knight"? That's where names come from generally, not from the Named themselves.

I don't understand where Heiropphant came from though

Big Brother

The Kingdom of the Dead?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Ha! Nice try though xD

TideofKhatanga

I think the focus should be on neither. Black has described Catherine as "[Someone] who will use what she can't break and break what she can't use". Which is, I think, the most basic truth about her. Her first set of aspects were [Learn – Struggle – Seek] and the second is [Take, Break, Fall], which are basically aspect versions of the above description.

Her necromancy turning the useless living into the useful dead, and the unwilling dead into the willing un-living is another manifestation of that. I don't think it means anything precise about her next Name, besides that it will have some variation of "use" and "break" as aspects. But it does means that she's getting real close to her Name and might be transitioning soon.

Matthew

I thought this episode had a bit too much of casually used "thrilling heroics."

The Calamities became the Calamities by carefully rationing out the crazy name stuff they could do and not wasting time on useless banter. When they did banter, it was because they had planned accordingly

That Cat is so cavalier about "surprising" Masego didn't sit well with me. It just seemed like the kind "villains undone by their own villainy" BS that Black would have beaten out of Cat a long time ago.

Letouriste

Banter between friend keep the gods entertained so they have more chance to live long. black and the others have decades of villainy behind them so maybe the banter died down with age.

Dainpdf

I wouldn't call surprising Masego "villainy". And Cat has always straddled the line between Villain and Hero. Plus, it doesn't seem she's spent that much up to now. Only one aspect of hers, one winding of Masego, and one or two of Hakram's aspects. There's still plenty left to throw at the Duke.

nineran

This group uses the heroic tropes too, and they can because none of them have purely evil names – so the bantering will probably keep Archer alive through almost anything, since she is their current comic relief. Heirophant is their serious, straight man, and Cat is the tired leader, Adjutant is the herder of Cats, and Thief is the silent outsider.

As an aside, anyone else notice parallels to the White Knight's group?

I'm now really curious if Black will be able to deal with that group after all, especially now that losses of that hero/villain paired group are both at 1.

Dainpdf

My bet is he keeps winning battles and losing the war.

ereshkigala

The Calamities have less banter between them because they're, like, old fogeys whereas Cat and Co. are teenagers/young adults. I mean, typical teenagers in gangs do even more stupidly flashy stuff and there aren't even any names involved.

Matthew

But the way the world works according erratic is that Names push people to be more over the top. The Calamities worked because they fought against the push of their names to overreach and rely on the thrilling heroics. They used planning to defeat the Narrative.

This battle is incredibly important for Cat. Masego is one of their Trumps when it comes to hunting the Summer Queen. Cavalierly messing with him makes this battle not seem serious.

The problem with the way the group is running now is that they seem more like heirs to Lone Swordsman's old group rather than heirs to the Calamities.

Adra

I think this goes back to what someone pointed out when Ranger named them the Woe- no one in Cat's group has an inherently villainous name. The fact that Cat's thrilling heroics tend towards effect could be evidence that her group is going to straddle the line between hero and villain.

Dainpdf

The Lone Swordsman's group was dysfunctional. They didn't have banter in the way Cat's group does. As for carefully planned encounters, Cat does lack some of Black's careful approach, but she does prepare for encounters and arrange for tricks – just reread the encounter with the count, or the battle of four and one.

The Woe is heir to the Calamities, but they are still their own group. And, as has been pointed out repeatedly, they toe the line between hero and villain.

Luis

The thing is they are subverting the hero's party trope for evil ends. The calamities were similar, but they got through by using Black's intimate knowledge on the relationship of cause and effect on the current narrative and almost always knowing their place in it. Much like Bard does. Black and Malicia ended the self-destructive forms of evil for a more collaborative form that would be a precursor to the new party we are seeing now...

Catherine tries to make herself the hero for every story she is in...even if she is a villain, because while she may be a "villain" she can play a heroic one in certain circumstances.

Then on top of that she is villain who is currently defending her homeland which should give her all kinds of points.

Even as a villain she is still trying to do right by her people, and other folks in her tribe, she doesn't fully embrace the tower and its most egregious evils, while still submitting to its overall authority, she has astounding personal charisma and the ability to rally her troops. Native born callowans and presi alike.

So she is definitely doing something new.

Dainpdf

She seems to have some natural talent at the trickery aspect of things. I think one of the interludes showed that, with an outside perspective showing her to be quite good at diplomacy...

Well, the stabby kind at least.

She just waves over a lot of that, partly because it increases dramatic tension when we don't know her plans.

Chapter 43: Cliff

"Of course not, did you see the height of that drop? That is the last we've seen of the Shining Prince, I assure you."

– Dread Empress Sinistra IV, the Erroneous

Historically speaking, villains leading assaults against a numerically inferior force situated atop a hill did not lead to the kind of outcome I would prefer. That was a problem. On the other hand, if I didn't lead an assault against those hills Summer would still have a decent chunk of its army left when the Queen arrived. That would be a much bigger problem. On the other hand, if I ended up with most my armies dead by the time we got a royal visit I would be fucked regardless. The Queen wouldn't negotiate with a host on its last gasps, even if hers was wrecked. It would also give a lot of power to my 'allies' in Arcadia I'd rather they didn't have, given that they were literally incapable of not being treacherous. Kind of like High Lords, really, only they were less smug about it.

"This is a dilemma," I noted, squinting ahead.

The Immortals had come out to play. Pouring out of the castle on shining wings, they'd propped up the regulars holding the ring of walled properties around it and by the sound of the horns that were now blaring they were about to begin a counterattack. I'd pit the Fifteenth against regulars any day, especially if we had dug in positions, but the golden fae were another story. By my reckoning, they were physically on par with what I'd been able to do when I'd still been fresh to my Name. There were, unfortunately, ten thousand of them. No, I corrected silently. Less than that. Both Masego and I must have taken out a chunk of their numbers in Arcadia and I could hardly believe they'd scythed through both Nauk's men and fought of the Watch simultaneously without taking some losses of their own. Let's be generous, I thought, and assume nine thousand are left. That felt a lot like saying it wasn't as bad to have a sword tearing into your lung rather than entirely through.

"We can't retreat," Hakram said.

Brawling with another titled noble fae had not done wonders for Adjutant, it was plain to see. He had a nasty cut across his cheek that was going to scar even after healing magic had been poured into it and he had a black eye already turning dark green. The fact that the pauldron on his armour was loose hadn't escaped my notice either. That likely meant his opponent had dislocated his shoulder so hard it had ripped out the steel bands. For all that, he was standing and steady. Couldn't ask more of him. His words only sunk in a moment later. He wasn't wrong, not exactly. If the Fifteenth gave ground now we were abandoning fortified positions in favour of a street fight with opponents that could fly. They were a lot better at skirmishing than we were, I had to admit. On the other hand, I'd put my hand to fire that after the first wave of regulars softening us up the second would be Immortals. Those would tear through walls like wet parchment.

"Masego," I said. "Scry me Juniper."

I'd gathered most of the Woe on a flat rooftop before we went on the offensive, in part to catch our breath and in part to try to find a weak point for us to break through. Masego had also taken the time to dig the arrows out of my back and heal the wounds, prompting the inevitable jokes about having been stuck with fae wood by Archer. It'd taken long to get everyone there, to my dismay. We must be past First Bell by now, and if the presence of so many fae hadn't warped the passing of time too much that meant we had only about two hours until dawn. At this time of the year, two hours before Morning Bell was when the sun started peeking through. Hierophant no longer needed his trinkets to scry, I saw. He drew a circle in the air that shimmered like water and heartbeats later one of the mages attached to Juniper's headquarters appeared on the other side. My general shouldered him aside before long, her face looking comically large in the circle.

"Catherine," she said. "What went wrong?"

If the situation was slightly less dire I would have made something of that, but I didn't have the time to spare. The fae were mobilizing.

"Immortals reinforced the outer ranks," I said. "They're preparing for a push, if I'm not mistaken."

The request for advice went unsaid, but she heard it anyway. The orc grunted in displeasure at the news.

"Begin Operation Candlelight immediately," she said. "And hit the walls before they sally. If we don't keep up the pressure we lose Old Dormer."

I grimaced. We both knew that would mean brutal casualties for the Fifteenth. I'd known this was not going to be a clean battle or an easy one, but sending so many of my men to die still left a bad taste in the mouth.

"What's the situation on the other fronts?" I asked.

"Deoraithe are getting fucked to the east," she bluntly said. "Fae drew them in and set the entire sector on fire. General Afolabi had scattered the host at our back, but they're still harassing. There'll be no reinforcements from the Twelfth or the Fourth."

"Shit," I said. "Kegan tried to send in the Watch, didn't she?"

"Had to threaten putting her in chains to shut that down," Juniper growled. "They're already headed your way, not that she's happy about it."

The Duchess of Daoine had always been the largest liability in this. There'd been a risk she'd scrap the entire operational plan if she thought she was losing too many men. We'd made a deal for her to help me with the fae in exchange for a crossing and backing against Diabolist, but she'd always put the interests of the Deoraithe above everything else. I had a feeling Juniper's threat had been a lot more colourful than just chains, and I was glad she'd lost her temper. If Kegan started acting out the delicate balancing act that was this battle could very well collapse on our heads.

"See you on the other side, Hellhound," I said.

"Don't die an idiot, Foundling," she dismissed, and the scrying link died.

"She's growing on me, I'll admit," Archer noted.

"You say that about everyone that insults me," I sighed.
"Hakram?"

"I'll get this started," the orc replied.

I let him leave without comments. It was Legate Hune that had the scrying connections to Robber and his cohort of miscreants, though the orders about resuming the offensive would have to be carried to Nauk as well.

"So, candlelight. Are we romancing the fae now? Bold move," Archer mused.

"We're going to burn them out," I said. "Assaulting the castle was always going to be bloody as all Hells, so we planned to hem them in with goblinfire."

"Doesn't that burn uncontrollably?" Archer said.

"It can be delayed with ditches," Masego noted.

"Ditches dug through pavestone?" the woman mocked.

"It does," I broke in before that could degenerate further.
"It'll be a race for us to break through the front before we're neck-deep in green death as well. To be honest I'd rather burn them out entirely, but Hierophant says we need to hold the beachhead to contain the Queen."

"Summer has prepared a crossing point," the mage said. "She'll still be able to cross without it, if after a delay, but then we would not know where. That complicates warding a great deal."

Archer cleared her throat.

"So, just to be sure, the plan is to set fire to a castle and then charge into it?" she said.

"That's oversimplifying a lot," I protested. "There are nuances."

"Your general's going to be pissed you disobeyed," she grinned.

Yeah, that battle was already lost. Better get out with as much dignity as I could manage. I strode to the edge of the roof and sharpened my vision. Hakram had waste no time, I saw. The Fifteenth was already forming ranks for the assault and moments later green bloomed in the distance. Then again. To the left and the right of the castle. There would be another foyer behind it, I knew, though the ramparts hid it away from me.

"All right, we move," I said. "We've got until dawn to kill us a duke."

At this point I wasn't holding a shield so much as an arrowcatch that occasionally got set on fire. I wiggled my fingers around the latest arrowhead, that had come a little too close to comfort to carving straight through my thumb. Goblin steel didn't do much to block those when there was that much sorcery behind them.

"Hierophant, if I become a godsdamned porcupine because you're being a perfectionist I will be cross," I snarled.

Archer, standing behind Hakram and the tower shield he'd claimed for the assault, put an arrow in the eye of the enterprising fae who'd come so close to lowering my amount of fingers. She was a vision, it had to be said. Movements perfectly smooth and fluid, she let loose a shot with every breath and I had yet to glimpse her fail to make a kill. She was clearing out the walls wherever she aimed as swiftly as the fae filled the gaps, quicker on the draw than even Pickler's repeating scoprions had been. Adjutant wasn't doing nearly as well, a dozen arrows stuck in his shield and one gone through his boot. Which he'd had to stomp around to put out the flames that had immediately spread, something I would have enjoyed watching if I wasn't busy standing around like Creation's angriest practice dummy.

"This is complicated work," Hierophant said.

"Gods Below, just burn our way through," I yelled.

The Soninke needed to hurry the Hells up. Around us the Fifteenth was assaulting the walls with ladders, and dying in droves as they did. It wasn't that the ramparts were difficult. They were garden walls, more or less. But the fae had gathered archers behind them and were shooting massed volleys down on my legionaries. Half the ladders had gone up in flames before touching the walls and the fae on them were fighting furiously to keep us from establishing a beachhead. And these are the fucking regulars, I thought. The Immortals withdrew deeper in. The broad avenue that led straight to the castle passed through a fortified gate that Summer had closed and would laugh in the face of a ram: it had a heavy steel portcullis in front of it, protected by thick arches of stone. We'd need sorcery to punch through that, but Masego was dithering like a bloody milkmaid.

"Ah," Hierophant sighed. "Disappear."

I raised my shield to catch another arrow that would have taken him in the throat, glancing over the side. A wave of darkness had engulfed the gate and the rampart bordering it, solidifying for a moment before it disappeared. It left behind absolutely nothing. No stone, no wood, no steel. It was as if nothing had ever existed there at all. Gods. Had he annihilated everything? No, I could feel something at the edge of my senses that was not unlike Arcadia. He'd shunted the entire gate off in another dimension.

"FIFTEENTH," Nauk's voice roared from behind me. "TIGHTEN RANKS, YOU UGLY GRASS-LICKERS. FORWARD!"

The answering shout was deafening, thousands yelling and steel brought up. Woven inside, though, I could hear the soft buzz of arrows that still fell like rain.

"Into the breach," I shouted at the rest of the Woe, barely audible over the pandemonium.

Hakram moved to cover my left and Masego hunkered up behind us, runes of light blooming with but a gesture. Archer put one last arrow through a fae's open mouth before joining up and together we advanced. Our way through the absent gate was uncontested, but in the walled avenue it led into ranks of fae were awaiting us. Black had once compared leading Named into battle to leading a chorus, and as we struck I finally understood why. We were, as a group, greater than the sum of our individual skills. The grooves were already there for us to settle into, as if they'd been carved before we even begun. Archer opened the song. She did not waste her arrows on the rank and file, instead surgically putting down any fae that looked like an officer. Even as we tread the pavestones, they dropped with every heartbeat. Hierophant added his voice to the melody, whispers in the mage-tongue weaving rings of darkness in the fae ranks that bloomed and tore through mail and flesh. The chaos was our cue. Adjutant and I dug into it with relish, a storm of steel and strength that shattered and broke the straw men standing in our way.

My blood sang with the song, the heat of it something not even Winter could deny me. With every stroke and every stride we painted death across the face of Summer, Archer's long knives joining us in the steps without missing a beat. I could feel it without ever laying eyes on it, the swing of Adjutant's axe I could duck under to overextend a screaming soldier and carve through his throat with a flick of the wrist. Hierophant's sorcery flashed across the melee like coils of ruin, passing so close I could feel the caress of the power unleashed without it ever touching me. I could not tell the passing of time, every sight flowing into the other by what could have been an hour or a heartbeat. I felt myself grinning, teeth bared as Summer gave. Fae let themselves die on my blade merely to slow it, others striking in that instant of killing but what did I care? I was not one blade but many, my body just a vessel for my will. Dust swallowed the dead man whole, the edge of the axe dug into the chest of the thing that would have slain me even as I spun and slit the throat of the fae to my side with inhuman precision. Not a drop of exertion wasted, as if slaughter could be measured and quantified.

The four of us stood surrounded by a field of corpses when I returned to myself, not a single living fae in sight. I was panting, though instead of exhaustion I felt invigorated. This, I thought, had been deeper a religious experience than anything I'd ever felt in any House of Light. The sensation ebbed and the absence of it was hollow. Sound returned, the fighting of legionaries behind us and the slow breathing of the Woe around me.

"Shit," Archer croaked softly. "That was... Fuck."

Hierophants' eyes were bright, though his mind faraway. Adjutant looked oddly serene, shield resting on his shoulder as he leaned on the haft of his long axe.

"Yeah," I muttered, and speaking at all felt like I was whistling in a graveyard.

I shook myself out of it before long, and assessed our situation. Making a unified push into the upper city had always been a fantasy, I knew. There were avenues up here, made broad for carriages, but aside from the path that led straight up to the castle the rest was a maze writ by the whims of the powerful who'd once lived here. The Fifteenth had taken the outer walls as we'd been killing what I now grasped had been the reinforcements meant to drive my legionaries back. Now the knife fight began, my men having to spread through dozens of gardens and manors as Summer fought them for every inch.

"Castle's where we need to be," I said, pointing my sword at the faraway silhouette of the tall towers.

I could glimpse spreading green in the distance, a reminder that the fae were not the only enemy we had to beat. The goblinfire had made certain they would not be able to flank us, that they would be forced to fight us in a narrow corridor, but with every hour that corridor became narrower for us as well. Resistance would become harsher the deeper we went in. Archer wiped her longknives on the cloak of a decapitated soldier before sheathing them, running her tongue against her lips. My eyes could not help but linger on the sight as I wondered what kissing her would feel like, and peeling that leather off her. Shit, fighting didn't usually get my blood up this way. It had just felt... intimate, more than killing ever should. I looked away before she could notice. Nauk came to the rescue, thank the Gods, leading up a cohort of legionaries with the Gallowborne at their head. The large orc whistled at the sight of the corpses strewn around us, Tribune Farrier coming to stand at his side.

"Not that looks like it was a proper fucking fight," the legate said. "See that, you wretched layabouts? That's the kind of work I expect from you."

There were a few barks of laughter.

"Legate, Tribune," I greeted, sheathing my sword as I took in the sight the two.

Nauk was grinning and splattered in blood. He'd been leading from the front again. Farrier's mail was scorched on the side, but aside from that he was in good health.

"We're making a push to the castle," I said. "I take it this is our reinforcements?"

"Hune's bastards are handling the flanks," Nauk replied. "Scraped up my only intact cohort and brought your reds and gold along to spice the wine."

"Your Grace," John Farrier said, offering a nod that bordered on a bow.

"Catherine," I sighed.

He'd become irritatingly formal since it had been made open knowledge I'd been named Vicequeen of Callow. It had taken me the better part of a year to wean him off that the first time, and I wasn't looking forward to fighting that war again.

"Keep your eyes open, boys and girls," I called out. "We've got their second line ahead and the Immortals behind that. You're in for a rough night."

"Hells, ain't that every night in this outfit?" someone called out from the ranks.

"Wouldn't be the Fifteenth if we didn't get proper fucked before sunup," someone else laughed.

Well, they weren't wrong.

"Gallowborne take the lead," I told Farrier. "If we run into the Duke, you run."

"Ma'am," the dark-haired man protested. "We're--"

"Ants, to a thing that powerful," I flatly said. "You have your orders."

He nodded, though he didn't seem pleased about it. Nauk was eyeing him approvingly. Loyalty didn't really count for orcs unless you were willing to die for it.

"We done braiding our hair?" Archer drawled. "I'm getting bored."

"There's nothing wrong with braids," Hierophant muttered, putting his own braids in order.

I wisely decided not to touch that and instead gestured for Nauk to call the march. It would have been much harder, I thought, without Archer. We were ambushed from rooftops twice on our way forwards, but between her bow and the line of sappers that was distressingly eager to wreck noble houses given half an excuse we weren't given a serious challenge. That was when I started to get worried. We should have, by now, run into either a barricade or another heavy knot of fae. I let my stride lapse.

"Something's wrong," I said.

Hakram nodded.

"I am no tactician," Masego said, "but it seems poor planning to allow your enemy to gain foothold on your walls. We might have simply spent the strength of Summer, Catherine. They might no longer have nobles to field against us."

I shook my head.

"Remember how many people there were, at the masquerade in Skade?" I said. "Summer should have at least that many."

"Duke hasn't come out, either," Archer frowned. "He didn't seem this shy when we tangled."

I closed my eyes and considered the battle as if I were not part of it. The front in the plains was effectively over, by Juniper's report. The fighting in the east had turned brutal, but given the numbers Duchess Kegan could field it was highly unlikely the fae there had turned the tide. Unless they had flown away, as they'd allegedly done earlier. No, they can't do that quietly. Either one of us would have seen a few thousand glowing wings in the sky or Juniper would have scried Hune with a warning. The forces left in play, then were the remaining regulars in the upper city and the Immortals. And the Duke, followed by whatever nobles he's got left. If I was a Duke of Summer, needing to keep a fortress at all costs and three of sides around it already on fire, what would I do? Immortals would be my sharpest knife, so I couldn't waste them on attrition. So I'd put the regulars on the wall and send the nobles to bolster them.

No, he can't do that. He already sent out three Counts and a handful of solid barons and we just tore through them in less than an hour. Sending nobles against the Woe would be trying to put out a bonfire with oil. Named couldn't advance alone, though, or at least not do so and expect to hold any grounds they took. Which he must suspect we needed to, with how hard we'd been going after the castle. So what he's aiming for is the soldiers. Then why not push harder to hold the walls? Why hadn't we had a rougher fight going in? I mind mind, I watched the Fifteenth die in droves to enter the upper city and then take the fight to the maze of walled and sprawling domains, harassed by a much more mobile enemy every step of the way. But giving ground. Juniper had said, earlier, that the fae to the east had drawn in the Deoraithe before setting fire to the city. They're doing the exact same thing here, I realized. Only they won't burn their own fortifications, they need those to scatter the legionaries. Once they reel us in... In a line across the upper city, golden banners rose high in the sky.

In utter silence, the Immortals advanced.

Gunslinger

I wonder what Masego's name entails exactly. Debunker of miracles is what we know, but it seems to be flexible in terms of what magic he can pull off.

I wonder if it's the analyze how magic works and recreate the miracles path.

stevenneiman

He can clearly control miracles an channel some degree of a godlike being's power without their consent. The Summer Queen's comments made it sound as though each new miracle he witnesses and each new god he interacts with (or vivisects) will increase his power, to at least a maximum high enough to pose a serious threat to even royal Fae, if there is an upper limit at all. I would assume that eventually he would have the power to usurp godhoods whole which is really going to mess with the underdog status that the Woe rely on. Of course, from his perspective it's all more like de-obfuscating and hacking the code gods are written in than anything else.

Aside from that it seems to provide a boost to raw power just like any other magic-based Name, with perhaps a special focus on meta-magical effects and divinations. That sorcery-disruption thing he did earlier seems like the most impressive new trick he's pulled out when he didn't have a god battery handy.

All in all, he is definitely someone to appreciate having on your side, now more than ever before.

esryok

Based on what Masego has said in the past ("power is a consequence of knowledge" + "the godhead is a trick of perspective"), my reckoning is his miracles are driven by his own strength. His Name helping him to achieve the necessary knowledge & perspective, rather than granting him the ability to steal divine power from existing deities.

JankTankJoe

Oh hell, the Immortals are going to have a field day with the fifteenth.

Catherine having a religious experience? Is she going to transition before the end of the book or was fighting as the Woes just that awesome?

That said, while her ability to killmurder people seems to improve by the hour, her grasp of general strategy doesn't really get better. That strikes me as a problem, considering the current bets on her next Name.

rangamal thenuwara

And that's a good thing, right? She has continuously admitted that although she is good at bullying (or in some cases even manipulating) people into doing what she wants them to do, Juniper and Black is better at strategy (Cat can rely on them). We don't want her to become an OP Mary Sue, right?

As long as Cat's strategic failures don't result in real and lasting setbacks (because her slavishly loyal friends will prop her up), doesn't stop her from becoming an OP Mary Sue.

ALKATYN

Assuming that battle thing isn't a fluke that implies there is some sort of name mindmelding thing available. Maybe the calamities could do the same in their prime but lost the ability when they lost Ranger.

We haven't so far seen a group of heroes with anywhere near the same level of coordination. But if the white knight, or whoever, finds his own appropriate temmates that could be trouble

Nastybarsteward

But the Woe weren't fighting as a group, no thief.

Digitize27

I'm still not sure what to think about the name 'The Woe'. Going on convention (As spiritual successors to the Calamities) shouldn't they be The Woes? If I remember right, the original impetus was the last Chancellor saying something like "You are a calamity on this world" (Paraphrasing) So if the Queen of Summer said "You will be Woe unto all you behold" (Paraphrasing again) Shouldn't it be The Woes?

And I understand why you didn't go with that, it just looks wrong on the page, but so does The Woe, to be honest. I feel like something else would have sounded better. The Terrors? The Nightmares? I feel something polysyllabic would have worked best.

Leporello

> Now the knife fight began, my men having to spread through dozens of gardens and manors as Summer fought them for every inch.

I'm reminding everyone that in chapter 32 it was stated that the remaining Duke is the Duke of Green Orchards. Looks like we're about to get a second set of fortifications, now that the first one is burning.

Saktiwijayahman

I wonder if The Woes could perform any better when Thief is present there. I know she isn't a fighting type unless she transcended to a new name, but still ...

I really ship Archer X Heiropant

therealgridlock

I've been hesitating to do any correcting because every chapter has had a dozen typos and I assumed you already had comments on them and either got most of them already or moved on and didn't care, but this I do want to point out:

There is no sinistral, fourth of their name, because you said yourself the highest any dread emperor got to was third, and then they and their entire bloodline were stabbed out of existence. So either you don't actually need to be related to the last one to inherit the name, or earlier you were incorrect.

I don't particularly care which you pick but catherine commented on it specifically because she said the emperor of praes isn't a hereditary thing, because the highest anyone got to was three generations.

Just for your edification.

braxen1

That's already been addressed. In the extra chapter Reign, Malicia says:

"Do you know why I chose Malicia as my reigning name?" she asked. "Maleficent the Third was bandied around by many, before the coronation..."

Relation to a previous tyrant would have been a big deal and has never been brought up so we can assume easily she is not related to previous Maleficents and yet could have taken the name.

I always saw it as similar to when popes take new names in the Catholic Church.

Also I highly doubt the author reads comments on chapters from three years ago.

Chapter 44: Drop

"The only thing more dangerous than being hated by a villain is to be loved by them."

– Dread Empress Regalia II

That made it twice, that the Summer Court manoeuvred me into a situation where there was absolutely nothing I could do. The golden banners flew high, and with every moment they remained there my legionaries would be dying. In tight ranks, with sappers and crossbowmen at their backs, heavies might have a chance against the Immortals. But dispersed across a dozen different mansions, spread out in pursuit? It would be slaughter. And for once, we would be on the wrong side of it. A part of me already grieved the death of those soldiers, though I knew that even greater caution would have made no great difference. If I'd grasped the enemy's intent here, Juniper likely had an hour ago – and she'd still sent us in, because this battle was against dawn as much as against the fae. Another quieter, calmer part of me was already tallying how many losses the Fifteenth would incur and assessing whether it would cripple us before the fight against Diabolist.

I didn't always like the woman I'd become. It was a damningly short walk from we need this whatever the cost to one sin, one grace. That my shade of ruthlessness was different from Black's was cold comfort. It sometimes occurred to me, in the dark of night, that if I got my and settled Callow I'd be the last monster remaining in it. It was an unsettling thought but remembering the girl I'd once been, the one who'd once thought that there was no need for monsters at all, brought as much disgust as it did rue. Keeping my hands clean clean wasn't going to stop armies marching, or fields unburnt. It wasn't going to do a single fucking thing except make myself feel more righteous. And still, once in a while, I couldn't help but wonder what it would have felt like to be proud of the tired woman that looked back when I stood before a mirror. I clenched my fingers and let out a long breath. Whining about the price I'd had to pay to get a seat at the table wasn't going to change anything.

Blood had been spilled, there was a foe ahead of me. They would break or I would, it was as simple as that.

"Combat formations," Nauk barked. "Time to earn your ghelsin'in pay, children."

Kharsum, that. Meant fuck, basically, though with the implication of going at it from behind. Wonderful language, Kharsum. Had more variations on 'fuck' and 'eat' than any other tongue I'd come across, which honestly said quite a bit about them as a people. There were no Immortals in sight yet, but a banner had risen ahead. Only a matter of time.

"Catherine," Adjutant said, coming to stand at my side. "We knew it'd be bloody. This changes nothing."

"Think about the tactic, Hakram," I said. "This isn't jaws clamping on our fingers, we lose a thumb and it's over. They'll drive us back to the walls, then the Immortals will retreat and the regulars fill the gap again. They're going to harvest us, one push at a time."

"That sounds bad," Archer whispered at Masego. "You've been in wars before, Zeze. This is bad, right?"

"Don't call me that, you horrid sweaty goblin. And she's Callowan," Hierophant whispered back. "They love farming, do it all over the country. It could be good."

"It's bad, Zeze," I sighed, ignoring Archer's delighted chortle. "The Duke of Green Orchards, if it's really him in charge, essentially turned the outskirts of this place into a meat grinder for the Fifteenth."

"What's the blades, in this tortured metaphor?" Archer asked.

"The Immortals," I replied.

"So we kill the Immortals," Archer mused. "There, problem solved."

"It does seem a fairly straightforward issue," Masego agreed.

Though I had some truly cutting sarcasm to grace them with, I held my tongue. Archer was, well, right might be a bit of a stretch and I definitely wasn't giving her the satisfaction of saying anything like that but there was a nugget of correctness hidden in that boulder of aggressive ignorance. To pull this off, the Duke would have to spread the Immortals in a thin line across the upper city. And if we broke through that, he was in trouble. The castle would be wide open, save possibly for him and a handful of other nobles. That meant either betting this battle on him crushing us, which was risky for him given our highly murderous track record against Summer, or pulling back the Immortals to get in our way. The Woe could, in my opinion, feasibly deal with either the Immortals or the Duke. Both would be beyond us.

"We punch through and he's on the backfoot," I said to Hakram.

"Even if all we manage is to keep the centre from collapsing," the orc replied, "it's a rallying point for the Fifteenth and a funnel for reinforcements. It would turn into a match of attrition he cannot afford."

Neither could we, we were both aware, but what other options did we have?

"Nauk," I called out.

"Warlord," he grinned. "We got a plan?"

"Smash through everything until we've won," I said honestly.

"Ah, the Foundling gambit," he gravelled. "It's never failed us before."

"Don't say that where people can hear, and that's an order," I hurriedly replied.

That kind of stuff had a way of spreading. Legion humour was, uh, more than a little dark. Four hundred men already standing in tight ranks across the breadth of the avenue began their advance after a few yells. The Woe took the lead and I sharpened my senses to watch for the likely ambush that awaited further down the road. Though darkness was hardly bar to my sight, the smoke that was spreading across the sky was. Balls of magelight hovered above the two cohorts, kept going by our mages, but I barely noticed them: what was most visible in my eyes was the bevy of standards in the sky. Which was why, when one disappeared, I immediately noticed. Far left, I thought. Hadn't seen much of what was there, though I'd noticed trees from a distance. Had my legionaries managed to turn back the – ah, Thief was still on the prowl. And aiming to complete her collection, by the looks of it.

"Archer," I said. "How many of the standards did you two manage to take?"

"Half, maybe?" she shrugged. "After the first few they noticed and we had to be more careful, but there couldn't have been more than twenty in all."

And I was currently looking at eight still giving off that golden hue. Thief might not have been much of a fighter, but she was far from useless. I abandoned the train of thought without lingering, as moments later we'd finally come across the enemy. Ahead of us was a roundabout, though a fancier one than any I'd ever seen in Laure. It was wide as a plaza, the avenues circling the statue garden in the centre wide enough for two carriages to share it. Among the alabaster statues of what looked like past rulers of Dormer and a noticeably larger depiction of Eleanor Fairfax – though the sculptor had taken liberties there, since I doubted a knight of her calibre would have ever worn armour that left so much of her tits out in the open – the Immortals had formed a textbook perfect square. Even simply standing around, they were wrecking the greenery of the garden: the trees that weren't already outright on fire were all smouldering, and the grass looked like a mage training yard. The Summer Court's elite had not changed since I'd last seen them. Gold plate set with rubies glimmered under closed armet helmets of the same, heater shields so well-polished they could serve as mirrors filling one hand and ivory halberds the other. Facing them, my legionaries spread across the roundabout. The Gallowborne took the centre, Nauk's cohort split to cover the flanks.

"Summer Triumphant," an Immortal from the front ranks called out.

Two hundred halberds slammed down in perfect unison, flickers of flame spreading from where they touched the ground. The words had not been spoken in any language I knew, and hardly been words at all. They'd been the crackle of wildfires, the clash of steel and the spilling of blood on hungry earth. Summer's the season of war, Archer had once told me. Their words rang of that truth, a boast that rattled the night air.

"KILL THEM," Nauk screamed.

"TAKE THEIR STUFF," the Fifteenth screamed back.

We charged, wings enveloping their flanks as smoothly as if this was a practice battle. Like sea against rocks, I thought. The halberds rose, the halberds fell, and there went the first rank of my legionaries. As streaks of lightning filled the air and sharpeners were thrown in long arcs, Adjutant and I rammed into the enemy. It was not like fighting the regulars. They did not give, when my sword struck their shields. And there was no slapping aside a strike of those halberds. No match for me in strength, perhaps, but not that far either. No wonder they broke the Sword of Waning Day, when they fought. Winter's sharpest blades were rusty knives compared to these. Hacking my way into their formation was like taking an axe to an oak. My first blow hit a shield without purchase and bounced off, the halberd taller than I was sweeping down to tear through my shoulder in answer. I had to stick close to the Immortal to avoid it, and doing that felt like rolling around in a pile of embers. They heat they gave out wouldn't melt my plate, maybe, but it would heat it until it scalded to the touch given long enough.

It took Adjutant and I working together to pry the line open. His shield got a halberd stuck and the tip of my sword pierced just over the tip of the enemy's, sliding into the opening between the helmet and the gorget. The blood that coated my blade when it withdrew was smoking, but the fae was dead. I kicked the enemy down and forced my way into the gap even as the Immortal behind that one advanced, trying to force me back with his shield. From the corner of my eye I saw Adjutant's knees give as the shaft of a halberd struck his shoulder and that distraction cost me. The side of my shield caught the halberd's point at the very last moment, hard enough to change the angle from my chest to my forearm. The ivory went through plate and I screamed as fire burned in my veins. I would have had to give ground, if Archer hadn't come to back me. Slithering around my shield she struck high, plunging a longknife in the Immortal's throat and spinning to throw herself at the man at his side. I ripped out the halberd the corpse still clutched and let Winter loose, the flame smothered by impossibly deep cold. I let the strength linger, and took full advantage of the room she'd carved me.

The Immortals were meant to fight in ranks, the enemy in front, and from the side they struggled. Not the most flexible of weapons, halberds. I slammed my shield in the flank of the Immortal to my left and when he turned snarling Adjutant's axe smashed through his helm and splattered blood. Now that my second was at my side, we began to widen the gap. One of us baited, the other struck. I learned at the cost of what was going to be a nasty scar under my eye that anything but a killing blow was useless on them – they did not seem to feel pain, and baldly ignored wounds. Being on the other side of that was a lot more infuriating than I'd thought it would be. With Archer weaving in and out of our side, knives always moving, we forged a wedge of corpses in the centre of the formation that the Gallowborne filled without prompting. The rest of my legionaries were not doing nearly as well, I saw when I got a rare moment of respite.

Hierophant had seen the flanks were failing badly in the face of the opposition and lent them a hand, but the two spells he was working simultaneously took up all of his concentration. A hovering ball of shadow had sprouted tendrils that struck like sledgehammers on the left, while to the right a panoply of small silver circles flew around and shot beams of pale sorcery that not even the shields of the Immortals could withstand without twisting.

We'd killed maybe a fourth of them, fighting tooth and nail for every corpse, and already taken over twice that in casualties. I grit my teeth and pressed on. Attrition would grow more to our advantage the fewer of them were left, and though only the wrecks of two cohorts would emerge from this fight we would emerge victorious nonetheless.

"Sons and daughters of Summer, stand deathless under the sun," a voice thundered.

Oh shit. Did that mean what I think it meant? Behind me, the dead Immortals proved the truth of the name. Great gouts of Summer flame poured out of the wounds, and they rose to their feet – most of them in the middle of the Gallowborne. A dozen of my retinue died in the first heartbeat and I screamed in fury.

"HIEROPHANT," I yelled. "KILL THAT STANDARD."

Before I'd even finished speaking a handful of runes formed just before my eyes, shining blue, and transmuted into a word: warded. Fuck. We weren't the only ones who could use those.

"BATTER IT DOWN," I screamed.

We were way past conserving power for the Duke of Green Orchards. At this rate we'd never even reach him. The detonation that followed rocked the entire plaza, statues flying in pieces and even Immortals being thrown to the ground. I widened my stance and was only blown back a few feet, though Hakram was thrown straight into two legionaries and had to extirpate himself from the mess of limbs and armour. To my horror, when I looked up, a globe golden light shone around the standard as it remained unharmed. Oh, this was bad. I ripped the halberd out of the grasp of an Immortal swinging at me, dropping my shield, and swung it around so that the edge of the blade tore into his skull. He dropped dead like a stingless puppet, but how long would he remain like that? The fae might not be able to pull that trick as often in Creation as they could in Arcadia, but how many times would that mean? Four, nine? My legionaries couldn't even afford for it to happen twice. I would have called out to Archer, asked her if she had anything in her quiver that could take care of that, but she was busy trying not to get skewered by a pair of very angry Immortals.

It was a shiver, or at least that was how it felt to see it. It spread from the left flank, slithering through the thick ranks of Immortals and only turning into something real when the silhouette emerged out of thin air. Thief put a foot on a shield meant to smash her down, using it as a foothold to move to the shoulder of another Immortal. The fae tried to shake her off but she was already moving, jumping off the helm of an Immortal and somersaulting in the air. She went through the golden globe like it wasn't there at all, hand snatching the standard at the apex of her leap and spiriting it away in a heartbeat. I felt the impact before she'd even begun to come down, the way every Immortal on the field flinched. I grinned, right up until the moment she was engulfed in apple-green flames and began screaming. Wings ablaze with eerie light, the Duke of Green Orchards stood atop the battlefield with mild disinterest writ on his face. A single hand held up, he kept Thief aloft and burning seemingly without effort.

I furiously tried to break through the Immortals ahead of me, but their ranks had tightened and the halberds were keeping me back. They weren't going for a kill, just delaying me. It was Hierophant that managed to step in.

A gust of wind blew out the flames and Thief's blackened body was dragged back behind the lines through the air. Gods, her entire hair was gone. She was scorched, but breathing and moaning in pain. Masego immediately began healing her, but she was done for the night. For more than that.

"Lady Foundling," the noble fae greeted me politely. "It appears this affair will come to close momentarily. Perish."

The nightmare began. Before he'd finished speaking I'd leapt off my first ice platform and was about to land on my second, and Archer had sent her first arrow flying for his eye. The shot went through the silver flames that appeared when it got close, but it slowed enough the duke caught it with his hand, crushing the wooden shaft to powder. The other hand had lashed out with green flame, a small orb of it tumbling towards me. The size of an apple, and the exact colour. Fuck. I'd thought for sure he'd be more like the Count of Green Yew, and hoped the torched trees would mean he was limited in his power, but he obviously had a work around. That first hit on Thief had been nowhere as strong as what I'd seen some dukes and duchesses pull out, but it was still exceedingly dangerous. A twist of will had a platform to my side forming and I took a turn there to avoid the throw, frowning when I saw the apple kept tumbling down. Was he really unable to redirect those? Oh Merciless Gods, I realized. I lashed out with ice, trying to keep the explosion contained when it hit the Gallowborne, but it was too little and too late. Then dark globe of ice was torn through almost instantly, green flame pouring out and consuming a full tenth. It moved from there, devouring men as the Duke calmly moved his hand to guide it.

Hierophant struck directly at him, a dozen spears of what looked like water-like shimmering iron getting stuck in the silver flames as they kept pushing at it. The fae grunted and the green fire gutted out. I should have advanced, but my eyes remained on the half-bare skull of Tribune John Farrier. Most his body was gone, even bones turned to ash. On all front of the melee the Fifteenth was giving ground, step by step as halberds tore through mail and plate. I'd known John for over a year now. Had fought by his side, bled with him and laughed with him. I'd liked him and relied on him. And he'd been swatted down carelessly, like a fucking insect.

Creation grew muted.

I could feel it all deeper now. Feel the night grow thicker, until the sight of the moon in the sky was obscured. Feel the beating from the shard of Winter that was my heart slow, and then cease entirely as I drew deeper from that well than I ever had before. My breath came out steaming and my plate crackled as frost spread over it. I peered at my anger, at my fear and calmly picked them out. I fed them to the cold, let them disappear into the flow until nothing was left at all. I'd always held back, I knew that deep down. I'd ripped the mantle of a god from its corpse and still acted the mortal. Wanted to be just Catherine Foundling. All these worries of humanity and remaining someone I could stand. The whining of a petulant child. I would be whoever I needed to be to keep my people alive, and damn me for flinching in the face of that truth. Beneath me the Immortals stirred and I felt the threads coming from them, those that had once bound them to the banner even in death but now lay inert. I reached out for them, two hundred threads growing into rivers as I forced the power of Winter through them. There were screams, there were curses and shaking and clawing at their armour. It made no difference to me. The Immortals died like flies, falling to the ground under the weight of my mantle.

"Rise," I ordered, and they did.

Blue eyes burning behind their visors, the pride of Summer gripping its weapons as wings of ice spread from their backs.

"Shit," Archer muttered, still among them. "That doesn't look good."

My gaze met the Duke of Green Orchards' and the man smiled.

"Ah," he said. "And now we finally meet, Duchess of Moonless Nights."

The trees in the garden below burst into green flames, apples forming by the dozens and dropping from the branches without missing a beat. I moved with four hundred wings, my snarl on the lips of every Immortal. A storm of green flame swallowed the world, and the battle began in earnest. For the first heartbeat, it was only the two of us. I could sense his will in the flames, shaping them as men and beasts to fight my Immortals. They rose into the sky, pursued by Summer wrath, and Hierophant struck again. I saw his will slip into the green, follow along that of a lesser god and learn its workings.

"Shape is intent," the blind man whispered. "Intent fractures."

Like picks in stone, the Hierophant's will struck at the sorcery and collapsed it. With a sound like a bell the flames reverted into apples, hanging harmlessly in the air, and my Immortals buried the Duke in a storm of blades. For a heartbeat all that could be seen was a pile of armour and ivory, until branches grew out. A globe of wood was spreading, swallowing the Immortals as it did, and I could feel them struggling against the crushing pressure inside. It would not save him. My will buried like a blade in the minds of the imprisoned corpses, forcing Winter into them until their bodies were overfilled vessels. One after another they burst, ice digging into the wood and tearing it from the inside. It groaned and broke, then the Duke burst out from the top in a shower of shards. Archer's arrow would have torn through his knee, if he hadn't caught it. He raised a mocking eyebrow.

Then it blew.

Hissing in pain, his fingers shredded, he seized the floating apples again. I ignored that, plaques of ice forming under my feet as I ran across the sky to him. The flames exploded as I felt Archer tap the back of one of the surviving Immortals. Without even glancing in her direction, I sent the corpse aflight with her hanging on the back. We reached the Duke at the same time. The fae pulled the fire to him, but through ears not my own I heard Hierophant speak.

"Burning is transmutation set by boundary," he said. "Boundaries are mutable."

His will rang like a bell and the fire intensified, beginning to burn even itself until all that was left was a single flame that guttered out. Archer and I leapt together as the enemy's face darkened and he allowed himself to fall, the burnt out husks that were the trees below us collapsing into a hunks of burning wood that gathered to him in a protective shield. I grabbed Archer by the arm and tossed her at it, leaping down from a platform to follow. Her blades dug into the shield to no avail, and so did my sword. Frost spread from where I'd struck, putting out the flames but little else. A hand lightly touched the globe, Thief's scorched face grim as she leaning against Adjutant.

"Steal," she coldly said, and the shield disappeared.

Beneath it the Duke of Green Orchard's eyes were wide. Seven wooden pillars formed around the fae, followed by four runes linked by pale light. The same binding Hierophant had used against the Princess of High Noon. The duke's body grew rigid and Archer's blades dug through his abdomen on both sides, straight into his lungs. I did not bother to speak. My blade ran straight through his neck, spider webs of ice spreading from the wound as life winked out of him. I panted, slowly, and felt the remaining Immortals collapse one after another. Nothing but corpses, now.

"Hierophant," I said. "Destroy the corpse."

He did not quibble. Hazy power devoured the remains, leaving nothing behind, and slowly I returned to myself. I'd taken four hundred men into battle. Sixty still lived, most of them wounded. All that remained of the roundabout was a smoking, broken wreck.

"Nauk," I croaked. "Where is Nauk?"

I strode through the ash and corpses, shouldering aside a legionary and glaring at the first officer I found. She paled, shivering.

"Where is your legate, lieutenant?" I seethed.

"Ma'am," she stammered, "he's..."

I saw the few remaining mages attending to the wounded as best they could, yellow light covering their palms. I could see Nauk among them. He was not moving, his breath faint. The left side of his face had been made a burnt eyeless husk, and the arm on the other side ended at the shoulder. They were not healing him. Fury spiked, the pavestones under me cracking.

"You," I said, hoisting the closest mage by the chest. "Why aren't you healing him?"

He only babbled uselessly, so I dropped him.

"There's nothing more they can do, Catherine," Masego said, passing me by as he knelt by the legate's side.

"Then craft me a fucking miracle, Hierophant," I hissed.

He frowned, then drew runes over Nauk. The frown deepened.

"I can keep him alive," he said. "Anything more is beyond me. Parts of his mind were shredded by the fire."

"Do it," I rasped. "Who? Who can heal him?"

Pinpricks of light formed above Nauk, sinking into the body as Masego murmured. The orc's breath grew steadier, but nothing more.

"Father," he said. "Possibly Diabolist. Or..."

He hesitated.

"Tell me," I said through clenched teeth.

"It was fae fire that did this," he said. "Fae sorcery could likely heal it."

I clenched my fingers into a fist.

"Catherine," Adjutant said.

I hadn't even noticed him approaching. Thief was further away, leaning on Archer. Neither of them met my gaze.

"Dawn is coming," he said. "We cannot linger."

I forced myself to grow calm.

"Can you do anything more?" I asked Hierophant.

He shook his head.

"They'd already stopped the bleeding from the stump," he said. "All I did was restore the organs."

"Then we go," I said, turning to the silhouette of the castle ahead. "Let's end this."

Kingbob12

We get so used to Cat winning, that when she loses, it hurts all the more. And here comes the real test. Will Cat let Killian unleash her Fae power to save one of her own? Or hold fast to her principles.

-Mech-

She'll always place her principles over getting power, its been the theme of the story for a while. Yes, there's the statements about 'Justice is for the Just' and all that, but that only comes into play when she's engaging the 'Good' guys. (Like seriously, why can't we have a single sympathetic good character) Otherwise, everything to do with dark magic is a no-no.

Okay, I'll admit I'm being a little, sorry, very obnoxiously prissy about this, but its getting a bit thick with the references about how literally every other faction is more cavalier about human lives.

Gunslinger

I'd say Cordelia is pretty sympathetic.

OldSchoolVillain

The band of heroes that Black is duking it out with is very much more caring about human lives, with the exception being the Bard. And it's implied that The Lone Swordsman was . . . irregular, in his approach to heroism. We just don't see much of other factions that care about collateral damage, is all, because we're seeing Cat's perspective and Cat's enemies.

stevenneiman

That's kind of the point. Black is trying to prove that Evil can meaningfully win, and Cat is trying to prove that people with some shred of compassion can.

nipi

I dont know the white knight seems like the kind of guy that would flip a coin on to decide the fate of countless lives and say "Heavens will be done".

beleester

But on the other hand, the coin seems like it actually **does** reflect the will of heaven, to the point that Black got smacked down by an angel for trying to interfere with it. So listening to what the coin says isn't as crazy as it sounds.

Abrakadabra

It is crazy. You know, listening to unknowable aliens, and deniing responsibility for your actions...

sheer_falacy

Except the Heavens are jerks.

On the other hand, I don't think the White Knight would do the coin thing to random people. He kind of knows that angels aren't nice.

Cpt. Obvious

True about Hanno not flipping the coin for everyone. His patrons are absolutists, so either you are innocent or you are guilty. And almost everyone is guilty of something. Ever been jealous of someone? Guilty! Lusted after someone in a relationship with someone else? Guilty! Kicked an apple from a tree on someone else's property without asking? Guilty!

I used classic Christian sins as an example. In the Guideverse these may or may not be considered sins, but a lot of other banal things will be sins. And those are all judged.

If Hanno were to flip the coin for everyone he saw he'd be cutting a wide swath of death wherever he went.

So he chooses for whom he will flip the coin of justice, and yet he claims he's not judging.

That's bullshit.

Cpt. Obvious

And the spellchecker strikes again!

Kicked an apple...

Should be:

Knicked an apple...

I'm sure there's more examples of spellchecker mayhem, but I'm too tired to go looking for them.

Nastybarsteward

Hmm, but there is also the greater question of whether good is right and evil wrong.

I think a few heroes, esp bard, have tip-toeing towards being more wrong than right, and Catherine has definitely been trying to do right with evil.

Dainpdf

I think *Cat* got too used to Cat winning.

corrado alamanni

Another step from humanity another reason less to care for people done to save them.

Another step towards black

soonnanandnaanssoon

Your WildBow is showing, erraticerrata.
P.s amazing chapter btw.

esryok

Yep, right about at "... through ears not my own I heard Hierophant speak" I had a "Queen Administrator would approve" moment.

Gunslinger

This hurts so bad. I must be a masochist cause I read it twice. Brilliant chapter and Ohh man the queen is up next.

Big Brother

Holy shit, I have been waiting for Cat to go Nuclear Winter for so long. Sucks that Farrier had to die to do it, I liked him. But Cat's Necromancy just took a massive step forward, using Winter to control the Cold of the Grave and raise all those Summer Immortals into her puppets.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What was there to like about Farrier? He wasn't very fleshed out. I remember him mostly as a jerk. Wasn't he racist or something?

esryok

The Lone Swordsman was racist, but to me Farrier always embodied the Callow's "we'll even the score someday" theme. He held a grudge against greenskins because one killed his grandfather, scorned Procer because of its past transgressions, and hated the Empire because of the Conquest and its general moral bankruptcy.

He was also fairly collegial with Adjutant, and freely praised the competence of greenskins in the Fifteenth.

And of course was devoted to Cat, 'cause she's more or less the second coming of the Queen of Blades.

stevenneiman

He was raised racist, but I found him all the more sympathetic for the fact that he actually tried to not act like it, and he had the respect of a few of the orcs iirc. He hasn't really got much character development since the Gallowborne became a thing, at the Battle of Marchford.

Dainpdf

He wasn't as much a character as a type, overall. He was a symbol of those loyal to Cat, those who follow her unflinchingly into battle. Those who died in droves with every one of her battles.

He also represents those in Callow who see her as a new hope for the kingdom. Well, he and the knight guy.

His death represents how much, not Cat, but the kingdom, has paid for her decisions.

-Mech-

Rest in peace, Tribune. Your duty is done.

Its unfortunate that despite all these deaths, its still likely that Catherine's not going to be able to fight on the scale of the duke. Sure, she broke out the magic this time, but I fully expect that some contrived reason will pop out that she's powerless or drained.

I recognize the need for the protagonist to always be challenged, but it gets a bit stale when every army except the Dread Legions get to break out the special stuff. All they have is going to be sappers and siege weaponry, whilst Fae have super magic, Deoraithe super archers, even diabolist legions of demons. Sure, there's the whole mundane shtick going for them, but conventionally, they should be getting steamrolled by everyone they face. Except for the knights of course, they're special but kept in reserve like a Deus ex Machina.

Hopefully something other than the knights are in the hands of the Fifteenth, otherwise they're just a bunch of mooks that get murked every time Catherine needs to lose out somehow without sacrificing a named character. Yes, a hundred nameless scrubs got massacred here, or there, but it just seems to be overlooked so easily. Although I'll definitely admit, losing the Tribune was a nice touch to remove a named character, albeit a powerless one.

Gunslinger

The diabolist and the fae are outliers. The legion was designed to counter mortal armies, specifically Callowans.

-Mech-

Well, the whole this being a story thing means she's going to be fighting nothing but outliers, unless her enemies suddenly get depowered.

There's the Procerans to consider, I'll concede, but I'll bet that some super magical unknown army comes in specifically to get in Catherine's way. Cos she never gets a break.

Cicero

So in what direction would you take the story? I am not sure what direction you expected the story to take instead of this.

me.me.here

I dunno, Zombie the Third and company seem pretty special, and they'll probably be sticking around for at least a little while. Wouldn't that count?

oldschoolvillain

There's really no reason for Cat to be drained of her power, and nothing to really cause it. The challenges she's going into – the Queen of Summer, Diabolist, the incumbent Crusade – are going to be more than dangerous enough for her without somehow losing her power. Right now she's slugging at a power level somewhere between a Duchess and Princess, but all of the threats above are still a league above that. Diabolist took two Princes of Summer head on, and was willing to duke it out with Princess Sulia before Summer retreated. Procer's Crusade is implied to be backed by dozens of experienced and legendary Heroes who so far have considered Praes to be below their notice. And then there's the Queen of Summer, the Prince of Nightfall, and the King of Winter that Cat still has to deal with. She and the Woe have their hands plenty full as it is – somehow draining her of her power would be trite and meaningless other than to set the uphill battles she's looking at even steeper.

It's possible that a transition to a full Name will cut off her access to Winter – it's tied into her Name of Squire and her Fall aspect – but a final Name will bring whole new levels of power with it that should make up for the loss.

Diabolist was about to be killed by the Summer Princes she was fighting; she'd already used all three of her Aspects and was relying heavily on their power, so if Cat had waited another five minutes before entering Arcadia, she would have lost.

stevenneiman

The point of the Legions is not to rely on anything crazy, and it works. With the way that Fate works they also have a distinct edge against previous Legions just for having a good reason to be there, because past Legions were clearly dredged forth by the narrative because Callow needed Legions to beat back. Of course, they have an advantage with Named on the field, because everyone has an advantage with Named on the field, if they're willing to accept the attendant risks. Also, remember that she's a Callowan beating back the most foreign of all invasion forces, which is an advantage in itself even if not as much as it would have been before the Conquest. The fact that that invasion force relies on crazy bullshit is just icing on the cake, however frustrating it might be tactically.

Dainpdf

As has been pointed out, not relying on flying fortresses and sentient tigers **is** the point of the Legions. This allows them to standardize their maneuvers, have reliable performance, and most importantly not backfire crazily due to some “evil is hoist by its own petard” narrative.

Moginheden

The super magic all of the other forces are relying on has been proven time and time again to backfire or disappear just when you need it most, (see Thief stealing the shield the duke relied on in this chapter.) This is not a matter of the underdog winning, or the story allowing the weaker force to win. This is a matter of how you define strength. The super-magic might make each of your forces worth 100 legion members... but when the legion outnumbers you 200:1, the legion still wins. It's not flashy, and it costs an enormous amount of human lives, (though less than the sacrifice-powered flying fortresses) but it works consistently.

As for Cat being de-powered in the future, that has already been setup in the narrative. It's not contrived. She has a huge power boost from winter, but to win the war against the fae she needs to get rid of ALL fae influence in creation. That includes her own fae title.

Gunslinger

Regarding her well of power though wasn't she already using the max her body could take? She would freeze if she took more? Or has she transitioned into a fae body (extremely unlikely)

rangamal thenuwara

I think the ritual Masego did helps.

nipi

Well the problem for her was getting too chilled. Surely summer makin bonfires helps out a bit too.

oldschoolvillain

She wasn't using the maximum she could draw on after Masego's ritual, but she was starting to feel tired after creating her army-sized Staircase of Doom. She still had an impressive well of power to draw on going into the final stretch of the siege.

Before Masego's ritual though, yeah, she'd have turned her blood to so much crimson ice by now.

esryok

Yeah, she explicitly mentioned her "heart" stopped beating. Sounds like she pushed her blood all the way to frozen, though apparently this isn't as fatal a problem as previously imagined.

Might end up relevant to her past worries about having to murder her way back into being human.

Snoogle

Maybe the problem used to be a fatal one, but the ritual Masego did made it so that her blood freezing isn't lethal anymore.

pyrohawk21

The Forge is ready, the Crucible has been Filled.

The Ore has just been put to the heat, will the Metal be what is needed?

And what shall the Ingot be made into, by the Smith and the Hammer waiting nearby?

Sieral

Oh noes, looks like Catherine will sacrifice some poor folks to use in a ritual to restore Nauk. Though it's entertaining seeing Catherine struggling with her already shaky morals, I'm a little sad Killian will return. It genuinely feels like some cheesy attempt at pandering to me when her and Cat's relationship woes gets trust in my face.

K. Gamm

In Chapter 42, we see that Cat's necromancy can preserve, or revive the personality of her thralls, like she did with the horse. Nauk isn't dead, but Masego speculates that the only accessible way to heal his mind is with Fae magic. We've also seen Cat use necromancy on her still living self to move when badly injured, so it doesn't need to be used on completely dead things. I bet that she uses it, in combination with her natural Fae magic, on Nauk to revive his mind. However, I don't think he will come back exactly the same. It IS a common trope for revived people to come back with their personalities warped, but Cat with her very own Orc whitewalker is too cool an idea to pass up 😊

Panic

God I hope not. The best thing to happen in this book so far is the two of them breaking up. I never liked them getting together to begin with and I did not feel their relationship bringing anything of value to the story at all. Not that Killian hasn't had a part to play but being lovers with Cat is not one I fancy.

danh3107

Man I don't know why it feels kinda shitty to say, but I'm in agreement.

Ashen Shugar

I get the feeling that the "story" would be pushing Cat and Archer towards each other (and other people away), seeing as Black and Ranger had been a couple. It's probably not a big push, seeing as this is like only the 2nd iteration of the story (though there may be some stories of hero parties that would kinda match to make a deeper groove for it to follow) but it might be enough that things "naturally" tend to go that way.

Draighean

If Killian turns into Fae wouldn't she be Summer? Wouldn't she become bound to a Story and loyal to the Queen? Shit could backfire hard.

Shequi

I don't think Killian has summer ancestry because her Fae ancestor was specifically mentioned as being part of the Wild Hunt and we've been told that doesn't exist when Summer does.

nipi

If shes going to sacrifice anyone then they are going to be fae.

Dainpdf

I got the distinct impression that it was more of a "probable chip in the Queen's table" thing, but you raise a good point. Cat specifically said she wouldn't sacrifice people for power itself, but for her friends she would. That's one short lived Chekov's gun.

stevenneiman

They had an enjoyable relationship that broke apart due to politics. It would be realistic for them to try and reconcile, but at the same time it would be realistic for them not to, especially since as was mentioned below Cat is drawing heavily on a story which involved her and Archer's analogs falling in love.

Personally, I liked them as a couple but I feel like if they did come back I don't think the relationship could really work, since I feel like it would have to be something where either one of them won or they found a workaround and then pretended like it didn't matter anymore. I personally agree more with Kilian's attitude that if the justice system is thorough enough in making sure that they really are guilty of crimes serious enough to warrant death, getting some use out of killing criminals isn't any worse. On the other hand, Cat isn't entirely unreasonable in thinking that it creates a perverse incentive towards harsher criminal law that leads to more profitable executions.

*benthelynx*

I loved them as a couple it brought forth a different perspective and dynamic, which was a good change of pace. However this would be a terrible way to get them back together. Not a bad way to drive them further apart though. In the whole allied but with bitter feelings between them.

*DroughtBringer*

Just...

Wow.

Wow.

Wow.

danh3107

Jesus fuck...

Also, Fae aren't human so sacrificing them doesn't really seem like hypocrisy in my book. They're barely even sentient.

nipi

Technically its not human sacrifice. Well depending on how you define human.

Dainpdf

What Measure is a Non Human, anyways? If Diabolist does it, it's probably fine, morally speaking.

Unorginal

They seem very self-aware and capable of feeling, non-sentient would mean they aren't even capable of understanding concepts like pain or emotion, so I'll contest you there as they are clearly sapient if bound to patterns.

But you are right about the sacrifice bit... it isn't 'Human' sacrifice and they're immortal as well so does it really matter *wink wink*.

Unorginal

Ignore the spelling mistakes please, I typed and posted without spell-checking.

benthelynx

Sentient and sapient are two different things. And I'd agree that they have most of the makers of sentience: they are responsive to their senses and are (self)aware. Sapient is closer to wise and that's harder for me to pin down. However they are lacking one of the implied valuable traits we associate with sentience: the ability to make choices based their awareness. Apart from the winter king, it's been strongly implied that they lack that ability; that the decisions they make are closer to programmed reactions than true choices.

Unorginal

The amount of badass makes me need to check my blood sugar levels because holy fucking shit pyrrhic victory it may be but Catherine just doesn't stop kicking ass.

Jabes

Pyrrhic victory? I am seeing Cat sacrificing her personal retinue, including Ferrier and Naul, and a lot of power, to bring down what was going to mince most of her region. Why she gave up things/ people that are very important to her, I think they actually just saved thousands of Legionaires.

Dainpdf

Still a Pyrrhic victory. The cost of the battle, overall, has been huge. She spent a lot of power, Thief is basically done, Masego also spent a lot, Adjutant took a lot of hits, her retinue is fucked, and the Queen has a "heal Nauk" chip on her side of the table.

In the context of the overall war against the Fae, not good. In the context of facing Diabolist after this, still pretty terrible.

kinigget

That moment when the walls come down...

quantum

This chapter was chillingly good. It gave me shivers

esryok

Look, Adjutant! Archer and Thief are bonding!

Cicero

Woe onto all ! That is really going to hit home.

Fanon

Killian not adding anything to the story or relationship is exactly /why/ she broke up with Cat.

Unless Killian can stand on relatively even footing with Cat's named, she's only going to be known as Cat's lover.

If they get back together, it'd be because Killian is no longer absolutely useless and powerless in comparison to Cat. A more equal, balanced relationship.

I'd put decent odds into Cat letting the ritual take place, too. This story is all about principles and what you're willing to sacrifice those principles for in order to accomplish your goals, and what better temptation for corruption than human sacrifice in order to take back your lover and save your friend?

Dainpdf

I was pretty sure it was the fact that Cat couldn't countenance something she thought was obviously okay. You know, the culture clash.

Even if Cat allows the ritual now, they'd still need to resolve this very important difference.

maresther23

Wait... did Cat use the power of love to get a power boost (+motivation) and avenge her loved ones?

George

Well yeah, this is YA and story tropes have actual power IC. Though mostly she just drew further on the power than she would usually be willing to.

Dainpdf

Mostly she just pulled the stops and took full advantage of Hierophant's work.

Skaven

Not sure why everyone's assuming that Cat having Kilian go through with the ritual would involve them getting back together.

It was pretty much stated when they broke up that the values dissonance meant that whatever direction they went with regarding the ritual, they wouldn't be able to stand to remain together.

Barrendur

There's really nothing *wrong* with Killian as a character, but there's nothing *right* either. As readers, we wouldn't know, because Killian is the most ridiculously UNDEVELOPED significant character in the story!

It wouldn't even be fair to call Killian "underdeveloped"; no, she's a cypher, a silhouette, a shadow of a character whose only moment of development came when she broke things off with Catherine – and her reasons for doing so.

Killian's a cardboard figure, with a single promising splash of colour on her. No wonder readers don't like her; we know so LITTLE about Killian that Cat might as well just be masturbating when they go to bed together

Shequi

I wouldn't say she was undeveloped. We know that she has family she cares for, sending half her pay to them, we know some of her aims (& have done since way back in Rat Company), we know she gets a lot of racial discrimination as Duni and part Fae both.

Letouriste

You are exaggerating. like you said we know little about her but that's because we never got her POV and her personality has only being presented by ratface (in an interlude) and cat. and somehow ratface pov had more depth^^.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Wild exaggeration, so much so I can't really credit your original point anymore

Letouriste

...I'm speechless. i so didn't expect that outcome^^.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Nauk's injury/death has been foreshadowed for some time IIRC

Dainpdf

Orcs seem to have a tendency to just throw themselves headlong into battle, and Nauk has always been something of a berserker even among his kind.

Plus, it seems like people under his command die constantly, including that one guy who was a traitor. And whose name I forgot.

Big Brother

Nilin, I believe it was.

Unmaker

I can't say I predicted it consciously, but I have been cringing every time Catherine led Nauk into battle when the other troops were led by her and Adjutant, i.e. Named. She has essentially been asking for this by putting him too close to enemies that only Named can walk away from alive.

dalek955

Anyone want to bet the queen only has one eye when she shows up?
Ranger could really do with a ring on the other hand.

Dainpdf

Or maybe the Queen has a new ring. Would be quite a Worf moment.
...yeah, I know. I almost managed to keep my face straight while typing this.

Reveen

Wow, so the Immortals are basically the coolest motherfuckers in the entire series from an aesthetic standpoint huh?

Also, a soldiers job is to die Catherine. They are currency and your job is to spend them to achieve your strategic goals. Kinda sucks that you're running into this fact now, when it's ones you're personally connected to and not the shitloads who've already did their final duty up to this point.

Shawn Panzegraf

I think Cat's gonna let the Killian ritual go down. She won't make Nauk pay the price for her principles, IMHO. Before it was a Killian-wants-it-done thing. Now it's a dear friend's life on the line. Cat may hate herself for it, but if all it takes to save someone she cares for a lot is a few bodies to drop, she's gonna drop them.

More power to her for it as well. There's no point in having power if you can't tell the rules to fuck off when it comes to the people who really matter to you.

Morals are COLDEST comfort beside a grave that didn't need to be filled.

Dainpdf

Oh shit.

Two things to say about this: one, Cat got too used to winning without sacrificing the people closest to her.

Two, wow. She's getting a bit on the self centered side. First, she talks about the sacrifices *she*had to make when she meant the sacrifices she forced on her homeland. Then she loses people whose name she knows and suddenly the loss is real...

Oh, and third: anyone else connect Sabah and Nauk? Two berserkers, sent into battle by their boss, both dead due to miscalculation. Both causing their bosses to deviate from their courses, in death.

Well, Nauk is still savable.

Shawn Panzegraf

I wouldn't really equate Nauk getting mangled with what happened to Captain. They all knew going up against the Duke after forcing their way past the Immortals was gonna be a horror show from the planning stages. It's not like Catherine flubbed a key decision that lead directly to Nauk getting fried, as Black missed the "All the wagoneers he sent the Monster after were Virgins" angle.

Deft-Blade

Man is it just me, or is Calernia just begging for some paper and pencil action? I feel like a homebrew set in this world would be so fun, the fact that self awareness of Story and Roles actually CONTRIBUTES to immersion is perfect. I feel like the only necessity would be trust between players and DM, as I feel that he/she would have a bit more plausible leeway in Calernia. Now I'm gonna spend the next two hours thinking up rules and structure before ultimately abandoning it, because I am forever alone in my dice rolling endeavors :-:

Barrendur

@Deft-Blade

You are NOT alone! I never thought I'd see pen-and-paper (and actual polyhedral dice!) roleplaying dwindle and diminish unto death in my gaming lifetime, but I'm not giving it up for lost... And yes, the world of the Practical Guide would make a phenomenal roleplaying setting. With Roles and Story, it would have the metafictional elements and sophistication that narrative RPGs once tried so hard to add White Wolf .

Barrendur

Sorry, that should have been... _tried so hard to add (cough) White Wolf (cough)_

BroadAxe

Is there some way to get an email when new chapters go up? 😊

Roger W

Errors:

"if I got my and settled"

"Keeping my hands clean clean wasn't "

Roger W

" embers. They heat they"

And there was another shortly after that I lost track of.

arancaytar

"I used to be a fae duke like you."

arancaytar

And damn it, I liked Farrier.

Shawn Panzegraf

I don't get all the hate for Killian. Yes, she didn't get enough individual screen time, and the lack of PoV text from her perspective hurts her developmentally as a character...but the fact Killian needs more fleshing out does in no wise invalidate the character conceptually. I found the idea of a half-Fae/half-Praesi mage, inspired to become more by close association with a determined Named she's developed feelings for to have significant potential. The culture clash over the human sacrifice issue was good story fodder, and realistic besides. Long-term relationships are challenging when both parties are simply working 9-5 jobs. Let alone facing life-or-death danger from enemies attacking your front, plus life-or-death danger of treachery attacking you from behind.

IMO, Cat would benefit enormously from a Named-equivalent permanent love interest. Black allowing his relationships to fade to the platonic level is a big part of how his emotional isolation began, and subsequently ossified. Without someone at her side, Cat's trodding down the same path whether she realizes it or not. Of everyone close to her sort of elevating her beyond them because she's always the crux of what they're doing, and the final authority regarding decision-making. Her after-hours talks with Adjutant aren't enough. Not by a long shot. Getting involved with Archer would just be a relatively meaningless fling. I mean good sex is great, but a few rounds of that is all that would EVER be.

For all Cat's vision of the future she's fighting to create, if she doesn't take steps to build a place for herself in it....I mean she's already having thoughts along the lines of "If I succeed, I'll be the last monster in Callow."

Altruistic sacrifice is well and good...but if you're all give and no take, you burn out and ultimately fall short of the contribution you could've made in a longer-term sense. At least that's my view.

trailer

Pissed. I spent weeks of days reading. I had no idea this was unfinished. Yes, I didn't look. Now waiting for an update. Squire with Archer fan club.

Tal Morgan

"Not the most flexible of weapons, halberds." The BALLS they aren't! Flexibility is the whole point of halberds.

Argh. I really like this story, but I keep running into these little annoying nuggets of bad history...

Cloudlight

Well they paired with shields after all. Handling a two handed weapon with one hand might make them cumbersome.

Cloudlight

Yeah pairing a halberd with a shield is just wrong. It is after all a vertical two-hand weapon and isn't ment to be wielded one-handed. I might be a bit biased as pretty big halberd fan.

burguulkodar

Masego's Hierophant abilities, I wonder which they are. We have seen none spoken outloud so far.

Thief has STEAL and HOLD, and the last one is obviously whatever she uses to bypass wards and sheath her in shadow. I wonder that verb that would be. Probably "Hide", but could be something more deep.

Chapter 45: Falling Action

"And so Maleficent said: 'Though you be god I am Empress, crowned of dread, and by my hand comes your doom. Rage in vain, for from your bones will rise a great tower whose shadow will be cast upon all the world.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Chains, first of the Secret Histories of Praes

The fortress that lay at the heart of Dormer jutted out incongruously, great jaws of granite gaping down at a city that had known only peace for centuries. The seat of power of the barony had been built in tiers, an elegant ring of grey stone making the first. The was power here, and not young. Though no moat had been dug into the hill, the empty circle around the castle would been a shooting gallery to bleed an investing host were the walls manned at all. But there was not a soul in sight, the faint night breeze lazily winding through deserted bastions. No contest of our advance had been made as we approached, only flames in the distance betraying the truth that Summer had yet to surrender. The pace had been irritatingly slow due to Thief's hobbling, but I had mastered my anger before it could lash out. There were more deserving targets for my wrath than those who had fought and burned for me.

The gate was the sole concession the Barons of Dormer had made to concord, sculpted columns of marble and ivory built over the ancient rough gate and portcullis hidden away by the younger arch displaying the words and heraldry of House Kendall: Honour Lies Immortal, written along the curve of the wreath of ivy. I strode past the pale marble steps, the faces of the ancient rulers of the city staring back at me from the shadowed reliefs. Scenes of glory one and all, from the founding of Dormer to the first oaths sworn to House Alban when Callow was made a single kingdom. There were lies unspoken in this, victories made false by denial of failure. Winter pulsed in my veins, itching to take blade to the unsightliness. I breathed out mist and crushed the impulse. You serve me, I whispered at the cold. Never the other way around. The urges were more insidious than those my Name still caused, my own thoughts painted with a Winter brush.

The portcullis was closed, bands of steel tightly wedged into granite, and perhaps before I would have sought one of the servant entrances. But what did mere steel mean to me now? My gauntleted hands clasped around two bars, and the metal screamed as I ripped open a path. No more difficult than snapping a branch, and Winter murmured in delight at the destruction.

"That's one way to do it, I suppose," Archer said.

The first words spoken since we'd left the field where so many of my men lay dead. I did not glance back as I stepped into the courtyard. To the side I could see the smouldering ashes of what had once been stables built around the wall, but I had no interest in sightseeing. In the distance, at the heart of the fortress, I could feel a gate in the making. Not at all like mine, where my will was a knife used to cut through the boundary between Creation and Arcadia. Someone had built a canal on the other side, and was now carefully prying open the lock. The river would pour through unimpeded, when the time came, and sweep away everything that stood in its way. A Queen is a god in the flesh, I thought. No creature so powerful can lightly cross boundaries.

"There is a ward ahead," Hierophant said, studying a handful of shining runes. "Barring the inner reaches of the fortress."

"It will break," I said.

The hall we strode through was old as the walls, the raw stone made to look luxurious by tapestries and hanging drapes in the green of Kendall heraldry. The Proceran carpets under our boots had already been singed by the fae who'd once held the fortress, the edges of blackened and twisted. Stairs rose ahead into a balustrade, sculpted ivy leaves shaping the railing. We had not succeeding in getting our hands on plans of the fortress, before the battle, but I could feel the gate-to-be like the north of a compass. Further in, where the great hall where the Baroness of Dormer had once held justice and audience before the Tower stripped her of right and title both for her rebellion. How long had this castle stood, I wondered? There might be nothing left of it but rubble, when dawn came. I guided us through the corridors, the power wafting from me eagerly scattering the last wisps of Summer's presence in little tufts of hissing steam. The air grew cool and crisp wherever we passed, and more than once I felt Hierophant shiver.

We found the ward as we emerged from the corridor that would lead us to the great hall, its copper gates laying wide open behind it. A wall, though one of woven sunlight and shivering golden Summer flame. I could feel it spread beyond my sight, a great cage of power crafted to protect the arrival of the Queen of Summer.

"How long will it take you to open a way, Hierophant?" Adjutant asked.

My sword left its sheath with a quiet hiss before the blind man could reply. I struck out, boots leaving trails of ice behind as my blade rammed against the light. The walls shook around us, but the ward stood strong.

"Knocking at the door might take a while," Archer noted, sounding amused.

"I can walk through," Thief rasped. "If Hierophant tells me how to unmake it from the inside-"

"Break," I hissed.

I opened the floodgates in full, let Winter pour through my veins and seep into the most destructive of my aspects. My blood was cold, I only now noticed. It had been for some time. Yet I felt no weaker for it, the frost instead lending a sharp clarity that it had once taken effort to reach. Duchess, I thought. My will found easier purchase when bending Creation to its will. Shade and ice flared along the edge of my sword as it struck the ward and for a heartbeat it felt like I was trading blows with the Duke of Green Orchards again. Then the ward broke, as I'd ordered it to. Stone around us shattered as well, the walls anchoring the sorcery torn through as the ward desperately scrabbled to remain coherent. There was a sliver of life in it, a will to guide it. Had they sacrificed a fae to forge this? No matter. Ice smothered that wisp of thought, blanketing the corridor. I resumed marching through the ruins surrounding us, the wide doors of copper held up only by a thin arc of granite as I passed through them. Adjutant caught up to me first, leaning close.

"Catherine," he murmured, though we both knew the others would be able to hear anyway. "Calm yourself, before you begin making mistakes."

"I am calm," I replied, and I was. "What I am is out of patience. If it gets in my way, it dies. We're past half-measures, Adjutant."

The orc looked as if he wanted to argue, but I was disinclined to allow it. The great hall lay spread out before us, a shabby thing compared to those I had walked in the Tower. Long tables on both sides flanked a supplicant's path leading to stone platform set against the back wall and the tall glass windows over it, the dying moon cloaking the simple bench of whitewood on it in a halo of light. There, I thought. The crossing would take place there. Let it not be said the Queen of Summer would ever settle for less than a throne, in any world she strode. Hierophant came to stand by my side as the others milled around the hall.

"Still the better part of an hour before dawn, by my calculations," the mage said.

"There's no need to wait that long," I said. "Implement the contingency."

Eyes of glass shifted to me under black cloth, a brow rising.

"You know my study of the sun is incomplete," Hierophant said. "Should I be forced to loose the arrow the Due would be comparable to that of the very event that named the concept. There will be no city left, no armies, and it is unlikely anything will grow of these grounds before Creation is unmade."

"One does not call a god to heel without risking calamity," I said.

He paused.

"I want to work a pathing spell on your mind," he said. "This is reckless even by your standards."

"Winter has nothing to do with this," I said. "But if it will make you feel better, by all means."

His touch against my forehead was surprisingly warm, as was the sorcery that seeped into my mind. I could feel it curling like smoke along my thoughts, until finally he withdrew.

"It is influencing you," he said.

"But," I said.

"No more than the mantle of your Name," he admitted. "Your mind is still your own."

I heard Archer let out a baited breath, behind me. Hierophant no longer quibbled after that. It was a wonder, watching him work. I'd seen him weave sorcery before, even High Arcana, but this went a step beyond. Eyes closed, heartbeat almost still, the blind man crafted me a miracle. It was not runes that he threaded together but echoes of things he had seen, flickers of great feats he had witnessed. I saw his father's silhouette standing before a tower that built itself turning into the Princess of High Noon with her hands raised, a pyramid of blood-streaked mud lying at the heart of a maze melding with a glimpse of a city rising into the sky. Pillars of translucent, shimmering power struck the ground in a perfect circle around him and I felt their reach rise through the ceiling into the night sky above. Eventually, he opened his eyes.

"Thief," he said. "Release the sun."

The burns on the heroine's face had peeled off, replaced by red and tender skin through healing magic, and so I read the hesitation on her face plainly.

"There is no need to be afraid," I said.

No, not us. Not today. She nodded slowly, and fingers found the pouch at her side.

"Here it goes," she said, and opened it.

The glare was blinding, for a heartbeat. Hierophant's unearthly ward caught it whole, drawing it to the pillars as even the coldness coming from my frame was swept away by the raging heat. And then it dimmed, as suddenly as it had come. The mage grunted in effort. It hurt my eyes to look at it, but I did not look away: I might never see such a sight again. The ceiling above us was not torn through so much as it evaporated, the fortress around us melting like butter in the heat. The sun of Summer rose into the sky, chasing night away, and with it came dawn. I turned my eyes to the dais as the lock gave and the Queen of Summer came, granted entry by our will. There was no gate. Between two moments, absence was filled a young girl. Golden curls streaming down her white robe, she still looked half a child and every inch a farmer's daughter. There was nothing unearthly about her tan and her dimples, or those brown eyes that could have belonged to any mortal. The left side of her body was touched with red, bandages peeking through the collar of her robe. Ranger had wounded her, at least.

"Oh, children," she sadly said. "You know not what you do."

It would have thought her mortal, if not for the hint of pressure behind her. Like she was the seal on a boundless ocean that could sweep over Creation at any time. Winter coiled inside me, frozen furious hatred that wanted to rip her small frame apart no matter the cost to me or anyone else. I ignored it.

"You have been summoned," I said, "to discuss terms of surrender."

"Come to me, my armies," the Queen said.

I did not need to look to know every fae in Dormer had taken to the sky, the words touching their minds. The city emptied in moments as wings flared and the tide of soldiers flowed towards us. Hierophant staggered as if hit in the guts, blood wetting his lips. The Princess of High Noon, I thought, had just been freed from her prison. Over the molten ruins of the fortress surrounding us ranks upon ranks of soldiers and pennants stood perched in silence, more arriving every heartbeat, and only then did the Queen turn her eyes to me.

"So many dead," she mourned. "You have earned him victory with your blood, Duchess. Yet Summer does not surrender. You know this. You have seen it with your own eyes."

"You have three duties," I said.

"She's trying for the sun," Hierophant said, tone alarmed.

"Destroy it, Masego," I said.

It was with vicious satisfaction that I saw surprise twist the Queen's face.

"A desperate lie," she said, but I felt her power still. "You would destroy us all. Break this land beyond mending."

It wasn't fear I saw in those eyes, not exactly. I wasn't sure she really could be afraid. But there was uncertainty. Hesitation. Three words, and I had stayed the hand of a god. My lips twitched, and strange joy bubble up in my chest. I laughed, loudly, and allowed a hard grin to split my face.

"If I can't win, you misbegotten thing, then we will all lose," I hissed. "Look into my eyes. Tell me again I'm lying."

I would have rocked back, had I not gone through the crucible of standing judgement before the Hashmallim. An entity infinitely greater than I enveloped everything that I was, will beyond comprehension taking sight of everything that I was and had been. The Beast coiled at my side and whispered back. Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation. The Queen of Summer flinched.

"Madness," she said, appalled.

"I am a villain," I laughed. "I stand before you the pupil of a madman, heiress to a thousand years of darkness and terror. Test me again and I will make this a wasteland to have even the Gods shudder."

"Summer does not retreat," the Queen said, and it rang like a thunderclap.

"Summer has lost," I replied unblinkingly. "As we speak the Prince of Nightfall breaches the walls of Aine, the city you are sworn to protect. Around you stands the butchered remnants of your host, awaiting doom at Winter's hand. And in my palm lies your Sun, three words away from destruction. The Laurel Crown has three duties, and in those three duties you have failed."

There was a moment of silence, before the Queen sighed.

"And so comes the dying of the light," she murmured. "The wheel spins, Catherine Foundling. To end is to begin. We will not go with a whimper."

My heart would have thundered, if I still had one.

"Or," I said. "I could give you exactly what you want. Aine safeguarded. Winter unmade. The Sun returned to your sky."

"You promise beyond your ability," she said.

"All I require from you is a word, and you will get your wish," I smiled. "And I ask a boon granted, for what I deliver to you."

She studied me again, tasted the truth of my words.

"This," she said, "has never happened before."

"And never will again," I said.

"I will hear the terms of the bargain offered," the Queen of Summer said.

It was no coincidence it happened the moment she spoke the words. The grooves carved into Creation would have ensured as much, smoothly turning truth to story. Coincidence that was anything but. At my side power coalesced, stealing the efforts of Summer to allow its ruler to cross as a path of its own. A circle left open closed, as with a sharp smile the King of Winter came into Creation to face his created opposite. Sleek and dark-skinned and crowned in dead wood seeping red, the fae breathed in the air of Creation with relish.

"Oh, what a beautiful morning," he said.

"Treachery," the Queen of Summer said, words ringing of steel and the death of men.

"Ever a favoured diversion," the King agreed. "Though I come for something... stranger."

He turned his eyes on me, the gaze of a teacher pleasantly surprised by a pupil. I itched to carve them out of his skull, and not using something sharp.

"With your permission, Duchess?" he said.

"According to the terms offered by Her Dread Majesty," I replied.

"You will have your boon, greedy one," he said. "Ah, but what a daughter of Winter you make. Is she not delightful, Ista?"

I grit my teeth to get through the pain of hearing the name of the Summer Queen spoken, feeling Masego go rigid as a board as he did the same. Coat of black sweeping behind him, the man walked to his enemy and with a flourish he knelt.

"Ista of the Morning Star," he said. "Bearer of the Laurel Crown, Queen of Summer Triumphant. I ask your hand in marriage, to rule Arcadia an equal by my side."

He extended his own smoothly. One word, I'd told the Queen. She could still have it all, if she only said yes. The armies of Winter would end the assault of Aine, I would return the Sun and Winter would be undone. I watched the kneeling fae with cold, cold smile. I'd made an oath, once that I would unmake him. And I just had, with him having to thank me for it. There will be no more Winter, I thought. Only a single court ruling Arcadia, neither and both. The Empress had been right. The pivot was always going to be the Winter King, because he was the only entity that would see my preferred outcome as a victory. It had all hinged on him agreeing, because he was the oddity and he could make decisions that led outside the stories he despised. Summer would have to be forced, I'd known from the start, and I'd done exactly that. The Queen would agree, because she could not do otherwise. She was bound to seek to discharge her duties, and I'd put her in a corner with acceptance as the only way out. To refuse here would mean actively going against what she was, and she could not physically do that. Black had told me once that I'd kill Akua, one of these days, not because of my own power but because her nature would force her to make mistakes I would not. I wondered if he would proud, that I had used his lesson to destroy two gods without lifting a finger against either of them.

"I accept your offer," the Summer Queen said, taking his hand, and I could see the horror on her face.

She was fighting it, trying to take back the words. But she couldn't, just like the Rider of the Host I'd once forced to monologue by playing the hero. The change that followed the words was hard to describe. It wasn't something I saw or felt. Neither of them metamorphosed into something different. But it was no longer two separate entities that were before me. I'd heard a riddle once, in Laure. When is a stone not as stone – when it is a wall. Nothing changed, yet it was not the same. The king rose to his feet, and pressed a tender kiss on the cheek of the livid queen.

"And so the war comes to a close," the King of Arcadia said. "A realm cannot be at war with itself."

A shiver went through the host of fae around us, as is something had been torn out of them.

"The matter of boons remains," the Queen of Arcadia said, and the eyes she turned on me were burning. "Promises must be kept."

I stood before two gods and did not kneel. I would not, in this moment, pretend this was anything but my win. That I'd bled thousands on the field, caused the death of men dear to me for anything less but utter victory.

"Upon the granting, you will have discharged your duty to me," the King said. "And so will have earned the return of your heart. What do you request of us, Duchess of Moonless Nights?"

"Of you, I request release from vassalage forevermore," I told the fae.

"I am most saddened to grant this," the dark-skinned king said.

He did not seem surprised. I turned my eyes to the queen. I would have to tread carefully, here. If I fumbled the phrasing, she'd do her best to fuck me over. The temptations lay in the back of my mind, beckoning sweetly. To go back on my deal with the Empress and request that the whole of Arcadia come together to kill Diabolist. But she's not wrong. They'll wreck the entire central plains to do it, and we'd be risking some fae influence remaining. And there was another, young but no less demanding for it. I could ask them to heal Nauk. It would be a trifle, to them. But there might be other means to save my legate. And I would never get this chance again. A heroine, I thought, would have made the right choice. The only justifiable one. But I was not a heroine, and justifications only mattered to the just.

I spoke, and betrayed a man I called my friend.

"Of you I ask permanent right of passage through Arcadia for me and all I command, uncontested and unhindered," I said, voice hollow.

"I grant you this," the Queen replied curtly.

"And so peace is upon us," the King said. "Steel yourself, Catherine Foundling."

I felt the hand tear through my chest before I could even open my lips, and the world went dark.

I think this is something that people really do need to acknowledge in this day and age. Is it legal, no, not in most countries. Do people do it, yes, unfortunately they do. I think that the best one can do is to be vigilant, and make sure that people are aware. The entirety of the audience of your work is accessing this online, for free, in a pace that astounds me still. Hot damn.

wirelessgrapes

For real, though, I very much disagree with the idea that Cat betrayed Nauk here. Nauk did exactly what Nauk was going to do, fight the wars of the Warlord until his death in battle. I hope Juniper talks some sense into her about this, but she'll always feel some sting from his death. And for the better, she will now always weigh her actions against the lives they'll take.

RandomFan

I disagree too, but Catherine has always set the bar for heroism higher than she should, and then been disappointed in herself for not approaching it. If she'd been a hero, she'd never be as gritty as William, but she'd always think she was as bad as William- assuming she lasted.

As a villain- she notices these failings more, and then shrugs them off again.

thespaceinvader

Let's not forget, Nauk ain't dead yet, and Catherine still has access to a powerful Fae sorceress... if she's willing to pay the cost.

SQuid

Do we even know that she's specifically referring to Nauk? I wouldn't at all be surprised if it turns out she meant someone else, because that's just the kind of slippery twisty story we're reading.

goliath1303

.... Yes, considering she specifically said his name.

"And there was another, young but no less demanding for it. I could ask them to heal Nauk. It would be a trifle, to them. But there might be other means to save my legate. Kingbob12

Motherfuck. Damn good thing they didn't actually have to fight, or else the story would have ended here. You can trick a god, but not even Cat can kill a god outright. Not yet.

Metalshop

This was a fantastic chapter. I'm getting chills seeing how far Catherine has come and how much she's starting to see herself as a villain.

Gunslinger

She has the most frightening mentor though. I meant Malicia

Adarsh

Ok, I did not see that coming. I still wonder what will happen if she completes her bargain with the Prince of Nightfall.

stevenneiman

I'd been figuring that it was something to permanently disrupt the balance of power in favor of Winter, but that's just been turned sideways anyway so I don't think balance really matters anymore.

What I'm wondering now is what this will do to the power of Summer and Winter, given that on one hand a united power should be more dangerous to outside forces than a divided one fighting its other half, but on the other hand both sides defined themselves by the conflict so they might be greatly reduced without it.

oldschoolvillain

Nothing said he has to be alive when she sets the crown's at his feet. And she's already defeated a Princess of Summer – breaking him will be a lovely little cool down from the rest of the war, especially since the fae may not be reborn any longer.

nehemiahnewell

Hmm, I wonder what will be left from her time as Moonless Night. Will she simply be freed of it, or will Moonless Night be left and independent Duchy?

nick012000

So, the Elves flee Creation by phasing their Kingdom into Arcadia, right? Wouldn't this boon granted to her mean that their greatest defense would become a liability instead, if Catherine were to ever decide to invade their kingdom?

Gunslinger

She'd need to massively upgrade her army before taking on elves though. Triumphant had a horde of dastardly demons.

stevenneiman

Yeah, it sounds like every elf is on the level of at least a minor hero and that some combine a hero's advantage of Fate with something dangerously close to the raw power of a villain.

Shoddi

*presses knuckle to forehead*
May she never return.

jonnney

The Watch has a very old grudge with the elves. Once their godling is saved from Diabolist Catherine will have a powerful host with the backing of a thousand year old story that could never before come to fruition. She might also have allies in the north, the golden bloom isn't the only kingdom of elves on the continent.

The elves aren't a pressing concern though. Catherine's next war will likely be with Procer. Either defending against a Crusade or allied with the new united nation of the free cities to the south.

Mental Mouse

> She might also have allies in the north,

She will indeed, but best not to call the Drow "dark elves" in their hearing. They will point out (as in, knife-point) that unlike the elven interlopers, the Drow are native to Calernia.

nick012000

>Yeah, it sounds like every elf is on the level of at least a minor hero

So were the Fae, though, and look at what the Fifteenth just did to them.

James, Mostly Harmless

Considering how fast Kat is progressing in her power, I frequently wonder if she is Triumphant reincarnated ...

Mental Mouse

You're not the only one wondering that. Which will come around to haunt her....

George

Wow! Utter victory indeed!

Nguyen Hong Hai

So duty discharged, will Cat still be able to tap in Winter power?

RandomFan

I doubt it. I even expect she'll go back down to two aspects all over again. Diabolist's going to have fun with that.

Gunslinger

But then we'd never get to explore the mystery of her Fall aspect. All those hints of it being "more" would be wasted.

stevenneiman

I think that it overwrote one of her three Aspects, which will likely reassert itself once Fall is out of the way. If not, it might have just greatly empowered an Aspect she would have had anyway, in which case she would still have it but we'd have to wait and see if it's still worth having. If she does gain a new Aspect, I wonder if it's going to be Seek or something new we've never heard of.

@Gunslinger, what hints? We got a clear explanation of exactly how the power worked. A directly offensive Domain is unusual, but not too remarkable considering the unusual influence on her Name, and there was no indication that it was any more special than that.

Gunslinger

@stevenneiman Masego had made the observation that Cat's domain was quite different from a regular domain. I think the term more came right after the capture of Sulia when the Prince of Nightfall brought up its resemblance to his domain

Gunslinger

I suspect she'll still have winter related powers. That's not an effect that would simply vanish, at the very least influence her next aspect.

ArkCthuul

I hope she keeps winter powers, but I think the trend of breaking her down again will continue.

One of the parts I detested in worm as well, and I love both stories.

Ah well...

sheer_falacy

It would be kind of hilarious if she asked for the boon of free travel through Arcadia and then lost the ability to open gates into Arcadia.

Also kind of curious how this is going to affect Fall and Spring. If it doesn't, then she'll only have free travel when summer is in charge. Though maybe if the war between summer and winter is never won (because there is no more war) there will be no season change?

jonnnney

It is entirely possible that there will no longer be a fall and spring. The story of Arcadia has been fundamentally changed:

"This," she said, "has never happened before."

"And never will again," I said.

D. D. Webb

It really reveals the core nature of this story that this is what constitutes a happy ending.

Jordan

Shouldn't you be writing?

jk, I'd skip writing so I could read this story too.

esryok

When Ranger was with the Calamities they broke a story old as dawn.

When Archer was with the Woe...

pyrohawk21

They broke a story older than Creation itself...

IDKWhoitis

Man, Ranger is going to be really pissed when there isn't an Wild Hunt to actually hunt anymore...

I wonder what Black will do when he hears Catherine bent two gods to her will. Will he throw a party? Will he just not shut up about it? Will he get kind of nervous about her rapid development?

stevenneiman

Nah, now she'll be able to antagonize the Happy Couple. Trying to get rid of her together, they might actually be even more of a challenge than anything that was there before. On the other hand, if the Seasons are locked she might be annoyed that she'll never have an excuse to go take the Prince of Nightfall's eye again.

nipi

If the seasons are locked do fae still get to be "reborn"?

RandomFan

I'd expect the turnover from Wild Hunt to "United Court" would still cause the swaps. At least, I'd imagine those don't happen in synch.

Gunslinger

Holy shit this was quite something. I wonder what will happen to her winter powers now that she's been released from vassalage. Her aspect has been permanently altered so fall will not change. And the winter powers will have etched grooves in her Name so I doubt they would be gone as well.

Winter and Summer isn't here anymore. There is only a single court. Maybe her power will change accordingly!

James, Mostly Harmless

Winter and Summer no longer contest for rule of Arcadia, but that does not mean that they do not wax or wane or alternate in power. Now the transition between them is no longer overtly violent, although it may be covertly violent ...

Komploding

I wonder if this means Malicia will no longer be able to COMMAND Catherine's legion (against their will using her name) as Cat has been freed from vasselage, yes to the Fae court but to be freed by the King of the new court should have further reaching implications than what appears at a first glance.

stevenneiman

The wording might screw with the controls that Malicia used her Name to put in the legion if those ever would have come into play. Beyond that though, the Courts, including the new Sinter Court, don't really have the authority to mess with the command structure of the Praesi military.

nehemiahnewell

Things to remember

""

"He doesn't have a plan, I think," I said. "Or his plan was just to drag Callow into this mess and he doesn't really need to control what comes after that. He wants out, Malicia. I don't think how he gets out actually matters all that much. And that he thinks that way at all is scaring the other fae. I don't think he's supposed to."

"That," the Empress said quietly, "is worrying. Wekesa once told me that Arcadia is akin to a first draft of Creation, and mirrors it still. If Winter is meant to be the reflection of villainy, and yet bound to it, there are... implications."

This isn't an act without consequence. Even if Catherine dies tomorrow, it still is not without consequence. Arcadia and Creation are not completely separate, they mirror. So what's mirrored here, with this marriage?

Bonesawer

It seems evident that there can be an even closer mirror than the 'mirror feature' requires (and likely closer than we'll actually receive). Cat beats the forces of Good in such a got-them-by-the-balls way that they are forced by their very nature (desire to not have a facet of Good permanently destroyed leading to the everlasting victory of Evil or some such [sidenote: my greatest suspicion is something to do with the Due or otherwise Keter-related]) to accept a deal from Evil that combines them, forming one unified power. "A realm cannot be at war with itself".

Nairne .01

The Tower and the Kingdom of Callow?

TideofKhatanga

Yes, this is a permanent alliance of Good and Evil. An early prototype of the Dread Empire that Catherine has been trying to build. And a permanent tear in the tissue of the story of Creation, like spitting in the faces of the Gods and them losing an eye for it.

Gunslinger

In retrospect the mirroring shines pretty clearly doesn't it. Black's whole plan to kill Callowan heroes permanently is to make them accept Preasi rule. A realm cannot be at war with itself.

Engineer

Hahaha, bent both gods over a barrel.

The First Prince will be shitting herself. Now CAT has free fast travel to any place in Creation and by extension the entire Legions of Terror iff Dread Empress Malcia gives her command of her entire legions. Remember, the deal was for her and all she COMMANDS. Summer won't pass up the opportunity to harass any AFFILIATED forces and the Queen has already proven with her Sky Fire Jutsu that she can incinerate an ENTIRE legion on a whim.

So if Malicia wants to take advantage of the free shortcut without suffering any unnecessary losses, she would have to give Cat command of the entire legions of terror, albeit temporarily while they are crossing Arcadia.

Another commentor said that with Cat losing her vassalage she wouldn't be able to open portals. This is not a problem since she has Hierophant there and I'm willing to bet an aspect he already figured out how to open portals and he has a full name now.

Her Name's abilities has already been changed by Winter's influence and she already underwent Masego's ritual. Winter and her name both are likened to voracious beasts. I really am willing to bet her powers will still be dark/cold based from here on out. PLUS, she still has a transitory name. She must still grow into a full one. I don't think it is black knight, however.

I believe the name will be DEATH KNIGHT.

Nairne .01

That trick with necromancy she did sure suggests that she will not be a regular Black Knight. I wonder though will she become a Black Knight with just some extra power, or will she become Black Knight then transition again (something that might not have happened before – erraticerrata could you comment on this hypothesis?) or will she skip the Black Knight role wholly.

stevenneiman

Black stated that his shadow play is unusually weak as non-Aspect supernatural powers go for a Black Knight. It would be entirely believable for Cat to get even more powerful necromancy in support of her other powers when she attains a full Name, whether that Name be Black Knight or not. I suspect that she will develop into a different Name than Black Knight, since Masego has already proven that subordinate transitional Names don't have to develop into the standard full Name, but I'm not going to speculate as to what kind of Name she's going to take. All I know is that EE has confirmed that Grey Knight is specifically not on the table.

Keyen

I'm more and more betting on the Lich Queen ending, therefore, her new name could be the Dead Queen (or the Queen of Deads?). With another happy marriage with the Dead King, governing a continent/world of deads and screw the gods 😊

nipi

Hmm... does goblinfire burn cold? Anyone care to test it for me?

The green fire that I use burns at a higher temperature but puts out less heat than traditional fire spinning fuel, so its cold for a given value of the term.

I'm curious as to how will the Bard react. She was so adamant about the impossibility of changing the way things are. An interlude, pretty please.

oldschoolvillain

Oh the Bard is probably going to shit itself when it learns what happened while she was playing with Black. I'd say 'her' but I'm not sure something as old as the Bard needs an identifier.

Unmaker

A good point. How does a creature who is built of and uses stories react when something happens that has never happened before? Is this the start of a glorious new story, or is a fracture in the structure of Roles and Names themselves?

The Closer

Greetings from the year 2019. I began reading this series of books in early summer based on the recommendation of a friend. Once again another extraordinary chapter in a wonderful story with an outcome that I did not even see coming. I really didn't start following the comments until somewhere in book 2 to help me understand better what was going on sometimes but the comments often times doubles my pleasure. Thank you to the author for these rich characters, incredibly complex and original sorcery imaginings, and excellent story lines. In my humble opinion, there are stories of Thrones and Rings out there that have got nothing on you! Let us know when Netflix or Prime leaves a message on your voicemail!

James, Mostly Harmless

Knight of Ghosts and Shadows?

Engineer

It's Death Knight.

Look at her powers:

Cold/frost: "The Cold of the Grave."

Darkness: "Death is usually likened to endless Darkness"

Necromancy: Control over dead things.

Now let's consider her aspects.

A living being FALLS and dies. Its body decomposes i.e BREAKS. The last aspect which would compete the trio is annihilate (scattered to the winds or ceases to exist).

Furthermore, a cultural pressure is required for a Name to come into being. Praes has a history seeped in violence and the culture within the 15th are also heavily biased toward killing as evidenced by their motto (KILL THEM and take their stuff) and Cat herself has personally killed a whole range of entities that she really had no business killing as just a Squire. So the pressures for the Name is present (If it is sufficient is up in the air)

I think the one of the reasons she hasn't transitioned yet is her own reluctance to embrace the villainous monster she is and will be.

kinigget

Holy fucking shit

Catherine certainly doesn't do anything by half. Not with how she fundamentally altered the very nature of Arcadia and all the Fae therein

This changes *literally everything*

Euodiachloris

Alter Acadia and you alter Creation, as well. We won't guess exactly how, because of the the whole mirror-foil aspect of the relationship isn't a perfect scan job. 😊

James, Mostly Harmless

Euodiachloris brought up a good point: Kat just fundamentally altered Creation. That had to have been felt by everyone with even a bit of power, and possibly ordinary people too. I hope that we get to see Bard's and Akua's reaction!

Shawn Panzegraf

Nothing says the former Winter King tearing into Cat's chest means she lost her Fae mojo. It might simply be required to sever the mystical ties to the King. She did get that magical chunk of pseudo-heart ice during her title investment ceremony.

The Sinter King is happy with Cat. I doubt he's inclined to screw her up too much at the moment. Plus, leaving her Fae mojo alone will undoubtedly continue creating thin spots in the Veil. Those, as we've seen, are quite useful to the Fae. An entity thinking in long-range terms would leave Cat's power alone, and let her continue building magic subway tunnels for him all over Calernia.

Soronel Haetir

Am I the only one who sees the Queen being injured but apparently whole as being bad news for Ranger? I think her (the Queen) appearance lends credence to the theory that Ranger's time was up.

Dragrath

Yeah I suspect that as well as much as I wish it wasn't true it seems very likely

Solrac

Great chapter. Thanks.

edrey

well, if the king really want a permanent change in arcadia, he would need to create something new no only a story that is likely no happening again, i should be something that link winter and summer, most likely a princess of both of them ( i really don't like the picture of the summer queen with a baby), so i was thinking cat taking the rule of both of them and sending the prince of nightfall to his dead in the battle with akua, so there with have the prince graveyard battle, how she do it, i have no idea but i would be awesome, my point about all this its the king shouldn't have forgotten about the change of season and he would start with the same story again and again. so the most likely is he doing that

Ethesis

Now. Princess would be an interesting title for her to replace squire with

Barrendur

Cat becomes Callow's _Queen of Air and Darkness_?

colm

Or maybe Dread Empress Foundling, The Exploder of Goats. After all, Cat is being mentored by Alicia now and Akua isn't Heiress anymore.

James, Mostly Harmless

I have long thought that Black and Malicia were grooming Kat to replace Malicia as Empress. They may even hope that it will be the first peaceful, or at least planned, transition!

Sieral

Loved the update Erratic! 😊

Dainpdf

I thought she'd have asked for something else. Greater fae authority – it should be possible to merge in Summer power now. When I thought about it, though, I realized it would have been foolish. More fae influence can't be a good thing. I do wonder, though, how anything she builds will last when her armies will depend on her for mobility. Also, what about the promise to the prince of Nightfall? Bet that's going to come back and bite her.

Panacea

Conqueror as her title? I would say Crusader as well but that might belong to the First Prince and her army.

Ethreal

i suspect she will transit to a new name now.

nehemiahnewell

I think it's dependent on whether or not she keeps her fae mojo. If she keeps it, she won't transition until late in the story; she already has a full names worth of power, and more than many. The Duchess of Moonless Night doesn't NEED more name power, actively. It would force her role in stories in ways that are disadvantageous. So we would keep seeing Squire for quite sometime.

If she loses it, she'll also lose Fall, and which means she has one more surprise save as Squire, discovering her last aspect, and thematically she has to have that moment before she transitions. Then she runs into the limits of Squire, and she's playing games against full names. So she would transition shortly after that.

Nairne .01

I wonder if this is where her being getting four aspects as another stab at creation could come to play.

agumentic

I just hope that we will see inner Cats again.

Alex Straughan

Surprised no one has asked one very important question?
What does an Arcadia united do?

It doesn't seem like the Fae will just be content to stay in Arcadia now. Especially the Prince of Nightfall, i'm hoping we see more of him as Cat is still in his debt.

If I had to guess I'd say his ritual with the crowns would allow him to enter creation in the full of his power whenever he so chooses.

benthelynx

I particularly enjoyed this chapter.

Unmaker

erraticerrata, I would really like to see you write a mystery story. You keep managing to come up with twist endings that, in retrospect, were actually foreshadowed. That ability is great for any genre, but it is absolutely essential for a good mystery story.

Pipiemman

So did we essentially witness the birth of Titania and Oberon?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Great chapter!

This sentence wins the latest “grammatically not a sentence but still awesome anyway” award: “Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation.”

draxsiss

I think it would be cool if the fey powers transitioned on squire not HER but her name. IE every new squire is going to get the winter powerfey stick... she transitions she loses it. The first time in history a name transition resulted in a power downgrade.

draxsiss

You know after having thought about it... This may end the cycle of war... if the weather patterns become permanent there will be no more abundance of food (with massive winter/summer cycles) no more extended crops at spring or fall, This will impact the world at large meaning that the places might over time no longer war the same since they don't have the food/wealth to do so. Remember that who agriculture/farming stuff Cat learned with black back in the first book?

Mental Mouse

It's been explicitly said in-text that the Arcadian Courts are not actually linked to the seasons of Creation.

DC

It occurred to me, reading this a second time, that of course it was Winter that started this: if Summer is the kingdom of war, then what can Winter be but the kingdom of peace?

Chapter 46: Denouement

“Never wound a man you do not intend to kill.”

– Extract from the personal journals of Dread Emperor Terribilis II

It was a strange thing, to bury a man. Of the Praesi only the Soninke shared the custom, and even then only the highborn who boasted ancient labyrinth-mausoleums of baked mud to receive their own. Peasants and Taghreb burned their dead instead, save for those who had sold their remains to corpse-raisers while they still lived. There were no ancient mazes in the Green Stretch, and the dues to the dead were different for Duni. It was said that some of Amadeus' people still kept to the Gods Above in hidden places, conducting rituals even without priests to bless them, but his family had not been so twisted. Mother had proudly served in the Legions, after all, and thought little of the ornate boot-licking westerners called religion. Yet Duni buried their dead like Callowans did, the nature of that half-stolen custom changed by centuries upon centuries of Praesi rule and all that came with it. The Squire's shovel patted the surface of the freshly turned wet black earth, the last grave he would dig today.

There were four of them. Father, Clarent, Belladona and Valerius. He'd not spoken to any of them since deserting the Legions, and the first time in three years he'd laid eyes on his family had been to see them crucified by the burnt-out husk of the farm. The Heir had not needed to sign his work, for he had already boasted of it. Discipline, he'd called it, for a mudfoot who did not understand his place in the world. The Soninke had not well taken his defeat in Callow, the way Ranger's knowledge of the lay of the land had allowed Amadeus to lead the paladins to his enemy's camp instead of his own. Sabah had offered to help him dig, meaning kindness though the offer was ignorant. Wekesa had not, no more learned in Duni customs but instinctively knowing the offer would be crossing a boundary. It was Hye, in her own cold way, who had honoured his family. She'd stood vigil at his side in silence as he dug, a sacrifice of hours freely offered to people she had never met.

Amadeus wedged the shovel into the ground and stood by the unmarked graves he'd dug by the side of Mother's. Silently, he unsheathed a knife and split open his palm. Passing from grave to grave he trickled droplets of red the way he had been taught even as his companions stood behind him, still and quiet. There would be incomprehension on their faces, he knew. Praesi knew well the power of blood, but were wary of spilling their own. There were many rituals a skilled mage could work, with such a reagent. But there were no consecrated grounds in the Stretch, to prevent corpse-theft, and the Tower did not care to chastise necromancers that kept to the practice if their birth was high enough. The spilling of blood, to Duni, was an oath. 'They who marked that grave in red will seek redress, should this grave be disturbed.' He could have spoken the word, but he alone stood pale-skinned on this field. There would have been no meaning in it.

He had wept, taking them down from the crosses, but the tears had dried and left nothing behind. Amadeus did not recognize his own voice when he told the others to leave him to the vigil, to be stood until the moon rose. It was too raw a thing to be his, absent of calm and thought. They deferred, though before long Ranger returned to his side. Hye knew no commands but her own desires.

"We'll kill him for this," she whispered, standing at his side.

The green-eyed man smiled.

"The Heir," he said, "meant to cloud my mind. Fill it with grief and anger. Unusually clever of him, truth be told. I lose much if I lose my distance from it all."

"It always turns on them, plots like this," the half-elf said. "They get more than they bargained for."

Amadeus studied the palm he had cut mere hours ago, finding it perfectly smooth. It would not scar. Wounds on Named rarely did, lest they were dire or meaningful. He wondered what kind of man it made him, that this was not meaningful to him. He wondered if he should grieve that he could not manage to care. Had he been this cold, before he became the Squire? It was hard to remember.

"He made a mistake," the Duni said. "Not the one you believe this. This is just... insufficient."

Ranger did not answer. She'd always had a talent for that, knowing when to fill silence and let it stand.

"I believed I loved them," Amadeus said. "But I killed them, Hye, the moment I claimed my Name. I always knew that. Stories require clean breaks. We cannot have homes to return to, however humble they may be."

"You absolve him for this act?" the honey-skinned woman asked.

"No, not that," the man murmured. "Never that. One must stand responsible for one's actions. But it would be unseemly, to blame solely his hand for this end. If not him, Creation would have seen to the matter otherwise. Paladins venturing deeper into the Stretch, perhaps. Or wisps of a faraway ritual poisoning them in agony. Foe would have been provided, Ranger. Evil ever grows through conflict."

"You could have fought it," she said.

"And lost," he replied. "Creation can be gamed. We have proved this. But it cannot be overturned. There are lessons to be learned from the Tyrants of old. Power is not earned with clean hands. Their mistake was only to think bloodying them anew will always bring gain."

He saw Ranger's lips quirk into a rueful smile.

"And now you debate philosophy over fresh graves," she said. "Your grief lasted as long as the tears."

"I began grieving them the moment I became the Squire," Amadeus said. "This will not turn my path, Hye. A loss has been added to the tally, that's all. There will be many, many more."

"And love?" she said.

"A sweet thing, to be sure," the Squire said. "But love is not what I bared my blade for."

She laughed, quietly.

"You're not boring at all, are you?" she said. "The blood you spilled, what does it mean?"

"An oath," Amadeus said. "A warning."

Ranger's knife glinted silver in the dark as she cut her palm, joining her blood to his own on the dark earth. He met her eyes and wondered what was watching him back, that hard and blazing thing that had his heart skipping a beat.

"And now what, Squire?" she teased.

"I read a play once," Amadeus replied. "Forbidden by Imperial decree. There is a part I enjoyed, and it goes like this-"

His voice carried, without ever rising in tone.

*"Be fearful now
tremble; for my reach is long my wrath is great patient but unrivalled

Hye's answering smile was a thing of death and Amadeus looked away, staring up at the stars and letting his grief ebb to the sound of grinding wheels of steel.

I woke to a riot of light. I was naked, I promptly noticed, and on a bed of stone. I did not feel the cold in the slightest, which I did not take to mean much considering I similarly felt nothing of twin clamps and scalpel someone had shoved into my chest. Masego, unsurprisingly sitting at my bedside with his brow creased, idly dismissed a rune that had formed to the side of his head without looking away.

"Don't move," he ordered. "This is precision work."

"Good morning to you too," I croaked, forcing myself to remain still.

"It's past Noon Bell," he noted.

It said a lot about my life these days that I was largely unmoved by the sight of a man sitting by my naked body elbow-deep in my chest without my say-so. His free hand reached for the scalpel, delicately set aside, and the fingers I couldn't see pivoted something inside my body. There was a click, felt though not heard, and I felt Winter bloom through my veins. The well, I realized with widened eyes, was not gone. The mantle was still laid upon my shoulders. Taking out something that looked like a torturer's tool out of me, Hierophant clicked his tongue in satisfaction. He prodded with a long rune-covered stick at what should have been my lungs, by the angle, and though my body felt nothing I could feel something pressing against Winter. With a nod, he set aside the stick and removed the clamps.

"It'll take at least a sennight to settle properly," he said. "But the working was successful."

"Now," I said, "would be a good time to explain what exactly you did."

I was a little amused that neither of us cared all that much about my nakedness, but set that aside in favour of actually learning what the Hells was going on.

"Neither your soul nor your body could support the title without the metaphysical stabilizer the king replaced your heart by," the blind man said. "Your power began destroying your body the moment he removed it, and the edges of your soul were fracturing."

"You predicted as much," I said. "Didn't you carve some sort of protection on my ribs when you tinkered with the moon?"

"My calculations were inaccurate," he said, and he sounded deeply pained. "The runes shattered within the first hour. You are the last titled entity of Winter, Catherine. That had unforeseen consequences."

I rose to a sitting position, and spied neatly-folded clothes on a chair to my right. Ah, Hakram, you prince among men. I put a shirt on, though I couldn't be bothered to hop around putting on trousers and underclothes before I got a full explanation out of Masego.

"So things got fucked," I summarized. "How'd that translate to 'get elbow-deep inside Catherine without even buying her a bottle first'?"

"I wish you would rephrase that," he sighed. "I created an artificial framework around your soul to support the power. To anchor it properly into you, there was need for some surgical work."

"So it's all good," I proposed.

"To an extent," he conceded. "The power is no longer entirely intrinsic."

"What do entrances have to do with this?" I said, grinning wretchedly and with full awareness of what I was doing.

He visibly twitched, to my delight.

"Intrinsic," he insisted. "Meaning-"

"We all know what entrances are, Masego," I interrupted smoothly. "What does that mean, practically speaking?"

"That the framework can be attacked," he said through gritted teeth. "Through sorcerous means. It can also only withstand the fullness of your power for some time, at least until I've put together a stronger array. That may take months, there is no precedent for this I am aware of."

"So you put scaffolding around my soul," I mused.

"An uneducated yokel might describe my work in such a manner, yes," he said.

"And mages can take an axe to the scaffolding if they know what to look for," I continued. "Which would be bad."

"Yes, Catherine, someone ripping out a working attached to your very soul would be 'bad'," he hissed. "How astutely deduced of you."

"Are we talking decked in the face by Captain bad, or 'oh shit I just mouthed off to the Hashmallim' bad?" I squinted.

"That is not a quantifiable scale," he began, but rallied valiantly. "Are you familiar with the concept of cascading failures?"

"The Wasaliti doesn't have falls on it, Masego," I told him helpfully. "You really should have paid closer attention when you studied geography."

The dark-skinned man opened his mouth, closed it, then rose to his feet.

"I wash my hands of this," he announced. "We'll finish this talk when you're capable of taking anything seriously."

"Don't be like that, Zeze," I grinned.

I put my hand over my heart in a solemn oath.

"I promise not to yank your chain anymore," I lied.

He studied me for a long moment.

"You always say that," he complained. "But you never do."

He was learning, I would give him that much. He promised to send in Hakram on his way out, after giving me long enough to get dressed so I would not offend Adjutant's delicate orcish sensibilities. I'd screwed with him mostly because it amused me, but there'd been the shadow of another intent in there. A little time alone to process the Name dream I still remembered with eerie clarity would not go amiss. There was a lot to parse there, aside from a few revelations I could have done without – namely that watching Black turn into the Carrion Lord had got Ranger going and that she probably saw taking out knives as foreplay. I was not overly surprised on either count. My Name had always been heavy-handed with the hints and I knew better than to always follow the vague advice the dreams carried with them, but this one had been particularly direct. My teacher had buried his family, and odds are before the day was done I'd have to light John Farrier's pyre. A sweet thing, to be sure, but love is not what I bared my blade for. Fresh on the back of my hesitating to ask Nauk's healing as a boon, that struck particularly close to home.

There were dangers to caring for my men, and considering setting aside a war-winning trump card for a single man to wake again made them stand out starkly. My Name was telling me to grow harsher. That the moment I'd let the Lone Swordsman go I'd begun a path that would be paved with the corpses of foes and friends alike. There was truth in that I could not deny. If what I set out to accomplish was greater than any of the myriad souls that made the whole, I should not flinch in the face of sacrificing any of them. To do otherwise would be crippling myself from the onset. The priests of the House of Light would have called that embarking on the path to damnation, but oh that ship had sailed long ago hadn't it? I found it hard to reconcile the smiling man I trusted with the man bathed in starlight speaking those quiet words, but they were one and the same. Neither false, perhaps, but if they ever came at odds I knew which would win. I had seen the Black Knight's face bared of the pretence of civility.

"You're telling me to let go," I murmured.

I'd never been particularly good at that. I wasn't sure I wanted to start. You could win wars, I knew, without thinking like him. Without tallying it all in my mind, staring at Creation through the prism of gain and loss. But I remembered the sight of the burnt skull of a man who'd trusted me, believed in me, and I could not help but wonder if I might have avoided that if... Some Empress or other had once said that the worst sin a villain could commit was hesitate. She'd not been wrong. Every moment I spared to gaze at my hands and ask whether there was too much blood on them or not enough, my enemies were moving. Growing in strength as I stood still. There is a point where continuing to ask a question makes it meaningless, because Creation has already passed you by. Diabolist would not care for my qualms. Neither would the Empress, or the First Prince or whatever greater threat lurked behind them because wasn't there always something larger? I smiled bitterly. I was, in the end, a practical woman. It mattered more to live than to be someone I could live with.

I slipped on the rest of my clothes in silence, and was fitting my boots when Adjutant rapped his knuckles against the door. I called out for him to enter.

"Cat," he said, studying me closely. "How are you feeling?"

"Like the war's not over," I said bluntly. "Report."

"You were under for a day and a night," he said. "The Deoraithe are getting restless, you'll need to settle the Duchess soon. I've had Robber watch them, there's more to this than just wanting to strike at Diabolist. The Watch are acting oddly."

"Akua's making her move," I grunted. "I suppose I should be thankful she didn't show up in the middle of the battle to fuck everything up."

"She is no longer in a position where she can move quietly," Adjutant noted. "She must be very, very careful. If she slips now, even once, it will be the end of her."

"Fifteenth?" I asked, steeling myself.

"Casualties were significant," he grimaced, unknowingly baring fangs. "The fight for the upper ring bled us dry."

"Give me numbers," I said.

"Aisha's still tallying them," he said.

I frowned.

"You don't have to coddle me," I said flatly. "It's been more than a day. The captains will have handed in their reports."

"We had another situation to deal with that delayed matters," Hakram replied. "Diabolist sent envoys. They're currently awaiting audience with you outside the city."

I heard the leather rip as my fingers tightened around it. Fuck. One of these days I was going to be able to take a nap without waking to a fire urgently in need of putting out, but evidently it wouldn't be today.

"Get me another pair of boots," I sighed.

SpeckofStardust

You are the last titled entity of Winter, Catherine.
Well that's important.

Nastybarsteward

She is now all of Winter.

Engineer

Creation will now seek to create her counterpart.

Who's willing to bet Akua will through some contrived turn of events become the last titled entity of Summer?

Jonnnnz

Huh, so this means her ex will be the final boss if she ever goes full fae?

Isa Lumitus

No. Remember how this war between Winter and Summer finally ended? If Killian goes full fae, Cat will have to marry her.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Oh no, what a terrible twist of fate.

Ayenem

So glad she kept her powers and can even go full for a time.

ijustwanttoread573

I wonder if Cat will be able to find her own balance between caring and practicality or if she'll continue to become more like Black

Ed

What does it say that Catherine's 'naps' are usually the result of massive injury or telling creation to go and do itself a mischief.... or both.

Gunslinger

Cat's Name is as subtle as she is. Not surprised she still has her winter powers but being the last titled winter fae seems like it would have other implications. And now onto the final boss of book 3.

Ohh and vote for the guide on topwebfiction.com if you can. It's dropping places quite rapidly

No worries man, just let it go, let it go and don't give a shit anymore!

Robert Allaband

I guarantee that in Praes there is no saying of "do not kill the messenger", whoever Akua sent just got red shirted.

Hakurei06

When your envoys are probably hellspawn or possessed thereof, killing them is just self defence.

Reveen

The last thing Catherine wants to do when she's been severely weakened and her army mostly spent is to, to steal a term, "accidentally a war".

tmeenaks

There probably is, actually. Praes is a very Evil place and killing messengers usually does not end well for Evil people. Villains probably pick up fairly early that not doing that increases their survival odds infinitely

nehemiahnewell

Hmm, so with her keeping Winter, and possibly having upgraded her title to Princess or Queen (to mirror her Vice-Queen title), I predict she's going to remain squire until the 11th hour of the Webnovel.

Oshi

End of this book or climax of next. Honestly the whole soul is vulnerable thing keeps making me jittery. I hope she doesn't become a Death Knight...

Keyen

You wish. It's hinted so much through the books.

nehemiahnewell

Nah, she wouldn't have kept Winter if she was going to change soon. It's a demigods power, and puts her on the same level as mature heroes and villains. Her growth for a while will be in delving into what she already has.

She can't be allowed to actually transition into something stronger for a while. Honestly, even though he would make short work of her, I'm pretty sure in pure power Cat now outstrips Black.

Hakurei06

An undead knight doesn't have enough precedent to be an existing path to a name in it's own right (or it would have been mentioned) and is too close to the Black Knight's bailiwick to be breaking new ground.

My money remains on Green Knight.

Nairne .01

I keep seeing the Green Knight now and then, but I'm not really sure what that even is. Please explain.

Naeddyr

To Oshi: the Green Knight is an Arthurian myth about a knight who goes off to pick a fight with people, challenges them to a contest where you-hit-I-hit, so Sir Gawain cuts off his head and then the Green Knight picks it back and up tells Gawain to meet him at the back of a church or something I'm just wikipeding here.

Nguyen Hong Hai

No words on Nauk and Killian?

Akim

Hakram is holding back the info, so Cat does not kill the envoys on sight.

James, Mostly Harmless

Cat's Name dream could also be a warning for Bard, that her attempt to anger Black by killing Captain is also doomed. He had already resigned himself to losing those he loved again.

Engineer

That was more the Tyrant's aim- pissing Black off for what appears to be nothing short of gleeful insanity.

I don't think Black ever truly loved his companions. Remember; he has a plan to kill all of them should the need arise. We saw his thought processes in the aftermath of the Harshmallim bitch slapping him and finding out he apparently lost Captain. He shoved all the emotion in a box and kept his cool. Even showing restraint in using the last of his power to topple a house on White. Black simply does NOT lose his cool.

Ever.

Oshi

He's had decades to love and live with them. I doubt even a single member of the Calamities doesn't know where the end might come and love the life they have already had. Black has made his peace and so I'm sure has Captain.

nasiba

He does love them but knows he may have to kill them. He lamented that much to himself when he realized he didn't have long to live. He's capable of both, love and destruction but as the dream told, he didn't become the Black Knight out of love.

Gunslinger

With the loss of Captain though it wasn't just about hurting him through love but mostly shaking his pride. He got thoroughly outplayed and that is what the Bard suspects will make him err.

James, Mostly Harmless

If Cat becomes the Winter Knight because she is "the last titled entity of Winter", will Jim Butcher beat EE about the head and shoulders?

Gunslinger

She'll atleast have better winter powers than him

Engineer

A magical scaffold weak to an accomplished Mage and her next enemy is the Diabolist herself.

Ever an uphill battle.

Though I wonder why Masego simply can't recreate the "Magical Stabilizer" the Winter King had. He obviously got a good look at it when he was diagnosing Cat in preparation for his ritual. The stabilizer worked well, allowing Cat to tap completely into the power of Winter with very good side effects (cold clarity, ruthlessness and a deep Well of Power and she wasn't as weak to outside magical influences as she is now).

Why not simply emulate that?

Oshi

I'm guessing the King was able to craft and tie it into whatever well of power he has access to. Unfortunately Hierophant doesn't have that option...yet.

Muffin

Her winter powers increased, by being the last noble of winter.

It's strange tho, she still owns some kings heads to that ex winter Prince, and if she's the last of winter what prevents the grinds of fate turning to autom/spring.

Atagan

Im betting that she owns them to the title itself, and if it doesnt exist anymore she can loophole her way out of it.

MetruX

Well, for starters because she has a heart now, and she was bound to the thing as much as it was to her, making her controlable by the king after the time limit. So, even if he could recreate it, it doesn't strike me as a good idea. It's better to have a weak point than a control point, after all =X

Blobby oozes in

I would like to see Hakram-esque people with Butler name, or would that be too much stepping on the toes of TGAB?

Edrey

Now, the god of the watch is going to get killed or not?
On the other hand cat is the last noble of winter, how was it, the true of winter, all die alone, now lets pray liese dont fall from the sky after all is over

Nairne .01

I'd wager the god of the watch might be made into a well of power for the Diabolist, she always wanted a Greater Portal/
Gateway (I can't remember the right word for it).
Else, who knows, maybe the god is getting impatient with the watch for dilly-dallying with the fae and not addressing the issue.

Triumphant”

John

Could Catherine have gotten both the strategic military advantage AND a fix for Nauk (and probably a lot of others) by asking for safe passage bundled with hospitality or guest-right, in some way that explicitly included healing? Even if that means severely injured folks are off the board for months or years due to time shenanigans, at least they'd be coming back fighting fit at all – and not posing a logistical burden until then. Of course, the more complex deal would also have a greater attack surface for literal-genie exploits.

Chapter 47: Offers

“Here is the truth of our dreadful crown: to claim it a declaration of war on banality, on mediocrity. The banner of the enemy is apathy, the slow grind of the inevitable. Victor or ruin, every Tyrant that ever lived bet their madness against the bridle of the Heavens."

– Dread Empress Regalia II

I wore plate, a suit of it untouched since it had left the Imperial forges of Ater. My own had been wrecked by combat, both my power and that of my enemies. It would be days before our smiths could make anything of it, and Akua Sahelian's envoys awaited me now. The goblin steel covered by the red tabard of the Legions had been forged for someone of broader build than I, and so the aketon I wore underneath was bolstered with more padding. The cloak I that streamed down my back had long ceased to be dark, strips of banners sown onto the length by Hakram's clever hands. I knew them well, those marks. The Silver Spears, the colours of House Talbot and Kendall, and now greater honours still. Cloth of wind for the Duke of Violent Squalls, a red tongue of heatless flame torn from the Princess of High Noon and now a golden ribbon ripped from one of the banners of the Immortals, the Queen of Summer's own. The black cloth that still looked like feathers in the right light was half-covered, by now, and in time there would be more. The collar of the cloak felt tight against my neck, worn in the Praesi style, but I wore it regardless. It was a statement. All these were mighty, once. Now I bear them on my back. Think twice, before you take a swing.

The envoys Diabolist had sent numbered twelve. Three times that number in Legion mages kept them under ward, but I was unconvinced it would be enough if they truly wanted to get up to something. My mages were hardened veterans, but most they knew of magic had been taught at the War College. They were no match for practitioners who'd inherited legacies old as the Kingdom of Callow, centuries of tricks and trumps that no one outside the Wasteland had more than glimpsed. Into the pavilion that lay at the epicentre of the heavy wards, I took only two people with me. Aisha, whose knowledge of Wasteland currents I may very well need to navigate that conversation, and Hakram. Him I trusted to see what I did not, and to keep me from making mistakes. I parted the cloth flaps and found only two of Diabolist's people were seated, the rest standing patiently behind them. One Taghreb, one Soninke. Both women I had never seen before, though that meant little. Akua and I drew talent from different pools. I'd inherited ties to the Legions from my teacher and links to Named besides, but my nemesis had the highborn of Praes at her disposal.

I had her beat in Named and armies, as far as I was concerned, but in most everything else we were either matched or she my better.

The two who'd been seated when I entered smoothly rose and bowed. I'd learned a bit since my first public humiliation at Court, in large part because of the very woman at my side, and so I was able to dissect the nuances. The angle was lower than that owed to an Imperial Governor, yet higher than the one a ruling High Lord would expect. As with most things Sahelian, the gestured bordered between compliment and insult.

"Your Grace," the Soninke said in Lower Miezani. "This humble servant is Deka Wolde, mfuasa to Wolof since the Declaration. At my side stands Samiah of Fatimi, sworn to the Qara."

My eyes narrowed at the second name, flicking to the Taghreb. Fatimi was the name of the lordship Ratface's father ruled, the Supply Tribune's name before he'd taken another at the College having been Hasan Qara. He was, I remembered, a member in decent standing of the Truebloods. Whether he'd since joined with the Moderates I had no idea, but if he'd sent one of his own with Diabolist that seemed doubtful.

"Lady Sahelian sends strange envoys," Aisha drawled in Taghrebi. "Blood treats, sand shifts."

I forced myself not to raise an eyebrow. I knew what the saying meant, more or less. Praesi nobles usually only ever negotiated with other nobles, even though ruling lords and ladies rarely met face to face. It was a show of good faith to have a relative sitting at the table. When the Soninke had called herself mfuasa, it meant she was from one of the so-called 'servant blood'. Retainer families that, while not highborn, had been in the service of a High Lord's line for so long they were considered to have higher status than the rest of us peasants. Powerful mage lines usually fell into that, since it was always useful to have a few spares around to breed some talent into the blood. This Deka's family, if she was to be believed, had been in the service of the Miezans since the founding of the Empire. Still didn't make her noble, though. A statement could be read in that, considering I was now Lady of Marchford and a Duchess besides: the highest of Praesi servants stand equal to foreign titles. Ah, good ol' Akua. She never was one to pass a good slight when opportunity knocked.

"This humble servant offers manifold apologies," Deka said, bowing again. "The Lady Diabolist means no slight. It was understood that Vicequeen Foundling may not take kindly to one of the true blood."

I almost snorted. So Diabolist was worried if she sent an aristocrat all she'd get back was the head. Yeah, I could buy that.

"Sit," I said.

Deka bowed again.

"This humble servant dares not gainsay you, but must offer the word of her mistress," she said. "The Lady Diabolist requests that Lord Hierophant attend this conference."

"This isn't a place where Akua Sahelian gets to make requests," Hakram gravelled.

Another bow. Gods, her back was going to kill her by day's end. Unless they'd bred her family for the flexible spines, which horrifying enough might actually be the case. You never fucking knew with the Wasteland's old blood.

"It is as you say, Lord Adjutant," Dekka said.

I sighed.

"Aisha, have them send a runner," I told my Staff Tribune. "Make sure he knows it's not a suggestion on my part."

She nodded and saw to it. If that wasn't clear enough he might ignore the summons, and that would just be awkward. The envoys might take issue with grabbing a seat before Masego showed up, but I did not in the slightest. I took the seat appropriated from Summer a while back and leaned back against the cushion. I studied the ten standing in silence behind the envoys, now that I had the attention to spare. They were, I saw, what the soldiers of the Legions of Terror had been once upon a time. The true heart of the old hordes that had battered Callow's gates, not the greenskins tossed used to blunt charges and the levies sent to die storming walls. Soninke and Taghreb, dressed in ornate mail from head to toe that glimmered with sorcery. Their swords would be enchanted as well, every city weaving its preferred spells into the steel as they were forged. Helmets with curtains of mail on the sides and a descending prong of steel covering the nose revealed hard eyes, made to stand out by the colourful scarves tied around their necks. My people had fought men like these for centuries, until Black had replaced them with the legionaries I commanded. They were not to be underestimated, and it was their kind that would make up a great deal of Diabolist's host in Liesse. They were standing around what looked like a tightly bound rectangular package taller than I was, which brought questions considering the sorcery I could faintly feel coming from it. My men had already investigated and I'd gotten a report saying it was a mirror inside, which might mean scrying with Diabolist herself was in the cards.

There were no refreshments on the table, and I did not offer any. Aisha seated herself at my left, leaving the other side open for Hakram though he stood behind me instead. It was Masego that dropped into the chair, when he finally arrived. He looked irritated, though his brow rose in interest when he laid glass eyes on the two main envoys.

"Mages?" I asked.

"Above average talents," he said. "The Taghreb in particular. Drake blood, is it? I'd heard some families near the Eyries managed to bring it into the line."

"The compliment honours me greatly, Lord Hierophant," Samiah said, bowing even lower than she had for me. "This servant's ancestors knew fortunate encounters."

"Your ancestors managed not to turn themselves into scaled abominations when stealing properties from famously unstable lifeblood," Hierophant noted. "That takes skill as well as fortune. I confess curiosity. Is your blood thicker than that of a baseborn human? Your heart certainly beats slower."

"Masego, we don't ask people about their blood thickness at diplomatic conferences," I sighed. "Sit, you two. What does Akua want? Last I saw her I was one oath away from repeatedly shoving steel in her throat until she stopped twitching."

The two women bowed as smoothly as they had rise, seating themselves across us.

"An explanation for the mirror would be warranted, before beginning is had," Aisha said.

She spoke Lower Miezani, but the cadence of the words was all Taghrebi. The way she'd avoided using pronouns was as well. Aisha called it 'noble dialect', and every major Praesi language had a form of it. It was the kind of impersonal double-talk highborn used in negotiations with each other, conventions established ages ago that had become unspoken law. Formal diplomatic language that Akua had never bothered to use in her dealings with me before, or any highborn Praesi I'd met for that matter. That I was usually killing or coercing them at the time likely had something to do with it. Still, it was interesting she was dusting off the manners now. Whatever the envoys were after, Diabolist was willing to pretend she was taking me seriously for it. Funny how people suddenly became polite after you murdered a demigod.

"This humble servant brings word from the Lady Diabolist," Samiah said. "The tool is meant to provide sympathetic link for scrying. Authority to treat in the name of the Lady has not been granted, for the Lady would treat directly."

"Hierophant?" I prompted.

The dark-skinned mage leaned forward in his seat.

"Wolofite scrying array, the kind the Sahelians kept to themselves," he said. "A few hidden runes to record sound but--"

Light trickled between Masego's fingers and a hiss came from the hidden mirror, the acrid smell of smoke filling the pavilion.

"- they has been dealt with," he finished. "There will be no surprises. Provincial work, whoever carved these. The pathing spells to find double-bind runes have been known for decades."

If the envoys were miffed Hierophant had just casually marred what was probably an ancient and expensive heirloom belonging to their mistress, they showed no sign of it. Unlike Masego I had a decent read on the Diabolist, and I knew there was no way she'd have missed the fact that with him in the room there would be no sneaking those runes through. Odds were it was an old artefact, and he'd just casually burned a chunk of it because he disliked the quality. Either she's showing off her wealth and what little she cares of it as a reminder of the resources she has at her disposal, or it was the artefact best suited for this conversation and she simply didn't care since our talk is important enough to warrant the loss. Either way, Akua, your point has been received

"Proceed," I waved nonchalantly.

The envoys rose and bowed before delicately undoing the bindings around the cloth covering the mirror, setting it up so that it faced us to the height of a standing person. Fancy. The two women touched a palm to the silver surface they'd revealed, sorcery sinking into the metal before they stepped away and joined the soldiers. There was a ripple across the surface, and then I looked at Diabolist in the flesh. As usual, she'd dressed to make an impression. Red and gold, which I'd come to notice were favourites of hers, made up the silks of her long and perfectly fitted dress. I would have been able to appreciate the sight of that perfect hourglass figure and smooth long legs if the very sight of her didn't make me want to reach for my sword. I noticed, after a heartbeat, that she was seated on what appeared to be a throne. Some gaudy thing of gold and jewels, with arms that ended in the grinning faces of devils. I leaned towards Aisha.

"Isn't it illegal for anyone but the ruling Tyrant to sit on a throne?" I asked.

"Since the Declaration, yes," she replied faintly.

I snorted, turning my eyes back to Diabolist.

"Well, apparently you're done fucking around," I said. "There's a nice change of pace."

Akua's golden eyes studied me emotionlessly.

"It's is unfortunate," she said, "that someone gave you the impression your mannerisms are charming. Dekka?"

"This one feels power comparable in scale to a Prince of Summer," the Soninke said.

My hand rose and she began choking as her throat filled with ice, clawing at the skin desperately. Aisha stilled at my side. Not a single other person in the pavilion moved.

"Envoys are covered by law," I said. "Spies aren't."

Diabolist watched my actions with detached curiosity. She wrote her off before ever sending her, I realized. Trading a fresh eye on me for a retainer's life. I lowered my hand.

"Walk out," I said calmly. "Present yourself to the nearest legionary. You are now a prisoner of war."

The woman looked to Akua, who inclined her head by the barest fraction.

"This humble servant thanks you for your mercy, Your Grace," Dekka bowed to me.

"You're trying my patience," I noted calmly, and gave Hakram a glance.

Understanding passed without need for words. He'd see to it, and led her out.

"It was necessary," Diabolist said, "to understand who I was treating with before we began in earnest."

I smiled coldly.

"Where's all that nice flowery noble tongue gone to, Diabolist?" I asked. "Your people were being so sweet to me before."

The Soninke smiled like we were old friends. It never reached the eyes.

"This noble one will, of course, be glad to offer such courtesy should it be returned," she said.

"I'd have to stop cussing if we did, right?" I asked Aisha.

She nodded.

"Carry the fuck on," I told Diabolist with a winning smile.

I was being ornery mostly because I'd rather eat a bowl of knives than be civil to the monster on the other side of the mirror, but there was another intent behind it. Now and then I managed to get under her skin, and that had a way of tripping her up. I'd never managed it before outside a death match, but there was no loss to me here even if it failed. Flipping the finger to Akua's noble sensibilities was reward in and of itself.

"You appear to have dealt with the fae invasion, Squire," Akua said. "I offer you congratulations."

"I don't think well deep enough in Creation to throw those down that would convey how little they mean to me," I cheerfully retorted.

"You have done great service to the Empire," Diabolist said, unruffled.

I supposed after actually trying to stab her verbal digs felt a little lacking from her side of the equation.

"You've abducted one of said Empire's cities," I said. "Don't suppose you'd care to give it back?"

"That could be arranged," she said. "My use for the city itself is permanent, but the inhabitants could be released."

"The two of us had a conversation on the Blessed Isle, once," I said. "You told me you'd put everyone inside my orphanage to the sword, if I didn't renounce my Name. Do you remember what I replied, that night?"

"That you would make a monument to ruin of me," Akua Sahelian said, and she sounded almost fond. "You refused me, naturally. Those, however, were forty lives. I hold over a hundred thousand of your countrymen in my palm now."

"You know that's not how that works," I serenely said. "I let one of your pack of vultures pull this on me once then every High Lord will threaten to start summoning demons in Callowan cities for leverage."

Diabolist cocked her head to the side.

"When we first met, you would have hesitated," she praised. "I must confess I rather enjoy the woman you've become, Catherine. You've been scoured of your former impurities."

"Spoken like someone I'm going to murder before the year is out," I said. "Is this the part where you tell me we're not so different, that we could work together? You burned that bridge when you let the demon loose, Akua."

"A blow meant to cripple you, that you dealt with in a way that demonstrated great aptitude," Diabolist said. "Had you not been able to weather the likes of it, we would not be speaking."

I blinked.

"You've never actually admitted to that before," I slowly said.

"There is a certain satisfaction in discarding the pretence," the dark-skinned beauty mused. "You should be aware by now I've never seriously attempted to take your life."

"You were never aiming to be Black's apprentice, I know," I flatly said. "Bit of a jump going from that to us being friendly, considering you did try to cripple me several times and are directly responsible for the death of both soldiers and innocents under my charge."

"The alternative to the posturing would have been standing against the Empress prematurely," she said. "We both know the outcome of such a trial. It was never personal, Catherine. While I do find you grating, you are not without redeeming qualities."

Aisha leaned it.

"She may very well mean what she says," the officer murmured. "While her actions are those of a foe by the customs of your people, to a Praesi allying with her would not be unthinkable should the rewards be sufficient."

I watched the Diabolist, that genuinely friendly visage she must have spent years perfecting. I was not looking at a person so much as a collection of cold ambitions that masqueraded as one.

"I'm being told you might mean that," I said. "But we understand each other, don't we Akua? You know what I think of your Great Game. You know better than to think I'm going to link hands with the likes of you, no matter what you offer."

I heard Adjutant silently return to the pavilion, coming to stand behind me.

"You speak so because you believe I am going to lose," Diabolist said. "That is not an unreasonable position."

"I know you're going to lose," I said. "You have a month before Liesse has to come down, or you have a hundred thousand rioters on your hands. And the moment you're grounded, I'll be leading the largest army since the Conquest to take your head."

"And so we touch upon the reason I requested the presence of the Hierophant," she said.

I glanced at Masego. He didn't react. I elbowed him.

"Is it over?" he asked.

"Pay attention," I chided. "She's got something she wants to say that concerns you."

He looked dubious, but his face turned to Akua.

"As the only son of Lord Warlock, I assume you are familiar with what the Calamities refer to as the 'Dark Day protocol'."

Masego frowned.

"I am," he said. "It's a classification for workings they use. The best way to describe them would be kingdom-killers. Uncle Amadeus has never lifted restriction on their use that I know of, though study is another matter."

"Twenty years ago," Diabolist said, "Lord Warlock comprehensively researched what I believe came to be called the Still Water project."

It was distressing the way Masego paused at that.

"That is under Imperial seal," he said. "Everyone involved was killed and their souls bound to prevent necromancy. Uncle said if it ever got out we could do that there would be a Crusade mobilized within the month."

"A trial was run," Akua said.

"In a closed pocket," Hierophant said and his voice shook. "You... You have a ritual that can – no a ritual would have been noticed. You have an artefact that allows you to scry other dimensions. Gods, the advances that could lead to. The Hells could be mapped with this. Arcadia, we could learn the full boundaries of Creation."

I'd never before seen him look hungry, desire twisting his features.

"It is currently in my possession," Diabolist said. "And could be made available for your study, should you choose neutrality in the coming conflict."

Yeah, I wasn't letting that go.

"It's yours after we kill her," I said. "Hierophant, focus. Still Water, what does it mean?"

"Father was trying to discover if necromantic state could be achieved almost entirely through alchemy with sorcery as only a trigger," Masego said. "After consuming sufficient amounts of a reagent humans can be turned into undead with a minor ritual, with exponential potential for number of affected as relative to expended power."

"That sounds like an undead plague," I frowned. "The Empire's used those on Callow before, they don't work. The House of Light always ends them in the crib."

"It is metamorphosis, Catherine, not a magical disease," he said impatiently. "Miraculous healing has limits. It can heal a sickness but not change the natural state of being of a human – reconnect a cut limb but not regrow it. The power of the priests would kill the undead, not cure them."

I breathed in sharply. Shit. If there was no cure and all that was needed was for people to imbibe the substance, then the only limit on that was the amount of reagents the Empire could afford – and Praes was very, very rich. If they play it quiet enough, half of the Principate could be a shambling horde before they realize what's happening. And Akua had implied she knew of this.

"The refugees," I said. "The people of Liesse. You fed them the substance."

"Our understanding of the process was incomplete," Diabolist conceded. "It took me several months instead of the theorized one to reach the ideal concentration. The process was accelerated when I held the only available source of water, of course. As you can see, it is temporary for you to have the largest army on the field. That can be remedied in the span of an hour should I wish it."

"I'm not sure I have the words to express how dire the consequences of that would be, for you," I quietly said.

"I would rather not employ these means myself," Akua easily said. "Yet you now understand I am not in nearly as desperate straits as you believed. Which is now I would now make you an offer."

My fingers clenched until the knuckles turned white.

"Would you like to rule Callow?" the Diabolist asked. "Truly rule it, I mean. Not whatever ramshackle arrangement the Empress promised you. You would be queen in truth."

"Under you," I said.

"Not a dishonourable state of affairs, as the rest of Calernia would be soon to follow," she said. "I do not care, Catherine, for the petty duties of running this continent so long as it bows to me. I understand, of course, that by the customs of your people I have caused personal offence. I would provide gift to even the balance. I am given to understand one of your companions, the Legate Nauk, was wounded beyond your means to heal. I will return him to fullness of health myself, as a gesture of good will. Truly, so long as you limit your ambitions to the bounds of Callow is there is no reason the two of us cannot find accord. You would find me a most tolerant ruler."

I closed my eyes, sought calm and found only Winter. A frozen landscape without end, reflecting the ragged edges of my anger in a sprawling hall of mirrors. The air turned cool. The wards around us shivered. How many times am I going to have to betray you, Nauk? But I had not traded him for a boon, and I would not trade him for an empire. Eyes opened, and the envoys ahead flinched.

"Here is my own offer, Akua Sahelian," I said softly. "Set Liesse down. Abandon everything, flee to Ashur and sell what you must to buy passage across the Tyrian Sea. If you do that, spare me the horror of bringing down everything you've ever built on your head, you'll keep your life. This I call fair bargain, and more than you deserve."

"I had hoped," Diabolist said, "that I would not need to break you before we came to an arrangement. If you march against me, terms will not be offered when next we meet. They will be given."

"I give you oath, Diabolist," I said and I hardly recognized my voice for it was a thing of ice and iron. "If you do this, there is no place in Creation or beyond that will safeguard you from me. Not Heavens or Hells, not even if every lord in Arcadia swears to you. The doom I promise you will have men trembling in a thousand years when they speak of Akua's Folly and the woe that came from it."

The Diabolist smiled tenderly, as if I had confessed my love for her.

"Oh, Catherine," she murmured. "I almost regret it, that this ends with you kneeling."

Before she'd finished the last word I had flipped the table and crossed the pavilion, sword in hand and shoved to the hilt through the mirror. Ice spread through it and it broke with a deafening crack, shattering in a hundred pieces of shining silver. I did not bother to look at the remaining envoy or her escort.

"If any of them move," I told Adjutant, "kill them all. I want them shackled and in a dark hole before a quarter hour's passed."

He nodded slowly as I strode out of the tent. Hierophant followed, panting as he tried to catch up.

"Catherine," he gasped. "Wait."

I turned to him, forcing calm.

"The array on Liesse," Masego said. "It's too large. The power of the entity she bound does not make sense if Still Water is her intent. She could achieve it with something a hundredth the size and a dozen mages."

I froze.

"This isn't it," I croaked.

Hierophant shook his head.

"She has yet to reveal her weapon," he said.

A city floating in the sky, a god stolen and bound, a hundred thousand men turned undead. All of this, and it was only the opening of the waltz.

It was time, I thought, for hard measures.

danh3107

Man I'm running out of epithets and curses concerning christ and a whole bunch of other people. I must have ran through a dozen reading the last several paragraphs alone.

I need this series in print already, I'll be at the first book signing

Gunslinger

At the risk of being presumptuous if you're interested in supporting the author on patreon (<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>)

We're only 200 dollars away from three updates a week

Adrian

Can the author confirm this? sorry to sound paranoid but these days you can't never be sure

NerfContessa

Agreed, can't wait till they are in print and formally betaed and edited.

Big Brother

Oh, hard measures are gonna be so fun to see. Liesse might end up exploding like the Death Star, or Akua could find her soul confined to the razor edges of the inside of Cat's blade. Hell, if Akua actually activates the Still Water protocol, Cat might be able to just take control of the new undead army. She already killed and raised an entire formation of Summer Immortals in an instant, who were probably a LOT tougher than some shambling ghoul made from mortals.

Gunslinger

I'm pretty sure they'd be tied it into some aspect of the diabolist. I do think Catherine will find it that easy.

Adrian

You just accidentally nailed one more reason why Cat could do it, remember what is her first new aspect?

IDKWhoitis

I was half expecting the magic mirror to have a curse or something.

Also, how many chapters are left in this book?

Shequi

Is breaking a mirror considered 7 years bad luck, in Callow?

nipi

Awww... Cat got baited.

Naeddyr

Man, Akua is growing on me, looking forward to seeing more of her in the far future where she definitely will still be around 😊

Robert Allaband

Hard to be around after Cat kills her.

Nairne .01

Not if her soul is bound to a piece of equipment and forced to serve.

nipi

Well we do know that her soul is definitely not in her body. Chances are Cat is going to kill Akua's body and her dad but her pissed off spirit will evade Cat for a while longer.

Nairne .01

Or one of the devils she has bound already knows where her soul is and becoming a disembodied spirit will equalize to an eternity of torment or something along those lines.

SQuid

She's a fantastic antagonist and just an utterly, utterly irredeemable person.

Shequi

Oh Akua, you really have surpassed all the worst that Praes has to offer.

I'm going to enjoy reading how Cat destroys everything you are.

Nairne .01

I second that. What are the hard measures she will employ? I can't wait to find out.

DroughtBringer

"I give you oath, Diabolist," I said and I hardly recognized my voice for it was a thing of ice and iron. "If you do this, there is no place in Creation or beyond that will safeguard you from me. The doom I promise you will have men trembling in a thousand years when they speak of Akua's Folly and the woe that came from it."

Stuff is about to get real!
Amazing chapter! 11 out of 2!

darkening

As awesome as the speech is, I find myself wondering how she's going to live up to it. I mean, it feels more the Cat thing to do to just shove a sword through her and call it a day. I guess killing her father first would be a good start? Only thing she loves and all that.

SQuid

I could see Cat getting all Praesi on Akuas father in a fit of cold rage. More than likely though she'll just turn Akua over to Heirophant for a little while before a total execution.

argentumArbiter

I mean, she made an oath that sounded pretty heroic, and we all know how powerful the Story is in this universe. Considering the fact that, as Black said earlier, that the heroes always win, Cat may get some help from fate along the way.

Terion

Akua's Folly and the Woe that came from it. (capital W mine)

It seems to mean that – in a thousand years – people will tremble. Not so much at the depth of Akua's Folly compared to that of others, but at the Woe that it created. It seems to imply that the Woe will have effects reaching far beyond Akua's petty schemes. Already the Woe has wrought a fundamental change on Arcadia on a level that even beings like the Warlock have not done before and – assuming Catherine is speaking prophetically – will never happen again. I'm not sure whether there's a precedent for anyone successfully standing up to, and stealing from, an angelic choir.

It seems that every time Catherine speaks in some significant capacity, it is heavy with prophecy and foreshadowing. I wonder whether her penchant for prophecy and foreshadowing has a foundation in-universe, or is just because it works so well in the storytelling. Whereas Black seems to be miles ahead of Catherine when it comes to recognising stories and thereby trying to avoid their outcome, it seems Catherine will simply rewrite the story to her liking and force it into existence around her. An oddly bardic power, which lends some credence to the idea that Akua is in the end just a small foe, and ultimately Catherine has to go up against the Wandering Bard (as an agent of the gods above). She could become the opposing agent of the gods below. I wonder if she might transition to a very unusual Name from the Squire. Her Role seems to be more akin to a prophet. Ironically she would most likely be violently opposed to the very notion.

Rikel

The Wandering Bard recounts every story which has ever been, holding them close and keeping them moving- raising heroes to serve.

Catherine would not agree to that. She would Tell a new story- Warp the fabric of reality to fit her tale, and Act as she felt she must to change all.

I look forward to seeing what the Storyteller might create.

ArkhCthuul

Her Name will be Author.

And the Gods above and below will tremble.

Stephen R. Marsh

Not to mention that Akua just threw down the gauntlet against Black and the Empress.

Nguyen Hong Hai

So, mass poison as an opening move? I guess Akua end game would involve big honking WMD.

nipi

Nah! Seems like she plans to copy the Dead King.

Engineer

Oh, oh my.

This is getting interesting.

Akua has a dead army she can raise that Cat can potentially control and Cat has a magical scaffolding that would be weak to Diabolist's influence.

They symmetry is a thing of beauty...

Nairne .01

Hard to call it symmetry if it goes like this:

Akua raises the undead army.

Cat takes control

Akua brakes the scaffolding

Cat explodes / her soul withers away.

nipi

Why would Cat be able to control them? Cat can control the undead she raises not those of others. Heck when she was undead she admitted that staying undead would be a potential weakness as others are better at necromancy and could potentially take control of her.

argentumArbiter

She could Take control through her aspect and her penchant for necromancy, maybe not of all of them but a good amount

Engineer

Anybody care to guess what will happen should Cat use BREAK on that array keeping a god bound and chained?

I'm thinking all sorts of WIN.

The ensuing casualties would give Cat the necessary weight to become the DEATH KNIGHT.

nick012000

I'm almost certain that Malicia was aware that Akua was going to enact Still Water. It's possible that she even facilitated it. In the interlude where Akua's mother died, she mentioned that she was giving Akua under-the-table assistance gathering reagents, didn't she?

nehemiahnewell

Giving her resoruces, yes. But for the real weapon, not Still Water. She doesn't need Akua's help to use Still Water if she wanted to. Diabolist has some terror Malicia feels can be leveraged to make Praesi safe, once it's placed in her hands. A MAD weapon, which Still Water is not.

letouriste

exactly;)
because the deoraithe god seems have been from the waning woods i'm thinking something destroying nature(plague? destruction of grounds and crops? something like that)

nipi

Malicia might be sending a message that its better to have her on the throne. Just look at what the alternative is.

SpeckofStardust

Whats cute to me is how it seems Akua seems to intend to let Catherine Live.

"Oh, Catherine," she murmured. "I almost regret it, that this ends with you kneeling."

Nairne .01

Oh, I'm willing to bet she wants her as a servant. Cat has proven herself very capable after all.

letouriste

well,for her cat is her playmate...a scary playmate

MetruX

Praesi see things differently, if Cat wasn't able to kill her, she wouldn't even consider her as a servant. Wich just means that it's more prestigious to have THIS degenerated mad dog under her than dead by her hands. Besides, she needs to know who the "next generation" of the Praesi Named will be, and with her she has a substitute for Amadeus.

nipi

Cat could still bow to her while turned undead. No need to assume her life would be spared.

Gunslinger

Undead zombies, a potential gate to one of hells. The Dead King needs to sue for copyright infringement.

Cat going all Darth Vader on ice was pretty cool but the oath topped it. Akua's folly and the woe that comes from it, loved the call to Cat's group.

Cat really needs to have a fling with someone. Now shes stuttering when seeing Diabolist.

Well her thoughts are stuttering.

Reveen

Oooh! I will start actually loving Akua if she manages to kickstart the blood soaked carnival of carnage and death that this story has been playing chicken with for the last forty chapters.

Like, Still Waters is just ripe to spiral out of control and tear Callow and the Wasteland a new one. That's the only interesting option, the only other option is Catherine appropriating it as leverage and it becoming yet another excuse for the story to avoid having more interesting conflict.

John Galt

Akua's Folly. Notice the capitalization and the voice change. Akua is going to get rekt.

Unnamed goblin

And now the true test: Hold fast or expire.

DocTao

Cant wait for this to continue! You have well and truly caught me, I hope very much that you may continue to write and we may follow your works. Compliments once again.

Ethereal

Perhaps this is the joke. That in the end Akua WILL end up working alongside Catherine and the Woe in a horrifically effective combination of the old ways and the new, and the world will tremble to hear of it one thousand years later.

Big Brother

"To claim it a declaration" isn't actually improper grammar. It's an older style of English that doesn't see much use in modern writing. If it makes it easier, try reading it like "To claim it, a declaration"

Big Brother

This was meant to be a reply to Gunslinger, whoops.

Sistema

Catherine better be careful. We know that her world mirrors the fae on some level and she just forced the marriage of two sworn enemies. This could end up with her being forced to marry Akua in order to save Creation

oldschoolvillain

The marriage between the Fae courts was actually mirroring the forced union of Callow and Praes, rather than foreshadowing one with Cat, I think, given her rather vigorous refusal when political marriage was brought up by her cavalry grandmaster.

Panic

Hot. Just imagine the two of them hate fucking. I mean Akua is many things. Manipulative. Sociopathic. Evil. But she is not ugly!

I don't think it'd work, but it is an interesting crack ship. 😊

Chapter 48: Interrogation

"I was once told that character is what you are in the dark. I found, my dear Chancellor, that I was the dark."

– Dread Emperor Sorcerous

"There," Hierophant said.

It had been a pleasant surprise to learn that Masego had not ignored the talks with Diabolist purely because the matters discussed bored him. He had, in fact, been tracking the other end of the scrying spell since its establishment. Though Akua had used relays to muddy the water, I doubted she'd seriously expected her work to fool the eyes of a Named mage. The implication there lay bare: it didn't matter if we knew where she was, because she was ready to pull the trigger at any time. On Still Water, and whatever else she had up her sleeve. The neatly ordered lines of light in the air formed a broad map of Callow, though it ignored cities for geographical features. Studying it, I picked one of the stones Juniper used when planning operations and set it down on the earthly map I'd sent for.

"This looks accurate to you?" I said.

The Soninke did not turn, and I got the eerie impression he was looking with his glass eyes through the back of his head.

"Half an inch upwards," he said.

I adjusted and grimaced as he dismissed the spell.

"No way to tell if she's set down, is there?" I asked.

"She will have to, to use her array," Hierophant said. "On a working of this scale, the slightest imprecision would have massive repercussion. I've never heard of a flying fortress capable of remaining entirely still in the sky."

So this, I thought, was going to be our battlefield. Akua had brought Liesse in the heartlands of Callow, precisely at the intersection of three cities: Vale, Ankou and Southpool. All cities that had gone largely untouched by the Liesse Rebellion and what men were already beginning to call the Arcadian War. On one hand, that brought her within marching distance of the legions under the command of Marshal Grem One-Eye. On the other hand, those legions were posted there because they were in spitting distance of the border with the Principate. There was, I knew, no realistic way to keep anything that would go down there quiet abroad. Diaobolist, as was her habit, had begun to fuck us over from the very beginning. Black and Malicia had spies under every rock in this land, but not even that would be enough to keep the method of necromancy used here under wraps.

It'd taken another sit down with Masego to understand how much of problem it would be if Still Water got out. I knew there was something called Keter's Due that was one of the limits of sorcery, the amount of power that got wasted with every spell and ritual, and apparently the Due one was one of the reasons why large rituals were only ever used if you didn't mind wrecking wherever they took place – like, infamously, the Kingdom of the Dead. Warlock's horror project was bad news in part because most the heavy lifting was done through alchemy, with only the trigger being sorcery. It could be used again and again without any great resource investment save the reagents. Calling it world-shaking innovation would be stretching a bit, in my opinion, since there were still obvious limits on how it could be employed. If people didn't imbibe enough of the reagents, the ritual wouldn't do much at all, and after the initial use other nations would certainly start keeping an eye out for it.

It was still a brutal weapon, one that had the potential to wreck large swaths of territory if employed properly – which it would be, if the Empress and Black were the ones plotting the use. Given that the First Prince was already itching for a Crusade, there would be consequences when it got out. The best I could hope for was to slow the spread of information and destroy the proof. I knew better than to hope that would lead to more than a delay. Diaobolist had just effectively ensured we'd be at war with the Principate within a few years, at a guess the moment they finished getting on war footing. Given the titanic size of Procer and what it would actually mean to have its full strength thrown at the Empire, I doubted Black would give them the time to gear up in peace. He'd strike first and strike hard, aiming to cripple them before they mustered their armies properly. If they don't start the war, we will. Dark as the thought was, I would prefer the latter. Better to fight on Proceran soil than Callowan.

I reached for the bottle and topped up my glass. I had no idea how long Diabolist would need to finish her array, assuming she hadn't already, and that meant the time scale of this campaign was still in the dark. If I took a few months to gather reinforcement, was I going to have to deal with the sky raining fire? On the other hand, with the army that stood on the other side, could I afford not to? Unless she'd gotten reinforcements since her scrap with the Princess of High Noon, Diabolist had only six thousand proper soldiers but twice that in undead and devils. Then she'd get the entire population of Liesse, of course, and she still had one 'greater devil'. For something to qualify as greater in the eyes of a Princess of Summer meant it wasn't to be taken lightly, by my reckoning. It would mean nothing to hit fast if my armies failed to take the city. There are still so many unknowns, I thought, and glanced as Masego made to leave.

"Stay," I said. "I need you for the coming conversation."

"Though my judgement is laudable, I have not much exercised it in matters of war," Hierophant said.

"This one's not about war, not exactly," I said. "I sent for Duchess Kegan. I want to know exactly what Diabolist got her hands on that has her so worried and what the consequences of killing it would be."

The blindfold creased with his brow.

"Deoraithe are notoriously secretive," he said.

"And it'll be the three of us in the tent alone," I grunted. "I already am compromising. I'd rather have Hakram and Juniper in here as well."

"And you believe she will see it this way?" the blind man asked, genuinely curious.

"Let's hope she's reasonable," I said.

The mage looked amused at that, for some reason, but he grabbed the seat at the edge of the table. It was meant for over a dozen, the same I used for staff meetings, and looked rather strange so empty when I'd grown used to it being full. I drank from my cup as Hierophant summoned the bottle to him and poured himself one as well. I raised an eyebrow.

"Would it really have been that much of an effort to get up?" I said.

"You sound like Father," he muttered.

Whatever I would have made of that – and already I had ideas – had to be set aside for the moment, as Kegan graced us with her presence. It would be revisited though, the grin I sent Masego's way promised as much.

"Your Grace," the Duchess greeted me, then grudgingly inclined her head at Masego. "Lord Hierophant."

"Duchess Kegan," I replied over the rim of my cup. "Please, sit."

The courtesies on her part were stiff, and I knew exactly why. Twenty thousand Deoraithe had marched out of Daoine, a quarter of them Watch, and now only fourteen thousand remained. Her casualties had the Battle of Four Armies and One had been relatively light, but Dormer had been bloody business. Made worse, I knew, by the fact that Juniper had refused her use of the Watch when she struggled against the Summer regulars in the outer city. Instead they had been sent to fight the Immortals, and courted disaster there as well. I'd yet to get a spoke report, but the written one I'd gotten my hands on said the Watch had been getting brutalized before Thief came to their aid by snatching the standard on that flank. Half the Watch had been buried, either here or in Arcadia. It was the kind of losses that would take a generation to recover from, and we hadn't even come in sight of Liesse yet. Kegan took a seat distant from both mine and Masego's, to my dark amusement. It was almost childish, the three of us sharing a table meant for four times our number as if there was nothing odd in it.

"Your messenger did not specify the reason for your summons, only that the matter was urgent," the Duchess said.

She eyed the bottle, but did not reach for it. I had no intention of wasting Vale summer wine on the likes of her, and so did not offer.

"We know where the Diabolist is," I said, and gestured at the table.

She glanced at it, eyes lingering on the stone I'd placed.

"A blunder on her part," the Deoraithe said. "You could easily muster forces from the adjoining cities without even use of portals. Orders through scrying would allow you to gather and arm men in great numbers."

"I'm considering my options," I said.

I balked at the idea of sending half-trained civilians into the den of madness Akua would have prepared for them, but I was not unaware I might not have a choice. What we had left might not be enough to deal with more than a hundred thousand undead, much less the horde of devils she was sure to have contracts for.

"That is why I called for you, as it happens," I continued. "The odds are already stark as is. We can't afford to go in blind."

The tan face of the aristocrat went blank.

"I have already shared with you what I can," she said.

I raised an eyebrow. She'd told me that whatever Akua had bound 'could be considered a deity of sort', which was actually less than what Masego had been able to tell me – and all he knew was second-hand from his father.

"Behavioural changes were observed in the Watch," Hierophant said. "Of this you have not spoken, or truly much at all."

Kegan's eyes went cold.

"Has your esteemed father not put enough of my people under the knife to discern some truths?" she said.

Ah, sarcasm. She should know better than to think that would work on Masego. He had a decent read on those he knew well, but strangers?

"No," Hierophant replied frankly. "He is under orders never to grab a member of the Watch without legal cause, which has been very difficult since the Conquest."

"How sad for him," Kegan replied blandly.

"That's very kind of you," Masego said, sounding surprised. "It has been very irritating to have such a fascinating mystery within reach but forbidden from study."

"Warlock's not the one asking you the question, Duchess," I said. "I am."

The woman's eyes returned to me.

"The terms of our treaty with the Tower place the affairs of internal rule within our sole purview," she said.

"And if the thing was still within your borders, I'd cheerfully pretend it didn't exist," I said. "It isn't. It's being used as fuel for whatever Diabolist means to throw at us, and I'm not taking a swing at that without a broad idea of what's waiting on the other side."

"The breach of terms was Praesi," Kegan stiffly said. "It is not for Daoine to pay the price for that treachery."

"Akua Sahelian has been attainted as rebel by the Empress," I sighed. "You know who stands for Praes, right now? I do. You know, the person trying to fix this fucking mess."

"A mess you have no small hand in making," the duchess coldly said. "Did you not personally petition the Court to have the Diabolist named governess of Liesse?"

"I was bound by oath to do as much," I reply, but it was a weak answer and I knew it.

It had occurred to me, of late, that it was hard to tell if I was the pillar propping up Callow or the stone around it's people's neck. I wasn't done losing sleep over that, but neither was I going to let it bind my hands when dealing with a woman actively refusing to inform me of a danger we both faced.

"And I am bound by duty not to speak of this matter," Kegan said.

I let out a long breath and calmly put my hand on the table. The other woman watched it, and her features loosened almost imperceptibly when she saw the wood had not fogged or frozen. She thought it meant I wasn't furious. Wrong. It just means I've gotten back a sliver of control.

"I've made a lot of oaths and promises, in the last few months," I calmly said. "Some pretty grandiose threats, too. I won't bother with that here, Kegan. I'll just put two truths in front of you. The first is this: to have a decent chance at victory, I need to know what I'm facing. The second is this: I do not need your consent to get an answer."

I could Speak, I could have Hierophant rip it out of her mind or half a dozen other ways. With ever month my arsenal grew, and I grew less reluctant to use it. I could use any of those tools and even make sure she wouldn't remember a bit of it when she left this tent. Masego had learned much from his work against fae in the south, when I sent him to use Summer against the Diabolist.

"You have made much of treating fairly," Kegan said, but I could see fear there.

"And I will again," I said. "I'll offer mercy whenever I can. Justice too, as much as it can be had -but never when the cost is defeat. That is my line in the sand. Cross it at your peril."

The duchess met my eyes, even afraid, and for that she won my respect. It would not stop me from asking Hierophant to carve open her mind, if I had to.

"A lesser evil is still an evil," she bitterly said.

"I prefer necessary to lesser," I said, "but will not quibble over the rest."

Kegan breathed out, and reached for the wine. She poured herself a glass and wet her lips before speaking.

"It is not a god in the way Praesi would know of it," she said. "It is a gestalt."

Masego gasped.

"Souls," he said.

Kegan nodded.

"Every single one of the People that have died since the elves took the Golden Bloom from us," she said. "Millions, by now."

"And the Watch is bound to them," I said.

"They borrow the strength of our ancestors, one day to take back our home," the duchess said.

"You forged a god," Hierophant said, and spoke with a touch of awe. "This might be the single greatest working of necromancy Creation has ever known. Unlike Keter it would keep growing. Every decade you can have more Watchmen, or stronger."

I had other worries.

"If Diabolist controls your... gestalt," I said. "Can she control the Watch through it?"

"The past rulers of Daoine had similar worries," Kegan said. "A degree of separation was created to prevent a Warlock from effecting this should they find out. It is one of the reasons the Watch has not been able to grow more numerous but not more powerful over the centuries. The number of oaths that can be taken is limited. The usurpation was still felt, however. It is quite unpleasant."

"You should have spoken of this to Father years ago," Hierophant began excitedly, "there are numerous theories that-"

I cut him off with a raised hand.

"Can it be destroyed?" I asked.

"Yes," she reluctantly said.

"And what would the consequences of that would be?" I pressed.

"I am unsure," she admitted, and I turned to Masego.

"You'd be destroying the gestalt, not the souls," Hierophant noted. "As individual entities they would go on existing, released from whatever binding kept them together."

I grimaced.

"That sounds bad," I said. "It would damage the surroundings, right?"

"Containing them in a location would be feasible, with the right set of wards," he said. "Otherwise, should they be unconstrained, I imagine over a third of Callow would be turned into a blasted, violently haunted wasteland. I'll need a direct look or more precise numbers to project the exact fallout."

"I have brought specialists to wrest back control from the Diabolist," the duchess said. "Preventing her from interfering with the process is the most salient issue."

Glass eyes turned to her.

"It find it unlikely," Hierophant said, "that Deoraithe mages could undo the work of a Named practitioner of Akua Sahelian's skill."

I drummed my fingers against the wood.

"Duchess, get your people talking with Hierophant," I ordered. "We'll see how feasible your way is. I'd much prefer it was. But if it isn't..."

I grimaced.

"Well, Diabolist put a sharper in the middle of her army," I said. "I'm not above lighting it to finish the war."

WEW LAD WASN'T EXPECTING THAT

DroughtBringer

Woah.

Still another "slow chapter, but it doesn't stop me from loving it.

Thanks for the great story.

Big Brother

Man, that is an amazing weapon. Natural or Artificial, a God is nothing to be sneezed at.

This actually reminds me of the Korean manhwa "The Gamer" and the new "God" ARC Company, forged from the collection of souls known as The Abyss Company and given sapience and spheres of influence.

nehemiahnewell

Huh. I wasn't really taking the people thinking Death Knight as the name she grows into very seriously, but... if she saves or gains control of the gestalt that would be a great way path towards such a name.

RoflCat

I vote Queen of Woe/Queen of the Frost Wraiths.

Because might as well go for an immortal ghost army if she want to cut down her losses (since I doubt any future enemy will be less threatening then what Diabolist will pull)

If Akua turn the citizens into undead, then maybe Cath can bound the soul of the Deoraithe to them, and take control of the army that way.

Which would makes her undead army

1. Callowan (body)
2. Deoraithe (soul)
3. Winter (since they're now under the last named entity of Winter)

Since Summer is gone they don't have obligation to fight as Winter.

As Callowan they basically are the Gallowborne++

So if Cath can go take back the Golden Bloom, she'd fulfill the Deoraithe's wish and probably can bargain for their servitude in return.

IDKWhoitis

Imagine the international fallout. Hearing that Praes fought the elves, and won.

A mega crusade with external factors would be organized immediately.

Gunslinger

Ohh boy, isn't bind one of Akua's aspects? Those millions of souls aren't going anywhere

soonnanandnaanssoon

If she Binds, then Claims from the Deoraithe gestalt...I honestly think that's what she plans to do to channel the god's power into her array.

boballab

You forget that Cat has an aspect called Take and can rip them away if Akua binds them.

greatwyrmgold

Of course, if Akua is half the villain she thinks she is, she has a contingency for her greatest rival using her first (or third/fourth, depending on how you count) Aspect.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Oh damn, and maybe even Call to work synergetically with the array and summon a God Below into Creation. What better a Diabolist than to summon, well, the most diabolical, highest level of Evil?

nipi

I very much doubt shed summon a God from Below. Just recall her paling when Cat proposed swearing their oath on the Gods Below.

She wants to rule all of creation not perhaps be second in command to its ruler.

KageLupus

Agreed. From a practical standpoint, Diabolist summoning a God from Below doesn't really make any sense. All of the hints of her plan that we have seen in her interlude suggest that her master plan is to escape her mother's plan for her to be the next Empress. She also wants to bring back the golden age of Villainy that she see Black and Malicia subverting. She also also was aiming to use a Hashmallim to fuel her ritual, and I feel like that kind of power wouldn't be strictly useful for summoning a God from Below.

If I had to really guess, I would say that Akhua's plan is to raise herself up to something like godhood, or at the very least to get on the same level as Triumphant. Maybe she wants to recreate the greater portal that caused the Kingdom of the Dead. Whatever the mechanism, I can see her trying to turn Callow into a kind of Neo Praes, opposed to the Tower and a bastion for the forces of Evil left in the world.

RoflCat

@KageLupus: Well, if she want to be deified, I think there's a good chance she'll eat a "Fall" for her pride (*coughLucifercough*) would be interesting if it's a sort of repeat of the William fight, when Akua got blindsided for starting a monologue.

shieldredblog

Yes, but when she used it to bind a Prince of Summer it was only possible because he was from outside of creation and therefore fell under the specific skillset of her name. Necromancy is actually outside her name.

JackbeThimble

This makes it a little strange in retrospect that the Elves were trying to pre-emptively assassinate Heiress in the epilogue of book 2. Or were they not actually after her? Maybe the emerald blades were in Liesse to destroy this gestalt before it could threaten them.

nipi

I think the elves were worried that Akua might become the next equivalent of Triumphant. So they decided in favor of a preemptive strike instead of fleeing to Arcadia again.

Shequi

Oh boy, a theoretically Good nation utilising necromancy to empower its troops. I can definitely see why Kegan's house didn't want that getting out; nevermind the Warlocks, half of the Good nations would object.

Now, questions: Cat is half Deoraithe; Would she be sucked into this gestalt if she died? Is this gestalt the source of the power that "wanted" Cat to stay alive when Masego was resurrecting her during the battle for Liesse? Could Cat utilise the empowerment without the "degree of separation" Kegan speaks of?

nipi

Im thinking the Deoraithe willingly become a part of the gestalt. Just goes to show how deep their hate for the Golden Bloom and longing for their homeland runs.

Not the Golden Bloom isnt an oddity itself. Racist elves that drove people out of their homeland but consider themselves to be on the side of good. Only heroes are worthy of grudgingly speaking to in their carrion tongue.

shieldredblog

I don't find the elves odd at all.
Good after all clearly doesn't mean humble or kind.
Elves in this story are almost demigods as well (walking domains). Why would immortal demi gods devoted to the harsh Good of Creation be anything but Supremacist?

Idan Dor

I'm going to guess that Cat is going to take an Oath before this is over. She already has the arcadia fast travel = we are going to fight some elves soon enough. The only reason however, that Cat would want to fight the damned elves is if she has to. Therefore, an Oath is due.

It might even be useful and not just a trick so that she can win against Akua.

nipi

Im thinking the same. Well thats one crown for the prince of Nightfalls feet. The one that need not be a mortal rulers.

Idan Dor

I was under the impression that the Prince's crowns was about the free cities and the "one" being the hierarch. That should set up the fight with those guys, can't have some part of creation not burned to the ground in this quest.

Trickster315

I find it interesting that through cat's efforts to save Callow she's actually doing a ton of damage to the people and land that she loves. Certainly more than when the Presi were in charge.

Dimensional

Honestly my only prediction at this point is that one side has a flying fortress and the other has the aspect of FALL. – Just saying.

sheer_falacy

That would be hilarious but she's probably landed it so that her ritual array can be stable.

Akim

So true.

But that rather sounds like the start of the battle than its end

thespaceinvader

Soooo what happens when you cram a gestalt of millions of ancient souls into a greater devil, again?

Or, what happens when you cram millions of ancient souls into hundreds of thousands of zombified Callowans?

nick012000

Wait, Catherine is Deoraithe, right? And she's died before – if she hadn't had her soul trapped in the amulet that Apprentice had made, her soul would have gone off to join the gestalt. So, she'd probably have a link to it.

And given that she's got Take as one of her Aspects, and her previously-demonstrated puissance with necromancy, I think there's a pretty significant chance that she might be able to hijack the whole ritual and hoist the Diabolist on her own petard, while getting her own Name transition into Death Knight.

Letouriste

You know, that's actually a really good point!

...
But Diabolist know about that no? I doubt she would forget to put that in her plan when cat is bound to be an important factor in that battle

nipi

I don't think she knows about Cat's recent necromantic tricks.
I mean her envoy needed to spell out how much power she gives off.

beleester

"Well, Diabolist put a sharper in the middle of her army," I said. "I'm not above lighting it to finish the war."

I wouldn't do that if I were you. This sounds a lot like one of those "Evil sowing the seeds of its own destruction" things.

(Of course, since Cat's an anti-hero, she might be able to get away with credibly threatening to blow up the array before revealing it was a bluff.)

shieldredblog

Like she bluffed the Summer Queen?
No, bluffing against Evil is a bad idea.

IDKWhoitis

Bluffing with people who are okay with watching a continent burn is a surefire way to get a scorched Callow.

Keyen

You guys are forgetting several important points:

-If when Cat die, she will go there is irrelevant. The interesting point is if Cat can access that (she could simply bully her way inside the watch, with an oath to help them kill the elves, and things like that).

-The other interesting point (I saw nobody mentionned it) is the fact the Deoraithe HAVE Named. So they are there aswell. So maybe Cat can have access to them.

-Why it is relevant? Because sooner or later, Cat will meet a new antagonist. The White Knight. And guess what is his weapon of choice? Recall. Somehow, I bet it will be VERY relevant.

Metrux

The part about Named you can probably write off, they don't keep it on death. Your own powers, like sorcery and sword-skill? Yes. But not Names. That is the whole reason why a villain must die for another to get the Name, and Good Named even take theyr Names "off" before death, so I'm pretty sure there is no "Named Power" in that ball.

TheTime

Name power? no. Name experience? hell yes.

Keyen

The whole point of Recall is using dead Name power.

warriormonk

There was an extra chapter from Ranger's perspectives that deals with dead Named (under the service of the Dead King), and I believe they held some vestiges of their aspects and Named powers.

RoflCat

The Ranger's chapter with Dead King would imply otherwise.

Shequi

The Revenant Undead that Ranger encountered in Keter still had access to a "ghost" of the Aspects they had in life. Just saying.

Jockster

The White Knight depends too much on "Recall"(Black said he mastered this Aspect but not his own skills), but one use of "Take" and there goes his Aspect.( And I can already see Cat using Amadeus' style to fight him through "Recall" after a “tragic loss of her teacher”)

The only two things that can save him are the healing shenanigans and the yet-to-be revealed third Aspect.

Petya

Welp, whatever happens next, you gotta give it to Aqua for sheer grandiosity of plans. I wonder, how exactly it will spectacularly backfire to her face.

Thea

Will it, though? Malicia has set Akua up to succeed with her trump card once before she gets taken out. And for Cat to keep climbing the tower, she needs to be at odds with Malicia...

Chapter 49: Hearsay

"Truth is a lie grown old and beloved."

– Soninke saying

The woman sitting in my tent I had fully expected, but the fragrant pot of tea set on the table I had not. Not for the first time I wondered how deep the rabbit hole went: how deeply had the Empress infiltrated the Fifteenth, that she could see water boiled and a tea set put down in my own godsdamned tent? As for Malicia herself, I offered her a nod before plopping down in the seat across from hers. The meat-puppet of the woman who ruled about a quarter of the continent poured me a cup of pale steaming tea, adding two blots of sugar and a silver spoon to the saucer before handing it to me. I was long past being surprised at her knowing details about me, but that she'd taken the time to learn how I took my tea was a nice touch.

"How was your day, darling?" Her Dread Majesty Malicia, First of Her Name, asked me with a sweet smile.

I winced, well aware that she was putting forward that very domestic image purely to screw with me for her own entertainment. As long as she didn't start massaging the back of my neck I'd cope.

"Well, this afternoon I pretty much scared the Duchess of Daoine into telling me a secret older than the Kingdom of Callow," I said. "I put it under the seal by your authority too. No one but Masego and I are ever going to know the details."

I stirred the tea before putting down the spoon on the table – which even with my botched etiquette lessons I knew was quite unmannerly – and took a sip. Huh, tasted different than the Ashuran stuff. Closer to Aisha's brews, though the taste was clearer. The Empress smiled.

"Ah, hedging your bets," she said. "You do not want the knowledge in the Tower's records, lest it be misused decades from now."

Pretty much, yeah, though I refrained from agreeing out loud. I wasn't sure I'd trust Black with the knowledge that there was that kind of juicy leverage on Daoine up for grabs, much less whatever murderous clown might be succeeding the lot of us whenever our work inevitably caught up to us. Masego would keep quiet, I knew. He'd been raised to respect symbols like the Tower's seal and he wasn't exactly the gossiping type to start with. I doubted Kegan would trust the son of the Warlock to do anything at all, but she'd just have to deal with it. I'd needed Hierophant in the loop to have a chance of this not ending in the ruination of Callow. Which, in all fairness, it still might. One on one I'd bet on myself against Akua, but she'd had a long while to prepare. For a mage, especially one as powerful as her, that made a difference. Liesse was going to be the greatest slaughterhouse of my young but bloody tenure as the Squire.

"So," I said. "Not going to ask me what terms Diabolist offered?"

The Empress sipped at her own cup, taken plain.

"Shall I guess?" she said, amused. "The queenship of Callow, naturally. Anyone trying to turn you would begin with this. It would have to be paired with a threat that promises to either destroy this land or ruin it, lest you dismiss her from the onset."

Elegantly, Malicia tapped a finger against the table.

"She will have been serious in her attempt," the Empress assessed. "A personal touch as well, then. A full ritual to unshackle your former paramour, perhaps, or healing for your recently wounded legate. Her spies should be capable of sending word of that in time for the offer being made."

I drank deeper from the cup. She'd been right on the nose for all of it, not that I'd expected any less. Dread Empress Malicia had been doing what Akua was trying to for over forty years, better and against more dangerous opponents.

"She went for Nauk," I said. "I suppose I shouldn't be surprised you know all about Kilian."

"Did you really think you would be able to wield so much power in my name without your weaknesses being thoroughly investigated first, my dear?" the Empress chided. "If there were means available to remedy her state that did not break your principles,

I would have seen it done already – if only to remove a way to pressure you.”

So, confirmation even someone with Malicia’s resources and frankly ludicrous sorcerous archives couldn’t find a way to help Kilian without ritual sacrifice. I’d been considering asking a favour there to sidestep the issue entirely, and was almost relieved it wouldn’t be possible. Owing a favour to the likes of the Empress was not something to undertake lightly. It left Warlock, maybe, but that wasn’t much better. And if I must make bargain with the Sovereign of the Red Skies, Nauk comes first.

“I did not come to speak of the Diabolist, though I expect we shall,” Malicia said. “I have news from the south.”

I raised an eyebrow.

“Is Black finally done murdering his way to a settlement?” I asked. “The situation in Callow could use his special touch, I’ll admit.”

The Empress paused, and my eyes sharpened. I’d never seen her visibly choose her words before, but I was near certain that was happening before my eyes. Shit. What went wrong?

“Amadeus was defeated,” Malicia said. “Though Procer has not spread its influence to the League, that achievement was not his doing. A Hierarch was elected even as Nicae fell to the Tyrant of Helike’s armies.”

“He lost to the White Knight?” I said. “Fucking Hells, I thought he was green. How did he manage that?”

“I am given to understand there was betrayal on Helike’s part, but that the foremost architect was an old acquaintance of yours,” the Empress said. “The Wandering Bard, under a different name.”

I frowned.

“She was a pest,” I said. “And dangerous, I won’t say otherwise, but definitely not in the league you’re describing. A second-stringer like the Bumbling Conjurer, with a sharp grasp on her powers and limitations.”

“As of Amadeus’ last report, ‘Aoede of Nicae’ has made it on the Red List,” the Empress murmured. “You have not been introduced to it yet, I believe. It is a list of names circulated among the Eyes of the Empire, of individuals that must be assassinated whatever the cost should opportunity be presented. She shares the distinction only with Cordelia Hasenbach and Klaus Pappenheim, at the moment.”

My tea was cooling, so I gulped down a mouthful as I marshalled my thoughts. Black had been sent to the Free Cities to make sure nothing happening there gave Procer and excuse to start a Crusade, and it looked like that had been accomplished even if not by his hands. It was, unfortunately, made moot by the fact that Diabolist had a bucket of red in hand and was determined to paint a big target all over the Empire's face.

"He's all right, though," I stated, almost a question.

I refused to believe the Empress would have been so casual about this if my teacher was dead. I had only a vague grasp on the relationship between those two, but there was a great deal of trust and affection there. Frankly, I would have believed they were a couple if Malicia wasn't strictly interested in tits and Black pretty much indifferent to anyone not called Ranger.

"He was severely beaten, but not wounded," the meat-puppet said. "I would not call him 'all right', regardless. Captain was killed fighting a heroine."

I let out a sharp breath. Fuck. I'd always liked Sabah. She'd been the most reasonable of the Calamities in a lot of ways, and ever since the day I'd met her she'd acted like some sort of giant warrior aunt to me. And I knew her for two years and change. The Calamities were together for over four decades. I'd only rarely seen them together, but they'd been a family. They'd be grieving her for years.

"He must be wretched," I said.

"And coming north as quickly as he can as of a month ago, along with Warlock and Scribe," Malicia said. "Be warned, Catherine."

My fingers clenched.

"Don't you fucking try that," I snarled. "He wouldn't hurt me. Not even at his worst."

The Empress looked at me, and for a heartbeat I forgot this was a body she possessed. The woman I'd seen on the throne that night had come again, cold empire made flesh.

"I love that man," Malicia said, and the calm of her voice could be called anything but savage, "in a way I doubt you will ever love anyone, Catherine Foundling. He has been part of my soul since we were children looking at the stars. Do not ever believe that whatever paltry affection you lay at his feet is but a pale shadow of mine."

I flinched.

"I have never seen him like this," the Empress said. "Whatever the Wandering Bard did, it wounded what is at the core of him. This goes deeper than pride or what he felt for Sabah – he is as a raw, bare nerve."

"So he'll go cold," I said. "I've seen him like that before. It's terrifying, but not dangerous to either of us."

"Think, Catherine," the Empress coldly said. "For all that he arms himself in logic, underneath still lives the sixteen-year-old boy who watched Nefarious flee and felt only disgust. If he'd never been at the Fields..."

She shook her head.

"It doesn't matter," she dismissed. "Every Named is crystallized from a single moment and that was his. What you should worry of is that his judgement has been impaired. He will serve the sword to anything in Callow that he deems to threaten Praesi hegemony."

"All that's left is Diabolist," I said. "And he's welcome to wield a sword there, if he gets to her first."

"Be warned," Malicia repeated quietly.

The tone was solemn, and had me doubting. I actually hated her a little bit in that moment, because no matter if this was true or not it remained that she had the ability to make me doubt one of the pillars my life relied on. That alone was enough to harden distrust, made worse by the awareness that I needed her. Her support and her help, so that what I meant for Callow was anything but failure.

"So there's a Hierarch," I said, bluntly changing the subject. "Is that going to be a problem?"

"The man bears it as a Name," the Empress said. "As did his sole predecessor. He is a career diplomat for Bellerophon, called Anaxares."

"Bellerophon's the easternmost city, right?" I frowned. "The one that elects its rulers."

Democracy, it was called. There was a part of that that appealed to me – letting people choose their own way – but I'd never really bought into the notion. People were dumb, broadly speaking, and mobs even dumber. For all that I'd acquired a distaste of nobility, filling a hall with drunk tradesmen and asking the lot of them to make laws was no way to rule a country. Someone had to hold the reins, or all you got was bickering and indecision. Just because I believe that place shouldn't be inherited didn't mean it should be carved up and handed off to a hundred thousand strangers out in the streets.

"The Hierarch was prisoner to the Tyrant of Helike since the beginning of the war in the south, and the Tyrant seems to have been instrumental in arranging his election," Malicia said.

"We've yet to acquire a full profile on him, since infiltrating Bellerophon has always been... difficult. What little we've seen of him is puzzling. He seems aggressively opposed to taking any action at all in his function as head of the League."

"He wouldn't participate in a Crusade, then," I said.

"It seems unlikely," the Empress said. "I would not commit to an answer without deeper study."

"Good," I grunted. "If we don't have to worry about an army sailing up the Hwaerte, then I just need to put down Diabolist quickly and lock down the Vales hard enough Procer thinks twice about invading."

If the First Prince managed to rope in the Thalassocracy it was possible they'd try to land armies in Praes, but I actually rather hoped they did. That land was death on invaders. Between the Wasteland and the Hungering Sands it was more or less impossible for an army to live off the land there, and every major Praesi city was filled to the brim with nasty surprises for anyone meaning to try their walls. Even at the peak of the crusader kingdoms, the authority of the kings had not held further than a few miles away from the cities they ruled. And even then they'd not conquered the whole of Praes. Wolof had badly broken the army trying to take it, and neither the Northern Steppes nor the Grey Eyries had ever come under crusader rule. If Cordelia Hasenbach tried to take Praes from the coast, she'd find the region a bottomless hole swallowing her men and coin. Crusades always ended when they got too costly, half a dozen failed runs at the Kingdom of the Dead had taught Calernia as much.

"And so we return to Akua Sahelian," the Empress said.

I grimaced.

"She got her hands on something called the Still Water project," I said. "I'm guessing you know what that is. I'll have a hard time ever forgetting."

Malicia sighed. It was, for her, an unusually human gesture.

"I told Wekesa the trials were a liability," she said. "But he was adamant. Argued it would revolutionize understanding of rituals."

"Did it?" I asked.

"In a manner of speaking," she conceded. "After I decreed the matter to be under seal, he largely abandoned the avenue of research. What he learned before that would allow us a fighting chance against the Dead King, should he ever wage war upon us."

I raised an eyebrow.

"And that's considered likely?"

"The Empire has been in conflict with the Kingdom of the Dead in past centuries," the Empress said.

"I'm pretty sure I'd remember that," I said. "That kind of mess would be worth a page in the history books."

"You will find almost no record of them," Malicia said ruefully. "An attentive historian can find a period of twenty-five years between the reigns of Dread Emperor Pernicious and Dread Empress Maleficent the Second that is unaccounted for. The three Secret Wars were waged through the Hells, a vanity project that was an attempt to seize the Dead King's infernal dominion. An invasion through a hellgate in Ater was so imminent after the third that the woman who would become Maleficent II called on a pair of demons to erase most of a Hell and the previous two decades with it."

I let out a low whistle. I disapproved of fucking with the fabric of Creation on a general basis, even the parts that smelled of brimstone, but I had to admit that Maleficent had gone above and beyond in getting rid of the mess on her hands.

"Setting aside a revelation that will be haunting my nightmares in months to come," I said. "I have to ask – how many of those other continent-shaking horrors do you have locked up in the Tower? Because, without being arrogant, I think I can put the fear of the Gods in the Principate. But if the shoes keep dropping, they won't care about how many people I've stabbed. They'll be in for a death match."

"Four," Malicia said. "None of which are in danger of being revealed, as they never made it past the theoretical stage. Two inherited, two of Wekesa's making and dependant on him being alive."

Well, fuck me. There'd been a lot of nights lately where I had that sliver of doubt about whether I'd made the right choice in working within the Empire instead of against it. Wondering if by choosing to be a villain I'd ensured all the ruin that had come to Callow since. That put most of the doubts to rest, because I knew better than to believe Black would not have pulled the trigger if he was facing a victorious rebellion with foreign backing. My teacher had picked a soft embrace for Callow because he'd thought it to be the way to bring it into the Empire that would lead to the least resistance. I was not fool enough to delude myself into believing he would not turn to harsher means should it fail.

"I'll admit to some disquiet over that," I said. "It's not that Emperors as a rule are murderous pricks that would use those given half an excuse, but yes it is in fact exactly that."

"The resources involved are significant," the Empress said. "None of them are minor projects, and we both know how large developments such as these tend to end."

I didn't really consider 'don't worry about it, a hero would probably take care of that if it came down to it' to be a valid response, but I wasn't exactly in a position to pursue the subject at the moment. It might be worth bringing it with Black later. He had a bone-deep hatred of those kinds of weapons that might get my foot in the door as far as he was concerned, but that pragmatic streak cut both ways. He might want to keep those in the vault for a rainy day.

"There's going to be massive casualties," I told her after a moment. "She implied she can pull Still Water on the entirety of the people inside Liesse. That's at least a hundred thousand undead, and a battle won't clean all of those up. There'll be spill in the countryside."

"The Legions of Terror are versed in peacekeeping operations," the Empress noted. "And a visible common enemy has uses."

The Legions of Terror are versed in peacekeeping operations. Gods, there was a sentence to give a farmer the shivers.

"This is going to end up blamed on Praesi, Malicia," I bluntly said. "The Legions cleaning up afterwards won't win a lot of love when it comes from the massacre of a hundred thousand civilians at the hands of the Wasteland's favourite daughter."

"Public sentiment is already being prepared," the Empress said. "Your visibility of late is not without impact."

Ah. They were going to point at me and say here's the good girl, she beat the bad girl and would you look at that she's wearing our colours. Aren't you all glad the Tower's in charge? Lowered taxes for everyone. I'm not sure that'll be enough, but if Procer comes knocking at the gate Callowans might just pick the devil they know. Especially if the devil just named one of their own vicequeen, with pretty knights riding at her back. I was getting rather tired of the feeling my interlocutor had been three steps ahead of me the whole time, but I doubted it would end anytime soon.

"I have a hypothetical to speak of," I said.

"I am listening," Malicia said.

"Now, let's say there's this girl and she's not all that good at scheming," I said. "Hasn't got the knack for it. But she learned to read forces in movement, so to speak, and looking at the last year she noticed a few things."

The Empress studied me openly, and did not speak.

"The girl's been hacking away at moving targets this whole time and until recently never had time to breathe," I said. "But she does now, and trying to look at the year from a different seat she saw a few oddities."

I waved my wrist lazily to elaborate.

"Like Akua being able to amass the reagents for Still Water without calling down Hells on her head," I said. "Or importing so many little trinkets through southern Callow unimpeded. Now, this girl's people are green. No surprise they missed those things. But there's two people who should have been keeping an eye on the situation. One gets a pass, since he was away. The other, though? The other's absence of movement is intriguing."

"I am curious," Malicia said. "What do you believe this other would have to gain, by allowing the breadbasket of her empire to be devastated?"

"See, that's the part that got the girl at first," I said. "Then she thought, you know what's the problem with Callow? It's got all this farmland, but it's full of stubborn Callowans. It'd be much easier if a chunk of them were gone. You could have Praesi farm there instead."

The Empress said nothing.

"But then the girl thought that was too heavy-handed," I mused. "Measures like that could have been taken long ago and weren't. So what was to be gained, yeah? It occurred to her, then, that she was still thinking in the present. The wrong sort of game. Now, looking ahead, you know what might be useful for this other? Callow strong enough to fight the Principate, but too weak to make waves. And there's this image, too. Of the girl putting steel into Akua Sahelian's throat until she chokes on her blood, and how that'll make her popular with some people."

My eyes hardened.

"Puzzled her at first, since the other would lose a few feathers from the whole affair, but it makes a twisted sort of sense," I murmured. "If Callow's behind the girl and the girl is behind the Tower, well, all sort of troubles go away."

"And in this hypothetical, what would the girl say to the other?" Malicia asked.

"That now's not the time to bare knives," I said. "But that if anything like that was pulled again there would consequences, and that lately she'd gotten quite good at killing."

The Empress idly turned her cup.

"I believe this girl you speak misunderstands a few things of the other's methods," she said. "You see, unlike her fellow she does not believe a war with Procer is winnable. It is one of the few points on which they dissent, and she has gone to great lengths to delay and even attempt to prevent such a war from occurring."

I wouldn't enable Diabolist if what she was cooking up brought a Crusade on our heads, I took that to mean. Believable, though months of growing doubts weren't going to be quieted by a few offhand sentences spoken by one of the most skilful liars in Creation.

"That's a little worrying," I said. "Considering that war is around the corner."

"The man you spoke of spent a lifetime preparing for it," Malicia said. "It is, in his eyes, the culmination of everything he has ever done. To win it would validate all that he has fought for. One might say he is unable to envision this war cannot be won, for it would be contrary to who he is."

"And she thinks he's been blinded by that," I said. "I'm not sure it matters, at this point. The war's coming regardless."

"It's an interesting puzzle, isn't it?" she mused. "How does one win a war that one is fated to lose?"

"And there's an answer?" I asked.

Dread Empress Malicia smiled beautifully.

"Why, you never fight it at all."

First update of the month, so extra chapter. Titled "Fledged", it's from the POV of Archer.

In the Extra Chapters tab as per usual, link for the lazy:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/12/04/fledged/>

JC

Last piece of dialogue was extremely awkward.

Lots of errors in general.

Still, glad to see things are progressing.

Kingbob12

God damn, what a pair of chapters. Time with the Ranger and a soon to be Archer, and Cat and Malicia spend some time sharpening Iron. Fantastic.

danh3107

Never fight at all huh, Malicia you old spider.

stevenneiman

Nah, that's Tenebrous you're thinking of.

Ruduen

Just finished reading this one – solid chapter. It's good to see just how much more she's learned to try to follow the schemers by now.

Engineer

So much wow. Such win. Black is tilted.

I pray to the God Below and the God Above, his sovereign majesty EE who masterfully crafts worlds and characters with but a whim and a pen, That this book ends with the conclusion of the fight with Diabolist.

I don't think I'd be able to survive waiting a month for that fight.

Dainpdf

I hadn't thought of it in those terms, but that is the perfect term for it.

maresther23

I don't know why I find the "talking" chapter more terrifying than the action ones.

Shequi

Because Malicia is very very scary indeed.

Shequi

I wonder if Akua actually has the reagents she thinks she does, or if she just has something that appears to be them until the very last moment?

Nafram

And now I'm really worried about Amadeus. Damn you Wandering Piece of ****

I hope that he overcomes this, that Amadeus manages to settle the score with her and lives to see Evil truly win

Engineer

Sadly, Black is on the Way out. The Calamities will now die off one by one. There's no place in the Story for them anymore. Captain was the First to go. Ranger is M.I.A. Her death was the Pivot in the story of the Calamities. But there story has lost weight now. This is Cat's story. The Woe are the second generation of Calamities.

The Woe are a villainous group and in a preceding Chapter Quote it is stated that Villains don't get torches passed to them, they need to rip it from the corpses of their predecessors.

Every member of The Woe is an analogue of the Calamities.

If Black was still on his game, he had a chance of subverting this Fate. As it stands Amadeus of the Green Stretch is tilted. If Malicia says he's off his game. Then he's off his game. He's fate is sealed as are the Calamities.

Letouriste

malicia is also off the game buddy.we know her plan to not fight against procer will fail.

Black plan to kill his friend(including malicia?),indirectly or directly for helping cat toward greatness.

If someone isn't losing touch here,I bet this is malicia

Letouriste

is*

Porkman

"You see, unlike her fellow does not believe a war with Procer is winnable".

This doesn't make sense grammatically.

d_o_l

I think I understand what Malicia's plan is. If it's Procer vs Praes, Praes is fated to lose. But if Malicia can instead frame it as Procer vs Callow, the entire story suddenly changes.

maresther23

I think she is going for MAD (which tells you a lot of her character and the situation that made her). Given the page quotes it will probably fail. The big question then is what the Hell is Bards plan and if Black and Malicia can craft a story using Catherine that destroys her narrative.

MetruX

It has been said in a previous chapter, I think a side chapter, actually. Her plan is simple: Akua has something so strong and vile that the principate would fear confronting it, and thus stay away after malicia takes it for herself. It think it will still fail, but that's her plan to not fight.

Gunslinger

Vote for the guide on topwebfiction.com if you can, let's take the top positions by storm

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Dainpdf

Malicia is juggling with knives here. I don't think she'll go out too soon, since Cat hasn't had her as a mentor too long yet, but... She's bound to get herself cut sooner or later.

Gunslinger

The warning about Black is interesting, wonder what role he's going to play in the coming future. He's not going to side with the diabolist, but I wonder if he's going to provoke Procer. Give him a chance to win and regain his pride

Engineer

Things like Pride don't matter much for the Black Knight.

I have a sense that he will be far crueler against the Tyrant and The First Prince than he normally would be. We already glimpsed the Carrion Lord during the Hanging of Summerholm rebels.

I think he'll be like that for the remainder of his short life.

This will probably also set up the story where Cat will eventually be forced to put her Mentor down and take his Name. Black will be ruthless now. The dominoes are stacked, the Final push needed for him to go off the Deep End is for Ista to have killed the Ranger. Which is very likely seeing as all the Calamities need to die for The Woe to truly take up the role of the Villains in the story.

Letouriste

I think he still control himself though.i think highly of him.i think everyone still underestimate him,both us readers and the characters.

usernamebco

Black is all about pride. Specifically, hubris. For evidence of that look at the chapters from his pov where he's all hung up on his superior perspective. He's trying to play heaven, and thinks he can beat them at their own game. For all that he's more enlightened than the previous generations of Stupid Evil he's still an old school villain at heart and hasn't grasped that the only way to win is to flip the board.

Like Cat basically holding Creation hostage to get the Summer Queen to capitulate.

Shequi

Slightly surprising that they don't bother to discuss Akua's claiming of a throne, which is essentially a declaration of rebellion against the Tower.

Letouriste

So? Her rebeling is not a surprise to either of them.that's important for the story but they know she will lose.

Letouriste

Hum...malicia want a weapon strong enough for avoiding war.We know though.we know that story is bond to happen because a war against procer will be epic and because we already got little hints about that in these aisha citation.Malicia is wrong and she has sacrificed 100000 people for that...actually what liesse is doing now will attract a war(still water near the frontier etc...) I struggle to understand her schemes here.i'm of black opinion here

Letouriste

Hum...what are the probabilities black is using his grief for bluffing malicia? Maybe he show more than he feel and use that for a plot,his agenda

maresther23

I don't think he is that kind of person. He is really very very loyal to his friends. I actually think that when he talks of hurting them is more in the "my absence will hurt you" than the classical Evil "I will betray you"

MetruX

Well, he already said he has everything planned for Cat to succeed him, even if his friends must die for it. Well, not said, it was he with himself, but still, a statement. He won't even see it as betrayal.

shieldredblog

First time I've seen hints of Malicia being on the way out. Reading this chapter I think it's possible we get a Dread Emperor Black. Not likely, but possible.

Because:

- 1) There is going to be a war with Procer so Malicia is wrong.
- 2) She straight up lied to Catherine about wanting to wound Callow with Diabolist's weapon and we know from Black that lying to junior Villains is a bad idea, it just feeds the story of them replacing you.
- 3) The only way for Black to survive his Fate or Catherine's rise is to stop being the Black Knight.

Keyen

You are wrong, the question was about Still Water and I think Malicia was sincere here. The thing Malicia was discussing with Black was the other "mega engine of Doom" which is still not revealed yet.

Anyway, still betting on Scribe = Assassin, still 0 mention of both of them in the same sentence by any of the Calamities/Malicia. We know Assassin was in the Free Cities, and yet nobody talks about him coming back.

Burnsy

In the Conspiracy bonus chapters Scribe refers to Assassin in a way that implies they have something of a rivalry about who can pull off the most sinister backstage murders. Also refers to Assassin as 'he'.

It's possible Scribe was obfuscating or there's some split personality shenanigans going on, but honestly in that case why bother even bringing Assassin up? There was no-one around worth playing for, so I'd say they're separate people.

Personally, I think Assassin's first appearance in story was the servant who was in Cat's room when she woke up from her first name dream. Based off the fact that she had to choose to be a villain, she could have woken up a hero. In that case, he would have been there to determine if she'd chosen good and then murder her before she had a chance to escape and become the COLOSSAL pain in Black's ass that the hero version of Cat would have been.

Fern

iirc when malicia was referring to the mega engine of doom she was talking about whatever the hell akua is cooking up

Keyen

@Burnsy: You are not wrong, the only hole in my theory is the Conspiracy chapter remark.

Still, the whole Scribe business is way, way, way, way too suspect. I mean, she doesn't do anything which deserve the "Scribe" Name (no aspect related to it, etc), does things purely related to Assassin (can appear/disappear, can silent the noise around herself and other (how the fuck it relate to be a scribe), and the list is fucking huge).

The whole paperwork business is exactly the same Hakram is doing for Cat.

Unmaker

I don't think Scribe = Assassin. The author has said that Assassin already had screen time. In the earliest chapters, when Black Knight was sparring with Captain, there was a legionnaire who was rather chatty and somewhat helpful to Catherine. He's my bet as to the 'real' Assassin.

Engineer

Well the gender thing is easily explained away by the fact that Thief had difficulty discerning whether Assassin was male or female in her encounter with it.

Given the nature of Assassin's role, it wouldn't be farfetched to think that he could change his appearances.

The only major spanner in the works is that we don't know if a person can have two Names. But what if two different personalities inhabit the same body? Like something similar to possession, where two separate entities occupy the same body with a "bleeding effect" where both can make use of the other's powers to a certain extent. It would certainly explain why Scribe has ninja like abilities, capable of sneaking up on everybody with supernatural ease. Hell you wouldn't even notice her presence unless she WANTS you to. Which is the PERFECT aspect for an Assassin to have.

Like Harry said in HPMOR, real assassins don't look like Assassins; they look like Accountants (Scribes) before they kill you.

Double possession is a thing. Look at Captain's case. Sabah is separate from the Beast yet they inhabit the same body.

Keyen

Scribe doesn't have two Names. Scribe is not a Name to begin with. It's just Assassin doing paperwork, exactly like Hakram. Names come from a will of something, and I doubt Eudokia woke up a morning "Hey, I want to dedicate my life at doing Black paperwork, gimme a Name plz".

Honestly, I can't believe one second Assassin would be the Lt Abase or (seriously?) the servant when Cat woke up. I mean, it's not even a good cover. The other Black Guards would instantly know, and this kind of information can be extracted, and I doubt an Assassin can see himself as a soldier (the salute, etc). Scribe is an excellent cover, make perfect sense (seriously, give me ONE moment they talk to/of/ask Assassin to do something. Never. Not even once. Every single time Assassin is used, it was because Black asked Scribe.

Shawn Panzegraf

I think Malicia's "Let Diabolist use her Super-Weapon once, then steal it. For use as a Procer deterrent" plan is fundamentally flawed for a single reason.

Cordelia wouldn't still go to war because she was afraid of Malicia going all Triumphant and using the Super-Weapon to get conquest-happy. I think Cordelia is savvy enough to have a read on Malicia's "I'd rather rule Praes forever, than the continent for a year" mindset.

Cordelia would plunge the continent into war, whatever the cost of facing the Super-Weapon, because she KNOWS....sooner or later, it won't be Malicia on the throne anymore. When Cordelia asks herself "What would a flying-citadel-powered-by-child-sacrifice-type Dread Emperor/Empress do with such a Super Weapon?" That all the possible answers to that question are answers that make Cordelia want to strike while Procer and whatever allies they can bring to bear can win.

Deterrents only work if the thing you're using to deter is scarier than the consequences of not being deterred.

Burnsy

I find the chapter title interesting. Hearsay, firstly, is a legal term. And legal terms as chapter titles have primarily been used for the White Knights interludes. Considering all the implications about Amadeus being off his game and close to death, I'd say that's indicative of something. A meta way of saying: "the White Knight is coming".

Second, Hearsay is usually inadmissible in court because it's essentially "x says that y says", it relies on one person speaking for another. Here we have Malicia obliquely warning Cat that Black might decide that she's a threat and try to eliminate her.

But what evidence do we actually have. It could happen, sure. But Black doesn't seem to have given much of a shit what Cat does so long as she does it contributes towards his end goal. So what could cause him to turn on Cat.

Maybe because, when he shows up and learns what Cat's been up to, she's acting strangely. She's on edge. Tense. Keeping secrets. She seems ready for a fight. Why would she be acting like that unless she had something to hide? Unless she was working against him. And suddenly Malicia's words become a self-fulfilling prophecy.

werafdsaew

"She shares the distinction only with Cordelia Hasenbach and Klaus Pappenheim" Why isn't Augur on the list I wonder? Without her Assassin could have already gotten to Cordelia.

Unmaker

Good question. We know Named heroes are much harder to kill – it basically takes a counter-Story or major sorcery to do. So maybe Malicia doesn't give "assassinate a force of nature" assignments to anyone but other Named.

Draeysine

Probably because Augur will only speak to someone worth helping, and she is only a threat as long as someone like that is listening to her.

Trickster315

"Every Name is crystallized by a moment" Black's was watching the chancellor flee. I wonder what Cat's moment was, maybe killing the governor? Unmaking both fey courts at once or maybe she hasn't experienced it yet.

stevenneiman

It occurs to me that Akua wouldn't have revealed that she's in on the Still Water secret if she thought she'd ever actually use it. She has certainly improved on it in some way that preparing for her to use Still Water would be useless against whatever she's actually doing. Still Air, maybe, or using demons instead of alchemy to bypass the Due, or her Name somehow.

What are her three Aspects again?

vuthuha912

Ah. This is the reason why Black is going to fail in his pursuit of a better Praes, he has no comrade who shares his priority, not really. He thinks that Malicia does and maybe she did at the beginning. However, playing with politic for so long or just being in the Tower have made her lose her sense of danger. She made riskier and riskier moves and one day it is going to backfire horribly for everyone on her side. Funding or tolerating Akua when you know she is planning something nefarious was beyond stupid. Incredibly irresponsible. Don't let a child have a knife. Akua is a horrible person to give any ounce of resource or authority. She is going to shoot everyone and herself with her stupidity.

Chapter 50: Preparation

"Doubt is the mother of failure."

– Dread Emperor Terribilis I, the Lawgiver

In the end, it took me three days to get eyes on Liesse. Marshal Grem One-Eye had sent out mages as soon as the city was glimpsed over the horizon, and my own mage lines kept coordinated with his own until we had four scrying links covering the major angles of the Diabolist's lair. What I saw did not bode well. The city had gone up with its walls largely intact and significant portions of the grounds under it and lost neither as it went down. The surrounding territory had been worked over with magic so that Liesse now stood atop a steep hill. Thousands were digging trenches and traps in the plains around it, working day and night without pause because they needed none. They were Callowans, but they were also dead. Without fanfare or a cackle, without a sound at all, Akua Sahelian had killed more of my people in a night than Black had throughout the entire Conquest. Men, women and children. The young and the old – Still Water drew no difference, and neither had she.

I'd been a viciously dark mood since I'd gotten proof of it, and the mood had only gone darker when I'd seen what she was up to. Devil-summoning arrays had been carved on the walls, large siege weapons like those of the Legions placed onto bastions and additional wards were made every hour to fortify the city against magical interference. Hierophant had already confirmed I couldn't open a portal directly within the walls, not that I'd ever seriously thought there was a chance of it. The Summer fae would not have dithered attacking her for months if they'd had that as an available option, and I was still much less skilled than they at using fairy gates. I disliked wasting time in Dormer, but Juniper had flatly informed me that after a brutal battle like the last one the men needed time to recoup and recuperate.

It wasn't just a matter of dealing with the wounded, though there'd been a great many of those. Our supplies had been running thin, and it was only Ratface's promised river barges coming through the city harbour filled with steel and goblin munitions that had the Legions in proper fighting fit again. Aisha had been a little less blunt in reminding me I'd had our troops going through forced marches and battles one after another for months, but no less firm. Even if it gave Akua time to dig in, the truth was that the Fifteenth simply hadn't been in a state to take the fight to her right away. As I saw to my house, Ranker and Kegan saw to theirs. The duchess kept to herself, but I saw almost too much of the old goblin for my tastes. It was her that suggested we had siege weapons of our own prepared in Laure and Southpool rather than rely on only our own, and when she began approaching the problem that way the Hellhound followed with aplomb.

For one, there were three legions in Holden under her mother that were sitting ducks unless I intervened. General Istrid had been sent there at my own order to prevent the Summer court from making a beachhead other than Dormer, and discharged that duty perfectly. But her twelve thousand men were now months away from the actual fighting, with a supply line that was chancy at best. Even if she began marching north immediately, she wouldn't be able to reach Liesse before the battle was weeks past. Could I afford to allow twelve thousand veteran legionaries to sit over a strategically useless position while I fought Akua? No, I could not. Not if the assault on the city was going to be as brutal as I suspected.

The only question then, was where I would transport them. The gates allowed me to significantly quicken the logistics of assembling a host that was spread throughout Callow, but they weren't a perfect solution. For one, I needed to be with the moving armies. And much more importantly, I couldn't actually use Arcadia as a staging ground. Whether the terms of my bargain with the fae court would protect my soldiers when they weren't actually travelling was irrelevant, since that wasn't how gates worked from my end: whenever I made an entrance, there was a corresponding exit. I couldn't actually get out of Arcadia by another place, as far as I knew, and our previous alternative of having Hierophant use fae nobles as portal-openers was no longer an option. Our prisoners had all been rather forcefully released by the Summer Queen when she still bore that name. And, last of all the weaknesses, going through Arcadia still took time. It as a shortcut, not fucking teleportation, which as probably for the best. Even with the mantle of a Duchess on my shoulders I was pretty sure attempting teleportation of any kind would flat-out kill me.

And so, sitting with Marshal Ranker and General Juniper, we planned out our little shell game. Akua had eyes on us, we on her. The side that would have the advantage when the battle began was the one who'd hide the knives better. Callow had already been put under martial law long before I went south, and as things stood I was both vicequeen and highest-ranked Named remaining of the region. I was also wielding my authority with the explicit backing of Her Dread Majesty – there was not a single in person in my home who had solid ground to stand on in refusing an order of mine. Would that I could enjoy that power even a little: I had wanted nothing more than to have it since the age of thirteen, when I'd made the decision to start saving up for the War College. I couldn't, not when the first order I gave was for immediate muster of the city guard in Southpool, Ankou and Vale. There was immediate pushback, argument from the Callowan governors I'd overseen the very appointment of that none of those men were trained soldiers.

I ordered for them to come anyway. Southpool was on the weak end of the scale, with only five thousand, but Ankou's city guard traditionally served as militia when Procer attacked the Vales and even though the city was smaller it boasted eight thousand and better equipped. Vale was the largest of the three, and though it put up only six thousand men I sent Grandmaster Talbot to squeeze blood out of that rock. Vale had always been the heart of central Callow, and though no great trade city as an agricultural one there were few equals to it on Calernia. There was wealth there, and though second-rate compared to the real wealthy cities of Callow it had historically been enough to support a great many soldiers and knights – some of the earliest chivalric orders had been founded there, they said. I left Talbot work his patriotic sorcery on the powerful of the city and another three thousand came out of that, including about a hundred knights. Gods, it was like those had been hiding under every rock. It was pleasing, in a way, that the governors were willing to fight for the people under their care when I would order those people to the grinder.

A shame I was not in a position to entertain their worries.

The place of muster for the city guards was set a little to the east of halfway between Southpool and Vale, which meant the Ankouans would have to pass south of Diabolist's lair and lose at least a week to it. Wouldn't matter, since I'd be busy ferrying Legions meanwhile. My options there had been more limited than I would have liked. The legions under Marshal Grem, for one, weren't going anywhere. I'd approached the subject of peeling off at least one, but the reports I'd been given in return were... stark. There'd been increasing skirmishes with the border principalities over the last months and Procer was massing soldiers in Bayeux. The Marshal's assessment was that if there was any large troop movement on the Empire's side, the Principate would try an assault on the Red Flower Vales. Fucking First Prince. It didn't matter if she was bluffing us or not, since we couldn't afford to chance losing the narrow valleys that would give us a fighting chance against Proceran invasion. The Wasteland wasn't going to be any help either. Malicia's meat-puppet had made it clear the legions in her backyard needed to stay there, to keep the highborn in line and more importantly keep the fucking mess Akua's mother had made in Wolof contained.

Much as I would have liked another twelve thousand soldiers, I couldn't blame the Empress for not pulling them out when the alternative was devils spilling out in the Wasteland. The only reinforcements from the Legions at hand were the same I'd sent into Holden, and they were nothing to sneer at. I'd met all the generals in command there – Istrid, Sacker and Orim – and all three had been through the crucible that was the Conquest, but more importantly the civil war before it. Almost every one of my highest tier of commanders in this campaign would be familiar with Praesi war tactics of the kind Diabolist was likely to pull. That knowledge wasn't as reassuring to have on my side as another ten thousand soldiers, but it might end up saving more lives. Already I winced at the notion of sending guards into the kind of madness Akua would have prepared for them. There was no choice. The usual voice in the back of my head that insisted there had been and I had made it saw itself buried. I would allow myself doubt and grief when the wars was done. Until then, all they would so was slow me down in what had very clearly become a race of sorts.

Either Akua Sahelian would finish her scheme and break the Empire, or I'd mass enough strength to put her down.

There was a part of me, the same that had been taught by Black, that kept to the iron-clad belief that she would fail in the end. That whatever she was juggling would backfire on her, either because she'd but off more than she could chew or because I'd break her stride. But as the days passed, I had to concede it was a possibility I might fail. I couldn't quite manage to believe I would, but then I doubted any of the rulers Triumphant had crushed had thought they'd end up a note in the margins of history either. I knew better than most how dangerous Diabolist was, and how disparate the forces I was bringing against her was. There was advantage in that bastard mixture of Deoraithe, Callowans and Praesi I was leading. But there was weakness too. I failed, Hells even if I won but died winning... Well, I would be leaving behind me a mess that might be beyond salvaging. In rising to prominence I'd crossed a lot of lines and ripped open quite a few old wounds. None of that would be undone in the wake of my death, but I'd no longer be there to even try to guide the currents.

I wondered if Black had that same sense of cold fear, when he looked at the Empire. The ugly realization that a lot of what you'd built was dependent on you to remain functional, and that if some farmboy with a magic sword put six inches of steel through your throat it would bring ruin on hundreds of thousands. Recklessness, for all that it often cost me, had seen me win one uphill battle after another. Never without some of my blood spilled on the ground, but I'd forged victory out of being the only person in a fight willing to cross the line. Whether it was allowing my own death to get out of a Heaven-mandated defeat or lying my way to the contraptions of godhood, audacity had allowed me pull through situations that should have seen me dead or broken. But I could, I was coming to realize, no longer operate this way. Before all it took was for one gamble to fail, and the whole house of cards I had built around myself would come tumbling down. I'd gone out of my way to make myself, if not essential, then as close as anyone could be in Malicia's empire. But that cut both ways. If I get myself killed, everything I bound to me suffers.

I'd bound quite a few things to me, by now. Armies and institutions, even the very hierarchy that now ruled Callow. When you became someone of consequence, if only followed that your death would have those same consequences.

I'd never been good with fear. I'd always pushed through it by heading into the breach repeatedly until I stopped flinching, steeling myself by taking the weakness as a personal insult. But this... this was no longer dealing with a fear of heights by standing at a rooftop's edge the way I had when I was a girl. If I slipped and fell, Callow went up in flames. It wasn't a fear for my own death as much as fear of what it would mean, and I was finding it much harder to push down. That was the problem with learning the currents that guided an empire from behind the scenes – you could never unsee it, after. It was not a pleasant thing admit I knew no other way to fight. Black had once told me I needed to start thinking ahead if I did not forever want to be fighting to the tune of my opponents, and I liked to think I'd learned how. To an extent. But it was one thing to sit with the Empress and plan the unmaking of the Summer Court, another to plan the steps of a waltz with the Diabolist. Fae had rules they could not break. They were, in some ways, predictable.

All that Akua had binding her was having been raised with all the blind spots of the old breed of Praesi villainy, and those weaknesses were not meant for villains to exploit. One slip and it was all over. I'd long become used to gambling with my own life, and once when I had been younger and more ignorant even gambled with Callow's fate through my clash against the Lone Swordsman. I was older now, and if not wiser at least a great deal more aware. If I threw the dice and they came up wrong, then from Harrow to Dormer my people suffered for it. If there is no Named to use to bind Callow to the Empire, they start to use harsher methods. I hated the thought, and the hesitation it brought with it. One of the old monsters who'd held the Tower had once said that the worst sin a villain could commit was to hesitate. She'd been right. I had won and kept winning because I had made a blade of temerity and struck out at my enemies with it. After a year of trying to keep Callow together in the face of slaughter and invasion, I wasn't certain how long I could keep doing that.

The thought came, unbidden, that this was not a coincidence. That Her Dread Majesty had uses for a hunting hound, but only so long as it could be leashed. And hadn't she done exactly that, by giving me the very same authority I asked for? I did not allow myself to think if it too much, not right now. I could spend months trying to discern the intent of the likes of the Empress and still end up grievously, hilariously wrong in my conclusions. But. I would, one of these days, sit with Hakram over a bottle and ponder this. Because it would have been arrogant to believe that the Empress had spent decades trying to suborn Callow with soft methods but would never try tactics that had proved so effective on me as well.

The itinerary that was ultimately settled on was simple. I would take Legate Hune and a detachment of two thousand into Arcadia, taking a fairy gate to Holden where we'd link up with General Istrid and her three legions. From there we'd take another gate to the muster point north of Vale where the guards from the adjoining cities had been ordered to gather. Then I'd make one last trip south, to hopefully shave off a few weeks from my host's march to the north to assemble with the rest. I'd always taken Nauk with me on journeys like this, and the Gallowborne as well. One was unconscious and more than halfway into the grave, and there remained only five of the cohort of two hundred that had once made up the other. Aisha had already suggested I disband them and assemble another retinue, but I'd refused. They'd died for me, John and his men. I would not spit on that by replacing them before the moon had even finished waxing.

"Senior Mage Kilian will have to remain with the Fifteenth," Juniper said, "but her second should go with you. I want our own mages on the ground, to keep scrying in our house."

"We have to assume Diabolist can listen in on all of those," I grunted. "The Empress certainly can."

"Ratface made his own codes that differ from Legion protocols," Aisha said. "I would think that our conversations, at least, will be hard for her people to decipher."

"She'll still be expecting most our troop movements," I said. "The Callowans I ordered to muster were warned she might make a sortie, but that only takes us so far."

"I am not certain she will," Juniper growled. "There would be obvious benefits to hitting our forces before they're gathered, but the heart of her strategy remains to defend Liesse until she can deploy her ritual. She might not want to take the risk, considering you can pop out of Arcadia at any time to hit the city."

"Assuming she can't track me when I leave Creation," I said. "We don't know that she can't."

"I would not plan strategy around the assumption," the Hellhound conceded. "But overestimating an opponent is just as dangerous as the opposite. If we are too careful to guard against means she does not have, we uselessly limit ourselves."

I sighed.

"Yeah, true enough," I said. "Pinpointing exactly what she can do has proved to be something of a problem, but at the end of the day it doesn't matter that much. If we're too slow we're fucked anyway."

Juniper rasped out a laugh.

"Won't be the first time we fight against the hours as well as the enemy," she said. "I doubt it will be the last. You leave with dawn?"

"That's the plan," I said, and turned to Hune. "Your people will be ready?"

"Orders were already given," the ogre replied.

I looked away quickly, knowing if I kept staring anger would well up again. I had axes to grind with Hune, though I'd forced myself to keep my mouth shut about it. She'd done nothing that was against regulations, or outside her authority. Didn't make me any happier about it.

"Dismissed, then," Juniper grunted. "Catherine, a word?"

This hadn't been an official staff meeting, and so there were only four of us in the command tent. Aisha gave my general a warning look before following the ogre out.

"I'm listening," I told the orc.

"What the fuck is your problem?" she bluntly said. "You've been treating Hune like she ate your horse ever since Dormer. If you have something to say, say it. I'm her commanding officer."

My eyes hardened.

"You don't want to knock on this door, Hellhound," I warned.

"I just did, Foundling," she growled. "Out with it."

I'd gained enough control that the wood under my fingers did not freeze, but not enough it didn't fog as the temperature cooled.

"We had two trump cards to play, when taking a swing at the upper city," I said flatly. "The Watch and the knights. She sent both to the flanks against the Immortals instead bolstering my own push."

Juniper eyed me in silence.

"I get one," I said. "The Immortals were taking their tool. But if the knights had backed me, Nauk would be awake right now."

The Hellhound's lips curled into a snarl.

"If you were an orc, you'd be on the floor bleeding from the mouth right now," Juniper said, tone eerily calm. "And if you say anything like that ever again, I'll resign my commission."

My fingers clenched.

"Explain," I said through gritted teeth.

"She made a call," the Hellhound said. "As commander on the field. She did not do it lightly, or with unsound reasons. Just because you're angry Nauk got wounded does not give you the right to treat her this way. She isn't your friend, Catherine. She is an officer in the Legions of Terror."

"I took four hundred men when I advanced," I said. "You know how many came back."

"And she saved twice that many by sending our heaviest hitters against the Immortals," Juniper barked. "She made a tactical decision. It was the right decision, and I would have made the same. You had four Named with you, one way or another you were getting through. The others were expendable."

Juniper rose to her feet and paused when she passed me by, laying a hand on my shoulder.

"It's good," she said gruffly. "That you care. The Empress wouldn't. But you need to harden the fuck up, Catherine. We'll both have a lot of dead friends before this is over."

She left me to ponder that in the silent tent, eyes closed. Callowans had a lot of songs about the glory and righteousness of sacrificing yourself for the kingdom. I knew quite a few. None of them spoke of sacrificing those you loved though.

As always, the songs were thin gilding over the ugly truths of what I'd have to do.

Wise words there Juniper, curious that Black also have the same weakness.

Engineer

Man Still Water is useful. Create an army of dead people that don't need to eat or sleep and can work 24/7. No overtime, meddling unions, medical or pension funds; just a bunch of dead guys that can follow simple instructions effectively.

I can totally see why the Dead King made Keter. I would do the same. With an entire continent.

BryceWilliam

you would murder an entire continent?

naturalnuke

Logistically speaking it's sound.

Politically this is why crusades and coalitions happen.

NerfContessa

That's why you make sure to make the heroes undead.

Big Brother

Like Nuke said, it is incredibly sound logistically. Not to mention, feeding an undead populace is much easier during and after a battle.

This is personal headcanon, but the fleshy undead like zombies and ghouls probably consume the flesh of the living to fuel the necromantic spell keeping them animated. After all, what better way to provide the energy of Death than from being eaten alive?

daegone823

The only problem would be the heroes that would rise against you in this universe evil actions that cause tragedy often lead to heroes rising against you. go ahead with your continent plan but the ensuing hero shenanigans will cause your plan to fail as evil always loses. vicious cycle.

stevenneiman

Undead have advantages, but they also have pretty severe limitations, especially the zombies that Still Waters creates. They might not need rest, but they also don't have human-level intelligence and I don't think they're a match for decently trained soldiers. Perhaps most importantly, they don't replenish like living citizens do, which means that unless you can spike the water supplies of other countries with more Still Water reagents despite them being prepared against the plan every conflict is going to cost mean losing a lot of undead that you'll only be able to recoup if you win. Not to mention that something like that would attract heroes like flies to a corpse even if you only zombify your own populace, and unlike the Dead King you wouldn't have any of the cool undead to back up your cannon fodder zombies.

Death Emperor Nihilus I

@Steve

I don't need them to be human level intelligent. Just need them to be able to follow simple instructions.

You're right about the problems regarding the water vector. Which is why I'd try to develop a contagious airborne variant of Still Water. Call it Dead Air. Airborne pathogens infect much more easily than water based vectors. I'll also try to tweak it to not just infect humans but animals and bugs as well. Especially bugs like flies or ants. Within a month Calernia would a continent of the dead.

The heroes can come with their crusades. In fact I welcome it. Their crusades is made by and large by average blokes susceptible to Dead Air's effects. Assuming the Angels don't give them some kind of BS buffed out poison res stats, they too will join the ranks of the Dead.

Should they manage to defeat me My fall back plan is to enact a ritual of such magnitude that the Keter's due would tear apart everything and everyone within a 41km radius. Also, the ritual is to weaken the boundaries between Creation and Space, so I can manifest a giant vacuum right above my kingdom. Either I'm winning or everybody is dying.

That would be my final fuck you to Creation. Sure some of those peskier hero types would survive but NOBODY will call it a true victory.

Bit then why even bother? To what means would you need what then is nothing more than a charade.

Shequi

Curious. Why did Akua trigger Still Water? As long as she didn't do so she had a threat to level at Catherine to stay her hand. Now she's used it she no longer has it, and she gave away her diplomatic group, the destruction of the mirror and the existence of her dimensional scrying artefact for... What, exactly? Some hastily dug fortifications that Catherine will destroy in the first minutes of the battle?

There's something more going on here.

TideofKhatanga

There was no threat to level at Catherine. The Squire had made it clear that, zombie apocalypse or not, she was going to stab Diabolist. Akua spent some ressources trying to turn a very competent commander to her cause but that was a side goal compared to the objective of grabbing the throne by force. When that failed, she went on with Plan A.

poignardazur

I'm pretty sure she didn't care a lot about her mirror or her diplomatic group.

I'm guessing she gave away her dimensional scryer because she wanted to hold the Liesse citizens hostage as leverage on Cat. Except Cat made it clear she wouldn't let herself be manipulated, so Akua went ahead and killed everyone to fortify as soon as possible.

haihappen

Still Water was a threat, Cat was not threatened, so Akua had no reason not to use Still Water. Using it strengthens her position, gets rid of the civilians that could prove a liability.

The only drawback is international political pushback, and she aims to be above that sort of thing anyway.

Remember, Akua and her breed have no lines they would not cross.

Critique ahead, be warned:

I feel like the Guide has progressively become worse and is currently at its all-time low in terms of writing quality. The fae arc overall felt kinda weak and more like a plot device which was only thinly tied into the overall story.

There has been too much unneeded pointless escalation (Gods below this! Gods below that!) without any room for characters to breathe. Chapters like the one with the bonfire stand out so much because they were so dearly needed.

But it was too little too late.

Character beats that ought to hit home and sell Cat's (and others') motivations fall flat. I as a reader simply do not care about the supporting cast – here are some examples of that:

1. I didn't give one iota about Farrier dying. I basically knew nothing personal about him. Why should I care? Why should Cat care? We are in her head all the time. Other than: "leads my personal retinue" and "is a sort of a plot device spokesperson for the 'normal' soldier" he had no personality. Even his crush on Cat got deliberately flanderized into: Yeah, many soldiers under her command crush on her. -> that took personality away from him and made him into a stand-in plot figure for the faceless soldiers. But not his own person.

2. Who gives a shit about Nauk? Thousands died but suddenly we were supposed to believe that Cat would trade kingdoms and all those losses for this dude she did not even speak with for a full page of written dialogue in the *entire Guide*? What the hell?

3. Killian? This whole romance was so unexplored – and instead of exploring it more it basically got axed and has become such a trivial roundabout straw-man of a moral dilemma which kinda shames the whole romance subplot and the characters involved.

4. Today there was this stupidly silly reaction of the Hellhound: I paraphrase how I couldn't help but read that dialogue: "I am a General and I don't like how my President frowns at one of the Lieutenants and thus I do the only sensible thing: I threaten to beat up my president and throw my resignation (discarding the duty to the country, not just the president!) in as well! Because dang thats the sensible thing to do here! Can't have the President make frowny faces at some other officers." Sure, she's an Orc and I tried to read it as an orc-y thing – but dang that was an overly dramatic, flat and silly reaction. Comedic at best. I do not think it was intended to be comedic though, which is kinda sad.

Maybe the author tried to pack too much plot into the story and it squeezed out everything else? Fey incursions and shenanigans in the Free Cities and then some Akua too! Oh my.

I think at this point I will wait and see how the second confrontation with Akua will play out and if it continues in the current direction I think I will withdraw my support on Patreon. Not because I am a spiteful asshole, but because I care. I think that two updates a week did not do this story any favours.

MetruX

I honestly can't agree with any point you made, which is truly surprising, since most of the critique I've seen here is well thought and not just personal opinion.

The whole POINT of this arc is this rushing head-along without breather time, the epic of epic struggle that make the books, not because of one battle, but because of the whole situation. Farrier wasn't seen much, yes, but we also didn't see all, since there are a lot of time skips, even if on small doses like days or weeks. He was always with her, he slept on the room on the side, trained with her, gave counsel... Honestly, how could she NOT care about him?

Nauk was, since the beginning, the most fanatically loyal to Cat. If she said for him to cut his own throat, he would. He was there at the beginning, supporting her when he got hurt in the war games, he was there through all her battles, the first to call her warlord, the support she had on the reunions in the beginning, he went through all. If you don't care about him, I can only see you as a very cold person.

Killian... I can't completely disagree with you, but I can't agree either. It wasn't a Big Romance, this isn't a romantic story, after all. She was a fling, that because of mutual stress and respect grew out of proportions, it was all very natural, and they didn't have time to truly know each other deeply, thus when she saw her paramour was different from something she could accept, it ended. It was a natural and common thing, even if it could've been better and I, particularly, always thought she needed someone else for romance.

About Hellhound... She was like this, always. She sees Cat looking funny to one member of their old retinue, and asks about. She didn't threaten to resign for the look, but for the explanation. Cat saw someone important to her get hurt, and she was blaming a commander for it, because she made a tactical decision. Hellhound is all about the winning tactics, and thus she couldn't accept Cat's blame, even though she agreed that it's important to care.

I can't talk for the author, but honestly, making this kind of patreon withdrawal threat... i can only see it as spitefull and forcing the author's hand, even though I wouldn't call it an asshole act, it's a very blunt try at manipulation, especially since you could have told him your critiques in private, but you chose to do it here, for all readers to see.

naturalnuke

So I'm not really trying to argue but you brought up some points that I wanted to put my take on.

So far everything that's happened has been logically sound, with an escalation we learned would be happening well in advance. As for why the deaths of Farrier and the wounding of Nauk are supposed to matter. They are narratively unimportant characters after the Fae arc. But, they are characters who have fought for and next to Cat early, who's problems and short comings we've seen Cat have to deal with or help them overcome.

But think about all the narrative things we've done so far, and how it fits in in-universe.

Their deaths matter because they stopped mattering to Cat. They weren't Named, and so they are props. Remember that whole conversation with the Bard way back when, where she was talking about redundancy in the party, narratively how speaking it meant either she or the bumbling conjurer would die? So she made little sub-plots and kept herself interesting?

How long has it been since you even heard Nauk or Farrier mentioned?

They stopped being important to Cats story, and so they became expendable. The only weight their lives had was to die or get injured and sever some of the last remaining connections with the 'squishy mortals', and she sent them into battle anyways.

Kinda agree on Killian, and as for Hellhound; it's more than an orc thing, she's had several times where she's said stuff along the lines of "get your shit together, I refuse to work under you if you don't" it's used more as emphasis 'hey Cat stop being dumb and realize you don't have your shit together' than her actually saying she's gonna leave. And as for your analogy; if the General was worried the grudge would have the 'president' in that scenario start contradicting that Lieutenants orders and fucking up plans, I'd sure hope there would be a talk.

A point I agree on is that it is all feeling a bit compressed and bloated, makes it harder to stick with the plot if every subplot is moving a mile a minute, and makes it seem a awkwardly paced.

naturalnuke

Repressing something: it's not that it feels bloated from the subplots, it's more subplots no longer get time to develop. Like, logically sound that Cat would be mad at Hune, that's who she is. But we had a paragraph to learn about it, and another to explore it, and one more to tie it up. And it's happened a few times, too much stuff to fit in all at once already and then even this point that is logical to the plot and needed to happen feels a bit, rushed? Not rushed, just too fast, it doesn't feel like it was shoved in, just that it could have used more time to develop than what was given. Kinda rushed I guess.

naturalnuke

Rephrasing*

erraticerrata

While I don't usually answer criticisms in the comments, I'll make an exception this once since it stepped out of the bounds of 'opinions on the text'. I'll be frank: Patreon is voluntary. You're not forced to donate, and if you don't want to you certainly don't have to. Bringing whatever donations you've been making into this is pointless and somewhat insulting – you're essentially implying I should allow the Patreon revenue to dictate what story I write. Criticisms I always read, and if they feel relevant usually run by some trusted people to see if there's something there. That last paragraph you wrote made the post something other than criticism, and it's pretty telling you felt the need to add a preemptive defence of your character in it.

Anyways, there's no need to make a scene over this. I'll be keeping an eye on the comment thread and will delete entirely if it turns into name-calling or a flame war – I'm not interested in either of those filling the section

Cyrrix

Thanks for your reply.

My point with patreon was that I thought the story was better when you had time for one chapter a week. That reaching those patreon goals was detrimental to the quality of the writing – thats the point I am trying to make here.

If you think I did dictate your writing at any point in my critique outside the bounds of what critique is (I don't like xy because of xy) I will apologize. This was not my intention.

Nif

I think you're missing a huge point, regarding Hellhound, here you should look into the terms they agreed on when Hellhound joined Cat. Cat agreed that Hellhound would be cats equal in the legions. Deals and oaths are incredibly important things in the story as they're binding on a whole other level than our world. So your analogy about a president and general doesn't hold water, in my opinion. And I don't think it's unlike Hellhound to call out Cat when she's wrong, or not in the right headspace. But I can agree on the fact, the Hune hate was sudden, and I didn't feel it was well explored either.

Farrier, as a reader fell flat when he died, but I can also see why his death would matter to Cat, they spent most of their time together, and we often saw them interacting and training together.

Nauk, to me feels like an other story, that hurt me right in the gut. And here I will give NaturalNuke points for a good explanation, and try to use the same point to go back on why it's important for Legate Hellhound to call Cat, out here on unjustified Hate against a non named will likely seal their fate.

As for Killian, I don't think it was an area that needed to be explored more and would be a liability, to the story as a whole, but that said I think it, also served for Cats as a way to better understand the effect she has on other people as a named, and how she impacts their lives. Correct me if I'm wrong, but I believe Killian described it as Cat was going places at a speed she couldn't hope to keep up with and all she could do is desperately cling on, and hope to not fall off on the way.

Mytha

I wouldn't say Farrier's Death was entirely without emotions but I agree that it could have been done better. Like more minor details about him and how he did these things for Cat. However it is nothing compared to Nauk.

Nauk feels nothing like a person and more like a prop if anything. His Death means nothing to me whatsoever. Captain's Death by far affected me more than his, sort of Death, did. As for the trading kingdoms for his, he healed? I think the Point being made is she would NOT do that. Consider it? Yes, but never actually acting on it. Her showing willingness to sacrifice "Close" friends for the greater good or what not.

This expands into the overall problem, that may be intentional, that Named characters push out all normal mortal characters from storytime. People like Robber and Ratface, while mentioned, do not really make a noticable appearance. This in conjunction with Cat moving further and further up into her Name, leaving them behind. It does make story sense that they would slowly be phased out in favor of other Named whom she can relate to in a way she can not with regular people. However it does make it hard to sympathize with their Deaths and the like when they are already just about dead and gone storywise anyways.

Killian. I never really got this romance to begin with nor did I like it much. It did have it's moments in book 1 and 2 but it has been nothing but a boring drag in book 3 that takes up space better used for more important plot. Besides everyone knows Cat + Black = True Hellhound. I agree that she formulated herself poorly and out of charactly from what she has before. Then again she did wait until it was just the two of them to behave in such a way not to mention they have grown a Little closer since the beginning so that may explain how she can say such things now when she could not Before. However the meaning behind her Words are VERY in character for her. She is mad at Cat for her resenting Hune for making the tactical decision she very likely would have made herself. If Cat is going to start resenting officers and leaders for doing their job then it becomes to much like Wasteland nobility with their own resentments and scheming and she does not want that. So she makes sure Cat knows this.

Then there is the fact that the whole thing is revealed, investigated and resolved in the span of a few paragraphs which is a entirely other thing. Like who here knew Cat resented Hune for this thing? Who expected it to be sort of resolved two minutes later?

All in all the plot is nice and full of action but at the cost of suffering characterization as Erretica tries to move in the full cast of Named in preparation for book 4 while still keeping side characters somewhat relevant. A move which in my opinion has failed.

Jago

"4. Today there was this stupidly silly reaction of the Hellhound: I paraphrase how I couldn't help but read that dialogue: "I am a General and I don't like how my President frowns at one of the Lieutenants and thus I do the only sensible thing: I threaten to beat up my president and throw my Hune is the second in command for the Fifteen. So it is an Army commander frowning at a vice commandant of a division in front of the division commander. The division commander will want to know why and will argue for his vice if there isn't a good reason to frown at him. The discussion will be kept private (as Juniper did) but it will happen. It isn't a good thing for an army to leave that kind of thing unresolved.

Cyrix

*The whole POINT of this arc is this rushing head-along without breather time,*

That might be the point the author wants to bring across, but this is no excuse to forgo characterisation. Worm (which webserial readers might know) was very breathless too – but I did know and care more for the leading cast there after a lot less words. Never mind its myriad of side characters. Epic plot does not contradict characterdriven storytelling – or at least chapters with more characterdevelopment.

*Honestly, how could she NOT care about him?*

Show! Don't tell. Or in this case hint? We weren't even told most of the things you mentioned. That he slept in front of her tent can be asumed and what that ment for their bond can also be asumed? I guess? But we do not know and we certainly were not shown. Show don't tell is a fundamental writing principle.

*If you don't care about him, I can only see you as a very cold person.*

Yeah, except half the things you talk about are refering to Hakram, not Nauk. That you mix those two up so badly kinda highlights the problem, no?

* It wasn't a Big Romance, this isn't a romantic story, afterall.*

If you do romance do it proper – or do not do it at all. Again: I have no problem with the romance per se – or how it turned out. Thats all fine and good. I have problems with how it was done. I did not *feel* like Cat was in love. There were more words spent on cats armor being burned off or dented then on those two character saying something meaningfull/personal to each other.

*About Hellhound... She was like this, always.*

Hellhound imo – and of course you can disagree here – was and still is a stickler for the rules and proper course of action. Due process and thought out, grounded decisions based on facts. The right measure at the right time for a certain threat. Very, very professional in a nutshell.

Threatening to beat up your commanding officer and threatening her with a resignation right before the biggest battle of their lifetime is more than just unprofessional – It is totally out of character for the Hellhound. Especially over such a triviality as *frowning* at another officer.

*i can only see it as spitefull and forcing the author's hand, even though I wouldn't call it an asshole act, it's a very blunt try at manipulation,*

Except I am not manipulative – I did never claimore for specific changes. I did critique – I said where I thought the story was failing and why I thought it did.

I did never say: Write in this thing or I won't give you any money! I am sorry if you read it this way. I also stated I would continue supporting at least for a few more months till the situation with Akua got resolved. I will leave it up to the author if or how and what he wants to change. I am not pushing him in a certain direction – but I am allowed to say I dislike things and why.

If things till then continued in this direction I dislike – I will pull my patreon money. Which I think is a fair thing to do? I do not support things I do not enjoy reading after all. I do not think my few bucks a month will force the authors hand one way or another. Thats silly. But I am not above useing it to show that I am serious.

simeraz

The point was that , will the critique was interesting the threat of cutting off money was unnecessary and should have been made in private not public. By making it in public OTHER perceive it as YOU saying "Because i gave you money you have to do what i say" and not "I dislike your serie and shall not pay a subscription anymore"

Cyrinx

By not actually talking about the critique which you found interesting you are not actually leading this conversation in the right direction?

To be honest I do not give that much about what the public says – I wanted my critique public so others have a chance to join into the discussion. You are very welcome to do so!

About the money: If others think I push the author and what he should write into a certain direction that goes beyond what you could inherently interpret into any critique – they should read the arguments again and talk about them. You are welcome to do so too btw.

The main point you could and should take away from my patreon comment was actually the following: I thought that the Guide was a better read when there was one update a week.

I apologize for any insinuation with the patreon comment – it was not intended.

Jonathan

Cyril, bringing up the possibility of withdrawing Patreon support is inherently manipulative.

You never needed to threaten the author directly because it's implicit. Obviously the author would rather have your Patreon support. And just as obviously, addressing your critique would make you more likely to continue your Patreon support.

It's actually MORE manipulative to phrase it as an unrelated possibility rather than a blunt threat – you sound more reasonable, and more likely to get what you want – the author to change the story.

As for your critique itself – it feels like you've entirely forgotten the characterization of Nauk, Farrier, and Juniper received in the past. We haven't read recent scenes of Cat speaking with Nauk and Farrier, but that's because their characters were already firmly established, and it's reasonable for the readerbase to not forget that these people exist just because they don't get a few lines of dialogue every chapter.

Cat went through the War College and early battles with Nauk at her side, and he was mentioned often. As time went on, they separated in rank and Nauk was mentioned less, but that doesn't mean Cat stopped caring about him. It means that you forgot Nauk's emotional significance to Cat extends beyond what is shown on-screen.

Juniper was also at Cat's side from the start, and moreover their ranks mean they see each other quite often. They've been friends for a long time now. It's perfectly in character for Juniper to use their friendship to make Cat less emotionally compromised by the situation. It's a move made out of cold, calculated logic, and WOW that's what Juniper is known for!!

Cyril

Yes, I agree it was inherently manipulative – to a degree.

That addressing my critique would make me more likely to continue to support the author – thats actually a stretch. I support him if I like what he writes. I did not tell him what to write. Just what I thought didnt work in his current writing. This **IS** a very big difference.

I told him some things didnt work for me: It is up to him to decide if and how he wants to address that. If he doesnt, he is likely to loose my support – but thats fine and more upfront instead of saying nothing and just taking the support away?

About the critique: I did not forget about the characterisation. But I would argue that it isnt enough to just establish characters without doing anything with them – And to then expect an emotional reaction from the audience if they are killed off. Or to expect the audience to understand why those deaths weigh so hard on the main character.

**It means that you forgot Nauk's emotional significance to Cat extends beyond what is shown on-screen.**

I did not forget – but this is a bullshit argument (sorry for the language ^^) that only works on paper. Yeah no shit I dont care about someone– I dont care about? Or was not made to care about? I do not care about someone because 3 books ago I was kinda sorta told I should? This is not how storytelling works? Show don't tell.

**It's perfectly in character for Juniper to use their friendship to make Cat less emotionally compromised by the situation.**

How does threatening to beat her up and leave her without a general play on cats friendship? She would leave her job, her duty behind. Not her friendship for cat? If anything the opposite to what you said is way easier to read into this? At least thats my take on the situation.

I would also argue that the Hellhound isnt known as a shrewd people manipulator the way Malicia is – from whom I would buy such a move.

In all honesty though the Guide so far does not strike me as the book that is that subtle with its characterbeats (which is totally fine btw! Different genres exist for this very reason) – and I honestly feel like you are reaching for straws with your interpretation.

Blue Dragon

Eh. It still seems like you're just a "spiteful asshole" from here, willfully misinterpreting or misunderstanding the story in order to complain.

Cyrinx

Thanks for your response. And thanks for telling me how to not interpretate a story (which are inherently subjective) and giving such a thought out and well formulated response.

People like you are the problem why authors have a hard time getting critique. I am not claiming mine is especially good or valuable – but I put a lot more thought into it then you did into your useless comment.

But be comforted by the fact that the hugbox of the author (this is not an insult to the author – it is just an apt description of the most devout followers) will descend upon me and support you. Because that will make your arguments (?) obviously better and correct.

maelos61

@Cyrinx : I totally agree with you on all points.i think it's, as you mentioned, a 'show don't tell'-problem. The counter-arguments to your critique are pretty much a bunch of things that we need to assume, but didn't specifically see. I mean, sure, I can totally understand why Cat would care about them, but the problem is that I don't and don't see why I should. If Hakram died, then yes, I'd actually think 'Oh no, not him.' because we see way more interaction between him and Cat. For Nauk and Farrier who are pretty much side-characters when it comes to amount of 'screen time'? Who cares. The romance was also totally useless, but I'm hoping it'll get better. The author could have literally inserted another 'morally questionable case' and just have never introduced the romance in the first place, so I'm assuming it'll have at least some unique use... hopefully. So yeah, you're not the only heartless bastard.

Cyrinx

Thank you for talking about the critique. 😊

Its nice that I am not the only one seeing those problems.

I think I agree with you that loosing Hakram would have been a much harder beat which would drive loss and possible recklessness on cats part home to the reader.

I am not advocating killing him off and I would argue that the story so far doesnt strike me as a grim and dark one? So I can understand why on a narrative sense one might shy away from doing so even though that could have been potentially a better thing?

But the tradeoff is as you describe: I also do not care about Nauk or Farrier. I think for those intended beats to land we would need more characterisation for those side characters or just in general.

I am interested in hearing more opinions about that.

... you heartless bastard. 😏

Berder

So... does anyone still think Cat *really* won against Akua in the deal at the end of book 2? I predicted then it would result in some horrific ritual, and indeed it has with the release of Still Water.

Let me recap that deal (chapter 48 part II). Cat and Akua were both in a bubble dimension. Cat had the ability to kill Akua at that time. Akua did not have the ability to kill Cat. Cat probably did not have a way out of the dimension without Akua's consent (maybe Masego could have done it, maybe not). Akua definitely did not have a way out of the dimension without Cat's consent, because Cat would kill her. Cat was thus in a stronger negotiating position at the start.

Akua granted safe passage for Cat out of the dimension. In exchange, Akua got an agreement Cat would not kill her or shed her blood for three days and three nights. That's fair enough, Cat trading her own survival for Akua's survival, and both of them held each other's survival hostage at the start. The deal should have ended there, with a draw.

But then Cat agreed to let Akua have three of her associates in exchange for the three day truce extending to Cat and her command. Why on earth did Cat agree to that? Cat could have just killed all of Akua's associates, and it was shown shortly afterwards that Akua lacked the actual power to actually harm Cat. Cat was able to subdue her despite not being allowed to shed Akua's blood. Akua got something for nothing here.

And then, Cat agreed to support Akua for governorship of Liesse, a decision which directly led to Still Water and the death of more Callowans than Black killed in the invasion. Cat rationalized that in Liesse, Akua would be out of her element, away from allies and among a population that "hated her guts." And, Cat rationalized, Cat would have tools to keep her in line. These assumptions are now demonstrated false, as Akua has succeeded in doing more harm to Callow than anybody, and the fact that Callowans hated her guts is of no consequence now they are undead. I predicted some awful ritual would arise from Akua's governorship, as indeed it has.

In exchange for this massive blunder, what did Cat get in return? Akua agreed to surrender the demon standard. Since Cat shortly afterwards proved she had physical dominance over Akua, this was again nothing in return, since Cat could have simply taken the standard against Akua's will. Akua got a huge basis for her power, a governorship that led to the deaths of vast numbers of Callowans, in exchange for nothing.

Akua was the clear winner of that deal, rule of threes notwithstanding.

Mytha

Well that deal was all kinds of bullshit, no one is arguing against that. Personally it feels like Erratic wrote itself into a corner and deus exed itself out of it. Like why not just "Escort" Akua for 3 Days and then have her murdered by the Escort or the like? Still the best of the 3 books but still.

But yes. Akua by FAR got the better of that deal and it I'd go so far as to claim that Cat is directly responsible for the Deaths of all those people Akua turned due to agreeing with the deal, among other things.

lennymaster

First, please excuse any mistakes, I am not a native speaker, which I usually do not cite as an excuse, but this post is somewhat emotionally loaded and so am I as I am writing this.

I have read over a thousand books till this day (I am not joking, my kindle library states it holds 1176 works, maybe a hundred short stories true, but most are novels), and quite a few webserials (Heretical Edge, Taint, Trials, Zombie Knight, Powered, The Gods are Bastards, Legion of Nothing, Mother of Learning, etc.), but few have managed to impress me quite as much as Guide has. It is one of the very few series that regularly manages to surprise me (despite the fact, that Guide is built on storytropes) and make shudders run down my spine (my main criteria for awesome). But this post is unfortunately not about the awesomeness that is Guide, but rather the incessant comparison of it to a in my opinion far lesser story. Something of a pioneer in this field maybe, but a far too overrated one in my opinion, just like Tolkien and Rowling.

I do not understand why Worm is considered to be the pinnacle of Webserialwriting. Yes it was not bad, and correct me if I am wrong, I did after all not read more than half of it (very unusual of me, I very rarely break a series of once I have gone beyond the second book or the equivalent), but it had plenty of glaring weaknesses.

Warning, spoilers ahead:

To the point where I stoped reading, Armsmaster was nothing but a thinly disguised plotdevice, the reason why she could not offically be a good guy. He was the worst kind of villian, not evil but rather petty and selfabsorbed, more like a schoolyard bully rather than a grown up enemy, but one with all the real power of a full-fledged adversary.

Furthermore I did not care the least bit about ANY of her "Teammates", considering that they were cardboardcutouts with a little twist to make it less obvious how very cliché they were. Her powers were a joke, just so her opponents could look even more dangerous and impressive for having kind of normal powers for a superhuman setting. People that should have wiped the floor with her on any given day, wich they did until they had to get out of the way of more serious opponents so the plot could move along and she was finally allowed to beat them by being clever and prepared (meaning ridiculously lucky, to the point of were I would have wondered if her real power was not luck, if not for the fact that her life was so utterly shitty in all other matters).

Last but not least I have to say that I did not get around the impression that she was either a victim trying to not be a victim, but perpetually failing, not necessarily because it was that way but rather because she saw herself that way. Or that she was a hero with an Anarchistic streak, a typical teenager, but with superpowers, though entirely lacking the grit to take what she wants. If she even had an idea of what she actually wants (revenge for her dead mother but no one to take revenge on, revenge for her fathers lost job but no one to blame for his joblessness other than hard times, revenge for herself, the only one she could actually get, but never made a move about getting it), perpetually differing with indecision about wether to do what little redeeming she had to do to be an official hero or to embrace villiany and for example taking her revenge on her former best friend, who bruttaly and callously betrayed her at the worst possible time for no reason at all (really, just like that?!). All Worm did was gloss over its myriad of weaknesses with an utterly grim-dark worldbuilding.

Characterdevelopment? Sure, but it does not matter that our heroine grew a spine, something came along in this dark, dark world and ruined everything she was starting to achieve anyways. Our heroine was terribly betrayed, but she does nothing about it and rather whines instead of going out to either take revenge or to forgive that traitor, because that would align people who are already aligned against her in this terribly unjust world, or actually require far more spine than she managed to grow, despite fighting several battles to the death against terrible odds and terrible enemies (where there was no or nearly no chance of the other one dieing) until then.

Spoiler end.

Is it it wrong to bash an authors story like that? Yes, probably so, but I am so sick of people criticising a dozen different things about any webserial I read and like, always using Worm as an example of how to do it right, oftentimes contradicting each other. Just because it is the first webserial they have read. Worm is mainstream (a little bit of something for everyone), that is not bad in and of itself, but considering that it is neigh the same thing one can find a hundredfold in mainstream media (amazon, 90 percent of anything with more than a thousand reviews), with sleight variations such as a darker world/cast/plot, however with no truly innovative, scandalous or outright crazy ideas. Like Mother of Learning, wich combines a magical world with a groundhogday scenario, or Everybody Loves Large Chest, with an outright psychopath, not sociopath, as a protagonist, to name two examples that are at least to my opinion the ballpark for modern webserial writing. Even Drew Hayes's Superpowereds differs in some essential points from regular mainstream, it it is one of the works in the top webfictionlist wich comes closest to that. Worm may have been far from mainstream one time in the past, however it has not been for a LONG time. Webserials these days is were authors go who do not fit in mainstream media, and comparing mainstream with stories that are just so outside of it like Guide is like comparing apples and peaches.

Cyrrix

Worm was used as an example because many here might know it – thats it.

Its popularity was used to illustrate an argument. This was never about Worm or about a comparison between Worm and the Guide.

I am honestly confused what set you off?

lennymaster

It was not your comment, though I do not disagree with it, it was the use of worm as a comparsion.

First do I not only consider it to be a middling good story at best, I also believe it to be vastly overated, akin to Tolkien an Rowling. Like them it was something of a pioneer in their respective stiles, wich has given it an undeserved amount of weight.

Second, my fazit, wich I might not have expressed clearly, mea culpa, was that it is mainstream, only differing from it in the darkness of the stories world, and not doing so sufficantly enough to actually stand out from it. Not like How to Survive on a Daily Basis for example does (not to my taste, wich however does not dipute my point). Worm is in fact so mainstream (to cite: "You are neither hot nor cold ...

" ) that it is neigh uncomparaple to most webserials. Thus not comparable in anithing but specifics.

Your comment was quite specific, namly characterisation, thus secondly does not apply to your comment, but firstly very much does.

So my critic to your critic goes only so far that I do not agree with you on the fact that anything in Worm is in any way better, much rather significantly worse in my opinion, then in Guide. Aside maybe from the end, on wich I cannot judge, for I did not read it, wich however does not matter since we are about as far along in Guide as I was in Worm when I stopped reading.

When you look back on any webserial on the topwebfictionlist that was even remotly similar to anything in the general mainstream, aside maybe from something as difficult to define as general genre, please tell me so. I would love to be proven wrong considering that I suffer perpetually from lack of high quality reading material, or at least something that differs sufficently from the mainstream that I can not tell at the very least the general plot from the first few chapters. The inability to do so is one of the points wich have drawn me to webserials.

"Her powers were a joke, just so her opponents could look even more dangerous and impressive for having kind of normal powers for a superhuman setting."

The reason she kept beating people despite the apparent power discrepancy was a major reveal near the end, and the reveal also showed that this was planned from the beginning, not a later twist decided by the author. You missed this by not finishing the story.

I had my own problems with Worm, but I see things a little differently – to me, the reason Worm is a standard for comparison was consistent, high-volume, decent output. The majority of authors simply cannot reliably put out that kind of volume without it going completely to sh**. I suspect the comparison of reliability versus other authors had a halo/horns effect: people like consistent output, so Worm looked better in comparison to stories by authors who could not produce as reliably. But that is highly IMO and therefore could easily be wrong.

Denimcurtain

I have a completely different perspective.

Everybody Loves Large Chest is just crack fiction that has been done plenty. It usually isn't well liked because you don't empathize with the character at all. I wouldn't call it innovative but I could accept that it isn't traditional (though I'd point you to the Watchmen comics for a very mainstream rendition of psychopaths as main characters).

The things you described about Mother of Learning seem like it would make it not innovative as well. Ground hog day spliced with isn't a new concept.

I like the Guide because it has a cool conceit and sets its characters up to have very cool moments. It shines when it plays with the tropes of good and evil and gives pragmatic reasons for taking excessively dramatic and cool actions. It slides a bit when it slips a bit too far into the tropes dictating the actions of characters we care about or fails to underline the tension between Cat as the protagonist and Cat as a villain.

I put that there because I don't know exactly how you can hold constant the problems you have with Worm about powersets with the idea that it is mainstream at the same time as you call all these other stories not mainstream. It does a great job of showing just how dangerous overlooked powersets can be. The traditional powersets SHOULD lose against someone who can guess correctly almost all the time or someone who can decide what timeline he's in. Its definitely not mainstream in its treatment of its main character. For better or for worse its much further away from the mainstream than any of your examples so far if you're looking for stories where the main character wins (Guide at least has the Pyrrhic victory thing going). It feels like you missed a lot of the story either because it was hard to follow or because you didn't finish it.

I could see not liking Worm but I can't really agree with almost any of your critique. My problems with worm would be that its a bit oppressive in its grim darkness at times and the pacing is a bit wonky at times. Like most webserials the quality of writing fluctuates more than you would get from a book. Its ok just not to like something but if you're really confused as to why people liked it, its because they likely don't agree with your understanding of what happened in worm.

Wanted to sidestep this shitstorm, but just gotta say: I could not be sicker of all things Worm. If I had it in my power, I would delete the damned thing from reality. Not for what it is, but for all the mindlessly derivative permutations of it that have been spawned.

If, at any time, the Guide were EVER to bear more resemblance to Worm than "both are examples of lines of text, written collectively in the form of paragraphs* I would bail out without a 'chute as a fan.

This arc of the Guide HAS been different than what's come before, but that's to be expected as the main protagonist moves into plot-circles that have more dimensions. Everything from the moment the name Cordelia Hasenbauch(sp?) was first used (if not well before) has been tilting towards an acceleration of events. The Calamities went north to throw a wrench in that, and failed.

Cat's very Named-dreams have, repeatedly, borne out that Black's experiences contesting with the Heir bear a STRIKING resemblance to what we see happening here in the present. Social orders being overthrown, only for those victorious overthrowers to have to make too many decisions too rapidly for all of them to have been ideal. Leading to problems down the road.

EE has, at all times, done a great job of preserving the "The theme of events is cyclical, even if the variations on a theme differ markedly" ethos on which the Guide-verse pretty much rests.

Since I've neglected to do so before now: Thank you for the extra Chapters, EE. Finding time to juggle one's life and hold to a writing schedule is hard enough. Increasing your word-output is just choosing to put more stones in your backpack to hike with. It is appreciated.

The uh, the calamities went South

Denimcurtain

What "mindlessly derivative permutations" are out there?

danh3107

I honestly liked this chapter up until the end, you need exposition sometimes. However the bit about disliking Hune wasn't even built up or foreshadowed in any of the previous chapters, it was brought up in one paragraph and solved a few lines down. It was pretty unnecessary

MetruX

I... Kind of agree. Hune being hated was a pretty surprise, and wasn't well seen. To make clear, before someone call me out on it: my defense before was about our general, not about this bit of Hune in the story. For Hellhound it was a natural response, even though Cat's hate wasn't well seen.

grzecho2222

I'm curious if Captain is even really dead, since this whole running back doesn't sound very much like Black Knight and it smells of some kind of ruse to draw Bard into trap. Also I've been thinking evil might be balance for Bard and only entity that works like that that I've heard of is Licho.

Fern

Couple of thoughts:

I do think Farrier as a character was undeveloped, but as someone who reads this pretty consistently (whenever a chapter is released I usually read it 3-4 times) I liked him, and liked how you dealt with his death.

I love Nauk! I feel like his main character building stuff was all done during the war college arc, so I have no complaints there.

Other than that I only have two real criticisms: Hune and Black's coming breakdown.

As far as Hune goes it's even been pointed in story that Catherine doesn't really know her all that well, which made it a surprise when she suddenly lashed out her for a pretty weird reason (that Juniper explained).

With Black I think almost all of us were sure that Bard was just talking out of her ass, but it seems like with Malicia's comment (that Black is reverting back to his 16 year old mindset of undisguised loathing instead of the inhumanity that I think we all assumed was his, ah, "base mindset" I guess) of just coming back and assuming direct control of Praes.

Those are just minor though, the kind of thing I assume gets tuned up after finishing the story but before publishing. Big fan of the work man, love the story so far!

narcoduck

You know what I think could have helped alot? An interlude from the 15th Legion's rank and file after the end of the last arc. The narrative has been taken over by the Named to the point where it was unsurprising Nauk became unimportant to Fate, "expendable" as Juniper said.

Seeing how Robber, Ratface, Killian, and Pickler react to Nauk's injury could have been a neat chapter about how they're getting left behind in the battle of legends and by Catherine herself. Maybe even a POV from Hune so this development wasn't so rushed.

E.E.-

The typos/autocorrect mistakes are getting so bad here that they're interfering with being able to understand the story. For example:

"lying my way to the contraptions of godhood"

Did you really mean contraptions? I don't think you did, because it doesn't make sense, but I also don't have any way of guessing what you DID mean! Commissions of godhood? Compensations? What? I could easily read over all the "ifs" that should be "ofs" and so forth, but some of them are actually hurting the story.

Brandon Sanderson is always telling fantasy writers that having your characters actually DO things is usually preferable to having them sit there contemplating.

It mostly works for you to have long stretches of Cat's inner monologue, more often than not. This world is so complicated you're never going to get completely away from that. But at the same time it would be nice to get to Cat DOING things 😊

*metals*hop

Reading this at 1am, too tired to leave a long comment so I'll be brief.

Story is good, slow thinky parts stand out well against big battle scenes. Stuff feels fast and strained because Cat is feeling strain from stuff going too fast.

A few more typos than usual this time, might be worth doing an extra proofread pass each chapter.

Mentioning the Patreon at the end of a negative review might not have been meant as a threat or manipulation but unfortunately it came off that way. Lesson learned for next time.

LordMunchkin

I think Farrier dying was more about what he symbolized to Cat rather than his character. He was one of the first Callowans to believe in Cat and he died fighting for her.

Chapter 51: Overlooked

"It is ever the temptation of chroniclers to ascribe great failures to a single turning point, a flaw revealed or enemy virtue displayed. This simplification of history ignores the starker truth of all great enterprises, that in the end though all leaders are captains of a ship they rule neither wind nor tide. Failure and victory are the collection of choices small and great, shaped by perspectives of the myriad making them."

-Extract from 'The Ruin of Empire, or, a Call to Reform of the Highest Assembly', by Princess Eliza of Salamans

The fairy gate had opened half a mile away from the outskirts of Dormer, and that was where the two thousand legionaries of the Fifteenth made camp. It had taken us a week of marching through Arcadia to cross what was essentially the full breadth of Callow, not a fae in sight. I was still only beginning to grasp the full implications of what the boon I'd obtained from the fae royals meant for warfare in Calernia. So far I'd only used the fairy gates to move quicker within the bounds of Callow, but that was a self-imposed limitation. With Hierophant to chart me a path, I could feasibly muster an army in Marchford and have it pop out in front of the Principate's capital bristling with steel. Keeping an army in the middle of enemy territory supplied without turning to banditry would be near impossible, but what did it matter? I could leave the same way I'd come when my foodstuffs ran out. If the Red Flower Vales could be kept in Imperial hands, I could strike at Proceran territory with impunity while the First Princes' army were stuck besieging one of the most heavily fortified borders on the continent.

It was enough to have me shiver. There was precedent for the kind of power I wielded as the last Duchess of Winter, villains and heroes alike that had shown a capacity for destruction just as great. The gates, though? I couldn't think of one.

The Fifteenth had returned midmorning to Creation and I'd wasted no time in arranging matters with General Istrid. Juniper's mother had always been my favourite of the Praesi commanders in Callow. Within moments of our first meeting, two years ago, she'd expressed the opinion that Governor Mazus had been in need of a good hanging. Always a way to get on my good side, that. She wasn't much like her daughter, aside from the rough manners that were so common with orcs. If anything, she reminded me of Nauk – or the other way around, since I'd become acquainted with her first. She rode out to meet me on one of the great wolves that her people used as mounts, meeting me halfway to Holden. She gave warm welcome, though not without some grousing.

"You sent us across the country from the real fight, Squire," she growled after clapping my back.

Before I'd stolen my mantle, Named or not it would have jostled me. The woman had ferocious strength still, for one in her fifties.

"Needed you to herd them towards me, general," I replied. "Otherwise the front would have spilled across the south, and there was no putting that genie back in the lamp when it got loose."

"Sacker says the same thing," General Istrid said, visibly disgruntled. "A real shame. I won't ever get a good crack at the fairies, with that peace you shoved down their throats. At least we get a turn in the dance with the Diabolist."

"I won't say she's more dangerous than a pair of literal gods," I said, "but we're in for a rough month. You heard about the necromantic ritual?"

The exact nature of Still Water was still under Imperial seal, so the official story was that Akua had used some kind of ancient ritual to turn the entire city into undead. Considering the trove of horrors that still lay dormant in the Wasteland no one had questioned it too much, but I was aware it was only a matter of time until the truth of it trickled out.

"They're supposed to be high-grade undead, right?" she growled. "That's fucked. Skeletons and zombies need a necromancer guiding them to be a threat, but a hundred thousand bloody ghouls aren't something to sneer at."

"My caster tells me they're closer to the kind of undead the Dead King uses for officers," I told her. "We're calling them wights."

"The highborn twit should have paid closer attention to her history lessons," the orc laughed. "We proved that dead men and household troops are no match for Legion steel when we put the Empress on the throne."

There was truth in that, I felt, but also dangerous assumption. As far as I knew there'd been no battle of the scale of the one looming ahead during the Praesi civil war. Akua would have at a hundred thousand wights and six thousand living under her command, by our estimates, and the forces I was gathering would be a little over sixty thousand. Even during the Conquest armies that size hadn't been fielded in the same theatre, and for good reason. It was going to evaporate at least half the Imperial treasury to keep that many people fed and armed, and the aftermath was likely to turn a chunk of the Empires' breadbasket into wasteland. Nations fought with smaller hosts for a reason, even when they could muster great ones. The ride to Holden was spent recounting the Arcadian campaign at the general's demand, until I stood in council with the other two generals in the city. Orim the Grim and General Sacker were significantly less friendly in the manners, though never actually impolite. Sacker did have that sharp goblin sardonic turn of phrase, but refrained from verbally pulling my pigtails the way she had on our first meeting.

I'd risen in rank quite a bit since then.

General Istrid had begun preparations for a march the moment my mages had scried hers, and I was rather pleased to hear the twelve thousand legionaries would be ready to leave come dawn. There was a certain pleasure to working with veterans knowing their way around a war. The Fifteenth's officers were getting there, but my legion was not a well-oiled machine yet. Part of that was on me, I knew. Even after the brutal casualties we'd taken in Arcadia and Dormer, the Fifteenth was still twice the size of any other legion and severely lacking mages. It was a rare month I did not thank the Gods for granting me both Ratface and the inclination to not look too closely at how he kept us supplied. Even Juniper had ceased slapping his fingers when he bent the rules a little, using the fact I'd effectively suborned the Guild of Smugglers to him as an excuse to wash her hands of the matter. It was not the place of an Imperial general, she said, to meddle in civil affairs. A little rich of her to say considering Marshal Ranker used to run Denier through the governor, but in theory it was supposed to be true.

I rode back to camp a few hours before sundown, declining the offer of a roof over my head in the city in favour of sticking with my men. I was still chewing on the conversation I'd had with Juniper before leaving. That Hune had made the right call, even if it had seen one of the few people I considered a friend halfway to the grave. Even if it had led to the Gallowborne being all but wiped out. The ogre legate was the only one of my senior officers I'd never truly reached out to. I hadn't made a lot of mystery about that, it must be said. When I'd first crossed the Empress by resurrecting a knightly order, she'd not been one of the people I gathered to tell. The Hellhound had objected back then as well, though I'd dismissed her words by saying I did not trust her the way I did others. Nauk, I recalled grimly, had been the very example I used. It might have been a mistake, I now thought. By visibly keeping Hune out of my 'inner circle' even though she was the second highest officer in the Fifteenth, I was making a self-fulfilling prophecy. Trust freely granted, in my experience, had a way of making people trustworthy. Of making them want to live up to that trust. I'd never attempted that with the legate.

It might not be too late to rectify that mistake, though. I still didn't like the call she'd made, I admitted to myself. But it was a dislike that was borne of reasons personal. I do not have a monopoly on ruthlessness employed to save lives. I'd raised the Fifteenth out of people I knew, had shared struggles with, and they had since the beginning been given a measure of my trust. Hakram, Nauk, Ratface, Pickler, Robber. Even Juniper and Aisha, who had been opponents in the College but ones I respected. Hune had been brought in at the Hellhound's word and so never fully welcomed into that fold. It was part of a larger flaw in the way I did things, one the Empress had already warned me against: I rarely gave power to those I did not personally know and like. It was telling, perhaps, that Anne Kendal and Juniper were respectively the effective ruler of Callow and the commander of the largest military force within its borders. But I could not continue along these lines if I wanted my homeland to ever climb out of the hole. No matter how skilled the few I fully trusted were, they were not enough to form the ruling class of an entire kingdom. I shook myself out of the thoughts and sought Hune instead of continuing down the spiral and of excuses and recriminations.

The ogre wasn't with her officers. I found her at the edge of the camp, tucked away between two low hills and kneeling on the ground. Even like that she still towered several feet above me. I remained at a distance, though when I saw her lips move I sharpened my hearing to listen in. I'd had a casual disregard for other people's privacy even before I began employing spies. Pouring wine into a wooden bowl, she murmured to herself.

"O Faceless Gods, I give you thanks," the legate said. "For crossing survived and refuge found, for the breaking of the chains of men."

Breaking a small loaf of black bread with fingers large as sausages, Hune crushed it into crumbs she dispersed next to the bowl. Crossing survived, huh. I knew ogres were not native to Calernia. They'd been brought over as slaves by the Miezans, and ended up joining the Dread Empire when the first Maleficent founded it in exchange for land to live on.

"Neither poor nor rich, neither free nor bound," she murmured. "For the promise made to our ancestors, I offer bread and wine."

My brows creased when I saw the crumbs rot and the wine turn to vinegar. Hune was not a mage. No ogres were, they could not be born with the gift. This was the closest to the miraculous powers wielded by priests I had seen on the Empire's side. I knew there were cults in the Empire that sacrificed to the Gods Below in exchange for powers, but I'd never actually seen the Hellgods extend their hand to Creation before. It was chilling to watch, light as their touch had been. A reminder there's more than one side of the old war looking at us. The ogre emptied the bowl onto the grass and brushed her hands clean, picking up the empty wineskin before rising back to her feet. She did not seem all that surprised to see me. Ogres, as far as I knew, did not have senses better than a human's. She might just have been expecting me. Reaching me in a few strides, Hune lowered her massive torso in a bow.

"Lady Squire," she said.

"Legate," I replied. "Didn't take you for the pious type."

Her face did not react, neither irritated nor amused.

"I am not Praesi," she said. "My people have their own ways."

"So I see," I said. "I'll admit to some ignorance on the subject. Never found a lot of books written about ogres the way there are about orcs and goblins."

Hune studied me calmly.

"We are not numerous enough to merit scholarly attention," she said. "Are you seeking reports, ma'am? I gave instruction to my commanders to have them prepared, but I remember the details if you would prefer them spoken."

"No, your officers already have me in the loop," I awkwardly said. "They're, uh, quite thorough. The precision of it will shave a few hours off Ratface's workload when we link up."

"I am sure your words will please them," the ogre said. "How may I offer service?"

I was honestly unsure if she was politely putting me off or not. There'd been some people currying favour with me when the Fifteenth was founded, before Juniper had put her foot down. Even after, though, it was rare for people not to lean into an opportunity to talk with me when they could. I left matters of promotion to the Hellhound without meddling, but I was still arguably one of the ten most influential people within the Empire. I was a little at a loss at how to deal with whatever this was. I wondered if the Empress had felt the same, when she'd summoned me to the Tower for audience and I'd bluntly pushed through the small talk.

"Sit with me for a while," I finally said. "If you've no pressing duties."

"I can spare some time," Hune said, her tone hinting at neither displeasure nor expectation.

I ended up with my legs going down the slope, thinking of how ridiculous we must look from a distance. Even with my plate making me seem larger, it would take ten of me put together to even remotely rival the legate in mass. I ran a hand through my hair, wondering exactly how I should go about this. It'd been easier, with the others.

"Are we to revise the command decisions I made in Dormer, my lady?" the ogre broke in while I was still debating.

Ah. She'd picked up on that, had she. Hard to play coy about displeasure when mine literally lowered the temperature.

"No," I said. "It's been pointed out to me that my objections were personal. Childish, arguably. I apologize for how I acted."

"You were not impolite or unprofessional," the legate said. "Even if you had been, you are Named. It is your prerogative to speak as you wish."

"Doesn't mean I should," I replied. "So have the apology anyway."

"There is nothing to forgive," Hune said calmly. "Was there anything else?"

I turned to her and studied her face. There was something brutish about the ogres looked, the way their features were slightly broader than a human's would be if they were the same size. It made them look a little slow, but there was nothing dim about those deep and dark-set eyes meeting mine.

"You don't like me very much, do you Hune?" I asked.

The ogre's face shuttered.

"I am an officer in the Legions of Terror, under your command," she said. "If my demeanour offended you in any way, I apologize and stand willing for any punishment you deem fit."

Catherine Foundling, I thought ruefully, charmer of the year.

"It's not a crime to dislike me," I said. "And I'm not offended. I'm honestly surprised at how well along I've gotten with the people around me. I wasn't exactly the most popular girl at the orphanage."

"You are apprentice to the Carrion Lord, named Vicequeen of Callow by Her Dread Majesty," the ogre said woodenly. "Praises are your due."

"I'm not all that interested in praises," I said. "But I'd like to know what... this is about."

I waved my hand vaguely. There was a flicker of irritation in her eyes, but I couldn't call it a victory. It was too shallow. The kind of irritation you had for a fly buzzing in your ear, not something I could use to bridge a gap.

"Ma'am, I am your subordinate," Hune said. "This is unnecessary."

And that was the heart of it, wasn't it? I didn't consider my people to be subordinates, or at least not just that. They were the people I drank and laughed with, the people I shared a fire with. There'd been less of that since I'd begun gathering Named around me, it was true. But I'd not allowed those relationships to go fallow either.

"I ask more of my officers than others do of their own," I said. "I try to give more as well."

"We," the ogre said bluntly, "are not equals. You hold power of life and death over everyone in the Empire, save a hallowed few. This pretence, my lady, is tedious."

"So this is about power," I said.

The sigh the legate let out was cavernous. I was pretty sure a single one of her lungs was the size of my entire torso. Should have done this when it was dark out, I mused half-seriously. Seems to work better that way.

"Is this an order?" Hune asked.

I nodded. I would have preferred not to make it one, but evidently that wasn't an option.

"Then with your permission, I will speak frankly," the legate said. "You are dangerous."

"Usually when people call me that they mean it as a compliment," I said. "I'm getting the feeling that's not the case here."

"The treaty with the Tower that granted us the Hall of Skulls and adjacent lands comes with mandatory service in the Legions," the ogre said. "There has not been a war since the Declaration where my people did not fight and die."

"I'm not unfamiliar with being on the wrong side of Praesi rule," I said.

"With all due respect, ma'am, that is untrue," Hune said. "You were born in the wealthiest city of the Empire's breadbasket and raised by an institution whose education is on par with that of lesser nobility."

"The orphanage saw lean month toos, Hune," I said. "We had Governor Mazus running the city for years before he got the noose."

"Every month, one of my people is murdered and drained of blood after coming too close to a lord's border," Hune said. "When the Green Stretch has a bad year, families sign themselves into servitude to avoid shortages. The Reforms barely lowered the amount of warriors that must be provided for service. We are strong enough to be of use and too few to be worth appeasing. Callowans hang when they rebel or resist, ma'am. We earn death by existing."

"That can be changed," I said. "Hune, none of this is set in stone. It's not inevitable. It only works as long as we let it."

"And speaking words such as these, you have raised a host that answers to you before the Tower," the ogre said. "You promised freedom to the greenskins, insurgence to the many colours of men. And yet two things you have brought in fact: ever greater titles to you, and war wherever you tread."

"Because it's working," I replied bluntly. "There's opposition because we're gaining ground. We push hard enough and it'll break. We're not going against infinite strength. At some point they have to bend or lose."

"That may be," Hune said. "Perhaps you will deliver all you have sworn. But you are not the first silvertongued monster birthed by Praes. We have seen them come and go, and what has changed? In the end all of them smile, and ask us to die in their wars."

"I'm not asking you to die," I said. "I'm asking you to fight. If not for me, then at least for something you want. To do more than just... linger."

"We fought heroes," the legate said. "Then devils. Then the courts of the fae. Now we march against a madwoman of the old way. What meaning have any of these to me? I took oath, and will serve in the Fifteenth until I die or my term ends. But you ask me to bleed for strangers and thank you for it. That is not the due of a soldier. It is the due of a servant."

"I don't want servants, Hune," I said sharply. "I want comrades."

"Servants are what you have, my lady," the ogre said. "Your causes are their causes. You are Named, and so this is only natural. But I took oath to the Legions of Terror and not the army of House Foundling."

"I'm not asking you to commit treason," I said.

"We are riding with knights," she replied bluntly. "Half the Fifteenth is Callowan. You strong-armed the Dread Empress into naming you ruler of this land. Do not misunderstand me, Lady Foundling, I wish you well in these ventures. The world may be better for your victory, should it come."

Her dark eyes narrowed.

"But I will not die for another woman's dream," Hune said.

Slowly, she rose to her feet.

"I apologize for any offence I have given," the ogre said. "May I be dismissed?"

I bit my tongue and nodded. I watched the legate stride away and passed a hand through my hair.

So much for mending that bridge.

That conversation with Hune was great. It's nice to see that not everyone is pulled in the wake of Cat's story. Also I chuckled at this line She's likely one of the clearest eyed people in Cat's retinue. I hope Cat listens to her.

stevenneiman

Named, especially Named whose Role or Aspects involve command, seem to have an effect similar to Girl Genius' Sparks, in that they bring out the minion side of others whenever they do something they need help with something. But, it seems that just like Sparks, not everyone has enough of that side to be affected that way.

Metalshop

Ok, now I really want to hear more about the ogres. This little glimpse was fascinating.

Soronel Haetir

Well, if Hune is the remaining high traitor that we've had hints of I guess we better start calling her Actress.

Nguyen Hong Hai

That is way too obvious, also nice to see our Squire from an outside perspective, especially from someone who is tired of all the fighting.

Dainpdf

From someone who is not caught up in her. Villains and heroes of her type (commander types, that is) seem to always gather retinue of, well, servants. Too often to be a coincidence.

MetruX

Actually, I think she literally spelled it out that she is not affiliated with Cat, but with the Tower... So... It wouldn't even be betrayal...

Considering how Hune's weight to the story is (and has been) foreshadowed to be greater in the future, am I the only one who pronounces her name like June/dune? Or does everyone else pronounce it hoo-neh?

thespaceinvader

I hadn't really thought about it, but now that I do, I think I'd pronounce it 'Hewn'...

limlimrevolution

"Hewn" is what I defaulted to as well.

taborask

I hate to say it, but Hune makes a lot of good points. Catherine definitely has a sort of Taylor Hebert flavor to her in that she talks a really good game but her actions don't seem to actually show that. For everything she says about protecting her people from abuses of power, and building a world based on institutions and not Named everything she does ends up with dead Callowans and more power to herself and the Woe. Sure the argument can be made that she's doing positive political/bureaucratic stuff offscreen that's improving peoples lives or that she'll get to her long term goals once she's amassed enough power, but those both feel pretty thin

Daemion

That's the problem when you try to change things through force. Anything gained by force requires an increasingly greater force to keep stable. You can't simply change people, they have to want it and even then it takes time. Generations, usually.

You can't sit two life long enemies at a table and tell them they are friends now.

So to even get a chance to change things, Cat had to use her Name, she had to apply force in various ways and now she has to keep doing it just to keep things on track. If she ever stops or if she dies, everything will fall apart and go back to the way it was before.

Her hope is that once she achieves her vaguely defined goal everyone will see that things are better and accept the change. This assumes people are rational and interested in the greater good over personal advantages.

Realistically, to make this work Cat needs to be a constant influence on the Empire for at least 2 generations and everything needs to happen as planned. Same as Black did before her.

It's only human to think that way. I think Cat realized her mistakes and her naivety. She knows she has to change the way she operates because right now it's not sustainable.

RoflCat

Maybe she'll basically lose 'everything' she hold at one point.

Her power as a Named.
Her status as vicequeen/Squire.
Her allies in the Legion.

Like say if Bard pull whatever thing she did that made herself into the new person, but on Cat this time.
So she'll become a nobody.

No Carrion Lord to take intrigue in her and gave her the shortcut to power.
No Hellhound to make her army into the force it is.
No Woe to assist her.

She will only have normal, every day people to work with.
In a way it's a massive downgrade of her power, but on the other hand if she can change things while having no power, it'll be a testament to her will.

Stephen R. Marsh

"But you ask me to bleed for strangers and thank you for it.
That is not the due of a soldier. It is the due of a servant"

That captures so much.

mordered

I think that Cat's motives matter very little. The goal of a squire is to become greater and rise above the status. Amassing power is a part of her name. Cat's also not being honest with herself, it is not just what she can do with the power it is power itself that she enjoys. Having it makes her want more (which is the evil side of Squire playing its hand), she just justifies it all by saying it is for the greater good. Worst thing is is that she truly believes she is good.

Dainpdf

She has a lot of Taylor in her. They're both very good at telling themselves that, while the cost of their actions to others is great, they are for the greater good.
Being Named seems to be halfway to being Fae: once one's Name has inroads, it's hard to get out of the grooves.

nipi

I wonder if Cats secrets will come to light at some point. I mean even if it was out of ignorance having taken a bad gamble with the souls of all in Callow is bound to cause some spectacular fallout should it come to light. I can see her going down a dark path to keep that secret. Then again only the Woes and fae were witness to that.

Zach

Catherine herself even realizes this to some extent; as she pointed out, none of this current conflict would have occurred if not for her voluntary decision to let Lone Swordsman live. So far the net result of her actions is a massive negative, and all her actions since that point have merely been mitigating the damage of events she set into action through a bad choice.

Basically she's acting under the assumption that her gaining power is intrinsically a result that will lead towards the greater good and must be pursued at nearly all costs. Your comparison with Taylor is very apt, because both characters are control freaks who are incapable of trusting anyone other than themselves (and the handful of people they trust) with power. You see this in her comments about Democracy a couple chapters back.

Honestly, I have trouble seeing Catherine ending up as a positive influence on the world unless she significantly changes the core of who she is (which is kinda unlikely due to the nature of Named, who – as Empress said – are basically snapshots of the people they were when they first transitioned into their Names).

danh3107

It must be rough being born to a race who has never known true freedom in their racial memory. They are mighty, and intelligent if Hune is a good example, but they're made to be subservient to men and women smaller than their arm.

Brilliantly conveyed erratic, brilliant

cakeartistword

I want to see someone with the [Baba Yaga] name.

AshSlanabrezgov

And I really don't.

It would be mindless cut-and-paste from Slavic folklore. And I like Erraticerratta's PGTE exactly because it is anything BUT mindless cut-and paste from anywhere.

Also this world doesn't look like it has requirements for Slavic culture – you need at least one Great river flowing between Easter-style culture and Western-style culture and lots of forests to produce one.

From geography and Eastern-style culture of Praes we can excule impossible combinations – and only place where we have something that could fit prerequisites is Callow and Marchford but although they have some shades in a cultural sence, we have Callow's language, tales, names and religion that doesn't fit.

So, Baba Yaga would be out of place. -_- Also, in this setting you don't need her, really. You already have a lot of Heroes and Villains and Demigods and Gods who have the same specialisation.

nipi

So Akua has 100 000 officer class undead? Ok she doesnt have undead heroes. But still is the Dead King weak or something?

Dainpdf

I assume he has way over 100000 of them. He has an entire kingdom, after all. And then he has a bunch of devils, plus the tide of lower tier undead, and maybe some higher tier officers, even.

nipi

Id expect at least a 1 000 000 regular undead to a 100 000 officers. I just dont see anyone ever testing the Dead Kings domain if he has multiple millions of undead soldiers on top of all the other horrors. Hed be too powerful considering the sizes of the armies we have seen thus far.

Dainpdf

I don't think anyone really has, outside of a Crusade (multiple nations allied) and Ranger, who is Ranger.

Skycom

Hmm a difficult situation, but not impossible. My understanding is that Hune thinks that Catherine is acting as a chancellor amassing power to take the throne. The easiest way to clear up that misunderstanding would be to simply have Hune in the room the next time Catherine talks to the dread empress, to see how totally outclassed Catherine is as a manipulator.

Catherine is a reformer not a revolutionary, if only because Black and Malicia are so reasonable. With the high lords neutralized, there shouldn't be anything internally stopping Catherine, Malicia, Black from making those reforms. Except Blacks possible current insanity.

Zach

The problem with this point of view is that Black and Malicia only pursue reforms because they happen to be the best way to maintain power and ultimately defeat Procer in the future. They (or at least Black) have no desire to make life better for anyone, and they wouldn't be pursuing these reforms if the result wasn't in their interest.

Hune isn't necessarily doubting Catherine has good intentions, but she doubts that she will actually have a positive impact in the long run. And she isn't wrong to do so; Catherine's impact so far has been extremely negative for most people outside of her inner circle (and Hune is basically a view into this less biased perspective). The current conflict was only possible due to Catherine's actions, as she herself admitted some chapters back. So there is no reason for Hune to have any faith that Catherine's actions are actually for the Greater Good, regardless of her intentions (and she's right to doubt the inspirational words of a Named).

I would be strongly mindful of a Taylor Hebert-esque unreliable narrator situation when it comes to viewing Catherine is a positive figure.

vuthuha912

But why would Black and Malicia want to defeat Procer? Isn't it because they want their country to survive? They conquered Callow because they want a reliable source of grain for their people. They make all the reforms to achieve their goal but the core reason for the Conquest is all about feeding their people. Black doesn't care about personal power because the ones who do care about it won't be so willing to die. If your wishes are selfish then victory doesn't mean anything if you aren't alive. He needs to be able to care more than himself to actually be willing to die for his goal. Besides, it is not like Black care for Evil as a whole. He cares for people who are on the Evil side – his friends, his country, his apprentice, etc but not for the philosophy and the methods of Evil. He hates the nobility, he hates the traditions, he hates all this nonsense of Stupid Evil. He just wants things to work properly. The dilemma he has to face would ultimately be between his friends and his country. Can he still love his country if everyone he cares about is dead? He said he will kill them if they harm Cat/his future plan but they have never really threatened the well-being of Callow. They are all living in Praes why would they blow up their backyard. They can run away if things go south but with Alaya and Wekesa being Sonnike, it can be difficult to live anywhere other than Praes.

Black hates heroes because heroes wreck Praes but never manage to do anything for it. Procer wants Praes to let Callow go but they won't be willing to sell grain to Praes (not directly). Praes can't produce enough foods to feed its own citizen just like Japan. The successful way to deal with Praes can be based on the way America treats Japan and Germany after WWII. Yet, Procer is not going to do it because of the conflict between Good and Evil.

At least with Catherine and sympathizers on top, Callow might be willing to open trade with Praes. The reason Black is so cool with Cat gaining tremendous power, it is because he already surrounds Cat with Praesi – the sympathetic one. Cat cares for these people, she is not going to let their families die of starvation. Not just Cat, the orphanages, the taxes, the legionary, etc all contribute to lessening the hostility between the two nations. The Commonwealth irl is such an excellent idea that even when the British lose control of most of their territory, their former colonies are still willing to stick together.

Now, It would have worked even better if those highborn understand the necessity to appease others for their future benefits. But, they are incapable of viewing others' gains as their own. Either they benefit directly or it doesn't matter. Only when Praes see Callow not as an exploitable resource but as a possible ally and trade partner, can progress be made. Black is not fixing the core of the problem, the toxic culture of Praes. He tried to (killing the Trueblood who are actively keeping the culture alive) but Alaya presumably has a better way of dealing with culture reform. Now, his indecisiveness (Akua and the Trueblood) can bring everything he built tumbling down onto his head.

Nguyen Hong Hai

And as bad as OGREKINDS get now, it used to be worse, really not understand how the old Praesi managed to do anything without causing mass rebellions or widespread famines.

Dainpdf

Who says they didn't? I assume that their mastery of Horrible Sorcery was way more effective at putting those down (since there were no Heroes involved) than at invading Callow.

Letouriste

Yeah, rebellion in a mage country where devils and blood ritual are widespread is bound to be horrible. you don't start that lightly

Shawn Panzegraf

With the Truebloods pretty much extinct, once Diabolist is disposed of what exactly is stopping Black and Malicia from instituting all the things they wanted to, but couldn't get away with before? Diabolist seems like the last remaining bit of internal dissent in the Empire.

taborask

Not really related to anything in this chapter, but I've got a theory that Cat's going to have masego build an escapement into her Winter power. Since there's no way to reasonably stop Diabolist from Claiming it (we've seen her do it with fae royalty already) the best option seems like it would be to let her take it, but have a spell woven in that makes it inherently unstable so it blows up in her face

greatwyrmgold

Seems like planting a bomb inside your soul is a bad idea... especially since Catherine should be able to just Take it back. Or find a countermeasure that doesn't risk putting craters in her soul if something goes wrong.

Adrian

I do think she advanced her relationship with Hune, i specially liked her line about dying for other people's dreams, but she got it wrong, is not that Cat is imposing her dream but rather she is making it so it fits inside or around other's.

Perihelion

...without turning to banditry? You mean....foraging? Armies used to do that all the time. It's standard operating procedure. Except of course you call it plundering, which, as a military action was entirely legal, at least in the invading country.

In fact, armies didn't even bother with supply trains at all until late in the 16th century when they started to get so big (like, upwards of 100k big) that looting wasn't viable anymore.

I'm not sure why the *Legions of Terror* would bother with any kind of supply train at all to be entirely honest (with the exception of munitions I suppose). Unless they intend to mobilize an entire city or something.

vuthuha912

They can plunder and steal all they want, it will be a mess for the administration team that comes after them. They might not be crazy enough to mess with the people who are working on their salary and such.

Besides, I think that there should be a decree from the capitals demanding for the provinces to provide for the Legions during the duration of the fights and then receive compensation in terms of tax reductions and such later. However, as the Ruling Council created a big mess (thanks to the Praesi fuckwits), the country might not be running as smoothly.

She raises a point.

What part of her precautions and actions are truly helping, and which ones are mistakes and things she was forced into by her alleged allies?

Perhaps one day it will work, but as even she said, if anything happens to her, it all goes in the crapper. And she's the only one who cares.

I'm glad we finally get a glimpse of who Hune is; she's been just another face for quite a while. Shame the bridge between her and Catherine isn't mended, but at least Cat knows how wide the gap is.

Chapter 52: Tensile

"What cannot bend is fated to break."

– Taghreb saying

I wouldn't say aragh had grown on me, but it was the most common of the strong stuff that was peddled among legionaries. That had always been a source of wonder to me, that men and women who already carried so much weight over so many miles would still find it in them to slip a bottle of drink somewhere in there. Booze always found a way, didn't it? I hadn't asked Ratface to get me one, but it had magically appeared in my quarters after I'd gotten paring knives to stop disappearing from our supplies. My quartermaster was a tricky bastard with many an axe to grind, but it was little things like this that endeared him so much to me. Trust a Praesi to understand sometimes after a shit day you could need something a little stronger than wine. I poured myself a finger's worth in a silver goblet that Robber's men had 'found' back in Arcadia, aware I'd be going through at least a third of that bottle but unwilling to actually pour myself a full glass. It would have felt like to blunt an admission. I knocked it back and let out a groan at the the fire going down my throat, shaking my hair.

"Gods, that would outright kill a child," I rasped out. "Should I pour you one as well?"

Thief was pouting when she came into sight, going from not to there in a heartbeat's span. She sat astride the table, leather creaking on wood, and presented a golden chalice. I looked closer at it. Those were bells engraved on the side, weren't they? The heraldry of House Fairfax.

"Did you steal this in Laure?" I asked. "From my own treasury?"

"Stolen?" she said. "How dare you, sir. This was bestowed upon me by the Vicequeen of Callow herself, for services rendered."

"I paid upfront, actually," I grunted, but I poured and the aragh sloshed in her ill-gotten goods. "Orphanage never covered how to negotiate with thieves, which in retrospective is an oversight on Black's part."

Thief tried the liquor and grimaced, coughing.

"You drink this?" she croaked. "On purpose?"

"You get used to it," I lied.

The look she shot me was more than a little sceptical, but she got down her second swallow without her windpipe rebelling. I leaned back into my chair and granted myself a second finger's worth.

"How do you do it, anyway?" Thief asked. "Tell when I'm there. I was under cover of an aspect, and I've stood inches away from men in broad daylight without them batting an eye."

"I guess you could call it a Name trick," I said. "You never had a teacher, did you?"

"Not one Named," Thief frowned.

"Then I will share my hard-earned knowledge with you," I affably said. "You know how when you came into your Name there was this set of instincts just under your skin?"

The brown-haired woman cocked her head to the side.

"It felt more like a hand guiding mine," she said.

"Close enough," I said. "When you're about to get wounded or killed, you're going to get a tingle just like it."

She nodded slowly.

"I had no intention of striking you," she pointed out.

"Yeah, but you were looking at me," I said. "It does the same thing just... fainter. Black had people following for weeks back in Ater until I learned to pick up on it."

"Then if I moved without looking?" she said.

"Probably wouldn't be able to tell you're there at all," I said. "I didn't get the impression this was common knowledge, anyway. I doubt most Named we'll face will know the trick."

Thief finished her chalice and presented it for filling. Feeling magnanimous, I deigned to comply.

"Are you sure you should have told me that?" Thief asked suddenly. "If I turned on you, this could allow me to land my first strike unseen."

I took another mouthful of aragh, the roughness of the drink now beginning to be replaced by a vague sense of warmth across my chest. I waved lazily.

"Will you?" I asked instead of replying. "Turn on me?"

"If I deem it necessary," Thief said, and for all that she spoke nonchalantly her eyes were serious.

"You say that like it's a rare thing," I told her. "You think Masego obeys my every order? Gods, let's not even talk about Archer. Even my soldiers have lines in the sand they won't follow me past."

"You did not mention Adjutant," the other Callowan said.

"Hakram's the only person in this misbegotten world I trust unconditionally," I replied, perhaps too honestly. "If he turns on me, I'm fucked regardless. No point in worrying about it."

"He does more than you know," Thief said.

"That's what trust is," I said. "Not needing to know what he does. I'm guessing the two of you had an unpleasant conversation at some point. Is there anything you want to bring to me? I'll listen if there is."

She studied me for a while, then shook her head.

"Nothing I can't handle," she said.

I raised my cup in a toast, then polished off the remainder.

"So what do you have for me?" I asked.

"Less than you want," she shrugged. "There's twelve thousand of them, I only had time to have a look at the upper officers."

"And?" I prompted.

"Nothing out of the ordinary, as far as I can tell," Thief said. "If there are planted commands they are too subtle for my senses. I have difficulty feeling sorcery aside from wards, so it's possible."

"I hate dealing with Akua," I sighed. "The bag of tricks she inherited is a bitch to handle."

"I'm unsure why you would believe these legions would be her target," she said. "Did you not send them away from the front?"

"She had to know I'd be pulling together all the forces I can before taking a swing at her," I replied. "Istrid's legions are going to be the core of our offensive against Liesse. If they break halfway through the assault we'll be in deep trouble."

"The Fifteenth still seems a better opportunity," Thief noted. "It was raised recently and has a reputation for battlefield promotions."

"The Fifteenth has been under Masego's eyes for over a year," I said. "She tries to enchant one of my senior officers and Hierophant will catch it. These three legions have been out of my sight for months."

"And you believe she'll have agents somewhere in them?" Thief said.

"I know she does," I grunted. "That's not even up for debate, it's the base for half the plays I've seen her pull over the years."

I filled my cup again, then hers when she hinted at desire for a top-off.

"Diabolist has been too... open," I said. "She's a chip off the old tyrannical block, I won't deny that, but Akua's wheelhouse has always been the indirect. The massive army of undead, whatever traps she cooked up around Liesse – those are dangerous, but they're not the only arrows in her quiver. They're blunt instruments when she's a girl with a thing for daggers."

"She spent months preparing for the ritual in the city," Thief said. "I would look there for her sharpest blade."

I drank and grimaced, though this once not because of the aragh.

"That's been worrying me as well," I said. "I mean, I'd have to be insane not to worry about a fucking ritual involving centuries of accumulated souls, but there's more than that. Diabolist thinks what she's prepared is going to put her on top of the pecking order, and she may have blinders but she's not stupid."

"I don't follow," the dark-haired-woman admitted.

"Think of it this way," I said. "Akua has a large army and backers in the Wasteland, but not enough to handle the Empire at full tilt. Say we march up to Liesse, she pulls down the sky on our heads and our entire force is annihilated. She still loses, because she's fresh out of a god and the Empire's still standing. Weakened, sure, but there's other armies it can field and other commanders too. She's not winning, she's delaying a defeat."

Thief's eyes narrowed.

"You're implying she can use the ritual more than once," she said.

"Pretty much," I said. "This doesn't make sense otherwise. And isn't that the stuff of nightmares? Either the ritual works once but it has a permanent effect – but she didn't rant about ascending to godhood when we talked, so I don't like the odds – or whatever she can pull, she can several times. And it won't be just a few either. If I die she's up against Black, and he's not the kind of man who shies away from a long slugging match."

"Great sorcery always comes at a cost," Thief said, but there was unease on her face.

"She won't care, if she's not the one paying," I said. "We'll have to go into that fight facing the possibility she has both her current armies and a deployable catastrophe in her pocket. We can't face that and win with traitors in the ranks, Thief. It'll be a razor's edge as is."

My fellow Callowan looked grim.

"I'll take a closer look as we march, extend it to your men as well," she said.

"Please do," I said, indolently toasting her. "And while we're on the subject, it's getting tiresome to call you Thief all the time. I assume you have a name?"

"Juliet," she replied without batting an eye.

I squinted at her.

"That was a lie," I said. "Your heartbeat quickened."

"Alas, you've seen through me," she drawled. "Samantha."

My squint deepened.

"Did you force your heartbeat to quicken just to sell this current lie?" I asked. "Because that's genuinely impressive."

"Did I? Vivienne," she said.

"Your heart went faster again," I sighed. "Now you're just screwing with me."

"I would never dare defy you, Your Grace," Thief said, sounding wounded.

"I'll call you Boris," I threatened. "Don't think I won't. Robber will have a song about it before the moon's turned and that's a promise."

She brushed back her bangs, seemingly amused.

"Vivienne Dartwick," she said.

Huh, that sounded highborn. Wouldn't have pegged her for one, though it wasn't impossible. There'd been a lot of former nobles who'd fallen on hard times after the Conquest.

"Had a feeling it was that one," I baldly lied.

My money had been on Juliet and I'd been coming pretty close to pretending I'd used a Name trick to know it was the truth. And they said I'd never learn prudence. I turned to offer an another refill but found only thin air. I waited for a long moment, but couldn't feel her eyes on me.

"I might have shot myself in the foot there," I admitted.

I ended up drifting from the path Masego had charted me. The fairy gate opened a few miles southwest of where I'd meant it to, though honesty compelled me to admit that might be on me more than Hierophant. Was I going to present it that way when we next spoke? No, absolutely not. Still, holding the destination in my mind when I opened the first gate was proving tricky when I'd never been there before. It was hardly a disaster, though. We'd have camp ready for sundown instead of Noon Bell, and a few hours of delay were hardly worth a second thought when I'd managed to lead fourteen thousand legionaries from Holden to central Callow in the span of a mere nine days. General Istrid was of the same opinion.

"That is a nasty trick you've got," the orc gravelled. "The Procerans are going to piss their pants the first time you appear in the middle of their fields without warning."

The two of us had gone with the vanguard, which for once was not made of my men. Istrid was riding a wolf the size of a pony, though noticeably broader. My own Zombie the Third had me standing taller than the orc, for once, since the great wolves stood closer to the ground. Mine also had wings, not that it was a competition. If it had been, though, hard to beat the flying undead horse. Her full contingent of wolf riders had preceded us, a horde of eight hundred that brought out old primal fears just to look upon. Beasts like those with riders just as green had been a plague on Callow for centuries, no match for the kingdom's knights on the field but able to ravage large swaths of territory and withdraw if they were not checked quickly enough. The reminder that they were on my side rang a little hollow when Istrid's own mount occasionally snapped at my own with fangs the size of daggers.

"Might not work out that cleanly," I said. "Black tells me they have a Named future-teller on their side. I figure there's decent odds there'll be an army waiting for me on the other side of the gate."

Neither of us bothered to pretend war with Procer wasn't around the corner.

"Then they have to pull off thousands from the border to wait for you," Istrid grinned savagely. "Their armies don't march so quick, Squire. You hop south, then you hop north and just like that their army's split in three – or the Fifteenth's torching their fields and poisoning their wells. Big place, Procer. Won't be easy to defend."

I hummed and did not disagree. I wasn't convinced, though. If Cordelia Hasenbach got her Crusade, that cause would attract more than armies. There'd be heroes too, and those had a knack for being in the right place at the right time to wreck the plans of people that worked on my side of the fence. The Fifteenth had been right behind the vanguard and I glimpsed Hune's tall silhouette, surrounded by a dozen smaller ones as she advanced. I must have let my gaze linger a little too long, because Istrid noticed.

"Thought you liked them smaller than that," the orc snorted.

"Wasn't that kind of look," I said.

The general wasn't exactly someone I wanted to discuss who I kept bed with, so I did not elaborate. Although, to be fair, the Istrid Knightsbane had been happily married for several decades so in that regard she was definitely doing better than me. The orc's very daughter had informed me that the word in Lower Miezan really was married and not 'mated', no matter what some Praesi books said. It wasn't an exact translation from the Kharsum term, which was closer to bound-in-fortune, but the meaning was the same even if the customs differed some.

"Oh, I see how it is," General Istrid grunted with amusement. "Got on your nerves, did she?"

I cast a steady look at the orc, who seemed rather unimpressed.

"We had something of a disagreement," I diplomatically said.

"She doesn't like you," the orc said, fairly bluntly.

I winced.

"That's a possible interpretation of it, yes," I said.

"You've been running with Named too long," the general said. "That sort of thing matters with a pack of villains, but she's an officer."

"I can work with people who don't like me," I said. "Hells, Juniper didn't when we started out."

"She's a sweet girl, my daughter," Istrid casually dismissed. "Ogres are harder to deal with."

I stared silently at the general. Juniper. Juniper, sweet? I'd seen her chew out a man so harshly over sloppy gear that he'd teared up. Even Robber tread lightly when she was in a bad mood, and the goblin regularly rode undead creatures I'd stuffed with explosives into active battlefields.

"The commander for my riders," the orc elaborated. "Finest one I ever got, leagues above the woman I had during the Conquest. I still want to break his teeth every time his smug lips open. Don't have to like him or trust him, though, because in the end we're both under the banner. Doesn't matter if you can't stand your legate, it's the Legions that come first – trust in that instead of the woman."

Except my banner isn't exactly Malicia's, is it? It stood on the same side, I'd made sure of that as much as I could. But our interests weren't all aligned. The ogre hadn't been wrong when she's said the Fifteenth was more likely to heed my orders than the Tower's, if it came down to it. That Hune probably wouldn't felt like a liability, but not one I could do much about. Setting aside the fact that the Hellhound would dig her heels in if tried to have the ogre transferred, I couldn't exactly use 'loyal to the Empire above me' as a reason to act. I wasn't sure I should, anyway. How likely was it that she was the only soldier in the Fifteenth who thought this way? We had a lot of Callowans these days but most my officers tribune rank and above were from the War College, and that meant greenskins and Praesi. I didn't like the thought of having a lightning rod for those who shared the belief, but there were risks to not giving those people voice at all. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. It would have to wait after the war, anyway. Changing the second in command of the Fifteenth right before the largest battle it'd ever been in would have been sheer stupidity.

"I got a lesson in ogre opinions," I sighed. "Not a pleasant conversation, though it was worth having."

"Nim's never been accused of being too much of a laugh," Istrid contributed. "There's a reason she was assigned in the Wasteland. Mok's better."

Marshal Nim, that was who she referred to. The ogre that led the Seventh Legion and held overall command of every legion in Praes. The other was General Mok, commander of the Third and currently at the Proceran border under Grem One-Eye. The two most powerful ogres in the Empire, not that you'd know to hear Istrid speak of them.

"Surprised one made Marshal," I finally said. "I didn't get the feeling from Hune they particularly wanted to get involved with the rest of Praes."

"Oh, they talk a good talk," the general conceded. "But they like a good scrap as much as anyone. They can't farm for shit in their hills, anyway, so they have to bring in the food with coin."

"Thalassina's pretty close," I noted.

As the main trading port in the Wasteland, it was from there the grain imported from abroad poured through. There would be advantages to that, if trade was what kept the Hall of Skulls fed.

"Though that can't be pleasant all the time," I added after a moment.

The disadvantages of having a Praesi High Lord this close to your backyard rather spoke for themselves. Istrid snorted.

"They can talk when they share a border with Wolof," she said. "Or the fucking Wallerspawn."

A moment later she remembered my tan wasn't all from the sun, and cleared her throat.

"No offence meant," Istrid said.

I wasn't eager to get into an argument with an orc about who exactly was in the wrong when it came to centuries-old border wars that had occurred often enough Daoine had seen fit to build a giant wall, so I let that one go. Probably for the best, since we were interrupted not long after. One of my mages hurried at our side, bringing word from the latest scrying. Diabolist was on the move, undead had poured out of Liesse. They were going, I was told, south. Towards the eight thousand men Ankou had sent out at my order.

It looked like the Second Battle of Liesse was going to have an opening act.

Big Brother

Istrid is probably my favorite un-Named character, simply because of how blunt she is. I respect upfront honest words more than double speak and politics.

stevenneiman

Istrid's cool, but my favorite is definitely Robber. I have to respect Hune as well, just for his ability to not be swept along by Cat's charisma and story. But there are a lot of awesome characters, both Named and not.

John Galt

Robber all the way. $10 says he ends up Named before all is said and done.

jamesc9

There are persistent rumours that Robber is already Named and that goblins keep it secret.

satoshikyū

Another $10 says Robber will get an entirely new Name as well. Little Shit seems fitting.

sol

How about Cutthroat?

Barthumphries

A male Named goblin? No way the Matrons will stand for that.

SpaceDorf

Little Shit is not befitting for a Royal Lesser Footrest. There is poetry in his wretched soul.

Also that Squire Claimant outright said that a named Goblin would be special. So I don't think the Matrons are Named, just skilled like Cordelia Hasenbach

Gunslinger

Looks like it's about to start. I'm still not sure what measures Cat has in place for all of Akua's plans. Things are looking pretty dire.

DroughtBringer

Great chapter! Can't wait for Act I!

Daemion

Maybe this will be the first battle Cat truly loses.

Not\_a\_robot

It would be a horrifically costly one to lose. Tens, if not hundreds of thousands dead, part of Callow ruined forever and a PR disaster. If there's one battle in this entire story I don't want her to lose it's this one.

shimizubad

That's probable even if she wins, I don't want to know what would happen if she loses.

Cicero

You got it wrong. She is going to win, but at what price? thats the question you need to ask your self. Woe onto all they will be.

I'm betting on "wins the battle, starts losing the war".

really nice chapter:) the mood is heavy for the characters but strangely light overhaul.
i needed this;)

overall.of course this is overall^^ my brain is weird sometimes

letouriste

uh wait, "I mean, I'd have to be insane not to worry about a fucking ritual involving centuries of accumulated souls, but there's more than that" thief does know about that? i thought that was only cat,masego,the top deoraithes and akua crew

Metrux

I think it's rather HARD to keep items away from thief, information more so. I mean, she could pass through any ward and just stay "invisible" there in the same room of the reunion, and only cat and masego would know. Do you think any of the two would've given her up for the deoraithes? But, I rather think this wasn't where she got to know, since Errat is fond of showing us these little snippets.

Akim

It would be rather stupid to keep such Information from your biggest spying asset.

She will find out anyway when spying but could look for more Details if she knew what she was looking for in tje first place.

chris S

I have a nervous niggling feeling that the fact that Cat has Daoine blood in her will be important regarding Diabolist's grand plan somehow. It's been brought up more than a few times.

Nif

I don't think will be the Daoine blood that will be the problem they're linked up to an entire different being. The problem will probably come from her Fay title as Akua have already proven she can manipulate them.

That second one isn't improper grammar. The "missing" ofs do make it easier to read, but they aren't actually required. EE seems to like occasionally slipping in some archaic English structuring.

Chapter 53: Manoeuvring

"War is a breed of conflict decided by the allocation of resources. Through better apportionment a lesser nation can defeat a greater, but never if decision-making is of equal standing on both sides."

– Extract from "The Modern Legion", a treatise by Marshal Ranker

Come nightfall I held council. We'd ended the march two hours before sunset when the scouts found grounds suitable for a camp, and the legionaries had taken to building it with veteran expertise. The Fifteenth's two thousand under Hune had raised palisades in the centre, with the camps of the other three legions forming a triad of spokes coming from it. Wide avenues were made for swift troop deployment, watches set before the wooden walls were even finished and scouting lines scattered around in case the enemy attempted to steal a march in the dark. I'd hesitated about the camp, but decided not to gainsay General Istrid when she suggested we should stop. Another two hours of marching wouldn't gain us much ground, but proper fortifications would make a real difference if the Diabolist's host tried a surprise offensive. That I'd call a war council was to be expected, given that the decision to march had been made that very morning and was a major departure from our previous operational plan. I'd spent the daylight in conference with mages and Thief, trying to get a better picture of the opposition, and I was glad I had. I would not have enjoyed looking like a reckless fool in front of these particular commanders, though there might be some grain of truth to that.

More reckless than fool, I liked to think, but that was the kind of judgement best passed on the dead.

I had three of the foremost Imperial officers in Callow facing me. General Istrid Knightsbane, commander of the Sixth Legion. Ironsides, their cognomen was. To orcs, perhaps the only one of their own that could top the reputation of Istrid's legion was Grem One-Eye's, for they'd earned that title breaking a charge of Callowan knights. General Orim – the Grim, his men fondly called him – led the Fifth Legion, cognomen Exterminatus. They'd earned that name during the Praesi civil war, executing near five thousand Praesi prisoners to ensure they wouldn't be slowed on the march. The third and last was General Sacker, commander of the Ninth Legion. Cognomen Regicides. Her goblins had been the ones to kill the Shining Prince when he'd ascended to the throne of Callow halfway through the Fields of Streges. The red paint on her throat was kept by all her men as well, a reminder they'd slit open the throat of royalty without flinching. Hune and myself were green, compared to that assembly. The Fifteenth had been founded only two years ago, and though it had a score of victories under its belt most of my men were still just a few months out of the training camps. The fights I'd put them through so far had hardened them, but it would be years before they had the wealth of experience of the three legions now with me.

I cleared my throat when all were seated, and one of Hune's aides provided scrolls to the three generals. Sacker seemed amused at the formality, Orim indifferent and I bit back a sigh when I saw Istrid was reading through hers too quickly for it to be anything but a glance.

"We've confirmed two things about the enemy," I said. "The first is that they number between twenty and twenty-five thousand, with two thousand at most being living."

"Always the way, with undead armies," Istrid grunted. "They keep enough necromancers to have a leash and a few elite troops but nothing more. If they mix the forces too much they'll start needing a supply train, and dispensing with those is one of the major advantages of raising the dead."

"I've had intelligence that Diabolist had no more than six thousand living in he entire forces as of five months ago," I said. "If we manage to wipe that two thousand, it'll cripple her army before we move on Liesse."

"I don't like the numbers," General Orim bluntly said. "If we were dealing with bones or shamblers we could handle two to one, but these 'wights' are supposed to be upper grade."

"We let this go unchallenged and they'll wipe the Ankou levies, Orim," General Sacker spoke, her voice a dry whisper. "Then raise them still fresh. No coincidence, that number of mages. If we do nothing they gain another eight thousand foot, already armed and armoured."

"Setting that aside, allowing a third of our Callowan reinforcements to be killed before the battle even begins will have stark effect on morale," I flatly reminded them.

Considering I'd ordered those city guards to march in the first place I balked at the idea of letting them get attacked without reinforcing for personal reasons as well, but there was no point in speaking of that to these three. All of them had been part of the Conquest, I doubted they had many qualms about spending Callowan lives.

"It was foolish of their commander to circle by the south," Hune said, the stone we'd dragged inside for her to sit on pushing into the ground. "They should have gone north and joined with the Southpool levies."

Even half-crouched, her head touched the ceiling of the tent.

"That one rests on my shoulders," I said. "I ordered them to muster as swiftly as possible, which is why the Southpool men were already on the move. Their commander took what she saw as the least risk-prone route, however incorrect her judgement."

"Can't expect too much of civilians in armour," Istrid said, which was not excuse but perhaps lessening of blame.

Disinclined to let the conversation linger here, I moved it along with all the subtlety of a sledgehammer.

"Second thing we've confirmed: the enemy commander is Lord Fasili Miremebe," I told them. "Formerly heir to Aksum. If someone can be considered the Diabolist's right hand, it's him."

"That crazy old witch Abreha disinherited him?" General Sacker croaked. "Breaking with the Truebloods in full then. Bold, for her. She usually hedges her bets."

"Don't you spoil this campaign with talk about bloody politics," General Istrid grunted. "I take it gating to their back isn't an option? I doubt we'd be treading the plains if it was."

It was my first instinct to keep them in the dark about my exact capacities, but I forced myself to ignore it. Paranoia had a place, but war councils wasn't it.

"I've never been in the region before," I said. "In those cases I need Hierophant at my side to chart a path through Arcadia. In theory I could try, but there's no telling how long we'd be in there or exactly where we'd come out."

"I can still be used to retreat, at least," General Orim growled. "Being able to leave beyond pursuit is already major advantage."

My brows rose. I'd never actually considered that. In part because I'd never lost a pitched battle, but also because I did tend to think on the offensive. General Sacker had been reading through the scroll carefully while we talked, and only spoke again when she'd finished.

"The Miremebe boy has only middling military record," she said. "One internal purge at his great-aunt's behest, held the left wing when Sahelian was manhandled during the Liesse Rebellion. Are we sure the information is correct?"

"It was supplied by Her Dread Majesty," I said. "I can't guarantee it, but I am disinclined to doubt."

I'd had my own people dig into Lord Fasili as well, of course. Aisha had connections in Praes and had called on them, but they'd not unearthed anything the Empress' spies had not and not everything they did. I had been worth the effort anyway, if only to confirm part of what I'd been given by the Tower. Blind trust had never been a virtue in my eyes, and was much worse than that if offered to a villain.

"Tutored by Asmund of the Dark Teeth Clan and Lady Taslima Ubid," General Orim said, frowning at his scroll. "I know one of these names."

General Istrid let out a noise of surprise.

"Asmund, the senior tribune from the Third?" she said. "Thought he was dead."

"Lost a hand and resigned his commission after they put him under the Quartermaster," the other orc told her.

"Taslima was on the general staff of the Eleventh," Sacker croaked. "Senior Mage."

"There's a reason I had that on the final report," I said. "Legate Hune?"

"Fasili Mirembe has studied the Legions," the ogre stated bluntly. "In depth, from officers that fought during the Conquest. He will be prepared for our tactics."

I inclined my head at the legate.

"I very much want him dead," I said, not bothering to phrase it delicately. "If we manage to off Diabolist's best general before the battle proper, her forces will be shaken when we assault. She's only got so much talent left to call on."

"It'll be tricky catching up to them in time," General Istrid said. "Their men don't get tired on the move, and it's not impossible for them to march through the night."

"Not often," General Orim said. "They can't let their necromancers get too tired or they'll lose hold of the undead."

I cleared my throat.

"We don't have the sorcery to scry through their wards on hand," I said. "But I can scry Hierophant, who most definitely can. From our current positions, if the pace remains the same, we should meet with the Ankou troops two days before they do. Our current guess at when battle would take place is nine days, barring the unexpected."

I watched rueful smiles bloom across the faces of the three greenskins facing me.

"Unexpected. Heh," General Sacker whispered.

"Ah, to be young again," Istrid mused.

I'd told Thief, not too long ago, that Akua had been too straightforward of late.

I learned how correct I'd been exactly one day too late, when I was scried in panic by the Fifteenth's mage lines in the south. Liesse had spewed out a second army in the middle of the night, while we were encamped. After the ritual ended I remained alone for a long moment, and considered how badly I might have just fucked up. When I'd gone to collect the three legions before taking a fairy gate north I had tipped my hand. Diabolist now had an estimate of how long it would take me to ferry troops and she'd planned accordingly. As of now, the host under Fasili had kept the same pace and my own was only two days away from linking up with the Ankou troops. I closed my eyes and considered the parts in movement. If we kept marching west, we lost two days. Keeping in mind how long it would take me to pass through Arcadia if things went well, if we did this then Akua's second host of twenty thousand would very likely have time to attack the men coming down from Southpool. Four to one against mages and undead? They'd be shattered within an hour of the first sword being drawn. The rest of my forces were in southern Callow, and if I left now to try to get them on the field up here would be pointless. Both the Ankou troops and the Southpool ones would be wiped by Akua's armies before I even finished gating back to the rest of the Fifteenth.

I should have seen it coming, when I ordered the muster. Diabolist wasn't an attacker by nature, not exactly. She was an opportunist. She'd waited until she could get a read on how quickly I could move, then gone to pluck the low-hanging fruits. The worst of it was that there was no real way to warn either of the Callowan forces. They weren't Legions, they didn't have mage lines for me to contact. The colder part of me considered the decision to make even as the rest remained in shick. If this was to be purely about numbers, I knew what call I had to make. Southpool was sending five thousand men, Ankou eight thousand better trained and better equipped. She didn't even need to do anything. She just waited for me to blunder, and I did. There were advantages to being the swiftest player on the field, but costs as well. If you were the first to move then your actions were out in the open. But I hadn't thought it would matter. I'd believed, deep down, that Akua would remain holed up in her lair and let me come to her. Because that was what villains did, wasn't it? They raised the flying fortress and let the heroes knock at the gate. And now people were going to die because I hadn't been careful enough. I only realized I was crushing the goblet in my hand when the wine wet my fingers. I called for my commanders as soon as I was no longer frosting every surface in sight.

"We're losing one of those armies," General Istrid bluntly said.

There wasn't any hemming and hawing from the others. I could see in their eyes that the five thousand from Southpool had been written off before I was done speaking the sentence.

"Though her stratagem was a surprise, the deployments remain real," Hune noted.

I invited her to elaborate with a look.

"Fasili Mirembe is within reach," she said. "So are his necromancers. Their loss would still be a blow to her defences."

"Five thousand levies for a third of her mages or more," General Sacker croaked. "It is an acceptable trade."

"That's if we can decisively beat the boy," General Orim grunted. "If he retreats in good order after a cursory skirmish, we will have been fully duped."

"So we strike hard," General Istrid growled.

Or is that what Diabolist wants? I thought. For us to commit here, where she knows we're coming and has time to deploy every manner of nasty trick? The first time I'd ever seen Akua, when he'd spied on her conversation with Black, she'd called herself a skilled commander. I'd chalked that up to arrogance since, since she had no real victories to her name, but the arrogance might just have been mine. I'd never seen Akua Sahelian fighting an actual war before, had I? Before the battles had always been just a tool for positioning, a way for her to implement her plots. Now she'd bared her knife, and on our very first round she'd been the one to draw blood. As ever when dealing with Diabolist, the spiral of second-guessing and doubt was as dangerous as her actual actions. Whether Fasili and the mages were bait or not did not matter, in the end. Fighting him with the Ankou troops was still the best decision I could make. It niggled at the back of my mind that thinking about the best decision Juniper could make was exactly how I'd predicted her actions, during our war games, but was that alone enough to have me gate for the Southpool men instead? No, I admitted. It was almost presumptuous, to call joining up with Ankou reinforcements the best move. All it is is the lesser mistake of the tow before me.

"We keep going," I said, and the words felt like ashes in my mouth.

I did not ask any gods for forgiveness. The ones that would grant it were my foes, and the ones I worked for knew nothing of the word.

It was a close thing, and I only avoided disaster by leaning into my instincts. Two hours before sunset, on the day before we joined the Ankou troops, I passed down instructions not to make camp and to continue marching after dark. Guided by magelights and goblins, our host of fourteen thousand pressed on until midnight. The pace slowed in the dark, but I was feeling an itch on the back of my neck. A sense of danger not yet revealed. Three hours of rest were granted before we resumed the march, and so narrowly avoided disaster. We found the Ankou city guard out in the field shortly before Morning Bell. We found the host of the dead as well, lines tirelessly advancing under the light of the rising sun.

"And that's why when a Named tells you to keep marching, you fucking do it," General Istrid said, and spat to the side. "This would have been a bad one, mark my words."

We were both mounted again, the orc remaining at my side as our legions spread out. My helmet kept under my arm, I gazed at the enemy host.

"They marched through the entire night," I said. "Gods, if you hadn't warned me they could..."

"Their necromancers will be tired," the Knightsbane said. "But our legionaries are as well. We'll have to be real careful with that shield wall, Squire. Formations are what lets us win this. If they break them we'll be in deep shit. Your countrymen can't be relied on, not with dead on the other side and numbers that high."

"You underestimate them," I replied. "This is Callow, general. We've seen the dead walk before. We've turned them back, again and again."

"From walls," the orc grunted. "This is open field, and I don't see no fucking knights. Just scared guards in cheap mail with spears they've only ever drilled with."

"That's why we spread Hune's men through them, to serve as a spine," I said.

I'd put the legate in charge of that entire division of the host, replacing the commander from Ankou. That ten thousand combined would serve as our centre, with the Fifth serving as the right wing and the Ninth as the left. Both legions had left a gap between themselves and the Callowans, bait for Fasili to send his wights through in an attempt to isolate our forces. Istrid's own Fourth we were keeping in reserve behind the rest, with her wolf riders as an independent command.

"Twenty-three thousand on their side, twenty-two thousand on ours," the Knightsbane growled. "We're in for a bloody day."

"If we can wipe their casters they fall apart," I said.

Without the necromancers controlling them the wights would lack organization. They'd still fight with the intelligence of living soldiers, more or less, but without officers or orders. Numbers mattered less when they belonged to a mob.

"They won't leave their mages unprotected," General Istrid said. "I'm guessing they'll go back to old Legions tactics from before the Reforms. They'll keep five thousand back in a square around the casters and come in a wave, then rely on sorcery to punch a hole and try to flip our lines."

"We don't have enough mages and sappers with the Fifteenth to break a wave," I murmured. "Hune'll keep the fireballs back until she has to plug a gap to avoid exhausting her mage lines."

"They'll have a ritual prepared," the orc laughed. "Those wily old Wasteland foxes always do. But I ain't worried, to tell you the truth."

I glanced at her, raising an eyebrow. General Istrid's lips split into a vicious grin, ivory fangs glinting in the morning sun.

"Whatever sorcery they're going to pull out, Squire, I doubt it's going to be worse than you."

"Tutored by Asmund of the Dark Teeth Clan and Lady Taslima Ubid," General Orim said, frowning at his scroll. "I know one of these names."

I'm pretty sure that's supposed to be "NONE of those names." Doesn't make sense the way it's written. The typos are so bad they're seriously detracting from the story. I feel like I have to doubt every single sentence, because anything could be misspelled in ways that apparently make sense but are wrong, like this one.

Is E.E. a non-native English speaker? A lot of the bad spots read like they're poorly translated into English from a language that's structured differently.

Kizuna

"one of these names" makes sense.. They considering the following paragraph where Istrid then elaborates on one of them.

AVR

@Warren Peace: I think I saw a .fr email address for him somewhere, so probably yes. That would also explain why he uses UK spellings – the Brits are a lot closer to France than any other English speakers.

Dainpdf

Okay, that can be taken two ways. Either any damage the sorcery causes will be more than offset by the carnage Cat will make of the enemy, or no sorcery could harm the legions more than Cat's mistakes already have.

Also, well played, Akua. Well played. By the way, nIce army you have there. Would be a shame if something happened to them, out in the Cold... Cat will be glad to lend you a few palls for them, I'm sure.

naturalnuke

It's like playing chess, every choice you give them should both be bad, and either should advance your own goals,

Gunslinger

Can praesi mages usurp another necromancers control? I wouldn't be surprised if after centuries of undead warfare they have measures in place for dealing with them

Engineer

It's possible. Remember, Still Water is largely alchemy based, with magic only acting as a sort of "ignition" as I understand it. Usurping or disrupting that spark might just cause the entire army to fall apart.

Hierophant DEFINITELY could. But he's not there. Which begs the question where he could be and what he's doing.

Engineer

Hahahahahahaha!!!!!!

This is going to be sooo good...

danh3107

Hmm well played Akua, well played.

JC

Hune is the unidentified traitor, methinks.

arancaytar

I would think that a traitor would not be so open with their dislike for Cat, but admittedly anything a traitor would not do is also something a traitor would do to avoid suspicion. And so forth.

Big Brother

I say it's not Hune. I'm banking on Killian. All her actions appear normal, but there's some serious oddities when they pile up.

I can't remember exactly, but didn't Killian approach Cat first? If so, that's a little odd for an officer in the Legions, when they have such strict regulations about relationships in general. From there, Killian worked her way into Cat's bed AND confidence, while using seemingly innocent questions to get information that was somewhat above her rank. Not to mention, she's the mage commander, and they handle long distance comms when not in combat. What better place could there possibly be to place a spy than right next to the enemy, in a position where they control communications?

firespier

Don't think so

Akua said in epilogue of book 1 it's not someone from rat company

Letouriste

Actually if Killian is a traitor we would already know. akua said herself she didn't managed to bribe the officers and killian being senior mage is comprised. I don't think there is any traitor remaining in the officers, even the ones who have been promoted later. Also, the whole break up reason would not make sense if she planned to backstab cat.

Sniggs44

Logically I think Killian being the traitor makes sense, since she has both the means and plenty of opportunities. As you pointed out she's the head of the mages, and since Masego can't be bothered to keep an eye on her (unless explicitly ordered) she's in a great position to leak info and just generally cause havoc and get away with it. Plus, IIRC she and Niln (sp? Nauk's dead buddy) were close friends, and apparently he was tied up in some sort of treachery, so they could easily have been in cahoots. Then again, aside from being pissed at Squire for not letting her evolve into her final form or w/e I can't really pin down any compelling, long-term motive.

Narratively speaking her being the traitor is such a blatant trope (jilted lover and/or power hungry witch) that I'd halfway expect the author to use it as a bait and switch. On the other hand this universe kinda runs off such obvious narrative tropes, so maybe Killian's betrayal is inevitable since she's tied so closely to a Named. (Though you'd think Squire would have put closer eyes on her specifically to counter this...an angry ex working against you is up there with "determined teenager quickly becomes a major power player" when it comes to oft-used story conventions.)

TideofKhatanga

Doubt it. If the little we know of Ogres is true, Hune has no reason to prefer Akua to Cat. Or to side with any of them over Malicia. I'm seconding the theory that Killian is the traitor, or at least more than a little suspect. Remember, "Love ends with the kiss of the knife, Trust is the wager that takes your life."

arancaytar

No pressure!

Eduardo

Cat was outmaneuvered, all options left to her were bad. Staying put, saving one army, saving the other or not even calling these armies, to begin with.

The problem is that she has smaller numbers and lower quality of troops. This allows the other side to do this divide and conquer tactics.

Letouriste

«lower quality of troops » you say^^

Ok a large part is levies but there still several legions there and I trust them better than a few necromancers

Euodiachloris

She does, however, have her own connections to both unconventional necromancy and Winter magic, both of which bounce off each other. These wights are closer to alchemical homunculi than to classic demonological undead. And, you can take and use a wizard's or witch's tools against them in Voudon with the right chemicals and knacks. You don't need anything big. Just well-placed counters and the right levers.

Engineer

Which Black will no doubt employ once he joins the theatre.

Sniggs44

"Grunted", "growled", "murmured", "croaked". Was it a war council or a conclave of barnyard animals?

Once in a while to set the tone is fine, but there's really nothing wrong with just repeatedly using "said". It may seem repetitive, but readers tend to mentally edit them out. Using other adjectives too often breaks up the flow of conversation. Not every statement needs to be paired with an action/description.

We know, for example, that Ranker has lots of disfiguring face/throat wounds, and that Istrid is an orc with a gravelly voice. No need to belabor the point once it's established.

LM

I'm curious why Cat didn't even consider an assault on the city. That's a huge opening, most of Arkua's forces are out in the open. Either a full military assault, or a named only assassination mission

Engineer

You're forgetting the thousand some odd demons and devils she has under control. The text made no mention of them so it's safe to assume they're occupying Liesse.

Gryph

Maybe I'm missing something, but I'm pretty sure there's a typo in the title of the chapter... "Maneuvering", instead of "Manoeuvering"

mupi

"Manoeuvering" is a more "traditional" (perhaps archaic) spelling:

<https://www.vocabulary.com/dictionary/manoeuver>

Vocabulary.com lists it as a "British" spelling; it's not inconsistent, IMO, with the "archaic" nature of warfare on Calernia.

Euodiachloris

There's nothing archaic about it. It's current throughout the Commonwealth, meaning it's the US what is weird. 🤪

CrazyPenguin

Nope, "Maneuvering" is the correct spelling in American English.

Tibs

Is anyone else annoyed that Akua doesn't really suffer whatsoever? Is it because she is playing the villain in this story? She just seems way too good at everything. Surely generals of this caliber would run circles around Akua.

Is it because she is a Named Villain? Or because she is facing another villainous character in Cat so she gets a boost of some sort.

I get this feeling that if a hero was going against Akua she'd go down super easy. I don't know. Some of this super-competency from Akua appears really odd.

esryok

Probably 'cause she's a Named Villain implementing the early stages of her plan.

An argument could be made that a hero would have had the climactic showdown earlier to try and stop Still Water. Suggests that her story's **actual** climax is orders of magnitude worse, for the zombie army to still have "no rush 20" in effect.

haihappen

Black implemented the "Stop the rise of heroic names in Callow" plan, with Cat.

Generally, in stories with Villain versus Villain, Heroes do not occur. Unless there is a Hero opposing both the villains. The Bard was instrumental on setting the current story up, but was occupied with the Free Cities fiasco, so maybe It has a follow-up plan or wanted to set the White Knight up as the overarching hero that defeats both villains? Whatever the current scenario is, it can be expected to be in the Bard's "script".

Unmaker

Zombies = no thermoregulation. Duchess of Winter. Let's hope for zombiecicles.

Interlude: Skirmish I

"If I had an aurelius for every assassination attempt, I wouldn't have to keep raising taxes."

– Dread Emperor Pernicious, the Imperiled

Commander Joan Ansel had feigned anger when the ogre took command, for that was what her men wanted from her, but deep down all she felt was pathetic relief. This was all far beyond her ability to deal with. She'd been Royal Guard, once upon a time, and fought in the Siege of Laure until one of the gates gave and the Praesi ran loose in the capital. That record had seen her appointed to lead the city guard of Ankou a decade down the line, but her men forgot she'd been a captain back then. What did she know of leading armies, of field tactics and the like? Her job had been the hold the fucking wall with the company of soldiers that answered to her, and that duty she'd discharged and well. It hadn't been her men that gave, when the Empire came knocking. This, though, this was all more than she could handle. The truth of how close they'd come to being wiped out by the enemy before the Legions ever caught sight of them still had fear running down her spine. Weeping Heavens, she'd still run if she could. Not that it was an option.

The fair-haired woman glanced back over the ranks and caught sight of that lone silhouette on horseback, a colourful cloak stirring in the wind behind it. The Black Queen herself had come to take charge, and she was said to have strong opinions on desertion. Joan hid a flinch under her helmet. They'd all heard how the Gallowborne had been snatched straight from the gallows and used 'til they were spent on foreign fields. The woman knew Her Grace had been named Vicequeen of Callow by the Tower, that she did not hold the throne in her own right as the Fairfaxes had, but balls to that. It was open secret the Black Queen had slugged the Wasteland in the stomach until it spat out a crown for her to wear. She's never lost a battle, Joan told herself. We won't die today. She clutched that belief tight, watching the ranks of the dead advance. Thousands upon thousands, pale as the grave even in the morning sun. Their armaments weren't pretty like those of the Legions, no matching colours and smooth lines. Just pieces of armour slapped together over a marching corpse, blades and spears and every weapon that could be gotten cheaply in hand. They did not look fearsome, until you saw there was only death in those empty eyes.

Her men, at least, had decent mail and good spears. The city guard used clubs and knives within Ankou to keep the peace, but it was tradition old as the kingdom that all of them drill with the spear every month. The city was the last holdfast between Callow and the fucking Procerans, if the Vales fell. It was expected to be able to hold until the kingdom's armies arrived. Ankou has walls, she thought. Here there is only barley and black earth. Both would be stained red before long. Joan felt her hands shake with tremors they'd disdained when she was still young, but she'd been a dumb twat at twenty hadn't she? Thinking Laure could hold against the godsdamned Carrion Lord and his pack of monsters. Now she neared fifty and knew better. There was no winning against the Wasteland. And the harder we fight, the harder we die. The thought was dark, but Joan had not felt this powerless in decades. The Imperial Governor in Ankou had been content to wring taxes out of the people and ignore them otherwise, until his term ended last year. They'd all gone on with their lives with no one bothering with them.

Now Joan was back in the Tower's eye, sworn to die in its name.

"Commander Ansel," the mountain said. "Your men seem dispirited."

Joan swallowed and looked up at the ogre. Legate Hune, she'd said her name was. One of the Fifteenth's top officers though not one she'd ever heard of, like the Hellhound or Hakram Deadhand. The creature was large as a dozen men, and those eyes were studying her like she was some sort of insect one misstep away from being squashed. Gods, she thought, why did I not retire? Coin would have been tight, but better poor than dead.

"They'll hold, ma'am," she stiffly told the monster. "They know the stakes."

You didn't need to be some great general to see the Black Queen had put Joan's men in the centre because all she wanted from them was to hold. The wings on both sides were Legions, and it'd be them who decided the battle while Callowans died like dogs. But if the centre collapses, this turns into slaughter. The dead would split the Black Queen's army in two and overwhelm it in small bits. The fair-haired woman knew this, but she wasn't sure her soldiers did. And even if they do, are they going to give a shit when their faces are getting chewed off? Joan shivered. It was easy to see the disaster this could turn into.

"They will," Legate Hune agreed calmly. "Pass this down to your officers: the legionaries of the Fifteenth are under instruction to kill any men fleeing the battlefield. Cowardice will not be tolerated."

Joan's eyes flicked to the Black Queen, still unmoving in the distance. Gods it was eerie how still she was.

"The Vicequeen will not gainsay that order, commander," the monster said coldly. "You will find no saving grace there. She has no patience for the yellow-bellied."

Easy for you to call people that, she thought. You're a fucking battering ram unto yourself.

"We'll hold," Joan said, and hated how weak it sounded.

She breathed in and out, kept her hands against her side to end the shaking.

"Down here in the mud, it's us who holds the line," she whispered, and that one had some iron to it.

The old song spoke about dying free, though, didn't it? She smiled bitterly. Well, songs were songs. Creation was never as pretty as they said.

Orim of the Tarred Dogs breathed in deeply. The air was crisp and clean out here, nothing like the squalid reek of Laure. He felt the part of him that was the general melt away, the chief he'd once been baring his fangs anew. Gods, it was good to be at war again. To have an enemy to chew up, an army to break and scatter and crush underfoot. It was the way orcs were meant to live, not playing fucking wet nurse to a mob of bleating Callowan cattle. Oh, he knew why Lord Black had garrisoned him in Laure. The day he'd spilled the lifeblood of five thousand Praesi on Wasteland grounds still rang in people's ear, a whisper of fear and death if he was crossed. It had kept the likes of Mazus in line and the local waste as well. But having to be patient and kind and all those hundred tedious little duties had worn away at him. Orim was fifty-three, now, but today he felt young again. It was going to be a good day, and all he regretted was that he had to fight under a green girl instead of Grem or the Carrion Lord. What Lord Black saw in the Wallerspaw was beyond him. She had a way with killing, but the Empire had no shortage of killers. Few of them were so irritatingly high-minded about getting the job done.

His general staff arrayed around him, Orim studied the rebel army. The wights would not be easy meat, but this was a battle that could be won. The Wastelander boy leading the other side had thickened his ranks before approaching, massing the dead to match the line of Callowan levies. Deeper lines, though. The mixed Fifteenth and levies numbered ten thousand in total, but the rebels must have closer to fourteen or fifteen thousand facing them. It was like Istrid had thought, Mireembe was aiming to break the centre and split them. There was more to enemy tactics than a single wave though. A chunk of three thousand wights had been split from the rest of the host and was heading towards Orim's own Fifth Legion. Behind the centre of the rebel army the living could be glimpsed, Praesi household troops and mages that couldn't be more than two thousand. There were another three thousand wights in a ring around them, which was a damned shame. Istrid's riders could have looped around to hit the Praesi if they hadn't kept those.

"General Sacker seems to have the lucky draw of the day," his Staff Tribune said.

Orim grunted in assent, though he didn't look at the Taghreb. Sacker's Ninth made up the left wing, and unlike his own legion there was no detached division heading for her. The orc licked his chops, the atrophied muscles of his face keeping his lips near-unmoving. A weakness he'd been born with, one that had seen him called Grim for how hard it was to smile. He'd been lucky it hadn't been obvious when he'd been a babe. Orcs born flawed didn't make it through long winters.

"Prepare to receive them," he ordered. "Staggered welcome."

His Senior Sapper snorted, then spoke to the flag-bearers. Twice red cloth rose, and it was fewer than thirty heartbeats before the scorpions began firing. Steel-tipped javelins tore through the first rank of the three thousand wights moving towards the Fifth like wet parchment. The undead were within three hundred feet, good killing range. The second volley flew twenty heartbeats later, this one angled to punch through more than one wight per projectile. The rebels had put cheap armour on their dead, but going through flesh and bone still took strength: it was a rare javelin that took more than two. The wights began to quicken their steps before the third volley launched, much as Orim had expected. If he'd had longer to prepare the chief would have made his sappers trap the advance, but the rebels had been too swift for that. No matter. Undead hordes had no skill to them, even the clever ones, and this one seemed to have no skirmishers to field. They'd bleed for that. The flags rose again and the Fifth's sapper lines shot forward across the field. They slowed right before the enemy entered range, the sharpeners thrown carving holes into the enemy ranks with loud cracks. The goblins immediately began to withdraw at a measured pace, munitions detonating every ten heartbeats with disciplined precision.

"We'll have a more than a tenth of them gone before they reach our shield wall, at this rate," his Staff Tribune observed.

"Close up is where undead shine," Orim reminded her. "This won't last."

He'd learned that the hard way, when they'd marched on Okoro during the civil war. Skirmishers scythed through the first few ranks of enemy undead and he'd thought it was going to be a slaughter, but it had ended up so close a victory it might as well have been a draw. Undead did not tire, or break when they lost too many. You couldn't flip their line the way you did the living because they didn't panic and flee. They didn't stop unless you broke them all, or the necromancers holding their leash. Three thousand wights against the four thousand men of his Fifth seemed like throwing away bodies but it wasn't that. The boy on the other side knew whatever dead managed to reach their lines would keep Orim's legion too busy to redeploy for at least an hour. He'd going to be hitting the centre's right side, the orc thought. The wights sent against the Fifth had been meant to prevent it from reinforcing there: Mirembe was trying to create weakness for him to tear through. But that wouldn't be enough, not with Istrid's legion kept back to plug exactly that sort of gap. So what are you truly up to, Wastelander?

One hundred feet until the wights hit the shield wall. No crossbow fire had greeted them when they entered range, for that would have been a pointless waste of bolts. Nothing that light would put down the likes of them. Orim spat to the side and made his decision.

"Heavies to the front," he said. "Senior Mage Dolene."

"Sir?" the Soninke replied.

"No volleys," he ordered. "A Hook, then Lob until told otherwise."

Whatever the rebels were up to, it depended on him being pinned down. To unmake their design he must tear through the opposition as quickly as possible. The orc watched as the ranks of the Fifth smoothly redeployed, the sappers taking refuge as his men and orc in heavy plate came to the fore. They would tire swiftly, he knew, but regulars would not make as much of an impact. He would take the gamble. Mere moments before the wights smashed into his frontline fireballs bloomed, rising up at a sharp angle before being pulled down backwards into the first rank of the wights. Hook. Flame consumed the undead, intensely concentrated so it would bite hungrily into dead flesh. The horns sounded and his heavies let out a loud cry, shields raised as they charged into the enemy. There was a thundering crash of steel on steel and the mage lines crafted flame again, tossing them into the roiling mass of wights far from the frontline. Lob, the doctrine called it. Meant to weaken the pressure of the enemy so it could be devoured in waves.

The glare of the sun glinting on his helm, Orim the Grim watched the struggle of steel against dead flesh and his lips half-twitched into a grotesque smile.

General Sacker watched from her raised platform as the line of Ankou men bent under the weight of the undead and frowned. Her missing eye itched, the urge of scratching the scarred tissue ever an effort to master. Either the enemy was blundering, or they had. The Callowans had thin blood and there could be no turnaround expected from them, but the centre was holding in the face of the wights. Legate Hune's legionaries steadied the parts of it that wavered, filling the gaps with red-painted steel and unflinching discipline. The Matron was almost impressed. Most of the Fifteenth was fresh out of the camps and of conquered stock to boot, which had seen her lower her expectations, but the men she saw fighting did so as proper legionaries. It is not merely Names that won them the victories, then. Something to consider. Any pack of goatherds could win a battle against an army if a demigod stood at their head, but the Squire had yet to act. This was the men of the Fifteenth alone and they were acquitting themselves more than passably. Had Sahelian's dogs made the same erroneous assumption she had, perhaps?

It seemed unlikely. The Diabolist had fought Lord Black's apprentice many a time, and seen the Fifteenth in action twice. Yet Fasili Mirembe's army was headed towards defeat, should matters continue to unfold as they now did. Sacker's men were cutting through the wights in front of them at a steady rate, sharpeners and demolition charges opening holes she saw broadened with mage fire. Her regulars were pushing back the enemy, slowly but surely. And when they found nothing but field in front of them, they would turn to flank the wights facing the Callowans. Sacker's remaining eye was not as sharp as it used to be when she'd been a young and red-handed Matron — alchemical concoctions could lengthen her lifespan, but not reverse the ravages of time — but she saw clearly enough. And what she saw was this: there were too few wights facing her Ninth. There'd been no need for Lord Mirembe to have fifteen thousand undead facing the ten thousand at the centre. Some of these now stood before her legionaries, but not enough to account for the numbers. Where had the rest gone?

When the battle had begun, there'd been a gap between Orim's Fifth and the centre. When the Fifth became tied down Legate Hune had lengthened her line to avoid getting flanked through it. Studying the mass of silent yet writhing undead, Sacker found a current. The ranks are thinner where the gap was, the goblin thought. They're massing wights in front of it to prepare for a push. Mireembe on the other side had to know it would not win him the battle even if he broke through there. Istrid would charge into there fangs bared and stabilize the centre. And after that? Sacker pondered. The Praesi still had a ritual up their sleeve, this was a given. Superior sorcery was their greatest advantage. They wait until Istrid is committed there. Orim won't be able to disengage from the wights after him, even if they're not a real threat to him. The orc had engaged the three thousand sent towards him aggressively, she'd noted, using tactics that Legion doctrine usually preached should be used against levies. The picture, slowly, began to paint itself. With the Fourth filling the gap, the only uncommitted force on the field would be Istrid's riders. And if the rebels hit the Fourth with their ritual, not only do they reopen the gap but they're costing us legionaries instead of Callowans.

Wolf riders alone would not be able to turn back the wights pouring through. They were not meant for hard fights like those. What, then, would be sent to prevent Sacker's own legion from intervening? The old goblin's eyes turned to the Praesi holed up behind the battlefield. Household troops, around a thousand. Half that number of mages and officers. And four hundred men in Helikean scale armour, most likely mercenaries. By themselves, not a threat. But able to withstand eight hundred wolf riders if those attempted a charge on the mages. Which left the three thousand wights currently deployed in a ring around the Praesi free to tie down the Ninth Legion while the left flank collapsed. It was a pretty little strategy, she would admit. Neatly designed to exploit the weaknesses of their host. It did not, however, account for the Squire. They cannot be so blind as to discount her, she thought. There is still an element missing. Whether it could be found would decide the victor of the day.

Abigail screamed herself hoarse, smashing her shield in a dead man's face. The nose broke with a crack but the shit didn't care in the slightest, hacking at her from the side. Good legionary mail had the blade bouncing off but it would leave a bruise. Sweat pouring down her face, she rammed her sword in the wight's throat and felt the spine give to goblin steel. She hacked the head off while it continued wailing at her, her shield denting under the force of the blows. Even headless the wight kept on attacking, and something smashed into her helmet that had her vision swimming. She felt someone pull her back and a tall orc filled the empty space, forcing down the wight and letting the legionaries behind him hack it to pieces.

"Captain, you still with us?" a man's voice asked.

Abigail wiped the spittle and sweat off her lips, focusing on the person it belonged to. Sergeant Tadaaki, whose dark face was creased with worry. She clapped the Soninke's shoulder, feeling a wave of nausea coming over her.

"I'm f--"

She bent to the side to empty her stomach on the ground.

"Fine, sergeant," she moaned after. "I am fine."

No bleeding parts, so there was nothing to bother what few healers they had with. The disgusting taste lingering in her mouth, Abigail wiped her face and deeply regretted having tried her lieutenant's 'mystery stew'. Secret Taghreb recipe her fucking ass. Didn't look any better coming out than it had going in. Never falling for that one again. That wasn't godsdamned rabbit floating in the stuff, no matter what he said.

"Take a breather, ma'am," the sergeant said. "I'll handle the frontline."

"Don't get aggressive, Tadaaki," she said. "We can't afford the losses. Bloody militia's shaky enough as is."

"They're your people," the Soninke replied, flashing a grin.

Abigail spat the scum out of her mouth, hoping the man whose boot she'd dirtied hadn't noticed.

"They're Ankouans," Abigail argued. "They've got more in common with goats than a good Summerholm girl like me."

Everybody knew the people in Ankou were barely Callowan at all, what with all that breeding with Procerans. Sergeant Tadaaki left her to the sound of laughter. Good sort, that one, for a Wastelander anyway. Captain Abigail made her way to the back of the line and undid the straps of her helmet, taking it off long enough to let her sweat-soaked curls cool a little. Gods Above, she thought as she watched the melee ahead, what a mess. She could not believe she'd ever been drunk enough to think enrolling in the Legions was a good idea. Abigail had come within an inch of dying twice in the last year, and now held the dubious distinction of knowing what fae blood tasted like. Screaming while hacking at Summer warriors came with drawbacks when red flew. Well, it beat being a tanner at least. Her family home had gone up in green flames when the Black Queen tangled with the Lone Swordsman a while back and her uncle had made it clear that being allowed to live under his roof came at the price of going into his trade. Her two brothers had folded, but she'd decided she wasn't going to smell like rotting corpse garbage for the rest of her life.

She was coming to reconsider that decision, but with three years left to her service that meant less than nothing. There wasn't anyone in the Fifteenth that was idiotic enough to think that desertion was an option. The captain rolled her shoulders, wishing she could take off her mail for even ten heartbeats. Her aketon was drenched, and now that she wasn't busy trying not to get killed she realized that her nipples itched something fierce. Ugh. She took a look at the melee to distract herself, knowing she'd have to go back before long. Tribune Ashan would report her otherwise, and Legate Hune was strict with disciplinary actions. The wights were chewing into the lines, but not as bad as she'd thought they would. The Ankouans were holding up pretty well, for a pack of hacks with spears. Probably helped they didn't let the dead get too close. Her own company rotated the lines often enough no one was dropping from exhaustion, though the enemy was hard on regulars like her. They swung harder than living men did, and if their armour had been any better they'd have been a hundred Hells to put down. Still, overall she called this better than Dormer – though 'less dangerous than fire-spitting immortals from a legend world' was a fairly low bar to set, now that she thought about it. At least she hadn't pissed herself this time, so there was that, though if the battle continued for another few hours there was no guarantee that would last.

It was because she was at the back of the line that she noticed it. She could see the rest of the army, compare where it stood to where her men did. Realize that her part of it was being pushed back, step by step. It wasn't some great turning of the tide or anything like that. Just... pressure. Slowly increasing. And we're bending in front of it.

"Shit," she said feelingly, and fumbled the clasp of her helmet after forcing it on. "Shitshitshit."

Tribune Ashan's cohort, of which her company made up half, was the anchor for right side of the centre. If they broke, then the wights had nothing to stop them and the swarm was going to be coming from all sides. Unsheathing her sword, Abigail went back cursing into the fray and really hoped that someone, anyone, was noticing how close to disaster they were edging.

I always enjoy the battle interludes with shifting perspectives. Though I am too sleepy at the moment to properly consider what the big problem at the end is. Any guesses?

If I remember correctly, the undead were created by having the citizens drink contaminated water which was then activated by a ritual. Perhaps the mystery stew was infected, and the center of the Callowan line is about to turn?

Allafterme

I gotta say I don't like that Chekhov's Stew not a single bit

Thrillho

Oooh, that would be baaaad. Just the kind of rotten twist you'd expect from Diabolist though

nipi

I doubt her spies managed to feed still water to all of them, but a number of their rank suddenly becoming the enemies ghouls is bound to cause chaos. Too bad for them that that's what Cat thrives in.

stevenneiman

It would be insanely difficult to try and poison any large group, but not impossible. The really scary thing is that they don't need to get it anything like uniform. Triggering a transformation in even one or two percent of any given force could throw it into disarray if the transformation is fast enough for them to strike without warning, which would cause it to buckle if that happened at the same time as they were trying to face another force of even remotely threatening strength, such as the main undead army. Not sure one way or the other if that's how it's going to go down, but it's not impossible.

Engineer

That would be a recipe for disaster.

Depending on how fast Still Water turns a human into a Wight, this could cause chaos in short order. Remember, most of the levies are already 'dispirited'. Seeing their fellow soldiers turning into Wights would evaporate morale and trust instantly since nobody knows who is infected and who is not. With the attack of an outside force happening concurrently and Cat may just see her first real defeat here.

... You know unless she uses her Winter and Necromancy powers to usurp control of the undead and use them to beat the shit out of Akua's demons.

Also transition into the Name Death Knight while she is at it.

warriormonk19

I don't think so. Didn't the citizens need to drink copious amounts of the stuff? I doubt that a single meal would have been enough to pack all the necessary alchemical ingredients. I may be wrong, but I think it was simply a case of a bad cook.

Replying to Warriormonk19.

I don't remember how much people have to drink or for how long. You may be right. However, I'm going to see your skepticism and raise you a catastrophe. Not only may she have been dosing these troops long enough to turn them, but who's to say how long she's been brewing the undead potion and how widely she has distributed it? Cat may find herself confronted with, "Kneel to me or there won't be a single living Callowan within a week." True, that would be a monumental undertaking, but she has had a flying city to work from while Cat has been busy with the Fae.

wirelessgrapes

The issue, and the benefit, is that Akua is playing the villain, and Cat is playing the hero. This reads entirely like a The Night Is Always Darkest scenario. Danger is foreboding, and disaster appears to be imminent. This is the point in the story where the good guys start to break, only to be saved by the hero.

Cat has set herself up incredibly favorably in this story, which is either the result of Akua getting pushed into her role by her transition to Diabolist, or Akua having some advantage planned for when this happens. Either way, she's stacked the deck *too* much here to win.

Which leads into an interesting idea I've had about the state of Cat's Name and why she doesn't transition yet. Squire, since it is a transitory Name, does not limit the decisions Cat makes. Her name only loses power when she goes against her Story. She can't go against the Tower, but she can go against people who go against Cat, so long as her interests stay with Evil. Whether consciously, or unconsciously with the Story, Cat doesn't transition because she's effectively stronger with a weaker Name, because she isn't limited by her choice of actions.

Akua is unable to set herself up in this scenario on this battlefield, because the Diabolist would never be in this scenario in this battlefield. The Diabolist is always the one with the army of the dead and demons, and the Squire, while Evil in this case, is not directly barred from this course of action. The Name itself does not drag her away from this action, and the Story she has built for herself allows her decisions. Or, the Story is arguably her decisions all put together, and this is just in line.

Of course, by putting herself in the hero role, she limits her abilities in combat, hence why she needs to have a good army and good tactics. She can't just Rambo this, she has to go in practically, because that's her story.

But it doesn't matter in the end, because she'll be the one to save the day.

mclovin2016

Squire isn't necessarily an Evil Name. Also, does Black Queen sound like a Name to anyone?

boballab

If you notice the first letters are capitalized which is what you do with a proper name and it would fit with how the whole Name thing works...You get the name first and fill the role second (Black called her Squire before she filled the role of Squire same with the Hierarch that the Tyrant pulled off). Also you are correct, the name Squire can lead to either Knight, White or Black.

LostDeviljho

Sounds more like a Carrion Lord type moniker to me, tbh.

nipi

Im thinking that having a transitional name allows her to grow stronger faster with aspects to that effect or not. Sure transitioning into a true name would grant her a large boost but at the expense of future growth.

Anna

"The Black Queen" I'm fucking screaming need a mo brb

Engineer

'Black Queen'. Is that a Name? I know it can't be Cat's Name since she's a squire and a squire can only transition into a Knight. But aside from that, does Black Queen have sufficient weight to indeed be a Name?

nick012000

Nah, she can transition to ruling Names as well. Remember that the fact she was a Squire played in her favor when she pulled the sword from the stone.

Engineer

Oh that does make sense that names could transcend but I think I recall somewhere in the text that someone said that a Squire must become a Knight. So her transitioning from a Knight name to a ruling Name would be plausible, expected even. I think if Black were to take the Throne his Name would become Dread Emperor.

Cat transcending from a Squire to a ruling Name feels wrong somehow. It's like an Intern being promoted to CEO without having been a Manager first.

Granted, the Angel could have made her a Queen but that's a direct intervention by an agent of the Gods above. Plus she had the narrative plot device of pulling the sword from a stone and being an orphan to ease the process. But I think the time frame wherein those actions carried weight enough for the transition is passed already.

I don't think it's possible for a Squire to 'naturally' transition to a ruling class name without outside intervention. So yeah, Black Queen in Cat's case seems to be a mantle like Duchess of Moonless Nights.

naturalnuke

Names can be transcended remember, just as the angel could make her a Queen, so to can all the Callowans calls ring her a Black Queen. Or so it seems.

Jonnnney

It has weight which could lead to a transition, but not into that specific name. Harm's deadhead moniker accelerated him becoming Adjutant. The orcs call her Warlord, the Callowans call her black queen, the fae call her duchess of moonless nights, the gods below only know what Praesi call her, she is likely to gain some new mantle.

Taichi22

Yes, I do think that we're edging close to a name transition now, what with all the monikers Cat's gained. One (or all) of them will eventually stick, I think.

Shoddi

How do the Praesi legionaries refer to Cat? Do they have a moniker for her like the Callowans, orcs, and fae? What about the Procerians? I vaguely remember something about Procer declaring her some sort of abomination, but I'm not sure.

Also, it amuses me how Cat has NO idea how utterly, completely, nightmare-fuel terrifying she is to many of the people under her sphere of influence.

IDKWhoitis

If I remember correctly, in book two, the Angels tried to make her a Queen. Transition to one of the Knights may be easier, but it seems that it is not impossible to ascend further.

Also, Cat has broken Creation's "paths" and cycles before, foraging new possibilities where there should be none (I.E. The unmaking of Winter+Summer into something new.)

Jonnnney

Don't forget the fae aren't part of creation. She has found unique ways to mold a story using her role, but she has yet to break creation.

esryok

Seems like the Callowans have decided on their vote for Cat's next Name.

Black Queen, eh? I like it.

Dainpdf

Come on, Abigail. If you see something, say something! Too bad there is no one she can report this to in the mess of a battle.

Sniggs44

Diabolist's "this ends with you kneeling" statement might not have just been your standard villainous hyperbolic rhetoric. Maybe she was speaking literally, driven by that overwhelming compulsion some villains have to foreshadow/reveal their evil plots.

I could see Catherine “kneeling” (i.e. submitting or subordinating herself) in one of two scenarios: Either Diabolist demands it or else she genocides all of Callow or something equally over the top (unlikely IMO, as Cat tends to be too stubborn to go for those kinds of deals), or Diabolist pulls some kind of magical fuckery with Squire’s “poorly-scaffolded” soul (Chekhov’s Gun!).

The latter plan could feasibly be pulled off in the coming battle. For the first time in a long time Squire is by herself, with none of her support network (IIRC she is the only one who took the most recent jaunt through Arcadia...no Hierophant to straight up no sell enemy magics, no Archer to just shoot people in the head from miles away to disrupt rituals, etc.).

The enemy force has dozens/hundreds of specialized mages, led by Diabolist’s second in command. Everyone on Cat’s side is expecting an enemy ritual, and several of her commanders have made fate-tempting statements to the effect of “this looks bad, but we’ve got Squire on our side!”. I could see the bad guys waiting for Cat to use some combination of her necromancy plus her Take (control) aspect in an attempt to counter the enemy undead – a capability they probably know she has by this point – then corrupting it via magical feedback or whatever in order to strike at her soul/Name directly.

On one hand this is a perfect time for Diabolist to get a debilitating blow in, but on the other Catherine may be protected by the narrative gods from such a setback until she actually confronts Diabolist herself.

(Also, goblinfire seems almost too perfect for fighting hordes of retarded flammable undead, which makes me think someone on the enemy team has developed a way to counter it. It’s not like there’s any real doubt Squire is going to use the stuff.)

Engineer

Cat might be kneeling but Akua will be the one reeling.

Stood Far Back When The Gravitas Was Handed Out

Cat is a villain's apprentice who isn't actually considered heroic by any of the presented POV's and who doesn't have any established pattern with Akua.

It seems unlikely that her defending Callow is enough to move the story away from villains fighting each other.

As for the battle being stacked in Akua's favour- it seems the sides are pretty evenly matched. Either Akua hopes to defeat Cat here (unlikely) or she hopes to whittle down her forces to the point where she can't effectively siege.

letouriste

hum...i don't know at all where this is going:)

PingleBerry

I have an idea. I think Akua's spies put still waters in the food.

letouriste

she doesn't have the amunition.she took mainly rocks and money with her.

liesse was not garnisoned so no goblin bags too.

only way would be magic but that would be really not cost-efficient right?

nipi

I hope the city guards have slashing spears. Dot going to do much against the wraiths with stabbing weapons it they can shrug off loosing their head.

And Im wondering how Callow ever managed to hold its own against armies of such "creatures" decked in full plate? Did the priests "turn undead" or something?

Thrillho

They almost certainly had their own clerics with anti-undead fuckery going on. Plus they had their own, albeit not as badass, version of Warlock with the Wizard. So while undead probably weren't great, it likely wasn't a total zombie-horde route. Not that that saved them in end anyway, obviously

beleester

Also, Hierophant said that the thing that made Still Water terrifying was that, unlike other undead plagues that had been used before, the transformation was permanent – the power of the priests would kill the wights, not cure them.

So presumably the typical "exponentially multiplying zombie plague" strategy just never gets off the ground – the priests are able to cure the plague before the horde gets too big to handle. And without any exponential growth, the only way to get a sizeable undead horde is by investing a shitload of magic into it, which probably means a Named magician who gets killed off by a Hero at the first opportunity. So it's probably a combination of Callowan clerics and the fact that you normally can't raise that big a horde in the first place.

daegone823

I think I might be the only one so far who thinks the horse with the black armor is a dummy and cat along with her crew of 5 is just doing a secret mission against the necromancers while the rest are fighting it out. They said the key to victory would be a surgical strike against the enemy commander/ necromancer thus assassination is better than big battle in this instance. Plus people just need the image of Cat sitting on the horse to boost morale, not the real thing. Queen of Corpse reign supreme!!!!

letouriste

oh right! i wanted to see more of the normal soldiers pov.i guess my wish has been granted^^ abigail could grow on me;)

Hune is the traitor!!!

Shoddi

If it comes down to a question of allegiance to the Legions vs. to "House Foundling", then Hune will come down squarely on the side of the Legions (until her term ends, at least). I'd imagine she'd fight against Cat if it came to that. But I don't see Hune outright betraying Cat to Akua (the enemy at hand) or Procer (the enemy on the horizon).

The stew reference is indeed worrying, but I thought up another variation of the problem. Diabolist has her hooks into a necromantic gestalt that gives people powers based on oaths to the gestalt. What if she can bypass the oaths (or pervert them), then she can give those powers to the wights. Wights + necromantic deity powers = bad news.

THE BLACK QUEEN

(chants the funeral march, the cracked brass bells will ring)

Barrendur

I thought this chapter was very disjointed, and packed with detail about characters the readers have never encountered before and will probably never see again. I found it frustrating, pointless and generally tedious. Now I can understand how not revealing the plot too soon would require some fancy narrative footwork from the author, including use of several naive (or clueless) characters who can't give anything away because they don't know anything... but that's a dull and disconnected character to read about, and tempts the reader to skip ahead until a familiar character reappears. Writing serialised fiction clearly requires the author give a LOT of thought to the balance between disclosure and concealment, and dole out information at an appropriate rate... but I think your disclosure rate in this chapter was more like stalling – and it made for a boring, frustrating read and a strong sense of “So what?”

Morgenstern

I disliked the disclosure rate in this chapter, too, but I STILL found it anything BUT boring and nothing about those characters made me think “bah, we'll likely never see them again, anyway” and thus dislike them and their POVs. *shrugs

Idan Dor

I believe we were hinted that the story that Catherine is gunning for is the old song of holding the line:

“Down here in the mud, it's us who holds the line,” she whispered, and that one had some iron to it.”.

We know, as with the faerie fight and the rebellion that Catherine uses stories for her fights. I believe she is using the Callowen song (here they come again) for holding the line for this fight.

Nairne .01

Thank you for the chapter.

Fern

The thing is, Sacker already called the fight pretty accurately. The Praesi square + 3k wights are staying back, and the current wave is trying to push through the gap between the Center and the right to force a break in the shield wall. What's important to note here is that 1 – the ritual's gonna have to either destabilize the center or affect the reserve, or else they won't be able to flip the line and 2 – the 9th is gonna be able to maneuver if the rest of those wights don't commit on the left. Here's what might happen:

Ritual + tying up Cat: This chapter's quote is interesting, as an allusion to assassinations. The ritual blows a hole in the center once the Fourth reinforces, and the 3k wight wave is sent to stop Sacker's Ninth from intervening. At the same time, a small, highly mobile force not yet noticed (like, less than two dozen or so) is sent to kill Cat. Even though they are no match for Cat backed by Istrid's riders, they are able to tie her up long enough that she can't interfere in the fight. The center breaks, and the host is forced to retreat-in-good-order through a gate to prevent heavy losses. Diabolist wins, and keeps her pretty host to boot with only minimal losses.

Just ritual: As said before, line flips, Fourth reinforces, ritual triggers, Sacker's stuck. However, we know that the gods above and below Looooooooove that advantage ball, so Cat comes and reinforces the line and reinvigorates her troops (notice: all troops in the center are basically pledged to Cat, which I don't think is a mistake). Once the shield wall is reestablished it becomes a war of attrition that Fasili will lose, so he sends his Praesi troops as a last ditch effort to break the line, either sending the 1400 odd soldiers they have in reserve or moving the whole square up. Either way Istrid comes around and either kills the now-vulnerable mages/officers, or she attacks the back of the square. Diabolist still wins, because I guarantee you she didn't send anything she couldn't afford to lose to this fight aside from Fasili. Loses about 1/3 of her host for information on Cat and the Southpool host, a draw/slight win for Diabolist.

Ritual @ Cat: The ritual affects Cat instead of the line, so the line holds and the battle becomes simple. But this has strategic implications: without Cat the Woe loses weight in the story (of which they need as much as they can get.) Remember, for as much as this resembles the usual black and white tales this is an evil vs. evil fight; it's gonna come down to whoever has the most cards on the table at the end of the fight.

Interested to see if Cat can pull a victory out here. Love the story, keep it up EE!

SpeckofStardust

Considering it all, is it possible that the Diabolist from having research information Via Still waters and has other spells she could set up the same way? aka instead of an undead spell she could set up a demon summoning one? Cause that is both something she has all the forshadowing for a lot longer then suddenly undead, and wont be something that Cat can likely counter.

SpeckofStardust

Yep

"Weeping Heavens," I whispered. "What kind of a ritual is this?"

"She fed them, didn't she?" Masego said. "She gave them water and rations. Hers. And she just retrieved that gift."

"If it's retrieved, that means she got it back," I hissed. – chapter 41 Book 2

I say we should be more worried about suddenly demons.

This was a fantastic set of alternative viewpoints to see the battlefield from. It really drove home how much Squire is missing in experience and what the ground-level of the battle looks like.

Interlude: Skirmish II

"Mark my words, the Imperial banner will be flying above Summerholm by midsummer."

– Dread Empress Regalia II, shortly before initiating the Sixty Years War

"Sound the horns," General Istrid said.

The Red Rage pulsed in the back of her head, the song of slaughter sweetly beckoning. She'd learned to ignore it, since she'd taken her oaths to the Legion all these years ago. Still the urge was always there, to let the howl loose and sink her fangs into one quarry after another until all was left of her was the joy and the blood. Orcs never really went tame, even when you drilled them and clad them in man's armour. Her warlord understood that, had never tried to make them anything but what they were. Instead he gave them enemies and taught them to be better killers, to wed savagery to discipline and something greater than themselves. Some of the younger greenskins nowadays thought that great thing was the Empire, but they'd been born in different times. Istrid of the Red Shields worshipped only at the altar of the Legions of Terror, the greatest killing machine Calernia had ever seen. What was Praes, to her? A pack of squabbling humans decked in silks and too much gold. Should she ever get the order, she would burn everything they had raised to ashes and salt the grounds of their ancestral homes.

It might just come to that. The Rage pounded her temples like a drum at the thought. Black's scrappy little apprentice had men singing of revolution these days, and even Her Dread Majesty was getting her hands dirty in the Wasteland. After they dealt with this Sahelian girl, the old order was going to see revisiting. She savoured the killing yet to come, for many reasons. The Red Shields Clan was not unbroken lineage like the Howling Wolves or the Ivory Fangs, but the shamans still spoke histories from the dead clan that had birthed her own. Of the days when greenskin hordes sacked Wolof and Okoro as they wished, took tribute from the kneeling kings of Aksum and fought great battles against Deoraithe in the Golden Bloom. Even before the Miezens the strength of her people had been waning in the face of high walls and cunning sorceries, but Creation was a wheel ever spinning. Every dog had their day, if they were patient enough. Her people's felt like it was coming.

The Fourth did not use Praesi-made horns for their signalling. Istrid had her own crafted from the bones of the great drakes whose remains still littered the Steppes, great carved things that took an ogre to blow them. Their call was deep and shivering, the hollow cry of creatures long dead to this land. It was the promise of death, and Istrid's legionaries marched to it against the last gasps of the old order.

Squire's legate had done what she could but these Callowans were watchmen, not Royal Guard. When the wights pressed where the line was thinnest and the men of the Fifteenth started dying, the left side of the centre wavered. Istrid had ordered the horns sounded before it could collapse entirely, and watched as her legionaries steadied the front before edging the Callowans aside. Her Fourth had earned their cognomen at Black's own word, after the Fields, for turning back the mounted killers of the kingdom. Ironsides. It had a lot of people thinking she'd raised her legion for defence, for taking a hit and swinging back. Ignorance, that. Istrid Knightsbane had climbed her way to the heights where she now stood by massacring everything in her way, be it rivals chiefs or Wasteland lords or the chivalry of Callow. She'd raised her army in her image: brute force made host. She had fewer sappers than any other legion in service, only the requisite number of mages and the Fourth was the only Praesi host with more heavies than regulars on the rolls. There was a reason they paired her with Sacker, she knew. Her old friend would use finesse where she did not, temper her more belligerent instincts. But there would be no need for deep thinking, today.

In front of her dead men stood and she would shatter them. That was all there was to it.

The orc tightened the clasps of her helmet and licked her chops. Her personal guard clustered around her, as eager for the fight as she, and Istrid glanced at her seniormost legate.

"Bagram," she announced. "Command's yours."

"Wade in their blood, Knightsbane," the orc replied, flashing fangs.

Just a little too long in doing that for it to be entirely proper, but the old bastard had always been flirtatious. Istrid limbered her aging shoulders with a roll and unsheathed her blade. Ahead of her the lines impacted with a heady fracas and she picked up the pace. Legionaries moved aside for her until all that was ahead was the dead, a teeming mass of pale flesh and steel that came in silent waves. The orc stomped the ground and let out a hoarse yell. A hundred of the same gave reply, greenskins from steppes both Northern and Lesser. Berserkers like her. There were some who said there was no longer a place for the Red Rage, in this orderly little world the Tower was building. No place for the old dumb brutes from the north.

"Bone and flesh torn asunder," she whispered in Kharsum, letting the old words wash over her.

Her father had spoken them, and his mother before her. All the way back to the Broken Antler Horde and the years where Creation had stood in awe of the orcs.

"Caked in doom and mask of cinder Stand ye ever red in tooth and claw Like empty, great and gaping maw."

The old rhyme eased her into it, the way it was meant to. Istrid's body shook with spasms as a scream not her own filled the air. Muscles tightened, bones creaked and the world turned to shades of crimson. The wight ahead of her struck, but so did she and her sword ripped through bone and flesh, bending steel and smashing it into another undead.

"FORWARD," she bellowed, laughing madly.

And so they went, doom upon all the world.

Abigail kept cursing even as the mage healed what was left of her eye. She could still feel the teeth going into her flesh, ripping and tearing as she struggled to get the wight off of her. It said a lot about the day that she was one of the lucky ones. Her entire line had been wiped out trying to steady the fucking Ankouans when it looked like they were going to rabbit: with the guards giving ground her twenty had been surrounded and torn through in moments. If a mage line hadn't burned her a path to retreat, she'd be in some wight's mouth like the rest of her soldiers.

"Cowardly shits," the captain spat. "I hope she hangs them all."

"Unlikely," Lieutenant Salome noted. "And if you continue speaking, I cannot promise you'll ever see again."

Abigail shut the Hells up, though she was starting to have opinions about Legion healers. They worked slower than the brothers and sisters at the House of Light and their bedside manner was a lot less pleasant. They weren't as good at healing, either. The lack of gentle persuasion about attending sermons more often wasn't enough of a trade-off for maybe losing half of her total eye supply.

"There," the solemn Taghreb said. "That should be enough. Keep in mind this is a patch job, Captain. Actual restoration would take hours of precision work, and will have to wait until this is no longer an active battlefield."

"I know the triage protocols," Abigail griped. "I sat through the fucking lectures."

The Legions had to be the only army in the world where they made you sit like a schoolgirl after the drills. It was a good thing she knew how to read, too, because it was a requisite if you ever wanted to make tribune. She had her eye on that promotion, as it happened. Officers of that rank weren't expected to be on the frontlines as often, which should do wonders for her life expectancy.

"Legate Hune left instructions for the soldiers that were in your section to present themselves for redeployment," the olive-skinned mage told her. "Try not to get killed, Captain Abigail. It would be a shame for my work to have been pointless."

"You're all heart, Salome," the dark-haired woman drily replied.

Much as she disliked the notion of going back into the thick of it, the Callowan had expected she'd be sent for. Half her company still lived but it wouldn't be headed back to where it had been bled – that space was now occupied by the Fourth, which had come out swinging. And screaming. Gods Above, so much screaming. It must have been an orc thing. The legionaries were turning around the situation there, at least. Their frontlines had been stacked with heavies and they'd slammed into the wights like a runaway cart, gaining back all the grounds that'd been lost in the span of a quarter bell. Now they were carving a wedge into the undead, which she assumed was the prelude to an all-out assault. Abigail made the rounds and collected the remains of her company from the tender attentions of the healers or the grounds where they'd dropped down exhausted before making her way to command. Senior Tribune Locks was the one who met with her, the reason for his ridiculous Legion-assumed name made clear by the dark curls going beyond his helmet.

"We're keeping you in reserve for now, captain," the Soninke told her. "Most likely you'll be joined with another company that took casualties and sent to steady the levies."

Steadying the godsdamned Ankouans is how I lost half my company, you smug prick, she thought.

"Looking forward to it," Abigail said, playing up her Summerholm accent so the sarcasm wouldn't register.

She spent half a bell after that standing behind the lines like she was on death row, but she couldn't complain. Better the wait than the fight. She was no tactician, but at the moment she'd wager the judgement that things were looking up for her side. The Fifth on the right flank was still stuck dealing with wights, but the undead were beginning to thin. The Ninth was going through the enemy slower but with fewer casualties, and the Fourth was digging into the undead like this was summer solstice and they hadn't eaten all week. It could be generously said that the centre was holding, though not much more than that. There'd been no glaring fuckups that would require her to be sent back into the mess, and she told herself she'd light a candle in a House for that. As long as it cost copper, anyway. She wasn't putting down silver for the folks Above, not unless she got a promotion and her hooks into a pretty boy that was supernaturally flexible in bed.

She was made to regret the blasphemy immediately.

There'd been a bunch of fancy Wastelanders looming behind the undead since the blades had come out and they'd finally stirred themselves to act. The move they made was on the Black Queen, and Abigail had to give them praise for the balls of it if nothing else. Catherine Foundling had a reputation for brutally murdering her way through problems, so it was pretty brave of them to so openly embrace that label. Blinding panels of light formed around the Squire in the distance, slowly spinning. Abigail would have looked closer but it hurt her eyes to, and not just because of the light. The shapes she could discern were hardly shapes at all, and even glancing was enough to have the beginnings of a migraine forming. To be honest, she wasn't too worried about this. Trapping the Black Queen was kind of like trying to put a bonfire in a box – it'd work for that short moment until the whole thing caught fire and then your hands were on fire as well and by then it was way, way too late to do anything about it. Unlike some of her dumber countrymen Abigail didn't think there was anything gloriously patriotic about trading a Praesi monster in charge for a Callowan one, but Heavens was she glad to be in the Fifteenth and not in the ranks of whatever poor fucking fools were fighting it.

There was something to be said for being on the winning side, and monster or not Foundling had a history of being the last woman standing on the field.

The thing was, the light panels stayed there. No howling blizzard tore them open. This, Abigail thought, did not bode well. The rest of the army must have agreed because a shiver went through the ranks. Not the old legionaries, they were made of sterner stuff, but the Ankouans were wavering. And the men of the Fifteenth were... It was hard to put into words. You didn't have to like the Black Queen to put your trust in the legend. In the stories about the girl who'd tricked resurrection out of angels and swept her way through armies and heroes alike. Abigail had seen her in Dormer, when she'd raised the stairs of ice and swept the Summer fae off the walls. It had been like watching a force of nature, not a person. Sometimes the captain still woke up with cold fingers even when she slept by the fire. You couldn't see something like that and not believe, even if only a little. So why isn't she breaking out of the cage? The Praesi took advantage, and if there'd ever been the history of Callow writ in a sentence that was it.

Abigail had heard stories about the Conquest. Every kid did, not matter where in the country they were raised. But those had been about battles and sieges, cunning ploys and foul deeds. This isn't anything like that at all, she thought. Darkness was made smoke above the chanting silhouettes of faraway mages, and that smoked moved. It slithered across the cloudless sky, spreading smoothly like ink in water, and it was only when it reached the army it clustered into a ball above it. Then it exploded again, into a hundred dark tendrils that swept through the centre of the host. Wherever the tendrils passed, men died. Choking and screaming, clawing at their throats as the smoke went into their bodies and poisoned something inside them. Black tears streaked down their faces, leaving ash-like trails. Abigail's blood ran cold, and in that moment she understood why old men called Praes the Enemy. This was not war, it was... She didn't know a word ugly enough for it.

How many had died, over these ten heartbeats? A thousand, at least. There was a gaping hole right in the middle of the army, and already the wights were pouring through. Abigail almost thought she heard a snap, when the morale of the Akouans broke. They were going to leg it, she thought. They guards were going to flee and they were all going to die. The smoke thinned and began to disperse, leaving only a field of corpses behind. That, and one soldier. That one survivor took off her helmet, shook free a ponytail, and the captain's heart caught in her throat.

"Rise," Catherine Foundling ordered, and the dead men obeyed.

The word had been spoken half a mile away, and still Abigail heard it like had been whispered into her ear. Akouans and legionaries rose to their feet, cold blue eyes shining, and the dead fell upon the dead. Something old and harsh rose up in the captain's veins, something she had thought herself beyond. It wasn't pride, because who could take pride in one of their own matching the Wasteland horror for horror? But it was something close to it, when she thought of the sneering mages on the other side who'd swatted down thousands likes insects. Be afraid, she thought. Like we are, like we've always been. Be afraid of the monster coming for you all, because there is not a speck of pity or mercy in her.

"Kill them all, Black Queen," Abigail whispered hoarsely, and meant every word of it.

Sacker watched frost spread across the ground, dead men claw at the dead, and felt her body shiver in a way that had nothing to do with the sudden cold. She'd seen Lord Black in the fullness of his power, turning the men behind him into a sword no army could withstand. This was something else. It was the madness and might of the Old Tyrants turned to sharp purpose, and the part of her that loved the Tribes above all else wept at the sight of it. O Carrion Lord, what have you wrought? The Squire was a host unto herself, a wrathful child who'd stolen the mantle of a lesser god and would wreck the world with it until it fit her vision of how things should be. The goblin was a true daughter of the Grey Eyries, daughter and great-daughter of Matrons, and she knew old histories and the dark truths they carried. No Empresses had been so terrifying as the ones that thought they were in the right. That thought they were doing the necessary thing. The Praesi knelt at the altar of Dread Empress Triumphant – may she never return – and named her the greatest Tyrant that ever was or would be. But she'd been a storm to be waited out, nothing more.

There would be no waiting out Catherine Foundling, she knew. The girl had been taught by the most patient of monsters, and surpassed his greatest weakness. Lack of power.

Is this to be your legacy, Amadeus of the Green Stretch? Will you leave us with one last laugh at our expense, knowing the world will burn in your wake? Sacker held more respect for the Black Knight than she'd ever thought she would give either a human or a male, but even so she did not think he deserved a pyre as great as the whole of Calernia. It was all made even more bitter brew by what what she knew, that the Squire would be needed in the wars to come. They needed the likes of her to turn back Procer, to smother the Tenth Crusade in the crib. I hate you a little, old friend, for the knowledge that you shaped a situation where we would have no choice but to embrace her. Every inch of Sacker told her that she needed to kill this girl, kill her right now before she crossed a line they could not return from. But to follow her instincts would be to cripple the Empire and the Tribes with it on the eve of the greatest war they had seen in centuries.

The goblin let fear and grief hold her for a moment, before she wrested back her mind. There were orders to give. The rebels had played their hand and seen it fail. It was only a matter of time until Istrid and Orim broke through, and when they did the battle would be good as won. All that remained was to play out the rest of this.

"Raise the banners," General Sacker told her staff. "Heavies in front, mages are to Lob at will. Let's end this farce."

It should have felt like a victory, but all she could think about was what lay ahead. Her people kept to the Gods Below, as the Praesi did, but they had given the oldest face of these deities a name: the Gobbler. It was said, among the Tribes, that when the Creation was born the Gobbler had spewed out all the peoples of the world. The last and smallest of them, crawling from the open and exhausted maw, had been the goblins. It was whispered to the daughters of Matron lines that they had been the last to come and that they would be the last to go. That they would be spared the calamities of greater peoples, hidden away in their deep places.

Watching Winter spread through the dead, freezing and shattering everything in its path, for the first time since she'd been spawned Sacker doubted this truth.

Happy Holiday and a large pile of corpses to you.

On another note it's kind of funny how Black hates losing so much that he'd willingly pull a "My Death is Just the Beginning"/"Load Bearing Boss" type gambit just to make sure that his death is not remembered as a defeat but instead as a tragedy for the entirety of the forces of Good. And that's provided that he doesn't make a return as the Dead Knight or something equally undead and unholy.

Or maybe conquer a Hell.

Darkening

I could see him playing a bunch of demon princes against each other until they'd all killed each other off and he was in charge of a hell. Especially if he's drunk. It'd be one Hell of a show lol. Not sure exactly how the afterlife works in this setting, I know there's a heaven for people that follow the Gods Above, at least according to the house of light, but I doubt every faithful gets in, so where do the sinners go? The same underworld that's mentioned to be where followers of the gods below go to? Wonder if that's like the greek underworld where most people are kind of just there, a special few get special torture, and a very special few get to live in luxury, or if it's more its own thing. Hm.

werafdsaew

Load bearing boss? His stated reason for getting a Squire is to subvert that trope.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Who says that's what Black's doing? Well Sacker obviously, but her opinion here is opposed to Black's own, I think. Personally I believe that Sacker may be right in terms of her observations, but wrong about Black's motivations for settling things up this way. I don't think "forcing everyone to accept Catherine" was a goal here. It's like Malicia said, he's so focused on winning the Proceran war that he is unable to conceive of alternatives. And as Cat will help achieve that end, Black never stopped to think that she even needs to be forced on anyone on his side

Good job staying on top of the typos, E.E.!

It's not about being perfect—though typo perfection is definitely attainable, just ask D.D. Webb—it's about avoiding the kind of misspellings that detract from your understanding and enjoyment of the story. I've complained about that often enough, so I appreciate the improvement twice as much xD

Pipiemman

I know you're just teasing us with the Black Queen stuff and that it's unlikely to be Cat's new Name, but G-ddamn is it working. I want it so bad.

stevenneiman

Yeah, Names seem to be something that you either strive to become or suddenly snap into being. They don't seem to be things that someone gets called and then it becomes a Name eventually.
All the same, Black Queen is pretty badass even for a nickname.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

[Names] don't seem to be things that someone gets called and then it becomes a Name eventually.

Actually I think that's exactly how it works, but "eventually" means "over the course of many generations"

oldschoolvillain

Actually, this sort of thing is exactly how Alia became Diabolist – Names are, ultimately, stories, so if you get a massive population telling this story about you, it could result in a new Name.

jrayfield13

I halfway agree I don't think that in a month or two she's going to just punch a god in the face and become the Black queen but I think what we ultimately seeing here is the start of a cultural legend being born and maybe the eventuality of a Name Black Queen. I mean Catherine's entire goal from the start has been to take the evil of the the empire and make it benefit Callow and all she has been doing since then has been not just doing that but creating a natural legend for Callow. I mean Callow was a historically "good" country right. If so technically speaking she is there first "evil" Named. There is probably a weight to that and if it continues I imagine her accomplishments could grow into the power of a name. I mean maybe not now but who's to say 50 years down the line some orphan girl doesn't take up the reign and become Black Queen. Stories and the Names have to come from somewhere and what better place to start of the new "evil" Callowian Named than with her

James, Mostly Harmless

Seeing Sacker's thoughts crystalized something for me: does Akua realize that Cat sees her as a distraction, a sideshow, on her way to the REAL war? The Procerans and the Tenth Crusade are coming ...

Reveen

Turns out putting your trust in port-fascism and hero worship and allowing it's legacy to come to fruition is a bad idea, who'd thunk it?

Also love how neither Abigail or Sacker seem to see any real difference between Practical Evil as an ideology and just normal evil. Almost like they're normal people and not authoritarian weirdos.

Evgeny

Fascism works well if your country is encircled by enemies. Yes, it is inhuman and bloodthirsty, but it works.

unoriginal

A jingoistic war focused society would also work well in that situation. hell, any form of strong central leadership with an eager nationalistic or otherwise motivated army works in the situation. So long as you don't bite off more than you can chew e.g. start a war with multiple neighbor-enemies at the same time. Because that it's all about efficient use of your limited resources by a strong government or ruler. The problem with fascism is, it isn't particularly efficient and while its democracies that get the bad rap for this generally a representative democracy is more efficient and streamlined than a dictatorship or fascist government.

A popular misconception, for example, is that in fascist Italy the trains ran on time. except they didn't that's propaganda encouraged to make the government of the time seem competent, but in reality, a dictatorship or any fascist state seen in human history is not too dissimilar from a royal court where powerful influence wielding individuals, all vying for power, clash with one another and the leader has to keep everyone in line and happy. Or as A practical guide to Evil puts it, the ruler holding power becomes a polite fiction (or something to that effect). And let us not get into the attendant bribery on every level and resources suddenly disappearing when corrupt officials think they can get away with it. (In many cases their bosses let them because it keeps them loyal to the power figure in the relationship just as that same power figure is kept happy/inline by the king/dictator/ruler/El Presidente/ supreme chancellor/emperor and etc.)

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Thank you. Fascism does not actually work. The misconception that it does needs to be killed already

Reveen

Ummm...

*Looks at what happened to the Axis*

No it didn't.

Abrakadabra

Yeah, it did. It took half the world to put it down, you know. It was efficient. The leaders tough, they were mad.

Daemion

So Cat was using a decoy on her mount and was hiding among the common soldiers herself? She's getting more sneaky.

Losing 1000+ soldiers has to hurt though, even if they win the battle. I wonder what the goal of Akua's side was? Trying to take out Cat early with a ritual? Gathering information?

Darkening

Mostly the callow guards it looks like, so not as huge a loss as a thousand legionnaires, but I bet she's gonna be feeling guilty about it, even if turning them into zombies is what wins her the battle. Dunno how much of the fifteenth was mixed in with the section of guards that died.

---

The dummy Catherine has left to distract the mages left had me thinking, just as a crazy theory: how do we know that "lady Naibu" is Malicia's puppet and not Akua's?

First, all the evidence of Malicia being the one to send her isn't even her words – it's Catherine guessing and the puppet nodding. Malicia herself never bothered to send an envoy before, though a talk with the Squire might have been a good reason. While nothing says that Nefarious, being a sorcerer on par with Wizard of the West, couldn't have made a flesh puppet for subterfuge/satisfaction purposes, Akua has already demonstrated being capable to produce similar results – namely, extracting a soul out of her own body and remotely controlling it.

Next, how it could pass off as Malicia's deputy? Well, the only person who knew about it being the case was Catherine, who didn't question the assumption in the first place. While the news about the Calamities going to assault Delos and the tone of the conversation look rather authentic, it doesn't look like anything Akua wouldn't have been able to glean from the infiltration of the imperial spy network, or guess. The Calamities make obvious enough waves, and Akua understands Malicia's distaste for oldschool villain stupidity well enough, perhaps even well enough to emulate it.

The same way she could have pretended to be a usual representative to the rest of the council: Akua thought she had infiltrated all layers of Malicia's employees in Callow, including, obviously, the official bureaucratic apparatus. She could have either switched the representative in the course of the infiltration or extracted the soul before her arrival, and all the other members would see would be an unknown envoy from Her Majesty, who disappeared as soon as the news of Squire going into Arcadia reach the capital – instead of, say, staying to stabilize the situation or contacting the loyal members of the Council.

I admit that the later interactions point more to Malicia than to Akua – particularly the "you don't fight the crusade at all" line: for the Diabolist a Crusade seems to be either too far or too insignificant a threat, so I'm not sure she would pay attention to that detail. Still, I would like to hear the arguments for/against the theory.

Tl;dr: Akua heard about Winter fae popping up at Marchford, used a prepared puppet to send Squire into a trap and hid it after verifying that she went through. Rebellion ensues, Diabolist gets to act independently and remove an adversary.

testalacon2017

Cant be for a multitude of reasons. The glaring ones would be the whole "planning chapter" with the general reprimand and the negociation with the king of winter. Diabolist couldn't have done that. Even if she did, backstabbing Cat there would have been much more effective.

Evgeny

SO! I think, winter is coming.

Seriously, Catherine. Do you REALLY want to challenge the Dead King ?

Shoddi

Once the Dead King hears about this, he'll splash on some Old Spite cologne, put on his best bone armor, pick a bouquet of corpse flowers and head to Callow to court Catherine.

He has to be lonely, and would love a queen to share his hell with him. He never gets anybody to come visit except Ranger, and she keeps breaking his stuff.

tpdbooks

How did Catherine use Rise? Since she got her new Name her Aspects have been Take, Break, and Fall, right?

Darkening

That's not an aspect, it's not bolded. She's just infusing the corpses with her name and Winter, and animating them like she does her horse, just on a greater scale now that she has so much more power. She could probably just command them with her mind, but spoke the command for them to rise verbally. Plus it's super dramatic and creepy and this universe runs on that.

unoriginal

Lets also not forget that rise was the first thing she took and even if she no longer holds that power it still have narrative importance and in a world that runs off of narritvium that means alot

Adurna

Great as always!

Now what aspects and consequences does the potential name of Black Queen bring to mind with you others? What would happen with the lands? How would her fae powers be twisted? I am REALLY looking forward to her transition.

jhhhu

Many people called this in the comments. It's awesome and frightening madness.

I really like how you start to see that Caterine is not a good thing and a woe upon creation. Yet I want her to continue, creation be damned, the story is just that great.

mavant

mclovin2016

Did when jist... steal Still Water? Holy Crap!!

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I don't really understand what you're saying, but no, I read it as Cat raising the dead the old fashioned way. The way she raises her horses

mclovin2016

I guess that would make more sense. The reason I thought till water was in effect was cause of the one person left in the middle, who I'm pretty sure was the one from last chapter who complained about the odd stew. I think she survives cause she threw it up. I think that when the ritual for still water was cast either cat's necromancy or the mage formally known as apprentice fucked with it, giving cat a chance to raise the dead and fill them with winter.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Huh that is way better reasoning than I expected, and I almost wish you were right! I read it as Cat herself being the one standing though. And this is a small spoiler for the next chapter so in rot13:

V sriry yvxr gur arkg puncgre pbasvezf zl gnxr ba gur fvghngvba.

satoshikyū

I think my favorite chapters are the ones where we get to see Cat from someone else's perspective. Like when we're riding over her shoulder we get a front-row seat to her being boss and facing down armies and demigods, but at the same time we lose a bit of perspective. It's important to know how she appears in the eyes of those around her, specifically those who aren't caught up in her inner circle.

To the Fifteenth as a whole and her friends therein the Squire is both a driving force and a wrecking ball, pointing them in the direction of the enemy and leading the charge to obliterate it. To those not a part of that well-oiled if batshit crazy machine, those who are simply caught up in the wake of its passing, the very concept of what she represents must be absolutely terrifying. She's a living wave of change that seemingly cannot be stopped.

It's good to get that perspective every now and then.

jayfield13

I like the comment made about how the biggest thing that Catherine's has on her compared to a lot of the other names is power. I mean back when Akua was still Heiress she mentioned how lacking in power black is to his predecessor due to his separation from his Role. He lacks power and never really found a good way to gain more and made up for it with superior skill and a ton of meta knowledge. He gave that to Catherine and she maybe accidentally maybe subconscious took more power than she should have been possible to get. I wonder if even if she is a villain if the fact that she's Callowen who notoriously have good named heroic luck might slip in, especially when she denying her natural Role. I mean if Squire truly is just a traditional Name doesn't that mean that it has less power but whatever forces control what both good and evil get in terms of slight divineish intervention could get confused. I mean there is ambiguity with both the Name Squire and her Role in terms of where it eventually leads sengachi

"And so they went, doom upon all the world."

And with that line, my terrified respect for the Legions of Terror grows.

Anonymous

All hail her highness Triumphant II for she has returned. For her name is Catherine Foundling.

Chapter 54: Wake

"I imagine the High Lords would be inclined to protest the mind control, if I hadn't seized control of their minds, which just goes to show this was the right decision all along."

– Dread Emperor Imperious

I'd believed, once, that the way Black thought was what made him different from his predecessors. The manner he tallied gains and losses, let the numbers guide his decisions instead of more sentimental inclinations. I'd thought it a strange thing, that a man born in Praes could think that way at all. But I'd understood, as I watched a thousand men die in a manner I tacitly allowed as part of an overarching strategy, that it'd been a false perception. Most Praesi thought that way already, when you dug a little deeper. That was the principle behind a sacrifice, wasn't it? Breaking something of worth so it would bring you something else you found of greater worth. A few thousand people for a flying fortress? Well, the Empire had a lot of people but few sorcerous war machines. Tendrils of something eldritch touching your mind for a demon summoning? Power was prized over sanity, when one intended to climb the Tower. My teacher had just taken a concept at the heart of everything Praesi and brought it to its logical, cold-eyed conclusion.

The House of Light said men could be worse than devils, for devils were driven to Evil by their nature and not by choice. That it was greater sin to turn away from the light than be born of the dark. Choice, that was the word the priests exalted above all others. That men had the right to make decisions granted by the Gods and that what they did with this right defined who they were. For the Children of the Heavens sin is in action, not in birth. I didn't believe that, not really. Malicia was a monster not because she'd fed a civil war that lasted decades and killed dozens of thousands, but because she was someone who had it in her to make that decision. Her sin, if I was to insist on such a word, was that she was a woman with that capacity. Even if she'd become a cloistered sister in southern Callow and never hurt a fly until she died, she would still have that bleak thing within her. Evil was not an act so much as it was a state of mind, a way of thinking I had been raised to despise even against the best efforts of the Imperial orphanages.

But I had the bleakness in me too. It was almost pathetic it had taken me so long to admit to that fact, that it had taken writing off a thousand men under my protection as bait before I could no longer deny it, even deep down. I'd sacrificed the Ankouans, and men of the Fifteenth as well, to draw out the ritual Akua's hounds had up their sleeves. I'd have done the same with General Istrid's men or any other of the soldiers on this field, because that ugly bloodletting had seemed to me the path to victory. Was this what you saw in me, Black? The same absence where better people have qualms. The decision had been no different – no worse – than sending the vanguard into the jaws of Summer at Dormer or forcing a battle against the full might of the Court in Arcadia. But the selfishness of this one had been bare, beyond even my ability to paint over. It should have grieved me, but aside from dull shame the sight of the dying had done nothing to move me. If I cannot be kind or just, then I will at least be victorious.

I had sacrificed my last illusion of being a decent person for a win, and I could not even muster regret at the the thought of that. Maybe Diabolist had spoken truth, when she'd said I'd become like Praesi. The gap between them and me was not as wide or deep as I would have liked. I heard Hune approach through the silence, her heavy footsteps unlike any other, but did not turn to greet her.

"Legate," I simply said. "You have a report for me?"

Ahead of us were the remains of the day. My little necromantic trick, turned from dagger to sword by Winter's mantle, had turned the tide at exactly the right time. While I led my own dead smashing the wights, the legions on the flanks had begun breaking through. Istrid's Fourth had been the first among them, but closely followed by General Orim and the Fifth. Ranker's legion had not been far behind them, a quarter bell at most, and the moment the Ninth was free move the battle had been over. With four breaches in the enemy line their formation had collapsed and then the rebels had grown desperate. They'd fled, of course. Dying for the cause was not a Wasteland virtue. To prevent pursuit Lord Fasili had thinned his centre and thrown everything he could at the marching veteran legions while he and his fellow living escaped. It hadn't been enough. Orim had sent a division of one thousand to delay the wights meant to block him and pursued, only backing down when Fasili threw his last reserve of three thousand wights at the Fifth. Akua's general had brought twenty-three thousand soldiers south and fled with barely two thousand when the Battle of Dead Dawn ended.

To my fury, I'd been unable to engage in pursuit. With the necromancers gone the wights had gone wild, turning on each other as well as my soldiers, but their numbers had not dwindled swiftly enough. I could have followed on foot, or with a confiscated horse. But I'd weighed the gains and losses. If I pursued, there was a chance I could kill Akua's best general. It was not a given I'd be able to, though, since he had hundreds of mages and at least one ward he believed could trap me. If I remained, I could significantly lower casualties on my side by carving my way through the disorganized wights with my procession of dead soldiers. Uncertain greater gain or certain lesser one. A year ago I would have pursued, but I'd been taught the price of recklessness since then. Powerful as they might be, villains who faced armies on their own died to them more often than not.

"Two hundred and thirty-three fatalities from the Fifteenth," Hune said, delicately handing me a scroll. "Twice that many wounded. Numbers are still coming from the other three legions and the Callowans lack even basic registries, but I am projecting at least two thousand dead Ankouans from the debriefs."

A quarter of the initial Ankouan force gone before Afternoon Bell even rang. The colder part of me assessed that, even with the five thousand men from Southpool sure to have been lost, this battle had still seen me come out ahead in the grim arithmetic of war. On the surface, at least. Diabolist could afford to lose more troops than I could. At this rate of exchange, I'd be the last woman standing in my army and she'd still have over a third of hers. Or what we thought was hers, anyway. Inside the walls of Liesse was barred to scrying and trying to guess the amount of people there'd been in the city when it rose into the sky was a logistical nightmare. Refugees didn't exactly declare their intent to travel, nor fae offer casualty reports.

"Then we've decisively proven the Legions can beat wights when the armies field similar numbers," I said after a long moment.

"I would mitigate that statement," the ogre said. "A third of our number were Ankou watchmen. That said, Liesse is a fortified city. The nature of the engagement there will be different."

"You're worried about her mages," I said, hazarding a guess.

It wasn't a stretch to do so. They had me worried as well.

"They will have had months to prepare the grounds," Hune said. "Superior spellpower and numerical advantage will weigh heavily against us, ma'am."

"Superior spellpower," I smiled wanly. "Not something they can claim, I think, so long as we have Hierophant."

"One man," she said.

"One Named," I replied.

"They have one of those as well, Your Grace," the ogre reminded me. "Had I not been informed there are temporal concerns at work, I would have advised for a protracted siege instead of an assault."

Temporal concerns, huh. A roundabout way of saying everybody was worried about what Akua Sahelian would be able to cook up if we didn't kick down her front door quickly enough. The ogre's notion wouldn't have been wrong on a tactical level, if we set aside Diabolist. But it would have been a mistake on a strategic one. The longer it took us to put the rebels down, the higher the chances Procer would attack while half the legions were tied up around Liesse. The ogre wasn't high enough up the ranks to be in the know for that, though I'd wager she'd heard some rumours. They were cropping up often of late and I doubted it was a coincidence. The Empress, I suspected, was preparing public opinion for the wars to come. Even if she had a plan in the works that involved never fighting those at all. Malicia was not the kind of woman inclined to leave any of the angles uncovered. I had no intention of discussing any of that with the ogre, though, so I changed the subject.

"Fasili Mirembe," I said. "Your opinion on him?"

"Skilled," the legate immediately replied. "Clearly studied Legion doctrine in depth. He accurately gauged how long it would take the legions to deal with the wights set against them. His tactical judgement is solid as well. The Ankouans were the correct target for his ritual."

"Terror tactics," I murmured. "He was banking on a Callowan rout to win this."

"They have evidently made plans to limit your ability to act on the battlefield, ma'am," Hune said. "I am somewhat at a loss as to how they were fooled by a decoy."

"That was Thief," I said. "Keep quiet a Name's power and it can be hard to differentiate between them, from a distance. It won't work twice, but it shouldn't need to. Using wards against Masego is like trying to drown a fish."

"I confess a degree of wariness over how heavily we rely on Named for for our tactics," the ogre noted.

She sounded, I thought, almost like my teacher. Never rely on an artefact or a power for victory. They will always fail you. There is no such thing as being invincible, but lack of glaringly exploitable crutches will do wonders for your lifespan. There was truth in that, but the number of Named on my side was my main advantage. I would be a fool not to exploit it to the fullest.

"We'll meet him again in Liesse," I said, winding the conversation back to Lord Fasili.

"I would rank him as inferior to most Imperial generals, General Juniper among them," the ogre said. "Though battles are rarely so clear-cut as to allow such gaps in ability to be a deciding factor."

She was right about that. On open grounds with identical armies, it would change quite a bit. But in a massive pitched battle around Liesse? That was a different story. I had faith in the Hellhound, but I did not think she would be better at leading a traditional Wasteland army than an intelligent man who'd been raised to do that very thing. We still come out ahead by miles when it comes to experienced officers. They'll be dependent on magic to control the wights, and that'll make it hard to manoeuvre quickly. Juniper had been crafting a plan of attack for Liesse for quite some time now, refining and improving it every day. I would trust in her, as she trusted in me. I silently watched the legionaries piling up corpses all over the field, preparing the pyres that would be lit before nightfall. Wights broke after they were damaged enough, whatever sorcery animated them ceasing to function, but some of the corpses still struggled as they were dragged away. They would burn anyway.

"Do you think you're a good person, Hune?" I suddenly asked.

"That's a human way of looking at the world," the ogre said. "Drawing lines and saying that standing before or past them defines who you are."

"Then how do ogres think of it?" I said, glancing at her.

The legate smiled thinly, fat lips tightening in a line.

"We are what Creation lets us be," she said. "That we get to decide is the first and oldest lie."

"I was taught differently," I said.

"And how much control did you have over that?" she asked.

She shook her head before I could reply.

"I must return to my duties, Your Grace," she continued. "I leave you to your musings."

I inclined my head in dismissal, not eager to keep her around. I had another conversation ahead of me, after all. As she strode away I sought the six hundred and forty-nine remaining undead I had raised, a writhing bundle in the back of my mind. I could see through their eyes, guide their hands and feet, but there was... danger in that. There were too many, more than I could truly handle. Orders that were more thought than word could direct them as a pack, but if I went any deeper I was certain there would be consequences. A god, perhaps, would not have been troubled by those. But stealing one's mantle had not raised me to godhood: all it had done was allow me to claim some of that power as my own. Safety lay in shallowness. It was my instinct to release the dead from service now that the battle was over, but I thought twice of it. I'd proved in the past that I could go a great deal of damage by filling dead animals with munitions. Six hundred purely expendable troops were too useful of a tool to dismiss without good reason.

"I know you're around," I said.

Thief clucked her tongue, and appeared ahead of me. She was sitting on a dead man's back, though from this angle I could not tell whether it'd been one of mine or a wight. She pulled at a waterskin, looking somewhat ill.

"I'll never get used to the smell," Vivienne Dartwick said. "The reek clings to you, somehow."

"I thought the same after my first real battle," I said. "I barely notice it now, to tell you the truth."

Thief's answering smile was sharp.

"And that doesn't worry you?"

"Not only villains fight battles," I said. "Or have noses, for that matter."

She didn't press the subject, nor I had not expected her to. Talking with Vivienne, I thought, was much like sparring. All deft footwork and probing for weaknesses, a game where victory and defeat were ever moving targets for both players.

"A great victory," Thief drawled. "Should I offer you congratulations?"

"A skirmish," I said.

"Forty thousand men fought on this field," Vivienne said.

"Not even a third of either real armies," I said. "Minor parts of the whole. That makes it a skirmish, no matter how large of one."

"If this was just a skirmish," Vivienne said. "Then why did Diabolist risk her best general?"

My fingers clenched, then unclenched.

"I," I murmured, "have been wondering about the same thing."

Looking at all of this, there were parts that weren't adding up. I could generously assume that I'd lost five thousand men today. Diabolist, on the other hand, had lost twenty thousand. Even with the five thousand Southpooleans she would kill and raise, I'd come out of this round ahead by ten thousand souls. It wasn't a horrible trade, for her. The more troops I lost the fewer I had to assault her walls with. But she sent Fasili, and hundreds of mages. Knowing she could lose them. Akua never did anything with only one intention in mind.

"The wards they tried to pen me in with," Thief said. "I could have strolled out at any time. They weren't keyed to me, if you get my drift."

"You think she wanted to find out if she could put me in a box at will," I said.

"I'm no general," the dark-haired woman said. "But I get the impression that, army for army, she has you beat. What you've got over her is a bunch of Named, and arguably you're the most powerful of them."

I wasn't so sure of that, to be honest. When it came to killing single opponents, maybe, and Named in particular. But Hierophant could wipe a company from the face of Creation without losing his breath, these days. And Archer was, well... Hard to contain, for lack of better term. She was the living incarnation of the proverbial grain of sand in the machinery. Adjutant wasn't overwhelming by himself, but that wasn't his Role in the first place. He was supposed to empower another Named, and though he worked best with me he could serve that function with others as well.

"It would be reckless of her, to risk so many mages just to answer that question," I said.

"If you'd been stuck behind the wards," Thief said, "would this battle have been won?"

I grimaced. Maybe. But then, maybe not. And if Diabolist had wiped three legions and a contingent of the Fifteenth right before our last battle, well, there went my chances of taking Liesse. This campaign could survive the loss of the Ankou city guard. Fourteen thousand legionaries were another story.

"There's too much we don't know for sure," I finally said. "Guesswork and schemes are her bread and butter, we won't be coming out on top if we keep playing this her way."

Thief was silent for a long moment, staring at me.

"You want me to go to Liesse," she said.

I slowly nodded.

"Not to fight," I clarified. "But I need eyes in the city before attacking it. I've tried to seize the initiative repeatedly, Vivienne, but she's always been a step ahead of us."

"It won't be like my last visit there," Thief said. "She knows I'm part of your little band of miscreants. She will have measures in place."

"I know," I said quietly. "I'm asking anyway."

"This is the part," she said, "where you use your eloquence to talk me into this."

I looked up at the blue sky and smiled bitterly. I could manipulate her, I thought. I'd glimpsed levers to pull in our past conversations. I had a grasp on the kind of threats and pressures that would make her cave. But this, the urge to bend her to my will that I was feeling in my bones? That was how villains forged the same blade that'd kill them. I didn't know if that sharp instinct was from my Name or Winter, or more distressingly neither of them at all. But I would not give in to it.

"Do you think you're a good person, Vivienne?" I asked instead.

"Good is irrelevant," Thief said. "There are debts, paid and not. The rest is garnish."

"A hundred thousand Callowans," I said. "Killed and made servants. That, I think, may be the debt of our lifetime. Help me settle it. Please."

Vivienne said nothing at all, and drank from the water skin. She wiped her lips and chuckled darkly.

"I used to think there wouldn't be a need for idiotic heroics, on this side of the fence," she said. "How I miss that assumption."

I didn't push any further. It had, in the end, to be her decision. Anything else and there would be a cost, sooner or later. I do not want servants, I thought, the conversation I'd had with Hune on a hill still fresh in my mind. But some part of me whispered that kindness was as much a leash as fear, in its own way, and that what I wanted mattered a great deal less than what I actually did.

"Don't dawdle south," Thief said. "I'll be cautious, and retreat if the danger's too great."

"That's all I can ask," I said, and the matter was settled.

By nightfall, the pyres were burning. A hundred candles of cooking flesh in the night. Thief went north, to the enemy's lair. I had the three legions under General Istrid escort the Ankouans to our mustering grounds, and returned south with the remained of my men. To the Fifteenth, to Juniper and Hierophant and the plans that would make or break Callow.

And, I found out, to Black.

danh3107

And the master is reunited with his apprentice, interesting.

Edward Conway

YES!!!! 1st

good chapter man, bloody cliffhanger endings

*taborask*

how long has it been since they met in person?

*wirelessgrapes*

Oooh, "There will be measures in place?" Sounds like the beginning to a dramatic stealth sequence. I think the double chapter will be Thief sneaking into Liesse and whatever she finds inside.

Big Brother

Man, Black is gonna have a field day with this. But he is a Broken Machine, with each Cog's rotation grinding the Mechanisms beyond repair. His emotional are going to get the better of him on this field.

I give him to the final confrontation with Diabolist, with his end sparking the Frostfire of Cat's new Name, be it Black Knight or Black Queen.

*NZPIEFACE*

That name actually got me thinking, does King Arthur count as a Knight?

*boballab*

Yes. The King in Arthurian legend was a knight first and remember Arthur sat at the Round Table which was only for knights. We already have a lot of Arthurian imagery in this story: Avalon, The Lady of the Lake and if you notice she carries two swords which also appears in most Arthurian tales (The Sword of Rule that Arthur pulled from the stone and Excalibur given to him by the Lady of the Lake), Black has been a father to Cat in most ways and she is supposed to be fated to kill him and in Arthurian legend Mordred was Arthur's son and mortally wounds him at the battle of Camlan using the Sword of Rule. Be interesting if Ranger shows up with a special sword to give to Cat...

Letouriste

I have a lot more trust in black than you apparently^^
I don't think he will bit the dust anytime soon

ArkhCthuul

And we're back in black, yes. Baaaack in Blaaaack....
Now that was something...

Gunslinger

Black is back. Things should be interesting, especially considering he's supposed to be broken now.

Letouriste

Really? I didn't get that impression from the last chapter we seen him. only malicia comment said so and she probably try to separate cat and black so her sentence can not be trusted

Engineer

By the Gods Below EE, WHY DID YOU END THE CHAPTER THERE!? Now I have to wait till Next year to read that conversation. This must be what Hell is like. If it existed, you know.

LM

A late Merry Christmas to you! The last two weeks of chapters have been sport on, thank you for writing them.

And congratulations on finally passing Worm on topwebfiction!

Keyen

The passage on choices made me think of the Wheel of Time. "To Choose is our fate. If you have no choice, then you aren't a man at all. You are a puppet."

Very good chapter, once again, but Thief will be in a deeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeep shit.

Stephen R. Marsh

I've really enjoyed the Ogre mindset parts. They make a nice counterpoint.

Sniggs44

I really liked this chapter, largely because of the big philosophical conundrum it started with. Generals "sacrifice" (the term is a little loaded, but it kinda fits) soldiers in war as a matter of course – is what Cat did here fundamentally different from what IRL generals have done for thousands of years? My visceral response was a resounding yes, but I'm having a hard time putting my finger on why exactly I feel that way, which in my book is a sign that a good question was raised.

I guess I feel the way I do because there exists (I would hope...) an implicit contract between generals and the people they lead. Yeah they're going to be sent to die, but the person in charge will(/should) make every effort to minimize deaths in pursuance of the goal. My concern is that Cat was handed a super effective tool that basically trades this contract in favor of better odds at victory, and how she treats her soldiers (and/or approaches battles in general) from here on out may fundamentally change as a result. I see sending folks to die to take a beachhead or w/e as totally different than sending them to die because once they do they'll be fodder for a ritual that will itself take said beachhead. But like I said I'm not sure if this distinction really exists outside my knee-jerk intuition.

On the bright side, Killian should now be one step closer to evolving into her final form, assuming Cat isn't going to be inconsistent about the whole sacrifice dealy.

I'm leery about Thief's odds of success. IIRC it's been stated several times that the only Named that get a free pass when undertaking these kinds of infiltration (i.e. suicide) missions are heroes. Yeah, maybe Cat's side of the conflict is relatively heroic when compared to Diabolist's, but betting on tricking the narrative gods by being "technically heroic" doesn't strike me as a good plan.

And from a purely practical standpoint, sending a covert agent back into an enemy stronghold after they've been found out once already just seems like a really bad idea. Like, "returning to the scene of the crime" bad. Things like that become IRL tropes because they've lead to disaster often enough that they're just plain good rules of thumb to abide by, no narrative shenanigans needed.

The attacker/infiltrator has an advantage over the defender because it's fundamentally harder to defend – you've got to spread your people out, "waste" resources countering potential threats that may never materialize, and be downright smart enough to imagine all the possible vectors by which attacks could come in the first place. But once these things become known quantities the defender has a decided advantage in pretty much everything other than the "when". And if Thief is to Assassin as Squire is to Knight and Archer is to Ranger, then Vivienne is going to be way out of her league if Diabolist is ready for her.

Sending poor Thief into a fair fight...why Cat? Are you still salty over the Hakram incident?

Ashen Shugar

The idea I vaguely recall reading in one book, is that that good commanders don't send people out to die. They send them out to succeed at a mission. Some may die in the process, but the plan shouldn't assume they're all going to die. You make contingency plans sure, but you plan to win.

Though as with everything, nothing is 100% except the few things that are.

beleester

Being "technically heroic" has always worked for Cat so far, so I don't see a problem there. But good call on her having already visited the city once. I forgot about that.

I can definitely see Thief getting captured and then rescued when Cat confronts Heiress, that's a very traditional way for the infiltrator to rejoin the party. Usually comes with a quip along the lines of "Good news: I found Heiress!"

But on the other hand, it is about time that we finally find out what Heiress's evil plan is, so I'm betting that she'll instead come back as a stakes-raising moment. "Hey, I know you're all busy with the giant undead army, but I just found out that Heiress's Evil Superweapon of Doom will come online in exactly five minutes, so we've got to hurry."

Or perhaps succeed and then fail to escape, so that she can provide the critical information after she's been rescued.

MetruX

I kind of agree, but guys... She's not a covert, she's a Thief. She will enter, try not to be found, steal the info, and be gone. It will be hard? A lot. Heiress doesn't know if she will come, or what she really does, she just knows her Name, and that she is part of Cat's band, so she will have some measures in place, not perfect ones, but knowing her, lots of options. Still, this IS her role. She isn't a front-line fighter, neither a distraction or a helper... She's a Specialist, and her specialty is stealing. Have a little faith in the girl 😊

Taltos Dreamer

I thought Diabolist was testing her ability to sneak the special stew into use and then convert the enemy army into undead on the fly?

If Catherine hadn't raised them, I expected step 2 to be the enemy mages doing so.

Notwithstanding the whole "Legions of Terror, bolstered by the restless dead" thing, Squire's camp is all morally ambiguous, right? At least in the hero vs villain sense. Whereas Diabolist, like the Tyrant of Helike, is a cackling villain of the old school. And Thief has just undertake a suicide mission that puts her alone in an enemy camp, surrounded by, well, elite mooks. Doesn't the theory of narrative causality basically demand that this be a skin-of-our-teeth success for Thief?

H.

Yep. Squire can be the prequel-name to White Knight just as easily as Black. We know Thief can be part of a party of heroes, as can Ranger's apprentices. For all that's it's based off a Legions rank, there's nothing villainous about being an Adjutant, or about any of the aspects we've seen. Hierophant is, I think, a new Name, or at least an old or uncommon one.

The entire party is ambiguous and could easily be a heroic band. No Assassin, Black, or Warlock here. Especially when opposing an oldschool cackling villain like Diabolist.

Nairne .01

Hierophant is the opposite of a priestess (I believe it was said a few chapters before when he transitioned). A priestess asks for divine help and treats the power she is blessed with as a sacred thing not to be abused. The Hierophant literally does the opposite. He takes the miracle he sees and makes it an on-demand spell.

If we factor the Gods Above and Below into the sides of Good and Evil then just with Hierophant's addition to the party, it's dyed in the Evil colors.

stevenneiman

Thief is still Heroic enough to pull that off against someone as blatantly and totally Evil as Akua, Heirophant is a Name that I don't think CAN be defeated with the kinds of things that Akua knows how to do, Ranger is just really badass, Cat thrives on playing between the extremes of Good and Evil and coming out on top against both (recall the conversation about power), and Adjutant follows whatever Cat does. Between them, that's nobody that Akua is really well-suited to defeat with her cackling villainy.

Shequi

"If I cannot be kind or just, then I will at least be victorious."

I agree, I bet on Triumphant, second of her name.

With the irony ++ of Triumph being the third aspect of the Lone Swordsman.

Sooo... what we're establishing here is that Catherine doesn't give a fuck about anything aside from battlefield dick measuring contests?

Why is she the protagonist again instead of Thief or Hone or that older Ankouan lady?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

"The House of Light said men could be worse than devils, for devils were driven to Evil by their nature and not by choice"

The House of Light is wrong. People are products of our environment. People born rich love to look down on the people born poor who, as a result of their circumstances, do things like drugs and petty crime. But the truth is, those rich people aren't any better. Remember the Stanford Prison Experiment, among many others. We are, in very large part, who our circumstances make us.

danh3107

They aren't though, the act of "looking down on the people born poor" and the act of committing petty crime are by definition choices. You choose who you want to be, every time. Regardless of circumstances choice is never taken away. People who commit evil acts are making the choice to do so, I'm not saying they're actively choosing to /be/ evil as opposed to committing evil. As this story shows us people aren't truly black and white.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

No, sorry, but YOU would probably commit petty crimes or become a drug addict too if you were born into a bad situation. You're not any different from those people

danh3107

It'd be my choice still. Choice is never gone from the equation, I would choose to do those things and shape my life that way. Who said I was any different, we're all the same in that we have the ability to make choices, for every person born into a bad situation who chooses to not get out of it, there's another who works hard to get themselves out of it. Same for people in good situations. The quote you took offense to was merely explaining the fundamental truth that human beings have the power of choice, and that shapes our destiny.

MetruX

People are products of their environment is actually a part cut through without context, the same as Machiavelli's famous saying, the true meaning is not the same. The truth, as seen by modern psychology (damn, hard to hard those stuff in other languages...) is that you choose who you are, one choice at a time, each small choice making the final image, and that the younger the choice the stronger the image. BUT, which choices are given to you, and which you are more likely to follow, are environmental and genetical, in order. And, actually, it's more common for rich people to do drugs than poor ones, strangely enough.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

It sounds like we're on the same page mostly, but what does Machiavelli's satire have to do with this? Nothing he wrote in the Prince can be taken at face value, or at any value at all really, since it wasn't a serious book.

kaerie

Oh my goddddd I can't wait for the next chapter you're killing me here. It's very out of character for Black and Catherine to like run into each other's arms and hug but I so want them to do it. I need some father and daughter moments y'all. They've been through so much. So much that I have been rereading Book One to see Catherine and Black again.

But that won't probably happen. It's crazy but I feel like somehow Black will attack Catherine?

Or maybe you know, they just act chill.

Excited!!!

tkarantes

If I can offer some criticism?

This chapter's opening is the third or fourth time (maybe more) that we've seen Cat thinking about how she's not as decent a person as she thought. It's getting rather old, and seeing her come to the same realization over and over again without ever actually learning anything really does make her look stupid.

Chapter 55: Reunion

"The heart of succession is always murder. The new cannot grow where the old remains."

– Theodore Langman, Wizard of the West

Four Calamities had gone south, and Scribe with them, but only two awaited on the other side of the fairy gate. I'd not expected to see Assassin, but looking at Warlock and Black standing side by side my heart broke a little. It was the way they stood: slightly apart, as if they expected a larger person to be behind and leaning over their shoulders. Captain had left a gaping hole behind her in more ways than one. Out in the open our greetings were polite, friendly even, but distant for all that. None of us were inclined to emotional theatrics in front of so many watching eyes. Warlock made himself scarce without bothering to explain, hard eyes lingering on me even as his handsome face smiled without a speck of sincerity, and my teacher silently led me to a tent in the heart of the Fifteenth's camp. Before I even came in sight of it I could feel the wards pulsing, a least two dozen woven together that reeked of coiled and contained violence. Not Masego's work, this. There was a depth and sophistication to it Hierophant had yet to reach.

It was where my teacher had been sleeping, I saw with a start. The inside was sparse and austere, functional Legion furnishings surrounding a standard issue cot. A handful of scrying tools could be glimpsed in a corner, glinting softly in magelight, and the short folding table that stood to the side was flanked by two rickety stools. The second most powerful person in the Empire slept here, and I could have bought everything in the tent with a mere month's salary. I'd never been too inclined to luxuries myself, but Black took it a step further. The tent's flap closed behind us with a quiet swish, leaving the two of us standing in the soft sorcerous glow. I was taller than him now, I realized. By a little more than an inch. How long had it been, since we'd last seen each other? A year, or close. He was still pale in that way that was more corpselike than Callowan, all the life in him gathered into those eerie green eyes. Named did not get tired the way normal men did, did not feel that burden as acutely, but in the lines of his face I read something like exhaustion.

The silence stretched on for a long time, me looking at him and him looking at me. If we were different people, I thought, he would be embracing me. But that wasn't who we were, so instead his fingers fleetingly touched my shoulder, using the excuse of brushing off lint that did not exist, and I forced myself not to lean into the touch. Those were the lines we lived between, even now.

"I'm so sorry," I said, "about Sabah."

For what couldn't even have been the full span of a heartbeat something like raw anguish flickered across the man's face, before it was whisked away into the void.

"So am I," he said, and there was something almost tired in his voice. "So am I."

I couldn't remember moving but found myself on a stool as Black claimed his own, watching as he broke the clay seal over a roughly-hewn bottle. He poured himself a cup of the red liquor within, and looked askance at me. I nodded and was handed cup of my own.

"Those who leave are met again," he said quietly, the words cadenced and formulaic. "Be it Above or Below."

Our cups clinked dimly and we downed the drinks. It tasted like wine, I thought, if someone had dumped half a bottle of hard liquor in a bad red vintage. I kept myself from grimacing.

"What happened?" I asked. "Last I heard the situation south was under control."

He poured himself another cup.

"I have grown arrogant," he said, and it was not a recrimination so much as a statement of fact. "I was caught up in my own cleverness, convinced I understood the nature of the opposition. So blind a nascent Name escaped my attention, that I failed to realize I was facing perhaps the most dangerous opponent of my long career."

"The Wandering Bard," I said.

Almorava of Smyrna, though now she went by a different name and face. I'd thought her a nuisance and not a threat, when I'd fought against her, a meddler that could help along defeat but never cause it. It appeared I'd been very, very wrong about that.

"You will face her too, in time," Black said. "Do not make the same mistakes I did. No matter how powerful the heroes she will align herself with, she is the greatest threat among the opposition. If she is not contained, she will make you rue that failing."

I studied him silently. The Empress had called him a raw, bare nerve. I'd hoped that she was wrong, but there was a shadow in the man across from me that gave me pause. It wasn't the dark spiral of doubt and recriminations I knew best, but something... colder. As if he'd cut away the human parts of him, deemed them useless and to be set aside until the current messes could be fixed.

"It's all right to grieve her," I said. "I do, and I never knew her the way you did."

The dark-haired man's smile was mirthless.

"I will grieve her properly when affairs here allow it," he said. "There will be a funeral in Ater, in a few months. I expect you to be there."

I nodded slowly. He drank from his cup, fingers steady yet somehow fragile.

"I will have to tell her family," he said softly. "I haven't yet. It feels like less than her due to scry her husband for that conversation."

He closed his eyes, finished his drink and the sliver of vulnerability there'd been on his face was gone when the green stare returned.

"I've been spending the last few days reading reports," he said. "You've done well here, Catherine. There are few people that could have so deftly handled the fae."

"The Empress helped me clean up the mess," I replied honestly. "Couldn't have done it without her."

"Another pleasant development," he noted. "I was glad to hear of your cooperation. You will need to rely on her in the future, and she on you."

"You talk," I said, "like you're going to die."

He laughed cuttingly, but the edge did not feel like it was directed at me. Or at him. It was the laugh of a man who looked up at the Heavens with only contempt.

"Oh there's still a few years left in this hide, if I avoid the right mistakes," he said. "There will be dangers in facing Diabolist, to be sure, but I am aware of the stories I must sidestep."

Gods but I was glad to hear that. Because there was a picture that could be painted in Liesse, one that involved my mentor and my rival and the bloody succession that had been the way of villains since the First Dawn. I wasn't... Fuck, I knew Black was a risk. That as long as he lived there would always be limits to how far I could push things with the Tower. But I wasn't ready for him to die. I wasn't sure that I would ever be. It wasn't even just that I felt safer with him, the hazy memory of a warm cloak around my shoulders threaded with the bone-deep certainty there was not a line he wouldn't cross to keep me alive. I worried my lip. It'd been easy to tell Grandmaster Talbot that the monster in front of me was the closest thing I'd ever have to a father, when he was so very far away. It was harder to do it now that he was here with me. It would have been breaking a pane of glass we'd always been careful to keep there, even if sometimes our hands pressed against that divide close enough to feel the other's warmth. The hard girl with a distant father figure, I thought mockingly. When did I become such a hackneyed banality?

"Be careful," I said, voice rough. "You're still useful to me."

Something like a smile quirked his lips and he nodded. I poured myself another cup to avoid looking at him even if the liquor had tasted like bad decisions, and felt a sliver of gratitude when he changed the subject.

"Diabolist must be dealt with before summer's end," he said. "We had a conversation, you and I, while I was in the Free Cities. About changes that must be had in the Empire."

"I'm not sure the Empress will agree to the kind of changes I want," I said. "I've made promises, Black. I thought I had it under control, but..."

"In Dread Crowned," he said, lips curving around the name of the song my legionaries and thousands more had sung. "A lovely tune. Almost lovely enough one cannot hear the clamour for war under the words."

"I made a deal with her for the vicequeenship of Callow, like you said I should," I told him. "But the Wasteland is sick, Black. There's centuries of rot set in. We can't build anything that'll last without clearing it away first."

Because, much as I'd come to like Malicia, I could not help to think that our deal would not survive her. That all it took was a knife in the back by some ambitious High Lord and the armies would march, because the Empress was a creature of pragmatic reason but she was the exception and not the rule. If we were to really, truly make this work then the cabals of scheming highborn had to go. Or it was just a matter of time until another version of the coup in Laure took place, and we'd come too far now for that to lead to anything but rebellion. I hadn't forgotten it wasn't the Truebloods that'd made a grab for power in the capital, when I'd disappeared for a few months. It had been the Empress' own allies, supposedly mine as well. To trust men like them was like throwing tea in the sea and expecting it to turn brown.

"And so, summer's end," Black said calmly. "Procer will not begin their campaign in autumn, not if it means taking the risk of fighting through the winter in foreign lands. We will have until the first pangs of spring to do what must be done."

The tone had been serene, measured. Cold as the Winter running through my veins, and I was not ashamed to admit it scared me.

"And what exactly is that?" I asked.

"Praes," he said mildly, "will be purged. From Court to gutter. I will not allow knives to be bared at our back as we prepare for the greatest war the Empire has seen in half a millennium."

I looked into those pale green eyes and glimpsed the house of steel behind them, grinding wheels of steel that knew no pity or pause. There had been weight to those words.

"The Empress has already broken the Truebloods," I said. "Most of them call themselves the Moderates now, and the rest is on the run."

"Twenty years, I have kept my tongue as Alaya ruled Praes her way," Black said. "She has done much with that time. Won a civil war without ever mustering a single army, and so much more I could never have done in her place. But it is not enough."

His fingers clenched.

"I look west and I see the chosen daughter of the old ways, sitting atop a throne of death and sorcery in naked challenge to the Tower," he hissed. "I look east and I see the remains of the same fools that fought us decades ago, defeated but not yet defanged. Those that kneel may be spared, Catherine. There is still use for them. The rest will burn, and from those ashes we will fashion an Empire that can turn back Hasenbach's crusade."

Strange, how fear could make a moment grow crystal-clear.

"That means going against the Empress," I said. "Is that your intention? Rebellion?"

The cold intensity that had wrought the man's frame went out like a smothered candle and he passed a hand through his hair. It was, I thought, one of the most human gestures I'd ever seen him make. More than his power or his words, the complete control Black held himself with had always been what made him feel unearthly. That made it thrice I'd seen the control slip tonight. It had my stomach clenching.

"No," Black said. "Never that. Alaya rules. But she must understand that the time for long games is past. Praes now faces an existential threat. Compromise is no longer an option."

"And what happens to Callow, in that path of no compromise?" I asked.

"You have a crown," my teacher said. "Let us dispense with the bastard fig leaf that is putting vice in front of your title. Your people already call you the Black Queen, Catherine. Take Callow in hand. Deal out justice and authority as you see fit, so long as the kingdom is ready for war."

My blood thrummed. I'd heard that title whispered, by legionaries and sundry soldiers. I'd been very careful not to claim it though. There were implications to it that would undo some very delicate balances that had been struck. But if Black was going to break those anyway... I did not look forward to it, what it would mean to be queen. The tedious matters of statecraft, the never-ending petitions and burdens on my hours. But who else would I trust to take the throne? I would leave the ruling in hands better fit for it than mine. But I would wear the crown and command the armies. And when peace was finally bought by enough death, I would put down my sword and make ploughshare of it. Find a successor that had the talents of peace I so damnably lacked.

"They won't go quietly," I warned him. "The last of the old breed. There will be blood."

"They should have been put down like rabid dogs forty years ago," Black said coldly. "Their mages conscripted into the ranks, the rebel holdings confiscated and their treasuries used to raise additional legions. For centuries they have hoarded secrets and rituals to use as knives in their bids to power. Let those be used on our enemies instead: the days were dissent could be tolerated are over. All of Praes will fight for the Empire."

And whatever parts of it refuse will be destroyed, he did not say. He did not need to.

"You want to turn the Empire into a great war machine," I said. "And it's a tempting thing, I'll admit. Legions boots over ever smug highborn throat. But what happens to it, after the war? If you make a Praes that is all forges and army camps, then it's not going to put down the swords after we win. It'll start looking for another conquest."

I did not mention the possibility that, even after all that, we might still lose. There was no point in having that conversation at all. Except I'll have to take precautions, I thought. Prepare Callow for the possibility, so that it would survive the defeat. I missed Hakram like a godsdamned limb.

"I imagine I will be dead, by then," Black said. "But Alaya will rule, and you will have learned to do the same. The two of you can make the Empire what it should be. In this I have no regrets."

"Cut out that fucking talk," I sharply said. "You're not dying so easily. If you're helping me make this mess, you're helping me clean it afterwards. There's too much I don't know, Black. Too many gaps in need of filling."

He smiled, suddenly, and for the first time I'd seen him today he felt as young as he looked. His hand hesitantly extended over the table and patted my own before withdrawing. It felt awkward. I wished he'd kept it there longer.

"Do not try to become me," he said. "I was a tool that served a purpose, and that purpose is coming to an end. This Empire will outgrow me and so will you. To linger beyond that would be to become a crutch, and do disservice to us all."

"You don't get to quit halfway through," I said through gritted teeth.

I hated that my voice broke just a little.

"Oh, child," he said, almost tenderly, and took my hand in his. "Do not grieve this. You will surpass me, Catherine. I saw that in you the moment we first met, that glint in your eyes that was the best of me without the worst."

"This isn't about surpassing anyone," I hoarsely said.

"It always is," he whispered. "I will gracefully leave the stage, when the time comes, and leave it proud of what will come after me. I knew this to be the outcome the moment I began."

I squeezed his fingers and closed my eyes. No, I thought. This is just a story, Black.

And I'd already proved I could break those, if I was willing to pay the price.

Early chapters today, and a happy New Year to everyone!
Extra chapter is titled "Prodigy" and from the POV of a young Masego.
(<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/12/31/prodigy/>)

Komploding

Thank you, I truly enjoyed these, have a fantastic new year, make it the best!

Letouriste

Damn, I should have checked yesterday^^
Happy new year to you too

Unexpectedly Polite Cultist

Woe is me, that I have found the last of the published chapters on this day!

But I shall despair not. Your story has intrigued me deeply. Deeply enough that in three days I have burned through it. Oh, the highs and lows, the glory, the pitfalls of despair. Truly, a rodeo of emotion.

*Show me more.*

Naeddyr

Two excellent chapters to start a new year with! Thank you, and have a good one!

naturalnuke

Happy almost New Years!

Anna

Happy New Year, but damn, I'm practically in tears. I don't want Black to go, and this talk is unnerving:/

Euodiachloris

Um... Cat... Saving a Beloved Papa From an Existential Illness isn't really a Villain tale. 😞

desu

Depending of the ways, methods and consequences.

Byzantine

It's not like she's limited herself to those before.

Zourath

What are you talking about? That sort of thing is villain origin story 101. Ends justifies the means, do everything in their power to save/bring back friends or family, consequences and collateral damage be damned? Definitely villain territory. Those stories usually never end well for anyone though.

Euodiachloris

She's a little beyond the origin story use-by date. 😊 Even Daddy's Little Villain usually winds up with some annoying High Heal Face Turn arc if said Daddy needs help – because, never forget that the Heroes have the narrative pull Villains don't (especially with the Wandering Booze Cabinet on the case). I don't think putting up with the White Hats less ambiguous than Thief for six weeks of plot is really Cat's style. 😊

greatwyrmgold

Origin stories always end in tragedy, whether it's Batman losing his parents or Mr. Freeze never getting his wife back. That's why there are stories after their origin.

Keyen

It's okay, if Catherine doesn't want to deal with the paperwork, she doesn't have to get the crown. I'm sure Hakram would do a nice Black Queen too.

More seriously, i'm surprised that Black would go against Alaya this frankly (even if he doesn't want to rebel), and into the same direction than Cat concerning the Praes nobility.

So, I guess we won't see the combinaison, Black will die on Liesse and Cat will clean the Praesi mess alone.

Happy new year!

Nairne .01

"I'm sure Hakram would do a nice Black Queen too."

I laughed.

Anastas

I dunno, do you think Hakram has the gams for the requisite suggestive yet tasteful gowns?

ArkCthuul

Queen has the right song for her title.
Listen to it and you'll understand...OR Not.

Aside from that, she could always bring him back as a vampire or something...would fit the villain theme, his looks, and be horrible enough..;)

soonnanandnaanssoon

Happy New Year!

Nehemiah Newell

The interlude was sort of sweet, kids being kids. The chapter was sad and worrying, which I'm pretty sure is the intention. How exactly is Cat planning on breaking that story, I wonder.

Sniggs44

So if I'm not reading too deeply into things, it looks like Black's "broken machine" illness is going to manifest itself as his self control eroding, and him deciding on actions based less on logic and more on emotion.

His stated plan to wipe out the Truebloods seems reminiscent of bucket list talk...like he's basically saying fuck it, and doing what he's always wanted to do despite how consequences may tip such an action into net loss territory. Is it that he doesn't care as much about the consequences? Or is the machine so broken that he's no longer able to evaluate situations with pure logic and find/pursue the optimal solutions? His instability ultimately sparking a civil war with the Empress would be an outcome Bard would love, I'd imagine.

I liked the overall tone of chapter, it was quite emotional. Reminded me of dealing with family members with terminal illnesses, in a way. Though there may be disastrous consequences if Cat ends up going through the classical stages of grief as a response to Black's situation. She's kinda in denial right now, which isn't too bad, but there are some pretty scary implications for what someone in the bargaining stage would be capable of in this sort of universe. Devils with which to make deals actually exist, for one.

Shequi

It's more that he sees the need for the Short-Term Gain, even if there's a Long-Term Pain.

vuthuha912

What good are mages going to do if they were kept in a safe and used to backstab you at your weakest moment? The nobility, even the ones on Malicia's side, is too treacherous. Remember, two c*nts on the Ruling Councils who butchered the chance to create goodwill and cooperation between Praes and Callow. During the war, high lords could hold back on the support, keep their force intact, let our people die then overthrow us after the Crusade was over. Does matter that it will likely weaken Praes? What goods is Praes if it wasn't under their feet?

They may even sell their leader out to Procer and happily accept their new Procer's overlord then secretly plan to backstab them and take the country back later. As long as their position at the top remains, Praes can burn to the ground for all they care. They will help Praes recover to a suitable degree and then enjoy the benefits. It is very common for real-world nobles to do something like that. Chinese history is littered with plays like that.

Praes as a culture is sick to the core. It actively hindered cooperation, order, trust, and unity. They are the cornerstone of any long-lasting empire. That is why Black is going to fail in his mission to better Praes. Too many elements are working against him and too few allies who share his views. The Praesi don't understand him, Callowan don't care about Praesi. He is too lenient on the high lords. You give them 40 years to change sides and provide them with food, and money, even write political pamphlets explaining your long-term plans for the country which will benefit everyone. If they want to change, they would already have. The only thing they ever see is the chance to gain more at the expense of everybody else.

Even with the Crusade coming, they still want to fuck around with their own buffer state. My gosh, can you even be more inept?

The fight is about survival and a chance for Praes to permanently escape the starvation cycle. It needs to succeed or thing is going to return to the day of stealing weather, turning the entire country into a wasteland and human-sacrificed to keep everyone fed.

danh3107

It's like he's got Alzheimers or something, the person you know is there but hidden...

Also, I wonder if one of Sabah's kids will become the new cursed.

Shequi

Wait, won't Sabah's family already know she's dead? After all, the Curse was explicitly described as a "Bloodline Curse" way back in the extra chapter "Beast".

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/12/07/beast/>

"She's not a lycanthrope," ((Wekesa)) said. "As far as I can tell, a Warlock put a curse on her bloodline a few centuries back. And this, kids, is why you put an escapement when you cast a blood ritual."

This would mean that one of Sabah's children has become The Cursed, and could mean some horrible things for the rest of the family...

B

I don't think her children will. Remember, she wasn't just cursed, she was the Cursed. It was a Name that was passed along bloodlines. However, she probably broke that name by killing a small god and gaining the control necessary to change her Name to the Captain.

If nothing else, she's had decades for Warlock to magic up a way to keep the curse from spreading to her children.

H.

If there **must** be a Cursed, then shouldn't it have moved on when she became Captain? I don't think she was carrying the curse anymore, even if she could still draw on the transformation.

At least, I hope that's the case, because her kid might struggle to find another old Orc god to kill.

Ward

Thanks for the chapter 😊

alegio

I REALLY hope that black will survive. He is probably one of my favorite characters ever, but as the story goes on its extremely unlikely. 😞

Happy nice year and thanks for everything!

Engineer

*clears throat and wipes eye (what? I had dust in them)*

So, uh, argh, anyway, uh did Cat just enter the beginning phases of a transition or what?

Gunslinger

Happy new Year everyone. And extra special wishes to erraticerrata for giving us not one but 2 chapters on New year's eve.

By the way we're only ~ a 100 dollars short of getting 3 CHAPTERS A WEEK. If you would be interested in helping speed that up you could consider supporting the author on patreon at <https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

kaerie

Oh my goddddddd I need more Daddy Black

Engineer

I wonder what those consequences will be...

I wonder how Black will deal with the Calamities.

I wonder why the Sovereign of the Red Skies is so pissed off at Cat.

Dramatic Tension is on point.

Now I am waiting for the Father-Daughter tag team bonanza. Ubua The Diabolist, oh you done fucked up now...

Shawn Panzegraf

I don't think Black is as unthinking about this as some might think. Remember, when he and Cat had their scrying conversation after she created the Knightly Order, Black was already talking about cleaning house with fire and sword in Praes when he returned.

I think Sabah's loss has simply made him hyper-aware that his time is running out, and he can't keep delaying doing what he knows what needs to be done because it will tweak Alaya's loss-of-control neurosis acquired during her time as abused object in the previous Dread Emperor's seraglio.

The other thing: Black has been maneuvering to leave Malicia no choice but to treat with Cat as a partner rather than an elite minion. He knows that Malicia has been saved from the fate of countless Dread Emperors/Empresses before her by her peer-partner relationship with him, and he knows Malicia's nature is untenable without a peer of a more knock head to solve problems mentality.

Malicia likes to believe every problem has a chessboard solution. Many do...but the critical problem is that every so often a problem crops up that APPEARS like you can solve it with clever maneuvering...when just going out and cutting its head off is really the better solution. Now, faced with a problem that gives every indication it can be overcome EITHER by Malicia's favored tactics, or Black's...without Black around, which option do you think Malicia would choose?

I also believe that Black is trying to make good on the essence of the promise he made Cat. That if she doesn't break, and doesn't shy away from doing what's needful to fight fate and make things turn out for Callow the way Cat wants, that she'll have the tools to keep Malicia from deciding to prioritize Praes over Callow at some point and screw Callow over. Black knows that kind of move leads back to pre-Conquest madness. Best to avoid the problem by keeping that temptation away from Malicia.

knockoffnikolai

Registering a guess: based on thematics, and Cat's whole "slippery slope to evil" thing, I think that Black is going to die, and that the end of Cat's journey to the dark side will be marked by her taking up the mantle of Black Knight.

Keyen

Honestly, it would be too conventional. I think the way Black will die will make Cat understand what Vivienne said to William in Book 2:

"Here's the thing about Evil, though – they've used those methods for a lot longer than you. They're better at them. If you want to make a better world, maybe you should act like someone who deserves to live in it."

I think the way Black will die will break the link between Catherine and Malicia (Maybe because she could avoid the whole mess), and thus, Cat will forsake the Dark Path and embrace the Chaotic Neutral.

Shequi

Well, drinking has often been this Series motif for descent into evil, and Black is now onto (badly) fortified wine. It's only so long before he's drinking spirits at breakfast.

Blue

There is no way Malicia hasn't planned for this. That's why she preemptively talked to Cat and Cat is already wary about how Black is approaching this. Black and Malicia are both right. Cat just needs to find a way to feed the Praesi to the First Prince and solve it that way.

quaelegit

I'm just reading this story for the first time now so no idea what happens after this chapter but you just gave me a hilarious/terrifyingly stupid idea: Cat can route the Tenth Crusade through Arcadia to Praes directly so Callow doesn't become the fighting grounds!

WhoEvenKnows

I wonder how many more instances of hardening Catherine needs before she realises the depth of her hypocrisy and allows Kilian to have her full power.

Ward

Love from a dumb

stevenneiman

Nothing in there that was actually a surprise, but you sure know how to craft a heavy moment, EE. I doubt that Cat will be able to save Black in the long run, but I just hope he gets to have an awesome moment as he does leave the stage.

glassgirlceci

"Our cups clinked dimly and we downed the drinks. It tasted like wine, I thought, if someone had dumped half a bottle of hard liquor in a bad red vintage. I kept myself from grimacing."

I just reread this chapter, after having read through the rest of the story so far. And the rest of the story so far includes Amadeus and Alaya drinking terrible, awful wine from Alaya's home because of it's sentimental value. And I just realized that this must be that wine. Amadeus is drinking this wine because it feels like home and he needs the comfort after losing his friend.

Oh fuck I'm gonna cry. Yup. I'm crying now.

Monadologist

Damn it. Now I'm crying.

morroian

Posting from 2022 reading this for the first time I liked the chapter but it made me more annoyed that we didn't get more of what actually happened to Sabah.

vuthuha912

Oh, Black is really going to have to choose between his friends and his country, isn't it? Malicia or Praes. The Trueblood can't stay. They are too selfish and dangerous. They said that immoral people are dangerous but smart immoral people are even more stupid. Black cares for Praes and he has been fostering patriotism in the military. Yet, the upper crust of Praes still misses the lesson. Well, 40 years is a long time to change your mind. If it is still not enough then it might never be enough. Time to cut the rope.

If people say that Malicia is going to go crazy after he dies, he might reconsider. Or, he can argue that Malicia is too smart to let grief consume her.

*sigh* Amadeus, Amadeus – the love of god, you really don't get it don't you. Love is why Malicia works with you. Love is what keeps the Calamities. You are not a tool to any of them – you are someone that they love dearly. Emotions always get in the way. We can't help it. We are human after all.

Chapter 56: Recess

"And on your grave we shall have inscribed: he was witty all the way into the tiger pit."

– Dread Emperor Vindictive

Nauk had a whole tent to himself, unlike the rest of our wounded remaining with the host. Unconscious or not he kept his rank. His Senior Tribune had been temporarily granted full legate authority, but no one had ever dared to talk of actual promotion in front of me. All those that could speak of the matter knew me better than that. There was no lit candle inside, but that hadn't made a difference to me in years. I dragged the lone stool in the corner across the dirt and sat on it, eyes stuck on the orc's inanimate form. His breath still rose and fell faintly and the wounds had begun to heal, but there was nothing pretty about it. His left eye was gone, taken by Summer flame along with ear and cheek and a chunk of his dark hair. It looked like a bonfire had devoured half his face, and though the burns were no longer a horror of charred skin they had scabbed green and peeling. This, I knew, he would be able to live with. That kind of scarring was almost a point of honour to orcs. My eyes shifted to the side and lingered on the stump that ended at his shoulder. The loss of his fighting arm would be harder blow.

Prosthetics could be made, I knew. The Warlock had made a hand for Hakram, after Summerholm, and I did not doubt Masego would be able to make something even more functional now that he had transitioned into Hierophant. But Nauk would forever be a cripple in the eyes of his own, without a Name to make up for his defect. There was much to love in orcs, be it the bone-deep loyalty or the fierceness in the face of peril, but the Clans were not known to be kind to failures – and that was what they would call him for this, I had no doubt.

“I never should have taken you into that fight,” I murmured, brushing back an errant strand of hair. “Neither you nor the Gallowborne. It was arrogant, to think I was powerful to keep you alive.”

I was, in the end, a villain. My power was not meant to be a shield for those I loved. All I can do is kill the enemy before they kill you, I thought. But that too would fail in time, like Black had failed Captain. Death could only be cheated for so long no matter how cunning and ruthless and strong you thought you were.

“I’ve been told Pickler visits you every night, after her hours are done,” I told the orc. “The others came too, even Robber. You haven’t been forgotten.”

There were no wards around the tent but there were guards, and when I heard them give way without comment my mind ran down the list of the few people with that authority. Wouldn’t be Juniper or any of the general staff – most of them had ordered a bonfire made away from prying eyes and begun showing up with bottles when Evening Bell rang. I meant to join them, eventually, but I’d come to visit my mistake first. Not Black, either. He’d been scrying generals and court officials all day, and likely would continue until we left for Liesse. That left only three. Hakram, but the approaching steps were too light. Archer wouldn’t have come here at all. And that meant...

“Lord Warlock,” I said calmly, hand withdrawing from Nauk’s forehead.

The Sovereign of the Red Skies was no more bothered by the darkness than me. He strolled casually to my legate’s side, leaving the body between us, and frowned at the unconscious orc. I studied the villain in silence, eyes tracing the sculpted face and fit form that was made plain by his tailored tunic. There’d always been traces of silver in the man's short hair, and salt as well as pepper in his beard, but I fancied I saw a little more of both now. He was still, I thought, perhaps one of the most handsome men I'd ever seen. An older man, certainly, but that only added to the allure: there was nothing boyish about him at all. The admission was set aside earlier than it used to be, the way I could dismiss Akua's looks. Some part of me considered the Warlock an enemy, and enemies were not to be blushed over. He did not reply to my greeting, or call on sorcery. All he did was stand there and look.

"I'm sorry," I said. "About Sabah."

Dark eyes finally turned to me.

"Your sympathy is a shallow thing of little meaning, Squire," he replied. "You knew her for scarcely three years, perhaps a month in all of shared presence. Your grief is pale imitation of ours."

"And yet I still grieve her," I said.

His face twitched, sorrow and hatred mingled. In my veins Winter flowed, the darkness in the room thickening. My mantle craved the strife like a parched man craved water.

"She was always the best of us," Warlock said. "All she wanted was for us to be alive and happy. It made her so very easy to love."

I did not reply. Tread lightly here, Catherine. Winter had caught the scent of war, and in this it is so very rarely wrong. The tall man continued to watch me, the silence growing tenser every heartbeat.

"I am trying," the Sovereign of the Red Skies said, "to think of a reason not to kill you right here and now."

"You might not find that so easily achieved," I calmly replied.

I'd come too far to flinch in the face of even a man like this. A slow smirk split the Soninke's face.

"You speak to me of trouble when your soul is one spell away from turning on itself," he said. "Proud little Squire, having learned all the wrong lessons. Did you really think a mantle was so easily claimed? That there would not be consequences to usurping a demigod?"

My eyes flicked to Nauk's silent form.

"I am sharply aware of my limitations," I said.

"You are an altar raised to your own ambition, child, and the foundations are shaking," he jeered. "You have lied and murdered your way through affairs beyond your understanding. Can you even still suffer the touch of cold iron?"

He laughed sharply, teeth like ivory showing in the dark.

"Perhaps it is too early for that still," he said. "But thresholds must already be growing difficult, yes? Wards stand stone where they were once parchment, your power mercurial where it was once firmly grasped. You are not more than human, Catherine Foundling, merely other."

My fingers twitched, hidden under Nauk's cot by the angle. I felt like reaching for my sword even as the words winded their way into my head. There was an unfortunate stench of truth about them. The edges being turned on me did not cut deep, but my patience was running thin in the face of a berating I had not earned. Or, at the very least, not from him.

"You once warned me about lines I shouldn't cross," I coldly said. "I've kept to those terms. And yet here you are, knife on your fucking tongue. Act like even half the man you pretend to be, Warlock."

Power flooded the tent. Not as a spell or an attack – the Sovereign of the Red Skies had simply ceased hiding the sorcery always roiling inside him. Just by standing there, just by being, he was a storm made flesh. My Name's hackles rose in answer, frost touching my shoulders and my shadow deepening into an endless pit. I stood in front of Hashmallim unbowed, Wastelander. You will not scare me into lowering my head with cheap theatrics.

"Lines," the Warlock hissed. "You dare speak to me of lines when just by existing you bring death to Amadeus? You stand before me reeking of bargain incomplete, a thing stitched together by blood and ignorance, and pretend you are safe for even a single soul in this wretched world?"

Something bubbled up inside me, and against my will a laugh escaped my lips.

"You blustering fucking hypocrite," I said. "Who are you to cast stones, Sovereign? You're more abattoir than man. Have you ever accomplished a single damned thing by means other than cutting up men? All I can put to your name is death and horror. I have been civil because Masego is family and for some godforsaken reason Black forgives what you are, but do not mistake that for fear, not for a single moment. You think your record cows me? I've bled for it, Warlock, but I have beaten gods. All you are is an aging bag of curses."

The cloth of the tent around us withered until it was threadbare and blackened, Winter baring its fangs through my open snarl. The Warlock's eyes dilated, red bleeding into them as the smell of brimstone spread through cold air.

"Hye should have killed you when she had the chance," he said. "He would have forgiven her, eventually. Damn her for having looked only at the hunt."

My fingers clasped around the hilt of my sword.

"Talk is meaningless," I said. "Either act or shut the Hells up."

The Soninke's shoulders twitched and for a moment I thought it would come to violence, my sword already halfway out the scabbard, but in the end the monster stayed his hand.

"My son asked for the life of this tin soldier of yours," he said, tone emotionless. "Have it back, and count the debt of protecting Masego through his transition paid. Watch your step, Squire. If slaying you keeps him alive, you will not live to see winter."

I forced myself to leave, because if I stayed there would be blood. Terror was writ plain on the faces of the two legionaries standing guard outside, and any notion they hadn't heard the argument was dead the moment I glimpsed it. My sword slid back fully into the sheath and I took a deep breath, wrestling down fury I knew to be not entirely my own. My temper was worsening. Like all the rest, I thought darkly.

"Everything you heard here is under the Tower's seal," I told the guards.

I lingered long enough to receive stammering assurances from them, then left. Part of me wanted nothing with the bonfire and comrades awaiting, but disappearing into my tent to stew over this wasn't going to improve anything about my night. Even if the mood was gone, I would show up. Other, the Warlock had called me. Other than human. Maybe I needed all the company I could get.

"You're having another," Hakram bluntly ordered. "It's a little early for morning dew, so I can hazard a guess why you have wet shoulders."

I grimaced but offered up my cup to the orc.

"Could we at least drink something that doesn't taste of burnt orange?" I complained.

I got a few smiles for that, though no laughter. No one was quite drunk enough yet to have reached that place where everything was funny.

"Dhahab is an acquired taste," Aisha conceded.

"Acquired is the right word," Ratface drawled. "That bottle is worth twice its weight in gold."

There were ten of us around the crackling flames, and though some of the faces had changed it had reminded me so much of evenings in the War College that I'd ached. Simpler times, though back then they'd felt anything but. These days whatever didn't involve half a river's worth of blood felt innocent.

"They served this at receptions in Ater," Masego noted. "Though it tasted different then."

"Milkweed extract," Aisha explained, her cheeks rosy. "It's the traditional paired poison."

My Taghreb staff tribune had begun hitting the bottle early tonight and already abandoned the flat stone that had been her seat in favour of lying against the large trunk we were using as a bench. Having traded a cotton shirt and slender trousers for her usual uniform, I got a good glimpse of why Ratface had been stuck on her for so long every time she stretched. The toned curves were hard to notice under the aketon, but now they were in full display. I didn't allow my eyes to linger, though, and the reason why spoke up right after.

"We're roughing it like proper peasants, then," Kilian smiled, cheeks dimpling. "How appropriate."

I expected Archer to make something out of that, but when I looked she was busy trying to discreetly tie Masego's braids in a knot. He kept slapping away her hands, so evidently not a great success.

"Frosted another table talking with Kegan?" Juniper asked, seizing Aisha's cup and watering down her liquor even as she pouted.

"I wish," I grunted. "Got into an argument with the Warlock."

"Were you asking about his s-" Robber started, but Pickler pushed him off his seat with the ease of long practice.

It did not escape my notice he half-leaned into the touch before allowing himself to be toppled. That infatuation had yet to disappear, then.

"Really?" Masego said, coil of lightning forming around his finger just in time for him to shock away Archer from her latest attempt with a flick. "Father doesn't lose his temper often. As far as I know, the last argument he got into was before I was born."

I raised an eyebrow.

"Huh," I eloquently said, nursing the liquor. "Who with?"

I wasn't actually all that curious, but steering the talk away from the fact that I'd drawn steel on one of the Calamities in the middle of my own war camp seemed a solid notion. Even if he'd been fucking asking for it.

"Uncle Amadeus," Masego said. "Uncle wanted him to open an academy for mages, after the Conquest."

"There already is," Ratface pointed out. "There's a track for mages at the College."

Hierophant rolled his glass eyes under the cloth.

"A real academy," he said. "He refused, of course. Father had no interest in teaching squalling Wasteland brats."

"The War College has a limited curriculum, it's true," Pickler said, and I noticed a subtle slur to her words. "The Eyries have entire volumes on engineering and alchemy that will never see light of day."

"The spell scrolls at the College are very narrow in scope," Kilian agreed. "And all the more sophisticated treatises are theory, not practical."

"Praesi hoard spells like dragons do gold," Juniper said. "That's always been the way."

I downed the rest of dhahab and reached for an open bottle of wine before Hakram could fill my cup with that sin against tastebuds a third time. I poured too quick, red spilling over the rim, and unthinkingly licked my fingers clean. Feeling eyes on me I turned, and found Kilian watching. I cleared my throat, in a hurry for a distraction.

"That may change," I said. "I've had a talk with Black."

There was a heartbeat of silence, my teacher's name falling like a shroud on the previously light mood.

"Lord Black," Juniper insisted, breaking the silence.

I snorted into my cup and saw a few smiles bloom. I hesitated to call anything about the Hellhound girlish, but the way she got so coquettishly proper about Black came pretty close.

"I call him sir about once a year, that should be enough formality to meet the quota," I said. "Regardless, there's going to be changes in the Wasteland after we clean up the Sahelian mess."

Stillness hung in the air like fog, the fire crackling loudly around us. The quiet was pregnant with words none of us dared say.

"That sounds like murder talk," Archer cheerfully said. "Doesn't that sound like murder talk?"

"It does," Robber said, grinning hungrily in the dark. "And with official sanction, no less. That is going to be a ride."

Hakram cleared his throat.

"Enough blade-talk for he night," Adjutant announced. "War will still be looming tomorrow, but then we'll have to be sober."

"Cheers to that," I said, raising my cup.

"A toast," Ratface shouted. "To liquor, obtained by entirely legal means!"

"To victory, fickle bitch that she is," Aisha added just as loudly.

She handed her cup to Juniper long enough to pass the bottle to Pickler, never noticing that the orc poured half of it to the ground.

"To stabbing Diabolist in the face," Archer said. "Like, at least twice."

"To claiming her personal possessions afterwards," Masego contributed.

"If you keep that up, warlock's get, I'll have to adopt you into my tribe," Robber said, placing his hand over his heart.

"That's illegal, they'll have you killed," Pickler noted.

"Then I'll make my own tribe," Robber said.

"Also illegal, will also get you killed," Pickler replied without missing a beat.

"Boss," Robber said, turning to me, "you need to make your own tribe so I can abuse that power most sorely."

My brows rose.

"Congratulations, Special Tribune Robber," I ceremoniously said. "You are the first and only member of the Lesser Lesser Footrest Tribe, by my authority as Vicefuckingqueen of Callow."

"You said I'd go back to just lesser if I behaved," the goblin whined.

"Which you did not," Pickler said, sounding amused.

"Goblins," Juniper sighed, then raised her cup. "To the Fifteenth."

"Boring," Archer catcalled from the side, obnoxiously drawing out the word.

"To making it this far," Kilian said, bringing up her cup before a squabble could erupt.

"To us," Hakram said, and with that sentimental finish we all drank.

The drinks kept flowing after that, and as the hours passed the stillness returned bearing staid tiredness instead of nervous anticipation. We did not speak of plans or war or the deaths to come, however close they may be. We talked like the friends I'd wished to have, back at the orphanage, and that I had found in this strange place along that winding path my life had taken. That the path also took me to dark and ugly places, I could not deny, but once in a while it led to golden nights like this as well – and they almost made up for the rest. When talk finally died down half my friends were asleep, Aisha draped over Juniper's side and softly snoring as the general fondly looked down at her. Hierophant was having a quiet conversation with Pickler as Robber interjected less than helpfully, Archer passed out over the mage's lap. For all that they bickered constantly, it had become plain for anyone to see how close the two of them were. He'd tightened her cloak around her shoulders, earlier, gentle in a way I'd never Masego be with anything but books. I was gazing at the scene, something between happiness and contentment having found me, when Hakram nudged my rib. He inclined his head to the side and I followed the direction, finding Kilian worrying her lip. She rose when she noticed my gaze and I closed my eyes. An overdue conversation, this. I rose to my feet as well, clapping Adjutant on the shoulder, and offered the redhead my arm.

"Let's go for a walk," I whispered.

>"Congratulations, Special Tribune Robber," I ceremoniously said. "You are the first and only member of the Lesser Lesser Footrest Tribe, by my authority as Vicefuckingqueen of Callow."

Why do I feel like this is a statement with consequences that will come back to bit her later?

Ward

It's the gun on the wall.

naturalnuke

Chekhov is that you?

callmesteve

And you have no idea how much I look forward to it.
And who bets the Nauk gets a Name too?

greatwyrmgold

Because Robber is exactly the kind of person who'd keep that detail in mind in case it let him complain at senior officers better, and approximately the kind who'd find some way to use it to get his boss out of a pinch. Also because Catherine is sitting on permission to, IIRC, start a goblin tribe.

JC

Confirmation that Hye is alive. Nice.

Warlock's words are really interesting. Hopefully Catherine can (once again) subvert her way to victory before she is locked in to any one story or other. I wonder if her being tied down to the fae was a ploy by the Wandering Bard, as if to shackle Black's legacy of stirring the narrative pot and to force it to obey convention.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Was Ranger's status of "still alive" in doubt somehow? I don't remember there being a question about it

Ninith settler

I mean, she did fight a God

Rey d`Tutto

And that was Tuesday for Ranger

Gunslinger

Umm wow, Warlock is scary as fuck, but Cat did well to call him on his hypocrisy. I wasn't entirely convinced about the reasons for his anger. Why is he still so sure Cat will kill Black? His own son transitioned without having to kill him after all.

The Killian talk is long overdue and Cat will have to own up to her own hypocrisy regarding the sacrifices.

Ohh and do vote for the Guide on topwebfiction <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>.

Engineer

Probably because to Warlock, it seems that Black is forcing the bloody succession story. He's still raw over Sabah's death and here he sees that his oldest and best friend is soon to die to. That would make anyone be a little on edge.

taborask

Maybe, but his hate for her seemed to be really personal – as if it was her fault. For example why did he threaten her over Masego's life? She's never given Warlock any reason to think she'd be a threat to Hierophant, it seems like there's a story going on that's forcing them into conflict over very tenuous reasons.

Nguyen Hong Hai

It looks more like Papa Warlock gets defensive here since there's a good chance Masego will be killed if he hang out with Cat.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Warlock was acting completely irrationally here, and that doesn't make sense. Why would he lash out at a target like Cat? The catalyst for this is obviously Sabah's death, but that's not a REASON. There's something else, and I feel like we don't have enough information to understand. I hope this will be cleared up Monday

Zach

Squires succeeding Black Knights by killing them is apparently A Thing that almost always happens, so it's not entirely unreasonable for Warlock to view Cat as being the person who is very likely to murder Amadeus at some point.

IDKWhoitis

I think Warlock is angry at Cat for what she represents in the meta-narrative. She may not kill him with her own hands, but she is adding weight for the universe to kill Black.

Also, Warlock is in a very, very, agitated state. He's as sensitive and enraged as Black is, but doesn't have the cold machine like personality that Black has adopted following Captain's death. Add that to the fact that Cat has a damned combative attitude, willing to argue with gods and monsters.

Ward

Because squire traditionally transforms into either black or white knight and since she isn't a hero she should become the new black. Traditionally being the key here.

boballab

His son didn't transition into the new Warlock, which would have meant the old Warlock had expired. By the rules of the Named, The Squire is fated to kill The Black Knight to become the new Black Knight, just like how Amadeus killed the previous Black Knight when he was the Squire.

Also in the scary as fuck scale Warlock doesn't even crack the Top 5 Catherine has faced and in a couple of cases beat.

1. An Angel that Catherine beat with her wits to be reborn.
2. The Summer Court including the Queen which are Demi Gods and in the Queens case basically a God, through wits and combat.
3. Hye, The Lady of the Lake, The Ranger. Of the Calamities she is far and away the most deadly and scariest and Cat for about 30 secs stood up to her and almost lost her head for it. Hye could kill Warlock and it wouldn't be that much of a challenge to her after fighting immortal being such as the Undead King and the Courts.
4. The Empress. She doesn't seem that scary but keep in mind if she wanted Warlock dead, he would probably be dead and he would never see it coming. For all of his intelligence the Warlock has a big blind spot when it comes to scheming and planning which is the Empresses wheelhouse. Also remember she knew what Cat was going to do even before Cat did, if Cat ever sits on the Praesi Throne it will be because Malicia plotted her own overthrow and picked her.
5. Black himself. There was and is a reason that Black lead the Calamities even though his actual power was less than the other four, Without him all but Hye would have died long ago because they would fall back into the rut their Name and Roles provide to them. If Warlock thinks to go after Cat, more than likely Black will have Assassin kill him because he will not let Warlock ruin the goal of getting Cat prepared for Procer, especially since doing so would mean Captians death would have been in vain.

Right now Warlock is letting his emotions run away with him and start righting checks his ass can't cash, if he doesn't watch out the last thing he will see before he dies is Cat standing over him sword in hand and him realizing just how she is making the gods bow down.

Ben

Amadeus didn't kill the previous Black Knight, and I don't think the Squire is fated to kill either of the knights—but she is fated to succeed them, so I guess her existence is like a constant tug on the narrative towards a story where one of the knights dies, and no one in the story right now sees that being the White Knight.

NZPIEFACE

Except... The old Black Knight was dead when Black claimed Squire.

Engineer

All points are valid save 5. I don't think Assassin would agree to that. He'd be putting down a fellow member of his band.

More likely Black would get Hye to do the job. Of all the Calamities she strikes me as the one who would and could do that relatively easily.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

No, Cat is absolutely NOT fated to kill the Black Knight. Black took pains to ensure this in book one. He explains it explicitly not long after they meet

ArkhCthuul

I agree.

But he still came across really scary, just not on the Cat scale 😊

Anastas

He's so sure Cat will kill Black because she WILL, directly or indirectly. That's the way the Story goes. Our wide-eyed Squire is discovered by their White/Black Knight, (s)he trains under him/her, grows to love (for Heroes)/hate (for Villains) their mentor, then the Knight gets killed by a Villain (heroes) or by the Squire him/herself, thus providing the motivation to step up to the plate and continue their master's work.

True, Cat probably isn't going to kill Black herself, but there IS a climactic battle approaching right as the beloved mentor approaches, which is the perfect time for Fate to cause some confusion or a dramatic twist that ends with Black's blood on her blade, and even if they manage to avoid that, that just means Fate gets to switch to the lesser-used but still possible tracks of the Black Knight being killed by someone else, or even old age or a sufficiently dramatic magic disease or curse.

Point is, from the moment Black picked a Squire at the very least, Black started on the downswing of his arc, and with it his life. Now that he HAS a replacement, he must soon die and BE replaced, and I'm sure Warlock realizes that to some degree. So, at least in theory, Cat's death would slow Black's hourglass again, at least a little. Of course, villains don't live forever, successor or no, and Cat dying would surely make Black angry, but at this point I don't think Warlock cares. With Sabah's passing cutting through his accomplished-villain-arrogance and reminding him of the Calamities' ultimate mortality, and Black's death plainly on the horizon, all he wants is a little more time, no matter how much that might tangle up the Grand Plan they've been working over forty years for.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

See, you're working with the assumption that Warlock was acting rationally, in his own best interests. I don't see any reason to assume that. I'm afraid this is going to be a common theme in the rest of the comments for this chapter, so this comment is really for all the others that I'm not going to read as much as for you so don't take it personal 😊

Fern

As far as I can tell, it's less that Cat's gonna kill Black and more that Warlock is deathly afraid that she's not thinking about what flags she's placing in the story. The reason Bard got a win on Black in the first place could be traced to Cat, after all; Bard is a character in Cat's story, after all, I imagine she was fated to get a win to prove how serious of a threat she is. The fact that Black managed to severely wound White is probably the only reason only Captain died, and this went from a Pragmatic Evil Wins story to a Evil Always Reverts to Stupid Evil story.

Beyond that, I can see several ways how Cat's actions – if she isn't very careful – could lead to death flags being placed on Black and several members of her own Demesne. This plot thread could turn out very interesting indeed.

EE I'm really liking some of the character work you've been doing recently. Characters that are Allied but not Friendly to our protagonist add a lot of depth to this story, keep it up man.

oldschoolvillain

You're making us wait the long gap on THAT? Gah, it was a glorious chapter with some proper villain vs villain smacktalk, but Gah give me Killikatherine stat!

Anyhoo, just had to get that out of my system. The chat around the campfire was wonderful, as so many character building things are, but the real glory of this chapter was Katherine's . . . 'talk', with the Sovereign of the Red Skies. Even with all she's done, all the power she's gathered, even though she could probably meet Warlock blow for blow in a straight fight, she's still head and shoulders below the old school of villains and seeing that after so many chapters of her steamrolling one problem after another was great. Well done.

PhDEevee

He hates her because she is Black's successor, and for Evil succession always means death (see the quote atop the previous chapter). This is often the case for Good as well, but not always.

I get the feeling Warlock is weaving a fail-safe into Nauk so that if Black dies, Nauk will use Cat's trust in him to try and kill her. That's what I'd do in that situation, were I an immensely powerful Named faced with losing a dear friend.

boballab

Good way to get Cat to kill him. Warlock is letting his grief and arrogance talk and not thinking because if he did he would not want to piss off the girl that made Demi-Gods and Gods do her bidding.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Shadowxhunter

Sniff... she came so far. I remember her first meeting with warlock. She couldn't even speak well. Now she was even ready to fight him to death.

Frnkly i don't want her to transition as the black knight. It doesn't suit her. Her raw power already surpassed all black knight ever born. Right now she is even stronger than black. And the way warlock acted show that she reached a level where even the calamity have to be wary of her.

lostdeviljho

"Her raw power already surpassed all black knight ever born."

That is a /bit/ of a big statement there. She's stronger than Amadeus, yeah, but the /traditional/ role of the Black Knight is to be the Empire's "big stick". Saying she's stronger than any Black Knight ever born is... well I don't want to say it's /the/ height of arrogance but it's eye the spot with intent, if you take my meaning.

NZPIEFACE

Black said the previous Black Knight was able to topple towers with a flick of his wrist...

Stephen R. Marsh

I keep wondering just what archetypes are available besides the black knight.

Warrior, Winter Knight, Strategist, Breaker (there are other breakers than the trickster), Captain, Gladiator. The problem is finding one that fits Cat's personality.

Come Woes, let us reason together on how to break this story
...

That said, I'm glad she is going to resolve things with her lover.

So much in this, so much. No idea where it is going to go. Wish I did.

LaNuup

I am not sure that she is more powerful than any Black Knight. Black said that his predecessor could topple a tower with a single blow and that he himself is a weak villain powerwise.

I'm also not so sure that Cat could defeat Warlock. Maybe with her power as duchess she could possibly nearly match him powerwise, but he is not a brute force tool, but a highly experienced and intelligent wizzard, who almost certainly has a way to deal with powerfull fae or fae like opponents, if he knows their weaknesses.

Letouriste

Her soul, he would target her soul. her soul was already damaged after the run against the demon and now that seems there is an opening there since her winter evolution

Bruce Chesborough

The way Warlock acted? He acted like a Marine drillmaster faced with a skinhead nephew daring him to start something.

"I could wipe out this arrogant little shit in a heartbeat any number of ways, but my brother would be SO pissed... but what if it's worth all the bad feelings to keep him from having from having to deal with all the consequences of letting this worthless waste of space run free? Damnit, it's too close to call!"

SomeKindOfName

Full circle back to that earlier fireside interlude.

Engineer

New idea for Cat's next Name. WOG already said Grey Knight is out of question but what do you guys think of Catherine Foundling, the Other Knight?

Vortex

Personally her kit right now suggests to me the Winter Knight since so much of it is tangled with the fae.

That being said, I am still hoping for death knight. She had shown a remarkable affinity for necromancy (her mount, her mount in the last battle, and even her own body).

Plus it would be a great way for ErraticErrata to show more of the Dead Kingdom and the Dead King, which we only got to see once in Ranger's interlude. Death Knight ftw!

Gingerbreasd_man

Still clinging to Warlord. I don't care if you're meant to be an Ork to get that Name, it's just way too appropriate. Winter Knight is a good contender for second favourite though.

Engineer

Yeah, I'm with you on that all the way. Death Knight would be pretty badass and it would sidestep the Story of Cat killing Black to become his successor quite nicely. Since Nobody ever said that a Squire MUST become EITHER a Black or White Knight. The Squire must just become a Knight. And besides, I remember White accessing a Name called the Knight Errant, so Black and White Knights aren't the ONLY Knight Names. It's just the role/story that Cat is caught in right now seems to be railroading her to take Black's Name. Taking another Knight name will subvert that story.

And that kind of subversion is precisely what Cat is known for if she's willing to bear the consequences.

Thought: The Soul Construct breaks. Cat is totally consumed by her Fae powers. She dies. The Story between her and Black Breaks/concludes. She rises again, with the help of the Hierophant and takes the Name Death Knight. Hell Masego could probably even hijack Abua's ritual array to do this ala Dead King style.

Don't worry about weight. Her legion is large and her dying and rising again will solidify the notion in their minds that she is a Knight that not even Death can claim.

Black is no longer forced to die and he has a chance to live happily ever after with Ranger or something. Warlock no longer has to be The Sovereign of the Red Jackasses and Cat doesn't have to cross swords with Ranger. Or maybe she does, Rangers is kind of messed up in the head and Cat taking that Name would DEFINITELY make her a viable hunt.

Masego already brought her back once when he was just an Apprentice. Him being the Hierophant with intimate knowledge of Cat's soul would probably allow him to do a better and complete reconstruction.

Then when she's The Death Knight she could easily claim the Name Black Queen when she becomes ruler of Callow in truth, setting up Book 5 where the Dead King takes center stage and Triumphant returns to battle her.

Apologies for the Wall of text, but the ideas just kept flowing.

AshSlanabrezgov

I don't like theme of Death. Catty is all about struggle and breaking, dying but mending. Death is stillness and rot. Cat is not.

She is closer to Nightmare if you excuse me my pun. I mean when Black Night fell over your eyes and a Beast is lurking in the dead Winter forest kind of nightmare.

By the way – she was given a name Black Queen by soldiers. I think folk tales and beliefs shape names – so maybe her new name would have not Knightish theme but Dread Queenish? Eh. Warlord or Brawler would suit her best though. Pity that first is orks only and Brawler is starting to feel not awesome enough.

cburschka

I know I already guessed the same thing with “Warlord”, but maybe it’s going to be related to her latest epithet (“Black Queen”).

(But another growing hypothesis is that she simply won’t transition at all. The sheer power and mileage she’s gotten out of Squire already show that she doesn’t really need it badly.)

MetruX

The problem here is that this is BORROWED power, the same thing Black always said to avoid. Sure, it’s part of her and she is the Last of Winter, but it can still be subverted. Unless she transitions into something that makes the Winter true part of her, she will have a glaring flaw to be exploited.

Stephen R. Marsh

Warlord fits some of the flavor text in earlier posts that talk about this campaign being a seminal one in her career. She has a lot more battles to come.

Would also be fund.

Engineer

MetruX, she didn’t borrow the power; she earned it through the story she enacted with that Winter Duke to become the Duchess of Moonless Nights. According to the story she weaved the power is hers in truth and notice that all of the Summer Royals refer to her by her title. In their eyes she’s the Duchess through and through and now being the last Noble of Winter that consequently makes her a Princess. That power is hers. The only issue is her body is not capable of using the full power effectively without the frozen heart of the Winter King. Masego needs to get his ass in gear on that front.

Tohron

I'm thinking Catherine will just transition directly to Dread Empress. Catherine and Akua are almost certainly in a competition to decide the direction of the Dread Empire – and Akua is clearly aiming for Malicia's spot. That bit about Catherine hearing the "Girl Who Climbed the Tower" song in her head was a pretty clear indication of where she's headed eventually.

Letouriste

That's bit of a long shot. I don't expect her to give a shot at the tower before a few years...maybe just before the war with procer if malicia continue to prevent and slow the forming of that crusade

Panic

I really, REALLY hope they are not getting back together now. It would feel so cheap.

Letouriste

Why? They obviously still have feelings for each other;) I guess that will depend of how that next chapter will go. EE must have a lot of pressure on that, this conversation will not be easy to write right

Sniggs44

Ok, so a few things.

First, Cat needs to learn when to shut the fuck up. Seriously, it's gone way past "scrappy underdog facing down the man" and is now approaching "compulsive contrarian" territory. Warlock was obviously grieving, which means he wasn't thinking rationally. You don't play games with people when your carefully constructed mental model of them is so out of whack that you have no idea how they'll react. She didn't bravely face down a threat, she needlessly rolled some dice and got a 20. Stupid, stupid, pointless risk.

Also, Warlock is a special flavor of the classical psychopath, in that he has empathy for a few select people in the world and treats the rest like furniture. Cat doesn't fall into the first category, so she needs to be really fucking careful about how she approaches the guy who could disintegrate her with a gesture and then teleport away with no lasting consequences. Her puffing up when facing down the angel made sense, because it was necessary to get her in the right mindset to resist its mind control and win. Her mouthing off here only increased the odds that Warlock would snap and put that tiny bit of extra weight into the "Amadeus will forgive me" column. If the guy is searching for a reason to end you don't go out of your way to hand him one.

Second, now I'm worried that it may not be Black that goes off the rails due to Bard's SAN attack, but the rest of the Calamities once he bites it. If he's the only one they're loyal to what's guaranteeing their "good" behavior once he's gone?

Darkening

It was mentioned during her meeting with the Winter King that she pretty literally can't help herself because of the way Names amplify personality traits, so her backing down in the face of a threat isn't really in the cards, even if it would be smart. As for the calamities going nuts, yeah, that's pretty likely. Captain's dead, so no vicious werewolf running around slaughtering people, but something needs to happen with Warlock, especially after this chapter. Ranger should probably get taken out too, not just because she'll probably take Black's death poorly, but because she's way too much an overpowered wild card in the story. Assassin and Scribe are more muted and less likely to cause mass death and destruction, but they might take it in their heads to kill off Catherine, I know seeing a second meeting between Assassin and Thief would be interesting.

Fulmi

Can't we just focus on Masego and Archer, and the possibility of a cute romance born between them? You know, putting aside all the blood and the inevitable tragedies for a moment?

Keyen

Man, when someone starts a conversation with "I struggle to find a reason to keep you alive", it's hard to stay civil. Not really Cat fault here.

Engineer

Darkening and Keyen are right. Cat's Name has always been likened to a voracious Beast and her Winter title is described similarly. Both of these traits were already present in pre Name Cat and now having them amplified by A Name and a Fae Winter title (Fae are notorious for being almost UNABLE to change their Nature) all but ensures Cat holding her tongue is about as easy as water spontaneously flowing uphill. After she left the tent she even said that the fury she felt wasn't entirely her own.

Sniggs, your assessment is valid for a regular mook with no Name. But Cat is Named and they shape Creation through their will. Look at Ranger, would you say her behaviour is any way sane? Look at Triumphant too, would you also say that her behavior is sane? Look at the successes those two have under their belt. In this world, like in One Piece, willpower is key to accomplishing great things and Cat has that in spades.

And her assessment of Warlock was correct. He's powerful, but he's human, not a capital God. Weight is on Cat's side in that fight, the Calamities' time on the Stage is nearing its conclusion. It's time for them to step down.

MetruX

The part about her mouthing off has been explained nicely by the others, so i'll just adress the statement of disintegrating her with a gesture. First things first, she's WAY more powerfull than before, more powerfull than any Squire has a right to be, and the story is on her side. If things last a while, which they would, given the low difference in raw power, Black would come, and we all already know which side he'd take. So, yeah, in a direct one on one fight Warlock is likely to kill her, not only defeat, but not fast and this would never be a straight and direct one on one, even the others of Cat's band could come and get involved, I just don't know if Masego would side with his father or Cat, especially because Archer would be with Cat... If this fight broke out, alot of common people would die in the fight, and Akua would probably see, but it would end with Warlock dead, not her.

cburschka

Must not start shipping...

Gunslinger

This chapter was actually confirmation of two ships for me.

unoriginal

It's too late, wayyyyy too late. The S.S. Junisha has been sailing since book 1.

I mean I haven't been the only shipping them right?

Right?

erraticerrata

At least one my friends does, so you're definitely not alone.

Taichi22

Lemme just say, OTP of Archer and Hierophant.
Too cute yo.

Thea

I simply love Last Supper-style scenes like this. Last Barbecue. Whatever. So beautiful and strong. The next arc is going to be brutal, isn't it?

By the way... Doesn't Cat have a nice, little pattern of three going with the Warlock? First time she couldn't look him in the eyes. This time they parted equally exchanging threats. Next time... Time for Cat to Break Warlock in some manner?

Engineer

Holy shit you're right.

And it fits too with the theme that the Calamities are on the way out too.

Still all that can be avoided if Cat simply takes another Knight Name. Doesn't succeed Black rather sidesteps and surpasses him. That's the key to resolving this mess with all parties concerned more or less happy.

HappyNap

It would fit... except that, theres been signs that you can't be in more than one "pattern" at a time, and it was hinted at that Kat is in some kind of pattern with the White Knight... so I don't think it works out

Gunslinger

@HappyNap she was in a pattern with both Akua and William at the same time

Reveen

It strikes me that Warlock really isn't that far off from the standard villain mold at all. He's a dangerous vindictive maniac who doesn't really care about the Empire on a practical level like Black does. The only thing distinguishing him from other old guard Praesi is having a bit more sense, not caring about politics, and being loyal to the ur-protagonist.

So considering that Black is planning to do away with that old order completely, Warlock might find that when the time comes he ends up the first to be purged.

Engineer

Black definitely wouldn't want to live anymore after he completed that plan. He'd be killing everyone he held dear to pave the way for Cat. Yeah, we saw how he was after Sabah died which was not entirely his own fault. Him having a direct hand in orchestrating the deaths of his friends would destroy the Black Knight completely. He'd be less than even a Monster after that is concluded. There's simply no way he's NOT swinging from the rafters (if he doesn't get killed first) when all is said and done. He even said it himself, to prolong his existence after that would make him a crutch to Cat. That would be pretty fucking dark.

Morgenstern

It's been hinted at enough in Black's own inner monologues, to be sure... How many of his friends will he have to kill off to ensure his desired end comes around, indeed...

..unless, of course, Cat becomes the grain in the machinery and DOES find another way out 😊 I'm really, really hoping for this. Though I, too, somehow feel and have felt for quite some time, that Warlock should be on the list to go at least BEFORE she can find a way out (though I really, really hope she does and this is NOT a "mentor must get lost first", traditions-bullshit story in this aspect, after all; I like Black WAY too much – and as others have said here again: she is STILL not ready to be a replacement. Yeah, she's become more awesome. Doesn't quite nail it YET, at least, though – and frankly, I'm simply tired of this killing off the mentor bullshit, instead of finding their own way by OTHER means, e.g. by DISAGREEING with the mentor BEFORE he finds some peaceful end after some happy-ever-after TIME at least, instead of dropping him in the middle of the story, because somehow that's how stories supposedly go. Drop dead, Bard. Fanclub Black wants to keep Black just as much as Cat does.. Let her succeed. Black Queen ftw!)

Morgenstern

Somehow it would feel kinda unexpected-but-unexpectedly-appropriate to me, if Wekesa would find himself doing some "throwing HIMSELF in front of his friend to save him from certain death"-move instead of the traditional "that is only for heroes, villains only ever get revenge"... this is supposed to be an UNtraditional story, right? 😊 Let him do something less than expected, while still fitting in character.. do the same for other plots that everyone seems to feel-know "have to be" simply because "that's how stories usually go, can't be any other way"... Pretty please? -o.0'

MetruX

I... Think Black won't want to stay, even if she does sidestep and no one else dies. He's broken and sacrificed too much for the objective, after this is done, he will have nothing to live for. He has, already, nothing else to live for, even his "family", counting the Calamities, Malicia and Cat, are all things he needed to make it happen. If he does survive until the end, he will end up a depressed philosophical machine, cold and bare on the inside. I'd rather see him die than live like that...

Mike E.

I feel bad for those two guards...knowing what we know from 1-7 about how violent two Named can be, they probably needed a change of underwear after hearing Cat and Warlock threatening each other.

""The last time they had a spar without holding back, Captain knocked down a tower and Lord Black threw a whole statue at her," he informed me cheerfully. "Hilarious at the time, of course, but the local baron was less than pleased.""

Shoddi

"To stabbing Diabolist in the face," Archer said. "Like, at least twice."

"To claiming her personal possessions afterwards," Masego contributed.

Hahaha!! That's the most hilariously formal rendition of "Kill Them, Take Their Stuff" I've seen. How did Robber miss that?

Engineer

He didn't. Remember he offered Hierophant a spot in his tribe right after that. Or at least said if Masego continued on that trend he would. He didn't miss it.

Hakurei06
Cold Cyberia

Holy shit, this seems bang on right. Either she gets stabbed next chapter or the info Killian is leaking will lead to her downfall. I really want to know the rest of the song now.

Green I Guess

I think that Killian is the traitor in the camp. Akua could have tempted her after she broke up with Cat and Killian was refused (by Cat) her ascension. Akua has all sorts of nasty old sorcery secrets she could have given Killian in order to have the legion mage send information unnoticed. It seemed a little coincidental that we were reminded this chapter about all those old Praesi magic hoards again, to me at least.

Addicted

ROBBER!!!!!!
Your back!!!!

Gods and Devils be praised!!
I miss that murdering stealing lovable scamp.

Blue

Black is currently the thing keeping monstrosities like Warlock in check. And Warlock is a monster. He takes people apart just to figure out how they work and Heirophant is no less of a psychopath just colder. They are evil in the true sense with nothing noble driving their actions. Cat at least has the motivation to free Callow behind what she is doing. What Cat is going to have to come to terms with is how to keep them in check. She's ok to kill Warlock since she can see him for the monster he is, without it being clouded by being his friend like she is with Hierophant.

And that brings us to Killian. I wonder if Cat is finally seeing her hypocrisy when it comes to how she reacted with Killian. Maybe she didn't like the mirror being held up to show that she loves people who are capable of doing terrible things to make them more powerful. Some part of Cat does not like being reminded that she is the villain and she took it all out in Killian. They can get past this but Cat will need to start treating Killian like an equal, or maybe Killian can make her see her as such. I mean who's to say that Summers mantle is not available for someone to step up to take.

clmineith

Squire could become the Black Queen, as a Name.
But maybe it's Black who will get a new Name. He could become Warlock, for example.

nigeltheoutlaw

As much as I love some good violence and story, you seriously do dialogue and companionship very well. I'd love to see more chapters like this (especially with Robber) even if it means less action.

Good shit as always, you're in my top three web serials around.

Shawn Panzegraf

First,
I know I'm bucking the consensus here. Yet I really want Cat and Killian to reconcile. What Killian lacked was the screen time and the circumstances to grant her the kind of depth we see in the other members of Cat's inner circle. (Which by no means are all Named. Juniper, Aisha, Ratface, Robber and Pickler are all significant to Cat as well.)

Cat recognizing the hypocrisy in her refusal of Killian's need would be a great start. I'd love to see Cat showing her support, despite her distaste, by doing the manual scut-work to set up Masego's ritual for Killian. That all this ruminating on death and mortality, and her regrets about Nauk and the Gallowborne being where they could get hurt and exterminated respectively due to her call has allowed Cat to recognize that what she potentially has with Killian shouldn't be discarded because of a principle she already tramples on regularly. I think if we get to see more of Killian in-depth, in addition to her relevance being increased due to an increase in her power, perhaps Killian might win over some of her detractors here.

Second, as other have said, Cat ruminated on the fact that just like Masego's obsession with accuracy was amplified by his being Named, Cat's inability to hold her tongue even when common sense dictates is her amplified behavior...all the way back during her endowment as a Duchess of Winter.

Third, for those in the camp of "Squire is enough of a Name for Cat" I say: Masego's patch-job on Cat's soul is fairly flimsy. Not only is that patch-job vulnerable to external attack (And as we saw when Summer assaulted Liesse, Diabolist's Aspects aren't so much Devil/Demon-focused, as focused on entities and powers foreign to Creation. Diabolist has just the kind of Name to give her the tools to turn Cat's Winter power against her. Why do you think she sacrificed a mage minion as a spy during her attempted parley with Cat to get an in-person read on Cat's Fae Power Level. Better than almost anyone else, Akua is likely to understand the implications of a mortal being invested with X, Y or Z amount of Fae Power.)

So there's the glaring external attack probability. Masego ALSO said, however, that Cat's very use of her power now that she's the Last of Winter is breaking down his patch-job...and any major uses of that power accelerates the erosion of his patching. Warlock wasn't just blowing smoke. He's an expert in soul architecture and BOUNDARIES. Look at the precision assessment of his Watch-member prisoner via the blood-ritual. That was without even knowing anything substantive about the source of the Watch's power. The Fae he understands far, far better.

Cat is going to need to make a metaphysical change of some sort. Warlock's assessment that her foundations are shaking isn't empty. Masego constructing the array he said would take months of tinkering to manage to more comprehensively shore up Cat's soul isn't really a viable alternative. She'd essentially be undergoing months of in-patient care. Even if the actual array wouldn't take months to implement, Cat would almost certainly have to be present for Masego to continually study as he worked out how to create this lasting, one-of-a-kind long-term working.

Even if Cat's dance card wasn't absolutely full to the brim with aiding Black with the Praes purge and getting it ready to beat back the Crusade, she has the ongoing stability of Callow to contend with. Then coming up and enacting those measures she considers necessary to create as insurance for Callow's survival should Praes be defeated in the Crusade. Followed by actually helping fight against the Crusade for however long it lasts. Plus whatever else the "Uncivil War*S*" entail. Even if it weren't for all that, Masego said even if he did all that work, she'd still be vulnerable, because her Winter power is no longer INTRINSIC.

Either the Winter Power has to go (I think that ship has sailed. It seems from the text bound up in more than one way with the Beast of her Name)...or something has to happen to make that power once more Intrinsic to Cat. Name mechanics are the only thing that would allow such a radical integration IMHO.

I've always felt the Winter Knight talk misses the mark...but I think it's correct in its implications that a Name Change is necessary to incorporate what Cat's become into something more naturally her. Something that say, fuses the shadow-stuff of Squire with that Winter ice.

A lateral transition from the assume White Knight/Black Knight inevitability does seem the only option.

Apologies for the text wall. Hope it didn't trigger a tl;dr.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

This is a very good comment, thanks for writing it! I think you have a solid grasp on the magic system in play here. I especially like your portratal of the powers of Warlock and Diabolist, as being focused on boundaries and noncreational powers respectively (I know noncreational isn't right word, but I haven't read the pigdragon chapter where Masego explains this stuff in a long time).

I'm going to have to review that chapter as well as the one with Warlock and the watch member you cite.

I'm just curious, but how long have you been following the story? I have a theory that the later you get here (ie, the more chapters you get to binge at once), the more likely you are to understand it deeply. A little time for reflection is good, but too much time and you're going to start talking yourself into nonsense. I know I have before. xD

George Smith

Anyone else think cat will kill black because diabolist magic ward isn't for cat but for black and it controls minds. Random thought at 3 am on a workday. That's how good a story this is.

John Galt

Typo:

He'd tightened her cloak around her shoulders, earlier, gentle in a way I'd never [seen] Masego be with anything but books.

Blinks

Best part of that for me was those two soldiers outside the tent.

I mean, if there was anywhere they'd less likely want to be at that moment...

Shawn Panzegraf

@Warren Peace NFL Report:

Glad you liked it, and TY for your kind words 😊 Umm...I'd say I've been here since around the time when Cat was discovering her Name wasn't working right after she'd joined the War College (because it'd been damaged by her allowing William to escape in Summerholm)...so, quite awhile.

On the other hand, I'm part of an active discussion on at least two forums where people discuss the Guide in-depth. (The better, but less active, discussion is definitely on Spacebattles.) So, I spend a lot of time analyzing and re-reviewing Guide chapters to connect the dots.

I really, truly believe the big takeaway from everything going on is that the Cat-as-semi-permanent Squire" theory has been shot all to hell with her Winter power turning non-Intrinsic ever since she a) Got her real heart back, but more because b) The fae are now Swinter instead of Summer/Winter.

So long as she's got that glaring "My soul architecture is a house of cards, waiting for either the appropriate practitioner to reach in and wreck it, or a sufficiently dire situation causes me to draw so deeply on my Winter powers I shatter Masego's patch-job" weakness...Cat is profoundly unfit to move beyond the Diabolist fight.

Truthfully, I see the things Warlock said as prophetic FOR the Diabolist fight. Her struggling with wards, being vulnerable to Diabolist because she's now "Other" etc etc.

If I was pinned down and forced to make a prediction, I'd say that the climax of her conflict with Akua is also likely to be where the Name Mechanics change for Cat...to address this Winter Vulnerability that's been mentioned directly about twelve times now.

Jason Ipswitch

Delurking to share my theory on what could happen:

Diabolist uses Claim on Cat's winter power. Cat responds by Taking Claim, then Cat using Claim on herself to ascend to her new Name.

vuthuha912

For your question, Cat, Black loves Warlock because he has no one left in his family. Wasteland is not overflowing with decent people during the time Black rise up. Warlock and Black might start out as only using each other then shenanigans happen and they become good friends. See how useful it is to have Masego with you, Black needs Warlock to even attempt to change his country. Warlock might even be normal at the beginning, he just changes afterward. Black's family is dead, he only has the Calamities and Malicia left. That might push it from 'good friends' to 'brothers'.

The answer is in his name – Amadeus – the love of god. Love is a very important part of Amadeus. Love his country, his friends, and Cat. He didn't intend to love Cat when taking her on. Care for her and be nice so she will follow his plan. Yet, he does come to love her. She just grows on him. And she comes to love him back enough to think that he would never hurt her even at his worst. He is a very easy person to love. Amadeus received love from other more powerful people and he loves them back. It is so cheesy and sweet.

Chapter 57: Revolve

"Men make swords, Heavens the sheath."
– Callowan saying

The moon was out in full, and though part of me still grew irritated at the sight of the pale orb I'd learned to ignore it. I'd wondered once or twice at why the Winter King had granted me the title of Duchess of Moonless Nights, when his court had such a close association with the same celestial sphere. I still remembered the dream that had followed the usurpation, doubted I would ever forget even a single detail of it, and in it it'd been Summer that wanted to break the moon. Was that the intent from the beginning? To have it in my very mantle that I would seek to destroy you? Now and then I had to wonder who had really played who, when I'd tangled with the Deadwood Crown. If my every desperate gambit had been foreseen by the immortal thing that now ruled the whole of Arcadia, turned to his purposes. I could have lingered on that line of thought, and wanted to, but the feel of Kilian's arm under mine was a reminder of why I'd begun this walk. I would not suffer cowardice from myself, not even in this.

Southern Callow took well to autumn, even at night. Though the shades of orange and gold some godly brush had painted across fields and trees could not be glimpsed after dark, there was an undercurrent of serenity to the country. Of peace, more than anywhere else in my homeland, for these parts had seen less of war than any of the rest. The last two years had been eager in attempting to make up that disparity, though even the worst of Summer was no match for centuries of Praesi invasion. I caught myself sidestepping the heart of this again, and clenched my fingers. The two of us moved in silence, away from the bonfire and closer to a small pond bordering wheat fields. The muddy banks were covered with footsteps from the soldiers who'd come here to fill canteens and barrels, but at this time of the night we were entirely alone. Except for the frogs, I thought, sharp ears catching echo of their song. We found a pair of carved stones by the shore, polished by what must have been decades of wind and rain, and sat there without a word.

The wind brushed the reeds ahead of us, and as I watched them I realized I had no idea what to say. A glance at Kilian told me her face was hesitant as well, though the reasons for it were her own. Some part of me thought there should be a physical weight to this, given how serious it all felt, but I found none on my shoulders. Something like a quiet laugh escaped my lips. Look at us, grim-faced as if the fate of the world rests in the balance of this conversation. Like this isn't two girls of not even twenty summers settling a dispute of absolutely no import to Creation.

"Would you care to share the jest?" Kilian asked.

For a heartbeat I'd expected her to take my laugh as mockery, but that had been doing her disservice. She was not offended, merely curious. She'd never been the prickly one between us.

"I was considering matters of perspective," I said.

I finally gave in to the urge I'd avoided all night and looked at her properly. She'd trimmed her hair. Last time we'd spoken it had been at the edge of what regulations allowed, but now it was in a clean pixie cut like when we'd first met. She was still, I thought, heartbreakingly lovely. Porcelain and flame framed hazelnut eyes, and the body I knew so intimately radiated a warmth I knew was completely imagined. Winter had seen to that. The mantle had done a great deal more, though. I'd been months since I needed to look at her to know she was there, ever aware of the measure of fae blood she carried in her veins, but as my power had grown so had that awareness. I was a Duchess, and she unsworn to any of the lords of the fae. There was a whisper in the back of my mind that spoke of mastery, of needing only to reach out and will it for her to kneel at my feet. The disgust that welled up in me at that spoiled what enjoyment I'd had of the peace and quiet.

"Great things," Kilian said, "are made up of myriad smaller ones. I do not think import and magnitude necessarily walk hand in hand."

A few sentences traded, and what I saw was our relationship made plain. I stepped away from it, making mixture of retreat and reason, while she stepped forward to bridge the gap at the cost of making herself the vulnerable one. There was, perhaps, expectation I would follow suit. But never demand. Time and distance had allowed me to see the boundaries we'd set more clearly, and the shred of shame I felt over them was well-deserved. There had never been anything equal about this, in what was given or received. The question that had hung in the air for the last few months was whether or not something that had never been balanced could be made so. Speaking with Hakram had broadened my outlook, but little else. I bared the blade first because in the end that was my nature, wasn't it?

"Were you happy?" I asked. "Before."

The redhead smiled, somewhat ruefully.

"You have a trick to tell when people lie, don't you?" she said. "That does seem a mite unfair, going into this conversation."

I looked away, gazing at the pond and the small ripple I could see a fish making as it swam.

"Of all the things that are unfair in this," I said, "I would consider that a lesser measure."

She sighed.

"The point of this," she said, "was never for you to take lash to your back like an Ashuran supplicant. What has blame ever done to mend the world?"

"Ignoring fault is how tyrants are made," I said.

"You are hardly that, Catherine," she said, and without looking I felt her hand rise.

It hesitated, then went down again. I was uncertain whether or not to be glad.

"I was," Kilian finally said. "Sometimes. Others not. We had our conversation because I feared one side would grow at the expense of the other."

It had been kind of her to phrase it so delicately but the meaning was clear enough. Whatever had been good about it, for her, had been giving way to the bad. And I'd hardly noticed, my mind on a hundred other matters. The thing was, I did not have it in me to apologize for that. I wasn't even sure she wanted me to. At the end of the day, my life didn't come first. Neither did the people I shared it with. The lines I was willing to cross to ensure both of those were preserved had only grown in number, but that part of the matter remained unchanged. Because there's a difference between important and important to me.

"You did most the talking, last time," I said. "So I'll get the wheel moving tonight."

I itched to pick up a stone and toss it into the pond, anything to break the damned stillness that smothered the air around us, but I'd done quite enough running for the night.

"It was hypocritical of me to hold you up to standards that I break myself," I admitted. "Standards I don't even hold up everyone close to me to."

Kilian brushed back her bangs, face wearing an expression I could not quite read.

"You thought well of me," she said. "And so you thought I kept to the same principles as you. That's not a crime, Catherine. It was just..."

"Presumptuous?" I suggested, a mirthless smile stretching my lips. "I placed expectations on you, then grew angry when you didn't meet them. That's on my head and no one else's."

Ferreting out exactly why I'd had those in the first place had been more delicate, the kind of introspection I was always reluctant to delve in. It hadn't been that I cared for her, or at least not just that, because I cared for other people too. If Masego had spoken of a ritual fuelled by human sacrifice, would I have been angry? Yes, absolutely. But it would not have felt like a betrayal, the way it had with Kilian.

"I used you," I said, tongue stumbling on the ugly word, "as a refuge. From all the dark shit that goes on in my life. And that meant I wanted you to keep your hands clean regardless of what you actually want. Or need."

I felt her eyes lingering on me but did not meet them.

"I hadn't thought you would actually admit that," she said.

The faint surprise in her voice was probably the deepest cut she could have made, because she hadn't meant it to be one at all.

"You once told me one of my virtues is recognizing when I'm wrong," I said. "It's fallen a bit to the wayside, lately, but it's not gone."

I'd made a lot mistakes, in the last two years. Won great victories too, but one did not excuse the other. I'd make more, because I had talents but also flaws and no matter what Warlock said in the end I was only human. But at least I could stop making them out of wilful ignorance. It wasn't as much as I wished it could be. But it was what I could do. Power alone was never enough.

"I was not blameless, if we have to speak of it that way," she said. "We did not have a conversation, last time. I'd made the decision before we ever spoke, and that was unfair to you."

I nodded slowly. Silence followed, until I pushed forward.

"So what do you want, Kilian?" I asked quietly.

A lot could have been avoided, I thought, by asking that question a few years ago.

"Catherine, look at me," she hissed.

Her emotions were roiling. I could feel that with my sense that wasn't quite a sense. But it was in her voice I read the anger, and it surprised me enough I obeyed. She was, I realized, genuinely furious.

"Don't do you fucking do this," she said.

Irritation flared up.

"Do what?" I bit out, exasperated. "Amends? Gods, Kilian, I'm trying. What more do you want?"

Her cheeks were flushed red, and for a moment I felt like kissing her. It passed.

"You're not trying," she said. "You're treating me like someone you have to bind to you. I'm not Hakram, Cat. Or Aisha. I know you. And this is what you do when you bring someone into the fold. You're acting like I'm the enemy, not the girl who shared your godsdamned bed for two years."

"I know a lot less about that girl than I thought I did," I flatly replied. "I'm-"

I bit down on my tongue, took a deep breath.

"No," Kilian said, eyes hard. "We're not doing it like this. Like I'm a horse you have to soothe or a hound you have to feed. I'm not interested in the Squire, Cat. She has no place in this conversation."

"I don't know what you want from me, Kilian" I hissed. "I just tried asking and you bit my fucking head off."

She met my gaze, the demand that I not look away laying bare.

"Do you really need that badly to be in control, even for this?" she asked. "Gods Below, Cat, there's no one else here. Would it cost you that much to allow yourself to be a person for an hour?"

"Yes," I said, and I was surprised by the fury in my own voice. "Because people break. People have limits. I can't have that anymore, Kilian, not when I'm making pacts with the Empress and planning wars with Black. Legends don't blink, and if I'm anything less than that we are fucked. Because they're stronger and they have decades on me and Weeping Heavens, this entire Empire is a house of cards and everybody's tugging at it. I am in over my head, I always was, and it is this close to catching up with me and everyone I've dragged into this."

The only sound in the silence that followed was my panting breath, paired with the unpleasant realization I'd begun to speak furious and ended up pleading. I passed a hand through my hair, exhausted in a way my body no longer allowed me to be.

"I can't do this, Kilian," I whispered. "There are no good choices anymore, just a spread with different shades of horror that I'm forced to pick from. Every time I think it's coming together another thing drops and I have to become a little worse to deal with it. By the time I finish what I set out to do, I'll be more poisonous than what I wanted to break. And I can't back out because the alternative is every single one of you dead. And you know what's the part that actually grieves me? I did this. I got us here in this mess, and I would do it again. Because this is bigger than me or you or the others, and if that's not ritual sacrifice by another name then I don't know what is."

All hail the Black Queen, I thought bitterly. I'd already put thousands to the sword to get here, what were a few thousand more for the pile? Blood was the grease in the wheels of Creation, and whose it was they cared not. Kilian reached over and slid her fingers through mine. I let her, though I knew I'd regret it.

"You are not alone," she said.

Of course I was. Because at the end of the day I have the power, I have the authority, and no amount of love can fit two people on a single throne. I parted our hands and rose to my feet, brushing off my knees.

"Your ritual," I said.

"Tonight doesn't have to be about that," Kilian said.

"It already is," I replied steadily. "I have no grounds, as either the Squire or the Vicequeen of Callow, to tell you not to do it."

The redhead frowned.

"And yet you still find the very notion repulsive," she said.

"This isn't about me," I said. "That was the mistake from the start, thinking that it was. I will, one day, grind that practice into nonexistence. Because it offends me, because it is a blight on Creation and the way of thinking it spawns is my enemy. But until then, it is against no law or regulation. Do what you deem best."

Her face went blank.

"That sounds," she said, "like goodbye."

"I love you," I said. "I've never said it before, not like this, but I do. It didn't really sink in until I saw the amount of principles I was willing to break to keep you."

A shiver went through her frame.

"Is that supposed to make this better?" she said, voice raw.

"It was due, regardless," I said. "You were always the one that reached out. But this was about being equals, wasn't it? I don't think that means power, or titles, or authority. It's about neither of us being expected to bend our knees to the other's beliefs."

My hand rose, going for her cheek, but she shook her head.

"Don't," Kilian said. "Not if you're going to excise me out of your life. It would be crueller than just walking away."

"I'll still care for you," I said quietly. "That's not going away. We are friends."

The redhead smiled bitterly.

"You bloody fool," she said. "Do you really think friends is what I want from you? Getting just a part of someone after having had all of them can't be counted anything but a loss."

I almost took it back, right there and then. I could still do it, I thought. Salvage something out of this mess. But I didn't. I felt like weeping for what I was giving up on, but it'd been a long time since I'd been in tears and I wasn't sure I still could. My mantle and my Name woke, intertwined beyond separation, and I could have shunted all this... tangle off into them. Let the cold clear it all away. But I was not yet so far gone, and so my hand came down instead. I did not say goodbye. It was too cheap and end for this. Instead I bowed my head, and left. Grace had never been my strength, and there'd been precious little of that on display tonight. I found my feet taking me back to camp instead of the bonfire, where I knew Hakram would be. I had no taste for the conversation that awaited there, would not for a long time. Instead I found a tent, still lit with magelight even at this hour, and let the wards wash over me as I entered. Black was seated on one of his rickety stools, his thin shirt for only armour as he poured over papers arrayed before him. He took one look at me, then let out a breath that was almost a sigh.

He leant back to claim a cup from his bedside and filled it with the wine at his table, pressing it into my hands. I could have sat across from him, but instead I went on his bed. I folded my knees against my chest and cradled the cup. I barely remembered what it had felt like, to be a child, but it must have been something like this. He did not speak, but neither did his eyes return to the papers.

"I met Ranger," I heard myself say. "She almost killed me, in Arcadia."

"So I've heard," Black said. "She is... difficult at the best of times."

It was not an apology, nor had I expected one. The Black Knight did not apologize for himself, much less others.

"But you love her," I said.

He inclined his head in agreement.

"I have, on occasion, thought of it as a singular obsession," he said. "But perhaps that is merely as close to love as I can manage, given what I am. It is enough for the both of us."

"Why?" I asked. "Why do you love her?"

He smiled faintly.

"I have wondered the same for many years," he said. "I have loved – still love – others, but never quite in that manner. In the end, I think it is because she does not need me."

I drank from the cup, a bitter Wasteland red that lingered on the tongue. I was glad of it, in no mood for sweetness.

"Does it get easier?" I asked. "Carving away pieces?"

Pale green eyes met mine.

"Yes," he said.

It was a lie. We both knew that. But I loved him a little, for saying it anyway.

The last part I remembered of that night was my father's hands putting a blanket over me.

Metalshop

Oh shit. She thinks of him as her father now...
He's doomed for sure.

sheer_falacy

Everyone thinks he's doomed, including himself. But a key part of this story is figuring out how to defeat the tropes – how to twist them, how to bring a different and contradictory trope into play, how to forge your own story without violating the overall story "rules". Black isn't even going to try to do that here – he's content with a couple more years. I wonder if Cat will figure out how to beat it.

Daniel

He's done cause the story requires it. The story that we are reading requires the mentor to die so the student can progress like obi-one Kenobi

It's a step in the heroe's journey

stevenneiman

I think he really is doomed. What he's about has never been breaking the stories, just twisting them in a way that allows him to get what he wants. The only story that doesn't end in a mentor figure like Black dying would be one in which he betrays Cat, or in which Cat betrays the cause to save him, neither of which would accomplish the things he's worked so hard and sacrificed so much for already. As a result, he's decided that in the long term he doesn't need to survive to get what he wants.

Besides, one thing that's always been a heroic ideal is that there comes a time for the old to exit the stage to make way for the young. It would be a fitting end for someone like him to steal death from the forces of Good and leave behind the agent of their ruin.

greatwyrmgold

It's one thing to save someone who feels like the forces arrayed against them are too overwhelming to defeat. It's another to save someone who's accepted that fate.

Jeffery Wells

The other key part of this story is that a Story always wins, in the end. That's how Cat usually wins now, by making a better story, and it's how Bard beat Black – she knew stories he didn't and manipulated them to damage him.

A stab wound from a scalpel to remove the shrapnel in your chest, maybe. This was one of the last steps Cat had to take before she's truly ready to move on to her next Name, in my opinion. ## Gunslinger

Man, Cat's character development in this was fantastic, one that's been foreshadowed quite brilliantly across this book. I wish Cat wasn't so dramatic though, she could still be with Killian even if their dynamic changed.

Nguyen Hong Hai

That feels like a half-measure cop-out though, being hardcore villain like Black means there's no room for everyone else.

unoriginal

Uhhhh. Not really at all.

We've already had proof that the trope even evil has loved ones is in play here. Namely Akua and her Father and the quote from one of the Good Kings in another chapter. The most obvious example of the trope, however, is Black. Namely from his POV and even from the view of those around him we see that he does intensely care for his adopted pseudo-family.

Black as much as he denies feeling anything feels quite a bit. Hells, even wandering bard points this out to the Tyrant of Helinke.

Nairne .01

I really agree with your opinion. The degree of expression in EE's novel is on a whole another level. I sometimes wonder whether EE has multiple personalities writing this so he can switch between characters.

Keyen

Hum, just though of something. You guys remember Cat lost her Name for a moment during Book 2 because the goblin usurped the Name, right? Remember where it happened? In ... Liesse, "the place where you can bind or usurp a Name".

What if Black and/or Cat have no intention of the Black Knight dying, but instead Cat simply takes his Name from him? I'm pretty sure they can manage to do it without killing him (they can use Hierophant and/or Warlock to do it), and this way, he can avoid his doom, while staying alive so he can keep teaching Cat and still serve the Empire. Warlock is happy because Amadeus doesn't die, Amadeus is not the #1 target anymore and has no "FATE reason" to die anymore, and so on.

The only problem is to convince him, and I'm pretty sure they can manage if she talk to him about retirement after Sabah death.

Buya

She has died in order to lose her Name. And has taken resurrection from Hashmalim. I don't think they can repeat that.

Mindsword

Take that path and he dies. Creation has no room for ties when it comes to Names. Look back at the chapter where he buried his family and see that Cat would have to bury him before the year is out if he took that path.

There is a chance down that path though. Acquire a different Name for him and then do the swap. Perhaps the Warlord will survive where the Black Knight would have died... yet I feel his death is a part of this story now.

Keyen

The problem is how Black's death is anticipated by everyone, characters and readers. I can't believe the only question is the how when the "are we sure it will be the case?" is still hanging.

If something like I described happens, it will be obviously going with Black faking his death (Since Cat will be the new Black Knight and nobody will be able to believe she got the position with Black still alive).

Concerning what he could be doing during his retirement -> Going to Refuge once he is done with teaching Cat.

Mental Mouse

Note that all of that is derived from his own calculations, in fact it's inferred from a single fact: He didn't get a Pattern of Three with White Knight. From that narrow point he's leaped directly to "I'm gonna die, better finish everything up real quick.". And he thinks he's realized his own arrogance, but he really has no idea... yet.

Draeysine

Yeah sorry but I don't see Black taking well to retirement. What would he do all day? Drink and talk to Cat. He'd be a liability without his name to give him power and would still be a target considering how much Cat doesn't want him to die. Perfect hostage material, and something he would rather avoid being a possibility. Just by existing he poses a threat to everybody regardless of name because of the information he holds and the people who would trade to save his life.

edrey

no, i think the story of black and cat will be after the purge in praes, i was thinking of cat repeating the resurretion trick, there is a serafin for sacrifice, the trick of the inmortals and lots of undeads, it should be possible, the problem is the calamities who are crazy

Hakurei06

If he was Good, then the mentor surrendering his mantle of power to pass on the torch would be valid, and there'd be no real narrative reason to kill him. He isn't, there's no rest for the wicked and giving up his power doesn't get rid of his enemies, just his ability to fend them off. That aside, everything we know about him says that he'd never give up the agency his name gives him even if it extended his lifespan, because it wouldn't be an even trade. He doesn't care about his lifespan but for the things he can achieve during it.

As for him acquiring a new name, Warlord is out. I'm led to believe it is an orc exclusive Name. It'd probably break something irreparably between him and Alaya to have Maddie take on the role of Chancellor and the same can be said of Dread Emperor for obvious reasons.

MetruX

A part not sayd by the others yet, can he even survive without his Name? Villains are effectively imortal, and he has being a Villains for a VERY long time... What would happen if he suddenly isn't Named anymore? Would he age in few moments what was stopped for decades? Would he start aging from them on? Would his body still function without the Name keeping it all together? Of course, we can be sure that he wouldn't like it, and probably would drive him a little crazy not having the machine anymore, but even his body may sufer from it.

letouriste

he would probably go completely insane.

asylum insane.

at this point most of his personality is tied to his name too deeply for his mind to survive an extraction in my opinion.

in the first place removing a Name kill the host. we know that since the battle of liesse n°1.

also, old age is ok so long you still have family/friends/ someone/a goal, here his only purpose without Name would be to observe. even his advices would not have much impact anymore because he would be out of the loop

goliath1303

I don't think he's that old though... The Conquest was 20 years ago and it's been implied that they started that war shortly after/ before getting their names. The catalyst for the civil war was Emperor Nefarious's death and the Conquest happened almost immediately after that.

Thenre

Shawn Panzegraf

Cat's already made the choice that SHE'S fucked, instead of the people around her. If your thought processes are so far gone down the paths of control that thoughts like "No amount of love in the world can make two people fit on one throne" are coming to you when you're barely out of your twenties... Cat is absolutely, 100% right. By the time she accomplishes what she's set out to accomplish, she'll be more evil and toxic than anything presently in Creation.

The powerful have been making unequal power-dynamic relationships work for THOUSANDS of years. Madame Pompadour as the Uncrowned Queen of France. Nothing but the King's mistress..whom he loved.

Elizabeth I and Raleigh (admittedly quite a bit bumpier, but the relationship had stamina).

Hell, even Genghis Khan had a favored wife, who by the laws of his people wasn't as valuable as a prize mare once her womb punched out some sons for him.

Cat wasn't even able to take in the fact that Killian absolutely, 110% does-not-give-a-shit about the power imbalance between them.

I have GRAVE fears for Cat, so long as she continues grasping this "I need to be the Legend 24/7" mindset. Even Malicia takes time off just to be Alaya with Amadeus.

Name powers or not...nothing that began as a human being can sustain that sort of drive each and every moment of each and every day. Most days, sure...but there has to be time (Admittedly in the heart of your power, where you can trust to your defenses to guard you while you let your hair down) to just take deep breaths and be a human being.

Otherwise the Name becomes a Noose. Slowly strangling everything out of you, until you don't even care whether you win or lose anymore.

Sniggs44

I agree with the general thrust of this post. Cat's behavior in this chapter seemed wrong headed. She kind of arbitrarily went from "self sacrificing" to "self flagellating".

Taking steps towards turning herself into an emotionless robot a la Black is just one (bad) possibility when it comes to becoming someone who can accomplish her goals. Another possibility is to be, you know, a well-adjusted human being whose values align with said goals. And if this turns out to be impossible, maybe take it as a warning that your goals are the things that need adjusting.

Yeah we can theorize about how the whole magical aspect plays into things, but without any solid proof one way or another it seems like her maintaining a balanced, healthy psyche would be the best way to go. Since that's generally the best way to go in pretty much any other endeavor, tbh.

That's why the "hard (wo)men making hard decisions" trope is such nonsense, because those two things aren't necessarily linked at all. She doesn't need to become a sociopath in order to be capable of making difficult decisions. You can totally cultivate a mental state that allows for, for example, being a general that regularly sends troops to their deaths while still being a morally/mentally good person. Just take the time to ensure you're doing the right thing and then align your values accordingly. It may be tough, but correcting your way of thinking usually is.

If she has niggling doubts about what she's doing, she needs to confront those thoughts and brainstorm on them, not paper them over with half measures and nonthinking. Her ditching Killian strikes me as a step in the complete wrong direction: she's become so used to feeling like crap about what she's doing that she's come to believe that it's the correct mind state someone in her position should maintain. She's trained herself to pursue being unhappy/lonely, because she falsely equates it with being effective.

Her entire outlook is skewed and frankly quite toxic, but I guess that's to be expected with this universe's dubious parental figures and lack of therapists. Still, she should really work on adjusting her outlook/though processes before resorting to this "peel away the weaknesses rahrrr" penitence stuff. (And also maybe ask for advice, since she's barely out of her teenage years. There have to be some leaders out there who have learned to manage their work/life balance.)

Keyen

It's obvious she is heading to a breaking point sooner or later. But I think it's perfectly anticipated by EE.

The said breaking point will be a renewal, either to a more neutral Role, or at least, she will manage to let go.

Somehow, I think Cat is very similar to Rand (from WoT). He think he has to be hard, unbreakable, unbendable, and it nearly destroy him in the end. Funny thing, it got solved by nearly killing his father (if you get what I mean :D)

MetruX

I actually think this just wouldn't work, not while she is a Villain. She employs morals and ways fo heroes, yes, but in the end her center is that of a Villain, ust what Black saw right there at the beggining: Heroes change for a better world, Villains change the world for a better view. She won't change her objectives, no matter how far she has to go, because that is what binds her to her mantle of Villain. If/ when she transitions to a more Neutral Name, then she can do this, and I really think she will, unless this is, in the end, a tragedy =X

Reveen

It's almost like having a quasi-fascist meat robot for a father figure would fuck someone up. Who'da thunk it.

Cold Cyberia

I don't think real life examples are applicable in this case – especially if you just list the names like that. It's one thing to have a confidant and a lover when you're at the height of your power and another altogether when you're a small fish in a very big pond.

Cat's main concern is as follows: she's much weaker than all of her enemies (the nobility, Malicia, Akua – the establishment basically) so she can't afford to have any extra weaknesses, which is what Kilian would amount to. I agree that overall the view is self destructive but it's also right – Kilian is exactly the sort of leverage Malicia would use. Cat needs to be more than she is if she wants to change the world, at least temporarily.

You don't climb the Tower by smelling daisies – you do it by becoming the scariest monster there is.

usernamesbco

I forget exactly where, but way back Cat admitted that she didn't see herself living more than two more decades. So she plans to be dead before she's forty.

Arbitrary screaming

Thanks for the chapter! *sniff* good day for the hard feels i guess.

Adrian

I have no idea how but i bet Cat will find some middle ground to save him, like sure his role will be over but instead of dying he will retire or something and get a "happy" ending along with Ranger.

PD: I say happy because i really doubt it will be a normal happy with these 2 crazy bastards xD

Nobody

Is it just me who wants Cat and Archer together? 😊
Archer is way better than Killian...

Keyen

The ship with Hierophant has already sailed, sorry.

Big Brother

I feel Archer and Hierophant will make a better pair than Cat and Archer. Cat and Thief though, that could work.

Yitzi

One "editorial" correction: "Poured over" should be "pored over".

Gerion

Help! This socially blind person here needs someone to lead him through this chapter step by step. I feel there are so many things going on between the lines I simply don't get. For example why Killian suddenly gets angry or whether or not Cat had planned to clutter their ties from the beginning.

Gerion

"cut her ties"
Stupid auto correct.

oldschoolvillain

Killian and Cat love each other, but they've been fighting. So, when this talk comes along, a nice Moonlit stroll through the woods, I think Killian was expecting to make up. Instead, Cat treated her just like another member of the gang who just needed to be understood and brought into the fold, rather than a lover. So that didn't help.

And yes, Cat did plan to cut the tie from the beginning, because they're perhaps a year away from the biggest war that this generation will ever see. In that war, Cat and the Woe will be drawing a LOT of fire from heroes, and Cat doesn't want Killian to be caught up in those kinds of fights. If they make it through the war with Proper, she might try to reevaluate the relationship and see if it can be rekindled. Overall, there wasn't enough communication between them to avoid something like this, where they both got angry. If either of them had been more considerate with their words, this might have been avoided, but honestly this needed to happen. Killian being too considerate and Cat not being considerate enough is what led to this, so Killian had nothing more to give and Catherine has forgotten how to give back. It's a salvageable relationship, I think, once Killian is a full-blooded Fae, but not until they're both powerful enough to go toe-to-toe with the likes of Warlock and the Heroes that Procer will bring down on them.

Adurna

Wow.

That's all. These last few have packed quite the punch.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What the hell does "godly brush" mean? Is that a typo? UNGodly brush would have worked fine, in an odd yet intriguing sort of way. But the phrase "godly brush" does not parse in the English language. I'm really hesitant to call it a typo though; because of the story's subject matter, that could well be important symbolism. I mean, a character is named HEIROPHANT. There's no way that phrase isn't significant, maybe extremely so.

THIS IS WHY TYPOS MATTER!!!!!!!!!! HOW THE FUCK AM I SUPPOSED TO UNDERSTAND THIS???????

Roland

Godly, an adjective which can mean coming from God; divine.

Godly Brush, meaning a divine brush. As in a painting instrument used by a god. This is poetic language.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Right, I understand that it's an adjective, I even understand the connection to the root word that it's a form of. I can see that you didn't know what to make of it either, so you threw "it's poetic!" out there as a last-godly-ditch defense. Hell, maybe it really is poetic, who can say? But being "poetic" doesn't help clarify anything. It's more excuse than explanation really.

If you're wondering, yes, the godly ditch is filled with a beatific bosage and a row of heavenly hedges. 😊

Barthumphries

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

God damnit. God fucking damnit. I really wanted Kilian and Catherine to reconcile.

nasiba

Wow, I am really at odds with a lot of the comments here. Although it was sad and Killian had very good points I completely understand where Cat is coming from and I think everyone is forgetting a lot. The girl has gone from one war to the next almost without break, against impossible enemies and situations, dealing with the deaths of thousands while constantly having her very soul changed over and over. Learning by the worst trials by fire and oh, btw, the fate of the Empire and the entire reason she is doing all this, for Callow, now pretty much determined by *her* actions. Also facing the War of the Millenium in a few months. And the death of her father figure. But she is supposed to have time so somehow deal with her first real adult relationship and all the delicacy entails at the same time? People with boring nine to five jobs often can't pull that one off. And they don't have to think that their actions might get their beloved killed on top of everything else. Get off her back, she is dealing with this the best she can.

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

Honestly, I agree with you. I really wanted Cat and Killian to work it out. But I don't really fault either of them for it not working out. It just makes me QQ.

Another thing people seem to be forgetting... Cat is now a member of the Winter Court... Killian is an obvious decedent of a Summer fae. Remember how Cat instantly, irrationally hated the realm of Summer the moment she laid eyes on it? They are doomed to be at odds with each other by their very natures.

It makes me cry... but that changes nothing.

Chapter 58: Hard Measures

"And so Subira of the Sahelians slew Maleficent and said: 'Emperor am I now, Sinister of name and deed. Let this be the truth of our empire, that iron ever sharpens iron 'til the last cut is made.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Thrones, second of the Secret Histories of Praes

There was a House of Light standing at the heart of the largest Praesi army in a century. The irony had amused me more than it should, and the sharp taste of it on my tongue had driven me to make the temple my headquarters for the night. There'd been no one to contest my decision: the lone sister remaining of the priests who'd once tended to the village now swallowed up by tents and palisades was out. Among the legionaries, I was told, tending to the wounded and the sick. I could admire the dedication, though she'd find few soldiers willing to allow her ministrations save for those of my Fifteenth. Praesi had a deep abiding distrust of anything that claimed it came without strings attached. Misplaced wariness here, but common sense in the Wasteland.

"By the pulpit, please," I told the legionaries.

A pair of broad-shouldered orcs set down my gloriously comfortable fae seat before the low wooden frame, casting uncomfortable looks at their surrounding. There was hardly anything to look at, this village being too small to even warrant mention on most maps. The House had been built in the style of the central plains anyway, instead of the more ornate Liessen ways. Walls of wood and clay, a single window in the back that was nothing more than a hole bare of glass or shutters. There wasn't even an adjoining backroom for the priests to sleep in – only a house more hut than cottage huddled up against the wall outside. A third legionary, this one bearing captain stripes on her shoulders, lingered by the pulpit with my writing tools in her hands.

"You can set those down," I said. "I don't believe we've met before. You're one of Hune's, right?"

"My cohort serves under Legate Hune, yes," she agreed, the thick Summerholm accent making it plain where she was from.

She grimaced.

"Ma'am, are you sure you wouldn't prefer your tent?" she asked.

They know where my tent is, I thought. They'll be watching it.

"Captain," I began.

"Abigail, ma'am," the woman provided.

"That will be all, Captain Abigail," I said gently. "You may go."

The Callown sharply saluted, half her face rosy in that way flesh tended to be after protracted mage healing. All the way up to the eye, I noted. She must have fought in the skirmish against Fasili and his wights. The pair of orcs followed her after dismissal, joining the contingent of guards that would be outside, and I let myself fall into the cushioned seat. Out of habit I pushed the inkpot and quill to the right side the way they'd taught me at the orphanage, reaching for a sheath of parchment and unrolling it. The soft calf skin had seen use before, though without Name sight I would never have noticed the hints of words that remained on it – whoever scraped the skin had done thorough work. Calmly, I opened the buttons of my shirt and reached for the three documents I had been keeping on me ever since receiving them. One was from Malicia, though not of her handwriting. The second bore Thief's hasty scrawl and the third was a hand I knew more than passingly, Ratface's. All of them bore names. Setting the three ahead of my own parchment I inked my quill and began to write. Two columns, the first for those that were in more than one document and the other for the single mentions. I blew carefully on the ink after finishing, and only then paused. Seven names from the first column were given a mark. Those I let dry on their own, settling into the seat and waiting for Hakram. Adjutant, ever a prince among men, did not make me wait for long.

"Masego says it's all ready," the orc told me without bothering with niceties.

I approved. This was not going to be a good night for those.

"And he's certain it won't be detected?" I asked.

The tall greenskin snorted.

"He thought you'd ask that," he said. "Should I give you the answer he prepared?"

"I assume it's very condescending," I said.

"Almost poetically so," Hakram grinned.

The flash of fang he bared was low, close to the lips and paired with eye contact. That, I had learned, usually meant amusement in an orc. Though not all of them, to my irritation. The clans from the Lesser Steppes kept to their own strange customs. He lingered after, and I drummed my fingers against the pulpit.

"Out with it," I said. "Do you need more men? Because there's only so many I would count trustworthy, and I don't want to dip into the Broken Bells for that."

"Forty is plenty," he replied. "Truth be told, I want to keep the second line you gave me after the business is over, if it can be done. I have too many irons in the fire these days for the number of hands I can command."

"I'll talk to Juniper," I said. "But Nauk's command was gutted in Dormer and Senior Tribune Jwahir is low on veterans, so I wouldn't count on it for a few months."

I raised an eyebrow after that. Another line under his command was very clearly not what he'd wanted to talk about. My mood turned sour when I remembered another matter I'd recently slid under his purview.

"Wait, is this about Nauk?" I said. "I thought that was going fine."

He shook his head.

"Hierophant took a look, like you asked," the orc said. "He'll be awake in a week, up and about in a month. You can leave that to me, Cat. I'm just worrying about our... timing."

"It had to be tonight," I reminded him. "The assault starts come morning. If we'd done this earlier she would have had breathing room."

"There are officers on that list," Hakram said, and it was not a question.

"Highest is a tribune," I replied.

Confirmation from Thief and Malicia. That one had stung more than I'd thought it would, given that he'd enrolled back in Ater.

"I dislike what this'll do to our chain of command," he bluntly said. "On the eve of the largest battle we've ever fought, no less."

"You can't seriously be suggesting we just leave them there," I said, appalled.

He sighed.

"No, not that," he said. "I just wish we'd done this early enough the replacements would be settled. Before you begin, I understand why we didn't."

"The wager's that we'll gain more than we lose from this," I said. "I stand by it."

The orc looked away, the thoughtful look I caught first eminently strange on a greenskin's face.

"It's been a long time coming," he finally said.

"I wish it was a masterstroke," I admitted. "It's why we delayed so much. But even now it's just spring cleaning, isn't it? We won't be getting all of them."

"I doubt there's a single army in the world that could boast that," he ruefully said. "Perfect is foe to functional."

A saying translated from Kharsum, that, though there was one much like it in Callow. Still, I silently admired the fact he'd managed to put alliteration in there through a language barrier.

"It won't be pleasant work," I said.

As close to an apology as I could offer him.

"Pleasant's herding aurochs back home," Hakram said. "We chose different lives, you and I."

I inclined my head.

"Good hunting, Adjutant," I simply said.

What his lips bared was not a smile so much as a row of knives. He left me to my thoughts, and though my mind was spinning it never lingered on any single thread. There were too many moving parts ahead, though thorough planning should see to the worst of it. It began in truth when Grandmaster Talbot was ushered through the door, an hour before Midnight Bell. The nobleman – as a knight he still qualified as that, even though his family's ancestral holdings were now my own demesne – was impeccably arranged even this late, dark locks combed and his beard without a single hair out of order. The cloak on his shoulders I nearly raised an eyebrow at, though the black and bronze I saw were the colours of the Order and not of House Talbot. It still looked more decorative than truly useful, but wasn't that always the way of highborn? He knelt smoothly before the pulpit, and if he'd taken any offense to a villain using holy site for writing desk there'd been no trace of it on his face.

"Your Grace," he said. "I come as summoned."

"On your feet, Talbot," I said. "I've never had much fondness for kneeling, mine or otherwise. I have work for you."

He rose as elegantly as he'd gone on his knees, but now I saw sharp attention in his eyes where before there'd only been curiosity.

"It was my understanding that the assault would begin with Morning Bell," he said.

"It will," I said. "That's not what I want you for. Or the Order, to be more precise."

"We are ever at your disposal, Your Grace," Brandon Talbot said.

Noblespeak for having not fucking idea what I was talking about, and I was glad of it. If they saw me coming... I'd kept my preparations light and quiet, but Akua had always been the better hand at this game.

"I have a list of names for you," I said. "When you return to the Order's encampment, you will rouse your men and proceed through the Fifteenth to arrest everyone on it."

The man's eyes widened.

"You have found traitors in the legion," he said.

"Most of these I've known about for months, if not years," I said calmly. "I've had Adjutant hunting for them since before he even had his Name. The intent was to watch who they came in contact with, but Diabolist has been very careful. In the end I had to rely on other eyes."

"And now you would purge them before engaging the Wastelander," Talbot murmured.

It wouldn't be all of them, of course. She'd have more, carefully hidden under instructions to lay low. But by killing what I hoped was the majority of her agents when she had no time to replace them I'd be either crippling or ending whatever scheme she had prepared. It took more than a handful of spies to carry out a plan, no matter how well-placed. I folded the parchment I'd written on and held out my hand. He hesitated before coming forward and taking it, eyes lingering on my fingers. I smiled discretely. I remembered enough of my etiquette lessons to know nobles weren't supposed to taken anything directly from the crowned head of Callow, and it was almost charming he kept to that even now. Grandmaster Talbot opened the parchment and read through, expression growing grimmer the longer he did.

"There are more than I would have believed," he said. "And Callowans among them."

"I doubt they knew who they were selling the information to," I noted. "She'll have used Callowan or Duni intermediaries. The names in the second column gave intelligence, but should not be considered agents. Just treasonous."

"Tribune Katlego," he said, eyebrows rising in surprise as he studied the first column closer. "Second in rank among Legate Hune's officers, I believe."

"I'm told hostages were taken," I said.

The Empress had written as much. But he'd folded instead of going to me, and so on the list he went.

"That is the reason there is no mark by his name," I added after a moment.

"And those have meaning, I take it," the man said.

"Those seven officers," I said mildly, "are going to resist arrest. They will, unfortunately, die in the struggle."

The knight's face went still and he studied me silently.

"Trial would be inconvenient, even with a military tribunal," he said.

"They have relatives in the Legion," I said. "Or connections at court. This will make fewer waves."

"This is murder," he said.

There was no condemnation in his voice. It was easy to forget, sometimes that while the nobles of the kingdom had been no High Lords they'd been far from being babes in the woods. Callow was no stranger to knives in the dark. His words had not been question but statement of fact, and I did not deny them.

"So it is," I agreed. "See it done promptly. Supply Tribune Ratface has a man outside, awaiting you with details on the location of everyone on the list."

Brandon Talbot folded the parchment and slid it inside his doublet before putting his palm over his heart and bowing.

"By your leave, my queen," the Grandmaster said.

I met his eyes, and did not correct him. I had few advantages over my enemies, I thought as I watched him leave, but the Order of Broken Bells was one of them. Callowan loyalists who'd been in hiding until a few months ago, and had hardly left my sight since. They were near certain to be free of infiltration and unlikely to balk at the killing of Praesi. It would not be entirely quiet work, of course. The knights mobilizing after dark would draw attention. I was counting on it, because there were very few mages on that list. Not nearly enough to explain how quickly Akua was made aware of my movements. Which meant there were more hidden, and like good spies they would report the ongoing purge to their mistress. At which point their locations would be caught by Maesgo's ward, and Adjutant would take them. A scheme, I had been taught, should always have more than one payoff. I was slow in learning, Akua, but I have learned. The lists I had received from others I put to the flame. I sent for legionaries and had my seat and affairs removed after, though I did not leave the House. I sat on a wooden bench close to the entrance, little more than a carved log, and waited.

As the hours passed I received reports, some more pleasing than others. The Broken Bells had killed twelve, not seven as I had ordered. Whether Talbot had taken this occasion to settle some scores with an excuse or whether those had been genuine accidents, I would have Hakram find out tomorrow. Adjutant caught two mages trying to reach Diabolist, one a lieutenant and Duni as well. We found the sloppy and the scared, I thought. The truly dangerous ones did nothing at all. I had considered, when planning this, snatching the lot of them from the gallows as I had once done with deserters in Summerholm. But I still remembered flames and Summer's wrath, the soldiers who'd died screaming for me, and found I did not have it in me to do it. Whatever the Gallowborne had begun as, they had been mine in the end. I would not forge them anew out of dross like this. It was near First Bell when the reports trailed off, and in the wake of that end I dismissed my guards. Returning to my tent felt like a chore, and so I simply rested my head against the wall in the corner of the House. I knew, closing my eyes, that Adjutant would have people close by. It was enough.

I closed my eyes, and sleep found me. An eternity later, I woke to a soft hand on my shoulder.

"Dawn approaches, my friend," a woman's voice told me. "The Legions have sounded assembly."

I'd been entirely awake from the moment I was touched, and drew back the hand that had gone for my sword out of habit. There was a woman standing at my side, barely out of girlhood. Her fair hair was kept in a thick braid, and her robes were simple. The sister, I thought. I was surprised they'd let her in at all, with me asleep. From the corner of my eye I glimpsed a legionary sitting in another corner, and while the sister turned away I dismissed him with a nod. One of Hakram's? Most likely.

"There's time yet," I said.

The woman laughed softly.

"I did not think the Legions so lenient," she said. "You must be an officer."

She doesn't know who I am, I realized. I was not wearing armour, and my clothes were well-made but nothing ostentatious. My blade was a longsword, not standard issue, but a priestess might not have noticed that.

"I am," I replied amusedly. "It's going to be a long day, regardless. A few moments of respite will not be begrudged."

"May I sit?" the sister asked.

"It's your House," I shrugged.

"Not mine in the slightest," she said, though she sat at my side regardless. "I was glad to hear the Fifteenth does not forbid worship of the Gods Above. Places such as these should be refuge to all, no matter their oaths."

"The Empire's never been heavy-handed with the priests," I said. "No reason General Juniper should be different."

"Or the Black Queen, I suppose," the sister mused. "We do live in interesting times."

I snorted.

"No denying that," I said. "Maybe a little less troublesome, after today. With the Diabolist gone the work of fixing this country can begin."

The priestess smiled to take away from the bite, but shook her head in disagreement.

"Will it?" she asked. "Evil warring on Evil cannot result in Good."

I laid back against the wall, eyeing the light peering through the hole ahead. I had at least an hour left, long enough to wash and eat before muster.

"I was told never to argue philosophy with the sisters, when I was a kid," I said. "But that seems too dismissive by half."

"I care little for arguments," the sister said. "But discussion is one of the tools the Gods granted us to make the world a little brighter."

"Shall we discuss then, Sister?" I teased.

Her face grew serious.

"Saving one soul is saving all of Creation," she said.

From the Book of All Things, that. One of the more sentimental quotes, and not one I put much stock in. Even if Malicia embraced the Heavens tomorrow, the Empire wouldn't change in the slightest – save maybe with the addition of her blood on the floor.

"Ah," I mused. "Hard to have a discussion with that premise, isn't it? I don't really think we believe Evil to be the same thing, when it comes down to it."

"Then teach me," she said. "I would not close my ears to the truth."

"You know, I was raised on the same stories as you," I said. "I used to believe that Evil was mostly about a good ol' rousing round of hangings and sundry blood magic."

The blond priestess smiled gently.

"But you don't anymore?"

"You could say I've had the benefit of an extensive education on the subject," I replied. "The way I see it, Sister, Evil is about refusing to play by the rules of the game."

She frowned. It was a pretty look on her, as I imagined most were. It would have been a lie I didn't find something attractive about purity, though power had always been what I preferred.

"I'm afraid I don't quite follow," she admitted.

"It think starts with asking why," I said. "Why should I forgive? Why should I not kill? Why should I obey? And eventually you realize that there's all these rules handed down to you and then you get to the real question – why shouldn't I just do whatever the Hells I want?"

I chuckled, the sound of it resonating in the near-empty House of Light.

"That's when you realize the answer's pretty simple: because someone thinks I shouldn't, and will stop me if I do."

I let out a long breath.

"Most people stop there and become a minor league sort of evil. That one jackass in every village that always talks shit, the merchant that short-changes you or another corrupt judge."

My fingers idly closed around the pommel of my sword, thumb rubbing the leather wrap around the handle.

"But once in a while, you get someone who doesn't flinch. Who decides it's not enough, and replies: try me. And then they pick up a sword."

I met her eyes and offered her a half-smile.

"That's Evil, I think – walking past the line in the sand and refusing to apologize for it."

The look on the Sister's face was unreadable.

"You sound proud."

I shrugged.

"Proud is a strong word," I said. "But it's been some time since I was ashamed of it."

"Strange," she said softly. "You did not strike me as someone who would embrace fear."

It was my turn to frown.

"I think you might have missed my point."

She shook her head.

"The way of thinking you just described assumes that the world around you is your enemy. That is not courage, it is fear."

I laughed.

"Look around you, Sister. The Diabolist is stealing cities, the Principate is marauding near the borders and just two years ago the south was in open rebellion. The world is full of enemies."

"Because you treat them like one," she told me seriously. "If you solve all your problems with swords, swords are the only reply you will ever get."

"That's a nice sentiment," I replied, "but it'll be cold comfort when the Procerans invade."

She sighed.

"Ah, borders. I've never quite understood why they matter so much to people. You draw imaginary lines on the land and tell people to remain on one side, as if ink and parchment could make you its owner."

I had quite a few scathing things to reply to that, but since she'd been polite enough to let me speak uninterrupted I supposed I should afford her the same courtesy.

"Do you know why the House of Light does not preach rebellion against the Empire? Because it doesn't really matter, whether we have a king or an empress. Rulers come and go, but what really matters doesn't."

I raised an eyebrow.

"And what would that be, exactly?"

"Trying to be better," she told me, and passion shone in her eyes. "No one is born Good. It's something you have to work for every day, and sometimes it can seem like more trouble than it is worth – but what else is there?"

She leaned forward.

"So many of us see life as a race and will do anything to pull ahead, but that is the conceit of a child. If we all cross the same finish line the only thing that matters, the only thing that can matter, is how we get there."

I grinned, but it was more a show of teeth than mirth.

"Sentiment like that is how they get you every time, Sister. So what if we all cross the same finish line? Down here in the mud is what really matters. What we make of it. And if I only have so much time kicking around Creation, then I'm the one who's going to decide how it's spent. Not the Gods, not whoever's got a crown, me. I own my life, and damn anyone telling me I need to live it abiding rules that are just a key to the other side."

She met my eyes, unafraid.

"Life is what you share with others," she said. "Hoard it and you will die all the poorer for it."

I ran a hand through my hair, frustrated that she just wouldn't see what I saw.

"You don't even get to set the rules you live by," I said. "You're a leaf spun in the wind deluding itself into thinking as long as it behaves it'll land somewhere nice."

She smiled, eyes gentle and sad. The kind of eyes you gave someone who was so far lost they didn't even remember what the path looked like. Her pity burned me harder than Summer's flame ever had.

"And you think your way will let you choose where you land?"

My mantle roiled under my skin, the weight of all the choices I had made and would make, the sum of what I was and would be.

"That's where you're wrong, Sister," I told her, "I don't want to be the leaf – I want to be the storm."

She laid a gentle hand on my wrist.

"In the end," she murmured. "I choose to believe that being Good matters more than being strong."

"In the end," I replied clearly, "I would rather be wrong than be cowed."

And what more was there to say, after that? I rose, letting her hand fall away.

"Be safe," she said. "There are great dangers about."

I smiled, feeling a sliver of grief for all that this was.

"Oh, Sister," I said. "All those dangerous people? I'm the one they answer to."

Stormblessed

I'll say impasse hoping for a reaction of the priestess finding out this was the black queen she was talking to, but it was a good discussion nonetheless.

stevenneiman

I suspect that at some point during the conversation she figured out who she was talking to Cat wasn't exactly being subtle. I'm genuinely curious whether she was somebody important or if she was just an unremarkable priest of the Gods Above.

corrado alamanni

Funny how for all her talk about wanting to be free cat is evermore bound by every evil act she feels is necessary

Gunslinger

Cat's been taking a lot of lessons from Heisenberg, what with all those badass lines.

Ohh and do vote for The Guide on topwebfiction (<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>). Ward might be hard to top, but we can definitely get more votes than Worm.

The Quietist

Oh shit wildbow stared the second parahumans series?

Idan Dor

We are three arcs in not including the prequel arc of GlowWorm. So far so good.

therealgridlock

It's already over and I cried, I needed more.

Fulmi

To be honest, i love the sister's perception of what being "good" entails.

Ninith settler

It's the other way around. Worm > Ward.

Darkening

I really can't tell if the sister doesn't know who Cat is for this whole conversation or not. Hm. Nice to see Thief showing her usefulness as spymaster for the Woe, nice to have sources that aren't reliant on Black and Malicia for information.

stevenneiman

Nah, she's just a spy and either Aisha or Hakram (I forget which) is the spymaster. She's a Named spy and useful for other reasons besides, but she's not in charge of other spies.

DroughtBringer

Great chapter. It was enjoyable to see the sister's point of view.

ArkhCthuul

Agreed.

And as many wondering if this is not much more than a simple sister.

Engineer

Bad. Ass.

Big Brother

I actually enjoy the glimpse of the "Good" side not focused by the Hashmallim, but through the eyes of one who follows willingly, un-Named.

So far we've only had fanatical points of view on "Good" from both sides; William, Black, White, Bard, Contrition, I believe there was a small rant by Warlock, correct me if I'm wrong there,

Good Name-vision Cat, Evil Name-vision Cat, Malicia, and the First Prince. This Sister marks the first person I can remember willing to discuss the opposing views of Good and Evil rationally and calmly with Cat. Good for her.

taborask

Yeah, there is surprisingly little argument on the Good/Evil question from the light side of the aisle, given the subject matter of this series. Which makes sense, given all the protagonists are Evil but still

Decius

Why do you think that the one who spoke to the Black/Death Knight about Good and Evil would remain unNamed?

Big Brother

Not everyone Cat talks to /has/ to get a name. Some characters can just be throwaway characters. A conversation with a merchant doesn't mean that merchant becomes an Essential NPC. Why should a discussion of Good and Evil with a priest give her a Name.

letouriste

hum...i don't know what make of this talk.that looks a lot like the ones i have with my parents:/

taborask

I've created a subreddit for general discussion, if anyone wants to be a mod or has suggestions let me know (I've never made a subreddit so I probably made some party fouls in the rules/descriptions)

<https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/>

Keyen

Funny to see Car is the position where she is the one "who doesn't get it", especially since she doesn't realize that and think the sister is missing the point entirely.

Nice chapter BTW, liked the reference to the famous quote: "If the only tool you have is a hammer, everything looks like a nail."

SentenRainen

So, I see Cat has now met the Wandering Bard.

SpacyRicochet

Yup, that's what I initially thought as well. Though I'm not sure how much body-swapping is allowed for the Wandering Bard. I have the feeling she might be stuck in her current one for the moment.

The nun is suspicious though. Undoubtedly good, and maybe even Good.

Vortex

She was way too sincere and reverent to be the wandering bard. All of the bard's incarnations have been drunken and sarcastic. The bard also understands Black and Cat's brand of practical evil very well, while the sister needed some explaining.

Personally I hope the sister gets a Name in the upcoming battle, I would like to see Cat interacting with a genuinely good hero in a non-hostile manner. I am not sure Thief counts exactly.

Thea

Getting along with unquestionable heroes is... difficult. It would go directly against her Name, which is depowering or lethal, as we saw when she let the Lone Swordsman go. Maybe it works if they're not in conflict or in different stories, but... difficult.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What's your rationale for that? If you're just wishful guessing you might want to mention that somewhere

Ward

Cat at the end.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Huh?

Jonsensical

Hahaha

soonnanandnaanssoon

Oooohh this is my prediction. Cat kills the spies. Diabolist smirks and thinks she has the upper hand since the spies did their job and fed some of the Fifteenth Still Water reagents. Battle begins, Cat gets a bit of the upper hand, Diabolist converts them to zombies. Cat converts them to Winter zombies.

Then all hells get unleashed. Perhaps literally for one or two Hells

Tohron

Interesting, I was thinking along a similar line, with Cat interrupting the zombie ritual to make them into a group of intelligent Winter zombies, to replace the Gallowborne with Abigail leading them.

Thea

Have we had a chapter like this before? Where Cat isn't recognized at first and has a discussion similar to this? Maybe even in a church? Maybe Marchford before the devil n demon assault? The overall flow feels very familiar, even if the details clearly are not.

Wonder if this is a Name thing, reflection scenes, chances to change your ways... Looking forward to the third one since I liked these so far.

narcoduck

Book 2: Chapter 28: Prelude

She talks to an innkeeper and her daughter, incognito.

Keyen

Book 2, Chapter 28 (Prelude), she was talking to a innkeeper. But it was quite different.

Rustndusty

It occurs to me that Cat's attitude in this ties back a little to last chapter: love means allowing someone else authority over you, and that isn't something she can do anymore.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Cold Cyberia

It would be cool if the Nun became part of Cat's group, sort of like how Scribe is an unofficial Calamity. It's not very likely, however people bitching about how mages aren't as good at healing for three books makes me hope we will see priests incorporated into the Fifteenth.

LM

The most important thing I took from this chapter is that Catherine has forgotten why she fights. It doesn't seem like she has real purpose, the direction that makes a name more than just a walking natural disaster. The purpose was what made her strong before. Both via narrative and through her will. But now she just seems angry. A mad dog cornered and biting

Dana

Isn't that kind of purpose-decay inevitable? Since Catherine's putative goal – making Callow a better place – doesn't seem to be the consequence of her activities.

Ninith settler

Cat = August confirmed. She doesn't fight for good, and she doesn't fight for evil. She just fights!

Riri

The most important thing I took from this chapter is to be reminded why commenters and reviewers aren't actual writers or authors. Because they have no idea what makes a good story or interesting characters. They just want things to happen because "it would be cool". They want things to happen because it suits their world view or because of bias towards or against a specific character. For all they say they do they don't seem to care about the actual narrative anywhere near as much as they claim, it's all entirely "in the moment" thinking and I can't help but think that if they were given the opportunity to take over the plot or to influence the story in any real way that it would definitely suffer for it in both the short and long term. It's something that I've read before and agreed with before but reading these reviews has reminded me of this fiercely. Let's just see what the future and proven author will bring us, instead of short paragraphs by those who can barely see in front of their noses.

~Riri

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"The most important thing I took from this chapter is to be reminded why commenters and reviewers aren't actual writers or authors."

You say that like there's some sort of strict separation between the world's reviewers and its authors. Reality couldn't be further from that. That being said, your comment is, on the whole, mostly truth-y, but that opening statement seems to betray an ironic incomprehension: for in truth there are many skilled authors who are also reviewers, and it's no-one's fault that they're not here reviewing this particular work.

Just a little reminder of something you likely knew.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Heh, I've made this exact observation before. I called it fanboyism, and it really does ruin the comment section for intelligent conversation. Who knows how much we're missing about the story because smart readers are discouraged from collaborating?

But I guess lots of readers here are small children, I mean who else would clamor for an obvious one-time throwaway character to become a Named all of a sudden for no reason? And then they do it all over again when next week's minor characters are their favorites ever. I've had dogs that were more discerning.

The worst part is that it's self-perpetuating. It fuels itself as all the fanboys click "like" on each other's inane wordvomit, further encouraging that kind of thing.

The worst part is there's no good solution to the problem. We could try discussing elsewhere, but the extra effort going to reddit or spacebattles is a real barrier. And obviously no one wants the story to have less readers. All we can really do is sit back and hope the education system is doing its job...

Aaahhhh-hahahahaha 😊 😊 😊 😊 😊

The Warren Peace NFL Report

The worst part is if it ever happens that some rando does get a Name, they'll all have "called it," and from there it's a slippery slope to rock bottom: everyone posing from a dumb phone.

Eh. The worst part is trying to think of new jokes at 4am

Thenre

Holy shit I just realized Catherine started a sword in the Stone story and got made a queen. Now she's getting called a Queen. That story isn't over, it's still influencing events and that's fucking incredible.

Reveen

Pffft... yeah okay kid.

The idea of owning your own life doesn't really work when you spend your life chasing threats, fighting the next baddie, dealing with political bullshit. The Legion, Callow, Black, Malicia all basically own her at least a little bit. Your choices and how you can live your life are inherently limited by your environment, your responsibilities, and who you are as a person. True freedom and self-ownership are impossible.

danh3107

Not to mention gods eh, I think that's what Evil (big E and from the perspective of the choice versus gods giving us rules narrative presented in the story) is all about. Trying to achieve true freedom and self ownership, hence Black trying to break the story, to win just to say he had.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I can't help but wonder if this entire chapter is built as a vehicle for the one line, "I want to be the storm." And it IS a badass line, but it reminds me of something I read long ago. Some advice for aspiring writers was to find your favorite line and to delete it. Otherwise you'll end up bending backwards, trying to restructure everything else to preserve that one line.

This chapter is called "Hard Measures." I don't see how that ties in to anything either

Cold Cyberia

The "Hard Measure" is the ordering of execution of more than two dozen men under Cat's command.

I don't think that one line was all there was to this chapter. The whole point was to show that Cat was tempted by Good but ultimately refused and fully committed to being Evil, right before the big battle too. It's classic storytelling.

AVR

Committed to being Evil? Talbot didn't blink an eye about capturing spies and killing some. It's a hard measure... but a Good leader might have done the same.

PracticalFanboi

Loved this chapter. This sounds like a really good place to end the series. I feel this shows that Catherine is pretty much too far gone at this point and a complete mutual defeat against Akua would be a beautiful conclusion

green

...okay then. I'm putting a mental bookmark on this chapter; I Strongly Suspect it will turn out to have been Important later on. There were... a couple of pivots here.

Jakku

I feel like Cat is too attached to absolutes. Good and Evil are things the gods have set. Cat breaks stories and patterns, as seen with the Fae. Cat needs to realize that she can choose a path that is neither villain nor hero. She doesn't need to take on the mantle of White Knight or Black Knight, if she doesn't want to.

Would be amazing to see Cat forge a new story and emerge as something like a Gray Knight, which I think will help her forge a new path for Praes and Callow.

morroian

Great character interaction but the fact that none of the traitors are well known means the cleaning house lacks impact.

vuthuha912

She is not wrong you know. The priestess makes an excellent point, if everyone is a little better, we are all better. Yet, it is so fragile, isn't it? Progress can be subverted. Homosexuality was completely normal in most of the Ancient world. It was completely normal in any places that don't have the influence of Christianity. However, some people said that it was a sin and people died for it. Women's rights go from the Tang dynasty to the Song dynasty. The ambitious, the lazy, and the greedy drive society forward as much as the goods. Who would invent the plowing machine if he was content with doing it the hard way? Every single ruler in the past is a terrible mass murderer. Both the good and the bad. They murdered their former friends, their family, and other people. But they also build and nurture. They put people down and get them in line to do some massive good for the rest of society. Their achievement lasted a lot longer than their reign. We just need to have a limit so that these little evils won't destroy the rest. We need laws and institutions that last longer than one man's life. We need education so that the next generation is better than the last.

That is why your father is going to fail. He keeps trying and trying but he is the only one doing it. He is still trying but he is tired. The rest of his comrade settles down and stops trying. They are making small compromises that slowly undermine everything he built. They try to smother the one he nurtures while the enemies are getting larger by day. None of them understand anything about building. They are there to destroy because the good of others means less good for them. Or, they can't separate the good bits from the bad bits and choose to stomp on everything. Or, some of them are just stupid. You are the one who is going to keep trying where he failed. You have people working with you who won't stop trying.

Chapter 59: Anacrusis

"Peace is a fine thing, but war is the crucible of crowns."

– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

There was something oddly intimate about being dressed, even if it was with steel instead of skirts. It began with the grieves, Hakram kneeling at my feet to tighten the straps. He was tall enough there was need of stool to put my foot on, since even kneeling he still reached near my chin. He had clever fingers, belying their size, and though he was not gentle he was quite meticulous. Then the pua, the long thigh and lower leg piece with an articulation at the knee. Over my aketon I put on a shirt of mail in the legion style, six interlocked rings spreading into a thick cover, and as he reached out for the vambraces I set the breastplate over the mail myself. The straps were hardened leather, reinforced with iron, and they creaked as I tightened them. I held out my arms for him to fit with the vambraces, watching his face crease with concentration. Pauldrons followed, marked only with the Miezian numerals of the Fifteenth instead of the heraldry and titles that were gathering to me like flies to honey. Armguards were adjusted to my comfort and articulated gauntlets finished the portrait. The fingerbends looked like fins, I'd always thought. There were usually stained red by the end of a fight, with either my blood or my opponent's. The gorget clasped tight around my throat, and though uncomfortable I knew better than to whine. I'd killed enough people through the throat to know leaving it open was sheer stupidity.

I'd expected to be presented with my old open-faced helmet as the last of steel to bear, but what I was offered was different. This one was not of Legion make, with hinged cheeks and a flat noseguard in front. It had a long tail to cover the back of my neck, true, but there was a flap in the back through which my ponytail was meant to go. The cheeks were fully covered, going into a long angled mouthguard crafted so it would rest against my gorget. The strip of steel that served as noseguard was shorter than I was used to, and above it was a ridge of steel meant to prevent blades sliding down into my exposed face. What had been forged above the ridge was what had me frowning: it was crown. Black iron set into the helmet, not jutting, but a crown nonetheless. My eyes flicked to Adjutant.

"You know I do not wear ornate armour," I said.

"I know your teacher does not," the orc said, and pressed my palm against the steel. "It is not him we follow."

This isn't a squire's armour, I thought. It is a queen's, and her crown is black. For all that I had avoided the regalia of my rising rank, it seemed it had finally caught up to me.

"Vicequeen," I reminded the orc.

"For how long?" he asked quietly.

I winced. Months, perhaps a year. But Black was not one to go back on his word, and he'd given it. A crown for me, so long as I readied Callow for war. Maybe he was right. Maybe it was time to get rid of the fig leaf. Past a certain point reticence was more arrogance than humility. Or, even more to my distaste, a form of fear. I lowered my head and let Hakram set it down on my brow. The cold touch of steel was no burden, but the promise it bore was different story.

"It is fitting, I think," I murmured, and Hakram's eyes met mine. "That you would be the one to crown me."

His face twitched at that, a flinch only half-swallowed. My gauntleted hand reach for his arm and squeeze him comfortingly.

"I have relied on you for so many things, since you were my sergeant," I said.

"I did what I could," Adjutant replied gruffly.

He looked away, and were he anyone else I would have thought him abashed.

"We made a deal once, under moonlight," I said.

"That was no deal, Catherine," the orc said. "That was an oath and I stand by it. I called you Warlord then, and I don't regret it. I don't keep to the old ways, not like Nauk, but it is no empty word. I haven't used it since because it—"

He scowled, unsure of himself for once.

"It's not the right title, not for the two of us," he finally said. "Too shallow in the wrong places. We are more than war."

It was times like these I understood how peculiar Hakram truly was, compared to others of his kind. It wasn't his temperament, or his way with people. There was an underlying threat to the way orcs like Nauk and Juniper and every other orc I'd met saw the world, and in Adjutant it was absent. I thought much of the Hellhound, but never would I imagine her saying we are more than war. It would go against her nature. To my general peace was the wait between campaigns, rule a necessary evil best left to the hands of others. Since he'd come in my service, Hakram had acted in myriad ways: diplomat, steward, tactician and warrior. A confidant, too, and how many times would my temper have led my astray if not for his calming influence? It'd been my Name that gathered the Woe, but it was Adjutant who was keeping them together. That much was becoming undeniable as the weeks passed. It would have been easy to dismiss this as part of his Name, becoming whatever I needed him to be, but Names did not come from nothing. There had to be will behind them, an intent to fill the gaps I left without ever realizing it. There were a great many victories to my name, nowadays, but few of them would have been possible without the tall orc quietly going behind me and doing the labour I never even considered needed to be done.

I wondered if this was what Scribe felt like to Black: a limb whose absence left you a cripple in all the worst of ways. I'd made much of my feelings for Kilian, lately, and the ever-complicated knot that was my relationship with my teacher, but if I had to name the person I loved most in the world it was the orc standing in front of me. Because he'd chosen to trust me when he had nothing to gain, long before a Name came into it. Because he was a decent man and he still believed in what we did – and as long as I had that, that shining truth tucked away in the back of my mind, it did not matter what horrors I hitched my course to. Hakram was perhaps my closest friend in the world, but more than that he was compass. Without him I would be lost in more ways than one.

"Oaths bind both ways," I said. "The part that is mine to uphold, do you judge it upheld?"

He laughed quietly.

"You've always kept your eyes on the horizon," he said. "On the next task, the next enemy, the next war. Look down, Catherine Foundling. See where you are."

In his deep-set eyes there was something feverish, the fire he always kept under lock and key let loose for my sake.

"We're winning," he said. "Just by standing here, we're winning. Because they only rule us only as long as we let them, and the moment that truth bleeds it dies. They can kill every last one of us and it won't matter, because as long as the banner's been raised once someone will rise to carry it again."

Baring fangs, he met my eyes.

"They wouldn't let us have a seat at the table, so we broke it," Hakram said, and there was a savage satisfaction to him. "That will not go quietly into the night, no matter what happens today."

"It's going to get worse," I said quietly. "After Diabolist. We know her kind, what it can do: rise tall and fall just as hard."

It's the people behind her we need to end, and they've owned the Wasteland since before it had that name."

"How tall the spears, and great the host," he spoke in Kharsum, cadenced and low, "This empire's bier, of graven ghosts."

His smile grew sharp, and there was not a thimble of mercy to be found in it.

"They say the last of the Warlords spoke that verse, after the Miezens destroyed the holy grounds of the Broken Antlers," Hakram said. "We were great, in those days, great as any power birthed since."

The Beast stirred under my skin, coiling lazily as it tasted the stench of death in the air – death past, and death yet to come.

"That's the thing with eras, Catherine," Adjutant said, hard-eyed and proud. "They come to an end. So let's bury it together, the two of us – this fucking Age of Wonders they built on our backs."

I clasped the arm he offered, and it felt like an oath.

Liesse looked like the gates of some godforsaken hell. The walls of sun-kissed stone had covered in great runes and the pale blocks had withered like fruit on the vine. Atop them stood unmoving thousands facing us, and though this was a fortified city and not a fortress they were tall ramparts and well-built. Behind them the labyrinth of alleys and shops would be crawling with wards and undead: we'd bleed for every street. I'd taken this city once before, fought my way through the Lone Swordsman and his army, but this was a different kind of threat. This was Akua Sahelian, and though I bore her no small hatred I would not deny she was cunning, ruthless and powerful. The Diabolist had called the last of the Truebloods to her side, gathered sorcerers and warlocks and every breed of practitioner the Wasteland could boast. The elements unleashed was the least of what I could expect. There would be devils, and perhaps even demons. She'd gone too far to flinch at the notions of what might come if she failed. What made Akua dangerous beyond all that, though, was displayed before the city.

Thirty thousand undead stood, but not in simple ranks. As I marshalled armies from every corner of Callow, Diabolist had prepared her grounds to receive me. A ditch had been dug and palisade raised behind it, wights with spears massed behind. Three bastions of rough stone had been raised behind, filled with mages and what few siege engines she had. No great fortifications, these, but our own trebuchets and scorpions would be lower on the ground and would have to be brought into range as hers awaited. To the sides of the ditch stakes had been hammered into the ground with broad depths, a clear deterrent for my knights. The nature of my forces was not unknown to her, and she knew that between the two of us it was me who was pressed for time. There'd been talk of assaulting the other walls, since this front was so deeply fortified, but though there would be such an attempt the main thrust would have to be through this direction. It was where the gates were, the weak point in the defensive wards. The fortifications facing Procer were the newest, since that side had once been facing Lake Hengest and had lacked any fortifications, but since then she'd raised walls atop a sharp slope of beaten earth and anchored wards in them. The stretch between those walls and the Ducal Palace had been made into a killing field worthy of Summerholm.

It was the most direct way to the heart of her ritual, but the casualties we'd taken forcing our way through there would be... staggering. That knowledge, about the anchor of her ritual, had come without any need for spying. Above Liesse, Akua Sahelian's madness was laid bare for all of Creation to witness. Pillars of darkness rose from the roof of the palace half a dozen leagues into the sky, where their true nature was revealed: a cage. Like claws the darkness clasped a gargantuan orb of roiling smoke, ever-moving and testing the confine. Only a handful of people on the field knew the true nature of it for sure, though I suspected the Warlock would divine it after a closer look. He'd helped design the containment wards about to be activated around the city, after all. The souls of the Deoraithe cast a heavy shadow on the morning sky, becoming more a stormy dusk the closer one came to the city. Millions upon millions, accumulated since before Praes stood a single nation or the Miezan so much as caught sight of Calernia's shores. It was, I thought, almost as deep a desecration as Akua's casual slaughter of a hundred thousand innocents. Almost.

"Not impressed," Archer volunteered. "Now if she'd set the sky on fire that would be something, but this is just decorative."

"Shut your fucking mouth," Juniper spat. "Lord Black is about to speak, and if I miss a single word because you're whining you'll regret it."

The Fifteenth, for once, would not take the vanguard of the fight. That would be the duty of the veteran legions, with my men serving as a mobile reserve to be deployed when the city was breached. The field outside was not ours to take. I'd gathered most my people regardless, since the Woe would have duties before it came to the fighting in the streets. Thief was the most glaring absence, come to camp only for a few hours when we'd first arrived and then disappearing into Liesse again. She'd given me priceless information, though, and though she would not be fighting there was one last task ahead of her. Hierophant was clearly bored out of his skull, impatient with anything that did not involve toying with the wards he'd spent several weeks designing, and Archer was even worse. She'd gotten restless the moment she saw the armies arranged, spoiling for a fight. Juniper's general staff stood with her and as usual Hakram was the lone isle of serenity to be had. As for Robber and his cohort, they were my knife in the night. What I had in mind for them did not involve being out in the open.

"Archer, don't assault my general," I said absent-mindedly. "I don't have a spare."

Juniper sneered in my direction, but did not comment. She'd been telling everyone to be silent for a half hour now, long before Black was even close to making an appearance. He was out now, though. Atop his dead horse barded in steel, in bare plate from head to toe and black cloak streaming behind him. He'd offered me the right to make the address, but I'd declined. Speeches had never been my strength – I worked best with small numbers. I would have to learn the skill, eventually, but this was too important a battle for fumbling. Horse passing before the armoured ranks of the Legions, my teacher slowed his mount and came to rest. When he spoke, it was with sorcery behind his voice: there was not a soul in our host that would not hear him.

"We have fought this war before," he said, and his words washed over us like a wave.

There was pause, but not long enough for stillness to set in. I could admire the skill of it – his fame as an orator was not unearned.

"Forty years ago, we fought it from the Steppes to the Hungering Sands," he said. "Twenty years before that it was fought as well, and again and again all the way back to the days of the Declaration. A thousand battles spanning a thousand years."

The Black Knight's power filled the air like a haze, and even where I stood I could feel it whispering to me.

"Legionaries," he called, a bone-deep shiver giving answer. "Look atop those walls and know you face a millennium of blood and arrogance staring down at you. You know that banner. Your fathers and mothers fought under it, against it. Under that standard Callow was bled a hundred times. Under that standard, Praes tore itself apart at the whims of the mad and the vicious. Are you not tired? I am."

He laughed, a thing of dark and bitter anger.

"I have fought this war since I was a boy," he said. "And so have you, in every shop and field and pit there is to be found in this empire. There is no peace with this foe, only struggle from dawn to dusk."

His voice rose.

"Legionaries," he called. "You of Praes and Callow, of Steppes and Eyries, you have fought this war before and won it. Forty years ago, we broke the spine of the High Lords. Yet here they stand before us, fangs bared. Will you let this challenge go unanswered?"

It was the orcs that begun. Feet stamped the ground, swords were hammered against shields. It came and went like a summer storm, deafening in sudden fury and sudden absence.

"I will not tell you our cause is just, for justice does not win wars," he said. "I will not tell you victory is deserved or assured, for Creation owes nothing. If the world refuses you your due, then declare war upon all the world."

His sword cleared the scabbard, the sound of sharpness and steel a call to war.

"On this field, on this day, two truths rule," he said. "There is only one sin."

"DEFEAT," sixty thousand voices screamed back.

"There is only one grace."

"VICTORY."

Shields rose, swords unsheathed, horns sounded and with that last word filling the air the Second Battle of Liesse began.

Amazing chapter!

I wonder how much power Black used for that speech...

Leor

None. Warlock does the voice spell.

joanneeve

Black and other named can put power from their names into their words. It is not just a thing Warlock does.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

But he didn't do that. Merely making your voice sound over long distances is very different from Speaking.

greatwyrmgold

Doesn't mean Names can't do other things with voices. Given how important clear speech is for ~~dramatic moments~~ fulfilling most Roles, I'd be shocked if there wasn't some Name trick for vocal amplification.

Jeffery Wells

It said in one of the early chapter that Warlock does the enchantment for his speeches. Black could probably do something that would work, but it would be 100x easier and more effective for Warlock to do it.

BryceWilliam

its like D&D, monologging/banter is a free action. In terms of power cost, prince mc arrow throat proved it isn't a free action fight wise.

but the gods love a good story, and what good story doesn't have a power speech right before a battle? id be surprised if that speech cost him anything at all.

stevenneiman

It was amplified by sorcery, not Name shenanigans. And I would assume that the effectiveness of the speech didn't rely all that much on active use of Name power. It was a combination of good speechwriting, sincerity, and the powerful emotions that he tapped into, with maybe a bit of people subtly picking up on the fact that he was about to start unleashing all three Aspects.

danh3107

First some more poetic Kharsum, a verse Tolkien couldn't have made any better, and then a speech that could pale any comparison from high fantasy.

Awesome

Big Brother

One Sin, One Grace is actually a statement I live by now. It perfectly reflects my opinion on how everything should work. Oh, and Black giving a "Heroic" inspirational speech just before the big engagement to the entire assembled force atop his horse? Yeah, I'm all in on him dying in this fight now. Were he a Hero, he'd make it out to his "Happy Ever After", but as a Villain, he just popped all the Red Flags.

Simurgh

"One Sin, One Grace is actually a statement I live by now. It perfectly reflects my opinion on how everything should work."

That's... pretty concerning, tbh.

Big Brother

My thought process has always been morally "questionable", but recent events in my personal life, as well as global events, have tilted it to the point of being clearly Evil. An Eye for an Eye, 100 Fold is perfectly fine. Someone intentionally trips you, knock 'em down some stairs. Breaks your phone, break their arm.

Make it clear they shouldn't screw with you unless they're ready for the consequences. After all, there are billions of us. A couple thousand gone won't really make a difference, from a statistical standpoint.

samshadar

It certainly would quickly lead to a very polite society.

Gunslinger

When even the Simurgh finds it concerning...

therealgridlock

Do you hear screaming? I swear I can hear screaming

Letouriste

Stop calling everything heroic^^

Giving a speech is also normal for armies of villain and minions and the content is brutal. a hero would have said something about the massacre of liessen people or the souls tormented in the sky, or the demons or anything he/she see like atrocity fitting to face. black basically said he doesn't care about all that, he only care about winning.

Nobody

You really should not get influenced this much by fiction, we are not living in the same world as Catherine. With this mindset, it's only a matter of time until you find some troubles for your life...

Well, it's not like you'll take my words seriously, but I tried.

stevenneiman

Being influenced by fiction isn't a problem inherently, the problem is in making poor choices about which parts of which fiction to be influenced by, and how. For example, one could argue that the lesson of Genocide Man is that the ends justify the means, but it could also be that it's easy to convince yourself that you're doing the right thing.

wehrmacht

Someone's being chuunibyou...

Big Brother

Congratulations, you made me use Google. It's not just "being edgy". I'm a polite and decent person unless/until provoked. I simply don't have the patience to put up with people getting in my way.

amc

but – remember that in this mini-arc – black and cat *are* the heros. they're fighting against someone who raises devils 😊 and we know that subtle distinctions count in the story here...

JC

"I have fought this war since I was a boy," he said. "And so have you, in every shop and field and pit there is to be found in this empire. There is no peace with this foe, only struggle from dawn to dusk."

This is a good story.

"Legionaries," he called. "You of Praes and Callow, of Steppes and Eyries, you have fought this war before and won it. Forty years ago, we broke the spine of the High Lords. Yet here they stand before us, fangs bared. Will you let this challenge go unanswered?"

THIS IS A BAD STORY.

glassgirlceci

First update since I caught up! I love this story so much...
I'm so happy we got to see one of Black's speeches. I can imagine Juniper fangirling madly inside, and that definitely lived up to the hype. On the other hand, just another death flag for him 😞

But I just have to say, thank you so much for writing this. I love it 😊

Letouriste

You caught up at just the right time^^ that battle is bound to be interesting

Metalshop

Holy shit. That was such a good chapter.

As I was reading it, I thought I was going to put my favorite quote from Hackram, but then I realized that I'd need to quote basically all his lines from the chapter, and then I got to the Carrion Lord's speech and it knocked them all right out of my head.

There's been a couple times where you've made me really viscerally feel what makes him the central threat of the empire and this one is honestly the best.

ArkhCthuul

Indeed.

This whole chapter is eminently quotable.

And amazing. Really, top notch.

Valkyria

Can't wait for the big battle to finally start... I bet Cat has some nasty badass plans prepared to finish Diabolist – with style

taborask

A reminder we've got a subreddit now:

<https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/>

So there's a place to discuss general story stuff that isn't specific to particular chapter

haihappen

Did I just read that correctly? Cat is giving in to the Crown and attached Name!? Or is planning to, at least. Or is she slowly giving up fighting it?

Engineer

Mantle at the moment, but I think Mantles have the potential to become Names in truth.

George

I'm pretty sure mantels are just for stuff like far titles that are directly attached to some sort of magical power. The crown is 'just' an element in a story.

Cold Cyberia

Two of the most important questions are still left unanswered. Is Zombie the Third around? What happened to Cat's cloak made from the banners of her fallen enemies? Because if they were destroyed in the skirmish then... well, some victories aren't worth the cost Cat. That cloak was badass.

oldschoolvillain

That cloak is more ceremonial than functional – it'll have Akua's colors stitched into it before the end of the book, mark my words, but it has little place in a battle.

goliath1303

You don't think there's a place in battle for a cloak that was enchanted to resist magic? Plus, who knows what is deal is now. It seems like something passed from mentor to student, worn by the preeminent current villain, and adorned by the banners of enemies that span from regular humans – corruption twisted cataphracts – the Winter and Summer Courts might become more important than the sum of its parts in a story like this. Even if all that is wrong though, there's definitely a place for a cloak that protects you from magic when going up against The Diabolist and her host of horrors.

kdreyes09

Oh my god Erraticerata I had such a shitty day and this chapter made it. Thank you.

Drd

I'm sure I'll be corrected if I'm wrong, but if Cat transitions straight to the Black Queen, does the Black Knight really have to die..?

I know all the death flags are out on parade, but could we be getting played here?

Could Black become highly injured, in a manner not fixable (this is the Diabolist), and go on to become Cat's highest adviser maybe?

Can you imagine the state the poor hell hound would be in every time Cat calls for her general staff!

Engineer

No, this battle is definitely Black's swansong.

Nostradamus

"In music, an anacrusis (also known as a pickup, or fractional pick-up) is a note or sequence of notes, a motif, which precedes the first downbeat in a bar in a musical phrase."

The next chapter is gonna suck for Cat.

Gunslinger

From the opening, almost erotic description of armor wearing to the final speech by Black, it was quite fantastic prose. Brilliant stuff.

Oh no i commented earlier saying: "Omg eraticeratta i had such a shitty day and this chapter made it. Thank you."

I realize this may seem like i was saying this chapter made my day shitty and I was coming off as a sarcastic ass. Sorry, sorry! Didn't mean to.

APGTE is what I look forward to every week, I was just particularly tired today and was in a rush while typing.

Apologies, again. Another amazing chapter. Love Nauk and Cat.

I must have missed it when it came up... but what in Liesse is worth the damage being done to the legions? Can't The Sovereign of Red Skies use that trick again?

Or soften the fortifications with goblinfire, if the catapults can't deliver it to wherever Akua is.

Engineer

I think I figured it out how Diabolist is going to make Cat "kneel".

First up facts:

- a) Warlock said Cat is becoming more Fae (other) than human.
- b) Diabolist's Role is control of all beings foreign to creation not just demons.
- c) Diabolist has an aspect called Claim which gives her sovereign control of all foreign denizens.
- d) Claim was shown to be powerful enough to control a Prince of Summer.
- e) Cat is about on par in terms of power as a Princess and has a patchwork structure around her soul that Warlock (another soul expert) said is "one spell away from coming undone".

There's no way in the Hells Diabolist doesn't mind control Cat and forces her to kill either herself, the Woe and/or Black. That's probably why she sent that mage envoy, to gauge how much Fae Cat has become. To see if Claim will work on her.

Yeah, Cat should really stay the Hells away from Diabolist.

Engineer

Edit* The aspect is Bind. But Cat has Break.

Bind vs Break.

Patchwork on Cat's soul tips the scales in Akua's favor.

... Damn.

Big Brother

Ah, but if Black Queen is actually a Name that Cat transitions to, then she should, by Right of Name, become a stable vessel for the power of Winter inside her, seeing as she's the only member of the Winter Court since the Winter King and Summer Queen got hitched and merged the two Courts into a new one.

Not to mention, that Winter power is bound to her soul, and will likely make the transition to her next Name as well. Shifting into a new Name with power like that might cause changes in the Named to stabilize the power into a base to build even more power on top of. You don't build a house on a foundation of loosely stacked logs after all.

This is purely speculation on my part however, and I look forward to being wrong with this like most of my guesses are.

Sol Invictus

in this universe, being at a disadvantage is favorable. Cat has never won a battle that was not against overwhelming odds. except that one time the enemy just fled before she got there

Cold Cyberia

Cat's biggest advantage is having a group of Named. I'm pretty sure that when it comes down to it Masego can help her out or maybe they've already prepared some contingencies.

In fact, I would be surprised if they haven't. This is Cat's biggest weakness and it's been brought up several times now – not addressing it would be dumb. Akua might be a step ahead though, you're right in that.

> I'd killed enough people through the throat to know leaving it open was sheer stupidity.

Plus, getting ironically shot in an unprotected throat is one of the very few ways Named villains can permanently die to random NPCs.

Mike E.

I believe once Hakram was in a bad spot, then tore out the throat of his attacker with his teeth, making a comment along the lines of "that is why you should always wear a gorget". Plus there was a of the badass hero who took a chance arrow(?) to the throat in the middle of a Heroic speech.

Misterspokes

The Shining Prince (Tyrant's Brother) wore enchanted armor that diverted projectiles, which killed him because he was a vain idiot and didn't wear the helmet, forcing an arrow that would have plinked him in the breastplate to lodge itself in his throat.

if cat takes Black Queen as her name, then the Black Knight does not need to be killed off. kind of funny that they became chess pieces.

Decius

“Heirophant” is a close enough match to “black bishop”, leaving room for a corvid companion.

Moginheden

“The straps were hardened leather, reinforced with iron” hardened leather is very similar consistency to wood, (it shatters rather than bending) then you added metal so it’s even less likely to bend... the straps on armour need to bend in order to be able to fit through the buckles. The rest of the armour description was good, but that line threw me off, (thick unhardened leather does creak when you tighten straps made of it.) maybe try “The thick leather straps” instead?

Villainous Interlude: Crescendo

*"Then let us be wicked,
Let us be reddest ruin
Rent, broken, crooked
Black hearted and cruel*

*Then let us be doom,
To both friend and foe
Fly banner of gloom
We lowest of the low*

*Rise, rise all ye villains
You rogues and madmen
Proudly claim the stage,
Of this wondrous age*

*We are not kind or just Deserving of any victory
We are a thing of dust
Promised only misery*

*So smile, Tyrants,
And let us be wicked"*

– Final monologue of "The Many Deaths of Traitorous", a play on the reign of the Dread Emperor Traitorous

In the depths of the city of Liesse, beyond layers upon layers of wards and traps, there was a room. For more than a year it had been slowly crafted to perfection, and for years before that had Akua Sahelian spent days and nights refining its design. Removing impurities and inefficiencies, balancing ease of use and breadth of effect so that only a single soul in all of Creation could use it as it was meant to be used. Should she live for a hundred thousand years she would never make anything half so great, for it was the culmination of everything that she was. All that she loved and hated, all that had made and fought her. There had been a child, once, who looked upon pyramids of mud and blood and felt awe. At the skill, at the scope, at the power that still dwelled within – and though Tasia Sahelian had toiled greatly to make a hollow husk of that girl, a mere receptacle for her ambitions, that spark of wonder had never been snuffed out. It had grown into flame, and that sacred burn coursed through her veins today. And it whispered of triumph.

Diabolist felt the city pulse like a living creature, arrays of sorcery spread across it like arteries all leading back to the heart that was her. In this moment, she knew, she was half a god. How easy it would have been to grow drunk on that might, had she been of a lesser line. But she was a Sahelian, the blood of the original murder. The killers of the first empress, who'd writ the truth of Praes in blood and treachery. Her forbears had been kings and queens, and Tyrants more than once. Rule, the ownership of power however fleeting it may be, was nothing less than her birth right. Walls of carved stone around her were as a pond, and on those reflective facades she saw the Legions of Terror standing with a man before them. The Black Knight, she thought, spoke well. Yet it was wrong, for him to be the speaker. It should have been Catherine Foundling, her match and mirror. Her red right hand in the making. Once she had thought too little of the Squire, believed her to be nothing more than tool and obstacle, but how she had learned since. Fasili had once remarked it was a shame Foundling was not born Praesi, for she had the seeds of greatness in her, but Akua knew better.

It had to be this way. It was the fire, the righteous indignation that made Squire who she was – a burn no lesser than Diabolist's own. If she'd never been crushed underfoot, she would never have risen from it fangs bared. The Soninke closed her eyes and smiled. She could glimpse the ending of their story already, grasp the edges of its shape with her fingers. Akua would break Catherine Foundling, shatter her beyond repair, and the creature of jagged edges and hatred that remained after would kneel at her feet. And what a fearsome monster she would be, upon emerging from that crucible. She would sweep through Diabolist's foes with fire and sword, a woe on all she faced worthy of the name bestowed upon her. It made Akua shiver in pleasure just to think of it. The Diabolist opened her eyes and let the words of the Carrion Lord burrow into her ears. The only distraction was her father's shuffling at her side, for there was only one seat in this room and it would not tolerate the sitting of any but her.

"He's not wrong, Mpanzi," Dumisai of Aksum said. "They say nowadays that the legions won that civil war, the orcs and the goblins, but I remember it still. The Calamities owned it body and soul: it defined them as much as their Names. Better not to fight them at all."

Spoken, she thought, as a man who could have been the Warlock but chose obscurity over the uncertainty of struggle. The odds, she knew, would not have been in her father's favour. The Sovereign of the Red Skies had begun to earn his title when he was still the Apprentice, and though claimants gained powers when embracing their claim Lord Wekesa would have had the full might of his old Name behind him. Yet it was never a certainty, that an Apprentice would become the Warlock. Praesi Names were never easily won. Akua loved her father, but she would not deny that in the face of offered greatness he had flinched.

"I do not hate them," Diabolist said. "Nor the Empress. For all their flaws, they sought to make our people rise. I am not Mother, Papa – I do not despise what they are. It is a mistake made in good faith, and killing them was never the point of this."

I am surpassing them. If that must involve taking their lives, then so be it."

And how long had she dreamed of this, of escaping the shackles? The Carrion Lord had been right, in part. They could not win the war by repeating the same defeat with a hundred different fresh faces. But the pair that ruled Praes had abandoned everything that the peoples of the Wasteland were to avoid another disgrace, and that was a betrayal greater than mere failure. They could win and still be Praesi, Akua knew. Go to your grave gladly, Black Knight, having learned the truth of that – you were, for all your weaknesses, a patriot. She would not deny the fearsome depth of that loyalty, however twisted it was. The man's words ended in the tired adage of the Legions, screamed back by the soldiers, and Diabolist rose to her feet.

"Go," she told her father. "And stay safe. You are worth more to me than petty victories."

His arms wrapped around her and for a heartbeat she was a child again, his chin nestled atop her head.

"Live," he whispered. "Whatever the cost, whatever the consequences. Live. Nothing else matters."

"Believe in me," she asked.

"'til my last breath and beyond," he promised.

No empty words, coming from a sorcerer who knew the mysteries he did. He left after that, the passing warmth of him lingering behind. Diabolist stood before the rune-inscribed walls and laid a single finger on them. They lit up like a starry sky, reaching for a hundred different arrays spread across houses and bastions and pits. The Carrion Lord had spoken for the ruling order, for the woman who held the Tower. She would speak, then, for the Wasteland. For the Empire that was and would be, for the greatness that was not yet forgot. Akua Sahelia stood proud, for there was more to her than mere ambition.

"We are," she said quietly, "the last of the Praesi."

They would hear her, her words carried by sorcery worn and ancient. They would hear her and know they might be wicked but they were not wrong.

"The Tower," Akua said, "is in the hands of a woman who would rule us forever. Before us stand her legions of dupes, led by her most loyal hound. You heard them speak of dues, and so know they deny the oldest truth of our empire: there are no equals."

It was like drinking spring water, to speak words she truly meant instead of whatever must be said to gain. Relief, that after years of scuttling in the dark she could raise her true banner.

"There are the rulers and the ruled," she said. "The greater and the lesser. To deny this is to deny the Gods themselves, for that is how they made us. And now our Empress bows and scrapes to a conquered people, ignoring the reality that saw them conquered."

She let silence ring loudly.

"Power," she hissed.

There were others in foreign lands that would call this ugly truth, but she spoke to Praesi: the people of altars and pacts, of naked ruthless ambition. What she offered them now was the song of their ancestors, sung anew with fresh promise.

"Twenty years ago, we were more powerful than the people of Callow," she continued. "Twenty years ago we were better than them, for beyond all the lies and stories that is the bare truth of Creation: the powerful own the world."

A laugh escaped her lips, sharply mocking.

"They call themselves a different breed, these hypocrites, but what is arrayed before you? Mere force of arms."

And her people knew steel, that old friend of ambition. How many of their ancestors had claimed the Tower wielding it?

"In the end, all they are is another movement in the Great Game. The enemy might be powerful, but that should bring you no fear."

She leaned forward, hard-eyed.

"Iron sharpens iron, and when we emerge victorious we will be so sharp a blade as to make the world tremble."

Akua smiled, a display that should have been beneath her but at this last pivot of her life was not.

"Glory in this day, sons and daughters of Praes," she said. "The Age of Wonders is upon you, and though it is great and terrible to behold, let Creation remember this – so are we."

And in the wake of her words, as the Legions advanced and flanking forces sallied, sorcery bloomed. No wild cheers, from the people of the Wasteland. Acclaim came in the form of death unleashed. A thousand mages stirred to action, and when they struck it was with the wrath of a people cheated their destiny. How long had it been, since Calernia last saw the finest of Praes moved to war? Too long. With every streak of lightning and storm of flame that balance was redressed, and in the face of steel a rolling wave of power was sent forth. It would have swept the legionaries aside like kindling, had it touched them.

It did not, because the Sovereign of the Red Skies had taken the field.

High above a star was born, and it came into the world with a keening cry. It pulled the sorcery like a withdrawing tide, swept it upwards until it was filled and a ring of raging sorcery detonated across the sky with a sound like thunder. The mage lines of the Legions, these half-mages minted and spent like cheap copper, gave answer. A dozen rituals burned and massive lances of flame were sent at Akua's bastions, but what did she care? These were but pale imitations, and the original stood arrayed against them. Half the lances dispersed within a heartbeat of being thrown, the formulas torn apart like the half-baked jokes they were, and the rest were turned against their own side. The fires changed from lances to beasts, lions and snakes and tigers, and with dull roars they attacked the advancing legionaries. Dozens died incinerated within moments, before the Carrion Lord lent the weight of his aspects to the men and led them through the inferno. Lead, Akua thought. Conquer. Not tools for the killing of heroes but for the leading of armies, and as the Black Knight's mantled came upon them the legionaries became more. Swifter, stronger, indifferent to the raging flames.

The Diabolist did not strike as the Sixth Legion followed the Carrion Lord in his sweeping advance, turning her eyes to the sky instead. There a single silhouette rode a winged steed stolen from Arcadia, cloak of many colours streaming behind her. An artefact in the making, gathering weight with every fallen army stitched onto the rest. Already Akua suspected sorcery would slide over like water off a duck's back, and it was still nascent to its true form. Squire would strike at the heart of the enemy, for that was her nature. Not through aspects, it was too early for that, but Catherine Foundling had another signature. The winged steed passed over the ranks of dead manning the entrenched palisades, deftly avoiding spellfire from the bastions as a simple knife cut down what appeared to be sacks tied to the sides of the mount. When the first arrow took flight from impossibly far, flames coating it, Diabolist almost laughed. There it was. One, two, three – eight in whole. Every single sack of goblinfire was ignited while still dropping, and fell like green rain over the wights. Some reached the bastions filled with mages and engines, but there were panes of force awaiting. The goblinfire burned into them, but they were thrown aside and her sorcerers left untouched. Her general's careful experimentation with the most dangerous tools of the Legions had paid fruit.

Diabolist returned to her seat, settling against the wooden frame as her eyes remained fixed on the unfolding battle. Soon. She would have preferred to let the Legions overcommit, but the Warlock would soon go on the offensive and he was not to be taken lightly. The Fifteenth, she saw, was not part of the assault. A reserve, likely kept for when the walls were breached. It would serve other purpose, but Akua was not displeased. They would be tied up regardless, removed from the equation. That was how her enemies would lose, in the end. Dispersed to deal with half a dozen threats, they would fall one by one. The Sixth Legion reached the outer field of traps, and Akua's mages triggered their arrays. Within three heartbeats what had been an empty field was filled with howling lesser devils.

And then they died.

Diabolist froze, blood going cold. Every single devil summoned by the arrays had turned into red dust before so much as striking a blow. The Warlock's doing, it could only be him, but how had he known? He'd have needed to begin casting before the triggers, which meant... Someone has studied the lay of our defences, she realized. And done so with a great deal of precision. Akua's fingers tightened around the arms of her chair. It might be assumed that the devils in the secondary arrays would meet the same fate, and without them serving as a slowing mechanism for the advance of the Legions then soon her palisades would be under assault. And with the goblinfire already thinning the ranks of the dead, they would break. Now. It had to be now.

The Diabolist breathed out and her mind stilled. It'd been seven years now, since she had separated her soul from her earthly flesh. It had spared her ugly end in this very city, once, and from that it was likely her foes had come to assume it was a measure meant for her preservation. To ensure that even if her body was destroyed, she could invest another and continue her plans. As it happened, that had merely been a fortunate consequence. Akua had removed her soul in preparation for something... greater. In the depths of the Ducal Palace, where the anchor of her great working awaited, a small cylinder of pure obsidian covered in runes lit up. Inside it was bound her soul, but it was no mere phylactery. It was a key. Her soul touched the untold millions of dead Deoraithe she had caged, connecting to the greater weave. All over Liesse runes burned bright, the glare alone melting stone and shattering wood around them as the greatest ritual Praes had seen since the days of Triumphant began.

Runic letters formed in front of her, a contract written, and then she gave the sorcery shape.

On the plains to the flank of the encroaching legions, a dot of yellow flame formed. In it the contract she had written shone, and the flame grew. An empty circle was forged, the diameter half a mile wide, and the yellow flame solidified. Creation screamed, screamed in protest as it was ripped apart forcefully and the Hellgate opened. Not a Lesser Breach, but a Greater. The first since the fall of Keter, and unlike the Dead King she would not be forbidden a second. The souls of the Deoraithe were not spent, merely thinned, and would coalesce again in a matter of days. It would take her even longer to stabilize her own, but the true terror of her work was the scale. Distance meant nothing, to sufficient power. She could open a gate in the heartlands of the Principate without moving ,if she so wished. Akua Sahelian's army was the entirety of all the Hells, and as the first devil crossed her gate, the binding she had written in the flame leashing it to her will, she laughed. The host at her disposal was without end, and she had crafted this ritual so it could only ever answer to her. The array was part of her, as much as any limb or drop of blood.

Waves of wasted power coursed into the escapements she had designed so very carefully, empowering wards that would have taken hundreds of mages to use and just like that Liesse... disappeared. Forced half a step out of Creation. There had been a reason that she had chosen the southern city out of all the governorships she could have secured. The corpse of the angel, though left behind, had ensured that Liesse was always slightly askew from Creation. Easier to move, and given clear boundary by the ancient wards surrounding it. And so now the city was out of reach, save for one entrance she had crafted herself. It lay at the heart of her fortifications on the plains, and the enemy would bleed themselves dry trying to take it. All that planning from the clever generals on the other side yet here they stood now, the forces meant to assault the walls on the sides utterly useless and the exposed flank of the army facing endless onslaught.

Hell began pouring out of the Breach, and the Diabolist smiled the smile of a woman who was going to conquer the world.

Woah...

No more words.

NerfContessa

Rereading.

And at a second reading, I still can't find enough info to have seen this coming.

One can hate Ubua, but she is brilliant.

therealgridlock

It was mentioned a few times the difference between a lesser breach and a greater breach, it was even mentioned that she constructed her breaches with bindings built in so the ensuing hordes followed her rule,

It was really as simple as assembling a puzzle.

When you give a diabolist an enormous amount of power and a way to permanently harness an endless amount of demons, what do you get?

A greater breach.

It's almost obvious enough that it should have been obvious to the protagonists but I don't think they knew about the bindings ubua had been practicing, only that she was a diabolist with insane power. I'm the kind of paranoid that "diabolist with insane power" would make me prepare for an infinite horde of demons anyway, but I don't know if these characters are that kind of paranoid.

danh3107

Huh, and endless supply of fodder a nearly unassailable castle, that's fucking brilliant.

WCN

Holy shit

JC

" The host at her disposal was without end, and she had crafted this ritual so it could only ever answer to her."

Sorry Malicia.

The disappearance of Liesse... does that mean Cat rules over part of the Hells now?

Darkening

Well, there's always mindraping her with Speaking, assuming she's correct about it being unusable by anyone else. I doubt Malicia would care too much about having to turn someone into a brainwashed puppet to use her weapon. That does assume Akua survives the day, which Black and Cat are hilariously unlikely to allow if they can possibly avoid it.

Joebojoe

That's what Thief and Squire are for. I'm sure that the Immortals were designed to not conceivably run on Winter either.

Vhostym

The principle of sorcery is usurpation. Also, since Akua is a villain, the mere claim that it is unusable by someone else is the assurance that it will be used by someone else.

Still though, a very nice setup for a climactic showdown. And I'm hoping that this is what Malicia intended when she referenced using Akua, because otherwise that likely means she had something else up her sleeves.

stevenneiman

I think she forgot about the part where she earned her name summoning demons and devils and then having Cat beat her up and steal them. I'm just wondering whether she'll keep the breach open or close it after she deals with Akua. Probably close it, devils are a pain to deal with even if you do control them.

RoflCat

>She could glimpse the ending of their story already, grasp the edges of its shape with her fingers. Akua would break Catherine Foundling, shatter her beyond repair, and the creature of jagged edges and hatred that remained after would kneel at her feet. And what a fearsome monster she would be, upon emerging from that crucible. She would sweep through Diabolist's foes with fire and sword, a woe on all she faced worthy of the name bestowed upon her.

So...Akua's plan is possibly binding Cat's soul or something after crushing her, to make her a forever loyal minion?

...Somehow I get a feeling that's a terrible idea given all the tidbits of Callowan revenges we've heard about.

Or rather, considering that while Akua have shown she can do necromancy, Cat is the one who made her Winter-zombies army, so if this Story is going to end with one of them crushing the other and force them into submission, my bet is on the one whose whole reputation is crushing any fuckers who try to crush her.

Dainpdf

Cat has a whole *thing* with the undead. She has used them as bombs, steeds, armies... She's even been undead herself.

Erfling

Whispers abound through creation:

Squire died once already.

Squire uses corpses as weapons.

Squire raises armies of the dead to fight for her.

A Squire must become a knight, but who says it has to be only Black or White?

Dainpdf

Nice catch. Death Knight incoming?

usernamesbco

I can't see it.

Catherine always had greater ambitions than a mere knight. She told Hakram she intended to be queen. Not just any kind of queen either, or else she would have accepted the deal from Contrition. That had too many strings attached.

I'm not sure what her final metamorphosis will be, if she even makes it that far. I kinda want to see her curb stomp the Gods on both sides for making Creation just to settle a stupid bet, and only giving everyone in it two equally crappy choices. "Live life your way and perpetually lose no matter what" versus "Submit to the will of Heaven and you'll win no matter what" are not good choices. Especially with Name shenanigans admittedly warping the minds and personalities of people on both sides.

Big Brother

This is why I love Akua's perspective. Honestly, she's had just as much, if not more, growth than Cat throughout this story. And the ability to open multiple Greater Hellgates wasn't even close to what I thought her superweapon would be.

soonnanandnaanssoon

It's more than just opening a Greater Breach. Liesse is a mobile fortress. Imagine a flying castle landing near you, opening a hellgate and then phasing out of creation so you can't damage it while a swarm of devils and potentially demons assault you. It's simultaneously a long-term offense and a short-term defense given mobility and reproducibility. I'm honestly impressed.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Edit: I misread the distance part. The ability to spawn a devil spawning point is from anywhere in Creation is strategically terrifying.

sheer_falacy

It's stronger than that – it doesn't need to land near you. She believes she can open a greater hellgate anywhere in the world. She just opened this one nearby because of the enemy armies.

Apathy-Peeves

Actually, slightly wrong here. Akua could open a Greater Hellgate anywhere on the continent without moving. She just opened it where it currently is because well, that's where she need it.

Tolack

I have a hope that I can't see happening, but hope I shall. I want to see Akua "live, no matter the consequences" be subjugated by Cathrine. I just can't see a better nemesis for Cat other than Akua, and I wonder just what it'd look like to have Akua work for Cathrines goals. Bloody good writing.

Big Brother

Heh, maybe Cat can Break Akua of her bad habits?

Vortex

Also consider that a greater hellgate is what created the first Dead Kingdom and that little area is one of the scariest places on the continent. The Dead King has his own collection of dead heroes he has amassed over the years.

stevenneiman

Honestly, I don't think she's really gotten any character development. She's only acknowledged half of one truth since the story started (that Cat is important to her story, but not that Cat has any real chance of beating her despite being blatantly set up as the protagonist and having surprised Akua with her success every time they've clashed). She's had a lot of character **revelation**, especially in this chapter, but that's very different from character **growth**.

And yeah, her superweapon is utterly terrifying. I wonder how it's going to end up broken/deactivated/turned against her.

me.me.here

My bet is that her body will be killed. She's turned her soul into the key to using the superweapon, but that just means Cat will have Hierophant usurp her autonomy and have her spend the rest of eternity as a lynchpin for the Woe's use of the Greater Breach Generator.

ArkCthuul

I agree meme.
That would be.hilariously village.

Also, that is a much smarter and less directly kablooy superweapon than expected, well.done!

Engineer

Cthulhudamnit its WEDNESDAY!!!!!!

... Eh heh, that was positively delicious!

werafdsaew

Taking out her trump card so soon? Tactically it is sound, but narratively it is stupid, as it ensures that the enemy has all the initiative, leaving you with nothing to counter whatever surprises the enemy has to offer. Contrast this with Black Knight's fight against the White Knight, where he avoided using his last aspect until the White Knight used his.

Gunslinger

Yeah but she realizes that thief did leak all of her plans and traps meaning the warlock would have planned for them ahead of time. This is why pure magic build is a dumb idea Akua

NZPIEFACE

A pure magician build that was a hybrid of trap and summoning.

Great idea to get a city and use a year to set it up.
Shitty of her to forget thief.

wirelessgrapes

Yup, her plan lies solely on her superweapon, rather than on her ability to plan around what the enemy is doing. She left them with a (nearly) full bag of tricks. Hell, Cat hasn't even used a freaking aspect yet. The Fae we're arguably a tougher enemy, even though this will be Cat's defining victory of the Book.

amc

Isn't part of cat's legend her unpredictability? there was some quote early on about boxing cat in and how she'd take the box and beat you with it...

it's probably a good idea for any opponent of cat's to realize they can't out-weird her, and just not try...

Thanatos

Yes but that's half the point. Diabolist hates that Black fights in such a strategic, calculated manner and using only the force necessary to win. It doesn't matter to her that it works and this chapter exemplifies that mindset and why it made some of the Tyrants so terrifying.

Here Diabolist has riled up her enemy and seen them defeat what they believed to be one of her trump cards (her bound devils) and the moment they thought they were winning she showed that all there efforts were wasted against her. That sort grandstanding victory is far more important to Diabolist's character than any advantage that hiding her trump cards could give her.

Gunslinger

Bloody hell this was brilliant. Right from the poetry at the start. That Akua was going to open a greater breach was expected, but the ability to open any number, across any distance, without fear of Keter's due is scary.

On a side note I am not sure what the passage describing Cat means. Is it the cloak turning into an artefact that deflects magic, or is it Cat that would simply deflect magic. The latter would be the logical option but the passage does not make it clear. Also I wonder if the Diabolist knows how thinly Cat's soul is bound and is planning on "binding" it under her service. Either usurp the protection Masego added or force Cat to renounce her humanity, turning into full fae and then some secret part of her bind aspect would allow her to control her.

Darkening

She refers to sorcery sliding off the surface of 'it', so I assume it's the cloak that she's saying would repel sorcery. Interesting to see objects can take on power just by being in proximity to a named and being part of their narrative. It certainly makes sense, and is a fun idea. Wonder if Ranger's swords are special in a similar way? Hm.

---

Well, this is the cloak Cat has been given by Black, and she already mentioned during the fight with the Duke of Violent Squalls that it could already resist magic. The main property of the artifact would be something else.

TheCount

i like the idea as well, its certainly good to give major characters a signature item, even more so if they can grow with them. There is the pure awesomness and heartwarming when a normal item you started with from the begining stays with you and becomes a mighty artifact as you go on:D i dont think its only ranger's sword that are like this, probably her cloak as well.

now, we can guess what the if and what the other named's items are like this:D

(i think the legion is Black's 😞 )

NZPIEFACE

Following on what Count said:

Hakram – hand
Hierophant – eyes
Archer – bow
Thief – pouch
Squire – cloack

naturalnuke

Swords that can cut anything because they have a long history of cutting everything? That sounds like and rangeresque artifact

Author Unknown

Forged in Goblin's Fire,
Quenched in Winter's Chill.
This Mantle,
This Mantle of Woe.

Proof against sorcerous ire,
And naked steel.
This Mantle,
This Mantle of Woe.

Stitched by an undead hand,
A band for every foe.
This Mantle,
This Mantle of Woe.

naturalnuke

I love you, and the name you gave the cloak.

Engineer

Chills.

Damn, EE is gonna have a hars time topping that.

TheCount

Nice one, would listen to the other parts of the song too... its just me, or its similar to the ring's story from LOTR?

narcoduck

It's interesting that Malicia plans to usurp Akua's superweapon, a mobile fortress that can open the gates of Hell, while Cordelia has her own superweapon termed 'the Stairway' (Heroic Interlude: Riposte). Can anyone say MAD?

Dainpdf

The problem with MAD is that they would have a pretty stark cold war going... With the difference that Cordelia could never depose Malicia because whoever came after her would probably press the button, consequences be damned.

Oshi

Malicia uses her own enemies to insure her eternal rule and the safety of The Wasteland. Pretty fucking evil in my book and perfect for whos she is.

jor

"Her red right hand in the making" whats it mean??

Nostradamus

Akua wants to conquer Cat as much as she does Calernia. She means for Catherine to become her soulbound Black Knight and serve as her right hand, likely steeped in blood.

NZPIEFACE

:lenny:

Nafram

Well, now I know for certain that, even should Akua win this day with seemingly impossible odds on her favor (a nearly impregnable fortress and a virtually inexhaustible supply of troops with her enemy likely caught off guard), then she wouldn't survive much longer. Sure, she would likely become a second Triumphant, but the whole "Open portals to hell anywhere and control all demons that come out of it" thing is too much Hero bait. She would be flooded by every single hero in the world, and eventually, one would succeed. Should humans fail, then the Dwarfs and every other Superpower out there would be out for her blood once she started expanding out

Euodiachloris

And, she's created herself a Bond Villain fortress OF DOOM! To the right Hero, it might as well be putting out a Welcome mat with the key to the control room under it. I can see why TWB doesn't really mind Akua all that much: she's got a limited shelf-life. <_<

Any bets on trapdoors/shoots somewhere to dump people into? Maybe a small hellgate? No? 😊

NZPIEFACE

TWB? Whats that?

Cold Cyberia

@NZPIEFACE

TWB – The Wondering Bard, if I'm not mistaken.

Dainpdf

Yeah, that's the problem with her superweapon. How long before an anti demon hero appears? Exorcist, Inquisitor, Templar or something like that?

Petya

He may appear right now. You never expect the inquisition...

Porkman

The dwarves seem like they wouldn't put up with this.

Like seriously, what is the depth of said gate to hell?

beleester

When the Dead King created his breach, the Dwarves said "Nope" and sealed up every tunnel that got near his domain. I imagine they'd do the same here. They're strong, but they're not **that** strong.

(Plus, they're Dwarves. They know what happens if they dig too deep and uncover demons from Hell.)

stevenneiman

Gotta agree with you. The way I see it, there are two possibilities: Either her powers really are beyond anything else in Calernia or they aren't. If they aren't, then everyone will band together to defeat her, and if they are, the gnomes will probably make an exception to their "only stomp on nonmagical technology" rule.

oldschoolvillain

Oh gods, Triumphant (may she never return).
Remember what Robber said, way back when? "When she croaked it, several of her legions went down with her. Odds are they ended up in the same place. Old girl conquered more with less."
Triumphant has been brought up a couple times already this book, and EE has shown that they can set up long term Chekhov's guns. What if Dread Empress Triumphant is about to return?

amc

terrifying!

d_o_l

Alright, place your bets on who's dying:

Diabolist 3:1

Black 3:2

At least one of the generals 1:1

Warlock 1:3

At least one of Cat's crew 1:4

Killian 1:5

Hakram 1:6

Thief 1:8

Hierophant 1:10

Archer 1:15

Malicia (cause fuck it, why not?) 1:50

PhDEevee

I'd put good money on Warlock dying, actually. Why? 1) Akua is playing with boundaries, which is Warlock's strong point, which means he'll probably do something. 2) Black seems to have started a story arc where all of the Calamities die (and I bet he or Ranger will be the last. 3) Warlock's son has come into his own name (it's no longer relevant to teach Apprentice). And 4) Warlock's already shown signs of coming apart at the seams.

Zayits

Yup, and don't forget the claimant to the Name of Warlock she currently has in the city.

Halinn

I'm going to go with an option not on the list: at least one entire Legion.

NZPIEFACE

Istrid dies and Juniper more than takes up her mantle.
Diabolist dies, but not to her own machinations, and not to any other sorcery. She dies a clean death under the blade of Squire.

Black dies at the same time as Diabolist. The death of the two fuel her ascent into a Name greater than that of a Knight.

Everyone else is fine, Lillian maybe not so.

5 is a magic number for groups.

Letouriste

Black will not die before a long time, he is still too plot relevant and his dying now would lead to Malicia killing Cat so 100% unlikely. 99%?

I think one or two generals could die + Diabolist and her father for sure.

Warlock should not die here, I think Black still needs him narratively and I doubt that guy could die easily anyway, too intelligent. The others should be safe, injuries at most.

MetruX

Actually, Malicia is only helping Cat because she wants Cat on her side AFTER Black's death. There on the beginning, when she first sent for Cat to come speak with her, she said that Squire is to succeed a Knight, and that she thought that is why Black chose her. So if Black dies, Malicia just stays the same with Cat.

werafdsaw

Black still needs to purge the Wastelands, and he himself said that he has a few more years to live.

letouriste

@metruX: yes but that was BEFORE she pretty much proclaimed herself queen and gained all that strength. She is useful but really hard to contain and I doubt Malicia would hesitate much to kill Cat if her plan to delay or even stop the crusade succeeds.

From what I understand about Malicia, all her plans have several benefits. She helped Cat against the fae and at the same time she enforced her control on her. She made Cat doubt Black etc...

She hopes Cat will not threaten her position that way...but she also is ready to kill her if that is judged necessary. She is not close to Cat emotionally and she is probably ready to fight her close friends if they are not useful anyway;)

stevenneiman

To be clear, do they have to stay dead to win?

amc

add to the list:

cat (later resurrected through name-shenanigans) 2:1

(she's done it before, after-all.,,)

---

So, I take it that Akua doesn't know yet that Catherine had recruited the Thief, nor that she probably entered the city before the fighting even started? The only reason why Squire wouldn't use the same trick as from the skirmish with Fasili would be getting to the phylactery to Take over the army or the ritual, and Akua had left her only one entrance.

Also, depending on how thoroughly Vivienne had studied the escapement system, Warlock might be able to Imbricate the city back. I mean, Hedge Wizard already did something similar in their fight (only she phased into Arcadia, and the Diabolist knows enough about Squire's powers to not go there; she'll probably use the same dimension from Triumphant she moved the church in the second book to).

Shoddi

*presses knuckle to forehead*
May she never return...

...however, with a brand-spanking-new, half-mile wide Greater Breach that just opened up, that Praesi oath might not hold up much longer...

blarg2429

I've long felt that "may she never return" is a phrase which, due to the rules of Creation, makes Triumphant's eventual return likelier each time it's uttered.

It really seems like one part possible foreshadowing (out-of-story) and two parts tempting Fate (and due to tempting Fate, also serves as foreshadowing in-story).

Euodiachloris

Good point well made. Also, I bet Triumphant could always find a use for a summoning soulstone pendant after a teensy little necromantic surgery to ensure complete obedience...

glassgirlceci

Holy freaking hell, that was beautiful. Maybe all the chapters have been this way, and I just haven't noticed because I've been binging until now, but I feel like this chapter is up there as one of the best written. The language in the first half of the chapter was especially poetic, but the battle was also chilling and awe-inspiring, goodness.

You paint a terrifying picture of Cat as Akua's red right hand...I... kind of want to see it? But not in any serious way – Akua has earned her place as one of the most infuriatingly competent and well-written antagonists ever. She needs to end 😊

NZPIEFACE

Yes, all the villains in this story are their own artistic form of batshit insane.

The Dead King seems to have taken to a grave form of caricature as humor, a solice in his solitude.

The Tyrant is nothing more than candle burning brighter than the stars, blinding and blinded.

The Diabolist is ambitiously grand, so much so that her machinations are greater than the one before.

The Black Knight is cold and callous, a figure whose eyes are colder than his steel.

The Dread Empress wishes for nothing more than change, to do so she needs not to be greater than all before her, but better.

The Squire whose passion burns hotter than goblinfire and her steel sharper than her tongue, a woman who tries to right a wrong that was never not.

Letouriste

Nah, some chapters written before were a lot better;)

TheCount

Damn, i love what she did with the city, the summoning on the other hand not really my personal favorite... (im into gadgets be they magical or not rather than sheer power) but damn, its impressive.

Let us see what she had cooked up to welcome the legion of terror!:D

Setback

I'm not entirely sure that Diabolist's plan to keep her city in another dimension is the best idea. After all both Warlock and Heiropphant specialize in dimensional magic. It isn't that far fetched to imagine them either seeking her in there or collapsing the pocket dimension he is in.

---

Depending on how thoroughly Thief had inspected the escapement for the Warlock (or did the Assassin do that?), he may be able to Imbricate it back into reality.

Fern

Akua and Catherine, by drawing on the Hells and Arcadia respectively, have accessed a strategic power that no one else on Calernia could match. It's already been mentioned once, but as long as the Black Queen (and maybe even Black, if he can live through Liesse) can watch their blind spots regarding heroes, they can they can absolutely fucking trounce the forces of the Principiate. After that, what can the rest of Calernia do to answer? The forces of Good will lie in disarray without the Principiate serving as a center, and our protagonist has become too especially good at squashing Old Evil to be stopped by the likes of the Dead King, not even mentioning the tatters of the Chains of Hunger or the Drow in the north. All that's left then are the elves, and through them the entire planet.

NZPIEFACE

You forgot Tyrant down south along with his trusty aide.

And Tyrant is damn fucking good at the meta-game, plus it seems he'll stop at nothing to ruin the day of every other character.

unoriginal

Remember that the Empire isn't even a footnote. You've got the Dwarves in the Kingdom Below as a regional power and this is the Kingdom Below that refuses to recognize the right of humans to own property and gets away with it because they can sink the cities of those that piss them off. And all land on the continent below a certain depth is owned by them.

Then you've got an entire empire of Elves who are not on the decline and hopelessly racist like the Golden Bloom, The Chinses, and Indian equivalent empires and did I mention the fucking gnomes? because the screaming flying machines sound like jet-aircraft to me and they have Sheild Style flying ships.

Sooooooooooooo, no.

The Empire is not ready to play in the big leagues until it consolidates its power.

Engineer

Those damn sentient lawn ornaments probably have nuclear weapons too. The fact that the sun and plant life exists on this planet is proof that nuclear reactions are possible in this world.

Just imagine the advances that could be had in this world if a mage of considerable talent is introduced to the scientific method. However said mage would probably get blasted to oblivion as soon as he/she made any significant discoveries. Godsdamned lawn ornaments...

Cold Cyberia

At last! Both the cloak and Zombie the Third are intact. I suspect Cat will end up kneeling to Diabolist as Squire, with her will and soul bound. I expect she will break the binding upon becoming Black Knight and recalling Black's iconic phrase – "We do not kneel".

Nairne .01

I hope not. Even a short period of that would "suck" very much so to speak.

Vhostym

I doubt it. For one, the whole "we do not kneel" idea was already tried in book 2 when it was much more thematically relevant, and it was found wanting. Also Cat is more breaking in a new mold rather than retreading an old one.

But more importantly, that would require the diabolist to succeed, at least initially, and really that just isn't going to happen. Diabolist's plan sounds good, because it's written from her perspective, but if you reread it with a critical eye it becomes obvious she has no idea how to wage war or make strategies. Her descriptions are filled with assumptions, like assuming that the armies will choose to follow her laid out path, or that there aren't already agents within Liesse. She really has no chance in the end.

At this point I'm of the mind that Diabolist exists to fuel Masego's growth, since as the hierophant he grows with the number of miracles witnessed. And creating a hellgate like this by channeling a near godlike mass of souls is most certainly a miracle from a sorcery perspective.

Cold Cyberia

It's a bit silly to say Diabolist doesn't know how to wage war when she outmaneuvered Cat to lose one of the Callowan reinforcements several chapters ago. Her assumptions are well founded: it's been mentioned Liesse is warded to a point where Cat can't get to it through Arcadia and Diabolist is well versed in sorcery – if she's confident there's only one way through I'm inclined to believe her. I will grant you that she probably doesn't expect her city to be infiltrated but it might be that she does, and simply doesn't think on it in her moment of triumph.

I think you're vastly underestimating the kind of power she now commands. She has eighty thousand undead and an inexhaustible amount of devils at her disposal, in a heavily fortified, difficult to get to and magically protected position. I think the story dictates she will be defeated but it's not unreasonable of her to think she could conquer the world from where she stands.

It's a lot more than just a way to learn some sorcery for Masego – this is the biggest conflict in the story so far – against Cat's nemesis from the beginning no less.

soonnanandnaanssoon

In addition to Cold Cyberia's answer, Akua has shown willingness to adopt some Legionary doctrine and war tactics with Fasili strategizing and laying out the tactics for her. I think her main weakness is how strongly she believes in her ruling-ruled ideology itself; it's biasing how she views the Story she's in, and I think she's on the track to lose just like Black did to the TWB. Akua overconfidence isn't unjustifiable given her many strengths and resources, but Narratively she isn't that good at stacking Stories on her side.

Vhostym

I see where you're coming from, and your examples are accurate, but just don't seem to ring true for this case. You're right that Diabolist outmaneuvered Cat a few chapters ago, but I'd argue that a truly one-sided war almost never occurs, and Cat's ability to mitigate the consequences is about as telling as Diabolist's (or Fasili's, more likely) ability to outmaneuver her.

In this chapter I think that Diabolist is leaning strongly towards the Emperors and Empresses of old Praes, where she creates crazy and wondrous inventions, but relies on others to properly implement them, as opposed to the new Empress who leaves that to others and concentrates on ruling. At this point we, as the audience, know that Malicia herself was funding a lot of this, so while it's possible that she didn't tell Black or otherwise let him and Warlock learn of Diabolist's plan, she is confident in their success regardless.

You've mentioned Akua being knowledgeable about sorcery and that if she says there's only one way to attack her fortress she's probably correct. I'm not so confident, though you could be entirely correct. Since we know most things from Cat's perspective we really don't know much about sorcery or loopholes that the 'heroes' could abuse here, but generally I'm reluctant to rely on absolutes here, especially as the Hierophant's type of sorcery seems to be somewhat distinct from what normal Praesi are capable of. Either way I suspect that her statement about their options is either incorrect due to her understanding of their abilities, or due to her understanding of what they need to do to win.

Regarding her army, you're probably right about the power of the Hellgate, since we don't know much about how they work, and it seems highly unlikely that they can shut down such a powerful trump without huge amounts of effort (barring possible prior informing from Malicia). The 80,000 undead though? I suspect they're a non-factor now since Cat and Masego are well known to be good at necromancy and usurpation, and Akua knows this. I think the undead were more of a bait than expected to be an actual factor in this.

You're right that I was pretty flippant in my earlier comment, and the actual battle is likely to be great and wonderful and touch and go at some points. Nonetheless, I think the result is a bit of a foregone conclusion unless she has significantly more up her sleeve, not even considering the lack of narrative/story weight on her end. And really, she's basically set herself up to lead the doomed old ways in the face of the new, story wise. And that never ends well.

Nairne .01

EE, You really know how to ruin the rest of my week. How am I supposed to wait until Monday just to see how Cat screws Aqua's plans? Really this interlude should have been posted on a Monday. Damn authors who belong to the S part of the universe. Whats a fellow S like me supposed to do?!

Jokes aside. Thanks for the chapter 😊

Engineer

Aqua?

*smirks* I think you mean "Ubua"...

Nairne .01

Right.

*returns an evil grin*

TideofKhatanga

From Chapter 33:

>"At least Procer hasn't invaded," I said, trying for a bright side. "And no one's unleashed a demon in a year."

>"High Lady Tasia did, in Wolof," the orc reminded me.

>"I can't believe I have to lower my standards lower than they already are," I complained. "Well, nobody's opened a permanent portal into the Hells. There. I refused to go any lower."

>"Give it time," Juniper grinned, ivory fangs flaring.

He told you, Catherine. He told you about taunting Creation. But nooooo, you had to jinx it and ruin everything for everyone.

Engineer

Black was also guilty of this in the epilogue of Book 2.

Then he got bitch slapped by the Judgment Choir and he lost one of his best friends.

Yeah, I long for the rise of Dread Emperor Boringus. He who never ever gloated or taunted Creation and followed the Evil Overlord list religiously.

Shoddi

What about Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly-Successful? Sound like he followed the E0 list pretty well.

Engineer

Indeed, Irritant was oddly successful during his tenure.

haihappen

Does anyone else see Thief strolling in there and Take the soul stone?

Its a classic villain plan: Brilliant, Great in Dimension, and with a single piece of failure that any Band of Heroes would inevitably exploit.

Essentially all the tropes in play here usually have the antagonist facing a set of heroes, not villains (eh, sorry, I meant "Individuals of questionable morality"). Is Akua relying on that fact not to suffer "I would have gotten away with it if it hadn't been for You Meddling Kids, and that dog too."

And thinking about it: What is the Bard's end game here? Akua failing, but with the knowledge of Still Water or Remote Hellgate getting out, triggering an Instant Crusade?

Or, since Liesse is now a bridge between Dimension, maybe she wants something from there to cross over, an Angel, for example. Whatever it is, it is safe to assume it is part of a greater end game scenario in which "The Greater Good" wins. Or the Bard can finally die.

Euodiachloris

The right kind of Hero to take on a Bond Villain secure in their fortress/weapon airship of might... is the classy, quipping, sneaky Rogue-type. Every time. 😊

Cold Cyberia

I imagine Bard's endgame with Akua is to eliminate Cat, much like what she tried to do in Book 2. Even if the Diabolist conquered the entire continent, she would still be an old fashioned villain that would inevitably be overthrown by heroes.

In contrast, she's mentioned several times now that the villains who think they are doing what's necessary are the really dangerous ones. Cat not only thinks she's doing the right thing, she's got the right combination of old villainy (amassing tons of power) and new villainy (metagaming the story).

unoriginal

Meta-gaming the story isn't a new concept it's just the Neo-Evil and the pragmatism embraced by the Calamities is just the concept executed right. We've gotten hints of how much larger the world is outside of the backwater continent this is all based on and with how the entire universe seems to run on the power of narrative, it would be silly for the Empire to have thought of meta-gaming the story first.

stevenneiman

Pretty sure that Bard's goal is still to ensure that a kind of Evil that Good can defeat comes out on top here. What exactly her plan is to accomplish that remains to be seen, but I'm certain that Black coming home angry and down a friend is part of it. On the other hand, she's not infallible, as proven by the fact that she gave her own gloating villain speech to Black. Considering that she pretty much only exists when she's on-screen, I doubt that she's going to get away with that. And the reason she won't get away with it probably involves Cat's band of meddling kids.

werafdsaew

It looks to me the Wandering Bard can only act by attaching herself to a Heroic band, and currently there's none around, so she cannot act.

Shequi

Two thoughts:

Akua doesn't know that Masego is now Heiropant, does she?

Thief is now sealed inside Liesse with Akua.

Jangri

She does. See chapter 47

Gunslinger

She knows, mentions him as Lord Heiropant when she sends her ambassador

Shequi

Hmmm. In that case she's deliberately put a Greater Breach somewhere that our friendly local reality-unweaver can get at it.

That's **spectacularly** stupid of her.

Letouriste

She crafted that really well, I guess she is confident he can't do anything to that. she used a lot of energy for powering the thing and crafted that in years. if masego could destroy that in a jiffy that would be unfair^^

Metrux

AS unfair as that would be, isn't that just the villain's thing? Justice is for the just, Fairness is for the fair. Hierophant's not any of them :B

NZPIEFACE

I've seen people talking about a Death Knight in the comments before, so I had a little idea.

If King Arthur could be a King and a Knight, why can't Cat be that too? Queen of Knights (Nights) or something, with the Name Black Knight to accompany it. And all she'd have to do after Amadeus is dead, is to raise his corpse and anoint him as the Death Knight.

Food for thought?

Ane

I'd never thought of that before, but I really like the idea of Cat ressurecting Black. Black still dies to the immense narrative weight demanding he dies, and allows the Squire Cat to ascend to a new Name at the same time. In reviving Black, Cat also continues to subvert the story.

However, it makes more sense for Cat to become Death Knight, since Black is only being brought back, and Cat is the one asserting control over the domain of death.

NZPIEFACE

Eh, I always kind of thought that Death Knight kind of applied to someone dead that also controlled dead people. He'd be a necromancer otherwise? Kind of like how Dread Emperor Sorcerous become the Dead King.

Cold Cyberia

This is actually somewhat supported by the story. I believe Zombie the Third preened at Cat when she was fighting against fae in Dormer, which implies her necromantic constructs retain some personality or sentience. If I recall correctly, Masego even remarked that this "has interesting implications" so it could be possible Black would be more or less himself.

Luxuria Tenebris

I thought of a fun way to stop the Hellgate, just put a portal to Arcadia in front of it, let the Fae deal with them 😊

Lunariz

I have a feeling that would permanently ruin relations with the Fae... And the Fae could make Cat's life way more difficult in the future if she ever wants to use Fae portals fast travel in the future.

Engineer

They can't touch her when she's traveling through Arcadia. That was the deal. All bets are off when she's back in Creation though.

cookiehunter

well so much for Cat setting her standards (chapter 33: "Well, nobody's opened a permanent portal into the Hells. There. I refused to go any lower.")

Red Letter Enthusiast

Theif has a portable pocket dimension that smuggle a fleet of ships, and has infiltrated Lisse. Cat has a large supply of goblinfire, and a reputatuon for burning down cities. Also, goblinfire can eat magic. I suspect that the spy mission from a few chapters ago was also the setup for a large explosion in the middle of Akua's victory monolounge

Red Letter Enthusiast

^ that *can* smuggle

Vhostym

That would make a lot of sense. And now thanks to your mention I'm terrified by what would be possible if there ever is a person with the name Saboteur, because that goblinfire tactic combined with aspects moderately more suited to its use than hold (which is already pretty darn well suited) would be absolutely terrifying.

soonnanandnaanssoon

When the Thief wasn't part of the Woe, Saboteur was one of the Names one reader proposed in a discussion for Robber lol. Since the Thief is a Woe, I find it hard for sufficient narrative weight to be given to Robber getting a Name but EE has proven me wrong lots of time haha.

Tibstrike

I really love seeing Black in his element. Leading armies and crushing opponents armies. His Aspects make so much more sense in that situation which just makes him all the more dangerous.

He's gone through decades of life as the pre-eminent villain using Aspects that aren't really all that suitable to single combat. They are, but they clearly shine in large-scale warfare.

And now we have his apprentice who is essentially a lv1 specialist who he has molded to fight as a strategic general and ruler.

It's fantastic.

Draeysine

Not sure anyone's mentioned it yet but um... what about the Gnomes? Pretty sure this is red letter material. They might just show up and wipe the whole continent off the map to make sure the threat is gone

narcoduck

It's actually interesting to note that the Gnomes don't seem to be interested in these old sorceries as a threat. The sunken city of Kerguel was not destroyed because of their mighty magics but because they were interesting "natural physics". The Dead King and his Hellgate is unmolested by the Gnomes. The Empire didn't receive Red Letters because of their demons or devils or doomsday weapons. They got Red Letters for a farming machine and playing with powders.

Maybe the Age of Wonders is over because it's archaic and ultimately not a threat. After all, the Wandering Bard knew perfectly well what Akua was doing (going as far as deterring the Elves), and she still thinks Malicia/Black/Cat are the real Evil that must be stopped.

Argentorum

Gnomes seem to be interested only in technological advancement. Praes didn't get a letter for Triumphant's (may she never return) Flying Fortress. None of the characters, likewise, are worried about any level of Praesi sorcery earning a Red Letter.

OmniscientQ

This isn't Red Letter material. The gnomes don't care if you make nuclear weapons, so long as you make them out of magic. If you started trying to refine fissile material so you could make one that ran on entirely non-magical physics, however, they would care.

The gnomes exist purely to enforce Medieval Stasis on Creation.

Engineer

To what end, I wonder...

EE, will the Gnomes make an appearance in the books to come?

erraticerrata

If they did, I wouldn't spoiler it in comments.

stevenneiman

@Engineer I think that real tech, especially tech effectively married with magic, just has a lot more potential than the crazy shenanigans you can get up to with magic alone. The gnomes have power because they've realized that potential, and they're taking steps to make sure that that power doesn't become available to anyone else. At the same time, they can't make themselves a generalized existential threat because that would trigger heroic stories about saving the day against these super-powerful invaders and even the gnomes aren't powerful enough to feel confident against that degree of Fate.

Engineer

@EE, thanks for confirming. The fact that you didn't deny it outright means that they will make an appearance and become plot central in the future books. If not, well there would be no harm in denying it, now would there? 😊 @stevenneiman that hypothesis explains their observed behavior and likely motivations extremely well.

RandomFan

@Engineer No it doesn't. EE could have not wanted to spoil that they wouldn't show up- which would also result in this comment. in which case, the post would have pulled off the intended result on you.

Engineer

@Randomfan yes, that too is a likely explanation of EE's comment.

However, a commentator in a previous chapter (or book, not sure atm) asked about the continent across the seas where the elves interbreed with humans and EE replied and said that they weren't going to be present in the story. So EE is fine with telling details that are not plot relevant to the story.

Therefore, his dodging of the question regarding the gnomes appearance in the books to come is evidence for their appearance and their plot relevance because like I said; if they weren't going to appear or be plot relevant then there's no harm in saying so, no?

Gorgoroth

You know, I see people mentioning Cat ascending to Death Knight as her next name, but I don't think she will. Her soul is a Squire, but that's not all she is anymore, and we know the right conditions would let her become more than just a Knight.

Catherine Foundling is the Squire of Praes, but she is also the Duchess of Moonless Nights, last of the Winter Fae nobility. She is the Black Queen, crowned ruler of Callow. She has a history of using necromancy to her own ends, and aspirations of subverting story-mandated deaths (Black, Nauk, Herself, etc.)

I think her next name is going to be Lich Queen.

Letouriste

Liches are dead sorcerer you know? Expert in dark magic etc... I get she can move corpse but she doesn't know what she is doing, that's all her Name shenanigans. she is no mage. also, I don't think she plan to kill herself again:D

stevenneiman

I don't think so. Death is somewhere Cat has been forced to visit a couple of times, but I doubt that she's ever going to end up living there. I expect her next Name to simply be Queen of Callow, or some corrupted version thereof.

Engineer

If Akua succeeds in binding her soul it's highly likely she would transition into that Name if Black is still kicking when that happens. Akua's description of her as her Knight is an apt description of how the role of a Death Knight.

AshSlanabrezgov

Akua's passion feels so... shallow. It feels pale compared to Black's intense creed, his SPITE.

Everything has a price. But I find that when she pays her price for power, her bid is shallow and not pleasing. She doesn't suffer herself, no, she sell souls of other people. So clean, so tidy.

Where in this is a worthy and interesting price?

You could compare her to price which Black and Cat pay. Now, that's exquisite and weighty.

As I read Akua's thoughts, I witnessed her misunderstanding of Callow, and the importance of it to hungry Praes. Where Black had a plan to fuck Good for good – I mean really in a way that matters – by grabbing a food source for Praes and capable allies, she is playing Wonderwaffe card.

Those Wonderweapons never cut it.

Overall she doesn't feel like the most world-wracking villain out there. I also question if forces she plays with are playing with her.

Will Hell strip from her proper price?

NZPIEFACE

Akua's sole goal is to become Empress for a few seconds. She kind of gives fuck all afterwards.

stevenneiman

I think that the old creed just don't understand that it's more ambitious to try for something that might succeed than to beat your head against a wall you know will never break. The old school villains convince themselves that they expect to win, but the truth is that they're afraid to try in a way that might succeed, because if they do they'll have to admit that they had a real chance and they blew it. The mad schemes they can always claim didn't work out because Fate screwed them over and ensured they were doomed from the outset (which it probably did, but that's no excuse), but a plan that turns even Fate into a gear in the machine would leave nothing to blame but your own failure.

Decius

So, about that coming Crusade that was going to be against Praes...

WuseMajor

When we first met them, Cat was brutally straightforward and Akua couldn't do anything without having half a dozen hidden machinations behind it. Ever since, Cat has been learning duplicity and Akua has been clawing her way free of her mother's influence. Now Cat has surprised her with a secret plan (with more to follow) and Akua's finally spoken from her true heart and revealed her final trump card.

Very very nice.

Addicted

Does anyone else thing that the Thief will steal a Key in the coming chapters?

Letouriste

A thief stealing a soul jar? Yes please yes!

Engineer

Thief is no mage and getting past the wards of the room where the phylactery is held would definitely not be easy.

If Hierophant tagged along most definitely but those wards were woven by a highly skilled fully realized NAMED sorcerer, with MONTHS of tweaking and refinement with the aid of The First Mage. A man who passed up the chance to become a Warlock not because of magical ineptitude, but because of his personality.

I really don't see how she could feasibly enter a room like that.

Assassin however...

AshSlanabrezgov

Thief is not a mage, indeed.
But a Hero she is still, yes?
Who already used to steal at least something as outrageous as the Sun and succeeded?
And this is Unassailable Fortress Of Evil, with Artifact Of Inescapable Destruction ready to commit genocide of country full of innocents?
And Thief might be trying to steal The Only Weak Point Of Evil Sorcerer?

I don't know exact chances, but I think it might work. If that's the plan.

Engineer

In most stories where that is in play said character usually dies after successfully weakening the evil overlord so the hero can deliver the final strike.

But this is a fight between two villains and calling Thief a hero is a stretch. She's neutral at best. The sun stealing is different because said sun was not inside a heavily warded room that is keyed to the very Named sorcerer that created it.

AshSlanabrezgov

Thief being a Hero is a stretch, yes, but stretch like this is exploitable.

Methinks it could be the story about two villains. But if framed right it would be a story of saving Callow from villain. Or another favorable story.

Black knows how to frame stories. Cat has some talent and practice with inhabitants of Arcadia.

Seems doable?

Engineer

Phrased like that very likely.

Letouriste

errr I get she think that plan of her can deal with villains and their armies but that fortress look totally hero bait^^
I seriously doubt she can face procer like that,I mean they even have an oracle saying where she will teleport in advance.

Shikome Kido Mi

"Heri to... [t]he killers of the first empress, who'd writ the truth of Praes in blood and treachery. "

Yeah, but from a certain point of view, those are the people who fucked everything up and stopped Praes from every attaining it's true potential.

stevenneiman

Normally when Akua shows up the situation goes straight to hell. It's a nice change of pace for Hell to come to the situation this time.

chris S

So Diabolist has a gateway to one of the Hells, a highly fortified Liesse, innumerable devils and demons, and all signs are pointing to Black dying in this battle? And she thinks there's no way the other side can win?

Akua, you poor, silly girl. You've just made some basic Villainous Mastermind rookie mistakes. Let me break it down for everyone.

Error numero uno: You're attacking the Legions... and that means the 15th. Which has a chapel/temple of House of Light in their camp, which is presumably now right in the path of the Hellgate. The hopelessly outnumbered defenders, in their homeland, with a symbol of the Heavens in the middle of their camp, fighting against the forces of Hell (literally in this case). You've written your army's own defeat here.

Error the second: Small band of Named attacking a Evil Villain's Impregnable Fortress of Doom, which holds the source of power for the Ultimate Superweapon of Doom? You may as well open the main gates and throw a party for Cat with a Plot line that tempts Creation like that.

Error number three: The father figure to the Rightful Queen of Callow (in pretty much all of her men and most of Callow's eyes), slain by the machinations of the wannabe usurper Evil Empress? I just hope you're not stupid enough to give them a double boost by trying to knock of Hierophant's father too.

Final error: "Diabolist smiled the smile of a woman who was going to conquer the world." You're gloating. The instant you utter anything along the lines of "I am Unstoppable!" as a villain, Creation raises a pimp hand to bitch slap you with a dose of Hubris – often via Ironic Critical Existence Failure.

It's a shame her parent's never bought her the Evil Overlord's Handbook to help avoid all these tropes.

Engineer

Hehehehe ah that was a good read.

All those tropes you mentioned however are only really applicable if this was a heroic party assaulting the Evil Wannabe Overlord's fortress.

The gloating one is spot on though, as both Cat and Black can attest. Bare your fangs in arrogance at Creation and buy a nice set of dentures for the aftermath.

werafdsaew

I don't think you need to have a Heroic Name to trigger Heroic tropes. After all Catherine was able to trigger the sword-in-stone story despite being a Villain, and Diabolist said that what is important is not the Name, but the Roles in the "Villainous Interlude: Chiaroscuro" chapter. The Book of All Things also claims that Roles came first, and Names are gifted to Roles, not the other way around.

Engineer

She DID do that. Huh, that narrative seems probable now... We'll have to wait and see.

*Euodiachloris*

James Bond often assaults Evil Fortresses of Doom... in a group comprised of people he's blackmailed, cajoled, tricked, charmed or leaned on to get there. Many of them Bad Guys (but not E is for Evil Big Bad kind of bonkers Bad). Sure, he always goes off and does his solo thing, but they dramatically enter to save his bacon most of the time. Or bring the Good Guys (for the current pilot's definition of "Good" and "Guys" – actual goodness and guyness may vary).

Thief is living a Bond tale right now. 😊 Sure, she's working with Bad Guys to get her job (save the world, daring-do, rescue relative innocents, take the info and loot) done. But, she's been combating Really Nasty, Cuckoo, Out-to-Lunch Big Bads with Pragmatic Evil. That's 007's whole thing: our Hero.

I'm just wondering who her Bond Guy/Girl is. XD

Ward

Love from a dumb

He-Who-Must-Be-Named

Haven't read through all the comments, so I apologize if this has been noted, but...

"And it whispered of /triumph/"

...

Anyone else thing Triumphant (may she never return) has...returned?
In some reincarnated form?

AshSlanabrezgov

I had suspicions but never voiced them. Title 'triumphante' means, well, triumphs, winning conflicts consistently.

But also, as God she might have a child – with a mortal or with an unknown winter fairy lord.

It all inconclusive, however. Even a family of farmer managed to give birth to Amadeus. You don't need to be reincarnation or relative of Triumphante to become a Catastrophe.

---

You know, Akua has called Black Knight a patriot in this charter, and this, combined with another passage from her speech here has reminded me of another mistake nobody mentions, and the reason I never could understand the concept of patriotism.

> "Twenty years ago, we were more powerful than the people of Callow," she continued. "Twenty years ago we were better than them, for beyond all the lies and stories that is the bare truth of Creation: the powerful own the world."

What kind of "we" are you talking about here? It's not "I and all of you", because twenty years ago you were nothing but your mother's scheme, the one she denied your father the support to his claim to the Name of Warlock for. But it's not "we, the peoples of Praes" either! Even if we ignore the fact that you didn't contribute anything to that victory, the peoples of the Praes are on the other side of those walls. You and your army represent the Praesi nobility, the small part of those peoples, the very same part that the people besieging your fortress had to subjugate first in a far more brutal civil war. Your mother probably didn't assist the Conquest in any way other than the average amount of taxes she owed to the Tower anyway, and maybe sponsoring a few promising officers to become her spies in the Legions.

This kind of demagoguery puzzles me. How can people think that slapping a "we" on other people's accomplishments somehow makes them stronger? It's a faulty way of thinking even in a universe that literally runs on this kind of magical thinking!

Sous

I have just caught up. At probably the greatest cliffhanger of them all, my poor luck.

But regardless I have to express my respect for the author. The Guide is written very well, and the world-building is subtle and thorough at the same time, which takes mastery. I am hoping so badly that it gets published, since such a work needs to become rooted deeper in our culture.

Engineer

If the guide gets picked up for a tv series by directors that know how to deal with fantasy (like the staff of GoT) then the guide stands a goddamn good chance of usurping GoT in terms of popularity.

letouriste

i don't think so.the system of Names and Roles etc... is kinda complicated to explain,i have troubles to see that on screen. i remember to be confused by some of the turning points in this novel like the angel church fight in liesse etc... that was already hard to follow written,i don't see how adapt that;) i expect a screen adaptation would be bad or really heavily modified and simplified:/

also,the fight scenes would not be easy to do with actors,i think an animation adaptation would be better.actually,a manga adaptation could totally work no?:0

Engineer

What was left unsaid was that EE should take an active part in the production of the series. He shouldn't be sidelined for any of the decisions regarding the production of the tv series. That's the only way we'll be sure that the series we get is on par with the books.

With the cg that's capable today I really don't think we'll have troubles with the fights in all their glorious detail. Sure the first season's fights would be bad quality but that's only because the first season is the testing season, to get more people watching the show and thus generate more revenue for the remaining seasons.

I agree with you regarding the Anime adaption being the better choice, however. You can show a whole lot more quality scenes in an Anime than what you could in a live action but you'd have fewer viewers than you'd get for a tv series (most idiots still believe that anime is purely cartoons for kids).

It's up in the air is what I'm saying.

Tolack

I can actually see Akua surviving this, and not eating Cat's steel. If Thief got ahold of Akua's soulstone, then Cat will have her life in her hands, and if Akua listens to her papa dearest then she'll submit.

Hammerman

I can see a certain blind magic user enjoying powering the sworn knights of a Duchess, especially if it allows him to vivisect a living soul stone owner.

letouriste

nah, cat promised her that next time would be the last back in the first liesse battle.
she also said one day she would find and destroy what akua care the most about...and by now she probably suspect that would be akua father...or would kill him anyway and see the result on akua face.

Big Brother

This is really a random thought, but didn't the Choir of Contrition show Cat a vision of her leading the next Crusade as Queen with her Red Right Hand? And now we've seen Cat assemble the largest military force since the Conquest, which contains a mix of a few nations (Praes, Callow, and the Deoraithe), to assault the center of power of the "Icon" of Old Evil, all while Cat is slowly accepting the fact that Callow sees her as the Black Queen.

And then here we see Akua make a passing remark about turning Cat into her Red Right Hand.

This might be a coincidence, but I feel an Evil subversion of the Heroic Crusade story at work right now.

amc

and in the previous chapter, cat more-or-less acknowledged hakram as her red-right-hand... 😊 foreshadowing where we least expect it! amazing, ee!

letouriste

the angels wanted her to be an hero, they can't physicaly accept her to be a black queen even if her role would be the same at the end.

for them only the side you stand on count. they are driven by absolute.

Big Brother

I understand this. I'm just saying what she's doing now is quite similar to what the Choir wanted her to do. Lead a massive army against the bastion of evil in Callow as Queen, which she's now doing on her own.

Jerden

In terms of Names for Cat, I feel like "Black Queen" is the most likely. She rejected the Name of Queen at the end of the last book, but seems to have been slowly filling the role anyway, so it would make sense to assume a corrupted version of the Good Name, and it would fit the successor to the Black Knight. It would also re-enforce the tension between her and the Empress, just in time for the fight against Procer.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I'm calling it now: Akua is going to win.

She won't win cleanly. But Black will be dead, the legions broken, Warlock I don't even know, but he won't last much longer... And Cat will have a tough choice to make: stay behind a weakened Malicia, or take Aisha's hint and back Akua when her offer is good enough.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

The only part I'm not seeing is where the Principate fits in to this scenario. Cordelia and Klaus have had too much development and screen time to be red herrings in the end

Max Scherer

Well i thought Akua is smart, but no she is actually pretty dumb. Her plans seems pretty good, but that can only fail. First she should at least know some stuff about Masego and that his specialization is pretty much what lays beyond creature, as Arcadia and the Hells. He cant possibly influence it, but he can see how it works and maybe find a way to destroy it with his father. Than there is Ranger she pretty much kills gods as a sport and when Amadeus should truly perish against Akua, she will find her and kill the cruelst way possible... And lets not forget that she cant break Cat. That is just one of Cats core principles. yeah she may compromise a little(but really dislikes it) but she will never break. An Angel tried it and it didnt work... So yeah she her plan is really stupid and she is really illusional in my opinion... But nontheless will this be now pretty bloody and i really want to see death, i hate Akua just way too much...

Chapter 60: Opening

"Victory is transient. To seek it is to remain so. I have seen the face of that which is eternal, and it stands beyond struggle."

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

Flight was markedly less exhilarating when people kept trying to kill me during, I decided as I guided Zombie the Third into a sharp dive to avoid a bolt of black lightning. Half a league up in the sky, the wind howling around me, I watched disaster unfold on the field below. The order of battle agreed upon had been fairly simple: the first wave would be the Legions. The Fifth, the Sixth and Twelfth would strike the initial blow, as the Fourth and the Ninth moved to the sides of Liesse bolstered by Callowan levies. The Deoraithe bowmen would move behind the centre, followed by the men-at-arms, and the Fifteenth would remain as a reserve. I was to soften up the enemy fortifications with Archer's help and a goblinfire trick, and until the aftermath of the green rain everything had been going to plan.

Then Akua had opened a fucking Hellgate and Liesse had just... disappeared. Gone into thin air.

She'd chosen the place for the gate perfectly, I had to admit. Behind the Fourth's advance, though the gate was oriented towards the Deoraithe second line. There were only a few devils coming out of the woodworks right now, but if that trickle turned into a flood our armies were going to break. The Fourth would be cut off and overwhelmed, the back of our centre up to its neck in hellspawn from behind and fortified casters from the front. The entire host would be splintered, and of the only two forces still in play – the Fifteenth under Juniper and Ninth with half the levies – the Ninth was positioned on the opposite side of the field where it needed to be. With out entire centre in the way. In the span of a single heartbeat, Akua had fucked both our left flank and centre while making our right wing useless. I would have admired that a little, if I wasn't too busy being furious. Zombie responded to my spurs as a living beast would, though I could still command its undead flesh regardless of its own will, and we arced down gracefully.

The staff officers of the Fifteenth parted for me in haste and I reined in the winged horse before someone could get trampled. Juniper, leaning over a table, ignored my entrance. Her brows were creased in thought. I cleared my throat.

"I heard you coming, Foundling," she said. "Now shut up. I'm thinking."

Yeah, that was about par for the course. I sighed and dismounted, Hakram appearing just in in time to be handed the reins. Hierophant and Archer were still out of sight, but I could feel them approaching. No, feel was perhaps the wrong term. It was an instinct, like the the one that warned me of danger, whispering that they were coming close. Whatever we'd done in Dormer, when all of us save Thief had fought as one, it had left a mark. The implications of that worried me.

"The Carrion Lord's advance has not slowed," Adjutant said.

"I saw," I grunted back.

There was danger in that, though I knew better than to assume Black wasn't aware of it. With the legionaries he had under the mantle of his Name advancing so much more swiftly, what had once been a wave was turning into a sloppy wedge. If he got too far ahead... He wouldn't, I told myself. Black had been winning battles before I was even a look in my mother's eyes.

"Senior Mage, report," Juniper growled.

I almost jumped. I hadn't noticed Kilian was there at all. Red hair free, she'd had her eyes closed and a loose chord of interlocked runes clutched between her fingers. After a moment she flinched in pain and opened her eyes.

"The Hellgate is beyond my ability to understand," she announced. "As for Liesse, I have some notion. The city is not gone, merely phased a step out of Creation. There is still a point of access to it."

The Hellhound made room at the table, hairless brow raised.

"Here," Kilian said, pointing down at the map.

I leaned over to see and winced. That was behind the palisade and trench, in open space overlooked by all three bastions and currently filled with wights. This one was on us, I thought. We'd all been so convinced the field fortifications were a battle measure none of us had taken the time to inspect them for anything like this. Not when we'd barely scratched the surface of understanding the kind of wards covering the walls. Juniper did not reply, brow creasing deeper. Archer and Hierophant passed the ring of legionaries exactly when I knew they would, the brown-skinned woman the only one smiling of the two.

"Masego," I called out. "I need an opinion."

"My preliminary analysis is over," he replied. "This is a Greater Breach, Catherine."

Kilian sucked in a sharp breath, but everyone else seemed as confused as I was. I assumed bad. Very bad, even. Usually the best bet to make when it came to Diabolist.

"A stable Hellgate," Hierophant added when he noticed the lack of understanding.

He sounded a touch irritated. I sucked my lip. If this had just been a play to pull out reinforcements like Akua had done at Liesse, the gate would have eventually closed on its own even if we didn't manage to shut it first. A major danger, but something that could be handled. This was different. There was a hole in the fabric of Creation in the middle of Callow and on the other side was a literally endless horde that wanted to devour everything in existence. At least I assumed. I didn't know much about the lay of the Realms Below or the beings that dwelled inside, but I doubted Diabolist had reached for Hell that was all about weaving straw baskets.

"Withdrawal is not feasible," Juniper said, calm tone cutting through the silence that had followed Masego's words. "The god bound above the Palace is not gone, and regardless time plays in her her favour more than ours."

"Hierophant, can you close this?" I asked.

He snorted, then realized I'd been serious.

"Catherine, a Greater Breach cannot be closed by definition. It is a permanent bridge between layers of existence," he said.

I grimaced.

"Can you just pop a cork in the hole, then?" I pressed.

"Theoretically," he agreed. "It would be temporary, however. And require power superior to that employed in the original breaching."

"He means no," Archer cheerfully said.

I kind of wanted to hit her in the face for that.

"If we shut down her ritual, does the gate close?" I pressed.

"You do not seem to grasp the principles involved," Hierophant said flatly. "The ritual is done. The gate is there. The Breach was made. There is no unmaking this."

I turned my eyes to Kilian, who raised up her palms in surrender.

"Diabolism is not a field of study covered in the College," she said. "I know nothing of this."

"Juniper?" I tried, grasping at straws.

The orc's hands left the table and she folded them behind her back.

"If we do not contain the Hellgate within a half-hour, the battle is lost," she said. "And so will be all of Callow west of Summerholm and south of Daoine, within a month."

The weight of that announcement rang like a bell. How many people was that? Most major cities fell within those borders. Vale, Southpool, Laure, Denier and even Ankou. I couldn't quite remember the exact numbers from the last Imperial census at the moment, but Laure alone was almost half a million souls. I spat to the side.

"Then get your blades out, people," I said. "We're going for a walk."

Whatever answer I might have gotten to that was drowned out by the sound of neighing and crackling flame, followed by the pungent smell of brimstone. The chariot landed with a crash, pulled by two pitch-black winged horses, and in it stood a man decked entirely in scarlet: the Sovereign of Red Skies, dressed in his full glory of war.

"Belay that," he said, and there was nothing lazy or amused in his voice.

That had me even warier. He was not a man to take the situation seriously unless he had to, in my experience. With a flourish of the wrist the Warlock produced a small flat stone and tossed it at me. I caught it without missing a beat, raising an eyebrow.

"Into your mouth, Squire," he said. "Welcome to the Link."

My eyes flicked to Masego, who nodded absent-mindedly. Safe enough, then. Gingerly I put the stone in my mouth and shuddered in discomfort when I felt it move on its own, fusing with the flesh beneath my lower teeth. A heartbeat later sorcery gently flared and I heard the sound of flesh being run through directly in my ears.

"Catherine," Black said. "Good."

"Black," I murmured. "We're in deep shit."

"Perhaps less than it seems," he replied, and on the other side something screamed and died. "You are to join me on the front along with Adjutant and Archer. The bastions must fall, and quickly."

"The Hellgate?" I asked.

"Wekesa has a theory," Black replied.

"That leaves Masego free," I frowned.

"He's going to-"

My teacher was interrupted by a sound I'd heard once before. A faint scream, rising higher and higher in pitch. Then another. Then another. Oh Gods. Had she really? Even for Akua this was playing with fire. The 'Link' cut out, before I heard Warlock grunt and sound returned as suddenly as it had gone.

"Hurry," Black ordered. "The Fifteenth is to accompany Wekesa against the Hellgate. Overall command is ceded to Marshal Ranker as of now."

Silence returned to my ears and I turned to face my officers. Several of them had gone pale, hands shaking.

"Demons," I said.

"It was a given they would be used here," Warlock said conversationally. "Not even Sahelians are so mad as to call on the Unmakers within a closed realm. Masego, you are to contain them."

Hierophant's glass eyes did not move under the cloth, but I could feel his attention move across the field and find the unfolding catastrophes.

"Madness," the dark-skinned mage said. "Apathy. And..."

He hesitated.

"Order," the Warlock finished. "That one seems to be the oldest. It might be Shango's Doom itself, the contract is still unaccounted for. Begin with Madness nonetheless, before we lose half our men to the spread. They devour grounds unlike any other breed."

Hierophant nodded, not bothering to reply, and strode ahead without paying attention to any of us. So much for planning together. I forced myself to focus even as in the back of my head threefold song began to be sung. How much worse, I thought, did it have to be close to them? Unless my sight betrayed me, the rebels had brought forth the madness right in front of the centre of their outer palisade.

"General Juniper," I said. "We have our orders."

The orc's eyes flicked to the most powerful mage in the Empire.

"We are meant to escort you," she deduce. "Am I to take this as meaning the Hellgate may be closed?"

The Warlock smiled.

"Oh, that clever child's work is not so easily undone," the man said. "The gate will remain. Destruction, though, is the tool of the uncreative. I have other means."

That cleared up very little. Was is something that came with the magic, the urge to be a mysterious jackass? The dark-skinned man rolled his shoulder to limber it and cast a wary eye to the looming Hellgate in the distance.

"Well, no time dawdle," he sighed. "General, I will need your men to establish a solid beachhead on the other side of the gate. Do be quick about it. I'll limit the spill until you arrive on the scene."

The reins came down like a lash and the winged horses neighed, the very sound unnatural. Within moments he was tearing through the sky again. My fingers clenched, then unclenched.

"Juniper," I said, turning to meet my general's gaze. "Can you do it?"

There was a heartbeat of silence, then the Hellhound chuckled and her lips split into a grin that was nasty little piece of work.

"I am," she said calmly, "a general of the Legions of Terror, anointed and sworn under sacred standard. If a Hell wages war upon the Empire, then I will invade that Hell."

Her voice did not rise, or her intonation shift. It was, as she said, as simple statement of fact. There was something in her eyes when she spoke that wasn't quite a Name – she did not have the weight behind her for that, likely never would – but was just as fearsome in its own way. It was cold, absolute and merciless certainty. The stare of a woman who had killed the enemy a hundred times in her mind already, and knew all that remained was acting out the movements. The tremors left the limbs of her officers, straight-backed pride flowing to fill the gap. Named did not have a monopoly on greatness, I thought. Sometimes all that was needed was the unshakeable will of one who never even considered defeat a possibility.

"Then hear my order, General," I said, and my mantle stirred at the shape of this. "Even if it is impossible, even if all that rules Above and Below stands arrayed against you – win. I will allow nothing less from you."

"Warlord," she said, chops bared and head bowed.

I left it at that, because between the two of us nothing more needed to be said. There might be a day where Juniper failed in the face of ruin, because in the end did we not all fail? No matter how clever or powerful, an ending always came. But, I thought, it would not be today. Not against this. Adjutant stood at my side, loosening the leather ring holding his axe, and I found Archer staring at me with a pleased smile.

"Zeze's playing with the hellspawn and Fury Green's got her own battle to win," Archer drawled. "So what do you have for us, Cat?"

My eyes found the distant silhouettes of the bastions, flickering with sorcery and siege engines.

"String your bow, Archer," I said. "The three of us are taking down the strongholds with Black."

Had the day not been so dire, I might have been unsettled by how feral the grin I got in response was. Today, though? I was counting on it.

Zombie the Third got us near the front, but that was all I would ask of it. Three people were too much to have any room to manoeuvre, and twice we were nearly torched on our flight forward. We made a slow, fat target for any mage with a little juice to send out. I sent back the undead horse behind the lines and took a deep breath. Shit, steel and blood. The scent of battlefields. I'd landed us close to General Orim's Fifth Legion, which currently made up the left side of assault. He trailed behind Black still, even though my teacher had abandoned the centre for the right, but he'd caught up some since I'd last had a look. Black had run into some heavy resistance at the palisade, and had yet to pierce through the enemy centre. That wasn't the part of this battlefield that worried me.

Hierophant's lid on the demons unleashed was paper-thin, it was obvious to see. Not only had he been ordered to maintain three sets of wards against demons simultaneously, but he was facing constant pressure by the mages in the bastions trying to undo his work. It was worthy of a little awe, I thought, how he was still managing to keep his head slightly above the water for all that. I could not even see the demons, save for the occasional heartbeat-lasting glance, since they were surrounded by smooth globes of ivory-like solid sorcery. Around those wards sticks of incense floated, slowly burning out only to be engulfed in ivory flames at the last moment and from ashes born anew and full. The strength of the wards? It made sense. I'd seen some sticks burn much more quickly when the ovals came under fire. Regardless, those few moments where the demons were not completely contained were enough to twist their immediate surroundings. I saw legionaries but also wights, things that should have no soul of their own, begin howling and tear at themselves and everything close to them. Others simply... ceased. Fell down, dead for their hearts no longer beat.

The creepiest was the work of the third. What it touched of Creation became... unwoven, in some fundamental way. Air was breathed, but gave no breath. Flesh remained fixed even as men moved, sliding off like oil. Ground became like the sea, and I even caught sight of a man who took a ball of flame to the face rise and walk back, flesh mending, only to advance as he first had and be struck by the very same spell. It was not that the demons ran amok. If they did, the Legions would have broken already. But just by being contained in front of the first palisade protecting the bastions, they created a rampart of death that could not be passed. The legionaries had to go around them, and not come too close, which took them straight into the enemy fire. Tough the goblinfire still burned and had thinned the ranks some, the wights were still thousands and bitterly contested the palisades. Most of the killing, though, came from the bastions. Sorcery lashed out in never-ending waves, trebuchets and scorpions that were the deadly work of goblin engineering carving bloody streaks in the advancing men. Already at least a thousand dead carpeted the field, and dozens more died every heartbeat.

I breathed out and unsheathed my sword, gathering power. Archer idly nocked an arrow and Adjutan's grip tightened against the shaft of his axe with a crisp leathery sound.

"All right," I said. "Let's get this started."

Order demon, huh? Not quite what I was expecting from the name.

Zayits

Looks like it makes matter/states constant at random. Before I read the third description, I honestly thought it was the "instant death" one.

Given the effect it has on magic, I wonder whether Akua's plan is to have it eventually plug the entrance to Liesse. She seems to pick the demons so they would affect her mages the least, but the Order one stands out. Bad idea, regardless, when you look on how the Madness and goblinfire (nice typo in the beginning, btw) spread the chaos on the battlefield, which arguably benefits Cat and Amadeus more than Akua.

The proper name of an order demon is, "Your Honour."

Blueballed until Wednesday huh, damn. Still a pretty good set up chapter.

Why do you have to stop there?

Also, I feel like this section will have tons of interludes, going to be nice afterwards to see what everyone is doing, but before that... having to wait a few days for each chapter is going to kill me.

Gunslinger

Well shit, things are properly dire now. I suppose it was too much to expect that the Fifteenth could chill in the rear and not have to constantly fight demons/demigods. Speaking of demons, I wonder if the whole tainted by the Chaos demon thread would come up again now that Masego is facing 3 others.

Can't wait till Wednesday but in the meanwhile vote for the guide on topwebfiction.com if you can <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Demon of corruption.

Idan Dor

The following comment was written before I read the chapter so there is a chance I'm already wrong.

I have thought for a few days about how the Calamties will die. It is obvious that now that the Woe exist, the Calamties are redundant to the setting and with what the Bard started, they have already started to "leave it". This comment is mostly my predictions, I'm at least somewhat placing this out here so I can see where I was wrong/right later.

English is also not my first language so I apologize in advance if things are grammarly incorrect or confusing. This has also turned out to be rather long, I have tried to split it a bit so hopefully it is readable.

Let's start with the death we already observed and diagnose it, The Captain, Sabah. Her death already happened, but I would like to mention a few things notable things in it. First, it was a very thematic death, the Monster brought down by a Hero, a Champion. Second, Captain was killed doing what she does best, all out fighting. I'm bringing both of these points up because they are going to be repeated in the deaths of the rest of the Calamities and to contrast it with the Exiled Prince's death. In his death, he did not die melee fighting or leading, he died "alone". It would be as if Captain was killed by a spell like the Tyrant attempted. No, instead she got to fight all out, 1 against 1 melee combat. Naturally, with this being a story in which the characters know about themes, precedent and lore I fully expect it to be inverted or evaded by at least one of the calamities.

Alright, with that in mind let us go back to the present where I predict (as do others) that Warlock will fall. Now, Warlock is not your typical evil sorcerer. He is not out there to terrorize and take over the world, he does not seem to use demons or devils a lot and as his states himself, he is bored with politics and just wants to do magic. With that in mind, look at what Diabolist has turned out to be basically his exact opposite. She wants to rule the world, terrorize it to submission and she will do whatever warlockly things are required to do this (undeading people, summoning devils, releasing demons).

Now, usually evil sorcerers fall to their own summons/creations/subjects but Warlock does not fit that mold. He instead relies on his skills, knowledge, research and power to get done what a more standard "warlock" like Diabolist will do with sacrifice/demons and blasphemy. I believe he will be defeated and killed by Diabolist in a battle of skill (Malicia claimed she would have been a match for him had he been younger) due to the army of devils she has under her control. His "thing" is also boundaries which Diabolist very much just broke so I believe it will be a very fitting death.

Guessing the other Calamities deaths' is harder because we don't particularly know much about them, but I'm going to start with Ranger. Ranger is a half elf obsessed with hunting those worth hunting, she has also been described as someone unbeatable and has considerable amounts of experience and skill under her belt.

She is also technically retired so I'm not quite sure if she still needs to die, but if she does my guess is that she is going to be killed by her opposites: the Elves of the Golden Bloom. She is the diametric opposite of them in quite a few ways, she is a half elf while they "will remain forever unmarred". They think themselves above the affairs of mortals while she does "meddle" (if only for sport). We also know from her chapter that the Emerald Swords occasionally trying to purge her. Overall, they pretty much are the only thing that can actually kill her, it will be a fitting death and because something needs to drag them to the uncivil war (like the rest of the continent) and this seems like a good premise.

Next, Scribe. She is technically not a Calamity but she is affiliated and she must die before Black does so she gets on this list. So what do we know about her? Not much really. She is from the free cities, her name is Eudokia and she is a scribe. We also got a few start of chapter quotes by a "Eudokia, the Oft-Abducted, Basilea of Nicae" which I can only assume is the same person as Scribe and that everyone but me noticed the connection even though I haven't seen it mentioned.

If she is the same person it is very interesting as it means that she is royalty in Nicae while her Name of Scribe is most likely related to the city of Delos, the city with huge bureaucracy where "the will of the Heavens and the will of the aseketis of the Secretariat were considered to be the same thing". This also seems to imply that Scribe is supposed to be an heroic name because Delos is on the side of Good. With the Oft-Abducted part of her name though and her quotes, I can only assume that she experienced a lot of Free Cities politics and was deeply hurt by it.

This, while very interesting, does not give me too much to speculate on, so I can only assume she will die in the Free Cities by the hands of the Hierarch who lived his life as a diplomat and then was abducted by Tyrant. This feels right but is not much as we still don't know enough about her. It is also, like with Ranger and the Elves, a great way to drag the free cities to this mess.

I have pondered quite a bit about Assassin. We know that he has been on screen before but we have no idea who he is. Some have speculated that Scribe and Assassin are the same person while the writer mentioned that some people in story don't believe he even exists but simply think Black has a lot of talented assassins in his use (at least I remember such a comment). We only really know he has an "interesting" sense of humor, a bit mentioned by Black about him being raised in a school of hired killers and whatever can be learned of his appearance in Thief's chapter. We don't know his ethnicity, origins (though he was not mentioned as not Praesi by Warlock so it makes sense that he is Praesi) and even if he is a "he".

As a completely wild speculation I'm going to guess he is actually Ime (Malicia's helper) due to Assassin knowing how Thief was (something Black didn't seem to), being a woman (from what I have seen the author refers to Assassin without gendered pronouns) and because we don't know anything about that her. Anyhow, the only being I could think of which can actually beat this whimsical pile of murder at his own game is the Dead King. I find it to be very fitting but I'm kinda speculating over nothing at all here.

And finally, the one which must be the last Calamity to die, Amadeus, Lord Black himself. About him we know a lot, we know how loyal people (and entire armies) are to him and how loyal he is to them. He is very much a leader and we know he will be the last to go due to all others (except Assassin) saying how they will avenge him. His kit is mostly about leading armies and groups to battle so I will not expect him to fall quietly.

The most obvious way he can die is Catherine stabbing him in the back. However, she has repeatedly shown no wish to do so. Unless he loses it completely, which is a road he somewhat started, I don't expect this to happen. It is merely "too standard" for Black Knights to be killed by their Squires.

Option two: The White Knight kills him. The White Knight could beat him at his army leading game (with a bit more experience and some luck) but his fight is supposed to be killing Catherine not Black.

Option Three and most fun (and very wild prediction): Malicia kills him. admittedly it is a very out there theory but I very much like it. Conflict between Malicia and Black has been "hinted" for a very long while and Malicia has been whispering betrayal for a while and craves control, so what happens when someone starts becoming a loose cannon and losing his perspective? It is very possible that Malicia will not kill him directly but merely orchestrate his death at the hand of someone else.

Option four, which a few people seem to believe in, he simply does not die. To quite a few commenters it seems like Black's death has been hinted too much and that it will simply averted.

I'm not sure I buy that, but it does bring me to what seems the most likely to me, option five: he dies and then Catherine necros him up. We have known that her necromancy is different then regular (Masego comments on this somewhere around chapter 40) and her connection with death has been direct with her using necromancy all the time and even dieing herself. I think this is the most likely as patterns can't be beaten but they can be transcended and this will be a very clean transcension of "the Calamities dieing" and will even allow Black his "real" victory/ happy ending.

I have seen some comments suggesting that Triumphant (may she never return) is going to pop out of the hell Diabolist has opened. If she does pop out, she will be a very fitting leader to beat Black at his own game. I'm just not very certain she is going to be back, though admittedly it will be very awesome.

TLDR – Warlock dies to diabolist, Ranger to the Elves of the Golden Bloom, Eudokia to Hierarch, Assassin to the Dead King and Black dies but is necroed to life by Catherine.

Thank you for reading. Now to read the chapter.

Ed

Nah sorry I disagree.

Your work up there is logical and makes sense but I really do think that Black will die in a way that is squarely pointed at Cat even though she didn't do it... so then the other Calamities all die at her hand.

Eventually... after severely mauling her and Cat having to arse pull victories as she does 😊

Shequi

Option: Black gets corrupted by one of the Demons on the field, and Cat has to put him down for both his own good and the good of the Empire.

Idan Dor

It has been hinted at before so it makes sense:

"It was a reasonable precaution," he said. "Arrangements like it aren't uncommon among villains. I know Uncle Amadeus has a way to kill Father should he ever be corrupted, and he himself has an arrangement with Assassin to be executed should he ever become a threat to the Empire."

Though I stick to my reasoning that Warlock will be the one to die here not Black. If someone gets corrupted by the demons then it is going to be Warlock who will be killed by Black. I remember Black thinking "and he wondered how many of the people he loved he would have to kill, before it was all over." and we already know he is supposed to have contingency against Warlock.

Duckie

I have to agree. I am leaning more towards Warlock being taken by demons and killed by Black then Black being taken by demons or killed by Akua. For one Blacks story does not cross in anyway with Akua's or enough so that it results in her killing him.

It is far more likely Warlock is corrupted, killed by Black. Black who is already suffering the loss of one friend, snaps after being forced to kill another. Decides enough is enough and tries to do what he hinted a few chapters ago. Make Cat attack the empire, he thus becomes a threat to the Empire. Which in turn sets the plan he made for Assassin to kill him if he becomes a threat, in motion. Which makes Cat even angrier and gives her a justification for waging war on the Empress, revenge.

MetruX

My own take on this: Assassin dies off-screen, and we never know who he or she is. Ranger, if she must die, will die hunting, maybe even Cat herself. Black, on the other hand? I can see two options. He finally snaps, but in the wrong direction, and dies protecting his daughter in all but blood, Cat; or, option two, he kills himself in some manner (even if just by letting something happen instead of stopping it) so Cat can follow her way.

Engineer

Remember Black is not losing his mind. The only person who said that was Malicia and her reasoning for that is because he plans to murder the entire nobles and destroy their bloodlines, something Malicia doesn't approve of. But look at the shit that's happening now, you've got a Noble that has opened a permanent gate to hell. If Alaya had listened to Black and allowed him to murder all of them back at the end of the Conquest they wouldn't be in this situation now.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I like your guess about Assassin's identity, that seems fairly likely.

I'm still sticking with my guess that it was the one member of the Blackguard who spoke with her, way back in the beginning 😊

Letouriste

I honestly expected them to already have counters against all kind of demonic things given that's what akua is known for. I thought her trump card would be something different from demons and devils flooding^^.

Soronel Haetir

I don't see Ranger needing to die, also with the way she is I am not certain she would not withdraw from a fight she is losing. She does what she does because otherwise she is bored, not because she is actually interested in whatever good or ill she achieves.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

soonnandnaanssoon

Did anyone pick up on the change of relation with Killian? I remembered Cat being able to feel her presence before, but now she doesn't even notice Killian around anymore. My bet is either some Akua fudgery is going on with Killian or there was some Role development that was ongoing when they were together that stopped when they split. Regardless, I think this is gonna bite Kat in the ass. Unpleasurably, coming from Killian.

MetruX

It's more that she could feel the Fae Blood and since she's a noble fae she got the feeling she should dominate her. But, with the final choice of full break, there is no compulsion anymore.

Alyxe

Yay, thank you for the chapter. Two quick typo note with the corrections in square brackets []:

"[Though] the goblinfire still burned and had thinned the ranks some, the wights were still thousands and bitterly contested the palisades."

"I breathed out and unsheathed my sword, gathering power. Archer idly nocked an arrow and [Adjutant]'s grip tightened against the shaft of his axe with a crisp leathery sound."

Edrey

I dont think black would die, lossing his name maybe because cat would break the story and they are in the city where they can steal names

Nobody

Warlock is definitely going to die before Black. He would freak out if Black died and Catherine would be the first one to be blamed and killed by him. Maybe he will be forced to sacrifice himself to save Black...

Author Unknown

This fits perfectly with Diabolist's character, holding the world hostage. Again and again, the orphanage, the city, the chapel, she had taken hostages to try and control others. In fact, the chapel bears a considerable resemblance to her current stronghold. A dimension she controls. Where at the chapel she threatened to collapse the dimension and kill them all, who knows what she will do with this little pocket when faced with losing. I certainly don't think all of her spellwork is going to quietly unravel if she dies.

Myself

"It was a given they would be used here," Warlock said conversationally. "Not even Sahelians are so mad as to call on the Unmakers within a closed realm. Masego, you are to contain them."

Well don't be so sure about it, Ubua nearly summoned a freaking corruption demon inside a closed realm back in Book 2

Edrey

Now that i re-read the chapter i found something interesting, how kilian scaped cat's senses when she can literally feel her fae blood, is a ward or a name? Now that is something

Engineer

Time for my regularly scheduled fanfueled erroneous prediction. Without further ado, let's get to it. Ok so FIRSTLY, I know nothing.

That is all.

Chapter was great, except for the blue balling at the end. But all is forgiven since it was Monday and we can get our sweet "release" tomorrow.

Go Team Woe, Go!

Redlaw

No that i think about it the woe are really like the calamity. Squire = Black; warlock=masego ; adjutant= scribe ; thief = assassin ; ranger = archer. Now we only need someone to equal captain.

Engineer

Adjutant is both Captain AND Scribe's counterpart.

narcoduck

I think Nauk was Captain's counterpart. The big brute who resolves to control their inner fury and utterly loyal. But due to their leaders' arrogance, they're brought into fights where they're lost.

it took you that long to figure that out?

Chapter 61: Tempo

"It is true, Chancellor, that a house divided cannot stand. Why do you think mine is the only one I left standing?"

– Dread Emperor Callous

Legionaries were dying like flies. I'd never seen infantry assault a dug-in position held by mages and engines before, and now that I had I could only say it was ugly work. The enemy had been trained in counter-siege tactics, that much was obvious. The first killing grounds were the trench, deep and wide and filled with stakes at the bottom. The men of the Fifth set down planks to bridge it, but planks were mere wood and wood was no match for the sorcery being flung at it. The bridges rarely lasted longer than twenty heartbeats, forcing the legionaries to come at the palisade in clumps instead of a single overwhelming wave. The palisade itself was nothing special – tall and well-built, but lacking wards or anything arcane – but behind it stood an awaiting sea of wights. Goblin munitions made half a dozen breaches along the length of the fortification, but the legionaries were failing repeatedly to push back the undead behind the openings. This, I thought, would be where we began.

Men scattered around the three of us, as much because they knew what we could do as because of some animalistic instinct that screamed Named, move aside while you still can. I could have leapt the trench easily enough, but that would be defeating the purpose. My sword arced along the ground and thick, dark ice formed in a bridge large enough for ranks of ten to pass.

Retaliation was immediate. The fluid, silvery spell that flowed towards my chest I cleaved through without missing a beat and felt the sorcery coming apart at the seams. The five scorpion bolts were a touch more difficult to deal with. My Name pulsed and I let the world slow around me, Winter coursing through my veins. The first bolt froze and shattered with but a twist of will and the two behind it followed suit effortlessly, but the trajectory of the other two was angled too far. Clucking my tongue I ducked under the shots, but the sound of screaming and flesh being pierced behind me told me the men of the Fifth had not been so quick on their feet.

They were not the first legionaries to die today, nor would they be the last.

"Archer," I said. "Silence those engines. Leftmost bastion."

The arrow she nocked was more javelin than anything else, not even fletched – given the ridiculous size of her bow, though, it still fit. Golden stripes ran down the side of the wood, glinting with something like power. Not a spell, I thought, but power inherent. That was much more dangerous.

"Cover your ears, my darlings," she drawled.

Thunder sounded with the loosened string. The javelin roiled with lightning before it was even released, and it flew in a crisp trajectory. Panes of power lit up above the bastion's ramparts like fireworks in shades of blue but the arrow sailed right through them. Lightning tore through a scorpion's wooden frame, shattering it like it'd been swatted by some irritated titan. I didn't know how many of those fancy arrows she had, but I'd leave her to it. This alone had been enough to panic the mages in the bastion, though I knew better than to think it would last.

"Adjutant," I said, idly spinning my blade to limber my wrist. "Let's make the Fifth a beachhead."

I heard Archer cackle behind me as I strode across the ice bridge, followed by the sound of spells tearing into the ground where she'd previously stood. Hakram and I advanced shields raised and found nothing but palisade ahead – the legionaries pouring in behind us were already making for the sides where breaches had been made instead of remaining here.

"Hold," I barked.

Just wood, I thought, and almost snorted. There'd been a time where that would have been enough to slow me down, but I'd left that behind me years ago. My shield whipped into the palisade and there was a loud splintering sound. I'd felt the braces on the other side shake and so I struck again. Again, again, five times in whole before the entire section collapsed ahead of me. There was a heartbeat where the palisade fell back and that was all within my sight, but then the wights raged forward and the fight began. In the distance thunder struck again, Archer's laugh like the ring of doom, and then I rammed into the enemy ranks. There was no place for elegance or subtlety, here. It was just a slog through mud, blood and steel. The kind of graceless fight that had first seen me rise, back in Laure and the Pit. It was almost like coming home and there was a beat to it, a song of crushed skulls and scattered men, and as I sunk deep within myself I embraced it. Adjutant's blurring axe was another of my limbs, moving in accord to a will that was not entirely my own but still mine to shape.

The howling corpses of my people came for my head and they were swept aside. My shield smacked a wight into a spreading pool of green fire as my body pivoted to turn a sword-blow into a wasted swing, Hakram's axe tearing straight through the neck of the undead who'd swung it. Like a whirlwind we advanced, and the hordes of the dead were no match for two Named at the peak of their transient power. The Fifth Legion followed behind, rows of red shields streaked with mud, and what ground we gained was not given back. It wasn't enough, I thought. I went deeper, let the beat guide my hands and feet. Swifter, sharper, until they were just wheat before the sickle. The cold part of my mind knew this was dangerous, remaining in this place where all that existed in Creation was blades in motion, but victory did not come to those who hesitated. What ended it was the song, because it had refrain to it I'd not first heard. Threefold it crooned, feeding me whispers of destruction unending, and when I realized where it came from my blood ran cold. I tore myself out of the trance, limbs trembling, and prayed to any deity listening that it had not been too late.

"Hakram," I croaked, "stop. Now. The demons..."

He let out a hiss that reeked of fear.

"Hierophant should be containing them," he said.

"Can you really contain something like that?" I muttered.

The thing that had been coursing through our veins was gone, and though we still stood strong before the tide our advanced had stopped cold. I didn't want to use an aspect, not out here before I'd even caught glimpse of Akua and the reckoning that lay between us, but the Fifth alone would not be enough to break through the wights. Thunder struck again, Archer a weapon in my arsenal not even the Praesi had answer for. The stone in my mouth warmed with sorcery, and Black's voice cut through the racket of battle.

"Squire," he said. "Leave the Fifth on its own. Move on the left bastion. I need you to draw fire if you can."

My eyes flicked to the right flank, and I finally noticed I had not been the only one to punch through the palisade. Black was on foot now, leading the Fourth's heavies, and where he went death followed. Tendrils of shadow punctured the ground with impossible precision, triggering one array of defensive wards after another while tight ranks of shields drove back the dead. Before long he would be at the foot of the bastion, though the only way up for the legionaries would be the ramp descending from the back of it. It was no mystery why he'd asked me to draw fire: the mages from the two closest bastions were filling the air with sorcery, and though the legionaries under his mantle were not so easily killed the spells still tore smoking holes in his formation every few moments. Casualties were mounting, faster than he could afford.

"Understood," I said. "The demons are proving an issue, Black."

"Purge protocols will be put in place after the battle," he simply replied, and the sound cut.

Joy. That was going to be a glorious aftermath, herding together men who'd fought for us through literal Hells and torching anyone even remotely contaminated. Still, if the alternative was letting soldiers touched by demons back into the wild... There was no winning when it came to dealing with demons, only limiting the damage as much as possible.

"Hakram," I said. "Go back for Archer. We're hitting the left bastion in full force. Tell her... tell I don't care how she gets there, as long as it's fast."

I was going to regret that, I suspected. The orc nodded.

"And you?" he asked.

"I'm going to remind Akua's minions why she keeps running when we fight," I grimly said.

Slogging through the wights barring the path to the bastion would take too long, I decided. But I had option. A platform of ice and shadow formed before me and I leapt atop it, beginning my trek to the enemy.

There was a very important difference, I mused, between fighting one angry demigod in the sky and fighting a hundred mortal mages at range. The mages didn't hit nearly as hard, sure, but they hit a lot. That was proving to be something of a problem, given how gravity kept being a bit insistent about the whole falling thing. The orb of spinning black light hit me in the chest and knocked me straight off the platform — I smashed my shield into it but the steel began to boil, so instead I let myself drop half a dozen feet before making another platform. Under me the sea of wights grasped upwards, some clever enough to begin piling up to reach me. Right, upper grade undead. Fucking Praesi and their endless magical bullshit parade of horrors. My shield was dripping liquid steel but I froze it back into a semblance of usefulness, part of my mind already forming another platform as I did. I'd learned pretty early on that picking up the pace was the most important part of this game.

I was halfway there, but this close they were having an easier time pushing me back. I could see their faces from here, behind the glowing panes, and there was as much terror to behold as there was sneering. The way I kept stubbornly not dying was probably the reason for the former. Two leaps before I got my shoulder clipped again, and that had me slipping long enough for a lash of lightning to crack down at my head. I hurriedly hid under my cloak and the sorcery washed past, but then the fuckers shattered the platform under me and I dropped down onto the wights. I landed on one's head and even as a hundred hands and blades went for me I coiled my legs and jumped back up. The pane of ice I made at an angle, immediately leaping off it and ending up already in flight when the mage volley came calling. Steady, Catherine, I told myself. Steady and careful is how we get there. I faked a forming platform to the right then veered to the left on another, lips quirking at how eagerly they fell for it.

I heard a hoarse yell, and my brow rose as I saw a trebuchet stone hit the wights ahead. The Legions had finally set up their engines in range, looked like. Then a silhouette rose slowly from atop the stone, resetting a broken arm with a scream, and Adjutant tossed his crumpled up shield at a wight's head. Had he just... That had worked? I knew he was tougher now that he was Named, but this was ridiculous. He got hit by a fireball right in the chest and thrown off the stone so I hurriedly made a series of platforms and reached him before he could get his idiot ass killed. I leaned over the hoist the orc by the scruff of the neck, smacking aside a smoky-looking spell, and resisted the urge to chew him out in the middle of an active battlefield.

"Where's Archer?" I asked instead.

"Fire," he replied, eyes going wide.

I cursed and dragged him through another jump – less than a hundred feet now, they were getting quicker.

"She said something about 'stealing your stuff'," he got out.

"She would," I bitterly complained.

I focused on the little bundle in the back of my mind and found Zombie the Third in flight, Archer on his back and whooping joyfully. Her tone was not any less obnoxious heard through a necromantic abomination's ears, apparently. I'd learned something today.

"This is going to hurt," I told Adjutant.

"Catherine, don't-"

I threw him, right at the bastion. My armour creaked under the strain but the orc flew and smacked right into the blue panes of light. Ah, they'd adjusted for physical stuff after Archer kept destroying their engines. That was unfortunate. On the bright side, they were now panicking so another two platforms had me landing atop the bastion while they did their level best to incinerate Hakram with hellflame. Break was on the edge of my lips, just waiting to be brought out and shatter their little protections, but I pushed down the urge. Not an aspect, not against second-stringers like these. My sword dug into the shield and my Name flared, sorcery impossibly turning into ice and cracking beneath the force. It shattered, and their protections must have been tied because the whole thing gave as one. I landed in a crouch, my frost-tinged armour glinting even in the shade, and let out a steamy breath. Hakram dropped down like a stone a heartbeat later, crashing without even the pretence of control and cursing loudly in Kharsum all the while.

Bastion, I thought as I placed it all in my mind's eye, was the right word for this. From the outside it looked like a broad tower of hewn stone, but up here it was revealed for what it was: a large fortified platform, for the use mages and engines. Fewer than a hundred mages left – attrition had taken its toll – and maybe thrice that in household troops and men who worked the engines. Actually taking the bastion, I thought, was perhaps not within my means. Wrecking it, though, absolutely was. It would have to do. The Fifth was lagging too far behind to be counted on for this.

"Though I be a speck of dust, I-" a man began incanting, and without blinking I raised my hand.

His throat filled with ice, his eyes froze over and just like that he died.

"Oh Merciless Gods," a woman whispered, then gathered herself. "WARDS."

Too late for that, I thought. Adjutant was back on his feet, though given his armour always looked like it had been put to the torch it was hard to tell whether the earlier flames had hurt him or not. He was moving fine, though. That would be enough: all I needed him to be was a target. The buzz of sorcery filled the air and the household troops advanced, but I ignored them entirely. I'd not come to kill rank and file, however pretty the armour. I dashed forward and lowered myself under a man's swing then slipped past him, shield coming up to swat aside the man behind and then I was through, past their forming defensive line. There were shouts behind but I paid them no attention, running to the mages. I carved through the first man's chest before he could even finish making a ball of flame, moving to the next before his corpse had even dropped. Taghreb and Soninke all of them, in rich robes and jewellery. The finest of the Wasteland. They died, one after another. Once I might have thought there would be something cathartic about scything through the very kind of people who'd plundered my homeland for decades, but I'd been wrong. All I felt was sickened.

This wasn't a fight, it was a massacre.

They formed their first ward before I'd slaughtered my way through the first dozen but it had been done in haste. I let Winter flow my veins and it broke under two swings, a pair of mages falling to their knees bleeding out of their eyes and nose when it shattered. I flicked my sword and a spear of ice went straight through a Taghreb's stomach even as I broke a man's skull with a smash of my shield. They were terrified, and the Beast was drinking it in like fine wine even as bile rose in my throat. A few of them banded together and managed to bind my shield with lightning, convulsions running up my arm, so I dropped it immediately. Before a heartbeat had passed I was elbow deep in a man's ribcage, flesh parting like mud under gauntlet and Name strength.

"Monster," a sorcerer hissed.

"Amateurs," I judged them.

I withdrew my hand from the dead man, dripping red, and conceded the stranger might have something of a point. I stepped around the ten bolts of shadow he threw at me and ran him through anyway, because it was too late to flinch now. Not when I was surrounded by an army made up of my dead countrymen, lashed to these people's will. That I had blood on my hands did not make these mages better in some nebulous way: all it meant was that we were sharing similar gutters. The household troops were trying to get at my back, but they'd run into a problem called Adjutant. By the way he was moving, swifter and stronger with every swing, he'd called on his first aspect of the day. Rampage, I thought, would be enough to keep those out of the way for a while. I danced around another volley of spells, too quick for any of them to handle this close up, and Archer joining the fight was heralded by the loud crack of shattering wood. Zombie whinnied as he crashed into a trebuchet, his rider fluidly leaping down before impact, and my lips thinned. If Archer had broken my flying horse I was going to be cross. It wasn't like I could just waltz back into Arcadia to get another one.

"Sorry I'm late, had to make a detour," Archer called out.

"Mages first," I replied, in no mood for banter. "Then the engines."

It was poor form, I supposed, to tell the enemy or plan before it was carried out. I'd have hesitated if they actually stood a chance of stopping us. It'd been bad enough when I was the only fox in the henhouse, but with Archer having her knives out the mages were finished. After she cut the first one's throat any semblance of coordination went out the window and from there on it was just... work. Red labour, moving from one soon-to-be-dead man to another. Cut through the half-summoned devil, go around the spell, and then another corpse hit the ground. Dimly I realized I felt like throwing up. I pressed on anyway. After the last mage was dead Archer went to back Hakram and I turned to the engines. Seven trebuchets, twice as many scorpions. There'd been a few more of each before, but Archer had taken her toll earlier. I'd anticipated some fighting before breaking them, but apparently there'd be no need: all the people operating them had fled down the ramp while I whet my blade. Scorpions were easily dealt with, finicky things that they were: rip out the string, shatter the frame. The trebuchets were hulking masses I only vaguely understood the working of, so I kept it simple. There was a thick beam connecting the sling to the counterweight, going through the pivot above. I put my hand to the part of the beam next to the string and froze the wood, then shattered it with the pommel of my sword. It should be enough to take them out of the battle. I turned to the still-ongoing scrap with the household troops and my brow rose.

They were still keeping in formation, to their honour. But Archer kept killing their officers whenever one spoke, so what had likely been meant as an orderly retreat down the ramp and into the wights was turning into a rout. Adjutant, I saw, was beginning to wind down. His Name thought the fight was spent, so the aspect was petering out. That could be dangerous, if he was still surrounded by soldiers. There was a mass of wights below the ramp in the back, but they'd not engaged. They were... fighting? But there were no legionaries down there. Ah, I realized. We killed the mages guiding them. Now they're just tearing at anything in sight. Some pockets still seemed to be orderly, and my guess at the culprit for that was the mages on the central bastion. The battle wasn't done because we'd softened up the left flank, though now the Fifth would have a much easier time punching through. I looked at the other strongholds, and saw the one on the right had already fallen. The Sixth's banner flew above it, now, and unlike me Black had been followed by legionaries. He'd not destroyed the engines: he'd ordered them turned on the undead. Of him I saw no trace, but in truth I didn't look for long.

The Twelfth, I saw, had followed behind the Sixth. They were fighting their way to the central bastion, though advance was slow and costly. How long had all of this taken? An hour, in whole? And Akua must have prepared this field for months. Even without the other Calamities, Black was a weight on the balance unlike any other. I went to reinforce Archer and Adjutant, and that was the last straw. The household troops fled into the clawing field of wights, judging all too accurately that they had better chances of survival down there than against the three of us. There was a heartbeat of silence, the three of us panting atop a stronghold surrounded by corpses, and I closed my eyes. I willed a sliver of my Name into the Link, finding it highly receptive. I had no fondness for Masego's father but he knew his way around enchantments.

"Black," I said. "My bastion's done."

There was the sound of steel against steel on the other side.

"Can you see the way into Liesse?" my teacher asked.

I squinted in the distance, towards where Kilian had pointed on the map earlier. There was, I saw, a pit. I couldn't see what was in it and it was surrounded by wights, but it was the only thing close to a gate I could find.

"I think so," I said. "Hole in the ground?"

"I will arrive momentarily," he said. "Have your Named join with the Twelfth for the assault on the last bastion. You and I will proceed into the city."

"I don't like the shape of that," I admitted.

"It has been taken into consideration," he replied. "Do not dawdle. Resistance is intensifying close to the pit, I will not be able to wait for long."

The sound cut and I frowned, trying to look for him on the field. There was a single man on a horse, swiftly cutting his way through the wights. Huh. He wasn't even fighting them, not really. He trampled exactly as many as he needed to go forward and ignored the rest. And he's getting close, I thought. Time to go.

"We've got orders," I said.

Archer snorted.

"Because I'm so fond of those," she said.

"They involve a lot of killing," I said.

"You have my attention," the wretch grinned.

"The two of you are going with the Twelfth to hit the last stronghold," I said. "Follow into the city after if you can, but that might not be feasible."

Hakram frowned.

"You're going on without us?" he said.

"Bonding time with Black," I said. "I assume some form of murder will be involved, possibly also a chilling speech on the nature of power. As prelude to further murdering."

"You have the weirdest relationships with people," Archer muttered.

Archer. Archer had said that. I did not dignify it with a response. I whistled sharply and Zombie rose from the trebuchet wreckage where he'd been lazing about this whole time, trotting up to me. I slipped a foot in the stirrup and mounted the saddle.

"Try not to bite off more than you can chew," I said. "I have a hard time believing this is the best Diabolist could do with months of preparation."

"I'll keep her out of trouble," Adjutant said.

Yeah, from that look on her face that wasn't happening. Ah, well. So long as neither of them died I'd live with it. Sheathing my sword, I spurred on my mount and after a gallop to the edge of the bastion his wings unfolded and we took flight. Black, I saw, was already at the edge of the pit. He'd either dismounted or lost his horse, but didn't seem all that hindered for it. I winced as I saw his shadow and blade move simultaneously, tendrils severing three spines and sword sending a head flying over the span of the same heartbeat. I used more power making a platform than he had using his shadow right then – he'd be able to keep this up for hours, no matter that he'd told me to hurry. Still, I guided Zombie in a low pass and threw myself down. I landed at his side, legs bending, and watched a dead hand flop the ground neatly severed. Charming. Zombie flew off and I straightened my back. Green eyes took in the state of me, then returned to the enemy.

"So is there a secret knock to get in?" I asked, glancing at the pit.

All I saw inside was darkness, and not even a kind my Name sight could see through.

"We're going to jump," he said.

"You're enjoying this," I accused.

"Am I?" he hummed, and pushed me.

I said some very unkind things about his ancestry in Taghreb as I dropped, and didn't stop even when he started falling at my side.

"You've considerably improved your vocabulary," he noted.

I sighed. Around us was only darkness, anchored by the sensation of falling. Considering this place was out of phase with Creation, I was wary of the fact that this felt like so long a drop. Akua had already shown she could meddle with the span of time in her little horror bubbles. After half an eternity our fall slowed and we landed softly on what felt like stone. Nice touch, that. She wasn't even going to pretend she'd not expected company. There was a tunnel ahead, its boundaries not marked by solid so much as absence. I could see again, at least. And what I saw was a large and looming silhouette at the end of it, ram horns sprouting from its head.

"A gatekeeper," Black said. "Quaint."

"She's a real traditional girl, our Akua," I drawled. "Twenty denarii she yammers at us through a runic array when get in."

"Twenty more she compares herself to Triumphant," Black replied amusedly. "They always do, Catherine. I've heard three dozen variations on that speech by now."

He paused.

"They quote the play," he said, pained. "Every time. I know the entire third act by rote."

"I'll take that," I mused. "She probably thinks she's above name-dropping, like this isn't basically a glorified flying fortress."

I raised my voice.

"That's right, Diabolist, I went there," I catcalled. "Your whole plan is so last millennium, and I bet you actually call your lair a lair when talking to other people."

I didn't look, but I got the impression Black's lips were twitching. Heavy footsteps sounded ahead, followed by the cloying smell of brimstone wafting up to us.

Two blades left their scabbard as one, and we advanced.

Alright, the banter and action made Monday's blueballing more than worth it.

Engineer

The blueballing is not yet over. In fact one might say it has transitioned into purpleballing with this chapter.

Fucking Wednesdays man, damn!

Matthew Avant

Hey, we're only $61 on Patreon away from thrice-weekly updates. I'll up my pledge if you up yours.

Engineer

Indeed I would.

Financial constraints make that impossible though. You know, being a starving final year engineering student, neck deep in student debt in a third world country. Oh joy!

Gunslinger

I know this is supposed to be a dangerous situation and all but I was laughing throughout.

"We've got orders," I said.

Archer snorted.

"Because I'm so fond of those," she said.

"They involve a lot of killing," I said.

"You have my attention," the wretch grinned.

Gods below, I love Archer.

nehemiahnewell

Yeah, but I'm pretty sure she's going to die. Not necessarily soon. I suspect she'll die to heroes. Her whole funny dynamic sets her up to die to show things have stopped being funny. Well, either her or Hakram to show Cat can't truly have anyone at her back. Or both, for the gut punch.

Like, Hierophant is more powerful, but Hakram is the one she really cares about.

Decius

No, Archer is going to gradually grow to like the people she hangs out with, and when they need to buy time for a retreat she will make a last stand behind them.

After being presumed dead long enough for her friends to avenge her, she'll turn up in a bar, maimed, and mostly retire from the fighting life.

That's how the story should treat neutral characters, anyway.

NZPIEFACE

@Decius

- 1) Last stands are for good guys.
- 2) I'm pretty sure you cant just stop being a Named

RoflCat

Wasn't one of the pre-chapter's quote something about sending in the Fools first because the Gods won't let you be rid of them so easily?

If anything, her death will be the 'glorious' kind, because that's the kind of life she plan to live, and even in death she will not be denied.

Jonnnney

She is the only comic relief that's plot armor not a flag.

Metrux

Actually, I don't think she's going to die or retire, just leave the group, even if she still likes them, because it's a time of relative peace and she needs to fry bigger fish. And about last stand being for heroes... She's not a villain. She's not trully a hero, either, but she has got none of the villainous trademarks. Think about it, can't you just picture her in a heroes party? That's why I don't think she's going to bite it anyway. Hakram, on the other hand... I see him dying for Cat close to the end of the story.

RoflCat

I had similar reactions.

>They were still keeping in formation, to their honour. But Archer kept killing their officers whenever one spoke

It's almost like she's got instinctual hatred of commands that isn't about murder.

>"We've got orders," I said.

>Archer snorted.

>"Because I'm so fond of those," she said.

>"They involve a lot of killing," I said.

>"You have my attention," the wretch grinned.

....Oh

maresther23

Don't be shy Black, you also quoted that play to your murder happy girlfriend as you swore vengeance.

naturalnuke

Omg you're right XD

I love consciously melodramatic Black.

soonnanandnaanssoon

For all you who didn't get it,

Book 3 Chapter 46: Denouement (During a Name flashback, Amadeus to Hye)

"I read a play once," Amadeus replied. "Forbidden by Imperial decree. There is a part I enjoyed, and it goes like this-"

His voice carried, without ever rising in tone.

"Be fearful now
tremble; for my reach is long my wrath is great patient but
above or below."

It's a part of the play "I, Triumphant", author unknown, banned by decree of the Tower under Terribilis II. The whole extract can be found in the quote of the day in Book 2, Chapter 36: Madman.

Shequi

Presumably Terribilis II also hated having Praesi nobles quote it at him in dramatic fashion.

ArkhCthuul

Probably because he was terribly unsuited to witty retorts.

Still, chilly quote.
Good chapter.

Valkyria

Black, trying to hide bad habits xD

Why do we have to wait till next Monday? Can someone just donate 300$? 😊

No Fuckin Way

Seriously. I'll even throw in my 2 cents.

maresther23

If I had the money...

Meanwhile vote for PGtE! More readers, more donations. We might get Fridays updates by next year.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

MurkyTruths

Im honestly debating it....

Goldenroot

We are actually only $60 away not 300.

taovkool

I have just finished the binge read, and lo and behold, a new chapter have arrived, all hail the Black Queen!

By the way, with a name like Triumphant, I would not be surprised if there's going to be a chapter called a Triumphant's Return where, well, the Triumphant returns. With what I've seen so far of erraticerrata it seems like what the Name was leading up to.

Jonnnney

That's a fair point. Triumphant went to one of the hells when she died I wonder if it's the same one where the breach is connected.

Scratch

Another great chapter. I wonder how long now before Cat doesn't even get sick by tearing people viscerally apart with her hands.

jormungand

i got bad feeling about the two of em, i afraid diabolist will force her way to cath killing black. the rest of the calamities will not like that....

Engineer

The Black Knight and the Squire.

This shit is beautiful san.

soonnanandnaanssoon

It's practically screaming Black's death though. I won't be surprised if Black is secretly carrying a huge red banner with the word "MENTOR OCCUPATIONAL HAZARD" written across it.

Euodiachloris

It's not all that big. And, the letters are quite tastefully calligraphic in style. The stitching, incidentally, took months.

Engineer

Oh Black is definitely planning on dying here. He's enacting his succession plan.

Why else would he instruct Squire to leave Adjutant and Archer behind while he and Squire assault Liesse alone? Having two extra Named at your side when assaulting a fortress is NEVER a bad thing. The only other explanation is that he's carrying the idiot ball but the priors for that are way too low. He's planning something.

Matthew Avant

His last wish will be for Cat to use it as a lampshade.

Darkening

Man, Black and Cat have such a fun dynamic at the end there, can't wait to see more of it. I'm surprised Black's not being more wary of going into battle with her though, given that dying in front of your protege is the leading cause of mentor deaths.

Valkyria

Can't help it but after Cat's last taunt I'm just imagining some royals back at court:

-Uh, Diabolist is sooo last millenium.

-Totally! To think I ever was trying to get her attention, bah.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Keyen

During the first read, I was a bit dumbfounded about the multiple reference of how the fight is making her sick.

Then, I realized it was her first battle against humans "in the thick of it".

- Three hills: She just went to kill the Page, nobody else.
- Marchford: Non-Humans
- Liesse: Devils only, she didn't fight the humans
- Then it was Fae only
- Even the battle against Fasili, she fought only undead, not human beings.

So, I quite understand how it feels different for her (and I like the eye for detail, good job on it).

Engineer

Thanks for clearing that up. I thought her reaction to killing was annoying but it's completely expected when you're cutting down humans and you're not a sociopath. Good catch.

cookiehunter

technically not correct, at 3 hills she killed a number of soldiers as well just not that many

Keyen

You are correct (I forgot about that), but even then:
"It had been some time since I'd fought men without a Name, and never before had I taken the fight to them without my own power being hamstrung. The experience was... enlightening. I burrowed into their line like an arrow into flesh, too horrified to smile."

Same horror about it ^^

Mike E.

God I love this dynamic (and the snark):

"You and I will proceed into the city."

"I don't like the shape of that," I admitted.

"It has been taken into consideration," he replied

The Warren Peace NFL Report

"Twenty more she compares herself to Triumphant,"

During Akua's POV interlude, I kept thinking "I don't think you understand what 'may she never return' means." I'd think it was a meta-trap put there to induce Black to put her into a "type" to make him underestimate her, if I didn't already know she believes all the hype. Maybe it still is a trap, it's so like her to use the truth to tell lies

Matthew Avant

Hey fellow fans and patrons: We're only $61 on Patreon away from 3x-a-week! I know we can make it. Can twelve of us get together and all pledge another $5 apiece? I'm in if y'all are.

Letouriste

Black said he is prepared against the whole mentor dying before his apprentice after they fought together a common enemy so I will believe him. he still have plans for the after, a lot of plans....he can't let cat deal with his friends rage after all. their rage would be SO big if they learn he died when only cat was there and she didn't prevent that

Drd

"Bonding time with Black," I said. "I assume some form of murder will be involved, possibly also a chilling speech on the nature of power. As prelude to further murdering."

"You have the weirdest relationships with people," Archer muttered.

This had me in stitches. XD
Personal time with Daddy Black has never sounded as fitting to Cat's current situation!

Author Unknown

I don't know about everyone else, but I am really hoping Cat finds and kills Akua's dad first. Just so she can keep her promise/threat she made oh so long ago: to find something that Akua cares about and destroy it.

I think that would be Akua's undoing, as it isn't something a Hero would do and Akua keeps trying to cast Cat in the role of a Hero, denoted by her plans to turn Cat to the dark side and have Cat serve as her right hand.

Gunslinger

While I would love 3 chapters a week, I worry how much of a strain it would be though for the author. We wouldn't want them to burnout

nigeltheoutlaw

God, I can not wait for Catherine to gut that cunt Akua. Also nice chapter, good to see some banter between Black and Catherine again.

ICSM

Well, Black just donned the Red Shirt. My 20 denarii say he won't come out of the hole.

Goldenroot

We just reached the 3 a week goal on patreon a little while ago.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Oh wow. Thrice-weekly updates have been reached on Patreon. I feel kinda excited but kinda worried as well? EE if you feel burnt out and need a break from thrice-weekly updates I think most of us would understand and be ok with 1-2 weeks of backlog, so do voice out if you need more rest or something.

whyy

hi! I just went on your Patreon and saw the goal for 3 posts a week was reached!! Congrats to you and thank god for us getting another chapter each week 😊

Rogthnor

Finally caught up, and I just want to say I ship Akua/Catherine. I think Akua really likes her inner own twisted way, her plan to make cat server her forever screams villainous love. I hope cat ends up binding her soul to service when this is over.

burdi

i think aqua want to trap cat in hell, make her fight all devils and demons...fighting so many will make her super tired but she will never bow down, so she will keep fighting until she broke..became madness incarnation and she will seek the gate to get out...but aqua sorcery already waiting in the gate to bind anything that pass the gate to her will. of course thats not gonna happen, cat will came to her new shining name, black queen, or winter knight and brute force her way out somehow..just like her trademark

nick012000

>calling Akua Aqua

Hey, now, Akua might not be the brightest bulb in the factory, but she's still not that stupid!

alegio

I love how Black makes fun about people referencing that play when he referenced it himself AND Cat saw that in a name dream.

Oh, and also this: "Fucking Praesi and their endless magical bullshit parade of horrors." It perfectly describes Praesi culture.

maresther23

I read this article and I couldn't help thinking about PGtE:
<https://aeon.co/essays/why-is-pop-culture-obsessed-with-battles-between-good-and-evil>

"The ostensibly moral face-off between good and evil is a recent invention that evolved in concert with modern nationalism – and, ultimately, it gives voice to a political vision not an ethical one."

Chapter 62: Verse

"One hundred and eighty-seven: should one of your trusted companions be taken hostage at knife-point, check for the following features – cliff, moat, or any kind of sharp drop. Should one be nearby, you may assume the situation will solve itself momentarily."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

Heavy footsteps and the scent of Hell, yet no ominous breathing. I got to see the reason for the absence the moment our opponent came into sight. The devil, for there was no denying it was that, stood a good twenty feet tall. Broad as cart, if not more, it had a shape almost human if humans could be of that size. It wore no clothes, its sculpted body made of something neither stone nor metal but evoking both, and in its hands it held a long mace that looked like a massive rib. Granite? Hard to tell, in the dark. Still, it was the head that drew attention or more precisely the lack thereof. Atop the devil's neck was only a polished surface, like someone had ripped off the head of a marble statue, and from the sides sprouted the ram horns I'd glimpsed earlier. Well, there went my usual plan. Decapitation did the trick with most everything, if you were thorough enough. For all that the devil lacked eyes it had no trouble keeping track of us, and for something its size it was damnably nimble. Also strong, I thought with a wince as the rib-mace smashed against the ground with a deafening sound.

Yeah, I wasn't getting hit by that if I could help it. I no longer had the Lone Swordsman's hero juice that would allow me to get back up afterwards.

It should have been, I thought, a difficult scrap. But it wasn't, because the two of us were moving seamlessly. It wasn't like with Adjutant, who was a limb of my own, or the way it had when the Woe had... come together in Dormer. Black was just always in the right place, like he had a supernatural sense telling him where that was. The devil leaned forward to smash down the mace on me and my teacher was right behind, edge of his sword flashing with shadow as he carved a scar on the thing's back. It screamed mouthlessly and turned, swinging wildly, but he was exactly half a step out of the arc. Its free hand reach for Black, fingers creaking as they moved, but then I was free to act and my blade went into the back of its knee. Not, sadly, deep enough to push through. But enough it turned screaming again, and when it did Black hacked halfway through its mace-wielding wrist. The devil went wild and the both of us backed away smoothly, one behind it and one before, neither of us out even slightly out of breath.

There was a game of shatranj being played here, with every step and every swing, and the devil was losing it. Much as I would have liked to say I was a player unto myself, I wasn't. I was just... part of the dance. Another moving part my teacher worked with as he orchestrated the death of a creature that could easily have torn its way through a full company of heavies without taking a wound. Sometimes I forgot that, for all that I'd mostly seen Black scheme and lead men, his Name was that of a killer of heroes. To be the Black Knight was to be the right hand of the Dread Emperor, the slayer of the anointed champions of the Heavens. There was no searing light or shouted righteousness, down here, but there was death. Being painted on a canvas of flesh, one stroke at a time. I enjoyed being part of that as much as I hated it. Following the lead of a professional was... soothing, and the victory being arranged would be sweet. But it'd been some time since I'd had anyone above me in the pecking order on the battlefield. The feel of it was like fly that wouldn't quit buzzing around me.

When the devil emerged from the wild frenzy that had seize it, we advanced again. It leapt back, over my head, but nimble or not it was heavy. A twist of will had a spear of frost ramming into its side, doing little but breaking skin but slamming it against the side of the corridor. Absence, that was what the boundary looked like, but whatever it was it was not lightly shaken: the devil smashed against it and fell scrabbling to its feet. Neither of us intended to give it the breathing room. The rib-mace skidded against the ground, moving so blindingly fast it was a blur, but I leaned into my instincts – I felt the breath of death under my feet, cloak rustling, but already I was rolling forward and beneath its guard. There was a sound like stone breaking and the devil half-collapsed forward. I stepped to the side of the falling torso and hacked at its sides, for lack of better target, frost touching the wounds I made and never leaving. I smelled a kill.

"Withdraw," Black said.

I moved without hesitation. The creature did not attack, and I got a look at why: while I'd been distracting it in the front, my teacher had slipped behind and deepened the wound in the back of the knee until the entirely limb was cut off. The devil, struggling to keep us at bay with its mace, roughly tried to force back its severed parts together. To my distaste, I saw the unearthly material began to mend itself. Of course Akua had some kind of self-healing abomination, which also shrugged off my power in anything but strong concentration and who was fucking twenty feet tall as a gatekeeper. Her ego probably didn't allow her to be any random asshole, she had to be Queen Asshole, reigning queen of all the assholes in the world.

"Now," Black said, when the stitch job was half-done.

The devil screamed again, and I was close enough to feel the sound coming from its entire body. It was the thing itself screaming, and the act that nothing to do with mouth or throat. I pressed forward without flinching. I realized what my teacher's intent had been a moment before it bore fruit. The devil attempted to rise to its feet to fight us but the stitching was not yet complete: the moment it put weight on the limb, the healing broke and it fell down again. Typical Black, I thought. I might have been the kill the thing brawling up close, but it in his eyes the uncertainty was not worth the risk. Instead we'd withdrawn to create another occasion, one for a clean kill. It was the fighting style of a man who'd spent his entire life killing heroes. Knowing the dice would always favour the other side, he'd learned to remove chance from the equation entirely. It was an alien way of killing to me, who tended to double down when things got risky instead. But there's a reason he's lived this long when heroes keep taking a swing at his neck, and I'm looking at it.

Frost swept up my sword and I drove the blade into the back of the devil fallen at my feet. From the corner I could see Black cutting through the back of its mace-wielding elbow, motions fluid and not a single one wasted. The devil screamed but it was done. With a last attempt at taking me in hand it tried to rally, but from where my blade had sunk into its flesh ice was spreading inside. The hand never reached me, the limb itself frozen and I kept pouring Winter's power into its frame. From the beginning to the end, the fight could not have lasted longer than a quarter hour. Neither of us had taken a single hit, or been in any great danger of dying. There'd be a grand total of two words spoken throughout, no quips or taunts – the absence had been heavy it would have felt like whistling during a sermon to start. I spat to the side, out of breath more for use of my mantle than because of physical tiredness.

There'd been a lot of talk since I became the Squire about the similarities between us, but this... execution had just laid the differences bare for all to see. We both used chaos, but the manner was different. The dark-haired man would wait patiently, put himself in the correct position, and then set fire to the field. He'd then ruthlessly capitalized on those weaknesses, using chaos as just another tool in his arsenal. Me, though? Chaos followed wherever I went, so I'd made it my home grounds. Learned to drink and breathe that kind of mess, so that when it hit the field I was the only one unhindered. It'd gotten me through two messes in Arcadia, Marchford and Summerholm, but never without a price. On the surface his way of doing things was flatly superior and I still intended to learn from it, but I wasn't Black. I didn't have that kind of calculation in me. And though Akua had been full of shit when she'd called him a rat in a maze of traps, she'd touched something true: my teacher's way only worked so long as he was prepared. It was, in a word, fragile.

I could learn from him without turning in a shoddier version of who he was. I had to, or the fights ahead would cost me a lot more than Nauk.

"Mongowa-umun," Black said in Mtethwa. "It was a greater devil, though not a famous one. Likely an old Sahelian contract kept secret for a rainy day."

"She only had one of those left, according to my sources," I replied. "I expected it to be deeper in the city, to be honest."

"There will be worse," Black said, shaking his head. "A host, yes, but that will not be the thrust of her defence. The old breed has always preferred sorcery to armies, in the end. Sorcery comes from a single will, armies have to share victory."

"Wards," I said. "But we have a layout of those. Thief saw to that."

"Two things must you face, when breaking a High Lord," Black murmured, quoting from one of Terribilis II's treatises. "Tall and ancient walls, manned by wrath. Then the seat of power, where old devils lie."

"This isn't a Wasteland city," I said. "She didn't have ten centuries to fill her vaults with every different shade of madness she could think of."

"It is a manner of thinking, Catherine," he replied. "Her seat of power, the Ducal Palace, will be where she has invested greatest effort."

"Frontal assault's not an option, then," I grimaced. "Not that I'd seriously considered, given the army in the city and whatnot."

Pale eyes glanced at me and he nodded.

"Your little surprises," he said. "Do you have way to contact them?"

"There's a mage along," I admitted. "But it's not like either of us can scry. Akua bailing out of Creation wasn't part of the plan. Instructions were given before the operation began."

"I am uncertain what that would result in, if currently carried out," Black said. "There is a need to account for that liability."

"You want me to find them?" I said. "I never liked the metaphor, but needle and haystack. And in this case the needle is both murderous and actively hiding."

"Think, Catherine," he softly said, "about the fight ahead of us. The shape of it. In the process of that confrontation, can we afford to have a sudden tipping point of unknown timing and effect?"

I grimaced. If this were just me, I'd say yes. I was confident that, whatever came of it, I'd be better at dealing with it than Diabolist. I didn't care about what actually happened as much as I did what I could make from that. But that wasn't the way Black worked, and considering he was the mentor in this little jaunt of ours maybe sticking to the safe side was the better notion. I was still wary that he'd told me to leave Adjutant and Archer behind. There were a lot of stories that could spring from the two of us hitting Diabolist's lair alone, and few ended well for him.

"So I look for them," I said. "In the trapped horror-city swarming with undead and mages. Gods, you always take me to the worst places."

"No," he said. "I have... a notion for their use. Make your way to the Ducal Palace and prepare an approach. Quietly."

My fingers clenched. I studied his face and found it as inscrutable as ever, pale and calm and seemingly in control.

"You know I'm not great at the courtesies, so you'll have to forgive if I'm being too blunt," I said. "Are you trying to get yourself killed?"

He cocked his head to the side but did not reply. He didn't seem offended, but then he didn't seem much of anything at all – I was well aware that the only reason I saw mild curiosity on his face was because he was letting me.

"I went along with this because I thought you had a plan," I said. "Something that doesn't end up with you taking a spell for me or dying to free me from some trap. But I have to ask, Black, are you actually trying to die? Because us going off on our own before we pick a fight with Diabolist reeks of you being there in chains when I enter her throne room."

My tone turned harsh.

"I don't care if you think you've reached the end of the rope," I bit out. "I'm not going to help you go out in a blaze of futility. Gods Below, this is Akua. She has a magic weapon and a fortress of doom, but you've taught me since the moment I became a claimant that the story she began only ends one way. This isn't just foolish, it's actively detrimental to the Empire. I don't care if you're Named, we're on the eve of war with the Principate – now is not the time to start sacrificing our best generals."

I was panting by the end of it, fear and anger having bled out into my voice. I hated how vulnerable I'd sounded, even if I'd scrupulously avoided making this personal.

"If you are quite finished?" Black calmly asked, and I grunted in agreement. "Good. You misunderstand me. I've no intention of dying today, Catherine, though it is certainly possible regardless. You have not seen my full hand, so to speak."

"You know better than that," I said. "Tricks going against the current don't stick. It makes it seem like you have a chance for the moment, but then Creation fucks you anyway because it's a very large machine and you're a very small grain of sand."

"Of this," he replied, "I am aware. And yet I would proceed."

It was tempting to ask him what had him so sure he'd make it out, but even if there'd been a guarantee Akua wasn't listening in – which there wasn't – I didn't believe he would have told me. Black was more pile of secrets than man, sometimes, and he did not share those without good reason. My fear, even for him, did not qualify.

"This is what you'd say," I murmured, "if you were trying to force a succession on me."

"Yes," he acknowledged serenely.

"And you know how to fool the Name tricks for lying," I said.

He'd been the one to teach them to me, after all.

"I do," he agreed.

"But you want me to believe you anyway," I finished.

He inclined his head, conceding the point.

"A leap of faith," the Black Knight said, and for some reason he sounded amused.

I'd learned to recognize pivots, to feel the weight of their touch on my life. I'd come a long way since first hearing the word, Juniper telling me of it under the stars months after I'd made my first choice that mattered. Not a Choice, no, not the way the Book of All Things spoke of it, but perhaps something touching the facet of that greater concept. In the collection of decisions and acts that made up a Name, the stuff of it, some mattered more than others. This? This was not one. I breathed out and sharpened my mind but there was no fulcrum to be found. No sense that scales could be shifted. Was it because he was being truthful, that my wariness was unfounded? Or is it because he has already made a choice of his own, and it has long been out of my hands? I could not keep a man who sought death from it, I knew. Much less one as able as my teacher.

The part of me that was Catherine Foundling yet not, the girl I was and had been but seen through the darkened ice that was Winter and my Name, crept up my spine inexorably. It told me that if this was unacceptable, I should force my will upon it. Brand his soul with a queen's decree, that he would struggle for life whatever the costs. But that whispering thing met pale green eyes, so calm and measured, and it faltered. It would be fair, it insisted. Once, in Summerholm, he had robbed me of my own will before swinging nooses. Though that debt had grown muddled by the ways we had intertwined since, it would stand so long as it was not repaid. I was Callowan, after all, even now. We were a people of long grudges. I forced the set of ugly instincts down. Warlock had not been wrong, to call me other. I wondered if all the villains I'd jeered at in the old stories, called fools for not thinking it through, had started out like me. Bargain after bargain, one desperate compromise after another until you hardly recognized the creature looking back at you in the mirror. Damnation never felt like damnation until it was too late, did it? I forced myself to be Catherine Foundling and no one else, the coldness in my veins slowly receding.

"You told me once, that you thought of martyrdom as an act of cowardice," I said. "Symbolic vanity."

"And I stand by those words," Black said.

I closed my eyes and breathed out.

"Don't you dare make me grieve you," I whispered.

The sentiment passed, and my eyes opened. I found his matching mine, brown and green and neither giving ground.

"Into the breach we go, Black Knight," I said.

"Into the breach, Squire," he softly agreed.

ForgottenToupee

After this chapter, I think it's pretty much for sure that Cat will transition into the Black Queen instead of the Black Knight.

Also, I thought Black Speaking to Cat happened in Summerholm.

satoshikyū

This is my thought as well. My other consideration was something like Winter Queen, though to my mind that's less of a transition than it is her sort of shrugging into a name that is technically already hers by right. She's the last titled noble of Winter, so in my eyes that means she's Queen.

But yeah that bit about the queen's decree is either yet another masterful distraction for us or it's a tell. After all, we know from experience that Liesse is a place where Names can be stolen. Who's to say it isn't also a place where Names can be relinquished and new ones forged in their place?

Jeffery Wells

It will be difficult, Squire isn't a transition name for Queen. It would have to be a strong story akin to King Arthur pulling Excalibur from the stone and being named King. She has the back story for it, but you also need a powerful inheritance to claim, and we've seen no sign of that.

Barthumphries

Things may or may not have changed. Come catch up to where the story is now. 😊

Ashley Scott

uh spoilers wtf

Barthumphries

I can neither confirm nor deny that there may or may not have been spoilers and that changes may or may not have occurred. 😊

Seriously, come catch up. 😊

usernamesbco

I thought they already hashed out the powerful inheritance thing. Remember, with the angel?

She could also probably claim right of conquest, especially after she thrashes Akua.

Vitruvius

Book 2, chapter 47:

>"I have three things," I said. "A kingdom, an enemy and a claim."

>William snorted.

>"A claim?" he said. "You-"

>"I am the heiress to the King of Callow," I interrupted calmly.

>"There is no King of Callow," the Lone Swordsman said.

>"Yet a man rules it, and I am his chosen successor," I said.

Then she pulled a sword out of a stone.

narcoduck

"It would be fair, it insisted. Once, in Marchford, he had robbed me of my own will before swinging noosee."

I believe this was in Summerholm.

danh3107

Man Cat had to fight down every instinct she had for that one, impressive.

Also we all already knew that Akua was the queen of assholes.

Yeah, there are entirely too many ways for that to get horribly wrong.

Decius

Never give an order to be carried out "at all costs" unless you really mean that you are actually happy if everyone involved in executing that order is captured, killed, raised as an undead, and then has two-thirds of their soul burned in an unspeakable ritual to bolster your enemies, so long as the mission objective is completed.

Hopefully he realizes what Wekesa will do if he has any suspicion that Cat was in any way party to his death. He's a guy who once mutilated someone's soul just for giving him bad news about Black, imagine how much worse things will get when Black is counting on the person Wekesa holds responsible for his death. Best case scenario is that Cat kills Wekesa before he finds out, worse case scenario he sets off at least one Dark Day protocol.

werafdsaew

Which is why I don't think Black will die, since he has too many things left to do.

"It makes it seem like you have a chance for the moment, but then Creation fucks you anyway because it's a very large machine and you're a very small grain of sand."

That most likely hit very close to home considering that's basically why the Bard was able to out-play him. After all he knows so little of the totality of creation.

Blue

Didn't Killian need some sort of sacrifice to access her full power? Seems to me that Akua is handing that to her on a platter. Pretty sure she and Thief are hanging out somewhere inside.

blando

"Black was more pile of secrets than man"

I'm not sure why, but this pop culture reference in a dark fantasy fiction irks me.

Letouriste

Ref to what?

blando

In Castlevania: Symphony of the Night, Dracula gives a speech about man being nothing but a miserable little pile of secrets.

burguulkodar

Yeah, I caught that quote as well. I thought it was funny, and wondered if anyone else noticed. Good to know I'm not the only one who loved that talking in the game.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Reference to you, maybe. To me it was just a line. And I'd hardly call a genre video game "pop culture"

greatwyrmgold

It makes me want to correct Cat about leaving "miserable" out. But it's far from the only pop culture reference in the story; strange, for a story about stories.

Rogthnor

He's dead

Engineer

Hail Amadeus of the Green Stretch! Dead Knight of the Black Queen of Callow.

... Too many "ofs" in that heraldry.

Sous

A part of me screams that Black is sooo dead. The other, though, believes that the story will unfold differently. His plot is about subversion of tropes, outplaying the player, thus the outcome of twisting creation's rules and overcoming death by Black would be also on point.

Engineer

Huh, "Little Surprises"? Plural. Thief is the only other Cat aligned entity in Liesse.

What could the other surprises be?

She mentioned one was a mage but Masego and Killian are outside, dealing with the Demons. Who could this mage be? Who is Cat going to meet up with to plan the assault?

lennymaster

Robber and his gang.
Really hope he still gets a Name.

Letouriste

I think only females goblins can get Names.
There is no cultural background for a male goblin Named so that can't happen before the goblins change a lot.all the goblins

stevenneiman

@Letouriste we really know too little about goblin Names to be speculating. All we know is that some people suspect that goblins HAVE names, and even that isn't a 100% certainty. And just because goblins are led by vicious, crafty, female connivers doesn't mean that there aren't male names, they'd just probably never have any kind of leadership component to them. None of this is confirming that there ARE names accessible to male goblins, but there's no reason to be too sure there aren't.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

@stevenneiman you mean, we know too little to be passing off speculation as certainty or even probability. We can and should speculate about whatever we want. We just gotta keep it real

Shemetz

"Black was more pile of secrets than man, sometimes"

A miserable little pile of secrets!

Letouriste

Nothing about black is miserable

burguulkodar

But enough talk, have at you!

*shatters glass in the floor*

Shequi

So if Cat transitions into the Name of the Black Queen, I'd guess Decree would be her first Aspect?

That would make sense for a rulership type name.

stevenneiman

I feel like she's missed the chance to make a Name of being the Black Queen. Names seem to come in a sudden and appropriate moment, and that moment has already passed since Cat was acknowledged both formally and publicly as the queen of callow without changing her Name. She also gained the nickname of Black Queen without transitioning, which makes me fairly certain that it isn't going to be her final Name. Hell, she might just become the next Black Knight. It's the boring option, but half the point of this whole story is how Boring But Practical can have an awesomeness factor all its own.

room

i agree with you, seems like cat going to become knight..black or winter, or another knight because squire is transitional name to knight

Big Brother

Took Hakram a while of being Cat's adjutant to become Adjutant.

About Cat's potential new Name, fellow enthusiasts. Remember back when the Bard (I think?) said to TLS that there were really only three villains that mattered, the Empress, the Knight, and the Squire?

So maybe Cat, the Squire, transitions into a Knight bc that's what squires do, and then later ultimately becomes the Empress. No idea how EE would swing it but I bet it'd be AMAZING

Interlude: Liesse I

"Do not ever speak of victory before the last foe is dead."
– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

Juniper of the Red Shields spat to the side. This was going to be messy business, and she told Aisha as much.

"The Lord Warlock should be able to hold the gate until we arrive," her old friend replied.

The Named had mustered up a storm of green acid in front of the opening, and for now nothing was coming out but already the spell was thinning.

"The Lord Fucking Warlock wants us to establish a beachhead on the other side," the general said. "He better pull his godsdamned weight if he wants it done."

Spellcasters, always a finicky lot. Orcs as a rule put little stock in them. The Miezens has slaughtered the old shaman lines wholesale and what remained after was little more than bone-tellers and mystics. They made ceremonies worth bearing with, but in a fight they were decoration. The Clans lived and died on steel. Praesi were made for them, though, meddled with all kinds of nasty shit in the blood to get better with the 'Gift'. No wonder the whole breed was half-mad. Mages had their place in the modern legions, as field artillery and field healers, but something like the Sovereign of Red Skies could only make her uneasy. You couldn't have that kind of power without it costing you somewhere else. Even Catherine had changed, since she'd killed her way to a fae title, and not just that her temper froze tables now. She only had one foot on the ground now with the rest of them, now. Juniper could live with it. Foundling's mind had always been like a bag of rabid badgers, as long as she kept that pointed at the enemy it wasn't too much of an issue.

She'd ordered the Fifteenth to begin reorienting before she ever got the order from Lord Black, reading the lay of the battlefield. Someone needed to plug the gap, else the Fourth would be cut off from the rest of the army, and only her legion was in the right place. The Deoraithe were technically closer, but they were a fucking mess at the moment. When Sahelian's people had brought out the demons, aside with screwing with Legion scrying it had also made an impassable wall in the enemy centre. The three legions sent in as the first wave had moved around smoothly, the Fifth taking to the left and the Sixth to the right with the Twelfth behind it, but Kegan's soldiers weren't legionaries. Most of them hadn't seen combat except with the Fifteenth, gone soft now that the Clans no longer raided the Marches. The grinder that had been the Summer Campaign had already cut away the worst of the chaff, but getting blooded didn't make them any better trained. The Duchy of Daoine didn't usually go on the offensive, and it was showing badly today.

The first wave of archers, right behind the three legions, had split in two. One half heading for either side, circling around the demon grounds. But they were shit at it. They'd lost all cohesion, their formation turning into some kind of wavy column instead of the tightly packed ranks they should have been. The entire left half had slowed to a crawl the moment the Hellgate opened, afraid of being flanked but opening themselves to it just by milling around like scared herd animals. The infantry behind them was worse, in a way. They'd kept to the long rectangle formation they'd been sent forward as, but they fucking idiots kept advancing. When the front ranks realized they were about to either hit the tail ends of both archer contingents or tread too close to the demon grounds they'd tried to stop, but the officers in the back hadn't cottoned on yet. There was nothing quite like watching over ten thousand Deoraithe warriors trip all over themselves to make a woman wonder how exactly these fucks had managed to hold the Wall in the face of her people for over a millennium.

Marshal Ranker was now in command of the army and she was trying to clean up the mess before it got them all killed, but scrying was still touch and go even with the warlock's get putting the demons in some kind of egg bubble. At least they weren't running rampant – if Hierophant managed to keep that up until the battle ended, she'd kiss him full on the bloody mouth. Wouldn't even complain about his ugly soft cow teeth. According to protocol the Legions had gone back to flag and horn signalling, but the Deoraithe weren't familiar with most of those. Trying to order them around like that would only add to the chaos. Juniper had managed to get one of Marshal Ranker's staff officers in a scrying link and gotten authority over the Deoraithe for the moment, but she'd already sent messengers on foot to Duchess Kegan by then. It rankled to break the line of command like this, but it was her men going into the breach now. She wasn't taking any chances, even if it ruffled feathers. Juniper watched the battle unfold in front of her, splayed out for her to see, and then closed her eyes. She breathed out, and let the pieces move.

The Fifth under General Orim had managed to take the leftmost bastion after Catherine slaughtered her way through the mages there, but it was having trouble to pierce further in. Her mother's Sixth had the rightmost bastion, but they'd gained too much ground under the Black Knight: they wouldn't be able to go back on the offensive until they'd consolidated their lines. General Afolabi's Twelfth was getting ripped apart taking a swing at the last remaining bastion, but they'd earned their cognomen the hard way. Holdfast. They'd proved the truth of that at Dormer against Summer nobles and they were showing it again: losses were heavy, but they were going forward and they weren't flinching in the slightest. Gods, the Twelfth would be a skeleton of a legion by nightfall. The Ninth under General Sacker hadn't even tried to swing around the entire army to get at the Hellgate, they were headed straight for the fields of stakes making up the flanks beyond the right palisade. If she got there quick enough, she could smash into the wights from the side and take the pressure off the Sixth.

Good. The front wasn't in danger of collapsing, so long as General Orim remained cautious and Hierophant didn't drop the ball. The Fourth under Marshal Ranker had made a well-oiled turnabout and was now headed for the Hellgate from behind, but that'd take most an hour if she didn't want her men dead on their feet when they got there. The only arrows in Juniper's quiver were the Fifteenth and whatever Deoraithe she could scrape up. Eight thousand under her direct command five thousand legionaries and a half. Two thousand and a half heavy horse, though. Callowan knights. There was much that could be done with that, at least on this side of the gate. She had no intelligence on what lay on the other side, so initial approach would have to be centred around advance and containment. The breach would have to wait until she had area secured, and she was not looking forward to sending men into that. Much as she hated to even think it, she was missing Nauk. The man was an unseemly emotional brute without finesse, but if you had to send a vanguard into Hell he was the breed of officers you wanted at the head of it. Senior Tribune Jwahir was steadier than the legate had been, but she didn't have the same bite.

"Juniper," Aisha said. "The storm's broken. I don't know how many they gathered on the other side, but it's not a trickle coming out. Full battalions and – shit. Akalibsa. Those are are akalibsa."

Taghreb loan word. The orc's mind spun back to the lessons at the College until she found where she'd heard it before. Imperial civil war, Battle of the Black Grounds. Summoned by the Warlock of the time to bolster the usurping Chancellor's expedition into the Steppes.

"Dog-devils," Juniper said.

Incarnations of blind hatred. An old favourite of Taghreb mages, much like the walin-falme for the Soninke. No wings, but swift on their feet and they bore their own arms and armour. It had long endeared them to the desert tribes, who in ancient times had lacked the means to provide these to their war-summoned devils. The general opened her eyes, and watched the flood pour out.

"Aisha, sound the horns," she said, baring her teeth. "The horse is to peel to the left and await my signal to charge. The Fifteenth is to stagger as follows: right forward, then centre, then left."

Her friend's slender face creased, but she nodded. Juniper watched her legion move and waited. The waltz had begun.

Hierophant cocked his head to the side.

He was a mile away from his foes, but that little mattered nowadays. His eyes had been touched by Summer sun in the fullness of its glory, and little that was under the sky lay hidden to them. What had once been sight of sorcery's shaping granted by the enchantments Father had laid upon his spectacles was now part of him, and fae flame had filed that working down to sharp point. The press of sweating and bleeding soldiers between himself and his quarry were ignored, gone from his vision with but a thought, and all that remained was foe. Threefold summon had brought them into Creation, an oddity he would have enjoyed discussed with his father had there been time. He'd believed the concept to have been discredited, for while in theory the overlapping of Dues helped lower the power required in practice the fine tuning required made it too risky for the benefits. No mage fool enough to take chances when summoning a demon lived long, much less three.

Admittedly, it had been something of a challenge to contain all of them simultaneously. It had to be a single working, for three different wards of that magnitude were beyond his ability to maintain and if he'd attempted to split between a ward covering to and the other one the imbalance of power would have been... difficult to deal with. Overall efficiency was lowered by containing such different entities with the same spell, but this way lowered the risks of calamitous failure. Still, the amount of bleed displeased him greatly. It was the demon of Order that was hardest to handle, as Father had suspected he might. Whether the Beast of Hierarchy truly was the old monster that shattered the city of Shango and ripped it from Creation he could not be certain, but it was proving rather troublesome. By their nature the breed was difficult to contain, though thankfully much less prone to fast-spreading infection than the likes of Madness and Corruption. The issue was that the demon's effect on Creation was... selective, for a lack of better term.

Beasts of Hierarchy took creational laws, the hierarchy of the world as set by the Gods, and replaced them with something superficially similar but at cross-purposes. Air still existed, yet could not be breathed. Solid was as liquid, friction added where there should be none. Points became fixed without rhyme or reason, and so many other weavings: there were as many ways for the demon of Order to act as there were creational laws, if not more. There'd been reports that – ah, perhaps another time. Masego frowned as the demon of Apathy ceased its attempts to bleed through the Ivory Globe, instead gathering its essence into itself. Clever thing. Demons were not truly sentient, of course, or at least not in a way mortals could understand. At best they could imitate such intelligence. But they could solve problems, regardless, and this demon was attempting to turn its own corruption onto the very ward containing it. Apathy, this kind had been given as a title, but it ran deeper. It slowed and ended the movement of all forces, physical and metaphysical. The trick at work was an attempt to make his ward cease to flow, becoming so brittle it would shatter.

Runes forming under his fingers, the braided mage hummed. The globe of cleansing ivory light shattered and the demon moved without hesitation – indeed, it was incapable of such a thing – but Hierophant was not longer a green boy. He had seen wonders and horrors, had them seared into his soul so deeply they had changed his very nature.

"Glint on glass, stolen yet earned," he murmured. "Passing jewel, foe's crown: dawn."

For a single glorious moment, he saw all of it again. The sun of Summer in all its furious implacable might. Even the mere remembrance the ground scorched for thirty feet around him in a perfect circle. It was no kinder to the demon. Scathing light burned the envelope of thick murky skin around the core of it, ripping it to black shreds as the creature let out a sound that was neither pain nor anything at all – there mere excretion of it was a burden upon Creation wherever it sounded, a slowing of all it touched. The demon folded upon itself, surrendering its outer essence, and as the dawn passed Masego formed the Ivory Glow anew around it. It had gone, he saw, twenty feet forward. Another forty and it would be close enough to affect nearby soldiery, who would have panicked had they enough of their mind left to do so. The touch of Apathy would fade after a few more moments, but never entirely leave them. There would always be that empty space within, sapping away at all they were.

The Beast of Hierarchy had changed law while he'd been distracted, and with a downturn of the lips Masego adjusted the Ivory Globe's frequency. Too much went through anyway. Keeping the demon fixed in its current position, he mused, would not be the issue. It could not apply its essence to the Ivory Globe itself, for Hierophant had usurped the properties of the divine in crafting them. His study of the angel's corpse near Liesse had borne fruit in this regard. Yet their struggle was, ultimately, one of repertoire. So long as Masego could grasp the creational law being substituted and knew of a working to remedy this, its grasp outside the ward would be highly limited. The moment he failed on either counts, however, the spread would begin to work its way through the battlefield. The demon of Madness was proving difficult enough already, concerning that. Though in no danger of escaping, at the very moment his ward ebbed low a sliver of the creature's essence pushed through. With Order and Apathy, this was regrettable but of no great concern. Madness was another story.

Its effect lingered, accumulated and spread. Already for twenty feet around it the fabric of Creation was irremediably tainted and would have to be purified beyond recognition, lest anyone wandering these grounds from here to the end of time be taken by red madness. Though not the most dangerous of breeds to fight, the true ability of their kind was in the spread. The longer it remained, the more dangerous it became. It was no wonder that when Triumphant had come upon Liesse, though she had myriad demons of all Hells it was a demon of Madness she had sent to the city. Half a night had been enough to destroy the entire city, and the taint would have spread to the entire region if left unchecked much longer. Even as Masego adjusted the Globe again to check the Beast of Hierarchy, it occurred to him that he was but a single man trying to contain a flood with his bare hands. He would, in time, fail. He'd been reliably informed by Archer that some performers in Levant walked tightropes tall in the air for the entertainment of screaming peasantry, and perhaps this was an apt metaphor. The dark-skinned mage could, in fact, walk the metaphorical rope.

He could not, however, keep doing it for hours without slipping.

Adjusting the Globe again – the Beast was becoming swifter in recognizing when it failed to wade through, which was worrying – Hierophant turned his eyes to that tall platform of stone that still remained in rebel hands. There was a technical name for it, he mused, but he could not remember. Flat, low tower? Fat, short stronghold? The lack of precision was like an itch he couldn't scratch, but he forced himself to move on. Sorcery was being woven there, of no small scale. Were they to resume assaulting his wards? That had been deeply unpleasant. Unable to strike directly at them he'd had to pour power to fix the holes being made, which would have exhausted him into sloppiness if they'd kept it up for much longer. He simply could not abide sloppiness. The glass eyes took a broader view of the threads of sorcery being braided, but after a moment he dismissed it. Necromancy, which was none of his concern. His sight returned to the demons. Brushing back a braid Masego thought of a conversation he'd once had with Catherine, years ago. They'd been speaking of the hero Hunter, then still among the living, and she'd uttered the strange saying that when that kind of man smiled you called what he showed arrow-catchers.

He'd naturally informed her that even for a Named, attempting to catch an arrow with one's teeth would likely result in either shattered teeth or an arrow going through the roof of the mouth. She'd looked at him with that tolerantly amused look of hers, and explained that that was the joke. A very poor one, in his opinion, but it had to be said most things to come out of Callow were hopelessly shabby. Still, the little talk had stuck with him. He looked at the demons and traced runes, High Arcana one and all. The Ivory Globes winked out.

Hierophant bared his teeth, and tried to catch an arrow.

"Bless that child," Marshal Ranker said quietly, watching the Fifteenth move. "She inherited the best of both her parents."

The goblin was not a withered old witch like the Matrons in the Eyries, obsessed with bloodlines. It was true that goblins of matron lines were larger and stronger, cleverer and even lived longer – but Ranker had learned the reason for it when she became Matron, and wondered if the price for it was not too steep. Her people had done ugly things to survive on the surface, after losing their ancient underground kingdom to the dwarves. Yet, for all that she put less stock in breeding, it could not be denied that few girls had been better bred for war than Juniper of the Red Shields. Istrid Knightsbane was living legend, earned on the Fields of Streges, and the girl's father had been worth stories in his own days. Oguz Sharphand was the reason Grem One-Eye was called such, and few champions had been more acclaimed among the Clans until his legs were crippled. No, General Juniper was worthy of her rank regardless of youth. She'd begun sending the Fifteenth forward before the orders ever came, and now as Ranker watched the legion stagger as the cavalry peeled off she felt a sharp grin split her face. She knew that formation from reading her histories. The Callowans had used one much the same, when they'd crushed Dread Emperor Nefarious at the Fields of Streges.

Few of her own officers would have thought of using the old kingdom's tactics, even with knights under their command. For all that Legion doctrine was flexible and comprehensive, it encouraged one to think within a certain box of tools. Some of the sharpest tools on Calernia, yes, and they had proved their worth again and again. Yet for a commander to ever be considered for marshal, they had to prove they were able to think beyond that box. Istrid's daughter had that steel in her, though it was not yet properly tempered. Grem is come again, she thought. The torch had hands worthy of being passed to. The Fourth was heavier on sappers than most legions, and so turning it around after the Hellgate opened had not been so slow as it should have been. The regulars would lag slightly behind, but if General Juniper succeeded in seizing this side of the gate then sappers would be useful in keeping it even alone. There was need to hurry, regardless. The Sahelian chit had pulled a fast one on them with that gate, deploying it just after Ranker's legion was too far gone to pull back in time.

Orim was getting the short end of the stick, much like he had after the Conquest when he'd been sent to watch over Liesse and a pack of squabbling Callowans. The Squire had fallen onto that flank like an avalanche of death and ripped straight through the bastion, but she was gone now and the Fifth had to stand its ground against foes that outnumbered it brutally. The wights without necromancers guiding them were not as much as a threat, however, and in truth the lot of them had not impressed Ranker overmuch. If the Dead King's host was of this make, then the Procerans must be even more shit soldiers than she'd thought. Any nation that warred so much had no business being so bad at it, though she wouldn't look a gift horse in the mouth considering the fights ahead. Her Fourth was halfway to the Hellgate, when she felt the ripple. Felt it, like a physical thing. Rheumy eyes turned back to the battle behind, and what she saw had her blood run cold.

The rebels were raising the dead. This, they had expected. It was an old Wasteland trick to have the enemy's own dead turn against them halfway into the battle. The Legions had followed protocol, keeping sappers near corpse-piles when feasible. But it was more than that. The wights, it was the wights that had been the true intent. They'd thought that killing the mages meant they could no longer be controlled, that more casters were needed, but now the tide turned on the overextended legions as one. And they were no longer mindless. The undead stood in ranks now, in formations instead of an unruly mass. They moved and killed with purpose. Marshal Ranker had seen more battles than nearly anyone alive in the Empire. This, she realized in moment of perfect clarity, had been a trap. Since the beginning. From the positioning of the demons in the centre to split their forces to ground being given, all to draw them in as deep as possible with reinforcements split and too far behind. The rebels had sacrificed hundreds of their own mages, the favourite sons and daughters of Praes, to set up this very moment where the jaws closed in on the Legions of Terror. They'd been too used to winning, Ranker understood with anguish. We didn't think they'd learned.

Mind spinning, she unfolded what was going to happen. The Fifth, too far deep, was about to be overwhelmed. Afolabi's Twelfth Legion would be ground into the Sixth's flank until it collapsed, weakened as it was. And though the right flank would hold, Orim would break and the wights would spill through. Either they'd swing around and hit Istrid, or they'd ram into the back of the Fifteenth while it attempted to contain the gate. If the Fifth was scattered, the battle was lost.

"Sound the horns," Ranker ordered hoarsely. "We're reinforcing Orim. Now, at running speed."

Then the wards keeping the demons contained winked out and screams beyond mortal understanding sounded across shadowed sky.

First update of the month, extra chapter. Titled "Hierarchy" from the POV of Anaxares after the Free Cities plotline of this book. In the tab of the same name.

We've also reached tier three on Patreon, which now means three updates a week! Mostly this means Book III will end even quicker than I'd anticipated. Thanks to everyone for the support. First new weekly update will be on the 9th.

Well... shit

Valkyria

Perfectly said.

Shequi

Heh, I wondered if today would feature an extra update instead of the next time.

So... What the hell (if you'll pardon the expression) is Masego playing at?

Adra

From the sounds of things, he knew that if he continued to hold the demons in place with Operation: Eggshells, he'd eventually give enough ground that the demons would get their taint all up in the legion anyways.

Given the nature of his powers so far, my best guess is he's going to use an Aspect to play the demons off each other, or off the remaining Praesi.

Though, being Masego, he's not going to bother telling any of the muggles first.

Big Brother

If my mind isn't screwing with me, I think Demons are little gods like the Fae King and Queen were. Maybe he's going for another Miracle.

I mean, the Demons show influence upon Creation similar to a divine being, in that it's restricted to a certain method, much like a domain or sphere of influence most gods have.

Not to mention Demons and Angels are a (sort of) equal-opposite balance, and if Angels can grant Miracles to believers, it only stands that a Demon might be capable of performing them as well.

jonnney

Demons aren't at the same level of power of Fae royalty and they aren't pure power backed by a supreme intellect and a strict set of rules. They have the ability to effect one aspect of creation to an extreme degree and their sole purpose is to propagate that effect. The strength of the heavens and the hells are equal, but angels are finite while devils and demons are endless. The method that Angels and Demons use to effect creation is similar even if the magnitude of the effect is vastly different.

Big Brother

I never said they were on the same level as fae royalty, nor that they were pure power. I said that they might be gods, which can have varying levels of power from each other, and might have their own version of Miracles for Masego to learn. And I even had a parenthetical "sort of" before I said they were equal-opposites of angels. Never said they were exactly even.

erraticerrata

Shit. I misread the date again, didn't I? I can't believe this keeps happening, that's like three times now.

taborask

It's not like we're complaining about getting it early!

Shequi

I was wondering if you were in Australia or something.

jonnney

I would guess that he is trying to usurp control of their bindings and direct them to attack either the Rebels, each other, or some combination there of. In his first battle against rebels in Liesse it took him roughly an hour to take control of a few thousand devils by changing their bindings. He has now gained immense power and understanding and is back in Liesse with stronger hell denizens to contend with. He also has a demon of corruption from Triumphant's time bound to a standard, but I'd be surprised if he tried to use it.

Byzantine

Masego has decided his job is utterly impossible.

So he's decided he might as well do something else impossible. He's going to stop the Demons. For good.

DroughtBringer

Great chapter! I just want to know what Masego is doing...

Decius

That's a relief. Now that it's hopeless we know how it's going to end.

Letouriste

of course they will win but the question was about the losses.i'm concerned about if they will manage to muster enough troops for the procer war:/ most of the soldiers will be unblooded at this rate.

Mike E.

OK, massive props to being able to write multiple characters with unique voices so well.

And I always get chills reading your battle chapters.

Petya

> when that kind of man smiled you called what he showed arrow-catchers.

Can u plz explain that one to me? Either I'm daft, or there's a typo.

kagelupus

If I read it right, Cat was making the joke that Hunter is the kind of guy to put himself into almost certainly fatal situations, and do so happily.

Masego thinks about that phrase before deciding to something incredibly dangerous and almost certainly fatal. Either his plan will work and he will have "caught an arrow with his teeth" or it won't and trying will have killed him

Byzantine

Pretty much, and he came to this decision because hes already in a position that he cannot possibly win, and eventually will lose. So he figured if he has to do something impossible he might as well make it be something that counts.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Some silly typos, somewhere you typed in 'cottoned' instead of 'caught on.'

'They' in one place should be 'the,' you do this a lot, a lot of chapters in book three feature this typo that went uncorrected. INCONCEIVABLE!

Shequi

"Cottoned On" is a well known colloquialism in British English.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

It is in American English too

quoice

Was the opening line supposed to have two "speak"s?

"Do not speak ever speak of victory before the last foe is dead."

taborask

I know it's silly to complain about the chapter break on a end-of-the-month extra chapter day but HOT DANG is that a cliffhanger. There's currently a metric ton of feces teetering above the metaphorical fan

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Interlude: Liesse II

"There's not a lot of difference between court and a swamp. Colourful things are poisonous, lots of buried corpses, crocodiles are often involved."

– Dread Empress Prudence the First, the 'Frequently Vanquished'

Masego had forged his first dimensional pocket at the age of fourteen, the gruelling work of six months resulting in accessible space no larger than a cramped closet. Though the access and retrieval patterns had been flawless, the result was ultimately flawed: nearly half the power invested by ritual had gone to waste despite his best efforts. Father had refused him another attempt until he further improved his craft, as the costs of such an undertaking were... prohibitive. It was only in the days after the Liesse Rebellion, when he had a mage's tower of his own, that he'd returned to the chalkboard and tried again. The power of his Name had granted him perception and control beyond that of any mortal mage, and though Masego had always disdained relying on those powers he'd hated the thought of an imperfect product even more. He'd come within razor's breadth of the Due, and with a weaving of High Arcana made a full room only he could access. He'd considered it a worthy effort, then, though still short of the perfection he aspired to. His horizons had expanded since.

He had tread the grounds of Arcadia since, Winter and Summer and the hinterlands between. He'd laid naked eye on the silent line between Creation and other realms, shaped and breached it according to his whims. His path to understanding High Arcana did not lay in the study of boundaries, not like his father's, yet he had learned. One could not witness the seams of what the Gods had sown together without deriving insight from the act. The boy he'd been, who watched the world end, stepping into the silhouette of the man he now was and understanding that, in the end, it was all a lie. An agreement, a lending of form and function that was by definition temporary. In time, all this would end. That which was beheld was moulded by the shape of the beholder, and as runes whirled around him in patterns the Hierophant smiled. The sun had burned sight from him and so he had made the sun his sight, carving open the stuff of miracles for his due.

No throne was so great it could not be toppled by madman's writ.

Creation sang under his guiding hand, melody woven and folding unto itself. The fabric of the world wrapped itself around the demons before they could flee his reach, forcing them into a realm that was Creation and yet not. Foam on the wave, for a fleeting instant made a realm into itself. An instant was all that Hierophant was need, for so long as the unit existed the span was his to fashion. Masego stepped forward into the pocket he had wrested from nothing, his lie made truth by will imposed, and found the realm stretching as far as the eye could see. To bring strife to demons inside a closed realm, Father always said, was madness. Yet here he was, watching a shifting maze of smoke and mirrors, and in his bones he could feel the essences of his foes spreading. The Beast of Hierarchy wielded its own as a hammer, attempting to shatter the frame, but it was in a cage beyond its understanding. The realm broke, but all that did was set an ending. When that ending came was in the hands of the Hierophant, and he was not yet done done with his creation.

Madness whispered song sweet and insidious, echoing across haze and empty spaces, but found no purchase. The strife it sought to sow reflected upon itself, parted smoke without ruination. It was Apathy that sunk its claws into the realm, the scars it left wherever it tread beyond even his mending. No furrows in matter, no, simply... inertness. Matter made so still in all incarnations it might as well have been void. It had become the most dangerous of the three, yet this was not beyond Hierophant's prediction. Apathy was the oldest foe of wonder, and wonder was now the lens he perceived the world through. To destroy his enemy had always been where the trick of this would lay, Masego knew. It was the Heavens that granted their own the power to unmake even foreign essence through burning indignation, for in their stale eyes there was no place for such contamination in the orderly world that was to be built. The Gods Below granted no such boon, and had taught their own different lesson. Though we all lose in this summoning, what does it matter so long as the foe loses more?

To Evil, victory mattered more than the aftermath of that glorious moment.

Akua Sahelian's cohorts had learned this well, bringing their arsenal of ruin into the world. The flickering bindings he could see shackling the beasts spoke not of control, but of direction. A plague unleashed with the understanding that it would bring ruin to all it touched until fear pulled the leash and ripped them from Creation. It would have been child's play in this realm, for Hierophant to sharpen his will and rip through the runes. Yet in doing so he would sunder the means of recall. Summoning made into true presence, no longer contingent on the consent of mortal men. To catch the light of the Heavens and shine it a lantern upon this place would have done well, but Hierophant had seen too little. Glimpses of Contrition, before he knew how to watch, and stood witness to the corpse of an angel of which only white dry bones were left. There was no miracle for him to vivisect and assemble to his will, not even the shadow of one. He could not dismiss or destroy, and so only one path remained Hierophant.

"To borrow the fang of the beast, and strike the beast with it," Masego sighed. "How very crude."

Runes flared around his hand and the skin bubbled like water, until it parted bloodlessly and a drop of ichor flew from it. It had remained there since Marchford, so weak as to be cauterized and contained yet never entirely gone. Corruption. A perfect drop of it. The dark-skinned man turned to the maze of his own making, and felt the weight of his foes' attention bearing down on him.

"Let us play a game, creatures," he said mildly. "I call it 'burning down the house with everyone in it'."

The drop of ichor sunk into the ground and Hierophant began.

Brandon Talbot, Grandmaster of the Order of the Broken Bell, leaned forward on his mount. Heliotrope's flanks were covered with sweat under the armour, but the Liessen charger was still far from exhausted. They were a hardy breed, raised for war. Once the favoured mounts of many chivalric orders, when their kind had still been the pride of Callow instead of the last remnant. But that remnant still stood, under its own banner if one suborned to the Tower through complicated ties of rule and authority. That was worthy of pride, if only a little, and today the last scion of House Talbot allowed himself to feel it. This, he thought, was the kind of battles he'd been born for. That they had all been born for. Not bitter struggles with fae or the petty butchering of traitors in his liege's own camp. Though the foot at the side of his knights was Legion instead of Royal Guard, against them both was arrayed the old enemy. Hellspawn garbed in stone, with the fangs and faces of rabid dogs baying for the death of all men. There was purity to this moment that he'd sorely missed from his days as a rebel vagrant in the south, a beautiful clarity. One side rode knights, to protect the people of Callow. On the other stood devils and sorcerers, spawn of the vicious East. It was the manner of battles his ancestors had fought, and there was honour to be found in this.

The painting was marred by the truth that his comrades were often greenskins and Wastelanders, but Brandon had been taught patience by the woe the Liesse Rebellion had brought to the cause. A lesson his aunt had once known, but discarded when she began to believe she would not live to see the kingdom of her youth forged anew – save if she struck deal with the Procerans, a bargain with the devils to the west who preached fellowship yet warred as much as the Praesi. Brandon was not so old as to grow desperate, not yet, and so he had looked to the lay of the kingdom and made his choice. Better a tyrant born of Callow than the Empress' own leash at their throat. And he'd been right, he knew that now. Already so many of the Fifteenth were Callowans, and the further Queen Catherine broke with the Tower the more she would grow to rely on her own people. Not rebellion, no, not in the Grandmaster's day. But there would be a day. Where Callow would be kingdom in truth even if the Wasteland denied it the name. Where a great and fierce army having learned from the victors of the Conquest would give the Tower pause should it seek to overstep again.

He would play the long game, and win.

But for that scheme to bear fruit, Brandon mused, he first had to survive this day. The Order had sallied out at the order of that scowling orc general, the one they called the Hellhound, and at first the Talbot had thought it foolishness. A young girl's blunder, for General Juniper was said to have seen barely twenty summers. The Grandmaster had once been heir to Marchford and Elizabeth Talbot, once held to be the greatest commander of the Kingdom of Callow when that name was more than a dream. He had fought in no wars before the Arcadian Campaign but he had been taught strategy and war-making, to lead men in battle as his forbears had for centuries. He'd thought it best to have his knights stay at the flank of the legionaries, ready to swoop on the enemy when they engaged the infantry. Yet the Hellhound had oddly staggered her foot and sent him out into the wilderness to await signal for a charge. It had seemed an ever-worsening blunder as he obeyed and impotently watched the devils spill out from the gate and spread along the length of this oblique formation of the general's. Oblique. That had been the word that led him to understand.

His aunt had once spoken it to him when he'd been a boy, in her solar at Talbot Manor as she sat him in a chair and placed iron figurines on a drawn map. The Fields of Streges, she'd been showing him. It would have been a lie to call them the first ones, for that stretch of field had seen a hundred battles between Callow and Praes, but the battle she showed him had been the one before the Carrion's Lord massacre on that plain. When Dread Emperor Nefarious, fresh to his throne and cocksure of his might, had attempted an invasion. Good King Robert had met the old legions and their hordes of greenskin auxiliaries on flat grounds, and staggered his advance much like this. Even as the Wizard of the West fought the Emperor, the Black Knight of those days had ordered greenskins to pour down the staggered side and sweep it aside. It'd been a bloodbath, though not the one the Wastelanders wished for. And now Brandon stood in the place of the old knightly orders, under banner of bronze and black, ready to unleash death at the end of a thousand lances.

The stage General Juniper had crafted them went like this: at the back lay the Hellgate. From it flood of devil still poured, but that flow was slowed for lack of space. In the face of the approaching Fifteenth the dog-devils had formed ranks, at least in part. The Fifteenth was staggered in three sections. The rightmost was most ahead, followed after beat by the centre and a beat after by the left. The hellspawn stood steady before the right tip of that oblique line, but they were pouring unheeding down the left. Without line or formation, without even the semblance of orders. From where his horse stood, Brandon could see the shape of it as a long diagonal line. At the bottom of which was the Order of the Broken Bell. Before the the Hellhound ever sounded the horns, the aristocrat prepared his knights in three wedges. Three blades ready to plunge in the enemy's flank. The Grandmaster raised his lance, and within ten heartbeats all the knights had gone silent at the sight as he cantered ahead of his riders.

"Knights of Callow," he said, voice pitched and clear across the field.

Truth's not the point of a battle-address, Brandon, Aunt Elizabeth had taught him. Put fire in the bellies for the fight ahead.

"You all know it was Her Grace, who named us," he said.

Silence, to heighten what was to come.

"The Order of the Broken Bell," the Grandmaster said slowly, enunciating precisely. "Long have I pondered the sense of this, for our queen is a woman of few words and deep meanings."

He raised his lance high, steel tip shining bright even under this shadowed sun.

"It was no slight, my knights," he said. "It was a reminder, that in years past we failed. The fracture across our banner is warning, remembrance of that dark day where our weakness broke Callow."

There was murmur across the lines, but no denial. They had all been raised to the truth of this, that for all the might of the old kingdom the might of the Praesi had been greater still.

"But there is still a bell on our standard," he shouted. "We have a people still, if no kingdom. And now before you stride forth the hordes of Hell, to destroy even that."

He raised his voice.

"Knights of Callow," he said. "Will you fail them today? Or will you redeem the truth of your standard?"

Lances struck shields, a thunder crafted by the souls and hands of men. No, the shouts came. Redemption in steel, the calls went. Once, twice, thrice the horns sounded. All knights charge, the call old as the soul of this ancient land. Lances lowered, shields rose and horses swept across the field as the last knights of Callow went forth to meet their ancient enemy. Brandon Talbot laughed the laugh of a man who had finally found his place in the world.

Istrid smashed the head of a boy who'd been one of her own until moments ago. One of the fucking wights ran him through, and within a heartbeat of hitting the ground dead he'd risen as one of the enemy. The rebels had pulled a new trick. Raising legion dead was no great innovation: they'd done the same half a dozen times, during the civil war. But back then it'd been a ritual, one sweep and done. Enough for the protocols to be amended with sappers watching corpse-piles, but no great worry. The orc had thought this to be the same old trick, and one wasted — her goblins had munitions breaking her dead within moments of them rising. But the ritual had not ceased. The wights had turned savage, and now every legionary they killed rose. It was grinding at her frontlines brutally, every death twice as costly. The Sixth had gotten its shit together after Black went to murder his way to an ending, consolidated the grounds and brought the sappers to bear, but now the tide was against them. If this were a raid, Istrid would have called for a retreat. But it'd been a long time since she'd gone out to kill her kind for cattle and glory, and this was a battlefield. Retreat here would mean casualties in the thousands as they tried to disengage from the undead horde.

So her men stood, fought and died.

It was worse for the others. Afolabi's legion had taken rough beatings in the Arcadian Campaign and even worse making a go at the central bastion, and the sudden turn had found them bloodied and overextended. Now they were being torn apart company by company, every break hastening the next. Sacker and her Ninth were giving pitched battle over the fields of stakes north of this mess, but no amount of sharpeners would allow her boys to break through in time. The Ninth was too light on the offense, they weren't built for a hard brawl. It took off the pressure some, wights moving there to ward them off, but not enough to pull them out of this mess. The Fifth Legion, she could see even from where she stood, had it even worse than the Twelfth. Orim was retreating back to the palisades he'd taken as Marshal Ranker hurried to his aid, but she was too far and the wights were in close pursuit. How much of the Fifth would be left, by the time they had the palisades protecting them? Half, maybe less. Unlike the Twelfth, they had no other legion to hold one of their flanks.

Istrid spat phlegm on blood-sodden ground and left the frontlines, legionaries filling the gap she'd left. She needed better vantage before making a decision, or better yet Bagram's take. Her legate would have been watching the whole time. Making her way through closely-pressed ranks took too long for her tastes, though it was no fault of her men's. The more the wights pressed around them, the tighter the shield wall became to compensate. She felt the current of it as she moved, the way ground was being lost inch by inch. The Sixth was no longer fighting forward, it was trying to hold its grounds – and failing.

"General," Bagram saluted when she found him, arriving blood-streaked and tired.

"Legate," she rasped. "The Twelfth. How long do they have?"

"Every legionary will be dead within an hour," he said, not mincing words. "General Afolabi's own standard went down not long ago. He may very well be dead."

Fuck, Istrid thought. She had no love for the arrogant Soninke, but commanders of his calibre didn't grown on fucking trees. There were few better generals to hold a fortress than him, and they were going to need men like that when Procer came knocking. She turned to watch the battlefield, and her lips tightened when she watched another of the Twelfth's companies shatter then rise howling at their comrades. The only good news, as far as she could tell, was that the godsdamned demons were gone. They'd just popped out of existence after the warlock's get let them out. The Deoraithe were marching forward to fill the void, or at least some of them. Their army was a fucking mess, the left half of the foot and and bowmen being pulled down to the Hellgate. Where her own daughter was trying to face down an entire Hell with less than ten thousand men and no help from Ranker. Gods, this had all turned into a fuckup faster than you could blink. The entire army was falling to pieces, and no one was in a position to do anything about it than her.

"I'm taking our reserves," she told her legate. "We're backing the Twelfth, then withdrawing behind the palisades."

Bagram grimaced.

"We'll be thinly spread, general," he said. "If the wights punch through our lines the entire formation will collapse – we'll have no men to plug the gap."

"We'll be surrounded on three sides if Afolabi's boys break," she growled. "Better bloody than buried."

And so she went, near a thousand with her. Heavies and regulars, sweeping through the dead at her command. Advance was slow, slower than she would have liked or the Twelfth could truly afford, but what choice did she have? If she hurried she was handing her men to the enemy as fresh fodder to spend against her own. They hammered into the wights pressing down on the other legion, buying enough time for them to retreat with a semblance of order. Holdfast, a cognomen earned. Even with half the Twelfth gone terror did not rule its ranks. The sorcerers guiding the undead struck back at the reverse, the horde turning on them like a pack of hounds. Her Sixth was made of sterner stuff, but the centre of the Twelfth crumpled like wet parchment when wights threw themselves over the shields and Istrid had to lead berserkers to prevent the whole formation coming down on her head. Howls filled the air as Red Rage held back the tide where Legion discipline had failed, and she screamed until the Twelfth fell back in line and the retreat was shored up. Elbowing men aside, Istrid of the Red Shields moved like flame through the ranks and hardened resistance. She was tiring, she knew, but far from done. Neither was this battle, if she had anything to say about it.

Tumbling through a knot of legionaries too slow to withdraw she slapped a man upside the head and swatted down a wight too eager for the kill with a backhand, barking order for them to pick up the pace. She'd taken wounds, she felt as the red haze ebbed low, but nothing that would kill her. More scars with stories for the telling. Yet one stung. She passed a steel-clad hand over the throb and her gauntlet came back with yellow as well as red. Istrid blinked, and twisted to look at the cut on her flank. Shallow little thing, she thought as her heartbeat slowed. Just deep enough to get the poison in. Istrid Knightsbane fell to her knees, but her last thoughts were not of her husband or daughter. Goblin steel, she rasped as the world went dark.

Goblin steel had made that cut.

PingleBerry

Did... did Robber just murder the Knightsbane? Or was it someone else?

sheer_falacy

Pretty sure Robber is busy doing something in Liesse, and has absolutely no reason to kill Istrid with poison. Probably someone Akua controls, or possibly Procer though that seems much less likely.

Jeffery Wells

Goblin steel is the high quality weaponry crafted by the legion's forges. It is wielded by pretty much all of the legionnaires. The person who stabbed Istrid was a legionnaire, not necessarily a goblin, and there is absolutely no reason to think it was Robber of all people.

lucnation

Because he never stabs people

Treachery abounds! Who did it?!

It does suck that she died within the span of two paragraphs. Would've liked to see more.

Well, looks like the Hellhound is going to end up a marshal sooner than we thought. Also, I enjoy the hell out of Masego's plan to mix corruption into the demons and make the mage's holding them hit the GTF0 button before they get corrupted themselves. It's pretty great. Nice to see Talbot's perspective here, he's an interesting fellow.

Not contaminated.the blood was under masego control.i guess he purposely left that there^^

Nairne .01

Thats an interesting thing. I mean he is not a raving monster of flesh, tentacles, countless eyes and mouths right? 😊

Gunslinger

Bloody hell that ending. Juniper is going to roast Akua on an open flame for that. The perpetrator can't be Cat and so by extension can't be Robber.

Akua is the obvious answer, but could it be Assassin?

Euodiachloris

Not his style. This isn't an embarrassingly ironic death of ignominious proportions.

It's very probably Akua overplaying her hand and causing a bigger explosive backlash than she realised was possible. 😬

RoflCat

Probably one of Akua's spies.

We know she has spies everywhere, hence Cat's purge before this battle (she knew Akua would use this sort of trick)

So there's a pretty good chance one of her plan is to have the spies poison as many key figures as they can, to turn them into stronger than typical Wights AND break chain of commands at the same time.

Doing so to someone in protected location like Ranker might be hard/others will immediately kill their wight-ed victims, but in the field? Nobody would realize a thing and there's a horde of them to make it harder to kill off the victim.

Engineer

Yo did Masego just gank three Demons? Unholy shit dude (0_o)

In other news, Istrid was poisoned by a Goblin Steel sword. Now, before we get our trusty pitchforks and torches to burn the little green bastards, let's stop and think for a second.

Goblin steel is standard issue for the higher ups in the Legions. Squire herself has a goblin steel sword. Therefore the fact that it was a goblin steel sword does not mean it was a goblin that committed the act.

"To fathom a strange plot look at the outcome and assume that was the intended result."

Who benefits from Istrid Knightsbane dying here?

oldschoolvillain

Akua, obviously, is the immediate answer. But Cat just ran a purge of the legions under her command, which at the time included Istrid's. Second, Akua's Trump was the hell gate and the demons – if murdering officers was her plan, she could have initiated it before destabilizing her soul to turn the tide. Less immediately, Cordelia Hasenbach, clearing out the champions of the Conquest and the Reforms, thus cracking the spine of the legions before her precious crusade.

werafdsaew

I doubt Cat purged any legions except her own. How would she have known whom to purge outside of the 15th? And she doesn't have the authority to do that anyways. It's definitely Akua's play.

Letouriste

you forgot than thief spied on all the legions in this fight. she also had the queen spies report and a few others like ratface (which has access to unusual people). Also, these armies were all under her command until black showed. she outranked ranker^^

nipi

Cat herself admitted that some spies likely remained. Im guessing its Akua.

Or perhaps the Empress if she believes that Black and by extension those loyal to him are about to become a liability. We did get some foreshadowing about Blacks instability and the differing opinions on how to deal with the Procer problem.

Decius

Kat benefits, although she loses more, but the Empress loses more than Kat does. Maybe the Empress is playing a very long game, and sees benefit to weakening the Legions before Kat the Black Knight tries to take over.

Akua benefits, and could plausibly have planted a sleeper agent that wasn't detected.

Everyone who gets field promotions afterward benefits, but I doubt that backstabbing is common in the Legions of Terror, mostly because Black would have set a precedent for stabbing people who sought promotions that way in the back. of the neck. with a large axe.

The Callowan nationalist movement probably thinks they benefit, possibly enough to try, but they aren't nearly smart enough to get a spy into position on that timeframe without Scribe noticing.

Thief could have done it, but I don't see enough of a motive. The Wandering Bard likewise could have caused pretty much anybody to have delivered the blow.

And it's also possible that it was an enemy combatant. Akua had legion equipment, access to goblin steel, poison, a history of solving problems using poison, and expendable assets on the field.

Mike E.

Isn't Thief inside Liesse? Along with Robber and his minions.

Nightlurker8

Black sent all loyal to him legions in meatgrinder. He is too experienced and savvy to accidentally overextend his forces. Based on this I think he sent assassin after all his generals. So in the end empress would be forced to rely on kat.

Letouriste

and then cat has to deal with procer without good generals at her side?

No that doesn't fit. futhermore istrid liked cat so i'm not sure she would hate cat too much. for me black plan to kill Named friends and not many

Letouriste

Two generals killed just before a major war? I think procer or Tyrant would be responsible. could also be a plot from the matrons goblins but I strongly doubt that. Akua is also likely, confident like she is of her big weapon of mass destruction.

Poison is not the way a general should die!!! Dammit

oldschoolvillain

In a manner that further cripples the Legions of Terror just before Hasenbach's crusade. This is right up her alley.

Drd

Everyone seems to think it was a traitor from within who did this, but every soldier dying is being instantly raised as undead, just as I think Istrid is in the process of becoming.

Akua could be sticking to Warlock's method using reagents to instantly turn the legions to wights, that she used to turn the living inhabitants of Liesse into wights, then the swords (goblin steel swords) the wights have could be coated in the reagents like a poison.

nipi

We did have that little bit about the strange stew.

oldschoolvillain

The issue here is that it requires the legions to have gone into this battle planning to use poisoned swords against undead. While expecting at least some of their dead to rise as enemies. That's a pretty naive move for anyone as experienced as Ranker, Black, or Istrid to make.

Drd

I meant the undead were using poisoned swords against the living legions to turn them undead.
I am assuming that as the wights are higher level of undead, that they're armed, and that Akua had access to legion goblin steel weaponry to arm them with.

Nostradamus

Every Legionnaire that dies is raised back up as an undead. This deep in the battle, how many of the undead are fallen legionnaires? Are they being equipped with poison swords too? That'd be a logistical nightmare. It's much more fiscally and strategically responsible for it to just be some manner of sorcery.

Meaning the poison is probably just run-of-the-mill poison and not wight-making poison. This was an assassination not just a casualty of war.

benthelynx

The opening quote clearly relates but I'm too tired to work out how that narrows it down.

Engineer

Huh, so Istrid falls here and rises as an undead Berserker. Well that will simply destroy all morale in her company. Plus there's no Named nearby to step in so if she goes Red (Black?) Rage she will do some serious damage to her legion likely leading to a total rout.

I do believe the legions are fucked. Only a Named can save them now.

Nairne .01

Couldn't this be an entry point for a story for Juniper? But I mean she has shown so much potential and got compared to some of the greatest commanders the last few decades had seen in this chapter. I don't know what name it could be though, still, I'd love to see her get a Name. There is also the Hellgate and she has the moniker Hellhound...who knows what could happen.

nipi

I like how she called them devil... dogs like they are unworthy of being called hellhounds. I guess shes about to show who the alpha female is.

KZA

So I have a theory about what Black is up to now, on thought.

Liesse is a place where names can be taken- see Chidder last time.

The Black Knight may only pass their name on death... usually.

Black has literally every death flag in the world pointed right at his head, and he *knows it.*

Black is here to *hand Catherine the title willingly, using Liesse as the medium.*

This accomplishes all of his short term goals in one swoop-

1. Survive the next year.
2. Consolidate Catherine's power.
3. Prevent his friends and loyalists from going wild at his death.
4. Put him back in a position to affect the "narrative-" the Nameless but wise mentor figure to our up and coming Queen.
5. And most importantly, stick a finger right into the eye of narrative inevitability.

After all, he's always been said to not particularly exert his power directly. Losing it wouldn't cripple him like it would say, Warlock.

This also sets up possibly the most embarrassing and therefore probable possible future:

*Lord Chancellor Black.*

It was done on Hierarchs orders.

Interlude: Liesse III

"Oh, woe is me, you've destroyed my army... Hahaha, you fell for it again! I haven't paid them in a year, they were about to depose me. Once more, Irritant triumphs against all odds!"

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful

Orim was dead.

Ranker had hoped otherwise even after seeing his standard go down, but now that Wekesa's boy had disappeared the demons scrying links were stable again and confirmation followed swiftly. The Fifth's mages had commanded that his senior legate was now in command. Even worse, the bloody havoc was not singular to the left flank. Istrid was gone, allegedly to sorcery, and Afolabi had been hacked to pieces by his own dead men. It'd been a long time since the goblin had seen one of her own kind fearful, much less one of matron blood, but when Sacker had contacted her there'd been that recognizable ugly glint in the other woman's eyes. The reformed command structure of the Legions of Terror had been born of long conversations around fires she'd had with Black and Grem back in the days when they had been rebels on the run, and so Ranker knew the legions would not be taken out of the battle by the death of their generals. To blunt that old weakness of Praesi armies, who had once collapsed the moment the Black Knight or the Emperor was slain, had been one of their first reforms. Yet it would have been wilful blindness to say morale would not be butchered by the sudden deaths of old and beloved commanders.

Reputation always cut both ways.

The chain for supreme mastery of the host now ran three deep: herself, Sacker and then young Juniper. Istrid's daughter was making sweeping advance against the devils but was too far to be of true use. Sacker was on the wrong side of the battlefield, and fresh in engaging the wights through the field of stakes. After them legate seniority would be the rule of law, but Ranker trusted no career second with a battle like this. It would have to be her. Salvaging the remains of the Fifth had been her first manoeuvre, and to achieve this she had not been shy in spending the lives of the Callowan levies. They came back undead, true enough, but better guards arisen than legionaries. She was willing to trade three Callowan for every proper soldier pulled out, if not four. Some tried to run, after the first bloody clash. She had crossbows tear through the deserters, and calls made that the same fate awaited all cowards. It put spine in them, long enough for it to matter. Less than two thousand of the Fifth Legion pulled back behind the barricades, losses utterly disastrous. A year would not be long enough to train replacements for that, she thought. And Procer will not even give us that much.

The ditch that had once been meant to hinder Legion advance had now become its very line of defence, shield wall clustered tight behind it as sappers turned the thin space between ditch and palisade in a storm of munitions. The Fifth's siege engines were trained on the horde of wights, and her own hastily assembled to join them. The left flank steadied, slowly but surely, and the danger of complete and utter rout passed. For now. Legate Bagram had led the Sixth and Twelfth into similar retreat on the other flank, his giving ground made easier by the Ninth swinging at the wights from the side. The rebels in the last bastion saw opening in that, and took it. The moment the Ninth stood alone the wights turned towards it as one, to break the solitary legion, but they were not dealing with an orc. Sacker was a cunning old fox, and she'd prepared the grounds: the undead tumbled through a field of buried munitions and razor wires with mass casualties as Sacker retreated at her own pace, long gone by the time the undead had broken through her traps. The Ninth marched down to anchor the side of the bloodied Sixth and Twelfth, and Marshal Ranker had that side's combined command officially ceded to the only general there.

They would hold long enough for the Deoraithe advancing to prop them up. cursory reading of the field would have one think that would allow their side to turn the tide, begin a counterattack backed by Daoine bowmen and fresh infantry, but the old goblin had been watching more than troops movements with her rheumy eyes. Numbers. It was always about the numbers, and if nothing changed Marshal Ranker knew this battle was lost. Casualties were starkly heavier on the side of the rebels now that the Legions had a proper position, but that moment of overextension had been too costly. They'd been weakened, and now the rebels were grinding away at them with their own dead. A Legion of Terror was a complex and carefully crafted engine, meant to serve multiple purposes and consequently involving a great many specialized parts. There was a truth underlying that Ranker had never put to ink in any of her treatises, and neither had the other two architects of the Legions: there were a series of lines in the sand that dictated the combat efficiency of a legion. Lines defined by casualties and supply expenditures. Not simple ones, as a legion was made of too many parts for that. But the two most salient points of failure were dead regulars and lack of goblin munitions. One of these lines crossed would cripple a legion. Two ended it as a fighting force.

On both flanks, the numbers were teetering dangerously closed to both red lines for most the legions on the field. Her Fourth and Sacker's Ninth were fresh in comparison, but also the most fragile of the legions: they had higher proportion of sappers and engineers, and lower proportions of heavies. There was a reason the Ninth was high-always paired with the Sixth, the largest heavy infantry force in the Empire. Her own legion was not quite so delicate, but it was still far from the heavy assault force she needed now. Good for holding grounds, as it currently did. But breaching the barricade anew would cost her more dead regulars than she could afford, or this entire army for that matter. Marshal Ranker's eyes studied the enemy lines, and the rate at which the dead rose. Her lips tightened. It would take until nightfall, she thought. Several hours yet. But when the sun came down, the largest army assembled by the Dread Empire in over twenty years would effectively be ended as a fighting force.

The Fifteenth, if taken from the Hellgate, could perhaps tip the balance. Wekesa had implied it could be dealt with, and so Ranker grit her teeth and sent near half the forces of Daoine to hurry that fight along. The Watch, even, though it could have been used elsewhere to great effect. It was too much like rolling the dice for her taste, but she was short on alternatives. A miracle was what they needed. Answer came, to that unspoken prayer. A miracle of sorts. It was not great sorcery or a clever trick, a Calamity unleashed or strategy revealed at the last moment. It was a screaming fool riding a flying horse, dragging an orc by the neck as they crashed into the central bastion.

Which then exploded.

Wekesa was unused to feeling admiration for others. It was a sentiment usually reserved for Alaya or Amadeus, whose aptitudes shone brightest in areas of no real interest to him. Dumisai of Aksum, the father of the girl currently giving them some trouble, had occasionally earned a sliver of respect for his research as well: though not ground-breaking work by any means, the man's enlightened refinement of old Wasteland rituals was often worth a second glance. But even the insights of the man who might have once contested his Name were ultimately the work of a second-rate sorcery. Dumisai was to sorcery what goblins were to engineering – a skilled craftsman, but very rarely the herald of true innovation. He improved but did not create. His daughter, it seemed, was of a different breed. The Warlock silently studied what appeared to be a perfectly stable Greater Breach and inclined his head in genuine respect at the other mage's achievement. This was match for any work of his that fell under the Dark Day protocol, and truthfully above most his own devices.

The core of the work was hopelessly Praesi, of course. Pure Trismegistan design, from the set of secondary stabilizing arrays to the the displacement of the energy source to the sky in order to limit the effects of the bleed on the immediate surroundings. Yet Akua Sahelian had starkly surpassed ever single preceding effort ascribed to that branch of magical theory with her magnificent use of escapements to ensure even Keter's Due did not go to waste. It was, he would concede, a masterful thing. The precision involved was mind-boggling, likely the result of years of calculations, and the sheer variety of arrays involved was worthy of praise. Liesse had runic base for flight, for planar displacement and for repeated Breach ritual use. This might be the single most variable magical weapon in the history of Praes. It would be delight and the occupation of entire decades to study her work, after the Diabolist was killed. Still, reproduction was not possible. This much he'd already determined. The Greater Breach before him was... simplistic. There'd been a binding inscribed in the heart of the Hellgate that bound any devil crossing it, along with a mild compulsion to cross for any who looked upon it, but the binding itself could only be called incomplete. To function properly, it required one with the Name of Diabolist to be the one initiating the ritual.

This city-artefact was tailored so that only one soul in all of Creation could use its full potential, the very same villain who'd built it.

In his estimation, with the right modifications part of the functionality could be maintained without Sahelian. A Greater Breach would still be possible to open, though with nowhere as large of breadth of range and precision. But the devils pouring through that Breach would be so loosely bound as to be effectively independent. At best, given six months, Warlock could ensure they were barred from a specific territory. Any modifications more extensive would require years of research and a complete redesign of all major arrays: everything was interlinked. The slightest change would unbalance every other system. It was no wonder, he thought, that Diabolist had chosen displacement as a protective measure. Devices this sophisticated had a dangerous tendency towards fragility, one of the many reasons Wekesa himself preferred to rely on imbricated forces rather than runic arrays. Amadeus and his liability of an apprentice were currently traipsing the belly of the beast, and he was glad to have impressed on his old friend the dangers of meddling with such delicate arrangements. He would know better than start breaking every array in sight, and though the girl was an ignorant thug who did not she would be reined in by her teacher's orders.

Gaze leaving the Breach, Warlock considered the soldiers fighting before it. The Fifteenth was making short work of the devils – akalibsa, of all things, how very provincial of Sahelian. Some things were not so easily outgrown, it seemed. The Knightsbane's daughter, by the looks of it, had arranged some sort of tactical trap and torn apart the devils with the same horsemen her mother was famous for breaking. The irony was not quite worth a chuckle, but close. Annihilation did not seem to be the intent here, curiously enough. A path of retreat had been left open to the akalibsa and the devils were fleeing through it, simultaneously destroying the last of their formation and preventing more devils passing through the Breach by their panicked stampede. Within moments a mass of shield-locking legionaries had the opening secured, and sappers lined up behind them. A killing field in the making, Wekesa thought. Clever girl. This was, he decided, nearly sufficient preparation for him to begin intervening. Lashing the the shapeshifted devils that dragged his chariot, the Sovereign of the Red Skies began his descent.

Masego had always deeply disliked when scholars spoke of sorcery as an art, for it was anything but. Mages were often compared to painters and singers, spellcrafting termed as a piece instead of the precise formulas they truly were. It was only the ignorant who found more beauty in such subjective matters than in the perfect arithmetic of imposing one's will upon Creation. There was greater splendour in one flawlessly balanced formula than in all the statues and painting of the world. It was why Hierophant had become who he was, the reason for his love of witnessing that which was previously unknown: to fit and explain what was once a mystery within the greater frame of sorcery was the most genuine act of grace possible to one of mortal flesh. Every such truth brought into the light of day expanded the span of Creation as a whole, perhaps the only action that could ever accurately be called selfless. After all, beyond the petty squabbles of Above and Below lay a deeper truth. We are rats in a cage, one and all, and the choice spoken of in the Book of All Things is but a trick. The true choice is this: to claw at the other rats, or seek the edge of the cage.

Masego, like his father before him, had chosen purpose beyond the largely pointless vagaries of transient existence.

It was unfortunate in some ways that the insights he had gained following that purpose would not be used in the very kind of squabble he would rather avoid entirely, but on occasions concessions must be made for the ones we loved. Besides, he would gain much from victory today. The Sahelian artefact that allowed one to scry beyond Creation, for one, and unrestricted study of the Diabolist's own sorcerous efforts. Of course, victory had to be obtained first. This was proving more tedious than he would have liked. It was a noted fact that demons, for reasons not yet understood, did not affect each other. When two different such entities attempted to contaminate with their essence the same portion of Creation, one saturated the fabric of reality first and the other's effect simply washed over it. The phenomenon had not been studied in great depth, sadly, or rather it had but that research had not been preserved. Practitioners who kept extensive notes on matters demonic tended to be... affected by the very keeping. Their immediate surroundings as well. Even too much knowledge of such entities had its costs, and it was not false archetype to consider diabolists as particular prone to derangement. If not worse.

Still, it was quite fascinating to watch the spreading corruption of Hierophant's own creation check the efforts of the three demons that were attempting to destroy him. Like ink in water the drop of ichor he had inserted in the thread of the dimension had spread, but unlike ink had not thinned in the spreading. It had, if anything, strengthened. This had proved problematic in some ways – he now had to regularly craft a secondary control spell for his guidance and transfer the reins to it lest the corruption reach him directly – the effectiveness could not be denied. Already he had smothered Madness in a globe of corruption it was completely failing to breach in any way. There was, as far as he could tell, not so much as a single mote of bleed.

"Fascinating," Hierophant murmured, cocking his head to the side.

The Beast of Hierarchy was proving more difficult to restrain. Abandoning what could be considered 'offensive action' for its kind, it had instead replaced a law regarding space that Masego had yet to grasp. Even within this closed realm, where the boundaries and rules had been defined by his will alone, it managed to escape his sorcery effortlessly. He'd been reduced to using a defensive screen of corruption to prevent the demon of Order falling upon him, which was little different from setting fire to his own garden so thieves could not get at the cabbage. Apathy was something of a mixed bag. Though once the largest threat it was no longer, yet to consider it contained would be something of a stretch. While immobile, it was so because its essence had forged an envelope of inertness around it. Corruption could not breach it, and it kept disrupting efforts to wrap fully around its envelope. Frustrating, this. Anything less than perfect containment was no containment at all, with creatures such as these. Still, this was only preparation. The attempts at containment had been purely to sate his curiosity, the true thrust of his offensive would begin – ah, now. Sufficient corruption had been spread. Hierophant extended his hand, and from his pocket dimension a long shaft of wood fell.

A gift from Catherine, who truly could be a good and understanding friend when she tried. The old standard was long rid of any cloth but the runes were what truly mattered, carved into the old wood, and with a subtle shiver they responded to his will. The same demon of Corruption he'd once fought in Liesse came out screaming into his realm, leashed to his will. Within moments, not that time had much meaning here, it cornered the Beast of Hierarchy. With the others stationary, he could finally act. Trying to kill demon with demon would, of course, be as attempting to drown a fish. But it was not the demons he sought to affect. Corruption crept down the bindings the rebel mages placed upon their arsenal of ruin, sliding down the sympathetic links like thick oil. Masego smiled, and without ever leaving his realm found himself looking into the terrified eyes of mages hidden behind layers and layers of ward.

"Good evening, ladies and gentlemen," he said.

The demons struggled and screamed. For a moment he pondered offering a pithy line to send them off with, but he did not have a knack for such matters.

"Try not to scream," he suggested. "It only makes it worse."

Corruption surged. They did not listen.

Juniper watched the devils scatter like rabbits before her legion and felt only visceral satisfaction at the sight. Minimal casualties. The three wedges of Callowan cavalry had struck the dog-devils like a falling hammer. Collapse complete and immediate, thousands of bodies friend and foe moving according to her will in perfect harmony. The Hellhound had never enjoyed a roll in the hay half so much as she did this single moment. It must have been the way Pickler felt, she thought, when some device she'd made worked perfectly. That instant where the cogs turned and the chord snapped and the perfect suddenly clarity it brought. She felt flushed and feverish, and beyond that hungry for more. Another battle, another moment where the arrow loosed by her mind found the target and hit the bullseye with that palpably pleasurable thump. Gods, she had been blessed to be born in these years of the Empire. With war after war tumbling towards her like a drunken lover, offering the bounty of one field of steel after another with open arms.

Juniper felt Aisha's stare lingering on her, and so wiped away the unseemliness on her face before the Taghreb decided to comment on it. Teasing would only detract from the glorious lightness now running through her veins, no matter whose mouth it came from. Besides, she knew Aisha had touched this feeling as well. The orc remembered the war games of the College, the bright eyes shining on Aisha Bishara's face when Wolf Company tore into the flank of some astonished company of fools with fire and sword. Her Staff Tribune saw more parchment than steel, these days, but it was inside her still. The desert tribes of the Taghreb had been raiders as famed as her own people, in the olden days before the Miezans came. The Empire liked to paint a veneer of civilization over its peoples, nowadays, but blood always ran red. No one could escape the truth of that.

"The Deoraithe," Juniper said, gathering herself together. "Report."

Aisha's face bobbed down, though not deep enough to hide the smirk on her lips.

"Lord Hierophant's removal of the demons further muddled their deployment," the Staff Tribune said. "But we have three thousand archers and the same in foot headed our way. Duchess Kegan has, reluctantly, ceded operational command over them."

"And the Watch?" Juniper gravelled.

"Marshal Ranker has granted us use of it," she replied, cheeks dimpling. "The Lord Warlock's statement that the gate could yet be ended has her... invested."

The battle's other front was too far for the Hellhound to have a good look at what was happening, but the situation did seem dire from what she could see. Both flanks had fallen back behind the palisades and ditches they'd once taken, and the Deoraithe in the centre were rushing too slowly to fill the void left by the demons. If the Hellgate could be taken care of quickly enough, the Fifteenth could move up to reinforce the flagging legions. Swiftness was of the essence, more than ever.

"The Order of the Broken Bell is to pursue the fleeing devils," Juniper said. "Prepare fresh lines for a push into the Breach. I'll want the Watch to back them as soon as possible, too. But before that... The Warlock said he needs us to clear a space. So we'll clear him a fucking space."

General Juniper of the Fifteenth Legion bared her fangs.

"Tell Pickler her moment's come – engines free."

Senior Sapper Pickler of the High Ridge tribe hopped from one foot to the other, feeling like the young girl she'd never before been. Finally, finally the Hellhound had let her off the leash. All this talk of strategic surprise, of comparative advantages and blah blah blah. Gobbler be witness, the orc could prattle on like an old raider sometimes. A depression in the grounds had one of her engines bumping as the oxen tore it free and the goblin turned on the legionary driving the beast.

"You," she hissed. "If there's a single cog askew, I swear on all the Gods I will flay you piece by piece and make you eat it."

The goblin paled and started babbling excuses, but she cared little for his inanities. She crept to her lovely scorpion and stroked the rough wood, checking the beauty for damages. Nothing. Good. Not that she'd take back her words. Pickler was not her mother and despised all she stood for, but she was matron-blood nonetheless. Punishments as unusual as they were cruel were her birth right.

"I'm watching you," she barked at the legionary. "If you don't have any use for your eyes, you despicable little vandal, maybe Robber should have them instead."

Satisfied the ignorant masses had been sufficiently cowed, she stalked forward to the gate. Juniper was fronting heavies with sappers behind them, breaking up the devils that had begun pouring out again with sharpeners and then letting them wash up against the shield wall, but that was just a temporary arrangement. They needed to pierce through, since the Warlock apparently had some kind of scheme to close the gate. Not her concern, and she'd not asked for further information. Instead she made her way to the front and began haranguing the legionaries to prepare themselves for a parting when her precious ones arrived, which would be soon though if the oxen-drivers hurried and messed up her engines there was going to be a rousing bout of crucifixions following shortly. And not the nice kind. She'd find the rusty nails herself, if she had to. Ten scorpions of her own design were set down as she hovered, and two of the never-before unveiled Spitters. Getting Ratface to sign off on the logistics of providing ammunition for her two latest wonders had been like pulling a bald dragon's teeth, but she'd gone above his head and arranged for the Squire to stamp her seal of approval. It had been an easy sell, given the other woman's love affair with all forms of wanton destruction.

That the half-blood Deoraithe had immediately suggested goblinfire be used as ammunition as well was one of the things that helped Pickler believe there might be worth in following her.

Ratface had later redeemed himself of his sins by using his 'talents' to ensure her childhood dream came true. Before her, delicately being set down on the ground and deployed, were the first ten built examples of the gloriously-named Pickler Model of the Imperial Artillery Templates. The Supply Tribune had managed to push the official acceptance of the design in Ater with only three separate instance of blackmail and bribery, a splendid navigation of the maze of squabbling and obstructionism that was the Imperial bureaucracy. Fast-tracking the review had not even required a murder! The Taghreb would truly have made a halfway-decent consort to a Matron, had he been born of her people. Not a breeding partner, of course, or even a first consort – those were expected to be properly demure and covered in scars – but perhaps a fourth or even third.

The scorpions she ordered set in a straight line, with some room between them, and the sappers taught to handle them eagerly began field preparations. The two Spitters were set at an interval behind, the munition carts behind them very carefully unloaded. Even with cloth-filled crates carrying them on wheels had been risky business, but if that much had not been possible the Hellhound would have never allowed them to be deployed. She had no appreciation for real engineering, their general. Pickler did not usually hold battlefield command, save in case of sieges, but in this particular instance she had left behind the general staff to personally supervise. She'd told the others it was to keep an eye on finicky machines, but that was an ugly lie. Her designs were flawless. She just wanted to seem them unveiled for the first time from up close. Sauntering ahead, the Senior Sapper gauged the wind and distance before ordering a last series of adjustments. Then she screamed for the legionaries ahead to part, and glory unfolded before her very eyes.

Ten bolts sprang forward, steel-tipped, and shattered their way through the first three ranks of stone-garbed devils. Before the killing was even over, the strings on her scorpions loosened and with a mere pulling of the lever reset. The wooden store above the scorpion's length unclenched and another bolt dropped. Chak, and death flew. Lever, drop. Chak, and death flew. A manic grin split the goblin's face as she watched the poetry of the world in motion, the work of her mind and hands unleashed. This, she thought, was worth every strapping she'd received for stealing chalk and drawing designs on den walls. Worth every bleeding she'd suffered through for tinkering with her own hands, disgracing her line by doing man's work. It was worth her mother smilingly telling her she'd slit her throat and leave her body to the buzzards if she ever tried to return to the tribe. The Pickler Models scythed their way through the devils, until the six shots in the stores were emptied and the wooden boxes had to be changed. In that heartbeat, as the devils surged again, the Spitters fired. It pained Pickler to say it, but these were not her sole work. The engines were, of course, but not the ammunition.

Alchemy – the use of it of course, not the production as that secret would never leave the Eyries – had never been a true interest of hers. She had designed the clay projectiles, but within the concoction that awaited was Robber's own recipe. Three sappers had gone blind in the experimental process and twice that many deaf, but as she saw the Seedlings fly she thought it had been entirely worth it. Only one per Spitter, who as machines were almost more a long sling than anything resembling a scorpion. Flat but angled upwards, kept as close to the ground as possible to limit the shaking. They were not yet able to be fired from behind a shield wall, though already she was planning a second model that would remedy that weakness. The Seedlings, each half as large as trebuchet stone, arced up and then fell among the throng of devils. What ensued was sheer artistry. First an explosion, for sharpeners had been used to make much of the substance, but then spread a blinding white flame spilling from that blast. The devils screamed, screamed as the fire seared flesh and stone and cooked them alive. After seventeen heartbeats the flame went out, the longest Robber had been able to maintain the burn when exposed to open air.

When the flames winked out, the scorpions had been pushed forward five feet. The stores began their mechanical work as the Spitters were advanced five feet as well then loaded anew. And so began the push forward, heavies closing on the sides of the gate and forcing the devils into a hall where only death awaited. Senior Sapper Pickler of the High Ridge tribe cackled, and paid no attention to the weak-bellied legionaries around her that flinched at the sound.

Screams filled the air as firing resumed, and it was the song of progress.

---

Alivaril

I really hope the gnomes don't keep them from having nice things.

Adra

"Screams filled the air as firing resumed, and it was the song of progress."

Yup, that sounds like a paddlin' from the gnomes.

Ane

Wait, Alivaril? The real Alivaril?

agumentic

It's still medieval-ish, so they should be okay with it.

John Galt

Keep the gnomes at bay! Vote.

*Euodiachloris*

A whole new meaning to "red letter day". 😊

nipi

Was the third letter still a warning? Or did that come with the flying fleet?

Ezreon

With fleet

JC

Oh Archer. Taking after her mentor in so many ways.

Also, Masego is amazing. Innocently terrifying.

ALKATYN

Pickler is absolutely beautiful and terrifying.

AshSlanabrezgov

I don't like Pickler, but I love her engines.

*DroughtBringer*

Goblin fire... but not?

Awesome chapter! I can't wait for the first Friday chapter!

rangamal thenuwara

Hell yeah. Nice time to get the Friday updates. I just hope the author does not get burned out.

IDKWhoitis

Pretty sure that's White Phosphorus (Or it's magical equivalent), given that it blinds and burns.

shieldredblog

Corruption is the real hero of this story.
I hope the fleshy rag doll demon becomes a main character.

Alivaril

Personally, I'm extremely worried about Masego right now. Book 2, chapter 48:

"Are you telling me you just tried to summon a demon of Corruption in a dimension you bound to yourself? That'd be a special brand of crazy even for you."

I cleared my throat.

"And by crazy I mean stupid. So very, very stupid."

JC

I could show you the runes proving this if you weren't magically illiterate.

letouriste

i doubt masego bound that dimension to himself...still he personally weld corruption blood and experimented on that^^

maresther23

And this, boys and girls, is why we call them the Legions of TERROR!

danh3107

Greenskins are all mad, all of them. From Juniper's battle lust, to Pickler's joy of seeing her creations do what they intended and even Hakram's ability to sharpen his deadliness through verse and song.

All of them bloody mad,

AND I LOVE IT!

Ane

What Pickler /really/ needs to build is an engine that can hurl Hakram's.

Sure, there might only be one shot.

But the ammo is reusable.

Big Brother

Heck, launch him on a Seedling. He'll Stand through it, and Rampage in the aftermath.

Gunslinger

For a moment he pondered offering a pithy line to send them off with, but he did not have a knack for such matters.

"Try not to scream," he suggested. "It only makes it worse

Masego my boy, surely you underestimate yourself.

This chapter was fucking awesome. I've read it multiple times already. It's also tragic how much of a beating the legion has taken. I wonder if this is still within Malicia's estimate or if she would regret underestimating the Diabolist.

Gunslinger

On a related note, Traitorous and Irritant are my favorite dread emperors.

Big Brother

Oh easily. I kinda hope Irritant was the one who Traitorous killed to become Dread Emperor.

RandomFan

I hope they weren't, because both of them are more awesome if they decided to do this without following in the other's footsteps. Still, it wouldn't surprise me if they were.

Euodiachloris

Indeed. It's hard to say who between those two is most awesome. *nods*

chris S

If Cat ever climbs the Tower, I can kin of see her becoming Dread Empress Irritant II, The Even More Oddly Successful.

"You thought you had the upper hand when you chopped my sword arm off, but with it detached from my body, I was able to reanimate it with necromancy and pull the switch to activate the goblinfire explosives beneath you without you noticing!"

Engineer

Ok, so uh why is Archer dragging Adjutant by the neck? And uh, why did she kamikaze the central bastion? With Zombie The Third no less.

JC

Always have a first step going.

samshadar

Because such use of Zombie The Third irritates our dear Squire to no end? 😊

rangamal thenuwara

I think Archer just threw Hakram first which caused the explosion. Then landed on the destroyed bastion.

maresther23

Do you remember how Adjutant said he would keep Archer away from problems. Well, she resents that remark.

I love the comparisons between "unleashing the Calamities" and "a fool with an orc by the neck". The Calamities are elegant weapons of mass destruction carefully deployed by Black. The Woe are unpredictable weapons of mass destruction vaguely pointed in the direction they will cause more chaos by Cat.

Euodiachloris

You have to ask? With one act, she royally trolls both Adjunct and Squire by doing something they can't say isn't helpful. XD

Byzantine

Huh, when did Patreon reach almost $800?

Gunslinger

About 10 days ago which means we don't have to wait till monday.

Allafterme

Looks like if old Praes is going down, it will go down hard and take the old guard with it. Cat's succession seem more and more plausible with each chapter

letouriste

hum...so if i understood correctly there is a chapter tomorrow? i didn't even donate a cent/pennie yet:/ damn me and my lack of funds.

anyway, the presentation page still says Monday and Wednesday so i'm not sure.

great chapter:) things are looking up everywhere and with so many characters dying in the prior one i fear less a possible soon to be death of black...i didn't really believe in this anyway given all the plot foreshadowing of his future actions (elves?, transition to cat in the blood, war on the trueblood etc...) and he didn't seem suicidal to me.

rangamal thenuwara

Next chapter on Friday. Author confirmed on reddit.

great:)

thanks, i missed that.

is there several reddit for this story? i'm on this one:

letouriste

errr, forget that. i found it^^

AshSlanabrezgov

I am sad. Never thought that Hierophant would be so... mathematical and so hateful for sculpture and dance. I expected him be somewhat exoteric, mystical, otherworldly, arcane and perhaps a bit eldritch. I mean, look at his name. I expected wonder, dry engineering. Never expected him to be a raging atheist slash maths geek.

AshSlanabrezgov

*i expected wonder, ZEN-ISH WISDOM, NOT dry engineering.

Mike E.

He strikes me as being written as someone in the autism spectrum...non-social as a kid, knack for figuring out technical things, doesn't understand jokes/satire, physical contact annoys him, has a need to factually correct people (which Cat uses to troll him endlessly). Him being mathematical and precise is exactly what I expect.

AshSlanabrezgov

Autism... Hm. Might be, didn't think about it. Might be, yet I didn't see exact symptoms of autism? I'd rather define him as 'focused'. 'Too focused' even. In a sense of too focused on studies, perhaps he was shaped and encouraged by his dad and inborn properties of his brain. Too focused on studies means his experience and mental tools and interests are skewed.

stevenneiman

The whole point of his new Name is that he applies reductionism to what seems wondrous to others. He is, to use a real-world analogy, the stage magician who heckles spoon-benders and faith healers, with a bit of Richard Feynman and the Mythbusters thrown in. And he never had any interest in art or showmanship, even before he gained his first Name. All he cares about is the underlying principles and how to apply them; he regards showmanship as merely a barrier to the understanding of those principles, and art as the same except without anything he finds profound or interesting on the other side of that barrier. He doesn't even have much of his father's patience for other things, nor any real interests outside of magic, sarcasm, and a little bit of interest in friendship.

In short, it would be blatant character derailment if he did regard anything he did as being fundamentally special. Masterful and brilliant, maybe, but not special.

AshSlanabrezgov

There was ambiguity about how his name will take on 'dissecting divine'. Him being overly pedantic was influence of Apprentice Name. After getting new name Hierophant, High Priest, and new eyes, it seemed like his personality changed. He started to spout awesomely mind boggling and philosophical and poetic sh*t. I was trilled by his scenes until now. I thought he dropped the shackles of Apprentice and morphed to something new.

And now after all this time it feels like 180 degree turn when his insight is shown so... mundane. So casual. So simple. So grey. It could be more. His inner world could be more. Such a wasted possibility. -_-

knockoffnikolai

This comment is also partly in response to your reply to Mike E.

If you take a second look at his inner monologue, you'll see that Masego is very much driven by his wonder and curiosity. But it's a wonder and curiosity that's located in a view of the world that's very different than everyone around him. The perspectives of everyone around him seem like hazy and imprecise flailings at the true nature of reality, hence his disdain as he steps forward to unravel the mysteries before him. For Masego, there is no wonder in an unsolvable mystery. A mystery is like a wrapped present. It is fun to tear off the wrapper, but what you reveal in the process holds the lasting value. If there is any mysticism in the process (and he'll deny that there is), it's in the way that he is able to truly become himself while seeking after the hidden secrets of reality.

I work with autistic individuals, and the ones who go into research typically aren't quite that flowery, but the above paragraph is a good approximation of their perspective. (I tried to modulate it for your communication style, but that's always a tricky game.) I've worked with a fellow whose field of choice is nutritional research, because "I want to examine the basic components of this thing we call life." It's very much the same attitude on display with Masego here. Autism presents differently with each individual, but to my view, Masego is a pretty faithful depiction of a person on the spectrum.

AshSlanabrezgov

2knockoffnicolai – After all said above about autism, I think I might be misunderstanding the meaning of this term. (I thought 'autism' is severe mental condition that disrupts persons so bad that he/she is incapable of any work) Gonna look into it.

nipi

"If there's a single cog askew, I swear on all the Gods I will flay you piece by piece and make you eat it."

I thought wastlanders didnt swear on the Gods. The ones above not being theirs and the ones below. Well there was that little bit where Cat suggested swearing on them and Akua went very very pale.

Big Brother

Well, there are the Gods Above and Below who are the "top" of the divine food chain, then regional gods, like the Orcish God that Captain ate to control the Curse. Below that could be the fae royals, who embody points in time (Waning Day, Moonless Nights, etc).

Jonnnney

I believe the wastelands are not in the same location as the same as the Grey Erieks

stevenneiman

At first, I was thinking it seemed weird for Robber to be doing alchemy when he might not get to see the results. Thinking it over, I realize that it would be uncharacteristic for him to miss an opportunity to wreak havoc on a battlefield just because he isn't there.

Also, considering how things are going I've got a bad feeling about that chapter quote.

Hey does anyone know where I can find the description of goblinfire?

Inay

I like that we learn a bit more about the matrons-bloodline. What's make them so special and scare the Elder? I wanna know! (One day not right now now)

knockoffnikolai

We know two things: One, the goblins are ruthless, clever, and pragmatic. Two, they are extremely protective of their culture and way of life. They do not permit cultural bleed one way or the other.

Put those together, and I'm thinking the Matron lines descend from interbreeding with orcs. Unspeakably taboo for goblins (re: fact 2), but it gives their bloodlines a decisive advantage over other goblins (re: fact 1).

Ldwllms

Just did a binge reading from book one in like three days.... And I love it. To think I stumbled upon this by mistake and boredom. But then maybe it was just creation guiding my browser. 🙌
I was hoping I wouldn't catch up with the writing and that it would be all done before I got to the end. Sigh. Now I'm having a serious case of blueballs.

oldschoolvillain

You joined at the right time – just a week ago you would have had to wait until Monday for the next update, rather than getting it Friday.

Isa Lumitus

Yes! Pickler gets it! She understands the beauty of automated slaughter.

Somehow, I know what would happen to me if I was stuck in this story... I'd probably accidentally kill myself trying to figure out goblin munitions. Or I'd succeed and get assassinated.

The situation has been only made worse by the addition of yet more demons!

Interlude: Liesse IV

"Rulers must exercise restraint. Every action ripples across Creation, bringing three unintended consequences for every one anticipated."

– Extract from the personal journals of Dread Emperor Terribilis II

"Well, I'm not getting close to that," Archer announced.

Their arrival on the bastion had been somewhat haphazard, Hakram thought, yet the fight had managed to go sharply downhill within moments. Before they even got their bearings fully half a dozen wards had blown up and mages had begun screaming, their flesh boiling and twisting violently. The orc calmly considered the sight even as he rose to his feet, eyes moving from one roiling shape to another. This was not, he decided, sorcery. Or not just that. The effects were too varied. Some rebels were growing spores on their skin, others had bones protruding from their skin in a crown of spikes and yet more had... stranger outcomes. A woman's silk robes turned into a carapace, her the ruby set in her thick golden necklace blinking like an eye. He had seen the likes of this before, in Marchford. When a warband of young Named had picked a fight beyond their understanding, and come so very close to annihilation for that arrogance. The rest of the dots connected themselves without effort. Diabolist had surrendered the demon she'd unleashed there as part of the terms of settlement in Liesse, and the custody of it had been granted to Masego.

Adjutant felt like shivering. It was one thing, he thought, for Catherine to fight fire with oil. Quite another for Hierophant to do the same. The consequences of Masego making a mistake would be graver in many ways. It occurred to him for the first time, then, that they had perhaps learned the recklessness of the woman they followed too well. We are no Calamities, the orc thought. The crucible of our forging was one of desperation, and we have learned both the best and the worst of that. Victory against all odds, victory snatched from the jaws of defeat, could never be gained without a cost. Habit had taught them to disregard that, because behind them more steady hands always swept away the mess. But those steady hands were dying now. If they did not learn to check this recklessness, it would bury them. Or worse, the orc thought as he watched the corruption take hold of the mages. In the distance a sound like a thousand sharpeners sounded and Hierophant returned to Creation in a storm of power. The orc's eyes flicked, and his face grew grim.

The Deoraithe had advanced where the demons once stood before Masego spirited them away, and now that the blind sorcerer had returned he'd come back among them. Tendrils of power washed over the heart of the bowmen, corruption spreading with them. They had traded three great catastrophes for two lesser ones. Hakram seized serenity, let it sink through his mind and wash away doubts and fears. Clarity took the scales from his eyes, and he assessed the situation on the bastion. Corrupted mages, more than a hundred. It was no longer spreading actively, but the taint had taken them whole. Praesi household troops were hesitating, split between the duty to clear out the two Named who'd just dropped down among them and the dim realization that the mages they sought to protect might no longer be on their side. On anyone's. Could he and Archer take care of both forces alone? No, he assessed. Their intention here had been to disrupt, and Hierophant had achieved that without them. They must now contain instead, and the two of them were not enough. Without hesitation, he made his decision.

"Who is in command among you?" he called out to the soldiers.

"Shut your fucking mouth, greens-"

Archer had put an arrow through the roof of the woman's mouth before she was done speaking and was already nocking a second.

"Not the answer we were looking for, my darlings," she smiled.

"Your sorcerers are corrupted," Hakram said. "They must be cleared out before we all die."

Power began to feel the air, so heavy he could taste it, but it was wrong. Like stagnant water.

"Listen to me," Adjutant barked, and his Name flared.

Like quill being dipped in an inkwell, void filled for purpose. It was not Speaking, not quite. He was not Catherine, able to bridge the gap of a Name too young and thin by sheer stubborn will. But he was the Adjutant, and they were soldiers. That mattered, in the eyes of Creation. They turned to him, and there was a glint in their eyes that spoke of orders awaited. Just a glint, but it would be enough.

"About turn," he ordered. "Rapid advance, watch your formation. Strike before they can start rituals."

There was heartbeat of stillness, then the world pivoted. They moved.

"Archer," he began, turning to the other Named.

"Disrupt anything big," she sighed. "I know how this goes. Gods, you take all the fun out of this. It could have been a real messy scrap but you've gone and made it all orderly."

Adjutant hefted up his axe and joined the ranks of the men he'd been about to kill mere moments ago. Sorcery lashed forward and he bared his fangs in answer.

Wekesa had always considered the works of goblins with fond but distinct contempt. Short-lived creatures that they were, their kind always strove to leave behind a legacy of steel and chords to pull curtain over the tragic frailty of their existence. There were occasional sparks of brilliance in the dross, but in the end even the very best of engines only ever managed to match a single trick of the many a properly trained mage had in their arsenal. It was one thing for Amadeus, who had the preoccupations of an entire empire on his shoulders, to find worth in this. Sorcerers truly worth the name were few, and even fewer were willing to have anything to do with the Legions. But for him? The toys of children were rarely worth a second glance, and those that were worth more than that tended to attract... untoward attention. Warlock was confident he could survive the carnage that would follow the reception of a third Red Letter, but the same could not be said for the Empire. Still, for all that the little engines under him were proving to have some use in clearing out the devils they should not warrant anything of the sort.

It was hard to grasp exactly what incurred the wrath of the gnomes, but they'd tolerated the existence of both scorpions and goblin munitions for centuries. Greater efficiency in the employment of both should pass without making any waves being made.

The Fifteenth did swift work of taking the creational side of the gate, and afterwards swept forward through the Breach in an orderly manner. The Warlock's chariot tumbled through the air above the advancing ranks, passing a boundary that few alive would be able to sense. The Hell that awaited him on the side had amusingly mundane scenery, by the standards of such things. Endless yellow sands spread in every direction, shifting dunes and scorching winds. The sky was deep crimson and bereft of any celestial orbs – a hint in the location of this particular Hell among the lay of them. Though his people swore by Below, when they swore at all, this was broadly mistaken. The Hells were, as much as direction could apply to them, somewhat to the left of Creation. Attempting to map them was a fool's errand, of course. Emperors and Empresses and ruined Praes dozens of times attempting to do as much, only for it to become undeniable the labyrinth of hellscapes was constantly shifting. It was a pit of writhing snakes, moving with every heartbeat. It was said that as soon as a mortal mind thought of a Hell that did not exist, it would come into being. Wekesa had never managed to conclusively prove or disprove that adage, but he had reliably established that the Hells were in constant expansion. That had forced him to reconsider some theories as to the nature of Creation.

Wekesa had long suspected that the reason for the existence of angels and devils was that the Gods could not intervene directly in Creation or any of its adjacent realms. Not, like the Book of All Things stated, because a wager forbade it – but because the Gods were Creation. That their power had been made into the world all mortals inhabited and could not be withdrawn without unravelling the entire edifice. Hence the establishment of catspaws defined as opposite, but ultimately serving the same purpose: advancing the experiment. It was beautiful work, he'd thought. Well-deserving of the word divine. Yet if the Gods were invested in the making of Creation, what power fed the expansion of the Hells? The Heavens and their Choirs, after all, did not grow. But neither did they lessen, which was perhaps a hint. Angels had been slain or made to fall in the past, but no Choir had ever been measurably weakened. His current theory was that there was fixed quantity of power behind Heavens and Hells, and that Above had chosen fixed figure where Below had preferred endless mutability – at the risk of thinning the brew. Few devils could withstand even the gaze of an angel, after all.

Ah, so much to study and yet he had to settle these irritating distractions before returning to what mattered. Wekesa traced a handful of runes and a line of darkness scythed through the first few ranks of the devils clustering before the Breach, allowing the struggling legionaries to establish a solid foothold. The chariot rose into the sky again and his gaze swept to the distance. The devils here seemed endless in number, though it was not so. Still, two dozen columns slithering along the dunes like giant snakes of soldiers were trudging forward towards the Breach. Tedious, this. Warlock could have begun the work of slaughtering them, but he could not spare such expense of power if he was to build upon the work of the Sahelian girl. Crafting a lasting effect from scratch was already stretching the limits of what he was capable of doing without burning himself out. Much as he disliked the thought, he would have to rely on the Squire's men. His nose wrinkled in distaste even as he guided the chariot downwards. Wheels spun wildly against sand, splashing yellow hands around as he reined in the devil-horses, and Wekesa lightly leapt down to the ground.

Eyes sweeping from someone of high enough rank to be worth addressing, he found a woman with the markings of a Senior Tribune on her shoulders. It would do.

"You," he drawled. "I'll need a space cleared to work. A circle with a diameter of seventy feet, and add another dozen around that where your soldiery is not to step. Precision will be required."

The woman paled.

"Sir, this may take time," she said. "Resistance is proving stiff, even with your help, and the engines must-"

"I've not interest in the practicalities," Wekesa said flatly. "See it done. Now. I'll mark the boundaries visibly as a courtesy to your general, but do not expect any legionaries crossing it to survive the experience."

He truly did miss working with the likes of Ranker and Istrid. Their officers knew better than to question his orders. Warlock had no taste for grovelling, but he did believe that the occasional bout of terror would do a great deal to temper these youngbloods. As promised, he began by setting a boundary: dots of red light formed around the area he claimed for his own, legionaries hastily getting out of the way before consequences could ensure. With that dealt with, the true casting could begin. First, an outer ward. Circular, diameter of seventy-three feet. Little more than a filter to prevent the elements touching his work. Wekesa snapped his wrist and three red flames formed, burning bright, and began moving. His brow created and guided them with his mind, burning the sand to glass in the form of a perfect circle. Even as they began elaborating on that initial pattern he stepped forward into the circle and knelt in the centre, every lesser rune added as he moved leading towards him. The Warlock closed his eyes and let time ebb away. The flames wove in intricate patterns across the sand, arrays and runes he bolstered by drawing foci from his treasury dimension.

Amethysts taken from lifeless grounds first, clarity touched by death to prevent the bleed from cascading. Chalcedony from a riverbed, to nurture the currents of sorcery without them struggling against each other. Branches of still-living alder for precision, lead ripped straight from the earth to draw the impurities. Lesser reagents, but he did not dare bring materials with inherent properties into this ritual. Aspect sorcery was difficult enough to shape without additional variables being brought into the formula. How long the work took him, he did not know. But eventually his eyes opened and around him an intricate series of interlocking runic arrays marked the grounds of Hell. Wekesa looked for imperfections carefully, ignoring the sound of fighting ahead and to the sides. None he could see, and he forced himself to go over the calculations one last time. He'd done workings of a similar nature in the past, but never one exactly the same. It would suffice, he decided. Leave him all but burned out, but not so much he was unable to defend himself if needed.

"I do apologize," he murmured, words meant for the Sahelian girl who would never hear them. "It is beautiful work, truly, and to meddle with it is unseemly. But you have made yourself an obstacle."

Imbricate, his mind spoke, and the aspect shivered across this realm. Closing the Greater Breach was, of course, impossible. The ritual lit up around him, lights to blind all the world, and the Sovereign of the Red Skies turned his will on the span of the gate. Usurpation had even been the essence of sorcery. What could not be closed could be redirected. Power drained out of him at an alarming rate, but Wekesa seized that thin boundary and attached the work of his aspect to it. What had once been a Breach leading to Creation now led to another Hell, and his veins burned with the effort of weaving that addition into the heart of the Hellgate's nature. If he did any less, he was only delaying the inevitable. Panting softly, the greatest living sorcerer of the age rose to his feet. It was done. The sound of the panicking legionaries washed over him, the buzz of flies. Wekesa looked upon them, wondering at the numbers. A few hundred, a whole thousand? There were even a few Deoraithe he could see. Without the Breach at their back, the soldiers were already being surrounded. They were stranded, after all.

He was not.

Dusting off his robes, the Warlock stepped onto his chariot and set the horses to flight. He was not inclined to linger here, and it would be a long way back to Creation.

Ranker's people had a saying, about miracles: sudden dawns blind. It lost nearly all its nuances when translated in Lower Miezan. The usual word for dawn in goblintongue meant first-light-afterdark, but in this case the implied context was Light instead of light and raider-night for dark. Light for the the searing hatred wielded by heroes, and the meaning of strife that had been associated with the many defeats of the Legions since the subjugation of the Tribes. It was a reminder that sudden upsets always fucked goblinkind, one way or another. Like most goblin sayings, it had a completely different meaning in matrontongue. The word for sudden was narrow-vision-of-swiftness and for blind to-miss-in-wilful-ignorance. Matrons were not warned of the harsh hand of the Heavens. They were warned of seeking momentary salvation at the price of a later great cost. The old Marshal watched the Second Battle of Liesse unfold around her, and found that both meanings had grounds.

The explosion on the bastion must have been the work of the Hierophant, because that first sorcerous detonation had been followed by a shitshow of demonic corruption. There was a vicious fight going up there even as she looked, between two of the Woe and the handiwork of another. If those two hadn't been up there... She turned to Kolo, her balding and ever-nervous Senior Mage.

"You're sure the control array still stands?" she asked, for the third time.

The Soninke licked his lips and nodded.

"It's not in use, the mages are no longer guiding the wights – they must be going according to the last instructions – but it still exists," he confirmed. "They could take back control if they tried."

Burning, bloody Hells, they were lucky that demon-juice tended to turn the affected dumb if the demon wasn't around to guide them. But there was still potential disaster looming. If the corrupted mages spread that corruption down the sorcery that allowed them to control the undead... That was the kind of catastrophe that broke cities. Kingdoms, even, if it wasn't checked in time. And there was no telling if one of the rebels would wise up before they were cleared out and start pissing in the proverbial pond. And that wasn't even the worst of it.

"Scry him again," Ranker said. "Brute force it if you have to."

"Ma'am, we could have half our mage lines behind that ritual it would change nothing," Kolo said. "Trying to touch the Hierophant is... He must have something of Summer inside him, because even looking too close evaporates the entire scrying bowl."

He grimaced.

"Including the stone, ma'am," he added. "The damned stone."

Wekesa's only son had emerged from whatever sorcerous madness he'd been up to right in the middle of the advancing Deoraithe bowmen. That had been bad enough – at least a hundred had died just for being in the wrong place when he returned – but the poison in the wine had been the fact he'd apparently come back in the middle of a godsdamned storm of corruption. It'd splashed all over half a dozen companies. The boy had immediately started scouring the area with flame, which was the right decision to make. But it also meant he was now torching his way through the middle of the first wave troops headed to prop up the centre, killing dozens with every heartbeat. The infantry coming behind the archers had no idea he was killing only corrupted – they thought this was treachery, and now the entire front had gone to shit. Kegan was barking up about betrayal over the scrying links, and even after being told what was truly happening she was threatening to pull back her troops entirely. Ranker had told her if she did there'd be a court-martial and execution before the day was over, but there would be no putting this fruit back on the branch. Daoine was going to holler for blood after this, take it all the way up to the court if they had to. And we lost too many men today to be able to afford a rebellion in the north. All that, and the most dangerous question had yet to be asked.

Had the Hierophant been corrupted?

Ranker had seen him emerge in a godsdamned whirlpool of demon essence. That wasn't something she could just ignore. A Named that obviously powerful with a demon whispering in his ears was not something the Empire could afford. Or Calernia, for that fucking matter. There was a very real chance the boy would need to be put down, and now. But she didn't have the means to carry out that decision if she made it, and what would come of it was... Warlock would kill them all, even if they were right. Not even Black would be able to stay his hand, not when it came to family. And Foundling had made Hierophant one of her little band of roving disasters. The goblin had it on good authority the girl had lost her shit over one of her legates getting torched by the Summer Court so badly it had broken half of Old Dormer. What kind of a tantrum would she throw over losing a Named?

The only saving grace in this entire blunder of a battle was that Wekesa had come through and the Hellgate was closed. Or something like that, anyway. Her mage lines couldn't give her a straight answer, but they agreed that the way the gate had become see-through meant nothing would come out of it anymore. The troops that had gone through had yet to come back, though, and Ranker suspected they would never. She'd ordered for the Fifteenth to prop up the centre anyway and they were on the move – the sight of those legionaries marching towards her people had gone a long way in making Kegan shut up. With the wights rudderless, for now, the flanks were holding steady. This battle, the Marshal thought, could still be turned around. If they were careful and lucky and there were no great upsets. The old goblin's eyes turned to the Hierophant standing alone in a storm of flame, surrounded by charred corpses, and she whet her lips. Her Senior Mage stayed at her side in silence, knowing better than to speak.

There was a decision to be made, and Marshal Ranker made it.

Awesome first Friday chapter!

Shequi

I expected Wekesa to abandon the Legionaires inside the opened Hell. I didn't quite expect how he'd manage to neutralise the gate, though. The unattached gate outside Liesse is going to be a nightmare to deal with though; a gate like that is bound to be easier to reopen at a critical juncture.

What Ranker's decision to do with Masego is is a much more critical matter. Masego may make the point moot, one way or another.

Big Brother

I'm gonna say, judging by the fact that Masego has had a good long while to examine the Beast of Corruption as well as the drop of Corruption in himself, he's able to use his Name to neutralize the effect it has on himself, but not others yet. He is, after all, the Heiropgant, Revealer of Secrets. And what greater secret than Immunity to Demonic Influence at the moment?

werafdsaew

There's a simple narrative reason why Hierophant is not corrupted: he is part of the Woes, and the Woes are the chosen successor to the Calamities, the same way that the Squire is the chosen successor to the Black Knight. So until the succession happens, and the Calamities are replaced by the Woes, they have plot armor and cannot be weakened.

JackbeThimble

werafdsaew Demons don't care about Plot Armor.

Big Brother

What the heck is that first word? Some kind of acronym?

Cotillion

Demon of Corruption got him, too. See, author told us this shit was dangerous

overtcasts

underrated

goliath1303

Big Brother.... I would guess that it's probably either that, or it's the name of the person that JackbeThimble was replying to. 😊

warriormonk19

Wekesa did abandon the Legionaires inside the opened Hell. I agree with you though that the unattached gate may still play a role in the unfolding story. Perhaps Warlock, Hierophant, or even Catherine could make use of it to more easily rip portals to Arcadia or other planes? It'll be interesting to see the aftermath of this battle.

warriormonk19

On the second read, I realize that you do indeed know that Warlock abandoned the Legionaires. My bad. Damn, Masego is kind of clueless, but Warlock is straight up vicious.

edrey

ranker decision should be something like scrying someone close of masego to tell him that he should take the control of the undeads and give it to her tribune, it's a gamble but if she doesn't the corrupted mages would do it and all goes downhill , and moreover she doesn't have the means to kill masego even if she wants to.

JC

It seems there's still some sort of saving grace in the methods of the Calamities, after all. Poor 15th though. Getting trapped in a Hell like that.

I was worried that the story would prop up the Woe's methods as a bastion of reason for far too long, but here we see some of those consequences made clear. I do hope Masego makes it out ok.

Decius

Poor 15h? Poor hells, getting trapped in there with the 15th.

Gunslinger

Holy shit that ending is ominous. Hopefully it's something like trust Masego.

Also fascinating character that he may be I've grown to truly despise Warlock. Such an arrogant prick.

Lastly three chapters a week can't be easy for the author. If you have the capacity any support on the authors patreon would go a long way to assist them patreon.com/user?u=3523924

Gunslinger

<https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>

oldschoolvillain

Ranker can't afford not to trust masego – it'd be an easy matter to have a goblin slip a knife between his ribs or have a Watch snipe him from two hundred yards, but the consequence would be absolute obliteration from Warlock and Catherine. And Ranker kind of needs to be alive and have an army to deal with Procer.

lennymaster

I very much doubt that anyone but Archer could snipe Masego from any distance. And not just because of a Name, Names do not die to one-shot attacks, even from other Named. The combination of Archer and her inherently magical arrows might do it, though I doubt it would be more than a crippling wound, not an outright deadly one.

And no Named worth their salt would ever allow a Goblin within stabbing distance without being aware of their presence.

B

@lennymaster

> Names do not die to one-shot attacks, even from other Named.

Not true. The Exiled Prince got himself good and dead from a single crossbow bolt from an unnamed. It's unusual for sure, but it can definitely happen.

Mental Mouse

> The Exiled Prince got himself good and dead from a single crossbow bolt from an unnamed.

Not exactly – the Exiled Prince was set up by the Wandering Bard to expose himself stupidly – that enabled Cat to kill him through her troops.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

It can happen, sure, but it's not the "easy matter" the OP claims.

Valkyria

Warlock really is a prick. He doesn't care for people at all, they are just things for him... sending thousands of them to death.

I mean, maybe it was necessary... but he does not care. As if being a Named would alter him to non-human. I mean, he's calling Cat an abomination, so he somewhere is considering himself human, right? And yet it's like he is not connected to the species more than to a distant relative. He might be an interesting character and adds to the story very well, but I can't really get myself to like him. Unlike Hierophant who is similar to his father, but yet has some traits that just make him funny and likable. The more screentime Warlock gets, the more irritating I come find him.

Mike E.

And it also seems like he has grabbed the attention of the gnomes twice, if that is what the Red Letters refer too, so his experiments have crossed the border of being something gnomes would eradicate from human knowledge at any cost. (He infers he could survive the wrath of the gnomes if he crossed the line again, but the collateral damage to the rest of the world would be insane).

goliath1303

I just want to expand on what @oldschoolvillain said. The Empire has received 3 Red Letters since its inception, none of which were because of Warlock. The first one they received was sent during the reign of a previous Dread Emperor in response to some sort of farming machine. The second was, obviously, received relatively recently (If I had one critique of this story, it would be that it can be hard at times to know what the time scale is. Sometimes what I think is a months, or even weeks, is actually years. It also happens the opposite direction, just less often.) and it was sent due to a goblin tribes experimentation with some form of alchemy (I believe it was alchemy, but I'm not 100% sure though. I do know the rest is correct. Black going to deal with that is what led Catherine to join Rest Company at the War College. When he got there though the other Matrons had eradicated that tribe already.).

To me, it doesn't seem like offensive tech bothers them. They don't mind if humans get better at killing each other, what seems to bother Gnomes is technology and inventions that could propel society forward, as well as drive population growth significantly. If I'm remembering correctly, we don't know what the purpose of the Goblins research was, but the farming machine could have been a precursor to an industrial revolution of some kind. I think that the Gnomes don't want any more "Real" players in world politics. Remember, when Black heard about that letter, called the Empire something like "a provincial backwater" and talked about the "real world powers". I'm assuming that means the Gnomes, Dwarves, Elves on the other continent, and maybe some other, currently unknown to us, societies.

oldschoolvillain

To Mike E. – Warlock wasn't the one receiving the Red Letters, the Empire was. One for some farming machine a few emperors back, one recently for messing with 'powders' if I recall correctly. Warlock is just comfortably certain that he can ride out the cataclysm that comes with angering the Gnomes by hopping away to a pocket dimension with Masego and Tikoloshe. Probably right, too, considering his aspects.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Who says you're supposed to like him?

Valkyria

Well nobody. But comments are for stating opinions, right?

Engineer

Just focus on destroying the control array. That's the main point of contention at the moment if Masego doesn't do it during his "rampage". But don't move on a Named, especially one who has a "whirlpool of corruption" at his behest. There's no way that does not end in catastrophic failure for all parties involved.

Mr. Nobody

Looks like our dear Ranker will be the next general to be killed. Maybe an arrow through her neck by Archer. She won't even survive to actually manage to kill Masego, let alone see the reaction of Warlock or Catherine for that matter.

Engineer

All of the commanders of the Conquest are dying by the dozen. Ranker should consider getting life insurance and making me the beneficiary.

Hahahha

Hah! Warlock just signed his death warrant, hahahaha ... ha... haha ... ha. He always was the closest of the calamities to the old breed of idiot praesi villains and this move really illustrates it.

Speaking of warlock, has anyone else found him singularly unimpressive as a "great mage" so far?

Engineer

Not me.

Though the impact was probably lost in the text I got the distinct impression that redirecting a permanent portal into Creation from one of the Hells, a portal keyed on a fundamental level to the magical signature of a NAMED Diabolist, is a feat worthy of a capital S Sorcerer.

I agree though that The Warlock will not see the end of the Second Battle of Liesse, the way things are going now. For one he and Cat share no love for one another and he did just screw over a sizable portion of Cat's legion. There's no way Squire's Name and Mantle can let that slight go unanswered and remember it was Warlock who backed down during their standoff in the tent.

If the Warlock does not meet his end here, he and Cat are destined to clash. And only one those two have a power greater than any Name: Plot Armour.

TeK

I for once do not think< that they will clash. First of all, judging by how the story goes, Cat will have much bigger problems to deal with after Liesse. Second, it will take some time to fly from hells to creation, and noone really knows, how the gates were closed, and, honestly, thousand casualties ain't that big of a price for that. Just containing an open portal would cost much more, not to mention that the whole battle could be lost beacuse of it. So in conclusion, Cat will be to busy, to ask, what had happened in Hell, and Warlock will not see fit to tell her first.

IDKWhoitis

Warlock isn't impressive in the amount of absolute power he can unleash. For example, we see that his predecessor had a much higher output. However, to gain power, there are costs, some short term (a soul or bargaining chip) some long term (having too many pacts or modifications to the Soul can't be good for your health).

Warlock is impressive in the sense that he is able to do huge things without the large power reserves of those who came before him. He understands magic and knows the in and outs of a wide breath of magic schools. Few non-Named mages could hope to understand a single school of magic, or be able to glance at a runic array and derive it's use and failure points. Hell, even the Hedge Wizard had trouble truly deciphering what Warlock was doing while he was murdering her one spell of at a time.

Warlock is in a league of his own due to the wide and deep scale of knowledge he holds, and the ability to pull all of those tricks off without some blood sacrifices or expending himself completely.

Also, I don't think he's dead, he is just "MIA" for the foreseeable future.

heh

Dead in the sense of "Cathrine gonna end that fool"

Reveen

One of the best ways to end up remembered as a great general, scientist, sorcerer is to become famous for one thing no one else is doing, steal credit for whatever you can, and make sure there's no one around to say otherwise.

Also, buying into your own hype helps.

'Ladi Williams

"they were stranded afterall.

He wasn't"

I can't bliv he left then behind... But then I guess it's in character for him to not give a shit about mere legionaries. Squire is going to have his heart for dinner when she's done with Diabolist.

Masego had better not die or ranker (tho I care very much less about her).

Can't wait for the next interlude tho I know the writer is going to keep us hanging and switch to cat and black. 😞

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What's not to believe? What other outcome did you expect?

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

agumentic

I wonder if those stranded legionaries will come back in some way. Heh, maybe Triumphant's gonna add them to her army.

Shoddi

Triumphant: Oh, how lovely! Company come to call. Quickly, my minions, and fetch them. It's been so long since I've heard news from outside.

Letouriste

Warlock that shitbag grrr.

He could at least allow a large part of the legionaries to go back through the gate before activating the ritual: /

masego is totally badass in this chapter^^

I really hope ranker don't screw up and follow her fears here. the empire can't have a marshal dying now, that would be disastrous. her concerns are sane but this is a matter better left to a Named to judge... or at least she could wait for him to do something damning. i know that would be too late but she can't kill him easily anyway

Draeysine

Man what a read. Ranker may just have to take that L where Masego is concerned, his death above all others would unite Warlock AND Cat for wanton destruction.

As for Warlocks actions... justified, though not showing any hint of remorse makes it look worse than it is. I actually like Warlock a lot even if he is prickish I think he is doing what he can with the cards dealt with. Legionaries to him are replaceable, and sacrificing a few like that might have ensured the time it took to make his spell. It be no different in his eyes than that many legionaries dying to hold a position until reinforcements arrived.

I doubt he did it out of malice it was pure calculation.

And also Hakram definitely suspects or knows Masego is corrupted (albeit slightly) now. Good on him for realizing the pros and cons to the Woes standard "fuck it all up no regrets " policy.

Thrillho

What an absolute clusterfuck of a battle. I mean, the campaign against Summer was bad. Dealing with a well-aged demon of Corruption was probably nightmare fuel.

But this is on a whole 'nother scale. Multiple, /multiple/ seasoned veteran generals and commanders getting torn to shreds, both Black /and/ Warlock pushed to their limits, severe fallout from dealing with /multiple/ demons of various types resulting in heavy friendly fire. A permanent rift in Creation, the likes of which only the Calernian version of the Lich King could open previously.

New siege engines being developed, the face of military politics being seriously altered, I don't even want to think of the butchers bill on this one.

The Second Battle of Liesse is absolutely insane, and I'm on the edge of my seat to see how it ends. It's going to take a /long/ time for our protags to recover from this one.

Letouriste

WAIT A SEC! Pickler was in the hell side of the gate no? Her engines should have been there:o

Is there any named character exept Jwahir left there?

Maybe the hellhound sensed something and made some officers coming back?

Anyway,that should have been nauk job by juniper admission...I can't believe i'm glad he has been burned:o

We don't know much about jwahir.is she the woman kicking nauk in the first battle of the rat company? probably not given she was probably not even sergeant.

oldschoolvillain

No, Warlock was studying Pickler's engines before he crossed the boundary. The scorpions and seeders were meant to open the path, not breach the gate itself.

oldschoolvillain

There's a lot of discussion about how this chapter ended Warlock as a likeable character, but just gotta remind people – the soldiers who went into that hell gate knew it was a one-way trip. They were the sacrifice to save the battle and the several legions still fighting. Could Warlock have saved them? Frankly, no, he couldn't have. The time it would have taken for almost a thousand troops to retreat back through the hell gate would have obliterated Warlocks carefully set ritual, thus ending any chance of redirecting the hell gate and rendering the entire thing moot. In sacrificing a thousand he immediately saved thousands more and, in the long term, probably millions, because now there's no longer a hell gate feeding straight into Callow. Which, frankly, is hella impressive, because Warlock just took the ritual that Diabolist spent years preparing for and fuelled with millions of souls and pretty much turned it inside out in, what, an hour? Less? Screw the Red Skies – this wasn't flashy blow-it-all-up magic, but this was the most impressive magical feat we've seen in the story, to me, perhaps short of Diabolist actually creating the Hellgate

letouriste

well everyone already known that guy was horrible.this chapter just reinforced the idea^^ this is not the action he did which is revolting,more like the way he did that.

oldschoolvillain

*shrug* One thing that everyone might have been forgetting about the Sovereign of Red Skies, then, is that he's a Villain. I'd pin him as either Lawful Evil or Neutral Evil, but he's still Evil. And has always been, I think, the closest of the Calamities to what exactly that actually means. He is powerful, and holds the accompanying responsibility, but ultimately his only motivation is progressing his own agenda. No morals are required and, in some cases – such as this one – could cause a hesitation at a crucial moment and ruin everything the 15th spent their lives buying. For that reason, I actually really like Warlock.

Decius

There's really only a couple ways this can go.

Black orders Heirophant destroyed for being corrupted. Warlock kills Black. Scribe kills Warlock. The half-gateway in creation is connected to the fae realms.

Diabloist tries to surrender/ to the new Black Knight, but Kat blames her for the loyalty cascade and Killian uses her in a blood sacrifice to purge the corruption from Heirophant. If that kills Wekasa, Killian becomes Thaumaturge.doe Kat fails to get the personal loyalty of the Legions of Terror as a whole, and cannot use them to purge the wasteland nobility. She instead uses their institutional loyalty to ready them against Procer, and the wasteland nobility takes advantage of their absence to depose Empress. While they are fighting over succession, Procer invades Callow, does a lot of damage, and is barely driven back.

Kat then uses the Callowan army, blooded on two wars, to kill everyone in the Wasteland trying to claim the tower, and finally institutes some moderate reforms that prevent imperial governors from having the Stupid Greedy alignment, like she was trying to do at the beginning.

Reveen

Or her purge of the wasteland escalates into mass genocide and a multi-year quagmire, Callow gets sick of the constant war and starts rebelling again, and the hellgate slowly unravels everything around.

I fully expect this story to end with Cat climbing the tower to sit on the throne to rule over a nation sized graveyard.

letouriste

nobody will die beside maybe ranker.i doubt hierophant would die like that.black has a sure way to kill warlock (said in the second book when cat and masego talked about the bomb in his hair).

the rest is impossible,that doesn't fit to their personality and the narrative so far

satoshikyu

It's like he started off with the chapter we just read and then threw random ideas at the wall to see what might stick. Nothing beyond the first sentence has even the slightest basis in the story we're reading. Not one reasonable thing in the whole comment. That's almost impressive.

'Ladi Williams

I totally agree with you. Started well and then just took a major right turn.

Decius

Black has a way to kill Warlock.
Warlock has a way to kill Black.

Somehow I don't think that even Black would consider that Heiropant might be corrupted and instantly implement his plan to kill Warlock. But I can believe that Warlock would see the corruption, know that Black isn't going to let his son live, and implement his plan.

Scribe kills whoever kills Black- that's obvious. What happens to her afterwards is as unclear as her current location.

The Legions are already as a whole not loyal to Cat. Without Black giving orders the nobles would be able to convince them that the purges are treasonous and that being loyal to the Empress is better, and the Empress thinks she can manage the nobles well enough and can't order summary executions of them without losing political power.

Procer is already established as being ready to invade Callow.

There are other ways it could turn out, but the biggest way is that either Heiropant isn't corrupted , or Black never suspects that he is.

Mental Mouse

Consider that Masego's "droplet" of corruption was probably why Warlock hesitated when he was vetting his son after Marchford. Implied was a quick back-channel discussion: "Just how well contained is that, son?" "Look at the bindings, I've got this one, Dad." "Okay, but you know what happens if that gets loose".

Letouriste

No you don't understand: black had a SURE way to kill warlock. they devised that together in case he get too destructive and crazy. you can't kill a Named as experienced as black easily but the reverse is possible because of their agreement.

The contingency against black is in the hands of Assassin (said in the end of arc 2 too).

The rest is just conjectures. Scribe lack the raw power to kill Warlock anyway. i don't think she can.

Also, these two guys are really really close, i think black is more important than masego to Warlock eyes... not by much probably and i can be wrong

nipi

I was expecting the gate to be shifted to another plane. Meh! Close enough.

And Im guessing the gnomes aren't all that concerned with military applications of technology. Sure you're a bit better at killing people but the amount of killers you can field stays about the same both in absolute numbers and as a percentage of your population. Make something to increase productiveness on the other hand and... And the greater concern might be that it allows you to have more researchers too.

Alex Walters

Save that if you grind far enough up the military tree you can casually smush people who didn't grind up the tree even if they have say 100000x the troop numbers.

The Gnomes have apparently LITERALLY wiped nations off the map from above without anyone being able to so much as target the attacker.

That sounds an awful lot like high altitude bombers with nuke explosives.

nipi

Im guessing there wasnt enough time to position the siege engines to bombard Hell from the other side of the gate. Now when will Cat get her chance to make Hell freeze over?

Decius

If they launched goblinfire through the portals, could they set Hell on fire?

Cicero

looks like gamble of the empress failed in the worst possible, multiple of the legions have received heavy losses, at least 2 of her generals are dead and the super weapon she aimed to gain will very likely be useless

letouriste

yep,i don't see how she could gain from all that mess.still,this is probably worth the death of the trueblood and her rival.a war with procer will be hard,a war with procer with strong enemies in her side is doomed.

oldschoolvillain

Wekesa did mention that he can mostly replicate the effects, given six or so months. And the purpose of Magicka enabling Heiress' weapon was Terror. Procer doesn't know that the ritual can only be used by a Diabolist, so the intent behind it works perfectly for Marluxia until Wekesa can get a Hellgate gun of their own working.

oldschoolvillain

First, please see my comment to Legitimate above. And second, remember that this is only, four legions? This is still only a fraction of the army that Malicia could call up in case of a proceran invasion. There are about ten others sitting elsewhere that can't be here for various reasons, mostly distance, I suspect.

lennymaster

Remember that you also have to keep some troops back. She can not put all her available troops at the border and leave the Preasi and Callowan coast and heartland undefended. Raiding armies, shipfleets, other empires, like the Titanomachy, Levant and the Free Cities still exist, and an empire distracted by war makes for a great raiding target, even when, often especially when far away. And in this world there are portals, disidents with magic that could disrupt or directly attack for a variety of reasons piece and order in the country.

All that means, is that she will have to keep several legions each for Callow and Preasi back to ensure her citizens safety (yes, even Evil empires have to do that for arms, food and troop production purposes) as well as secure peace, order and last but not least supply lines.

So say three to four Legions just to be able to respond to several incidents at the same time for Preasi and Callow each out of sixteen as the last I heard makes eight to ten of which three maybe four, depending on the fifteenth's losses are gutted leaves four to five intact legions.

Five thousand men each leaves twenty, twentyfive thousand men to secure an entire border, on which the enemy as the attacker can focus all of their not to defense committed army at one point.

Add in that it has been stated several times that Procer has a significantly larger population than Preas AND Callow and thus a, while less well trained and equipped but far larger army, makes for a bleak result.

kdreyes09

Man I miss Cathy the murder baby

letouriste

probably next chapter^^

Reveen

Oh my god. This is delicious! Finally things start going to shit for the Empire. I just hope it sticks.

oldschoolvillain

. . . Uh, what? You realize that the Empire is the closest thing we currently have to good guys in this story, right? Given the protagonist, at least? Things going to shit for the Empire means things going to shit for Cat.

Reveen

Hehe yeah.

Let me put it this way, the concept of good guys bad guys is basically moot in this story. The conflict as it is now is just a pissing match between different forms of awful, and I don't see the appeal of choosing sides.

I don't care who wins the football game, I just want to see the riot that will inevitably happen either way.

Decius

The Empire is pretty clearly Evil. The protagonist has been Evil at least since the time that she raised herself as a mostly undead puppet and told a hero to start a war.

The story is just about Evil protagonists.

oldschoolvillain

Oh, absolutely. It's just that in the crap sack world we're seeing, Good and Evil aren't always equal to Nice and Horrible. The 'Good' nations are equally willing to engage in murder and duplicity as the Dread Empress Malicia, Long May She Reign, they just desperately cling to a veneer of 'goodness' to justify their actions.

Reveen

The Good nations don't actually need to cling to a veneer of goodness. Because while, barring magic nonsense, they are no worse than real world pre-modern nations, maybe even a little better, Praes in it's entirety is self-evidently worse. We have in one corner a bunch of crazy, magic spewing lunatics, on the other the "practical" side of a proto-fascist, monomaniacal war machine based on personality cult that exists for no other reason than endless grinding war. Both of them are pretty much identical in their nihilism and naked power worship, and the world would be better off if they wiped eachother out.

So Good doesn't even need to be really good, it can be as unfair and hierarchical as it wants, it just needs to point to whats happening to Callow and say "Doesn't that look like the lesser evil to you?"

vuthuha912

It is a little wrong to say that the Practical side is fascist since they don't blame their shortcoming on racial minorities. They don't even blame the Callow for their problem with food. They invade for the grain of Callow and keep it as a colony so their people can have a secure food source

=> British Empire or America would be closer to Praes

War is inevitable due to the lack of diplomatic options which hinges on the nature of the Good and Evil conflict and on the nature of Praes itself (the stupid Evil). Praes has been preparing for war because it is impossible to solve the issue with diplomacy. If this is the real world then we have several non-violent options on how to proceed. Yet, the nature of Creation demand that both sides fight each other. And it is not like Praes doesn't try other options: they enact the whole 'Art of War' on Procer: bribery, political assassinations, proxy war, espionage, etc. It is impressive how closely they follow the methods mentioned in the book. (even when I think that it is risky just fanning the civil war instead of backing some pacifists or some cowardly princes, I do understand the importance of bleeding the enemies' resources before the war)

Praes is fighting for survival – long-term survival. Of course, they should be prepared. War is a serious business and every preparation gives them a higher chance of surviving. Procer leadership is treating this way too lightly. A political war to unite the nation sounds nice but you should only fight when: A – you think you can win and B – you are fighting for survival. The country just went through a civil war, they have a short amount of time for preparation and they are still plagued by infighting. It is not a great condition to be fighting another enemy. At least wait a few more years for the food production to recover and the fighting population replenishes.

Honestly, it would have been a lot better if Black just purge the nobility. They are the one who is actively sabotaging the country. Their duplicity makes it nigh-impossible to trust Praes thus closing the door for trade. Their shortsightedness compels them to always shoot their side on the foot. Their extravagance squanders the country's much need resources. Their entire philosophy is living for the moment and living for yourself. If a lasting change can happen, he needs to change the culture of Praes.

I usually visualize Black plans for Praes as planting trees (fitting for a sone of a farmer). He prepares the 'ground' first – the factor that contributes to the shortsightedness of Praes is the sense of no matter what you do, you are never going to end well so might as well bring everyone down with you (the fairy tales of Praes is mostly tragedy). Thus, to remedy this condition, he decides to provide them with a reliable food source and show them that long-term victory can be achieved. The Conquest killed 2 birds with one stone. The fertilizer is the military reforms and the orphanages. These institutions are spreading long-term thinking throughout the lower and middle classes. It also provides them with a social ladder so they can grow.

His reforms have planted the seed but the force that is trying to stomp on it is still there. He thinks that internal threats can be dealt with through political maneuvering a.k.a Malicia while the external force is the war with Procer which he will handle. He has no idea that Malicia falls in love with the game and she has set a fire to his entire garden.

Alivaril

With the gargantuan casualties resulting from this unholy mess, I'm no longer willing to give Dread Empress Malicia the benefit of the doubt. As far as I can tell, her plan with the hellgate superweapon involves the promise of mutually assured destruction and/or devastation should Procer invade. Toward this end, she spent assets on cultivating an enemy, allowed that enemy to grow in power, and is currently undergoing heavy casualties in the battle to claim said weapon.

Certainly, she's devastating many of the remaining Truebloods/ Nobles in the process, but the Legions are also experiencing horrifying losses. The Calamities may very well cease to be a viable group, Cat is going to be pissed to no end if a previous offscreen conversation didn't give her excellent justifications, diplomatic relations are poor, diplomatic relations will turn into open rebellion if the Watch-Mass continues to be used as a power source, Masego may have been corrupted, and Cat's transition into what appears to be a ruling name may very well undo Malicia's Rule-assisted control over every member of the Legions of Terror. Admittedly, Cat's transition may have been part of the plan; I can definitely see Malicia assigning agents to spread the nickname "The Black Queen" with appropriately associated stories.

All that may be relatively fine if blood, steel, and magic were the only variables. Malicia intends to rule forever and a weapon capable of (theoretically) indefinitely preventing invasion is invaluable with that in mind. But although it's rationalized literally to Hell and back, this is not the sort of plan that Creation respects, historically speaking. This is asking, practically begging, for the Heroes to show up, godmode their way through all attackers, and destroy the weapon in the nick of time. In fact, even a sneaky hero like Thief could gum up the whole works, no godmode required. WMG: And that's assuming one of the portals doesn't open up to whatever Hell Dread Empress Triumphant (May She Never Return) may have conquered. Those sorts of unintended consequences seem like something Creation would love to force.

This may pay off in the end, but I'm leaning heavily against that being a likely possibility anymore.

Kel the Seer

So, are we taking bets on whether Triumphant or the Dead King will be the one as the using that redirected Hellgate as a staging point at a highly inopportune moment in the future? While Triumphant would resonate better with the foreshadowing, I'd say the Dead King would love a bypass around Procer. If it didn't open to a realm he already controls he will definitely want to find it once he hears of its existence. Beck, that possibility alone may end up being Procer's cassus belli.

Draconius Sinister

Why not both? I'm sure we'd love a three way war cropping up right in the middle of Procer's invasion. Gives us a reason to root for Cordelia instead of against her, and opens up Cat's options for crowns to give to the Fae Prince.

Reveen

Why do we need a reason to root for Cordelia? Wanting to kill every Praesi in the world is reason enough.

Draco

This story is so good I finally figured out what an rss feed is so I could get updates. Gods below, I can't wait to find out what Cat and Black are up to

Keyen

Man, it's quite easy to remember, it's only the Monday/wednesday/friday, everytime. I don't think he missed a chapter in quite a long time. You don't need RSS to remember that^^

Letouriste

The hour isn't also pretty consistent.he always post around 6 a.m for me

Draconius Sinister

Uhhhh... Aisha's with Juniper, right? She isn't the poor Tribune stuck commanding those poor fools back in the Hells, is she?

aran

Starting to have the sneaking suspicion that Wekesa is actually kind of an asshole.

But hey. Villain.

Chapter 63: Bridge

"A dilemma is no such thing if it is flammable."

– Dread Empress Sulphurous, the 'Technically Correct'

Liesse looked like it'd spent a few years rolling around in nightmare juice, but at least the result's old floor plan still more or less held up. I'd taken this city once before, and though this time I'd come knocking without an army at my back I still knew my way around. The new occupants, though, were something of a problem. For one they were all dead, which was not a desired quality in the inhabitants of what had been one of the most thriving cities in Callow, and the entire place had gone to Hell. Literally. Akua's idea of a garrison apparently involved a generous helping of devils let loose in the streets. Which, hey, not a problem if I stuck to the rooftops. But the devils with wings were, and the penumbra that hung over Liesse like a veil wasn't quite enough on its own to hide me. The inevitable long periods spent huddled under whatever was available to hide allowed me to stew in anger that was growing sharper by the moment. It wasn't enough that Diabolist had slaughtered everyone within these walls, the population of the second largest city in Callow and all the refugees from the south that'd been fleeing the fae. No, she had to wreck the actual city as well.

There would be no salvaging Liesse after this. Setting aside the madwoman's little helpers currently having the run of the streets, the entire place had been turned into some fucking Praesi ritual tool. There were runes everywhere, wards I could feel buzzing when I came too close and even the lay of the streets had been fucked with. Akua or one of her minions had ordered the already messy sprawl of Liessen streets to be turned into a maze of collapsed dead-ends and barricades. This was no longer a liveable city. It might become one again eventually, but that'd take years of highly dangerous and professional work as well as what I could only qualify as a prodigious amount of money. Which, even if I did have – which I didn't, because rebuilding a twice war-torn nation and my own ravaged demesne wasn't exactly cheap work – I wouldn't be able to spare. Because, once again fuck you Akua, this little murderous tantrum was the call for every godsdamned nation on Calernia that could spare an army to march for the Red Flower Vales. At best I'd be able to put wards around this wreck of a city and forbid entrance by Imperial decree.

Every speck of coin I'd be able to spare would be going to fortifying Callow and ensuring its people didn't starve through this winter, or the seasons after that. I somehow doubted the Tenth Crusade would be over in a year. It was going to be a long and brutal slugging match between the most powerful nations on the continent, and my people were troublingly unprepared for it.

My advance was slow, but it was still an advance. The deeper I got into the city, sticking to shadows and hiding places, the thicker the patrols became. I'd half-expected Diabolist to send an army of ten thousand wights just outside the tunnel that Black and I entered the city through, but there'd been no one in sight when we did. Just a set of hidden runic arrays that my teacher promptly tore apart with his shadow before we made a run for it. That had me wary. Diabolist was of the old breed but she wasn't stupid. I kept having to repeat that, these days, but that made it no less true. Just because we'd torn apart her vanguard outside Liesse didn't mean she was done: if anything, that probably meant the heart of her plan was in here. What that plan actually was, I still couldn't tell. Sure, she'd opened a Greater Breach in the worst place possible at the worst time possible for our army. She'd followed up that disaster by tossing three demons at us, which meant both Warlock and Hierophant had their hands tied with damage control. But how long did she expect that to last, really? At some point one of those two threats would give, and then the Named that was freed up would turn to cleaning up the remaining wights.

Black and I had come into the city ahead of the rest, but I fully expected that before too long we'd be followed by the Legions. I wouldn't even be surprised if the Watch had already begun landing at the bottom of the pit. Was that her plan, then? Forcing an engagement in a narrow tunnel that couldn't really be bypassed? Once more that might work for a while, but we had two sorcerers on par with if not outright superior to her outside and I really doubted her little get-out-of-Creation trick was impervious to the Warlock's entire bag of tricks. Right now, I couldn't see a way for her to get out of this alive. She'd last a while, there was no denying that. She'd even cost us a horrible butcher's bill before it was all said and done. But tonight or in a week, even without Black and I lifting a hand, this path led to her head on a pike. Or the Hall of Screams, if the Empress was feeling vindictive. Which meant I was missing something, because Diabolist only ever planned for defeat when it got her something she wanted and she was too fucking arrogant to care for something that sprang from her death. Akua Sahelian's cause was herself: everything else was, ultimately, expendable. It wasn't the kind of thinking that led to a woman martyring herself for some kind of philosophical point.

Not that it would succeed, anyway. Black had already made it clear that the aftermath of Second Liesse was going to be one long thorough purge of everything and everyone even remotely associated to the Truebloods. And she has to know that, I thought. That she gave him the excuse he'd been waiting on for decades. There was a way, in Diabolist's eyes, where today ended up with her on top and beyond reprisal. I was going to have to find what that way was and shove blades into it until it stopped twitching.

The first step towards that was getting eyes on the Ducal Palace, which was where Diabolist was bound to be holed up. Probably on an overly ornate throne, drinking expensive wine. I just knew her armour would be nicer than mine, too. Shame about all that blood that I was going get all over it. I ended up on a rooftop overlooking the outside of the palace, and grimaced when I took a closer look. I'd grilled Robber after he'd infiltrated the place a few months back then Thief after she did the same a great deal more recently, and they'd not been wrong to call it a fortress. They'd both mentioned that the area in front of the outer walls was open field, with space once occupied by shops and mansions torn down and cleared out to make it even harder to approach unnoticed. That part had changed, I saw. It was now entirely filled with tight ranks of perfectly still wights in full arms and armour. How many did that make? Thousands, at least. This was easily larger than the biggest marketplace in Laure, and it could fit that many people during festivals. Behind the walls I saw runes and stalking devils, and even clusters of mages she'd kept back.

Frontal assault wasn't looking all that feasible, but there weren't any obvious backdoors to exploit. It'd been a little too much to hope for that there would be: it wasn't like Diabolist lacked the manpower to cover ever nook and cranny. A distraction, maybe? Something loud enough she'd send men to quell the mess, making an opening for us to sneak through. But she'll be expecting that, I thought. She knows we're in the city. It might be that patience was our only real option. Waiting until the Legions made landfall and she had to shift her forces to hold them back, then going for the head of the snake. And even then, it wouldn't be a sure thing. I did hate it when my opponents were competent, it complicated everything. I waited under cover for what must have been at least half an hour, watching patrols and unmoving sentinels, but no opening ever emerged. At this rate Black would join me and I'd have no plan to suggest.

The explosion took me by surprise.

Not because there was an explosion at all – that'd pretty much been made a certainty the moment I'd sent Robber's cohort into the city through the path Thief had found me – but because it sounded wrong. It wasn't the kind of detonation that came from goblin munitions. It got worse when I quietly shifted rooftops to have a look at where the noise came from: one of the wings of the Ducal Palace was half-collapsed and smoke was trailing into the sky. Shit, I thought. If that was what I thought it was...

"A good plan," Diabolist said. "Or rather it was, the first time you used it."

My blade was out before she finished the first word and I twisted around only to find Akua Sahelian in all her glory leaning against the edge of the rooftop, looking down at her assembly of wights. I'd been incorrect in assuming she would put on armour. Instead she had draped over her full curves a complicated robe of red and gold with snow white silk borders. The back of her neck was covered by a low-hanging veil set with patterns of precious stones, and the oblique cut of her skirt revealed legs covered by form-fitting soft leather trousers. Even her boots, I thought, looked like they cost a year's salary. My first thought was: well, that's twenty denarii. My second thought was really more of a response, namely forming a spear of shadow and tossing it through her throat. It made a hole in the silhouette that glowed around the edges but almost immediately closed. An illusion. Diabolist raised an eyebrow.

"How uncouth," she chided. "As I was saying, there was some cleverness to the thought. Sending Thief after the keystone of my ritual while my eyes were on you and the Carrion Lord."

"Some cleverness," I replied flatly, keeping eye on the wights below. "How kind of you to concede that."

They weren't moving, at least not those I could see. That was little comfort, given where I was currently standing.

"Dearest Catherine," Diabolist drawled, sounding amused. "You employed this same trick to steal the very sun of Summer. Did you truly think that would go unnoticed? Of course I prepared for the eventuality."

"It was a trap," I sighed.

This entire city was, I'd known that going in, but I'd thought that my little contingencies might be snuck past her.

"Just because the keystone needed to be there once does not mean it needed to remain there," Akua languidly said. "Even if your little burglar survives my precautions, she will find nothing there to steal."

I frowned at her.

"So is this a back-patting session, Akua?" I asked. "Because I'm kind of busy. You know, working out the logistics of killing you."

She waved away my words airily. It really was shame I'd only be able to brutally murder her the once. I felt kind of cheated by that fact.

"I am in no hurry," she said. "You are. After all, your army is losing the battle outside quite spectacularly."

I went still. She could be lying, of course. Very likely she was. When I'd left two thirds of her mages on the field were dead, Masego had her demons imprisoned and the wights were collapsing on two fronts. Juniper was headed out to contain her Hellgate with the Warlock at her back, and so while I wouldn't consider that situation under control it should at least not be outright fucking us over for the foreseeable future. On the other hand, I'd thought since the beginning that this was going too well considering the amount of time she'd had to prepare her defences. There was a chance, however slight, she wasn't lying through her teeth.

"Istrid Knightsbane is dead," Diabolist said. "General Orim and General Afolabi are as well. Their legions were gutted around them, then rose in my service. The remaining commanders are hanging on by a thread, and that thread is thinning with every heartbeat. Even if they manage to retreat, this cannot be called anything but a defeat."

My fingers clenched.

"If it's true, that's a mess that's going to cost us badly," I said. "But it doesn't really matter, does it? The moment you used your ritual you made this about Named. Even if you wipe out my whole army your side collapses the moment you die."

"Can you?" Diabolist asked, and she sounded genuinely curious. "Put aside your pride and your hatred, for a moment. Do you truly believe that even if you came to stand before me, you would come out the victor of that confrontation?"

"I've killed more terrifying things than you, Akua Sahelian," I hissed.

She laughed, and gracefully arced her arm to display our surroundings.

"No," the Soninke smiled. "No you have not. I am not a fettered god you can trick or a petty tool hollowed out by the Heavens. I am heiress crowned by inheritance, in the fullness of her might. That I bother with these ramparts between us is a mere mark of respect – I could break you with a word, Catherine. You have risen too swiftly. It has made you fragile."

"I think I'm supposed to pity you," I said. "For being so far gone that you can't even understand what a repulsive creature you are and how it's going to get you killed. The worst part of it, Akua, is that you have all these gifts. You're so fucking capable, and I have had enough a need for capable people I might actually have ignored what a monster you are if you'd not proven again and again you're poison to everything you touch. But you just had to cross those lines, the ones that mean I have to put you down whatever the cost."

Diabolist sighed.

"Must you still bother with the pretence of righteousness, even at this late hour?" she said. "It has grown increasingly quite tedious."

"Is this the part where you trying telling me we're not so different?" I said. "Fuck you and the flying murder fortress you rode in on, Sahelian. I've done some nasty stuff, but you? You don't have limits. It's worse than a sickness of the mind, because you chose to be like this. You glorify it."

She seemed amused, and in that expression I saw a lot I'd rather I hadn't. I saw the Empress weaving plots that bound me ever tighter to her reign, I saw Black imparting a lesson that was always as brutal as it was practical. We'd both been raised in the shadows of the same monsters. It had left marks on both of us, and the knowledge of that shared brand had bitter taste in my mouth.

"Tell me, old friend," Akua said fondly. "What are your principles, exactly? I keep hearing of these lines and the way I cross them yet you never elaborate. I have murdered for my ambitions, this is true. But then, so have you. Is it simply the scale of the killing that is your objection?"

"Friend? Gods, when people say your kind gets drunk in power I didn't think it was quite that literal. You've loosed devils on innocents, Akua," I said coldly. "You summon demons to make use of them in war. You're racist, backstabbing and utterly amoral. You murdered a hundred thousand of my countrymen in cold blood to make a fucking point."

"Nearly all these acts have been committed by those you call allies as well," Diabolist mildly said. "Your own teacher has methodically butchered Callowans for decades to cow them. Perhaps never a hundred thousand at once, this I'll grant. But between the Conquest and the occupation? My dear, I broke a city. He broke a nation, and kept it so. I daresay the sum of corpses to his name is a few graveyards ahead of mine."

She stretched lazily.

"You've yourself made pacts with entities that are hostile to Creation," she continued. "And even now bear their mantle, a diabolist in frost instead of brimstone. You've consistently put Callowan lives above those of Praesi and greenskins, which indicates a certain... disregard. In matters of treachery, shall we revisit the inception of the Liesse Rebellion?"

She laughed, the sound of it rich and almost enchanting enough the urge to kill her didn't have my hand tightening into a fist.

"As for the same moral fibre you so often chide me for lacking," she said, and met my eyes calmly. "Catherine, when have you ever displayed it yourself? I was under the impression that to be righteous one needed to do more than merely commit lesser sins instead of great."

"The difference," I replied coldly, "is that killing is something I'm driven to, while it's your starting point."

"What difference is truly there," Diabolist asked, "if we both come to kill? Does hemming and hawing over bloodying your blade somehow exempt you from the nature of your actions?"

"The difference is that at some point I stop, Akua," I said. "I have an end. You don't. It's one massacre after another until someone puts you down. The payoff for all the ugly things done at my hands or my orders is peace. Real, lasting peace. A way out of the loop that's fucked over both our peoples since the First Dawn. What's your payoff, Diabolist? Progressively greater atrocities, until you finally run into someone stronger than you?"

"That," Akua said smilingly, "sounds like a justification."

I flinched, because it was just true enough to cut.

"Did you ever wonder why all these renowned villains displayed such immediate fondness for you?" Diabolist said. "Or did you merely assumed you were unfathomably charming? You have always been a threat to the very order they've spent a lifetime building, even when you set out to serve their purpose."

"I'm aware I'm being used," I replied flatly. "I can live with that, so long as I'm using them as well."

The Soninke clicked her tongue against the roof her mouth disapprovingly.

"Sentiment is a blinder, Catherine," she said. "Consider the facts. From the moment you've become the Squire, Callow has been graced with one bloody reaping after another. Did you ever stop to consider this was no accident but the actual intent?"

She leaned forward.

"Did you ever consider that Callow cannot rebel if it too busy burning?" she said. "That the ashes of a kingdom are easier to subjugate in full than a resurgent nation under your hand?"

"I know exactly what they're after," I flatly replied.

"You 'know' what two of the most exquisitely manipulative villains alive have told you," Diabolist corrected. "Is a few scraps of affection all it takes to bind you?"

"Did you think a clever speech would be all that was needed to sway me?" I said. "I know what you are, Akua. It's what I would be, if I believed in nothing. If I thought I was the only thing that mattered on Creation."

"You will hate me," Diabolist said. "That is as it should be. But I know you as well, Catherine Foundling. And there is a truth you have flinched from looking in the eye, for it is distasteful to you: the Empress and the Carrion Lord, though you may be fond of them, have a plan for Callow. Me?"

She shrugged.

"Its existence is a matter of indifference to me, so long as tribute is paid," Akua said. "And so now I ask – is there truly a bridge you will not burn, if it means better outcome for your people?"

Her smile was thin and sharp, a slice of ivory between red lips.

"Let us find out," she said. "We will begin, I think, by severing the ties holding you back."

She looked towards the Ducal Palace, the very picture of nonchalance.

"Do hurry, Catherine. I have the Black Knight."

My blood ran cold, even as the illusion dispersed and the undead below began to move. A reminder, those, that no matter how convincing she could be I was still mere feet away from thousands of my people she had murdered and enslaved. There were some things that could not be painted over by eloquence. The wisps of sorcery that Diabolist had left behind spun again, and even as I prepared to forcefully disrupt them a silhouette formed and my hand was stayed. Exactly one sentence was spoken to me, and then the silhouette was gone before I could so much as open my mouth. Loudly, I swallowed. My fingers clenched and then unclenched as I watched the wights beginning the climb towards me. In the distance mages wove sorcery and devils took flight, the full muster of Diabolist's madness finally taking the field. I closed my eyes, breathed out and stilled my mind. I opened them to sight of a corpse-like hand grasping the edge of the roof.

"Fall," I said, and darkness obeyed.

Was it his plan to get captured i wonder? I wouldn't put it past him and yet...

Letouriste

He is too smart for falling to an obvious trap like that.that's part of his plan or akua don't have him at all.

I expect a bluff actually

letouriste

err let's pretend i said nothing.we don't even know the details of akua plan so that could be extra clever^^ still think black would not fall for any trap she could do though

Jeffery Wells

Akua isn't bluffing. It would be extremely foolish to bluff and then have Black meet back up with Cat, totally fine. Something like that would destroy everything she is doing to snag the Squire as a subordinate.

Now whether Black allowed himself to be caught it not is an entirely different question. My guess is he knows this isn't his story, so he needs to set up a story where Cat successfully rescues him and kills Diabolist.

maresther23

And so the gambit pileup begins. Who will win?

werafdsaew

The Unspoken Plan Guarantee so far heavily favors Black (and Assassin) and Thief.

maresther23

And whatever the Empress is planing.

Zarquon

... I am hoping she's lying about having captured the Black Knight but huh. Huh. 0_0

werafdsaew

On the one hand Akua has lied about such things before. On the other hand defeating another Named is all about maneuvering yourself into a narrative that favors you, and I can see Black allowing himself to be captured as part of that, especially since he has the Unspoken Plan Guarantee.

Kindly

Relying on the Unspoken Plan Guarantee for protection is not a foolproof strategy. You never know when the author will write an interlude from your point of view and spill the beans – and of course, that will be the cue for everything to go wrong.

DroughtBringer

That ending is exciting.
First time we get to see Fall in all of its glory.

naturalnuke

hype

ALKATYN

Akua is enough of an old style villain to monologue and speak about how they are Not So Different, but smart enough to do it from far away via an illusion. I love it.

What she said reminds me of the parallel a lot of people have made between Cat and Taylor in worm. There's only so long you can do bad things and work with bad people while saying that its different if you do it. Much as she like to quote about justifications only mattering too the just Cat still needs to believe she is in the right at a deep level.

taborask

And just like Taylor I think both of them are kinda wrong. When it comes right down to it Cat ISNT much better than Diabolist, not really. They both murder tons of people are consort with alien entities for the sake of saving their culture. The fact that we are more similar to Cat's culture than Akua's doesn't make one superior to the other in any real objective sense.

Which is good, I think. There's a reason this story isn't called "A Practical Guide to Being An Asshole Who's Actually Good Deep Down"

vamair

> The fact that we are more similar to Cat's culture than Akua's doesn't make one superior to the other in any real objective sense.

Doesn't it, though? I'd argue Cat's culture is still better than Akua's in some objective sense. The justice of your cause doesn't make you a better person by itself, but caring about being a better person at heart is something that Cat seems to going to grow out of. Justifications only matter to the just, all that.

poignardazur

I feel like the culture that is based on Darwinist murder of everyone you can get away with murdering and "it's not breaking the law if you bribe the guy in charge" rules is the inferior one in a real objective sense.

nipi

Id argue that Callowan culture is objectively superior because when shit hits the fan they arent still backstabbing each other like the wastelanders

shieldredblog

Verified Gods and afterlives kinda change the nature of morality enough that i'm not sure you can compare morality in Creation to the real world anyway.

laguz24

The point is that if both Auka and Cat were left a kingdom with their own devices Auka would have still built the fortress Cat would have not. Cat is more reactive while Auka doesn't stop.

---

All right, the silhouette in the last paragraph sounds like someone giving Catherine a signal that Akua wouldn't notice while departing. Given that the sentence wasn't told to us, it looks like a last second addition to the plan.

What other possibilities are there for it? Akua showing her the captured Black Knight as a proof, and him saying some cryptic reference to help Cat?

DroughtBringer

It's either that or Thief, both
I'meaning towards Thief, as Blacks action probably would have been described as a Shadow, not a silhouette.

Morgenstern

Sounded like Thief coming out of hiding for just a moment, to me. I kinda hate that asspull-trick of not telling the reader a sentence has been said, but not showing the sentence, though, what with POV of the one effing HEARING that very sentence being applied here. It's kinda more fine if you have a 3rd person perspective or the POV of someone who canNOT hear that sentence either, only SAW that something short was said. But the POV of the very person who HEARS that sentence? Ass-pull and a big fat tongue stuck out at the reader. Meh. (Yeah, I get it's for suspense reasons, but really, it just feels like there are better/nicer ways to do it.)

Ane

Ward, I'm curious, are you a guy or a girl?

wirelessgrapes

Akua brings up an interesting point. Why is Cat better than her, or the Empress, or Black? Her 'phrase', "justifications only matter to the just" is pretty damning in itself, and she's committed atrocities herself. She's spent her men like copper, gambled them and lost heavily. Though she came out on top, Callow is arguably worse off than it was before she came. The lands are burning, demons are corrupting the cities, the Fae attacked Marchford, and the coin purses are running dry. So, why is Cat better? Is it because she's the main character? Is the point of the story that you *can't* be Practically Evil?

I don't think so.

Fantasy characters are defined by their goals. Frodo has to deliver the Ring to Mordor. Harry Potter has to defeat Voldemort. The Pevensie kids have to put the lion on his rightful throne.

Cat's goal is to be better. Her goal is to be better than the villains that exist. Her goal is to crush any and all opposition in order to rebuild her home better than it was. And that's what makes her better. In the same way that William was bound to fighting Cat, Cat is bound to fighting for Callow. No matter the price, no matter the pain, she will fight for what she believes is good for Callow.

Because, at the end of the day, what the fantasy genre ignores, the people are the most important part. That's what I believe the story is all about. The world after the battles are over is the important part. What's the point of saving the world if you can't keep it that way?

So, why's Cat better than Akua? Because Akua intends to break the world. Why is Cat better than the heroes? Because, if the heroes win, there will always be another villain.

There's the old adage, about asking if the means justify the ends. In this story, Cat couldn't give a fuck about the means justifying the ends, all that matters is the end. And her end is the best for the people. Because fantasy worlds suck for everyone else.

wirelessgrapes

And Cat will definitely end up fighting the Empress and Black, if they don't die, because nothing else can happen. The Story won't allow it. So long as Callow answers to someone who isn't Cat, she will fight for it to be hers.

NZPIEFACE

You know, Cat's literal defining trait so far has been fighting for a better Callow by burning it.

Keyen

I believe the discussion between Archer and Apprentice back in their scouting mission is pretty much revealing of that: "Foundling wouldn't want all the people inside butchered right?"

"I think not," Apprentice said. "She gets irritated about people killing Callowans unless it's her doing it."

NZPIEFACE

Maybe she's a vampire and every time she kills a Callowan she lives for a year longer?

Wait, wrong Queen. And she's immortal already.

werafdsaew

> Callow is arguably worse off than it was before she came
Is it though? In the counterfactual timeline where Catherine never took the mantle of the Squire, or died in her first fight against Williams, would Callow really be better off? The rebellion was going to happen sooner or later, Akua was going to be Akua, and the Winter King was going to be the Winter King. Catherine isn't really responsible for anything except moving the schedule up. And considering that Black and Malicia had 20 years to plan for the Crusade, it's not like a few more years is going to make a big difference in the grand scheme of things.

beleester

Catherine caused the first Liesse rebellion, which Akua used for her first schemes at Marchford and Liesse. Then she literally handed control of Liesse to Akua. Sure, Akua was always going to do *something*, but that something would have been a lot less dangerous without Catherine providing opportunities. Or at the very least, she could have done it somewhere in the Wasteland rather than in the middle of Callow.

Moving the schedule up for the Crusade probably didn't make too much difference, but making all the events happen *at the same time* probably did. They planned for a Crusade, sure, but I don't think they planned for a crusade and a rebellion and a civil war and a Fae incursion and a Greater Breach, one after another with no time to replenish the legions.

(This is also why I think Akua is wrong about this being a plan to keep Callow too busy to rebel – no rebellion would have caused as much damage as the current situation is.)

Reveen

Man, what are you talking about? This is a massive sweeping generalization of a genre based on only the most stock stereotypes about it. And this story and general has about as much insight and nuance on the subject as a political cartoon.

Meanwhile Catherine's resistance to the conventions of both her world and the genre are skin deep. She is acting in opposition to good vs evil dichotomy but falls fully into the core ideological construct of the Great Man doing Great Things. She wants to help Callow, but she's dead set on the only way to help Callow by her hand and by her hand alone, beating the country into the shape she wants it. Using force to get her way and convinced of her right to do so by virtue of being the Protagonist of her own little story.

It's not a big rejection of fantasy, quite the opposite, it's the same Great Man Theory that extolls the strength and agency of the Special people above the unwashed masses of plebs who need to be led to greatness. It's the same ideological underpinning of both the heroes and the villains, the only difference being that Catherine thinks herself so goddamn special as to be above both of those concepts due to some vague and philosophically empty set of personal ideals that she can't even debate with some teenage nun without tripping over herself.

And it is not an ideology that will lead to lasting peace or a better future for her people. It's an ideology that leads to people plowing forward convinced of their own rightness or rationality and failing to see the big picture. Catherine has just brushed off the fact that she's a pawn several times now, because she's wrapped up in her own ego that she thinks she'll just be able to overcome it.

I also think that if the time came when she came face to face with another path for a better Callow, she would reject it and fight against it because it is not hers.

werafdsaew

Given that the Gods are doling out Names, and Names are basically people who can shape creation to their will, I think the great man theory is 100% correct. At the very least, if your opponents have Names, and you don't, you loose.

Joey Wheel

Suddenly I have the feeling Cat will lose this fight. Cat's soul will be used against her at the final moment, Black will die, and Cat will be rescued by her party at the last second, unconscious and nearly dead.

Diabolist will go on to fight against the Crusade using her Breaches to great effect.

Cat will gain her name as she awakens a year or two later to a ravaged and burning Callow.

That's just my crack prediction.

Engineer

Which begs the question why Akua didn't simply undo the working on Cat's soul.

The only probable reason I can come to is that she couldn't use her aspects through her illusion. Because Cat is stuck in her domain a good deal far away from anyone that could conceivably apply magical first aid so this is the optimum time to exploit that weakness in her soul if I was the Diabolist.

Shequi

Akua wants Cat as her Black Knight.

Taichi22

Of all the ways I can see this ending, your prediction is my favorite.

Why? Because Cat has been actively losing her grasp upon the narrative. Both she and her close compatriots know that their way of doing things is untenable – set off bombs to prevent nukes, but never long enough to actually build anything. And they know this – I'm fairly sure that every member of the Woe has admitted this at some point.

We also see Cat losing her grip on her ideals and what makes her right. Her moral justifications are... mediocre, at best. We see her utterly unable to debate with the nun, winning through sheer 'Might makes right.' arguments. And when she isn't mightier than her foe, she is unable to debate them in terms of moral justice. 'Justification matters only to the just' may be one of Cat's defining lines, but the crux of the matter is that she does believe herself to **be** just, and as such, her principles just aren't good enough. As it stands, even if she were to get a name, it wouldn't suit her, because her morals and her stance isn't solidified. Who she is, isn't solidified enough. There are too many cracks in the foundation for her to become a Black Knight, or any other kind of knight, as this chapter has revealed. She doesn't have anything of a 'method' or a 'way', but rather is just going about as best she can to put out fires. And that's not good enough for a full name.

The prediction that you've made is a 'reset' upon the story. Cat's way is burned down, Black dies the way he wants to go out, and Cat is forced to take a long, hard look at her morals, principles, and methods.

And **then** we'd watch her get her name.

Engineer

Akua is correct in her assessment. Murder is murder, whatever your justifications and for a person that supposedly believes "Justifications matter only to the Just" Squire sure has a lot of them.

Just kick this holier than thou bullshit you have going on Cat and embrace the truth that all your actions merely boil down to "I don't like you, so I'll kill you."

And there is NO shame in that.

That is the essence of all Named, to see their will imposed on Creation and as a wise 11 year old Wizard once said "To impose your will on someone, you need to beat them first."

And she said at some point she'll STOP? Ludicrous, there will ever be someone that opposes her will. In a species as complex and diverse as humanity you will always have an individual or group of individuals that disagree with the status quo. So you will ALWAYS be killing.

So, short of mind controlling everyone like that Dread Emperor from yesteryear did, she will never achieve her goal of a lasting peace.

So embrace the Way of the Blade Squire.

LM

Let's split this into two arguments, morality and practicality.

You say that there is no difference in a kill made by a soldier versus one made by a serial killer. That's just not the case. Murder can be justified, even in civilized societies, if it's committed in defense of the people as a whole. Killing an attempted rapist or band robber, for example. Many countries have "castle doctrine", where reasonable actions taken to defend yourself in your home can NOT be used to prosecute you. The key word here is reasonable.

Katherine may be repeating that dumb "Justifications may only matter to the just" quip, but her entire method of governance is to attempt to be fair and reasonable. She's must successful when she's fighting against those with no justification for their actions. She's not committing mass genocide, she's fighting those who slaughter her people. She's not starting wars, she's ending them. The only example of her starting a war was letting the lone swordsman escape. She nearly lost her damn mantle because of it, not in my opinion because of some white/black conflict, but because it went directly against her principles.

Engineer

Yes, however both cases still leaves you with a corpse at your feet. Your post implies that murder is alright under certain circumstances but who decides what circumstances are right or wrong? Furthermore what the hell gives them the authority to decide that?

In fact, justifications do not exist outside human societies. The universe at large does not care why or how you killed that person. It just outputs a dead body. The point I am trying to make is that justifications are only there to soothe your own conscious and are not required for you internally. They are only required to prevent you from going to prison, but this is only necessary because you as an individual is weak compared to the entire police force which exist to enforce laws that only have effect so long as society believes they do and are enforced.

But if you were Named, capable of murdering 10 000 police officers singlehandedly without breaking a sweat like Catherine can, why the hell would you care about justifying yourself to ANYBODY including yourself? That's what annoys me; she's still trying to justify herself to some stupid "authority" or moral principle to believe she's a "good" person doing "bad" things for the "right" reasons. This is an unnecessary source of mental anguish and unfitting of The Last Noble of the Fae and the future Black Queen of Callow.

Just do what you want. If people have a problem with that destroy them.

Remember what Black said to her on that balcony, after she had her ass handed to her by the then Heiress, "If people get in your way, step on them."

I end this with one fundamental truth of Calernia and ours:
"Might makes."

Dan

I think the issue with Cat's moral standpoint is that there is no peaceful option. She is but one named among many. Luckily for her health, her plan is backed by other named.

What critics of her methods are avoiding is that the will of the people makes the future. The Black knight knew he needed a force for change greater than a named. So he created a unified idea of one grace one sin. Now the new generation of praesi are a mix of cultures they can rid their world of the old way of thinking. As we see, though, the black knight and malicia have been unable to convert the naysayers by peaceful negotiation.

So as we see different forces slaughter each other the only way to come to a conclusion which benefits the people as a whole is a force (the legions) defeat or assimilate their enemies. The country and region are not unified, but by gathering diverse forces under cat's banner, she gives power to the common people.

Ultimately, each named in history has been defeated by another named. The legacy of the named has thus been snuffed out from the top. I believe that The squire and the black knight have been the first named to keep the common people "in the loop" to some degree, regarding the grand plan.

Whereas dread emperors/empresses have ruled from the top with personal goals, cat's goal resonates with the people she fights with. In the beginning she had a small force, and did great things *personally* with their welfare in mind. Now she has simply grown her set of like minded followers, to the extent that she has created a new named out of her trusted advisor.

If names are handed down (or up) then her crusade? Has been tacitly endorsed by one or more gods. So while she spends lives, she is also visibly working in the interests of the people she leads, AND their audience.

The people fighting against the empire are selfishly pursuing what is ultimately a narrow seat of power, which they intend to usurp. Now, for the first time, the empire is being lead from the top, with support all the way from the bottom. So while there is only one way to make changes in the empire (killing) akua and the other forces are still aiming for a narrow seat of power.

*****

I think the true meaning of cat's justifications only matter to the just is that to justify ones actions there must be a range of effective options.

What Cat has learnt (the hard way, from essentially, her birth) is that for countrywide reform there is only one course of action. Demonstrate that she can lead, and survive *as one of them* fighting beside them and *for* them.

Dylan Tullos

Engineer:

The Black Knight before Amadeus believed that he could impose his will on Creation through raw power. He subscribed to the simple school of thought that "Might makes", and he had the strength to bring down a tower with a flick of his wrist. In his mind, that made him strong enough to do as he liked.

The last Black Knight was far more powerful than Amadeus, but he didn't understand how to use that strength. At Flandres, he slaughtered his way through more than a hundred men when some random soldier cut his throat. There was no dramatic duel, no final confrontation with a great enemy, just a Named who forgot that all powers have limits and paid the price.

A Named who thinks that they can do whatever they want and step on whoever gets in their way will inevitably be killed by their own arrogance. Even if we ignore morality completely, other people are real, and they have their own goals and motives. Black understands this, so he created institutions that offered the lower ranks of Praesi society a chance to gain wealth, power, and social status by serving him.

The Legions Amadeus created triumphed on the Field of Flandres because they fought as a team. The old Black Knight died on the Field of Flandres because he thought he was a God. Rather than seeking to use his raw power effectively, he simply bulldozed everyone in his path until he was so exhausted that a random peasant could slit his throat.

If Catherine could kill ten thousand, she'll face an enemy who bring ten thousand and one. If she destroys everyone who dares to question her and terrifies her underlings into obedience, she'll be surrounded by cowardly, resentful subordinates who will betray or abandon her at a critical moment. The history of Praes is full of Villainous Named who thought that their power gave them the right to ignore "lesser" peoples; Black and Malicia's success comes from the fact that they understand and motivate their subordinates rather than just beating them into line.

Catherine's team has saved her life on several occasions, but their loyalty has a price. Cat has to understand what they want, and show them that they can accomplish their goals by supporting her. She may be in charge of Callow, but she's more likely to stay in charge if she behaves like a harsh but well-meaning ruler rather than a deranged Nietzsche-worshipping lunatic.

Calernia, like the real world, is a place where leaders need to put time and effort into justifying themselves to their followers. No matter how powerful Named are, there are always going to be other powerful Named looking to bring them down. The best way to survive as a Named is through teamwork, strong alliances, and good people skills, not monologuing about how you will crush anyone who gets in your way.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah... Cat's going to team up with Aqua, isn't she.

You know, the only reason Black and Dread Empress came so far is because they were equals. I'm starting to believe Cat needs one too.

Andrei

Honestly I kindof hope this happens. I really like what Akua brings to the story and having her die soon is a little sad.

Letouriste

No.just no.i can't see that happening at all for a lot of reasons:

- akua is doomed to lose at some point
- akua trampled on what cat want defend
- cat is callowan and she has a big grudge
- there is no trust at all between them.don't belittle the relation between black and malicia.
- etc...

NZPIEFACE

Half the story is about subverting tropes, whats the harm in some crazy speculation that goes against convention?

Kotawa

Ugh, did Cat get another dosage of heroic morals from somewhere? This whole thing seems fishy.

werafdsaew

Cat has always been a hero with the mantle of a Villain

Reveen

"Do you feel like a hero with the mantle of a Villain yet?"

lavos

That seems to be the case yes. Perhaps that is Black's doing since the way Akua went about things pretty much guarantees she will lose to the first half-decent hero that comes around? Or Akua is twisting things to trigger a Face Heel Turn?

Gunslinger

Fuck you and the flying murder fortress you rode in on, Sahelian.

That line is pure gold.

I suppose Cat's the first one to use an aspect between the two, she'll win eventually but it doesn't bode well in the interim. Black seems to be the most likely candidate for the silhouette but it really could be anyone. Even the scribe

Unexpectedly Polite Cultist

Or assassin.

TheAtomicOption

Worrying that she's using an aspect right off. It seems like each aspect trumps the next, so first to use one loses. 🙄

shieldredblog

Yes but only in a straight up duel. There are also plenty of non aspect trump cards like the hellgates or buried explosives.

Adra

If this ends up being the fight where Cat levels up, she's playing with >3 aspects. Having her start one down on Akua, only to gain the aspects of her new name is a good way to upset that audience assumption that first to use an aspect is going to lose.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Mhm, I hope Akua wins and takes her revenge. The Black Knight dies, the woe scattered because Catherine held them together, mhmmhmMm. Then Cat will re-revenge? Something has to be gained from a loss like that to advance the story.

Letouriste

Lol no way.black can't die here narratively...i'm pretty sure of that.

The woe would not scatter:/ how do you expect that to even be possible? you would need cat to die

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

or disappear and the others wouldn't know what happened to her.

letouriste

then they would unit in searching for her etc...or dealing with her job in her stead(hakram would and thief too,masego and archer would just temporary go back home but that's nothing narratively)

Ashen Shugar

So Akua thinks Thief got blown up trying to steal the keystone. But since it seems like it might actually have been Robber's job to do, then Thief is probably still around to steal Black back from Akua as part of a cascade of errors she's made starting from assuming that it was just Thief lurking out the town.

Maybe.

SpeckofStardust

"silhouette formed and my hand was stayed. Exactly one sentence was spoken to me,"

That was likely Thief giving information/message.

Letouriste

Hum...now you said that...yep that's likely because she clearly only care about Named.she would not consider robber as something other than an annoying pawn

TheCount

"There was a way, in Diabolist's eyes, where today ended up with her on top and beyond reprisal. I was going to have to find what that way was and shove blades into it until it stopped twitching."

SUICIDE IS NOT THE ANSWER!!!

i mean, if cat would know that Aqua's goal is her...would she stabb herself?:o

That aside... im... suprised.

not about the any of the plans, but me liking aqua...

Sure, she is immoral and all that murder and schemming.... but... she is honest to herself... that, is something i value a lot.... not to mention the wards and other tools she crafted, even despite what (or who) she used to make them.....

lupus7

old-blood are hypocrite, they winner war again callow, when was black's legion, they racist and liar to other and them self, they call then self villains, only see poor crazy nihilist. sorry for my English i am speaker Spanish.

narcoduck

I don't think the last image was Thief at all. I think it was Malicia, co-opting (and hiding in) Akua's fading illusion spell to give Cat a nudge in the right direction. After all, she knew what Akua was planning this entire time. No reason why she wouldn't have a personal touch in the outcome.

Eli London

I'm looking forward to Cat's realisation that she kinda isn't any better than Akua and i think it's at that point that we'll truly see her true character because it's the point at which she'd no longer lying to herself. By no longer lying to herself, i think it'll enable her to push herself further than she ever has which will help and prepare her for the war that is about to happen after this.

Eli London

Grammar connections

i think it's at that point she'd no longer be lying to herself

Eli London

Lol, corrections

Letouriste

i understood that last bit as akua saying that sentence threat she talked about...am I wrong?

Alex Walters

Akua has lied about having your friend/mentor/whatever before, when she said some generic ghoul was Killian at the climax of book 2.

Also, I must say that while Callow is worse off than before Cat got going, it would be much worse if she hadn't. Only the Lone Swordsman's stuff can be even arguably traced to her, and it would have happened eventually anyway. Cat's been running damage control on the rest.

I do agree that "Justifications only matter to the just" is a stupid phrase that Cat doesn't really believe, at least in the modern sense of justification. In the archaic sense that "x action is righteous", yes. But Cat very clearly cares a lot about whether she's doing the correct thing by her own standards, and thus does justification in the modern sense. It's just that her own standards are a proto-utilitarianism 99% of the time and thus completely outside the bounds of conventional Good/Evil.

I cannot see Cat teaming up with Akua for any scenario, because most of the threats that Cat might deem bad enough that she'd call a truce with Akua to stop are ones Akua would want to harness and Cat would want gone.

werafdsaew

Without Cat triggering the rebellion early, it would have happened at the same time as the Crusade, and then the Empire definitely would have lost. And on their way out, the Empire would burn Callow to the ground, according to Cat's estimations. Of course this is better for an eventual free and independent Callow, but it wouldn't be good for the people actually living in it, and Cat has always cared about the latter while not caring about the former.

RandomFan

Don't forget, Cat may describe the other emperors as jokes, but they were dangerous. we might blame all this conflict on the empire, it might even be true- but Callow has had to war with their neighbors before, and to war with the empire as well. They might have remained free, but there's a long walk between free and good.

Even that's assuming that the throne actually was good for the people. If not, as long as pragmatic villiany persists, it's better for callow under the thumb of evil than under the thumb of good. Plus, if Cat carves a large enough hole, she'll make Callow part of the empire, which could make it a better place in general, especially after the Nobility has a large portion cut to ribbons.

Reveen

The idea that Callow would be a better place to live under the Empire only works under the assumption that the Empire isn't a nightmare dystopia, which it is. Even under "Practical" Evil it's not going to stop being a dystopia, just a more ordered one. And that dystopianess is going to bleed into Callow over time, especially if the country ends up torn to pieces by the end of things.

letouriste

hey,i just realised nobody commented on the possible death of robber.seems like nobody even want think about that or believe that is a possibility.

robber is dealing with a Named and trap made for Named...he could really die in this battle (even if i don't think he will) he is crazy funny and lucky but what make him a great character is his rebel side.narratively his future growth could be really interesting and go in a lot of ways but he could also be used for reinforcing cat character at some point...like by dying in battle:(

Nethermore

First of all, I agree with Masego that in Creation the most righteous cause is to seek to escape the cage. I find the divine experiment beyond disgusting, the worst exposures we've seen having been angel mass brainwashing and the Praesi not being allowed to try and survive on the foos they can grow. Somehow I wouldn't be surprised if agricultural science was sabotaged. The gnomes are almost certainly divinely influenced to keep the rest of Calernia from ever outgrowing the cage.

Akua has basically drunk all of the Evil rats' kool-aid and wants nothing more than to scratch and bite all the other rats until they're so crippled they can't resist her making a bed of them. Catherine originally just wanted a better lot in the struggle for her extended rat family and believed the best or only way to achieve it was to join the Evil rats, but when she was shown the cage and told of how some of the Evil rats wanted to bite the hand of their jailer (who also kept sneaking the Good rats treat, and magic swords), she was sympathetic and has become more so after seeing the story-driven patterns of Creation at work.

Also, Akua's "join me" speech was pretty weak, but then we already know her plan is to break Cat before turning her so I guess this was just a primer. Literally the only argument in favor of joining her Akua managed to bring forth was that she doesn't have specific designs on Callow. Pretty shoddy considering that she's a untrustworthy, sees 0 value in anything but her personal power, appearance, and father, clearly wants to war against the whole world until she croaks which is way more dangerous for all her "allies" than Praes just trying to keep hold of Callow, has Triumphant's "if I can't have it, then Creation is better off burned" attitude, ...

Meanwhile Cat has friends on the Empire's side, knows that the Empress's and Black's plan for the Empire and Callow is less dangerous than aggressive world war, has actually worked to shut otherworldly creatures (Fae) OUT of Callow when they forced her to deal with them, ...

Well, this sure spawned a plethora of comments, so let me put my two cents.

TL;DR: She is not so different from Aqua. In fact, the only difference between them is that Aqua is honest with herself, while Catherine is not.

I'm so sick and tired of Cat's bullshit. She is a hypocrit and a coward, and either too blind or too stupid to understand this. She needs to utterly divorce the idea that she can do "wrong" things for "right" reasons, and that having "right" reasons gives her a moral highground and makes her better. She whines about justifications, but the fact is, she can't fucking function without seeking justifications and "right" reasons for her actions. Yes, I'm committing atrocities, but at least it's for idea. Yes, I'm striking deals with devils, but at least it's for Callow. Yes, I'm killing people, but at least it's not Callowans. Fuck her and fuck her reasons. She is a hypocrit and a coward, and here's why.

First, let's start with sweet-sweet hypocrisy, the true mortar of the Tower. She considers her better because she has lines she do not cross, and because she not doing things for herself but for Callow. Let me break it down to ya. Her having "lines she wouldn't cross" is shaky, because it's a made up sentiment. Aqua too has those lines, though they are different. She will not do something that does not bring her any short or long term benefit, she would not do something that is not in her interests, and not caring for her survival is too unspeakable measure for her. Saying that there are things you would not do, therefore you are better is like saying that you breath, therefore you are better. Everyone has things they will never do, it's just the matter of where your goals lie. For Aqua it's her benefit and profit, for Cat it's to have reasons to believe that she is not "too bad", so her lines are set up accordingly. Everyone have equal right to judge right from wrong, which, depending on your opinion, either means that noone has that right, or everyone. Or only you, because of course you do.

Statement that she is not working for herself but for Callow (which is to what most of her rebuttals come to) is a nationalism. I struggle so hard to not bring Nazis into this, but they are "obvious" villains and showcase my point. People identify themselves as a part of their nation and or country, and in turn, identify nation or country as part of themselves. Working for a nation is ultimately working for yourself, it's just as selfish as is Aquas strife for power. She is dividing all people into to categories "my tribe" and "others". And others are expandable when it comes to her tribe. She's using the made up things that do not exist outside her mind to divide humanity on good and bad guys, which is just like racism, sexism, religious conflicts, class wars, and all other bullshit that keeps humanity occupied throught it's existence. She cares for Callow and Callowans, cause she was born in Callow as a fucking Callowan. Just as Aqua was born in Praes as a goddamn Praesi nobility, so she naturally protects "their way", which is "kill everyone who is a threat to you and use everyone else", so she does not care that much about Praesi, but point still stands. Everyone doing things for their benefit, and their only, fight me.

Now, let's look at cowardness, and since my post already too goddamn long, I would try to be short. Cat stubbornly refuses to face and admit the truth, even when it's fucking rubbed in her face. She runs away and hides behind platitudes, instead of accepting the reality. She is a goddamn coward and need to grow up.

P.S.

Everything I wrote equally applies to me, yada-yada-yada.

Abrakadabra

You are Just plain wrong, and full of justifications. Ironic, since You are clearly not Just.

JackbeThimble

Has Cat ever killed someone that wasn't either an Enemy, a Criminal or some kind of immediate threat (like the demon-corrupted soldiers)? She's sacrificed her troops but that was always against enemies that were clearly worth the sacrifice. The only case I can think of where she voluntarily killed allies or innocents purely for her own benefit or to advance her own goals was letting the Lone Swordsman go.

Isa Lumitus

You know, it occurs to me that Cat might have a way to SERIOUSLY delay the upcoming war with Procer. All she needs is the tool Akua made: Liesse.

Liesse isn't a mere floating castle. It's an entire godsdamned city, the second biggest in Callow. That is a whole lot of earth and stone, attached to an enchantment to move it wherever needed. So if they can get it into the air again, why not land it in the middle of a choke-point in Red Flower Vale to plug Procer's only real entry point?

Even if there are ways around the landed city, Akua worked really hard to turn that into a giant fortress. Why not invest it with a garrison? I also doubt that Cat's team is going to kill all 100K wights. If she can seize the control spells, they could help defend the pass.

Procer might find a way to invade eventually, such as by conquering the Free Cities and entering from the South. I bet that would take several years, though.

Max Scherer

Im not really sure he got captured and more he let himself being captured to steer Cat in the 'right' Path and gods i hope he doesnt die here. I know at some point he probably will, but at this point in the story it would be just sooo predictable.

Stayer

Honestly for all we commend Cat she hasn't really accomplished any victory they were all mostly guided into by some other force and at best you could call them the best loss she could have gotten. For all the breaking the mould and outside the box she has never really surpassed her opponents in any meaningful way they all mostly got what they wanted, you can say she beat the Lone Swordsman but that really didnt bring her shit except more troubles. Honestly from my perspective the only one that truly understands whats going on is the Tyrant by simply not giving a shit, when in the end the whole struggle is mostly pointless might as well have fun with it.

vuthuha912

What are you talking about Akua? Of course, Cat is different from you. You are butchering your own people so you can have your 5 minutes Empire. Cat is fighting to stop you from fucking everybody over. She is protecting her country from a madwoman determined to ruin them. Black is fighting to give his people a chance to be more in life, to be more than just a monster in the story. He killed and cower Callow but he also build and nurture. You wouldn't even have the thoughts of lowering taxes during a bad harvest or funding the orphanages or letting the House of Light survive so that the public can access free healthcare. If you ever do any of these things, it is used to fuck somebody else over.

Cat and Black truly love their country. You love yourself first and foremost. To have 5 minutes of glory, you killed over 100,000 people. The one who is justifying the whole thing is you. You justified the butchering as iron shapes iron and bringing the old tradition back to Praes but you aren't even planning to survive, leaving Praes in the hand of its enemies. It isn't good enough. The philosophy that required people to be the best backstabbers is inferior to the one of protecting growth from greater threats. In the end, if the pile of bodies is the same then the philosophy will be the one to determine everything. The French Revolution killed thousands of people but can you say that the ideas they spread across the continent of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity aren't ideals that are worth fighting for. If they don't rise up would the idea that people are important even enter the minds of those ignorant aristocrats or will the party go on while the country starved to death. Let's French revolution this bitch Akua.

Ideas matter. The nun from the previous chapter is right but she is looking at this from such a small optimistic point of view. Human nature is not all good. Bad things happen and bad people exist. She is the lamb waiting to be slaughtered without Catherine protecting her. When people are hungry, how much would they be willing to be good? Human nature is not built to be tested. If they are pushed into the corner, they lie, they cheat and they kill. You need to be able to survive before you become a human. Human dignity only goes as far as their condition allows.

Chapter 64: Solo

"Food riots, is it? Well, I do enjoy when a problem is its own solution."

– Dread Empress Sanguinia I, the Gourmet

It was a funny thing, hate. Before a sword through the chest set me on the path to becoming the Squire, I'd thought I was beyond it. That learning to see beyond the grudges and the anger was what set me apart from the heroes that died like flies as I grew up. I'd thought that by setting aside the hate I would be able to act with my hands unfettered, to bring lasting change instead of raging against the Tower for half a year and getting my throat slit in my sleep. It'd been a peculiar kind of arrogance, but arrogance nonetheless. None of us could ever be clear as spring water, not even Black. His brand of vainglory was just shrewder than most – because could you really call one man setting himself against the entire Heavens anything but arrogance? People could step on ants without even noticing it, no matter how clever the ant. Oh, when Named spoke to each other we didn't call it arrogance. It was will, or madness, or half a dozen other little euphemisms that allowed us to feel slightly better about what we were doing. But that the end of the day, one truth always came out: to be Named was to believe, bone deep, that Creation should be a certain way. Beyond that it was just quibbling about the means you used to make sure it did.

It was conceit to believe I could be more than I was, some pure instrumentality of outcome or ideal. When I'd fought the greatest monsters of Arcadia, we'd called them gods. Lesser gods, of course – even in hushed whispers, deference must be afforded to the prickly holders of the penultimate thrones – but gods nonetheless. I should have understood it properly then, because what were even the most powerful of the fae but Named with the weight of millennia behind them? It was why they'd lost. Because when they'd come down to Creation, to this messy battlefield of ours, they'd been forced to fashion themselves into people. In Arcadia, they were perfect: not in the sense of flawlessness, no, but in the way that a cog in a machine fit exactly the form and purpose it was meant for. A god made to masquerade as a mortal had the fatal flaw of perfection removed from the perfect. But us Named? Oh, we were different breed. Mortals made gods, or at least clawing at the foot of that golden pedestal. Born of a fractured thing we took up those sharp edges and wielded them like blades to cut at each other. An aspect was not a reward in some arcane lottery arranged by the Gods, it was a wound. A hurt, a disappointment, a rage made into knife.

And in matters of self-mutilation I had few rivals.

So I seized my hatreds and accepted them for what they were: the foundations of my power. I'd been told once that a Name could not spring from void, but that'd been untrue. It was Roles that were shaped by the currents of Creation, left glittering and polished stones at the bottom of the riverbed. Names were something more... intimate. A collection of sharp moments before and ahead of you. Huddling hungry under covers, after the price of bread had risen. Blood in my mouth as I fought a man too large and strong to beat, defeat crawling ever closer. It was a lesson on the nature of stories, learned by burned shores. It was a faceless tribunal whose verdict I had refused. I'd tried for so long to make something of all this, to weave together a tale that did not have bile rising in my throat. But there was nothing sacred about baring your blade, nothing laudable about telling the world it must bend or break. If I disdained the lay of Creation as ordained by the Gods, the banners of black and white, then I must either make my own or find myself nothing but a butcher among butchers. And so I took those vivid moments and made them a blade, and that blade I bared once more. It could begin here, under cover of moonless night.

It would.

The darkness did not spread, it fell. There was a sky above but not one that could be touched. It was not a boundary, a ceiling. It was a pit above, a biting void of nothingness that could not be filled. In front of me the hand of the wight froze with a snapping sound and my boot came down, shattering flesh and bone. I leapt down onto the street and found myself among a host of silent statues. Stillness alone reigned as I tread forward, leather creaking softly against the frosted ground. The Diabolist had set an army before me, one a Squire could not hope to scatter. But it had been some time since I was only that, and where Catherine Foundling would have been checked the Duchess of Moonless Nights strode unimpeded. I was not truly doing any of this, I thought as I walked through the ranks and passed a wight that simply... fell apart when my cloak brushed its frame. This was not a spell, sorcery as I understood it. It was, as Masego had said, a domain. The old and merciless cold of this place was as much a part of it as the unbroken black of the sky. My own kingdom of winter and night, and in this place all but me were guests. I wondered what it said of me, that this was the shape my own soul made realm had come to take.

Nothing pleasant, I suspected.

The silhouettes and edifices were juxtaposed, I instinctively knew, not fully drawn into the domain. They had existence both inside and outside of it, and so did I. A domain, not merely a weapon, I mused. There was more to this than an eldritch killing blow. The gate to the Ducal Palace was closed and had once been warded. But this was Winter, the land of soft silent deaths and unending hunger. The cold devoured it all, stripping it bare until a flick of my fingers had the gates falling from the hinges and even the last wisps of sorcery died. Beyond the gate awaited men and devils, and these were not so empty as the wights. There were still specks of warmth at the heart of them, like trembling candles. An indifferent glance was enough to smother them, like pinching the wick with a thumb and a finger. I climbed the steps that paved the way to the hall even in this silent world of mine, watching wards and wights flicker out around me. There was something ahead, I could feel it. A boundary to this place that should have none. I went through stairs and galleries, treading the graveyard of my own making until ahead of me hateful warmth gleamed before my eyes. Light red and yellow, a circle slowly turning with images I could not truly see inscribed inside.

A ward, one meant to check fae. Thresholds must already be growing difficult, yes? Warlock's voice whispered in my ear. I let out a breath cold as the air around me and rolled my shoulder to limber it, then struck at the ward as hard as I could. Something shattered, but it was not Akua's magic. Like a broken mirror the world around me cracked and crumbled, colour and heat rushing back around me. I stood in the same hallway than before, every surface covered in ice and steaming. All things came to an end, it seemed. Not merely the good. I was tempted to unsheath my blade and try to force my way through the ward again, now looking like an innocuous door of oak, but I was not a rat running through Akua's maze. I would not spend my strength against walls she had tailored to hold me back. Instead I closed my eyes and sharpened my senses, sinking deeper into my Name. I'd slaughtered my way into here, but I'd not been that thorough in the killing. There would be remains to find. After ten long breaths I finally heard heartbeats and footsteps, but not to the sides. There was only the silence of the grave there. Above. Threading my will into the ice covering the ceiling I thickened it, sunk its claws into the stone until it cracked. Then, without further ceremony, I crouched and leapt upwards.

Stone shattered around me and I emerged in a rain of shards, landing on a gutted carpet. There were three men in the room, and a crawling shape that was not anything of the sort. They screamed, unsurprisingly, and I noted with distant amusement that the walls and only door of the room had been covered in wards akin to the one Akua had set below.

"An amateur mistake," I told them. "Not covering every surface."

The creature of pink and bloated flesh on the ground opened a maw that was like a lizard's, if the scales had been ripped away, and a long black tongue extended. On it a triad of red eyes were set, and as they glared at me I felt lethargy seep into my frame. I let Winter flood my veins and the assault dissipated like morning mist. My sword left the scabbard and in one smooth movement spun around my hand so I could nail the devil's head to the floor. The men, Soninke all three of them, were mages. Panic remained but bled into sorcery, hasty incantations barked. A spear of purple flame sizzled to my side as I stepped around the spell, pivoting fluidly to avoid the stream of dark tar-like fluid shot by another mage. The third, to my amusement, did not even attempt a blow. He disappeared into thin air, veiled behind an illusion. I moved forward, sword carving through the fire-wielders' chest then taking him by the shoulder and spinning the dying man around so he could shield me from the shower of white sparks the other one cast. Flesh melted under them, eaten away cleanly, but that did not prevent the mage from being bowled over by his comrade's corpse when I tossed it at him. Sharpening my ears I waited for the sound of footsteps and found the last one attempting to flee by the door.

"Predictable," I chided.

I flicked my wrist and a spear of shadow tore through the illusion, going straight through the man's stomach but splashing harmlessly against the warded wall. I did not spare another glance for the corpse, instead turning to the only survivor. He managed to push the corpse I'd thrown at him to the side, only to find the tip of my sword resting on his throat. He swallowed, the lump in his throat moving as he did.

"Mercy, High One," he croaked. "I surrender."

"I thought about it," I said. "Having one of you still breathing guide me through the mess. But there's always the risk you'll lie, you see."

"I would never," he swore.

"You won't," I agreed, and the sword point flicked down to plunge into his heart.

He twitched, gurgled and even as life began to leave him I poured Winter inside his frame. When I tore out my sword, his eyes were already blue.

"Get up," I told my newest helper. "I haven't damaged your throat, so you should be able to talk."

He rose, but said nothing. I sighed. Undead.

"Say something," I ordered.

"Something," the corpse said.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. I, it had to be said, had literally asked for that.

"Tell me everything you know about the defences the Diabolist built in the palace," I ordered. "We can begin with that ward down below, and how I can get past it."

Dead men, as it turned out, did tell tales.

To absolutely no one's surprise, Diabolist redefined the meanings of 'overly complicated' and 'cripplingly paranoid'. The Ducal Palace was essentially a labyrinth of wards and traps that no one but her knew the full lay of. Akua was rumoured – but not confirmed – to have a metaphorical skeleton key that would let her pass through everything unharmed but her many minions had to make do with being keyed in on at most a handful of wards. My talkative corpse couldn't even get me through the one I'd failed to quite literally punch through earlier. He did know how to get past the equivalent on the second floor, but not how to go any further than that. Neither he nor his buddies had been high enough the pecking order for that. This was something of a problem, especially after I confirmed that the first contingency following the palace being attacked was every soldier within ten blocks rushing to secure it. I was going to be up in my neck in enemies if I didn't hurry, and this entire place was designed to make hurrying more or less impossible. I'd freely admit that puzzles weren't something I particularly enjoyed, so the notion of spending a few hours being swarmed by wights while trying to figure out how Diabolist's mind worked was not high on my list of priorities.

So I'd taken another angle.

The newly-renamed First Volunteer, after being squeezed for every drop of information he knew on the palace defences, was told to guide me to the next knot of mages that were holed up. Diabolist had crafted this ridiculously complicated maze for me to run through? Fine. I could deal with that. I just needed to kill and raise mages until I had enough around to figure out the way through to her. It still took me the better part of an hour before I saw real progress. With seven dead mages trailing behind me I finally go to a window on the edge of the west wing overlooking the central courtyard. Behind it I could see the centre of the palace, where they all agreed the throne room would be. I turned towards my panoply of undead and cleared my throat.

"Should Have Ducked," I said. "That section of the palace, does it have more of the threshold wards?"

A man with most his cheek missing watched me with blue eyes.

"It does not," he replied.

I glanced at my most recent acquisitions, A Dress Is Not Armour and Surprisingly A Bleeder, who were standing impossibly still.

"Either of you ever been in there?" I probed.

I got twins shake of the head in reply. Diabolist had restricted access to that part of her lair to her inner circle, apparently, none of which I'd managed to get my hands on. I wasn't eager to enter there blind, but I'd already had to abandon one way through because the wights had caught up and it was only a matter of time before they got to here as well. Breaking the window and making my way on foot was, according to these fellows, enough for me to enter. That reeked of trap, but not one I could afford to avoidk. If Diabolist really did have Black, leaving her the time to cook up a ritual was the worst thing I could do. I'd had my Named ripped out in this very city once, and though I wasn't sure whether the alignment that had allowed that to happen still existed it was not a risk I wanted to take. I was not unaware I might not be the target this time, if she pulled that ritual again. For a moment I considered taking the dead mages with me, but just as quickly I dismissed the notion. Taking corpses in a fight with a Praesi sorcerer was just asking to get fucked with.

"You are to destroy each other with fire," I ordered. "The last remaining mage is to destroy themselves using the same."

They bowed and I raised an eyebrow. I hadn't ordered that. The longer I kept them around, the smarter they were getting. I was breaking the glass with the pommel of my sword when the first flash of fire erupted behind me, but I didn't look back. I landed in the courtyard in a crouch and wasted no time out in the open. A good thing, too. Streaks of flame immediately began to bloom above, lashing down in my direction. Stone blew up behind me as I ran and more streaks formed ahead. Best not to get hit by that, I mused. I'd probably walk away still alive, but not without some damage I could ill afford. There was servant's entrance up ahead but also two other flame arrays lighting up so I swerved to the side and went straight for the wall instead. There was sorcery in it, but it did not feel like the wards that'd blocked me. My perception wasn't sharp enough to get more than that. Name flaring, I rolled out of the way of fire that left smoking trails in the stone where I'd been a heartbeat ago and came out standing right in front of the wall. Sending the power to my fist, I swung against the stone. Triumphant I felt the stone give, but what followed was less pleasant.

The closest description I could put into words was that it was like swinging at a spinning wheel. The stone gave for a moment, but then force came back at me and blew me off my feet. Flame came down from the side and I formed a pane of ice at the last moment but the fire evaporated it and thundered through. I angled myself so that my cloak would catch the worst of it and still half my pauldron was torn off, leaving behind a smoking mess. Fuck, I eloquently thought as I legged it before I could be turned into a smoking crater by the next volley. I did not fancy my chances with the servant entrance, either. Even if I made it there unharmed I could not seriously believe Diabolist wouldn't cover the obvious way in. She lived in there, so there had to be a convenient path inside for her inevitable servants and attendants, but that didn't mean she had to leave it there when fighting an invasion. That left... I glanced to the side. A long way around, into what looked like a ripped up garden. Mostly open ground. I leapt away from another strike and slid across the stone, noticing as I did that the first hit was followed by another two immediately. Were the arrays focusing? Shit. Yeah, garden was out. I looked at the wall I'd failed to break and bit my lip. All right, Catherine, what do we do when we can't go through? I cocked my head to the side, then frowned. Well, it could hardly be worse than the garden path. Probably.

I ran back for the wall, ducking another volley by the skin of my teeth. Diabolist's ward had punched back, but only when I'd tried to go through. So there was a chance this would work. Also that I would die, but that came around as a possible outcome with depressing regularity. A twist of will had a handhold of ice forming on the surface. I'd seen the Watch do something similar once – wait, no, I was going about this wrong. I threw myself off the wall as fire struck the surface and, damnably, was almost immediately spat out mere inches away from where I was. No matter. I landed on a platform of shadow and began working my way up. Much easier. Going upwards instead of sideways was trickier, but as it turned out a much shorter path. Four passes had me leaping through a window that had felt absent of wards and I rolled through the wood and glass shards to rise smoothly to my feet. The window had felt like an oversight. It had not been, I learned almost immediately. All the surrounding surfaces were warded, more discreetly, and behind me I heard the sound of flame lashing out through the opening.

"I can't believe I fell for that," I admitted.

Definitely should have kept going up all the way to the roof, I mused. I managed to throw myself out of the way before the array torched me, at which point the situation cheerfully continued proceeding downhill. I really should have known: Praesi never turned down the opportunity to fuck you over twice when it was on the table. Around me were the same spinning wards as outside: when the streaks of fire hit the wall, they started to ricochet wildly in every direction. Too quickly for me to avoid. I hid under my cape but the impact was still enough to smash me into the wall, which fucking smashed me back because of course it would. Then another array shot fire into the room, and at that point there was more flame than empty space in this place. I was about to reluctantly try to use an aspect to force my way out when there was another explosion. The door flew off the hinges, smacking me in the side. I took it in stride, flipping the wooden surface to reflect another streak of fire, and then from the corner of my eye I saw a green, ugly mug pop out of the door frame.

"So," Robber grinned, "about that promotion."

wirelessgrapes

Wait, when was the last time we saw Robber? Has he been in Liesse this whole time?

ALKATYN

I think so yes. She talked about having agents in Leisse before, not sure if it was explicitly named as Robber, but pretty obvious given his absence at the battle.

Relatedly, since he seems to have managed to bypass the various wards does this mean he now has a name aspect or something?

werafdsaew

Not just Robber, but his entire goblin cohorts. See Chapter 59: Anacrusis; "As for Robber and his cohort ... What I had in mind for them did not involve being out in the open."

The Ice Zombies seem ridiculously powerful. Pretty sure all zombies we've seen so far were totally non-sentient. Hers seem to fully remember their past and be capable of obeying instructions intelligently. (Were they using magic to set each other on fire at the end there? If so serious game breaker.)

Also I love that we now have Blue Eyed Ice Zombies and Wights in the same battle. We just need a few dragons to finish it off

And we have been shown some of the Dead Kings undead Heroes.

stevenneiman

The ice zombies also lead to a rather terrifying possibility: Once the final member of the team (Don't Fuck With My People) joins, Cat can have her explain all kinds of interesting things to Masego. He deserves a reward for dealing with those demons and mages, after all.

CipherJ

Lesser lesser footrest tribe

Gunslinger

We get to see Fall in it's full glory and such a joy it is. The highlight though are the zombie names, such a talent. Also the fact that her winter zombies were becoming smarter will totally not be relevant later. Totally.

Ohh and vote for The Guide on topwebfiction if you can <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

soonnanandnaanssoon

At this rate, I won't be surprised if the Sixteenth Legion or its equivalent will all be Winter Zombies. Cognomen? Coldhearted.

Mr. Nobody

She could use zombies as her new personal guard. Use deserters or enemies to make them.

Decius

Deserters, enemies, or the Gallowborne.

"I didn't say that your service stopped when you died."

TotesOlive

I feel like Cat is on the fast track to a Villain turned Anti Hero/Neutral Force to be Reckoned with like Ranger.

nick012000

>"So," Robber grinned, "about that promotion."

And here I thought Providence was a benefit that Heroes were supposed to get. I guess that she's filling that Role here, though?

stevenneiman

He might get as high as Senior Footrest.

I consider it very much an outside chance, but it would have me rolling on the floor laughing if any rank of Footrest actually grew into a Name.

Draco

If Cat makes it something story worthy and the position stays for awhile (doing the same sort of job) it would actually become a name. If I remember from book 1 correctly names are made because similar stories keep repeating themselves within Creation and after awhile the name arises to continue that story happening.

Engineer

Awesome. So if Cat can transition during this venture she will probably have enough power to basically raise every single legionary that died during this shit show and then have 2 extra legions in addition to her own. Under her sovereign control.

Now THAT'S how you answer Procer's challenge.

Gunslinger

Black Queen? Zombie Knight? Or maybe Cat's aspect of Black Knight (it black relinquishes his name)

Laberlampe

Damn that was a good chapter. The beginning was just...awesome and then the zombies were cracking me up. Thanks for the chapter.

ALKATYN

This also seems to be the first time we've seen her fully embrace her title as Duchess of Moonless Nights. Previously she has just been using standard winter powers of ice and cold, but she now seems to be controlling her Domain in the same way as an aspect.

Valkyria

Well but there's also a downside. Since it's a fae title it means she now is even more fae when she accepts it. Before that she distanced herself from it because it meant giving into another title/role, especially since she is the last Duchess of Winter now. That sure has a weight to it.

werafdsaew

So how does Robber gets in when the palace warded to hell and back?

Devin 0

Probably with Thief's help, she's got a power that lets her bypass wards.

boballab

Yep and that earlier explosion where Akua stated she had that trap for Thief because of how they stole Summer's Sun was probably Robber setting off a bomb to make Akua think that. You just have to keep the intro paragraph from Interlude: Commanders in mind when it comes to Cat an battle plans:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/08/30/interlude-commanders/>

Akua is making the biggest mistake of all: She thinks she knows what Cat will do and plan looking at the past and she is overlooking what happened before in that same city when she did that same thing. Last time she lost the chance to trap an Angel this time it will cost her, her life. I wonder if Cat would raise her as a Zombie and name her Too Big For Her Britches.

RandomFan

An interesting thought: If Cat's zombies are-or-become people with wills of their own, it might be possible for named zombies to retain or reacquire names. Of course, this is probably completely impossible and is prone to backfiring in the worst possible way, but if you merely wanted to cause havoc with no care to the cost, letting lose even a half-dozen truly named undead is probably better than invisible tigers- even if they're all heroes and betray you immediately, the political consequences of undead heroes are horrifying.

Ethesis

Boballab's comment is the one I've had in mind.

One side note is that Diabolist has to survive this with enough power left to challenge the Empress.

Cat doesn't.

TheAtomicOption

I love Robber so much. I hope he's next to get a Name.

Halinn

Are you saying that Lesser Footrest is not a Name?

NZPIEFACE

Merely a title.
Give it some time.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Joey Wheel

Beautiful chapter!!!

Death Knight becoming all the more likey.

Robber might just get a name at this rate—this much personal influence is maybe good enough for a Story.

Thanks~~~

Panic

On a completely unrelated note. What ever did happen to the plot point of Goblins wanting to settle just outside of Marchford?

ayon96

I think we'll see more of it in the epilogue of this book

Keyen

Not really a concern when the country burns. Priorities. We are not even sure they still want to do that since there is a portal to arcadia in the middle of the marketplace, now.

Adurna

Is that not the perfect opportunity for an enterprising goblin tribe?

Keyen

It's not world of warcraft, they don't give a shit about money.

Adurna

I was thinking amassing power and favors rather than money. If there is a group that could successfully play that off over time I believe it would be the goblins. They might still not want to of course, but it could very well be an opportunity, not to mention that not being an attractive place might let them be left more alone than otherwise.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Ah Dungeon Crawling against evil sorceresses, gotta keep up the traditions.

Ben

So, the transition has officially started now, right?

This chapter seemed really heavy on her transcending the title of Squire.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Examples? How was is heavily suggesting that?

alegio

So... is Robber getting promoted to from lesser footrest to simply footrest? Or some kind of more advanced footrest?

Euodiachloris

The dizzying heights of "Piano Stool" await! 😊

nigeltheoutlaw

Great chapter as always. Really looking forward to seeing Catherine gut Akua and hang her by her own intestines.

Drd

Now there's an image that makes me feel all warm and fuzzy on the inside. 😊

Ethesis

We've seen Warlock (and that line about keeping enough power to defend himself worries me) but Black's other companions are still in hidden play.

Loved the end of this chapter.

nipi

Typo:

"That reeked of trap, but not one I could afford to avoidk."
avoidk -> avoid

nipi

"Praesi never turned down the opportunity to fuck you over twice when it was on the table."

I sense a double meaning. Im sure Cat knows what she is talking about.

Aidan Dearlove

"Greater Footstool to the Queen of Callow"

kanadaj

Now that I think about it, what are Hierophant's aspects?

Darkening

He's pretty new to the name, I dunno if he's been stressed enough or had enough time to even develop any? Hm. I don't believe we've seen him use any on screen at least.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Akua unlocked all her Demonist aspects in like a day, so Masego almost certainly did too, we just don't know what they are

Keyen

It's currently unknown

Chapter 65: Elision

"A hero should not confuse striking at Evil and doing Good, lest their Good become the act of striking."

– Theodore Langman, Wizard of the West

I slumped against the wall, catching my breath, and resisted the urge to deck Robber in the face. He looked like he was enjoying this way too much for it to be healthy. That'd been a close call, inside the room. At this point I was unsure whether Diabolist was actually out to kill me or not – she'd been hinting pretty heavily she wanted me to be the Black to her second-rate Malicia – but just letting me get hammered by those arrays until I was burnt pulp would have been enough to get me captured even if it didn't get me dead. Dead might be the better outcome of the two, if it came to that. Assuming it even stuck.

"How the fuck did you all get in here?" I panted.

Robber alone, I could have bought. He was tricky that way. But there was a full line skulking around the corridor. Some were wounded, I noted, and not just by blades: there were tell-tale marks of spellfire on some of their gear. They'd been in a scrap before getting here, but I'd assume not even the Special Tribune's pack of marauders had been audacious enough to assault this horror of a palace. Goblins were a blade best used in the dark or in the enemy's back. There was a reason they weren't put in shield walls.

"Special Tribune Robber, ready to report," the wretch said, sparkling with insolence.

I was going to regret this, I suspected. But at least odds were good I'd be able to sift out a few useful nuggets out of the mixture of lies and blatant exaggerations he would offer.

"Proceed," I sighed.

That he saluted with the wrong hand before beginning to speak, I thought, was likely emblematic of what was about to follow.

"So," Robber said, "we were just walking around, staying out of trouble."

"Were you," I flatly said.

"I'm a great believer in the sanctity of law and order," Robber said, putting hand over his chest.

It was, I noticed as a splitting headache dawned, over the wrong side to be covering his heart. Idly I glanced up and chalked up the lack of thunder following that audacious blasphemy as yet another sign the Gods Above were washing their hands clean of this whole mess.

"Then wights started swarming over the arrays we were supposed to blow up, which was all right," the goblin told me. "But then mages showed up, and the key places got locked up real tight. So then Captain Borer – that's him right there, a repeat troublemaker I've had to report him several times--"

I glanced at the side where he was pointing and found a smaller goblin, with dark green skin tinted even darker over where his eyebrows would be if his kind weren't hairless. It made it look like he was perpetually frowning. He looked pained, but also reluctant to outright contradict a superior officer.

"We should make trouble, is what Borer said," the Special Tribune blithely continued. "It's pathologic with him, I've been looking into getting him a mind healer."

"I imagine they'd take a single look at you and run screaming," I mused.

"That's racist, Boss," Robber informed me, trying to give me what I assumed to be doe eyes but ended up looking like a goblin wearing some poor doe's skin and batting his eyes through the horrifying flesh mask. "Anyway, as the qualified voice of reason I put my foot down. Was about to look for some important people to help have some falls down the stairs when we ran into Lord Black."

My eyes sharpened and I leaned forward. This was the first I'd heard of my teacher since we'd parted ways, unless you counted Diabolist boasting she'd captured him.

"He's not with you anymore?" I pressed.

"No," Captain Borer said, before I could be strung around some more.

"That's another gold star of shame for you, Captain," Robber told him with a leering grin. "I expect you to wear all twenty-three of them on your chest when we return to camp."

"You don't have to do that," I told the poor bastard. "Robber, stop fucking around. I don't have the time to spare. Where's Black?"

The goblin turned serious, or at least as much as close as he could ever get.

"He took us to visit an old friend," he replied. "General Fasili Mirembe. The Carrion Lord figured he wasn't outside with the vanguard, you see. He had to be in a room somewhere he could command from without risking his very expensive blood."

"Why target him?" I frowned. "Diabolist is the head of the snake. Fasili getting the axe wouldn't actually change much."

"That's exactly what Borer said," Robber baldly lied. "Only much less respectful. The Black Knight did that weird smile thing – I see where you get it from now, it was kind of uncomfortable seeing it on another face – and told us that if you want to learn how to bury a villain, the first person to hit up is always their second."

My fingers clenched.

"He was after something that Fasili would have," I said.

"Skeleton key," the goblin said. "There's only supposed to be one, but you can't stab your warchief in the back if you can't get to her."

"That's how you got in here," I deduced. "But your people look like they've fought. There was resistance?"

"There was a whole garrison of dead around him," Robber acknowledged. "We couldn't handle that much, not even going in quiet. So Lord Black made a distraction."

I closed my eyes and silently cursed. Fucking Hells, Black. A dangerous gamble at the darkest hour that would allow extremely important information to reach me in my moment of need? That explained why Robber had gotten here exactly when I needed him to – my teacher had effectively twisted Creation's arm into ensuring as much. At the price, it seemed, of getting overwhelmed by Akua's minions and taken prisoner. He was playing shatranj with us all and treating himself a piece like any other. I spat to the side and turned my gaze onto Robber.

"If it went down this way, you'll have gotten more than a key," I said.

That large a sacrifice would have impact. It would get me an edge of some sort.

"He told me to pass along a message," the goblin said, and this time there was no humour in his voice. "It went 'Only one strike. Make it count.'"

And there it was. The way out of the coming trap that Diabolist would have laid for me. I grit my teeth. We would have words about this, if he survived the day.

"How much of your cohort is left?" I asked Robber.

"A bare hundred," the Special Tribune replied. "Dug-in mages are tricky to handle."

Considering that meant half his men were gone, that was something of an understatement. I rose to my feet and rolled my shoulder. Those fire arrays had stung, cloak or not.

"All right," I said. "Here's what you're going to do."

I spoke, and as I did his grin got a whole lot nastier.

I'd been taught that, while assaulting the stronghold of a villain, there were three things to watch out for.

The first was the monster. It wasn't always a greater devil or a demon, though admittedly that was the traditional Wasteland playbook. Some entity, usually difficult to handle, would be leashed somewhere in the lair to be used as a way to beat down an enemy too powerful for the villain themselves to handle. It was too much to hope that in this case it would be the greater devil we'd shanked before entering Liesse — that'd been a gatekeeper, and while it would have been difficult to handle on my own it wasn't the kind of brutal counterstroke that someone with Diabolist's resources would be able to keep around. I had a fight ahead of me, and it wasn't going to be a pleasant one. My advantage here was that even by villainous standards, Akua was massively arrogant. She wanted me for her attack dog, apparently, so she wouldn't open the game by sending whatever her monster was after me. She'd want the personal touch, at least until I backed her in a corner and those kinds of considerations went out the window. Considering I'd had to hack my way through both fae courts over the last year to varying degrees, my bet was on something related to Arcadia. I'd even had Masego and Archer send Summer after her neck a few months ago, so it made sense that I'd be made to pay for that one way or another.

The second was the trial, because there was more to killing a villain than just running them through. There was always a cost, a crucible you had to go through to earn that kill. The peasant boy that ended up slaying the dragon didn't just pick up the magic sword in a rubbish heap, he had to bleed first. What made a hero a hero wasn't the fancy weapon or the birth right, it was the courage. Or whatever other trite and actually fairly common quality they'd had in them all along. The shade that had once owned the sword would force a test, or the devil guarding the phylactery whisper some sweet temptation. I was of the opinion that lacking that kind of trial was why the Lone Swordsman hadn't gone out in the blaze of glory, just two stomps to the back of the neck. We'd been opposed, yes. But there'd been little personal about it except for mutual dislike. To me he'd been a means and then a liability. To him I'd been a symbol of everything he wanted to destroy. Behind that, neither of us had thought of the other as more than a stepping stone towards the real fight. Diabolist wasn't a lit sharper tossed at me by the Hashmallim, though. The higher the both of us rose, the clearer it had become that the story could only end with one of us dead or kneeling. I was partial to dead. That wouldn't come without a price.

The third was the pivot. Fight between Named were never as simple as who pulled out their aspects first or who was better with spell and sword. While an animated corpse without a single aspect and a shaky mantle, I'd been able to beat a still-fresh Heiress and Lone Swordsman in Liesse because while they went for blood I'd gone for the story. It'd felt like a complicated thing to juggle at the time, but in retrospect it'd been fairly straightforward. Here, now that we'd returned to the very city where I'd once died, there were a dazzling amount of moving parts. Black. Warlock and the Woe. The Empress. And Diabolist herself. That last thread, in my eyes, was what would make or break this day. There was a moment ahead where the weight of Creation's attention would be on both our shoulders, and when that moment came the one of us who made the choice first was going to be the one who got to walk away. There was a lot of danger to that. Spinning that wheel with William had been one thing because the Lone Swordsman, for all his many flaws, had principles. He had lines he hesitated to cross even for a win, if only a few. Diabolist did not. Her principle, ironically enough, was the same that the Legions had chanted outside her gate. Victory mattered, everything else was dross. If I wanted to win, I had to go into that room ready to cut down something I loved.

She had Black. I did not like the forming shape of this.

My sword was already bared when I found the heart of the palace. The Dukes of Liesse had been kings, once, and their ancestral seat still looked the part. The flight of steps before me had not been built to be lightly ascended. The granite was rough, the steps too tall for more than one at a time to be climbed. What began as a broad procession grew narrow as it rose, leading to tall gates of bronze that now stood sealed. Behind them, I knew, awaited the woman I had come to kill. Sorcery permeated the air here, so thick that every movement felt like I was stirring unseen wisps. So thick I could not tell if there was an array hidden, which meant there was one. The very trap, I thought, that Black had let himself be taken to help me beat.

I took a step forward and split.

Catherine Foundling found herself tired, after a hard bout in the Pit, and slept at the Rat's Nest. She never stumbled across a man raping a girl, or what came of it.

Catherine Foundling bet on herself in the Pit and lost, without having meant to. Her savings thinned. She never earned enough to go to the College.

Catherine Foundling had watch sergeant's a hand around her throat, choking the life out of her. The man began to speak, but through his belly emerged a sword that keened.

My boot touched the stone. I was myself, across three lives I had never lived and one I was living. I began the climb in utter silence.

Catherine stood in the crowd when they hung Governor Mazus. It was vindication, sealed by the choked cries of the man that was just another Wasteland leech. But the Rat's Nest would not pay for her her tuition in Ater, not anymore, so she sought Booker and made a deal. In the months that followed she no longer came on the nights where bruises were what men paid for. She earned gold with a sword in hand, catering to the howls a mob that would settle for nothing less than death. The coin she earned was drenched in blood, but blood was the trade she had chosen and she made her peace with that truth. Catherine did not know blades well, when she began, and her opponents did. She learned, but when she stood among the crowd of cadets awaiting placement in a company she had only one eye and more scars than a girl her age should have.

Coin was what killed the dream, not the schemes of foes she would never meet. Catherine found her savings disappearing like smoke, and Harrion telling her the Rat's Nest could not longer afford her was the final nail in the coffin. It was a bitter truth, and the bitterness seeped into her bones. The orphanage had taught her enough for a position as a tutor or tradeswoman, but the thought of it had her choking in anger. Impotence cut deepest of all. When Governor Mazus hung she was not in the crowd: her brawl with a guard that had hands prone to wandering had ended with the woman's neck snapped. Marked for the gaol, barred from the Pit by Booker, she took the offer when it came. Better the Smugglers than the Assassins or the Thieves, she decided.

Catherine did not believe in heroes, but she believed in debts. When two monsters cloaked in black arrived in the alley and struck at her saviour over the cooling corpses of her would-be murderers, she chose her side. They survived only by the skin of their teeth, the Lone Swordsman losing a hand to a moving shadow as a large woman turned into twisted abomination. They fled the alley, the city, the region. It was doomed, she knew. The monsters always won here. But for the first time since she'd been born Catherine Foundling breathed free air, and it was intoxicating. William learned to listen to her, after she opened the throat of the first Eye of the Empire after them. It was in Summerholm that her Name found her. Squire, the Heavens whispered. She knew whose death was needed to become more.

The War College taught Catherine her limits. She was good. Swift with a sword, clever with her mind and with a talent for the unexpected. Tiger Company fostered her skills, seeing in her lieutenant or captain in the making, and for a time she was sergeant under the cold-eyed ogre they called Hune. It was not the already-famous Hellhound that put blood in her mouth. It was Lizard Company, Morok's brutes shattering her tenth and leaving her broken on the ground. One of the orcs stomped her wrist twice, calling her Waller spawn, and it never healed properly. She never forgave their kind for that, not the wound but the blind ugly hate she glimpsed in the orc's eye. Goblins were tribe of their own, regardless of company, and the better Praesi pretended she did not exist. The worst made sport of her, and settling that with teeth on the ground made her as feared as she was alone. She had the talent to make captain, but was never elected by the others. Sergeant was the highest she ever rose at the College.

Catherine could afford the tuition now – and she could ten times over, because she was good with a lie and even better with a knife – but she no longer wanted to go. She'd had a glimpse of the true face of her people, beyond the well-worn stories of the Old Kingdom. Every night she rubbed elbows with murderers and thieves, not one of them Wastelander. What was there to save? Within two years there were only two above her in Liesse who belonged to the Guild of Smugglers, and only one after gold and whispers were traded. She left the title to the other, but the reins were her own. The quotas imposed by the Tower rankled, but she knew better than provoke that beast. It was the rest of the gutter she turned to, the forgotten and the ignored. The Hedge Guild folded first, after their most dangerous mage was found strung up downtown. The King of Thieves stole two shipments from Mercantis as a warning against great ambitions, so when she got her hands on him she melted down his pretty crown and poured it down his throat. The Assassins offered truce. She told them to kneel. Blood followed.

They killed their first Calamity the day before she turned eighteen. The Warlock was a monster, but a monster who loved his son. That was the death of him, and half Summerholm as well. The Penitent's Blade beheaded the sorcerer among the ashes of his tower and Squire mustered enough kindness to have the Apprentice's corpse left by his side for the Praesi to bury. They were growing. Thief, Bumbling Conjuror, Hunter and Bard. William found them and bound them, but it was Catherine who made a sword of them all, that wielded it against the Empire. The scent of rebellion was in the air. They ghosted across the land of her birth, followed by a thousand spies, and wherever they went governors and generals died. The Empress sent more. The Black Knight drew them into Liesse and burned the city around them but they were gone, gone through the corpse of an angel and back to haunt him soon enough. Procer sent coin and promises but both were spurned. They had sworn to see Callow free, whatever the cost. One foreign master would not be traded for another, and as the flames burned higher and the graveyards grew full.

She was twenty-three when rebellion came to Callow. Long past the College, Captain Foundling had seen luck good and ill. The Fourteenth Legion, raised in the year after her graduation, had offered better opportunity to rise than the old legions already thick with veterans. But peace, oh peace was her trouble. It took three years to go from lieutenant to captain, and the tribunes above her were all young and hale. Her company was obedient and well-drilled, but loved her little. Most were Praesi, and her reputation in Ater had followed her to the camp. The droplet that tipped over the cup was that the Fourteenth never fought. It was sent to garrison Summerholm as the other Legions fought, dispersing riots and patrolling empty streets as her desperate countrymen died in droves in the south. Vindication, that the Empire could not be fought and beaten. Vindication but no hope. It had been long since Captain Foundling was last kind, not since she'd killed men for gold in the Pit, and so her conscience went untroubled when she slipped poison in her superior officer's ale.

That was the game, in the Wasteland, and if it must be played she would. She would rise whatever the cost, to her or anyone else. After that it was only a matter of patience and skill. Staff Tribune Foundling was twenty-nine, when civil war erupted, and through chaos she rose higher still.

The Guild of Assassins cost her a hand and a permanent limp, before they were broken over her knee. From blood-filled gutters Catherine Foundling fashioned her crown. There was only one throne in the Empire, this she knew, but come night from Harrow to Dormer her will was the writ of law. The Tolltaker they called her now, for there was no sin under Callowan sky she did not get a cut from. A woman with ink-stained hands came one morning and presented her two scrolls. One held a seal, the Tower's own. The other a list of quotas. It was not a negotiation, and neither of them pretended otherwise. She thought of that, when the heroes came and asked for a way to enter Summerholm unseen. They were going to kill the Black Knight, they promised. She smiled and said she would arrange it. The coin she got from selling their location to the Praesi was spent on a beautiful mansion in Whitestone, where the nobles of Laure still huddled and pretended relevance. After the heroes were all killed, she put it to the torch. Because she could. Because she had no reason not to. To remind the soft-bellied aristocrats living there of what fear tasted like. She watched the flames and wondered when it had all stopped mattering.

My boot scuffed the last step and I stood before the gate. Closed, but kept so by sorcery. It parted without a sound when I pushed and before me the throne room stretched. Tapestries hung from the rafters like columns, each an old triumph of the Empire presented in colourful cloth. The contrast to the bare stone of the floor was stark. Runes shone on the walls and balls of blue flame lit up the darkness bright as day. My gaze moved to the back, where the Diabolist awaited. Languidly sprawled on the old throne of the kings of the south, Akua Sahelian watched me with bright eyes. There was no sign of Black. She wasn't keeping him here, then.

"Swiftness, Catherine," she smiled, "has ever been your unmaking. You never learned patience."

"Break," I replied coldly.

The throne shattered like a cheap bauble and the wall behind it too. Diabolist fell prone, laughing, and I had no intention of allowing her to cast. Frost formed at the edge of my sword as I shot forward, granite cracking under the force.

"What your Hierophant has wrought, I claim," Akua said.

The last word reverberated. Aspect, I thought. Then it felt like a hand around my throat, and I screamed. There was a vice around me, and as my Name desperately clawed at it I found myself stumbling while Diabolist rose.

"I told you, didn't I?" the dark-skinned woman said. "That this ends with you kneeling. What I have claimed, I bind. It is mine."

I fought it. My knee shook and slowly began to bend, so I wrested my hand from her control and stabbed my blade into the leg. Pain flooded my mind and I embraced it.

"Kneel, Catherine Foundling," Akua Sahelian ordered. "And rise my Black Knight."

"Fuck you," I gasped. "He's-"

"Dead," Diabolist said. "He was not the kind of man easily kept prisoner. Why take the risk?"

I buckled, and one knee touched the floor.

Rebellion spread across Callow like a wildfire. Liesse first, but then the south rose up and wherever they went spears were dug out from fields and cellars, ploughshares hammered into swords. Old banners were dusted off, and when the knights of Callow knelt before her the whole kingdom boiled over. It was a bloodletting unlike any Catherine had ever seen. Garrisons swarmed by angry mobs, mages killed with stones and knives and clubs. The Empress gave answer with a hard hand. The day after Summerholm was liberated, Legions surrounded the city and torched it with goblinfire. The rebellion flinched. Assassin dogged them every step, even slit Hunter's throat, and though she killed him twice with William's help he always came back. The fought the Praesi near Marchford, a pitched battle, and they would have won had some orc commander not disobeyed her general's orders and attacked instead of retreated. In the wake of the defeat madness spread. There had gone their last chance to keep any of this contained. It was no longer a war but a hundred smaller ones, and wherever they went they won but they could not be everywhere. The south held, nonetheless, and though the central burned the fight was far from lost.

Then Procer invaded, seizing the Red Flower Vales.

The Praesi had been ready for it, unlike Squire. They retreated to the ashes of Summerholm, destroying everything as they went. Fields salted, villages torched and wells fouled. If they could not have Callow, it would be as much a Wasteland as their home. The banner of the kingdom grew ragged, but still the people rallied to it. Every man and woman who could hold a sword took one up, and though the levies died by the thousands the tide was turned back. The Lone Swordsman hung seven princes and one and the Conjurer, long grown beyond the bumbling, brought down the mountains on the Vales. Shut, for good. The host marched to the ruins of Summerholm, the last foothold of Praes in the kingdom, and there the Black Knight awaited. Three days and three nights the battle went. The Hwaerte ran red with blood. But in the end Catherine Foundling rammed her sword through the back of the Black Knight's neck and from that death rose Knight as well, decked in white. The monster's bag of tricks had finally run out but oh, the cost. Callow was not a kingdom, it was a graveyard and an army. The Fields of Streges were taken back, and through those lands Callow reborn marched to reclaim the Blessed Isle. Whispers awaited them there. Dread Empress Malicia was dead, murdered in the Tower.

Dread Empress Magnificent, First of Her Name, awaited them as well. With a host the likes of which had not been seen since the days of Triumphant: demons and fortresses aflight, swarms of devils and every greenskin not buried in Callowan fields.

"Kneel," Akua Sahelian ordered, crowned in dread.

General Foundling had struck a deal with the devil. The Empress had been losing her grasp for years now, and High Lady Tasia Sahelian might be a viper but she was a viper on the rise. She swore the damning oaths, and over the corpse of every other senior officer in the Fourteenth rose a general. It was on the fields of Callow she fought her part of the war. The nests of rebellion that sprang up all over the Old Kingdom when the Praesi turned their knives on each other were carefully brought into the fold of her legion, promised the settling of old grudges against the same generals that had crushed Callow in the Conquest. Even the knights came to her banner, after High Lady Tasia's mages broke the right minds and reformed them into something more flexible. One occupying legion after another shattered even as the war became a thing of horror in the Wasteland, and from that destruction General Foundling made herself a force to reckon with. The Knightsbane, drawn and quarried by Liessen chargers. General Sacker given a true red throat instead of one her legion affected. Orim the Grim, a smile carved on his lips as he bled out. Marshal Ranker burned alive, save for the black hand that was her old boast. Wherever she went, legends died.

Nearly every cadet that had gone through the College in her days was dead, either at her hand or that of Sahelian assassins. It was Grem One-Eye and his second, the one they called the Hellhound, that broke her siege of Summerholm and pushed her back in the heartlands of Callow. With but a handful of ragged legions they beat her again at Denier and smashed her one last time near Marchford. It didn't matter. The High Lords had risen one and all in the backing of a villain for the Tower, one going by the Name of Heiress. Tasia's own daughter, it was said. And if One-Eye was fighting General Foundling in Callow, he was not winning the war for Malicia in the Wasteland. Word trickled that Heiress levelled half of Ater winning a duel against the Warlock, that the Black Knight had retreated to the Steppes to raise another army with the Empress. Marshal Grem and the Hellhound retreated to Summerholm and Callow was Catherine's, finally. The Imperial governors were seized and executed, even those allied to the Sahelians, and General Foundling refused a crown but prepared for the next part of the war. It never came, the embers smothered when a Hellgate was opened in the heart of Summerholm. The last true stronghold of loyalist resistance, wiped out in a single night. Before dawn, precisely a hundred Callowans died for every governor she had killed.

A warning that did not go unheard.

Procer seized the Red Flower Vales, declaring the Tenth Crusade and forming a coalition that spanned half of Calernia. General Foundling began talks with the First Prince, but they ended when a ziggurat of stone large as Laure cast its long shadow over the very city. Dread Empress Magnificent, First of Her Name, had come to remind her of oaths taken.

"Kneel," Akua Sahelian ordered, crowned in dread.

The Praesi were at each other's throats, but what did the Tolltaker care? The quotas would not change no matter who held the Tower. But then, oh wonder of wonders, months passed and the war continued. Then the first two legions were pulled out of Callow to reinforce the Wasteland, and that was just the scent of opportunity wasn't it? Catherine Foundling had left behind the illusion that there was something remarkable about her people along with her girlhood years, but she was Callowan still. For small slights long prices, and there had been so many slights offered since the Conquest. The Tolltaker mustered her empire of ghosts and crooks, and began a waltz with the many devils claiming the floor. It was a long and bloody night, when every Imperial governor in the old kingdom found death knocking at their door. The nobles, feckless wastes that they were, gathered in hidden rooms and plotted a nation born anew. She had no interest in dead dreams, and so the right whispers fhad Eyes of the Empire rounding them up for treason. They were looking for her as well, of course, and the Legions with them. They found nothing, for her kingdom was not made of castles but of a hundred ugly pacts made in the dark. Those could not be besieged, could not be fought on the field.

There was blood in the water, and so the west stirred. Procer marched into the Vales, filling every nook and cranny with their dead before the Legions could be dislodged. A host of Procerans marched into the central plains, claiming that they had come to put Gaston of Liesse on his rightful throne. So the Tolltaker had him killed, right in the middle of his precious little army. She had never enjoyed anything half so much as watching sixty thousand foreigners milling about, trying to think of justification for their invasion. They spoke of liberating Callow, in the end, and as they tangled with the remaining legions Catherine found her own amusements. The pot of rebellion was already boiling, so she helped it along. Weapons from the Kingdom Below, acquired through Mercantis, reached the hands of mobs. The Assassin came for her but she set the warehouse aflame with stolen goblinfire and whatever the creature had been, it did not crawl out. She learned to live with a hole through the lung, her breath always rasping. One by one the last aristocrats of Callow found knife in the back or poison in the cup, even as knights emerged from the south and fought both Procerans and Praesi for rule of the land.

There was no great plan, no matter what her lieutenants believed. There was only the dance, and every day she lasted against the monsters was yet another victory. The rebel in the Wasteland won, though that part of Creation had come to deserve the name twice over in that making, and after claiming the Tower she moved west with all her strength. Hellgates bloomed across the land and Procer retreated back behind the Vales before calling for a crusade no one else wanted. The knights fought against the tide, valiantly, and equally valiantly they died. In the wreckage of it all Dread Empress Magnificent, First of Her Name, came to Laure. The call came and the Tolltaker went, for someone who cared for nothing had nothing to lose. In the throne room of ancient Fairfax kings, a Praesi stood and looked down at her.

"Kneel," Akua Sahelian ordered, crowned in dread.

Across three lives I had never lived and one I was living, I knelt. A face as beautiful as it was terrible allowed a smile of triumph to flicker.

Only one strike. Make it count.

I/General Foundling/the Tolltaker/the White Knight rose, and shoved steel through her throat.

My boot touched the stone. I looked up to doors of bronze wide open and began the climb, humming the tune to a song I had never heard.

Holy shit I loved this. I have nothing meaningful to add, everyone has pretty much said it already. I just had to say this was amazing.

Bell Towers

I love it! It was so much fun seeing a Cat who fights for the Kingdom, a Cat who fights for herself, and a Cat who “came out to attack people and is honestly having such a good time right now.”

I wonder if using an aspect in an illusion counts and even if it does, Bind is the one that’s most dangerous to Cat right? So that’s gonna be interesting.

morrogin

now, as awesome as this chapter is, let us not let it be overshadowed by WHEN it was posted is this going to be a regular thing now or once off?

oh shit, is that “The Girl Who Climbed the Tower”?

naturalnuke

Yuuuup.

ArkCthuul

That was Magnificent.

NerfContessa

Rereading it.

Still one of the best meta chapters and fluff chapters in one.

The Quietist

Fuuuuuuuuuuuuuck.

Also Akua killed by her smug doesn't she know "We do no kneel.".

spencer

Awesome. I was a little confused by the fact that the White Knight had one fewer section than the General and the Tolltaker. I was expecting the lives to progress at the same rate.

jeray2000

This was an amazing chapter. I hope at some point you do an interlude or something in this format for other characters like Lone Swordsman or Akua. They're dead now, but this format is so wonderful a bonus chapter of alternate universes would be great.

Really wonder what happened to Hanno in that timeline.

arcwraith

With Catherine as (White) Squire, Hanno probably got stuck as Squire as well. Both of them claimants to the final name. In the end, Catherine won, Hanno would've transitioned to something else.

Interius

Probably killed by black sometime somewhere mabe callow since bard stayed in callow and didn't switch idendities

Rueful Respite

I love all of this and loved seeing the other possible lives Catherine could have lived. One line in particular makes me so curious though:

“...The Conjurer, long grown beyond the bumbling, brought down the mountains on the Vales. Shut, for good.”

I am so curious about the Conjurer now and who they were and what they could have been.

crowlute

Incredible. I've always been thinking “what if...”, and I loved seeing how that played out here.

Chapter 66: Refrain

“On the third month of the year I found myself on the outskirts of the city of Okoro, and stumbled upon one of the famous Praesi field rituals. The throats of ten and three men were slit on dusty ground, and from the lifeblood spilled the earth turned from yellow to black. Granted audience with the lord presiding, I asked him the meaning of the ceremony. ‘Everywhere men bleed,’ he told me. ‘In Praes we get the full worth of it.’”

– Extract from “Horrors and Wonders”, famed travelogue of Anabas the Ashuran

The Diabolist was lounging on a Callowan throne when I stepped into the hall, and wasn't that just the image of my people's lot since the Conquest? The Praesi had crawled into the country in the wake of Black's victories and claimed every seat and symbol of power, masquerading as rulers when all they'd been were thieves. Not, I thought damningly, even particularly skilful ones. I'd once thought that the Imperial governors with better reputations than Mazus reflected a certain restraint in the wave of highborn that had been appointed as petty kings over Callow. I knew better now. It'd been fear that kept them in line, fear of Malicia's deep schemes and Black's sharp sword. That'd always been the weakness of their reforms, when it came down to it. The aristocracy of the Wasteland, the people that really held power in the Empire, had never bought into the ideologies they peddled. They only saw a knife taken to old rights and privileges, and no amount of victory would ever reach them over that. No matter. I'd put fear in them as well, if that was what it took, and forging that fear would start with Akua Sahelian's death.

She looked the same as she had in the dream, I noted, save for one detail. Around her neck hung a necklace, the centrepiece of which was a small cylinder of obsidian. My eyes lingered on it, my Name sniffing out the soul that lay within. Trap, I decided. She'd been clever enough so far to keep her soul out of anyone's grasp, she wouldn't risk it here and now. Likely it was meant to bait out an aspect from me, but a liar lost power when you knew them as one. The hall was empty and echoing as I strode forward, the tapestries hanging from the rafters stirred by some invisible current. The whole room was thick with sorcery, more than my senses could parse. She had prepared her grounds, and that was a mark on the right side of my earlier assumption: Diabolist intended to get her hands dirty. Maybe not with a blade – I couldn't see one on her and she wasn't wearing proper armour, but neither of those things meant much – but she intended on fighting me herself. At least in the beginning. I disliked it, that I wasn't able to tell where she'd pull her monster from. It put an itch between my shoulder blades.

Against that calibre of opponent, one mistake was all it took.

"You were forewarned," Diabolist said.

"Was I?" I drawled. "Please, do elaborate."

I could read it on her face, no matter how blank she kept it. The urge to tell me what that trap in the stairs had been, to expound on her own cleverness. I'd been struck with it a few times as well, that need to tell your opponent exactly how you'd screwed them over, but it was different in her. More intense, and not just because she ran deeper to the source of villainy than I did. It occurred to me, in that moment, how lonely a person Akua must really be. Unable to trust anyone, to do so much as offer a genuine laugh. It was no way to live. The highborn of the Wasteland were inhuman as much because of their history as because they denied themselves the basic trappings of humanity. If all you were was artifice, what was there left? But I had no pity to spare for the likes of Diabolist, and the only reason I refrained from further mockery was that her extolling her own virtues would be useful to me.

"Hypocrite," Akua chided me. "You cast disdain at my feet for the occasional exegesis, yet how many of your little... diatribes have you indulged in, since you became the Squire?"

"If I cast anything at you, Diabolist, you can rest assured it won't be the feet. Still, I don't actually know what that word means," I grinned. "You know, on account of being a mudfoot peasant."

"Monologue," she sighed. "Your fixation on your origins is unseemly, Catherine. The promise of the Tower is that anyone can rise, regardless of birth."

"See," I mused, "the way you felt the need to add regardless kind of defeats your point."

"Should I be ashamed of what I am?" Akua asked, amused.

"I mean, I could give you a list of reasons why but that'd take a while," I said. "It's a pretty long list. In essence, Gods yes."

"Barring assassination, I will live at least three decades older than a baseborn," Diabolist said. "My natural capacity for sorcery is beyond even that of your Hierophant. I know more, can accomplish more, I am objectively more than others. Why should I apologize for this?"

"Got not issue with the whole Wasteland breeding program," I began, then adjusted. "No, that's a lie. I think it's disturbing as Hells, but not all that worse than the usual marriage alliances everybody else does. I don't take issue with your talents, Akua. Just what you do with them."

"It was too much to hope for that the Fourfold Crossing would rid you of the attitude, I suppose," Diabolist said. "Particularly given that you cheated your way out of it. I'll admit to some curiosity as to how you accomplished that."

"Come closer," I smiled. "I can show you."

Her nose wrinkled.

"Violence," she said. "The Carrion Lord's doing, then. He does like to keep you in the dark, doesn't he?"

I raised an eyebrow.

"Yeah, Black helped me out of that trap you laid for me," I deadpanned. "Treachery. Ach, what betrayal. I will never forgive him."

"It was more than a trap," Akua sharply said. "It was refinement. The clearing of impurities. Or it would have been, without his meddling. As always, he sees defeat in you where he found his own."

"Was I supposed to derive some kind of lesson from that?" I snorted. "'cause I came in ready to stab you in throat. Not much was learned there."

The mention of defeat pricked my ears, though. Black had never been shy about teaching me through examples of when he'd screwed up in the past, but it was the first time I was hearing about this Fourfold Crossing. The part I disliked the most about dealing with people like Akua was that they could read me like a book, unless I made a conscious effort not to. She found the hint of interest in me, and expanded. I let her. Usually I'd go in sword swinging to prevent her from making any preparations, but at the moment I could see both her hands I really doubted she was going to pull out anything throughout this conversation she hadn't managed to prepare while I was getting smacked around by her defences outside.

"Three months, he remained under," Diabolist said. "He might have stayed forever, had the Apprentice not pulled him out."

I was the opposite of an expert on magic, but if this wasn't High Arcana I'd eat my own toes and High Arcana did tend to operate through a kind of logic I could make sense of. Black had sent me in with a warning I'd only be able to strike once. That meant there would have been consequences, if I hadn't gone after Akua in all four lives. That this was the detail he'd warn me about told me something about how his own go at it had unfolded – he didn't tend to warn me about specific things unless it was something that'd tripped him up in the past, preferring to offer general knowledge and let me figure out my own way from it. So he'd fucked up in one of his lives. I wasn't surprised. It was a nasty kind of trap to spring on anyone, if they didn't go in knowing the key, and for all his cleverness Black had never learned how to lose. He'd won, where it mattered, when his story mattered. He would have stubbornly kept on until he got a victory out of it, even if the game was rigged and he knew it was. That was, in a way, his defining trait.

"He still alive?" I casually asked.

"For now," Akua said.

I huffed out a laugh.

"Amused, Catherine?" she probed.

"You're dead," I said. "You already were, but now? It's just a matter of how it happens."

"I warred and won against six legions and the muster of Callow," Diabolist said. "Against your collection of woes and the most dangerous of the Calamities as well, alone – and still you underestimate me."

I smiled viciously.

"You think I'm short-changing you," I said. "I'm not, Akua. What offends you is the lack of respect, but there's nothing about... this I can respect."

"I-"

"-lose," I interrupted. "You always lose. That's your outcome. You use methods that lead to defeat, because every time you win you make another dozen enemies fitted just for you. I just happen to be the one closest at hand."

"It only takes once, to change everything," Diabolist said.

"The refrain of every Empress before you," I said. "It's time that was buried. I have axes to grind with the new way, but the old one is in dire need of a grave. Do resist. I've been looking forward to the screaming."

The dark-skinned woman rose to her feet elegantly, brushing her shoulder.

"Well then," Akua Sahelian said, "shall we begin?"

"That's your first mistake," I said. "Thinking I'm only now beginning."

Thing was, she wasn't the only one around here who claimed an inheritance – and the way I'd come into mine was a lot more intimate than hers. Black was known for using his shadow, and while I couldn't mould mine the way he did I was not without tricks. The balls of blue flame that lit up the hall had my silhouette splayed against a tapestry and from there, out of her sight, lines of frost had spread up to the ceiling. Robber was right, I mused. Humans so rarely looked up, Praesi least of all – their Gods dwelled below. I wouldn't call what I'd crafted an array. I did not have the know-how to make one, and my power was of a different breed besides. But I'd accumulated power in four dots on the ceiling above Diabolist as she spoke, and in that moment I let them loose. Ice shot downwards in four thick pillars, headed straight for her, and the dance began.

That she would survive the first strike was a given. I'd approached the formula that was killing her with that in mind. If I couldn't get a kill – or even a grave wound – out of the first attack, what could I get? Tying her down. That was the most that was feasible, and so I opened the waltz with something she'd need to be stationary to deal with. That was how mages died, even Named. Lack of mobility. The whirlwind of flame that formed around her reeked of Summer, unsurprisingly, but even as it shattered the pillars of ice I kept pouring power into them. Could I win, if this fight became about reserves? On open field, I'd say yes. But not in here, not in the seat of her power. Letting a caster dig in always led to ugliness, and she'd had months to prepare this room. Sending the Summer Court after her had been a tactical necessity but a strategic mistake, I decided. Keeping her busy had been needed. But anything that didn't kill Diabolist would be ripped apart and repurposed by her, and now she'd shrugged off my initial blow as a consequence. I doubted it'd be the last time I paid for that.

I'd passed long evenings with Masego, preparing for this fight. Discussing not the theory of sorcery but the practicalities of using it, the limits. The conclusion I'd arrived to was that if I wanted to win, I had to do so within the first ten exchanges. Any longer than that, and her bag of devilries would outshine mine. I'd be stuck on the defensive, and that was the beginning of the crawl to defeat. One exchange had passed. My cloak fluttered behind me as I ran, ten steps passing before she recognized the danger of it. The whirlwind of fire thickened then blew up, forcing back the ice for a precious single heartbeat, and among the pillar of flame was revealed to be nothing at all. Second exchange: she was buying distance, with an illusion. A year ago, that would have been a problem but I had ways to deal with that, now. And the power to spare to use them. My foot stomped against the ground and ice spread from the touch, spreading like a tide. I wasn't much, not even enough to slip on. But it spread quickly and the silhouette of two boots was revealed.

"There you are," I said.

Diabolist dismissed her illusion and reappeared with runes hovering in the air before her. High Arcana. Third exchange then. Now she would attempt to hobble me, knowing if she didn't my sword would find her throat. Lightning spun, first a bolt but then weaving itself into a cage. I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth. Her lack of experience fighting against Named was showing – it would have been good against a mortal, but not the likes of me. My body convulsed in pain as I forced my way through the crackling tendrils, but my body was a vessel to my will. I had will enough that pain was just discomfort, something that could be set aside as a distraction if necessity called for it. I was on her within three heartbeats, my own ice no hindrance to me at all. Her wrist snapped, rings of darkness forming around it as the shape of a sword was forged in black. The stance she fell into before I struck was one I recognized. There were half a dozen schools of Soninke swordsmanship and this one I recognized on sight. Koanguka Moko, the Hand-in-Falling. Best used for duelling. I knew how to pick out the weaknesses of that form, how to bait it into a killing stroke, but that was playing her game. Giving her the time to cast again.

You were taught this, I thought. As a child, when your mother decided you must have the skill of a duellist to settle the affairs of the blade between Named. But this wasn't a duel, and I wasn't a swordswoman. So when her sword came up perfectly angled to have mine glance off I didn't fight it – instead I punched her in the belly, and the fourth exchange began. I'd struck hard enough to wreck steel, to powder stone. I would have pulped a legionary with that blow. Akua was blown off her feet by it, but a subtle ripple shivered across her robes and there was no gratifying feel of guts and bone giving under my hand. I let the world slow around me as I sunk into my Name, the sight of Diabolist flying into one of her banners burning itself into my eyes. If I made a mistake here, all the momentum I'd accumulated was gone. It would be hard to recover from that. I needed... I needed to interrupt that rune she was forming and control where she landed, at the same time. My eyes flecked to the tapestry and my hand followed, dark ice forming on the contraption of metal keeping it hung from the rafters and shattering it. When Akua hit the tapestry it folded under her but I got a glimpse of her face, of the small quirk of the lips that betrayed triumph. Trade, I decided, gritting my teeth. The Summer flame hit my shoulder even as I swept the edges of the tapestry, biting down on a scream as I wrapped Diabolist in a very expensive sack and pivoted to smash her into the ground.

The fifth exchange began with me trying and failing to put out the fire burning into my side. I forced Winter into it but Winter always lost, when fighting Summer. I could, if I took a moment, sharpen my will and drown it out. But it would take time I did not have, and this wasn't my sword arm. I'd wait until I was in danger of losing the arm. Diabolist spoke in the mage tongue, flailing on the ground, and though the words were alien to me the feel of the spell was not. She'd used something similar the last time we fought in Liesse. Even as the floor beneath me roiled with sorcery I leapt, boots landing sideways on a platform of shade as the ground turned to liquid save for a circle around her. I leapt off and came upon her just as she forced aside the tapestry over her, sword point crisp and clear. I rammed it into her chest, an inch away to the left of her heart. Angle would've been awkward otherwise, and given her protections I wasn't taking the risk of it glancing off entirely. Akua's lips thinned with pain and she lay her hand on my good shoulder even as I twisted the blade to worsen the wound. Too late for me to the dodge, I assessed.

The force that came from her hand blew me off my feet, but I took it in stride. I had, after all, won two victories going into the sixth exchange. The first was that she'd had to dismiss her liquefying spell to cast this one. The second was that, while she rose to her feet and healed her wound with a pale face, I rose to mine and finally had the time to smother the Summer flame without losing the tempo. My shoulder was a ruin of melted steel and burnt flesh, but the cold ended the distraction of the pain and I'd fought through worse in the past. I could almost run my finger along the length of the coming four exchanges, as if they were written in the air, and what I saw there had me smiling. She would notice it soon enough. The moment she reached for one of her arrays and found nothing, she was clever enough she'd put it together. Why I'd encouraged her to keep talking, why I'd not tried to take the fight out of a room she'd carefully crafted into her sanctum. It would have been more madness than gambit, if not for one single thing: just because I'd never used that trick in a fight didn't mean I couldn't.

The seventh exchange began when I shot forward. She'd learned from our earlier bout, and this time she didn't go for lightning. Panes of red light formed behind me, four of them, and when I struck at the one before me the other span and smacked me to the side. I slid across stone and found another set before me when I tried to turn. Ah. Problematic. Unless. I formed a spear of ice and tossed it at the first set, getting it spinning, and carefully adjusted my angle running into the one before me. It jostled my bad arm painfully even through the cold when I was thrown, right into the first set – and from there straight at Diabolist, whose face was amusingly flabbergasted.

I crouched low, sword swinging upwards, and that was the eight exchange opening. The black sword formed again to parry my blade, but she was a second-rate swordswoman at best: I spun on myself, breaking her footing, and even as she fell I flipped my sword and the pommel came down on her pretty white teeth with a deeply satisfying shattering sound. There was nothing graceful or elegant about this: I rolled over her and sat on her body, punching hard enough her sorcerous shield shivered once more and the ground cracked beneath her. She'd had to have felt that, enchantment or not. Threads of light bloomed behind her, tying around her body and ripping her out from under me. I got up to my feet before she could, though the threads hoisted up her a heartbeat later.

The ninth exchange happened when she flicked her wrist at me and nothing happened at all. Her face went blank. I began gathering power into myself, shaping it. Behind us, slowly, the bronze gates collapsed. They were burning green.

"You set fire to your own path of retreat," Diabolist said, sorcery flaring around her as her teeth healed.

"Wrong again," I replied. "I set fire to everything."

In one of those little quirks of Creation, an entire pane of the wall to our side collapsed the moment I finished speaking. Behind it lay a hellscape of goblinfire unleashed. Robber hadn't skipped on the stuff, I noted. I wouldn't be surprised if this entire section of the palace was melted stone by the time the fire went out.

"Is this the sum of you, Catherine Foundling?" Akua said. "Were you so disbelieving of victory you decided to burn us both?"

"Do you ever get tired?" I smiled rudely. "You know, of being wrong all the time."

For the tenth exchange, I opened a gate into Arcadia and stepped through it.

Zarquon

FIRST! And an EXCELLENT fight.

ruduen

Ah, yes – that would be what would get Robber smiling.

JC

Very Black-like in her fight.

I like it.

DroughtBringer

Oooh. Forgot about her gates, honestly.

jaysenton

HAH! DEAL WITH IT, AKUA!

Ane

Thanks for chapter!! I'm highly surprised Cat's soul is still unharmed through all of this.

Isn't Akua something akin to a lich at this point? With her actual soul in a protected phylactery somewhere else. Would killing Akua's body be that helpful?

Byzantine

Unlike a Lich she doesn't automatically get a new body eventually if hers is destroyed, from what we know. So killing her will be insufficient to get rid of her entirely, but it leaves her in a very bad position.

Dainpdf

Plus goblinfire burns magic, no? Who knows whether it can harm her soul from there...

Adarsh

Alright, this may seem smart, but experience tells me that unless you can confirm that the villain is dead with your own two eyes, then they aren't dead. So I'm betting that Diabolist lives through this.

Zarquon

This is true. She probably lives.

NerfContessa

Sure.

But she'll be called Ubua for the rest of her existence,. By at least 2 named.

sheer_falacy

Diabolist definitely won't die from this. That said, it does pretty thoroughly ruin Liesse and may free the Deoraithe souls (or destroy them, which would piss off Kegan but still work).

It's actually kind of an odd move to take – destroying the villain's hideout but leaving them able to rebuild later would have fit earlier in the story, but at this point things have to end with Akua dead. So I guess the fight will continue in some way.

Dainpdf

She did get a pretty good victory, though. Gotta where where this takes them, but this basically killed all the momentum Akua had – her whole “unbeatable villain” narrative is done with this humiliation. Because that's what it was. She got schooled.

Byzantine

Cat knows that. She didn't enter that exchange to kill Diabolist with that. She did that to destroy her seat of power, bait out the Monster, and leave Diabolist reeling going into the next series of exchanges.

Ethesis

Especially if she really has her soul in a phail around her neck.

dusting

going down that route would end up with her mentor dead, so she made sure it wouldn't, craft a different route, like in liesse before. And in liesse again.

though now that i read what i wrote. I suddenly realize the repetition. Creation wouldn't allow something massively important to happen twice without a third incoming sometime soon.

Levi Kalden

She has a separate soul of course she lives

Metalshop

That was incredibly satisfying to read.

D. D. Webb

I dearly hope Cat doesn't think that's a finisher. Villains don't get to stick an enemy in a trap and walk away, not if they want to be sure the enemy dies. Surely our Squire is too genre savvy by now to make that blunder?

nehemiahnewell

She hasn't beat Akua's champion yet, and she knows that has to happen before she can win. So yes, she's certainly knows she's still alive.

danh3107

Man there's no way it's going to be that easy. Akua is going to find a way to follow or something like that.

Draeysine

This was the plan all along. Cat was never going to win in 10 exchanges with Akua, but she could reset the whole thing if she took the fight somewhere else. I think the plan is to fight in Arcadia not whatever trap infested inner sanctum that Akua made. As everyone's said. Don't let a mags dig in. This is Cat digging Akua out to an open field where she controls things.

Jonnnnz

Cat is a Duchess of Winter, fighting in Arcadia rather than the seat of Akua's power is a significant upgrade.

JackbeThimble

Ugh. I really hope this is the end of Akua Sahelian though somehow I doubt it.

Type

GG WP

BroadAxe

Leaving a villain in a trap would not be a likely finisher, but maybe akua follows her through the gate into arcadia, there foundling will have the advantage as the duchess of moonless nights, her homeground so to speak :3

BroadAxe

Or, she might reason that leaving her body in the trap will work because her soul is somewhere else, so it wont kill her anyways? :3

Haihappen

My speculation goes toward her Akua's father saving her soulstone, and binding it to a new body, or she goes full-on lich.

For that unconnected major breach out there... that has the potential of going even more critical than anything else. Like, for example, it being highjacked by a specific entity in one of the hells that everyone prays may never return.

BroadAxe

Also, she has a soul that obviously isn't her own around her neck, and the black night lives "for now" maybe the soul around her neck is his? Catherine might end up killing him on accident by smashing the necklace or burning it? :3

Ketura

Personally I think it's just a nobody's soul so that Cat detects it as a soul container. Bait her into destroying it where it releases the bait and captures Cat's.

Ethesis

Quote:

"Around her neck hung a necklace, the centrepiece of which was a small cylinder of obsidian. My eyes lingered on it, my Name sniffing out the soul that lay within. Trap, I decided. She'd been clever enough so far to keep her soul out of anyone's grasp, she wouldn't risk it here and now. Likely it was meant to bait out an aspect from me, but a liar lost power when you knew them as one. "

Still reflecting on that.

Drd

Or, as she is the Diabolist, and likes using others to power her spells, she either simply uses Black's soul as a straight up hostage, or more likely she uses it to power (a hell of a lot of power too) an attempt at a deciding blow.

But yes, I think it's Black's soul too.

Nate9799

But there was no body, so she might live.

jor

madwahman!!!! so crazy and end with gracefulness

soonnandnaanssoon

Burn baby burn.

Soronel Haetir

She lives but her weapon (the room she has spent so much time preparing) has been wrecked.

name

Not sure that was The Weapon. I mean Akuas soul is the key that makes it work not her body.

boballab

She is baiting Akua into Arcadia where Cat has free passage but Akua doesn't. On top of that Akua has no set arrays there and the cherry on top: she is using stolen SUMMER power. Think that might get the Queen's attention?

lennymaster

The Summer Queen is no more. She is just the Queen now. Cat is the very last being with a season associated fea noble title.

RoflCat

Imagine, if Robber were there on the other side.

I can totally see him give a last "Bye have a great time" wave before the gate close.

Pipiemman

I feel like it's hard for there to be a surprise in this story when it comes to ending. I love it, but because the story is semi-self aware, ending don't occur without the proper weight, which generally I feel like the reader can feel.

sheer_falacy

That's true, but honestly it's true in other stories too. This story is self aware that it follows story tropes, but they're story tropes because they're used in most stories.

letouriste

of which ending are you taking about? the autor did a good job in each ending until now,that's the beginnings i find somewhat weaker.

i expect a good conclusion to that fight

letouriste

the whole interest of this story is in "how far cat will go and what kind of success she will met at the end" she could won at the end but she lost everything on the way,even herself.

she could redefine definitions.

she could have a pyrrhic victor or a total victory coming to some cost etc...

this story is really open on paths for the mc to grow

Hakurei06

I'm not sure this was about killing her necessarily, more along the lines of crippling her and forcing her from her seat of power. Akua can't stay in her burning foothold, carving a new one in the Hells without the time and resources is probably a no-go, Arcadia is right out, and her chances in creation seem... iffy, at best.

Hakurei06

Hells, it didn't actually say that she closed the gate after passing through.

letouriste

yep exactly,now the grounds are cat's to set so that's a minor win for her.akua is steadily going out of her confort zone and she seems cumulating minor errors now and then.now this is a matter of Aces and this is predicted she will make a big mistake at some point.

right now akua has more power left and more aces but her general plan is a wreak and she is walking on cat grounds... cat have probably secured akua father somehow and plan to use him...i'm not sure this is possible given the guy is Named now but this too important a factor in this fight for otherwise. there is probably a lot happening in the background(Thief,robber,akua father,black which is bound to free himself easily if he even has been captured in the first place and who know who else)

Darkening

Akua's father isn't named, she just gave him the first mage title that fell out of use when warlocks started coming into being.

....

Typos I noticed

- "Got **not** issue with the whole Wasteland breeding program,"
- " ***I** wasn't much, not even enough to slip on."
- "Her wrist **snapped,** rings of darkness forming around it as the shape of a sword was forged in black. "- Should that be "snapped up"? Snapped on its own makes me think of bones breaking which I don't think was the intended reading.

....

- The point about Akua being lonely as a result of the insane competitiveness of her upbringing was interesting. You can almost treat her as a tragic figure, emotionally stunted and grasping for the only way she knows of to get approval, power and respect. Makes me think of those kids who are trained from five to be athletes, dancers or piano prodigies. They end up kinda messed up in the head. It seems like her mother raised her a similar way but with power and magic as the focus. Even her father who seems to have an almost normal relationship of love and affection with her mainly related to her by teaching magic.
- The idea of the "Fourfold Crossing" test as being cleansing also gives us a hint of how she thinks. Seems like a lot of her ideology is a kind of refined self interest. Where being true to yourself means not having contradictions, even if that means being 100% evil its still being true to who you are. Cat regardless of her circumstances made the same choice in all the scenarios. Seemingly black didn't in his?
- ""That's your first mistake," I said. "Thinking I'm only now beginning."" Reminds me of a certain famous moment in Watchmen.
- Nice to see Cat actually having prepared for a fight by thinking about tactics and benefitting from that. Makes a nice contrast to what was alluded to earlier about her habit of recklessness. Only really works because Akua is so predictable though. Against a smarter enemy it wouldn't. Akua always thinks of herself as the only clever one.

Mike E.

Watchmen quote:

"Dan, I'm not a Republic Serial villain. Do you seriously think I'd explain my master-stroke if there remained the slightest chance of you affecting its outcome? I did it thirty-five minutes ago."

SpeckofStardust

I think She is heading outside to where the battle is happening, in order to ensure that the real fight isn't lost, Considering it all she disengaged because she decided she couldn't kill her if she continued the current 1 on 1. Also neither one of them used any of their name powers in full.

Love from a dumb phone

maresther23

I fear there is a spell that prohibits me from missing an update. I went to sleep early thinking I would read the chapter in the morning. Then the seismic alarm sounded at the witching hour and well... great chapter!

Engineer

Of course it ends there. I hope this won't be the trend moving forward. Because I feel now like usually feel at the conclusion of a chapter of Mother of Learning. Only benefit is that it's just a day's wait before I get my fix.

Ryan DD Durnell

Getting caught up on this story is the worst.

I want it all NOW.

Your work is awesome. Very few missteps, and some of those might be intentional for future story telling. I love this serial. Unlike some, I highly doubt this is Cat ending the fight. Round two!

Thanks sincerely.

Berder

No doubt Akua has some means of magical flight to escape as the flames close in. But she just lost her base of operations and perhaps her ability to open more Hellgates.

I observe that Cat was speaking like a stereotypical villain here. Particularly when she said "That's your first mistake..." and when she said "there you are" when uncovering Akua's hiding place. If she said those things while fighting a hero, she'd be doomed. Against Akua, who knows?

nick012000

Guile Heroes say those sorts of things too, though.

Alicia

I have to admit these last few chapters have made me start to dislike Cat. Where she seems to always pull something out of her ass. Where she seems to learn nothing. Where she doesn't even need to learn because everything goes her way in the end.

Hell her first thoughts on walking into the throne room weren't even about Akua or what's going on. Instead they were some shitty boring Monologue on how Praesi are all thieves sitting on Callow thrones. As if she's any better than them at this point. And it annoys me to no end how Cat has become such a complete and massive hypocrite. If this story was written for Akua, I have little to no doubt we would all find Cat the kind of Villain who we would cheer as she fell. Just due to how self-righteous and blind she is to her own actions while being able to always come away with an undeserved victory. A great fight scene doesn't change the fact that Cat these last few chapters has been able to display just how much plot armor, hypocrisy and pure contrivance makes up herself and her story. Where even after living three other lives she doesn't learn nor need to learn a single lesson. Where in the end... She's obviously the Hero. And the Hero wins even if they don't deserve it or aren't any better than the Villains they lambast with self-righteous sneering.

werafdsaew

Her point about the Wasteland nobles being thieves is that they weren't the ones who conquered Callow; the Calamities and the Legions did, so the nobles had no right to it. Remember Cat's discussion with Brandon Talbot back in c34? Cat has to bleed and fight for every bit of power she now holds, and so dislike the notion that someone can just inherit it.

Dany

My theory of this whole serial: Cat isn't the hero. She's IS the villain. The hero is Cordelia, the unnamed queen. We just happen to be following the villain's rise to power before the villain gets cut down, instead of vice-versa.

But I say that as someone who has loathed Cat and her plot armor for a while now.

MetruX

You do notice that the only person she acts against in a self-righteous way is Akua (sorry, Abua), right? She is somewhat hypocrite, but she lies to herself so that she can keep going towards her objectives. Not the most healthy thing to do, but that's what you get when there is a true villain as protagonist. She's not supposed to be the right guy or the better guy, she is no Hero. About the plot armor, honestly, any Named has it, only in different situations, and she learned since the beginning to pick apart those situations. Hells, it's been a couple of weeks where the updates see her seeing Akua's plan as a pure defeat, simply because of the narrative. If the narrative empowers certain stories, doesn't it look like plot armor? I disagree with you, mostly, on a single point: I like her. She's not nice, not perfect, and not truly cool, but I like her. And yet I wouldn't want to meet her for nothing, even if on the same side.

lennymaster

You are one of those people that still somehow think this should end in some kind of redemption. I know next to nothing about how this story will turn out (props to erratica for that), but I am entirely convinced that Cat will do her thing till the bitter end, be it victory or defeat. After all, in 58 Hard Measures her worldview was clearly stated in her conversation with the priestess:

““In the end,” she murmured. “I choose to believe that being Good matters more than being strong.”

“In the end,” I replied clearly, “I would rather be wrong than be cowed.””

And to be Named IS TO HAVE PLOT ARMOUR. THAT IS THE WHOLE POINT OF NAMED.

They are greater than life and their deaths will always be epic, or a lesson/motivation for other Named.

LaNuup

The interesting question is what happened to Black. He is after all either in a burning palace or his soul is bound by Diabolist. Cat also only has one exchange with Diabolist left to defeat her, before it grows problematic for her.

James, Mostly Harmless

Cat's line “Do you ever get tired?” I smiled rudely. “You know, of being wrong all the time.” reminds me of Luke's line in Last Jedi “Every word in that sentence was wrong.”

Rogthnor

I'm still holding out hope Akua joins the team somehow, probably by Cat using necromancy on the phylactery

Engineer

Ten Denari says that the soul bound around Akua's neck is Black's. Any takers?

Draighean Erland

Could the Diabolist follow Cat into Arcadia? Would be funny to watch Akua fight a Goddess in her realm.

Talmora

I have expected the Black Queen/Knight Name she will enter into will have one aspect being about burn or incinerate due to the stories of her setting fire to pretty much any city or battlefield she fights on on fire with goblinfire...

Zarax

That soul around Aku's neck being Black's is just too obvious... I may have missed it but has there been any mention of Kilian in the last few chapters?

chris S

"The ninth exchange happened when she flicked her wrist at me and nothing happened at all. Her face went blank. "

Something tells me a certain half-incubus mage prepared some protection for Cat and Akua was expecting to shatter the magic framework holding Cat's soul/heart together there.

Walter

I think she tried to call on a spell array that the goblinsfire had burned up.

werafdsaew

More like the goblin fire burned up whatever magical array she was depending on.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Half-incubus? Masego is adopted, actually.

nigeltheoutlaw

Damn, burning her in goblinfire? Brutal. Highly doubt it worked though, Akua is too slippery for something weak like that to do her in.

Edrey

Well, warlock won be happy with this

I was hopping a fire monster to counter this after all she always use fire but who knows

One question. Can cat take the magic capacity of akua? Is in her body or soul?

chaos_ex_machina

So, what's Thief up to? Stealing Akua's soul?

Stephen R. Marsh

One hopes. There was Robber pretending to be Thief. I'm looking forward to Thief pulling out something entertaining.

kdreyes09

The chapter had very good action scenes. I had no trouble picturing the fight at all. Erra, you are amazing. I'm happy to see that even if you're getting 3 chapters out per week, the quality doesn't suffer at all. You're amazing!

Alivaril

Hey, just here to say I really enjoyed the last few chapters, especially this one. The book two "opening gambit involves DYING" climax chapters were some of my favorites overall, above even Cat Struggling and animating her own body. Thief stealing a fleet of ships and subsequently dumping them to block the gates is also up there. I really hope she and Masego are okay.

Anyway, this chapter felt similar in tone to those fine days and if this revival sticks, I will be extremely happy. There's a marked difference between "stealing the box and pummeling her enemies with it" and just "stabbing her enemies," the latter of which just isn't as fun as this sort of measured planning.

aran

"I set fire to everything."

Yes, Cat; yes you certainly do.

aran

In other news: Oh goodness me, we certainly won't have to worry about Akua anymore. There's no way she could have surv- ah shoot.

Chapter 67: Middle Eight

"Change, my friend, is the admission that one falls short of perfection. A plebeian sort of doubt, best reserved for rulers who don't make their enemies eat their own hands."

– Dread Emperor Revenant

I'd picked my battlefield to stack the game as much in my favour as she had in hers when I'd engaged in the throne room. Much as it irritated me to admit it, there was no real chance my little fire snare would actually kill Diabolist: it was a death trap I hadn't seen through to the end. Even between villains, there was only one way that kind of play could end. That was fine, since the point hadn't been to put her down. Gods, I wish it could be that easy. What I'd accomplished was put the hurt on her before putting the torch to whatever nasty surprises she'd prepared just for me. It'd always been made abundantly clear to me that taking a swing at a well prepared mage was a Bad Idea, and I'd venture that warning counted twice as much if the mage in question was Named. Here, though? We were on my chosen grounds. And when the time came to make that choice, I'd picked somewhere I had spilled blood before: the Fields of Wend. I honestly couldn't think of a better place to kill Akua than a mile-wide stretch of shifting and uneven glaciers in the heart of what had once been Winter.

I'd come out on the edge of the glacier the fae called the Wending Heart, the tallest of them all and topped by a perfectly round platform, and moved away swiftly. Had I mouthed off at the Duke of Violent Squalls here once? It felt like I had. Admittedly when it came to assumptions about my diplomatic proceedings 'gave insult' tended to be the right bet. The only downside I could figure was that there might be fae interested in our little scrap who came calling, but even when it came to that I had the advantage. I was still a titled Duchess, and earlier Akua had been throwing around Summer flame. Exactly how it had all come together after the wedding between the King and Queen of Arcadia was still a mystery to me, but I assumed using what could only be violently stolen power wouldn't exactly please that crowd. And, unlike me, she had no oath from the royals to guarantee her safety. This was as much as I'd be able to tilt the balance my way before it came to a head, short of having the Woe at my back.

I left the fairy gate wide open. Getting Diabolist here was half the point of this in the first place, and besides I wasn't going to bet on my being better at manipulating that power than her if I tried to close it and she tried to keep it open. Call me sentimental, but if hubris had to get me killed I'd at least require a kind not quite so blatant. Akua strolled through indifferently, casting a look of mild curiosity around her.

"Ah, Catherine," she laughed throatily. "Your particular mixture of cleverness and ignorance never ceases to injure, does it?"

I studied her carefully. She was moving too slowly. Taking in her surroundings but not really assessing them the way she had earlier – she wasn't finding good space to stand or noting places to avoid. That meant her attention was elsewhere. I sharpened my senses, but all I could hear was the loud rumble of glaciers smashing into each other. If there were fae, I thought, I should be able to at least make out the edges of their presence. What was she looking for, then? Whatever it was, I suspected letting her have it would lead to no good. With a twist of will, I closed the gate.

"Claim," Diabolist said, tone casual, and ownership of it was ripped from me.

All that remained was a hole in the air too small to even crawl through, but she'd just thrown away an aspect on taking it. I swallowed a breath. It looked like I had a problem on my hands: Akua never did anything without at least three reasons. I let Winter flood my veins and found it still answered unhindered to my will. Then what – no, that was the wrong way to go about this. I was getting sucked into her tempo, and the moment that happened I was done for. It was nearly always better to disrupt than to respond. I charged forward. The sooner I got the both of us off this platform the better.

"The courtesy is late in the giving," Akua said, "but must be afforded nonetheless."

I got within three feet of her before the entire Heart spun, and that threw me off my stride long enough for a streak of darkness to strike at my chest and send me sliding back. The tendril of black remained around Diabolist, coiled like a loyal and eager snake. How the fuck had she done that? The spinning, not the pale imitation of my teacher's trick. This was a fae place of power, she should have no sway here.

"Thank you, Catherine Foundling, for the valuable lessons you taught me in Liesse," Diabolist said.

I wasted no breath on a reply, but my blood ran cold. This was an echo to words I'd spoke to her at the Blessed Isle, once, and to Barika Unonti right before I put a crossbow bolt into her eye. Not something to be lightly spoken. Akua was beginning a monologue, though, and that was my chance. I was warier in my approach the second time. I tested her defences with a flick of my blade and when the tendril of darkness struck out I bent under it and stepped behind her guard. My blade whistled as I carved through her throat but fuck, I'd lost the tempo and she was one step ahead of me – all I cut was a shade, an illusion, and Akua shivered back into sight at the opposite edge of the Heart. I pivoted without hesitation and returned on the offensive.

"On that night where you broke my bones," the dark-skinned woman said. "The two of us began a conversation about power that went unfinished. Shall we resume it?"

I breathed out and sought calm. Splashing around like a fool trying to catch a fish barehanded wasn't going to get my anywhere. Method was how I turned this around. First, finding out if what I saw was real. I touched Winter, the howling desolation made even thicker here in the very place where I had earned my mantle, and ice formed around Diabolist's feet. She did not even spare it a glance before it began melting, but it was confirmation. I moved then, quick as wink.

"There are weaknesses to my ways," the villain acknowledged. "Repeated conflict with you has made this clear. But you seem under the impression that means they are without worth. A dangerous assumption."

I expected the blow to come the moment I was within a foot of coming in striking range, and she did not disappoint. I only caught sight of the thin transparent wedges that cut silently through the air by sharpening my eyes, and though that allowed me to avoid them it also cost me. A ball of dazzling lights formed in front of my face and erupted instantly, searing a dozen colours into my vision. I struck blindly at where she'd been but my sword bounced off something solid and something else caught my ankle and tossed me away. Even as I fell on back in the ice and rolled, I grit my teeth. She was toying with me. She could have done some real damage right then, if she'd been so inclined.

"I've told you this before: a Name is not a mere tool," Akua said. "It has meaning. It is the choosing of a side, of a Role. To borrow its power while denying the Role is to willingly cripple yourself."

Even as I considered a different angle of attack, a part of me wondered if this might be the wrong way to go about it. She'd never had such an easy time handling me before, which smelled of a pattern or trick I didn't know. Talking so much should have seen me put a sword in her throat by now. Unless it's not the right moment, I frowned. Was Creation, even here, putting a finger on the scales until it had received proper theatrics? It wouldn't need to do much, I thought. Not even weaken me. Just make Diabolist a little luckier, nudge her instincts a little. Keep her dice rolling sixes and her hand full of trumps.

"Ah," Akua said. "You begin to understand. You are only half a villain. It is not your fault, my dear. You were taught incorrectly by a man who believes power derives from methodology, from philosophy."

Should I let her keep her talking? If I got stubborn about striking a blow when it was all set against me, I might make a hard mistake and take a wound that would prevent me from actually taking advantage of the opening. If there was an opening at all, which was already an assumption. If she got to finish her speech, though, I suspected I was fucked.

"Power," Diabolist said. "That is our philosophy. The only philosophy. The rest we craft in the wake of seizing, in a vain attempt to justify what was never just – for justice is as much an invention as the rest, a trinket built by the hands of men."

"It's an empty world you peddle," I told her. "That's why you get stabbed at the end, Akua. No one wants to live in it but you."

"Shall I tell you a secret, Catherine?" she smiled. "The true altar before which every man and woman in the Empire kneels is not dedicated to the Gods Below. It is the Tower, that nameless god that wears ever-changing faces anointed in the blood of the last. The Empress is dead, so the Empress rules."

"Backstabbing isn't a fucking virtue, Diabolist," I bit out. "It's why Praes fails all the time. Why even with all its power it lost to Callow again and again for over a millennium."

"Not a virtue, no," she said. "A liturgy, worship sincerer than any pact made in the dark through ancient prayers."

"See, there's no point in having a conversation with you," I said. "Because you're not being impartial about this, it's your religion. And your religion is godsdamned poison. Even when given a real functioning alternative, you'd rather throw a tangible victory away than consider you might have been wrong."

"Ah," Diabolist smiled. "But am I?"

"It always comes back to the same thing with you, doesn't it?" I grimly said. "Until the very moment someone put a knife in you, you'll pretend just the fact you're breathing means you're right. And it's not just you. Malicia was wrong. There should have been a fucking culling, after the civil war. You can't negotiate with people who see negotiation as a sin."

"You mistake me," Akua said. "I ask if you truly believe I am wrong? You stand before me bearing a mantle won through theft and murder, the old sacraments of our kind. Having assembled a host that would follow you against the Empress, having seduced into your service talents slighted by the old order. Protest all you like, the path you tread is old and well-worn."

"I'm not you," I hissed.

"No," Diabolist agreed. "You lack that purity of purpose, dulled by those who should have sharpened you. I will cure you of this, Catherine."

"I used to think there was the remains of a person in you," I said. "Something left of the child that was beaten into becoming this. But there isn't, is there? You can't even understand what affection is anymore."

I could not let myself be drawn too deeply into this. Slowly, quietly, I gathered power to myself. It would all ride on that single opening. If I managed to overpower her then, I could turn this into the kind of brawl she was utterly unfit to fight.

"Why so shy?" Akua laughed. "Use the word you truly meant. Love. And that is where they robbed you, Catherine. It is the leash they use to keep you in line. And so you stand before me a Squire instead of a Knight, expecting to win when you have no weight. What story carries you in this place? What Squire could possibly stand where you do?"

"I'm a little more than that," I said, and that was my one chance.

I struck. Every speck of power I'd managed to draw in, a deafening clap sounding as I filled the world with ice. Half the Heart was made a jagged thing of frost and I already I was moving. Merciless Gods, I thought as the ice shivered, she can't possibly- The strength of Winter sagged, the ice broke and along the lines I had struck thin ropes of sorcery came back to me. I struggled against them but they were like draining ditches, the power flooding through them and going nowhere. The bindings began to tighten and there was only one way out of this.

"Break," I said.

The ropes shattered, and in that very moment I felt Akua smile as she strode through shards of ice.

"Finally," she said. "Bind."

I'd felt something like this before, mere feet away from where I now stood, and the irony of it was cloying. Alone of all the things in the world, I was trapped in amber. Sweat slowly trickled down my cheek, leaving a salty trail behind, and even as the first drop fell with a soft sound on my armour I felt Winter go still. Not all of it. Around me the glaciers still creaked and broke in their ceaseless dance, but the mantle I had claimed from the Duke of Violent Squall sat like an obedient dog who did not even dare to breathe. No, more than that. Warlock had warned me, that I was not entirely human anymore. The fae title had been woven into my Name, its domain becoming an aspect, and so when Diabolist bound Winter she bound my Name as well. I felt my mind scrabbling against a wall of glass, reaching desperately for my last aspect – which even if unsuited would do something, anything – but there was no purchase. I no longer ruled my Name, my mantle or even my own body. I was appalled, then, at the arrogance I'd had in trying to kill this woman with the very instrument she could use to crush me. Akua slowly circled around me, her long dark hair made shining by melted frost.

"It would have been a fight," she said. "If you were not merely dwelling in the penumbra of villainy instead of embracing your better nature. A Black Knight anointed the last of Winter would have been... difficult to call to heel. I would have preferred it, nonetheless. They cheated the both of us our true iron."

Instead all she'd had to do was talk, and bait out my only aspect that might feasibly break her hold. For all that Diabolist had pretended to be absorbed in her words, she'd had me dancing to her tune since the moment she stepped into Arcadia. Akua's hand strayed to my face and she wiped away the sweat almost tenderly. It felt like a violation, however fleeting the touch, and one made even worse by the pretence of warmth.

"You will never like me," she told me. "But you will learn to love me, eventually. We will do great things, you and I. As we were always meant to."

She smiled, like a young girl sharing a secret with another in the dark.

"It is petty, but I am glad you have Deoraithe blood. Even if only in part," she confided. "They are a greater kind than the rest of Callowans. Nearly Praesi in their settling of grudges."

I was not a person in her eyes, I realized. Just cattle to be inspected for good teeth and lustrous coat. I'd ceased being someone to her, if I'd ever been, the moment she decided she had a use for me. Her hand withdrew from my face, instead adjusting my cloak around my neck.

"The throne room would have seen you lose as well," she mused. "But here? Oh, the mistake that was. Diabolist, dearest. Strange vistas such as these are not foreign to me. You took us to a place of usurpation and murder, and though you have learned of those ways you are yet young to that learning and came late to it besides."

Her lips quirked and she stepped away.

"You will already be thinking of ways to cross me," she said. "So let me disabuse you of that possibility."

I should have been, I thought. But I was stuck in a quagmire of my own horror, beginning to realize how badly I'd fucked up and how it might destroy everything. Even if Black somehow got me out of this, I knew what the price to that would be. There were no longer good outcomes to this. This fight was a disaster there would be no recovering from. Entire legions shattered on the eve of a great war, an entire city of Callowans lost and made to serve beyond death, and beyond all that someone was going to have to die over this. Me or Black, or – and the possibility was one that for all my previous confidence I could no longer deny – I might just lose. Completely, utterly, beyond denial. It only takes once to change everything, Diabolist had said earlier. I'd crawled from victory to victory these last few years, leaving burning wrecks behind me but still coming out ahead. There'd been nights where I wondered if some of those could be called victories at all, but now that I met the eyes of an actual defeat I knew the answer. I had my skin crawling, the crystal-clear understanding of exactly how fragile all I'd built was. How one bad day would be all it took to unmake it entirely.

"You will kill the Black Knight with your own hands, and in doing so become my second," Akua said, bringing me back to there and then. "Because there is no going back from that, you see. The Calamities will hunt you regardless of whether or not your own will guided the blow. The Empress, given the choice of keeping them or you, will choose them. And so your only salvation will lie in my service."

Would she? Would Malicia really? If it meant losing the Woe maybe not but then she might not really be losing them. Hakram would stay by my side, but Masego had been raised with Black as an uncle and Archer's teacher was his lover. Where their loyalties would lie I couldn't be sure. Thief might bail before it ever came to that, she had a history of doing it. And if one side had both Hierophant and Warlock on it, and Scribe as well? The Empress couldn't afford not to choose it, not if she was facing a rebellion from Diabolist. Spies and powerful mages would be what she needed most of all in the days to come, if Black died.

"That was always your side's conceit," Diabolist fondly said. "Thinking that being clever and quick enough, you could have the power without paying the price."

The dark-skinned woman inclined her head and without my prompting my hand rose, tearing open a portal back into Liesse. Not, I grasped, blindly aiming. Going through Arcadia was like threading a needle. And in owning both the place where the needle had first passed and the place where it would come out, Diabolist had been able to control exactly where that fairy gate would lead.

"There's always a price, Catherine," Akua chided me.

She went through the portal, and I followed. Behind it Black awaited.

Sweet. I figured Cat would be Bound in Arcadia. Brilliant move, taking the Diabolist to a realm not Reality, where her power would be greatest.

stevenneiman

Cat's mistake was recognizing that Akua had chosen to doom herself, then extrapolating beyond the data to assume that she was a total idiot incapable of making good plans. Also, she threw away the real advantage she could have had by leaving her own controlled battlefield rather than attaining victory there and then leaving at the last minute. It would have been a classic heroic story to defeat the mad sorceress, destroy her fortress of doom and then leave just before the whole place collapsed around her but she chose to leave after gaining the upper hand rather than the proper course of action which would have been to punt Akua through the goblinfire, pin her to the floor with a sword, let off a catchy one liner, and then leave through her hidden escape route.

On the other hand, I suspect I know how this is going to end. Black is going to Destroy the Binding and allow Cat to kill Akua, but do it dramatically just after Cat has delivered a mortal wound to him. She's already using her Bind aspect against Cat, and she used Claim earlier, and I don't see any way that she could use Call to restrain the likes of a Named, so all that's left is mere high arcana, which is never a sure thing when you're counting on it.

Stayer

Cat rarely wins because of herself, it's mostly others engineering everything and her getting lucky enough.

danh3107

Yeah I saw this coming, bet anyone ten dollars the next chapter or the chapter after cat's going to kill black and break free of Akua's control that way. Or you know, break free without doing it, I doubt this will be permanent.

Byzantine

I get the feeling she is going to violently transition to a new (in every sense) Name the moment before the killing blow is struck. Akua was right – the Squire could never have won that battle. And Cat's been on the edge of a new name for some time. It's just not going to be what anyone expects – she is not going to transition to a Knight, because that is what Squires do. And Cat subverts and changes the story by her very nature.

SlumberyStorm

Well she has TAKE and there is a Name for the TAKING.

Rook

I'm going to make a specific prediction here, Cat kills Akua by spearing the necklace she's wearing around her neck and impaling her neck with the sword in the process. She does become a knight, but possibly not a black one.

Cat's supposed to lose something she loves. Black is a surrogate father she has admitting to loving like a parent/mentor, just a tiny bit. Akua has a necklace with a soul in it, but Cat is pretty sure it isn't Akua's own.

I mean, whose soul would it realistically be? Akua doesn't do anything without a reason. For all her flaws she takes clear steps toward a goal and makes every move with intention. Ain't some random soul lying around there for no reason.

Pretty easy guess? It's Black's soul. She's an old school villain, the exact type to engage in monologues and to hold a loved one hostage with a trinket.

Thing is an old school villain is also the type of villain who is very prone to snatching defeat from the jaws of victory. Say, by doing something like telling the Squire to kill the Black Knight (which she admitted she'll make Cat do), while wearing Black's soul around her neck. Bonus points if she makes Cat kneel to rub the victory in her face first, putting her in a perfect position to kill her instantly by following her orders to the letter – stabbing upwards at the necklace Akua is wearing instead of Black's body. Mirror image of the fourfold crossing.

I'd say that's probably the big decision Cat has to make, when she realizes what she has to do and has to make the choice to pull the trigger or not, unwillingly killing her mentor and her biggest pillar of support with her own hands.

At that point, if she chooses to go through with it, it's going to strike true. The sword is going to get guided by fate like water down a well-worn path, no real chance to miss or go badly. Creation will dictate it so; it's such a well defined trope against such a classic villain in such a classic setting, with a method that suits her strength – improvising and pulling through with a clever and often self-harming gambit at the last moment.

On top of that it segues pretty well into the next possible conflict. The Big Bad Calamities, at least three of which have explicitly promised to come for her head if she ever hurt Black.

The twist will probably be if she didn't become the Black Knight after killing Amadeus, or if Akua survives her neck spearing and transitions to a big boss from a mid boss, to mirror Cat transitioning from a protagonist in training to The Protagonist.

letouriste

twenty on black having planned cat defeat and next chapter killing akua or at least weakening her enough for cat killing blow.

he is black after all,i can't see how that would not be planned.

we didn't get an accurate sense of what is happening in the background,we don't know what black is thinking and why cat didn't use Take yet.

i think black see all that battle like a training opportunity for cat.

the taste of defeat will strengthen her

Rook

Akua already lost. 100%. This is a story that uses stories and story tropes as plot devices. On top of that, Black isn't someone who uses plain tactics. He breaks the fourth wall, he uses story elements.

The fourfold crossing wasn't just a Trap, it was a Story. What happens when a squire is traditionally knighted? They kneel before a ruler before being knighted and rising with the mantle.

The fourfold crossing. Cat knelt before Akua, crowned in dread. She rose, fully titled and shoving steel through her throat. Her one strike, that she needs to make count, it came after kneeling.

What just happened? Cat knelt, before Akua, crowned in dread. The one strike cat has a window for, the one Black opened the window for, hasn't happened yet. It comes after the kneeling.

Black just screwed Akua over and beat all her grand designs by walking in, getting himself savagely beaten, and being held captive for most of the action. Of course foreshadowing points to him meeting a Terrible Fate, but I'm not sure he cares about that much, so soon after losing Captain.

nipi

Cats probably going to kill Black and then gets her moment to skewer Akua. All according to Blacks plan. And Batman, sorry

I mean Black has surely left behind failsafes to eliminate all the soon to be out of control Calamities.

SpeckofStardust

So...
Cat's the monster

Byzantine

Funny thing is Akua is completely correct about the story and the Squire not being enough.

But... she's making a mistake there. A mistake as bad as the one Cat just made. The story says a squire must become a knight. But Cat? Cat changes stories. She's going to become something else entirely.

Book

I'd put money on Black meeting a Terrible Fate, and Cat earning her knighthood. The foreshadowing is written all over the place

Black vs Heir was a Character Defining Moment, and this was basically stated outright to be a parallel crucible for Cat. He lost his parents, something he loved. Surprise, closest thing she ever had to a parent is in arms reach and is the only nearby character that she gives a big hoot about.

On top of that, you'll notice how the last few chapter titles for the mini arc have all even musical terms? Elision in music is when you use the ending of one song as the beginning of another. In that one you also got the symbology of a Knight-to-be kneeling, before being knighted and rising bearing the mantle.

This is the end, Loss that's got a significantly different tune than the rest of the song. She's lost and knelt. Now all roads lead to a Rise, while shoving steel through someone's throat, if elision was any indication. Knighted by Akua, crowned in dread, bearing some sort of title that definitely is not the Squire. Only question is whether Akua survives the knighting and what Cat loses/changes into – Name and Character wise.

Byzantine

I fully expect Black to die.

I fully expect it will not be by Cat's hand.

Engineer

Yes, there was no other way that exchange could have gone.

However, are you guys also seeing the rule of 3 at play here?

Squire dominated Diabolist in her seat of power, then Diabolist dominated Squire in her seat of power (sort of).

All that remains is for Squire to dominate and win in the final exchange.

Likely after the Black Knight is dead.

RoflCat

A part of me think a self-stabbing + another self-necromancy for another set of fresh aspect/Name is in order.

Type

Creation does not do repeat performances, It has been mentioned before that their pattern of three is done and that there will not be another.

soonnandnaanssoon

The only loophole I can think of for the pattern of three is about the Names tbh. A Pattern of Three between the Squire and the Heiress is done and dusted, but a Pattern of Three between the Squire and Diabolist hasn't yet been established. Admittedly, it's kinda weak and the Story and Role don't carry much weight. I think the way out of the Diabolist lies around the Role of Diabolist; to hold power over creatures foreign to the world.

Anyway, it'll be fun if the Tyrant appeared here with the White Knight or something. It'll just be a little backstabbing and treachery with the Wandering Bard's goals.

nipi

Cant remember if Cat reset her name before or after the pattern of three was completed? Might be another factor.

Anna

edrey

danmit, i see it coming but this is really bad, the only way out i can see is cat changing her name, the pivot is next, then is the monster.

TMP

The idea that "the only salvation will lie in her service" ... I doubt it can work. Cat likes stabbing her in the throat over kneeling.

That's also why I can't quite see the story behind Cat killing Black. She wouldn't follow Akua, and anything else would (usually) see her killed by Ranger.

Thief didn't really play a role yet though, so my money would be on her saving the day. Stealing the binding or something like that.

But I guess, as usual, I'll be wrong.

AshSlanabrezgov

Yeah, I can't see Cat following Akua after Bind wears thin. Even if Akua made her do something unforgivable regarding Empire, Cat is too spiteful.

tyizor

Sooo. The title is middle 8. "Middle 8. A middle 8 is so called because it is a section in a song that tends to happen towards the middle of the song, and tends to be eight bars in length. The purpose of this section is to break up the simple repetition of a verse/chorus/verse/chorus structure by introducing new elements into the song." Fuck.

tyizor

There's a good chance that the chorus is Catherine's constant wins against the Akula. This promises some kind of change to the pattern (though not necessarily throwing the chorus out entirely).

Morgenstern

Constant wins against Akua? o0 Always so far AKUA was the one to get something out of those "defeats"... NOT Cat... Cat actually lost while "winning"...

Shequi

I am in no way encouraged by the motif of these chapter titles being about music; it hints that the Wandering Bard may be about to take a hand in matters.

letouriste

no way cat kill black next chapter,i can't see that happen at all.

-black has been too low key in this battle,he has something prepared.i think he planned cat defeat for training.i'm sure he had planned to be captured but we also know he has plans for the futur;)

-cat still has Take,that one aspect which could rivalise Fall in efficacy if used at the right time.she can't use that under akua control but black probably can do something about that.

-the whole chapter feels like akua dooming herself instead of cat...i don't know why i feel that way^^ maybe her overconfidence or her not having any apparent real troubles to perform her plan (victory in story is never so clean cut,there is a hole somewhere in her plan and i think that's her underestimating black).

-the chapter title.

-we didn't see at all akua father yet since the start of the battle,Thief too,Assassin too but he didn't seem the kind to participate during the action.

blablabla i just want the next chapter!:D thanks for the release

nipi

Black has been sensing his end nearing. Might be a self fulfilling prophesy in which Black tries to leave the stage in a manner that benefits Cat and the Empire the most.

Indeed, what has Thief been up to?

If someone doesnt drag Akuas papa into this then he is probably going to end up as an opponent with a grudge for Cat.

MetruX

Actually I see he watching his daughter die and wonder aloud why she couldn't just accept things as they are, like he did when he didn't challenge the Name of Warlock.

Gorgoroth

Catherine never used TAKE. I expect that the use of that aspect will be how she escaped this debacle. And hopefully she'll actually try thinking a little harder next time she gets into a duel with someone every inch her equal.

Burnsy

I suspect Cat is going to either be forced to kill Black, but transition into an entirely new name, or use Take to take the name of Black Knight without having to kill Black.

Nguyen Hong Hai

"It's over Catherine, I have the high ground!"

thespaceinvader

But is Cat Obi Wan in this situation, or is she Anakin.

Or is she Maul?

PhDEevee

I'm somewhat nervous about the Batman reference (specifically, The Killing Joke, One Bad Day) in a story filled with Black (or Dark) Knights.

oldschoolvillainOldSchoolVillain

Black still has Destroy. Obliterating Akua's Bindings over Cat wouldn't be an issue for that Aspect – the question remains whether he can call on it or not.

Captain Amazing

The "there's always a price" line suggests to me that Cat's gonna do the martyr thing. Mentor that loves her and wants her to kill him so she can save herself? Taking the selfish option leading her nemesis to destroy everything she's built and kill all those she loves? A track record of killing tyrants and defying authority? Yeah, she's killing herself. No idea how she'll get out of it; my personal hope is for the wights to become people with her becoming one.

Naeddyr

I'm gonna throw a curve-ball here:

If Catherine is so 'weak' because she doesn't synch up with her Role or Name as well as she could because damn her if she ever will, shouldn't the control her Name or Role have on her also be... weaker?

We already saw a Name-reset in the fight between the gates with Chider before, so that won't happen. Honestly, before that happened I was expecting to Catherine to lose her Name and become a normal person and kick some ass regardless (then regain her Name or some Name), but that boat has probably sailed.

TheTime

"Love. And that is where they robbed you"

Black has her father. He let himself be captured as a distraction so Assassin and Thief would take Diabolist's father as a hostage.

Joen

My god I'd totally forgotten this, good call.

However, Akua would choose herself over her father anyways.

nipi

Probably but it would make her flinch for one moment.

Engineer

Black said "you'll only have one chance." That millisecond where Diabolist flinches upon seeing her father in danger might just be opening Squire needs.

Remember, at this juncture Cat could be considered Akua's monster and villains are ever killed by their pet monsters due to mistreatment. It all works out nicely. The only question now is whether this will happen before she kills Black or after.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Book

So it's pretty blindingly obvious by now that a victory should be coming very soon, and Black is almost certainly going to die or have something Terrible happen to him, capital T. The obvious bit is that it was pretty heavily foreshadowed that heir was something of a crucible to Black, and that Heiress/Diabolist would be the same for Catherine. A victory in the end, coupled with major loss (parents in Blacks case), but more importantly a turning point that made him what he is now. Cat doesn't know of any parents to lose like Black did, but he is the closest thing to a father she has and is the only character she gives a lot of shits about within arms reach as a major player in the climax.

The less obvious bits are the chapter titles, which are thematic and pretty telling as a result. Considering this is a story about breaking the fourth wall and using story tropes as a plot mechanism, you can't exactly ignore thematic chapter titles for what's looking to be the climax and conclusion for a major arc.

The bridge and solo are pretty self explanatory, in music they generally lead up to the climax, with the solo setting up the focal point. This isn't about fleshing out side characters, world building, or a buildup arc in the shadow of the bigger picture. This song – this arc – is specifically for the Main Character, a climax at the end of a very long song building up to it.

Elision is a bit more oblique, to put it simply, an overlap where the end of one phrase is used as the beginning of another phrase. An Ending and a Beginning all at once. It's pretty easy to make a strong argument for it being foreshadowing of the overarching plot. The end of the Squire – ending with a Loss, and the beginning of the next part of the story – beginning with a Rise. Maybe not as a black knight, but as the rise of something though, something that most likely isn't the squire.

Refrain is fairly self explanatory too. A repeated line. Same old conflict against recurring big-bad Akua. Same old conflict against her as the end of an arc. First in the bet with her for the final mock battle. Second more directly in a three way with ol willy. Third face to face.

Middle eight is generally a part of a song with a very significantly different melody that helps develop the song by a good contrast. It's intentionally not in tune with the rest of the story – it gets back on the rails afterwards. This is her Loss, after winning and winning as a Main Character. It's also very arguably the End of the major plot section. She's Lost and knelt. All roads now point to a Beginning, starting with a rise and putting steel through someone's throat.

Also, generally knights-to-be generally kneel before the ruler during their knighting, before rising and bearing the formal title. If you want to take the easy way out with the symbology. More than likely Akua, crowned in dread, ends of being the one to knight Cat, whether the outcome is in her favor or not.

Engineer

Fucking brilliantly said.

BroadAxe

All these people saying they saw this coming, yet not a single person suggested it in the previous chapter comments... Anyways, my guess is that killing black will make her able to break the bindings, that or being forced to do it alllows her to break them right before having to do it. But we have seen so much foreshadowing of her necromancy and how it's special that i think she will kill him, break the bindings and then black will rise as the death knight.

That's my guess anyways 😊

BroadAxe

Also, akua talking about the tower as a deity elluds alot to how cathrine has been talking about named beings gods, and hinting at becoming one herself sorta.

"If I disdained the lay of Creation as ordained by the Gods, the banners of black and white, then I must either make my own or find myself nothing but a butcher among butchers."

This chapter also match up to her saying the part where she beat the small god that was arcadia by taking it out of arcadia where it is no longer perfect like cogs in machines. Except here it was the opposit, she a thing of chaotic victory went into arcadia and lost because there, everything must make complete narative sense 😊

Black would just rise as the Black Knight again.

Him transitioning to a new name would leave the Role of Black Knight open again unnecessarily, since Cat won't be the new Black Knight either.

werafdsaew

Akua controlling Cat using Bind has been heavily foreshadowed, and many commentators have picked up on that. The exact detail on how that could happen is, of course, not known beforehand.

Gunslinger

I think I mentioned this when Akua brought up the aspect Claim that maybe she could claim her as a fae. Didn't think it would happen at the heart of winter though.

Stephen R. Marsh

Sorry, I didn't see this coming. But there are lots of things in this I don't see coming. I'd play a heroquest differently than Cat does. Everything goes differently than I would do it, which makes the entire series so delightful to me.

burdi

it was in the Fourfold Crossing. Akua always ordered cat to kneel and cat always kneel, before shoved steel through akua throat. Cat has to loose at the beginning before she can kill akua or..... cat became akua slave for the rest of crussade

Joen

You know, I can't really see how Akua expects things to play out.

Akua enslaves Cat, has her kill Black, and then kills Malicia and takes over the Tower? Killing her way through Scribe, Assassin, Warlock, and Ranger (who will want revenge) just to reach Malicia?

Akua could flee after Black dies, but her mind is set on becoming Dread Empress—she wouldn't be content with sitting in a corner while things blow over.

Byzantine

Akua is intelligent but she does not understand Cat at all. If she did she would have killed her the moment Bind took hold.

*knockoffnikolai*

Remember, Akua's just as genre-savvy as the other major players. She's banking on the fact that staying more in tune with her villainy gives her more of a narrative advantage.

Nafram

I choose to believe, in Catherine, in that she will find a way to not only defeat Akua but to save Amadeus and prevent Praes from basically imploding.

And, well, everyone seems to forget that Liesse is the one place where a Name can be usurped. Perhaps Black and Cat could find a way to use that to make Cat transition without killing Black and breaking Akua's hold over her 100% certain Black has planned for this. 70% certain Cat will get a new name out of it, the missing 30% are to account for how long it's been teased already. I don't quite trust the author not to blueball us ;). If Black dies, she definitely gets a new name, but if he lives (and I believe that he planned with his death as a cost he'd be willing to pay, but ideally wouldn't have to) then it might get delayed at least until she returns from the fight to claim it while putting down all the undead at once or something.

*taborask*

Honestly I'm just ashamed Cat didn't see this coming. She knew Diabolists power, knew she relied on Fae power, and just...hoped it would work out? I had all sorts of theories about how she was going to get around such an obvious weakness and am kinda let down that she just didn't think of it

1shot4living

Oh... No, please tell me that I'm not right... For the love of all that is holy, please have Cat kill Black... And then become the Black Panther XD

TheAtomicOption

Interesting to see people speculating about Cat getting a new name. It would be fun to see what she gets with 3 new aspects again. But what names could she even get? She already rejected Queen. Black Knight would require killing Amadeus, so here's hoping that's not the one. White Knight isn't really her style. Chancellor? outlawed and also not her style. Maybe a completely new one? It will be interesting to see. If I had to bet, I'd still predict she becomes Black Knight somehow. But maybe she can save Black and pull out a new one like Cavalier or Black Queen instead.

kagelupus

Cat rejected the title of Queen as thrust upon her by the Angels of Judgement, since it came with strings attached. But I don't think that necessarily bars her from ever getting a royal Name. She was the orphaned Squire that pulled the Sword from the Stone, after all.

Personally I think that the Angels just offered her the wrong name. Cat is a pragmatic villain who wants to rule because she is the only person who will do it the right way. She was never going to be the type of ruler who sits back and rests on her laurels because the entire world is fucked and out to get her people. Luckily there is already precedence for a Queen of Callow who uses martial might to lift her subjects up and stop them from just being a stomping ground between other nations.

My money is on Catherine Foundling, Queen of Blades.

HappyNap

Correct me if im wrong... but Cat used three different stories while in Arcadia to give weight to her fight with the Duke of violent squalls... Wasn't one of them her father dying?

Metalshop

With the implication that it's by her hands, no less.

narcoduck

To me, there are still three factors at play before this Book must come to a close.

1. Malicia's answer at the end of Chapter 49: Hearsay. We know that she knew perfectly well what Akua's weapon was, and perhaps even expected Cat to be Bound by Akua. Now that the High Lords are done for, what could she focusing her time on now?

2. Thief and Akua's father are both missing. There's the beginning of Akua's Folly.

3. The mysterious message at the end of Chapter 63: Bridge. Message from Thief? Black? Malicia? Hells, the Tyrant?

From reading the comments, it seems that everyone believes Catherine's time as Squire is at an end, and Black is fated to die for the transition of his Name. But is death really the end for villains? A line struck me on a reread; three years ago in Book 1:Chapter 6: Aspect, the very first thing that Black ever truly taught Cat was Necromancy. He helped her through it, guiding her nascent power through the motions. And the word he used there was curious. It wasn't that she was too fresh into her Name; it was that she was too fresh into her Role.

I wonder what the Dead King would think of that.

Zarax

So a question... can Cat use Take on Claim and Claim and aspect of Aku for herself?

Phil

Many expect a tragic end for Black, and in a normal Story that would probably be what happens. But we need to remember that a big part of what Cat does is twist and subvert Stories. Granted, she's on the defensive now and her plans have been shredded, but there's still Black to consider. He's all about twisting Stories, too, and right now things are presumably going more or less according to his plans.

Which is not to say that he'll necessary get out of this in one piece. Not everything can be subverted because Stories are the physics of this world. One of the rules seems to be that great accomplishments require great sacrifice. Akua wants Cat to sacrifice Black in order to rise higher, which really means helping Akua rise higher. Black and Cat will want to twist that to their advantage, but no amount of twisting will eliminate the fact that a sacrifice will be needed.

Kiling Akua would be a sacrifice in one sense of the word (like the sacrifices the Praesi practice all the time), but would it be the right sort for this little dance to play out? Perhaps not, in which case something important to Cat and/or Black will have to be given up in order for Akua to be defeated.

This fight is fundamental to this story. Black is living the idea that Roles and Stories can and should be subverted for the sake of larger goals. Akua is living the idea of sticking to one's Role in the Story – that there are no “larger goals” outside of living one's Role. For Black, being Evil is largely a means to an end; for Akua, being Evil is the end in itself.

The winner in this fight is obvious, given what this story is. But how and at what cost are open questions. It's a mark of a good writer that they can let the end of a fight be so obvious, yet leave open enough questions that they still manage to maintain tension and interest.

Many have thought that Cat would eventually take on the Role of Black Knight. It seems obvious and is part of her Name, and that's part of why I'm sure it won't happen (or at least she won't stop there). She'll never play second-fiddle to anyone, and that's what the Black Knight ultimately is. Unless Cat is able to forge a completely new Name and Role, there's only one place she's going: Empress.

It would fit with Black's plans, after all. He wants a stable Empire and believes that a union with Callow will allow that. The Callowans will never truly accept being ruled by the Empire, though they are on their way. Having a Callowan Squire is helping. Cat as a sort of Vice-Queen helps more, even if it's unofficial. But Cat as Empress? That would solidify Callow's place in the Empire and against everyone else.

Ed

No matter which way this falls Akua loses. She Bound SQUIRE not The Black Knight so even if Cat does transition to The Black Knight as intended, Akua is kinda fucked.

So either Cat gets free somehow and fucks her up as Squire, unlikely or Cat transitions to Black Knight either with Black dead or not and she fucks her up as the unbound Black Knight or Cat transitions to something completely new and fucks her up then.

Just a matter of how hard Akua is going to get fucked.

maresther23

I have this ridiculous image of Black going “all according to keikaku”

Decius

“Squire” can refer to either the shield-bearer/knight's apprentice, or to a village leader or justice of the peace or similar dignitary.

Cat could transition to a different name. Death Knight is out because there isn't room for another Knight. But something like Viceroy could come from (e)Squire. Or, with one aspect of Squire left, she could subvert the story Akua is telling, TAKE the title of Black Knight from Amadeus, then stab Akua in the throat, Either way, the payoff for "We do not kneel" is approaching.

Shawn Panzegraf

Everyone's forgetting something:

During the Chapter where Cat argued with Black, suspecting he was setting this up as a suicide mission for himself to transition her. There was foreshadowing, a moment where Cat thought to herself she could bind Black as a Queen does a Knight not to get himself killed. Instead Cat chose to trust Black.

That passage very HEAVILY hints/foreshadows that Cat is on the edge of Black Queen as a Name. I don't think it a coincidence that Black jumped her about "dispensing with the bastard fig leaf" that was calling herself "Vicequeen of Callow."

All the elements are there. While the Squire had no weight versus the Apocalyptic Villainous Evil threatening the Kingdom, a "villainous Queen of Blades-type Name" (Ie: Black Queen) would be just the sort of Name with the weight to throw off Akua's binding and contest with Diabolist on (more than) equal footing.

nigeltheoutlaw

I feel like Cat is going to be getting a new name instead of becoming the Black Knight. She's already become so much more than a Squire, and it'd feel almost anticlimactic for her only to be the Black knight. Maybe she can be the Black Queen in Name.

Then again, this is the type of story that seems to have a hard on for tragedy and bad ends, so maybe shit will blow up and she'll kill her surrogate father after all.

Anon

So...Cat's plan that she spent a bunch of time developing was to get Diabolist into the realm where rules, stories, and Names become much more relevant, AFTER Akua already warned her in a previous chapter, "what I claim, I bind" (of which the claim presumably allowed Akua to set up the initial bindings that led Cat to wasting break), and used summer fire to beat cats ice...and this was the best plan she and Masego could come up with?

Either this is all a plan of blacks (especially with that sentence from the shadow we couldn't hear somehow a few chapters back) or this feels really dumb. Even though it likely isn't going to end here, and I know Akuas role means she needs to be a schemer, this feels a little bit out there.

Granted, cat has other elements in play even without black, but if it's a black plot, there is the risk of the cool reveal feeling cheap, unless black mind whammied cat to forget, in order to make the twist more believable from a narrative standpoint Side note, don't the aspects have a cool down of sorts? Cat just used break during the 4fold path illusion. And on that note, Akua seems to imply that cat could attempt to break free later, in that bind may be limited? (She's also massively misconstruing cats character if she thinks cat would ever work for her after the lesson of the crossing failed – she'd need to continually bind her and/or keep her in Arcadia, or swear she would murder every Callowan alive if cat tries to get out from her yoke.

Gutters

I think that Cat is due for a name change, but in this case, it will be a logical progression of subtle clues we have seen. If I had to buy my lottery ticket, I'd pick something like "Black Queen" being her new name, because with it, she can become a Queen of Callow (as she has already been heading in that direction), she can maintain her association with dark powers, but also, it gives her a chance to recruit Black to her side. After all, every queen needs her knight in shining armor, and this would allow her to keep him.

Shawn Panzegraf

Akua's biggest problem with long-term binding Cat is she's applying her own outlook to anticipation of what Cat would do if faced with the Calamities hunting her for killing Black. AKUA would do whatever was necessary to survive, so she assumes Cat would/will do the same.

Diabolist is unable to process the thinking that could allow (even if everyone were right about Cat becoming the new Black Knight) Cat to rise as the Black Knight, and then turn on Akua anyways despite knowing it'd mean her own end at the hands of the remaining Calamities.

Diabolist would die with a look of shocked incomprehension on her face...

The Verbiage Ecstatic

I'm surprised Akua thinks that Cat will become the new Black Knight if she forces Cat to kill Black against her will. Yes, the Squire killing the Knight and ascending to his place is part of the Name, but if it's involuntary, will it have the weight to stick? Names are all about will, and it seems like a pretty weak-sauce act of will to kill your predecessor because someone else is running you like a puppet. Why wouldn't it just leave the Name open for anyone to claim? Akua makes the point that the Calamities won't care whether Cat kills of her own volition, and from what we know of them, that seems accurate, but Creation does seem to value intent.

naturalnuke

And then Scribe wrote a letter.

And the Diabolist lost power.

Cestarian

Black will not die, student killing teacher is a trope, and this story is about resisting tropes.

I think black's plan is to renounce his name before she can kill him, that is the only way Catherine won't just get squashed by warlock, scribe, assassin and possibly ranger after this ordeal. If he lives but she gets his mantle anyways. He does not need to die, if he steps down voluntarily, and I don't believe for a second that he doesn't see how he would just be a liability after this, after the purge, he has no real place as the black knight after that. Not even for the war with procer.

So in offering his name to Catherine without dying, she will get an opportunity to strike.

Captain Amazing

Not being able to renounce his name is kinda like the Hierarch's entire thing so I don't think it's just that easy. On further thought, that would be a plausible way out if they get it to work; Akua bound the name of Squire. On the other hand, isn't she banking on a transition once he's dead anyway and would have planned for this?

Thenre

So we've had a lot of foreshadowing that something is going to go down with the kingdom of the dead. That plus the foreshadowing of the death of Black makes me think this story is going to go one way (which means I'm almost certainly wrong).

- 1) Akua makes Cat kill Black
- 2) As the sword is swinging down Black uses Break on the Binding
- 3) Because Black waited so Cat would have to finish the blow and kill him she does
- 4) Akua begins another monologue about how she is the Empress and will knight her and blah blah blah
- 5) Cat says something to the tune of "You may be the Empress, but you'll never make a Queen kneel" and then stabs her through the throat (claiming the Black Queen Name in the process as alluded)

- 6) Using her new power as the Black Queen Cat raises Black from the dead and knights him as the Death Knight
- 7) In 3 more books (after spanking both Procer and Malicia) they end up at war with the Kingdom of the Dead or whatever it's called
- 8) The Death Knight is turned against the Black Queen
- 9) Cat finally destroys Black once and for all and then pretty much everything including herself in her grief.
- 10) We get an epilogue where Masego has a Harem of Heroes where Archer gets him the bodies of magical creatures in exchange for his "love" and thief steals him magical artifacts for the same.

Vagrant

I like the idea of black using break at the last moment possible thus enforcing his plan of dying and freeing cat. However, is his aspect not known to Akua? I don't remember whether he managed to keep an aspect hidden over his long career. He is awesome like that, so it might be. It just seems pretty... If Akua does not know his aspects, she should still be aware of the list of possible aspects and therefore be prepared for such a standard use of it. But I like the timing idea. Maybe it will happen but not yet be the final sequence of this fight

Tohron

Just to note – in case anyone missed it, in the Exeunt interlude we found out that Diabolist's remaining aspect is Call, which lets her control & see through the creatures she summons. Most likely it'll be used to bring in the monster.

Vagrant

Hello everybody, there are loads of theories in the comments. This story is very engaging to me too. So I, normally being a quiet lurker, want to share my two cents as well. 😊

Cat has been warned about her Fey nature being used against her, so she will have anticipated getting smacked in that weakness by one of akuad aspects. Masego and her have planned together after all. So why does she seem to be surprised now? If my assumption is correct, it can only be explained by her somehow having messed up her memories/ thought process on purpose. Maybe for the sake of playing out a believable Real narrative of being losing right now to creation. Whatever creation is exactly.. Or to fool akuad, as Cat is aware of not being an actor akuad would be unable to see through. Also, I agree that in the narrative cat expects I this chapter she herself has now become the monster of akua. It certainly has a personal touch 😊

zout

I love this story, but it is becoming so tedious...
This fight for Liesse has lasted more than 10 chapters at this point (long ones too). There are fully fledged books shorter than this. Some serious editing would do this story wonders

Chapter 68: Coda

"Here, have a butter knife. Let it not be said I do not tend to the needs of my beloved subjects."

– Dread Emperor Revenant, having dinner with an enemy

It was a pretty room, for an abattoir. As usual, Diabolist had indulged in a décor that was halfway between an overly ornate brothel and a cult's secret altar. The walls were pure bas-relief of pale grey marble, and even as my body obeyed instructions not my own I caught glimpses of what they displayed. Hells, twenty-one layers of them forming progressively smaller circles centred around the pedestal in the centre of I tall. Braziers of blood-red flame cast flickering shadows that seemed to make the reliefs of the devils move just out of sight, but my attention rested squarely on the man hanging in the air. Above a raised pedestal Black was held up by golden bindings on his wrists and ankles that had him spread-eagle and incapable of moving anything but his neck, which he craned at an angle to watch us coming in.

"You're late," he told me, bluntly ignoring Akua.

Diabolist tittered amusedly. She was like a cat playing with a mouse, savouring the struggle before the inevitable kill.

"You may speak, Catherine," she said, flicking her wrist.

I licked my lips, a rush of pleasure at getting back control of even just a part of my face spoiled only by the knowledge that she could take it back at a whim.

"She bound my Name," I said. "I don't control my body."

Black had lost his helmet, at some point, and his face was bruised. His armour had been stripped as well, and that sight was foreign to me. Beyond the cuts and scrapes I knew mattered nothing to a villain as old and set in his self-image as my teacher – they would be gone soon enough, leaving not even scars – it was seeing him without the shell of steel that discomfited me. It made him look vulnerable. But his eyes were sharp as ever, and his pale green gaze turned to study Diabolist with disdain.

"Temporary enslavement, truly?" he said. "I expected better of Tasia Sahelian's daughter."

That drew blood, I saw with a smirk. There was a heartbeat of frozen fury in Akua's eyes before she schooled herself into a blank mask.

"You killed barely a tenth of the soldiers I assigned to your capture, Lord Black," Diabolist replied. "Today is a day for disappointments, it seems."

Black seemed amused, and utterly unconcerned about the fact that he was trussed up like a pig for me to slaughter. That would have given me hope if I didn't know for a fact he would behave exactly like this even if he had no last card up his sleeve.

"Arcadia was a mistake," he told me, returning to ignoring Akua. "You won a greater comparative advantage in capacity, but in Arcadia narrative matters most of all. You lacked the necessary weight to win, Catherine. In the future, consult further than Hierophant. His lack of interest in stories is a glaring weakness."

If I could frown at that, I would have. He knew for a sure I'd consulted others when planning this out: he'd been one of them.

"This is almost touching," Diabolist drawled. "Fatherly Amadeus, advising his pupil to the end. Mother made you out to be much less sentimental."

My teacher raised an eyebrow.

"Adults are talking," he told her. "We can return to your wasteful little tantrum afterwards."

"Perhaps a reminder of your current situation is in order," Akua mildly said.

Her wrist flicked and the bindings stretched out. A series of sharp pops signalled his joints had given under the pressure.

"I've had worse sparring with Sabah," he noted, face betraying not so much as a flicker of discomfort.

"It's already a cloudy day, Black," I said. "Stop trying to make it rain."

Green eyes turned to me.

"There is wisdom in moderation," he conceded.

Shit, there went my sudden hope. He'd given the correct answer to our identity key. Cloudy and rain were an inquiry, wisdom and moderation a confirmation. There shouldn't be anyone else who knew the key. I tried to look at Diabolist but found I could not, my movement restricted. As good as an assurance she'd been looking at me.

"Why so quiet, Akua?" Black said. "Come now, if there is moment to gloat now is it."

Diabolist slowly crossed the room until she stood by his side, her face remaining in a pleasant façade.

"This is not personal, Carrion Lord," she said.

"Of course it is," the pale-skinned man smiled. "You've sold your people the lie this is about the old ways and the new, but we both know otherwise. You're not a mere reactionary. I stand for the order that has been keeping you contained for decades, and through my death you gain clear skies."

"You have served Praes well," Diabolist said. "And in this final act will serve it still. You may leave the stage knowing your labour will not go to waste."

"You," Black said, "are the incarnation of waste. Of every destructive instinct that must be carved out or repurposed lest we ever reach old ends through old means. Your accolades are as worthless as every single thing you've ever said and done. They will pass, and be forgotten. We will all be better for it."

"Empty defiance," Akua said. "A lesser end than you deserve, but that choice was not mine to make. Ill-done nonetheless. I will spare you further disgrace."

My hand moved and unsheathed my sword, the sound of steel bared ringing too loudly in the room.

"Do you still believe it," I asked suddenly. "That it's cowardice?"

His gaze moved back to me, and what I saw there had my blood pounding against my ears. There was no fight in him.

"Proceed, child," he told Diabolist. "Play out this farce to the end."

She hesitated, in that moment. With her attention flagging I got the opportunity to watch her, and what I saw had my lips quirking. She was hesitating because she could not believe, deep down, that anyone would be unafraid of death. Because you are, I thought. So very, very afraid. Some ancient Alban king had once said that a man only began to live when he had something worthy dying for. I'd never really believed that, myself. If you really believed in something, you owed that belief that it be seen through to the bitter end. But Akua? Akua believed only in herself. She could not conceive of any victory that did not involve her breathing at the end, and applying that belief to Black she was being shaken by his indifference. Wondering if he had some last trick to save his own hide. The hesitation passed after she looked at the walls around us, at the runes hidden in the bas-relief, and reminded herself of the strength of her defences.

"Farewell, Carrion Lord," Akua said. "Die knowing that the torch you now pass will cast a shadow on all of Creation."

"Uninspired," Black judged.

The sword went through his stomach. I'd not guided the blow, and it seemed his words had irked Diabolist enough she'd chosen to give him a slow death instead of a quick one. He gurgled and twitched as the dark-skinned woman stalked at my side. Laying a hand on my shoulder she leaned close to my ear.

"How does it feel," she asked in a murmur, "to reach the dawn of what you were meant to be?"

I wasn't the one to answer. A laugh came ripping out of a throat that was patched together from half a dozen voices, hoarse and soft but all whispering.

"Akua Sahelian," the thing kept in bindings said, "Diabolist."

Even as it bled out, slowly crawling to death, its skin was flaking off. Beneath the appearance of my teacher was a middle-aged Soninke of the same build. Then it was a young Taghreb woman. Every blink had a different face to it, and the longer I watched the less I could remember about any of them. Akua stepped away from me like she'd been burned.

"Assassin," she said. "No, a fake. You are in Procer, I know it. The Prince of Orne died choking on his own correspondence."

Ah, I thought as an old detail finally clicked into place. It'd always niggled at me, that Black's favourite executioner would have a signature. His little ironic deaths. Wasn't half the point of having a skilled assassin that the enemy never knew you'd killed one of their own at all? The point of a signature, I grasped, was that people recognized it. Watched out for it. It's like the Eyes of the Empire, I thought. The deadly hidden in the obvious. How many people has Assassin killed over the years that had perfectly natural accidents no one ever thought to question? Then it sunk in that the fucking Assassin knew the identity key I shared with Black, and my blood ran cold. Even knowing it had been a measured risk on his part, the fact that at any time in the last year I might have been talking with this monster instead of mine and never known it was sobering.

"You die nonetheless," Diabolist sneered.

"A hundred times before," Assassin said in that voice was not a voice. "A hundred times more."

Akua's hand whipped up, a spear of black flames formed and tearing through the other's villains guts in moments.

"Where is your father, child?" the Assassin said. "The Carrion Lord sends his regards."

And then it laughed, laughed until there was too little left of it for even that. Ashes fell in clumps on the ground until the hellflame devoured even that. Diabolist was shaken, I saw. That I could see it at all was telling, because I could now move my neck. And wiggled the fingers of my free hand, however slightly. The binding was not perfect.

"Did you know?" she hissed, wheeling on me.

I rasped out a laugh.

"All according to plan," I lied.

Or perhaps not. Just not my plan. Diabolist mastered her anger but there was more than that I saw in her eyes. Fear, fear spreading with every pump of her heart. The realization that she was no longer in control. I relished it, fed on it. She strode to the wall and slapped down her palm on it, the reliefs shifting to leave a smoothly polished circle as she spoke in the mage tongue. The cadence I recognized, if not the words. She was scrying. The surface of the stone rippled and lights swam into focus until an image was formed, and at the heart of the circle pale green eyes met Akua's gaze.

"Good evening, Diabolist," the Black Knight said, and cut off her father's ear.

I'd never seen the man before, though I knew his name from intelligence reports. Dumisai of Aksum. He'd apparently abandoned her mother's side to join her shortly after she became governess of Liesse. The scrying stone shifted, revealing a windowless room filled with hacked corpses and my teacher standing in the middle of it with Dumisai kneeling at his feet. Hands bound, his body a collection of swelling bruises. He screamed when Black's sword cut through his ear, shaking as blood spewed. Akua let out a raw sound, before she went cold.

"A hostage," Diabolist said. "You should know better."

Black, not bothering to reply, flicked his wrist and cut off the remaining ear. The man screamed again, louder.

"Mpanzi," he hoarsely said. "Do not flinch, this is—"

Akua's breath was steady, her face still as a pond when she interrupted. She looked at Black.

"You intend to negotiate, evidently," she stated.

"Still alive, Catherine?" my teacher asked.

"Feeling cautiously optimistic about it too," I replied. "No thanks to you."

"He is bleeding, Black Knight," Akua said coldly. "He is of no use to you dead. Your trick won you a small victory, but do not overplay your hand."

The pale man's lips quirked ever so slightly.

"I cannot claim that trick to be mine," he demurred. "The Wandering Bard taught me a hard lesson in Nicae, about weight and the shifting of it. I expect she will rue that, before my days are done."

"Your demands?" Diabolist asked.

"Three questions, answered truly," Black said. "If this is done, I will spare your father. At even the suspicion of a lie, I will kill him immediately."

I had to force myself not to glare. Questions? Really? Now of all times?

"And what guarantee do I have you will hold up your part of the bargain?" Akua said.

"You'll have no oath from me, child," he said. "I give you my word. Take it or leave it."

My hands rose and I felt the cold touch of steel against my neck.

"I could kill your apprentice with a single word," Diabolist said.

"That has been attempted before," Black said. "To the woe of all involved. By all means, see where it takes you. It's been a long day, I could use a laugh."

Though I appreciated the pat on the back, I was currently lacking a fucking angel to swindle so I really wished he hadn't just said that. Akua felt desperate, at the edge of the precipice. That was a dangerous place for her kind of villain to be.

"Three questions," Diabolist said. "Answered truly."

My hand came down and the blade with it, but that meant nothing. She could do the same without lifting a finger at any time.

"You acquired a great many ritual objects to build this device," Black said. "Were any bought through the Closed Circle in Mercantis?"

Diabolist looked at him for a long time.

"Yes," she said.

For a second my teacher looked very, very old. Exhausted down to his bones. But it was gone as quick as it had come, leaving me to wonder if I'd imagined the whole thing.

"What contact have you had with the Wandering Bard, envoys thereof or affiliates bearing messages for her?" Black asked.

That got my attention. I'd been under the impression that the Bard had been meddling down south, too busy to put her hand to the chaos in Callow. That he would even ask this implied he was not so certain as that as I'd believed.

"We had a single conversation in the hills beyond Marchford," Akua said. "That was our only point of contact, to my knowledge."

If anything, that reply seem to had him get warier. Shit. Another thing to watch out for, though. I couldn't see an angle for her to play in this mess, but that was always what fucked you wasn't it? The knife you didn't see coming.

"The cylinder around your throat has a soul bound within," Black said. "Whose is it?"

Diabolist's lips thinned and she hesitated. Cold steel tightened against the back of her father's neck. I felt it on my back, between my shoulder blades. Discretely I made a thumbs down, and tapped the side of my leg once. Then a thumb up, and tapped the side of my leg twice. It was gone. Then it came back once, twice. Another piece fell into place. Soon, now.

"A newborn child's," she finally said.

He turned to me.

"Her contingency, Catherine," he told me. "A blank slate with her mind woven in, meant to eventually possess that same child's body if she dies. You will have to destroy it."

"I'm a little tied up at the moment, Black," I said irritated, then winced at the accidental pun.

"Your questions were answered," Diabolist said. "You gave you word."

"So I did," Black agreed, and the blade left the man's neck. "Move along, Dumisai."

It swung down but no blood was spilled: the bindings on the mages's hands were cut instead. There was a flicker of surprise in the eyes of both father and daughter, and in that moment of surprise the binding slackened further. Patience, Cat, I cautioned myself. The mage trembling got to his feet and my teacher sheathed his sword.

"Do you know why grand designs like yours always fail?" he asked Akua.

"You have lost your leverage, Carrion Lord," she coldly replied. "Your life will soon follow."

"Because they're loud," he continued. "You light a beacon that no one can miss. The lasting victories are always the quiet ones. Farewell, Akua Sahelian. You were warned."

Dumisai of Aksum opened a door, and the moment freedom was open to him a volley of crossbow bolts thudded into his face. Black's word had been kept, to the letter. He'd spared the man. No promise had been made about any sappers that might be waiting outside. I felt the blow ripple through her, through the binding, and finally I tapped the side of my leg twice.

"You," Diabolist screamed, the hatred in her eyes was poison but she was looking in the wrong direction and she had been made to play the wrong game since she first scried.

It was going to cost her.

"Surprise," Thief rasped, and stole the binding.

She came into sight, wounded and burned but gloriously still alive, and the world slowed as the sequence I'd been awaiting began. Diabolist turned and barked in the mage tongue in the same movement. Vivienne recoiled as if she'd been slapped, gritting her teeth. I closed my eyes, part of me knowing exactly what was about to unfold. Akua would wrest the binding back from her and seek to shackle me again, to kill Thief and then Black. Even as I ran my finger down that line the rest of me turned inwards, to the scaffolding Hierophant had fashioned around my soul. It was meant to prevent from collapsing on myself because of the power I'd stolen from Winter, I knew. The best effort of a once-in-a-century brilliant mind to keep me alive and whole. That'd been the mistake. It was, as he'd warned me, the leash Diabolist used to bind me. But the error ran deeper, because for all the horrors at his fingertips Masego was a fundamentally kind boy. He'd tried to keep me unbroken. Shield me from pain, from hunger, from the many prices the decisions I'd made had laid at my feet but had since gone unpaid. There it was, I thought. My pivot. I'd awaited some dilemma that would have my conscience or my heart bleeding, but oh that wasn't the kind of story I'd made was it?

No. For all that I'd lashed myself with guilt when the mood took me, it had always been others paying the price. My people, my soldiers, my friends. My teachers. Again and again they bled so that I would not, and the arrogance of that had seeped into my bones as over that sea of corpses I set my throne. It had made me believe I was owed victory, deep down. Perhaps even that I deserved it. And now Creation was forcing my eyes open and making me watch what I had wrought, whispering that I had a choice. I could roll the dice once more, with a laugh in my throat and a sneer on my lips, throw my challenge and my pride in the face of Diabolist and bet on a victory that heaped yet another ruin to the pile. There was a chance of triumph, glinting at the end of that path. I had Thief and years of treading the knife's edge, hatred enough to surpass Akua's own. If I risked it all in the moment before she bound me again, I could avoid the reckoning once more. Or I could give answer. I had stood before a tribunal of merciless angels once, but this judgement was a deeper thing. It was a settling of accounts in full, the surrender of all the safeties I'd been given without earning them. Just my choices and their consequences, whatever those might be. It would not be pretty. It would not be as easily set aside as a doubt in the dark of night or a death snatched back by trickery. All I had to do was to... lean in.

A single heartbeat passed. Thief lost the binding, and I made my choice. In matters of self-mutilation, I had few rivals. In my mind's eye I looked up the scaffolding Hierophant had built and I ripped it off.

Diabolist's binding found me but there was no purchase, because Winter was no longer a thing tamed. It ran wild through my veins, through my Name, and a scream ripped its way out of me. My blood was red ice, my bones snapped and beyond it all my heart beat once – and ceased. There was a world within that I owned, and it was bereft of stars and moon because in the depths of that darkness even those had been smothered by frost. It did not kill me. No, in a way that would have been a mercy and my mantle knew no such thing. What I had of life was a last gasp, the desperate clawing of death's rattle as the whole world was buried around me. Bleak. That was the word, and now I understood the meaning of it in full. Winter had taken it all and left nothing behind that would warm me, no refuge to reassure me that I was still Catherine Foundling. Even my Name was stripped bare, its power dimmed and dull. I had no aspect left but one, and that one was gone far beyond what an aspect should be. Squire, I thought, but the name rang hollow. Tied to me only by the barest thread. Transition loomed ahead, patiently awaiting the right fulcrum.

"Oh fuck," Thief whispered.

I turned to watch Diabolist, feeling the warmth and fear wafting off her fragile frame. So very mortal, for all her arrogance.

"Your trial I have cheated," I said. "And suffered defeat for that crooked passing."

"Call," Akua Sahelian said.

A bundle of power inside her unfolded under my patient eye and I flicked my wrist. Ice spread through it, cracks spreading as she flinched. Ah, I thought. Devoured but not gone. The corpse of her aspect I took for my own, let the winds and the snow bury it. It would await my purposes there.

"Vivienne," I said, and when I spoke her name she shivered.

I did not, though the sheer act of voicing it had felt like I was stroking her cheek. A true name, freely given. There was power in this.

"Stand aside," I said. "It is time for me to end this."

She mutely nodded, backing away as Diabolist wreathed herself in Summer flame. Cold crept across the room, the air going still and the stone growing cool. I did not need to will it. It happened.

"The pivot I snatched from your grasp," I told Akua. "And so you no longer have hold over me."

I felt her will scrabbling against my own, trying to seize the threads of Winter, but all she could touch was the summit of the glacier. It was beyond her ability to move.

"What are you?" Akua Sahelian gasped.

"The monster," I said. "The one you should have bound tighter."

I limped slightly as I advanced, an old wound once erased but now made anew. The Gods did enjoy their little ironies. I read it in the way she moved, that shifted. How she was going to wield the fire. It only took the slightest of adjustments to let it pass me. Was this how it felt, to have the weight of Creation behind you? How novel. Diabolist backed a way but I touched her chest over her heart, ever so slightly, and there was a quiet snap. Her expression went still, and I buried my arm through her chest up to the elbow.

"I'll be seeing you soon," I told her as she died. "I still have an oath to keep."

therealgridlock

I finally get what you said when assassin has been on screen in every book.

Assassin has literally pretended to be every character at some point, hasn't he?

crowlute

And we wouldn't even know.... What a perfect reveal!!!

Kai Wingless

Sounds like something Assassin would say!

It must have feel depressing – knowing that you are the only one who is fighting while the rest of your comrade have given up. Sometimes, it is easier to let the currents takes you away. But giving up is not what you are, you will fight till the end. You rather be a broken jade than an unbroken stone.

Cat is turning herself into a monster. See what is wrong here Black? You want her to not become you but you put her in situation where becoming you is the options she need to take. You are shit at this parenting business. I know you are doing your best and is doing what you think will help her but seriously, you need someone to talk about this parenting thing. Someone who has a functional family – Sabah. Please tell me you talk with her about this before she died. You didn't, did you?

Chapter 69: Swan Song

"Thus the Gods granted us the first boon: as we live we will die, and in dying be granted our just deserts."

– The Book of All Things, fourth verse of the second hymn

I knelt and ripped the necklace from Akua's neck, silver links giving easily. The obsidian was warm to the touch and my fingers clasped around it. Black had told me to destroy it. He was not the kind of man to be troubled over the death of a newborn child, if that child served as a tool for his enemies. It was tempting to do as he'd asked, to just tighten my grasp ever so slightly and watch it shatter. But the Empress had spoken a sentence to me, and that gave me pause. It was too early, I thought, to begin closing avenues. I rose and tossed the cylinder to Thief, who caught it without missing a beat.

"Foundling," she said. "Are you..."

Words failed her after that. I supposed there was no delicate way to ask someone if they were still sane.

"Close enough," I said. "Stash it. Unless I tell you to admit otherwise, it was destroyed."

The other woman's eyes narrowed. She wasn't like the others, I thought. Adjutant and Hierophant, even Archer, they would speak their minds to me but almost never refuse an order. Thief and I had ties of a different nature. She had only come under my banner when she made a bet on me as the only actor on the stage interested in keeping Callow from being devastated. The moment that was no longer my path, she would turn on me. I could taste the truth of that in the air.

"One hundred thousand," Vivienne Dartwick said. "At least. Maybe half that again, with the refugees. She massacred and enslaved them, Catherine. Denied them even a proper burial. And you want to keep this?"

I studied her closely, my eyes sharper than they should have been. I no longer needed to force a sliver of my Name into them to better my vision. Claiming the mantle in full had brought consequences more than metaphysical. In the cool air of the room I could feel the warmth of her, a bundle of life that had me disgustingly hungry. Winter did not make, it took. Until nothing was left. Thief had not come out of the day's butchery untouched, for all her liveliness. Her short dark hair had been licked by fire on the side of her head, leaving the whole of it looking unbalanced, and under the frayed locks I could glimpse skin burnt and blackened. The left side of her leathers was flecked with blood, and close to her leg entirely drenched. I could still see the holes in her clothes where shards of stone and metal had torn apart her flesh. It would pass. Within the month she would be the same as she'd been, her Name smoothing away the wrinkles to her appearance. She was in no shape to fight right now but then fighting had never been what her Name was about.

"Do you know why my arm keeps getting twisted?" I said.

"Leverage, Thief. That is what I lack the most. They all have things I want or need, and I have precious little of the same. That little piece is a kind leverage. It may be that I never use it, and that within the month I'll shatter it. But there's a knot of choices right ahead of me, and I will not go into it having robbed myself of a card to play.”

“She doesn’t get to come back, Foundling,” Vivienne said. “Not after this. That’s a line.”

Part of me, the same that had eyes turned to the transition ahead, balked at being dictated terms by one subordinate to me. I breathed in and out, then forced that cold anger to the side. It was of no use to me. Anger was a blinder and I already had too many of those.

“Agreed,” I said.

Thief nodded slowly, and with a flourish of the wrist she had the cylinder disappearing into that place where all her loot was kept. It was an aspect, she’d intimated to me more than once. That should be beyond the reach of anyone so long as she lived, and Thief was very good at remaining alive.

“Now what?” Vivienne asked. “I suppose we’ve won but this doesn’t feel like a victory.”

“It’s not over yet,” I said, and looked down at the Diabolist’s corpse.

I could raise it from the dead, I knew. Without the soul lingering she’d be an empty vessel, but a very powerful one. That could have its uses in the wars to come. Another temptation, this. The first of many to come: power obtained always wanted to be used.

“There should be a part of the city on fire,” I said.

“I’m familiar with the Foundling Gambit, yes,” Thief snorted.

Given how often goblinfire was my solution to a thorny situation, I supposed I could no longer deny that name. It irked me anyway, that my signature would be green flames devouring friend and foe alike.

“Toss her corpse into it,” I said. “I need to find Black. He’ll be at the centre of the mess.”

“And when you find him?” Vivienne said.

“Offers are made,” I replied. “And then a choice.”

Gods forgive me, but I hoped I’d make the right one.

Liesse had been twice claimed by death. First when Diabolist murdered and raised anew the people that dwelled within its wall, making it a house of undeath beneath her throne. And now, as the Ducal Palace burned like a green candle in the penumbra, the city had been made a necropolis in full. No one ruled here now. Not me, not Black, not the Empress. Wights only half-leashed owned the streets as the last of the living rebels huddled in their strongholds, hoping they would be spared the sword of the Tower or the teeth of their own creations. I was not inclined to mercy in this. Examples would be made, would have to be made if I was to keep Callow in hand in the aftermath. This brutal a massacre could not go unanswered. Even if the thought of letting it go had not been repulsive to me, such an obvious and blatant injustice would be the fodder of a rebellion neither Calow nor Praes could afford. It might even make heroes, sent by the Heavens to put down the last of the Calamities. Or me. The days were I could argue my methods were anything but an evil – and perhaps not even the lesser one, I thought as I walked the ruins of what had once been the heart of the south – were long gone. I was not guilty of the butchery Diabolist and her ilk had made, but it had happened under my watch. Not guilty, perhaps, but a part of responsibility could not be denied.

There would be a reckoning for that, in time. Praesi liked to say that the Tower always got its due, but the Heavens were even less often cheated of theirs.

I could feel the centre of the array in the distance, pulsing like a living thing, and I let my feet take me there. It was beginning to sink in, the depth of what Diabolist had done here as mere means to obtain expendable foot soldiers. Liesse had once been a sprawling festival of basilicas and trade, the first destination of the wealth that came pouring out of Mercantis through Dormer. It'd been the largest city in Callow after Laure, and the beating heart of southern culture. Its destruction gutted the entire south. One hundred thousand people. It'd been easier to live with when it was just a number of soldiers Diabolist could field, but now that she'd been slain I was forced to face the truth that a significant chunk of my people was... gone. Irremediably. Men and women and children, the old and the young. Not soldiers but people, the part of this country that actually mattered. It was one thing for the struggles to scythe through soldiers and conscripts, but this? It was something else. It was not to be forgiven, or forgotten. When I'd been a young girl – what an arrogant thought, I mocked myself, for someone not even twenty to have – I'd chosen to put together enough coin for the War College because reformation was the path of least death. Of least damage. A part of what had led me to that decision had been fear, I could admit to myself. I'd been raised to tales of the Conquest, of the overwhelming victories of the Legions, and thought that Praes could not be beaten.

It was now quite clear that it could.

Had Akua meant to sow the seeds of doubt, with her Fourfold Crossing? I was not sure how much I could trust the visions, if they were shaped illusion or truth, but in one of those lives I had driven Praes out of my homeland. At great a cost. Dream-like visions of countless slaughters flickered in the back of my head. But looking at Liesse, knowing the Principate was mustering its armies, I had to wonder if the massacres of that liberation would be worse than what had already taken place and yet would. The Empire was fragile, that could no longer be denied. For all that my teacher had sought to make it a nation that relied on men and institutions instead of Named, that new order was being enforced by the cudgel that was the Calamities. And behind them, the many quiet cullings of Dread Empress Malicia. But that desired metamorphosis was not complete. It had run into old money and old power, and though the Truebloods had been the visible and despicable face of that I no longer believed they were the whole of it. It had been Malicia's own allies that double-crossed me in Laure, when I went into Arcadia. That she'd either not been able to prevent that or had not bothered to spoke volumes: her grip on the Wasteland was not nearly as tight as she would have us believe.

She'd effectively purged the Truebloods, for now, and muzzled their successors. But that struck me as a nothing more than ripples atop the pond. The High Lords were sill wealthy as a dozen kings, sitting atop fortified strongholds and centuries of accumulated sorcery. They were, for now, obedient. That did not mean they would remain so, and when they did I had to wonder – which Callowan city would get the axe next? This hadn't been a Callowan war, it'd been a pissing match over ownership of the Tower. But it'd still been one of our cities that got wiped out, a hundred thousand Liessen that got turned into abominations not even as the outcome but as part of a Praesi's plan. I'd been willing to back the imperial occupation so long as it was the lesser evil, and even now I believed Callow as a client kingdom under the Tower with me keeping the peace would be better off than as Proceran protectorate. But what did it matter that the taxes were lesser and the administration more efficient, if every decade or so a city was wiped off the map in a succession struggle? I couldn't write this off as an outlier or an exception, not so long as the High Lords remained powerful.

As long as they existed an influential entity, sooner or later the next Akua Sahelian would be born. And the next one would be a little smarter, a little more careful in her rise to power. Worse, while awaiting that I would have to fight tooth and claw with the same people who'd back that coming Heiress to make sure my people were not murdered and robbed for the profit of foreign highborn. I was getting tired, these days, of begging and scraping for the bare essentials of my people's survivals from people who it was becoming evident needed me to remain in power. It could be that Malicia would reform the Wasteland, one ploy at a time. That the institutions Black had built would overtake the old nobility in power and influence. But banking on that was a gamble, and I was running out of reasons to make it. I'd grasped, over the last year, that the way to finally leave that endless cycle of war between Callow and Praes was if one side finally won. With the Empire already occupying my homeland, working within those boundaries had struck me as the better choice. But now it was having to consider the costs of that position, and they were not light. Even if Praes was tamed, as much as such a place ever could be, there would be war with the Principate. And that war would be fought on Callowan borders.

Procer alone, I believed we could beat. The Red Flower Vales could be defended even against the massive armies the First Prince could field, and the Principate could not afford long and costly wars. It had borders to the north that could not go undefended, and sooner or later the princes would start squabbling again. For now, the memory of their recent and vicious civil war kept the peace. But that wouldn't last forever, and keeping a few border principalities at bay was no impossible task. But if the Principate came knocking again and again as the heart of a crusading host, that was an entirely different game. I had no guarantees that Cordelia Hasenbach's successor wouldn't continue pursuing her policies of making war abroad to keep peace at home. Crusades had never been kind to Callow, even when it stood on the side of Good. I'd sworn my oaths to the Tower to keep my homeland from being made a battlefield every few decades, but I was not having to consider I might just have changed the face of the invader – without even sparing Callow massacres at the hands of Wastelanders. None of this could continue as it now lay.

I loved Black, for all the horrors I knew he'd committed. The Woe as well, and the family I had found in the Fifteenth. But I had not begun treading this path for love, and I would not remain on it for sentiment. The Empress had spoken a sentence to me, sorcery riding the wave of Diabolist's workings. She had earned the right to make that offer, for the favours she had done me. That did not mean I would take it. I'd told Hakram once that I had not been chosen, that I instead I chose. Yet for all the power I now had at my fingertips, I was no closer to seeing what I'd chosen come to life. The echo of the final defeat I'd almost been dealt at Akua's hands still lingered in me, the realization of fragility. I could be wrong, just like anyone else. I might be the worst thing to happen to Callow yet, the very thing I was trying to kill one ruinous battle at a time. And if that was the case... Choices needed to be made and pride had no place in the making of them.

Even as that thought touched me, I found the heart of Diabolist's grand design. Deep in the palace behind arrays that welcomed me: I had the key Fasili had made and Robber taken from him. How Black had entered I did not know, but suspected his imprisonment of Akua's father had opened doors for him. He was not above bleeding men for answers. This was the core, I thought, but not the room from which she would have controlled it all. That would be hidden elsewhere. But it was the keystone, were her own soul had once been the tool she used to rip apart Creation before she'd hidden that as well. It'd been a courtyard, before, walled in but spacious. Now runes carved into stone covered everything, power trickling towards the empty array in the centre like tributaries to a river. Transparent panes of force jutted upwards high in the sky, up to the distant place where the souls of centuries of Deoraithe roiled under containment. There was an altar of obsidian among a circle of carved stones, and at the edge of that circle I found Black standing in silence. I knew, objectively, that I was now taller than him. Yet as I watched his lone figure, decked in plain steel and threadbare black cloak, I felt as if he was the one who towered over me. His hand rose to acknowledge my arrival, though he did not turn. I came to stand at his side, the two of us watching the core of the device that had caused so much death.

"Another rival dead," he said. "Though you paid a dear price for it. You reek of Winter, Catherine."

"She wasn't my rival," I said, disinclined to discuss the other issue for now. "Not truly. Her story never had much to do with Callow, did it? And that is where mine lies."

After a moment of silence, Black lowered his head in acknowledgement.

"She should have been killed years ago," he softly said. "I regret that I did not proceed regardless of permission. A few months of madness uprooted decades of work. What an utter waste. The south will take decades to recover."

I had not expected him to express grief over the death of my people save in matters where they affected his own designs, and so was not disappointed by the nature of the sentiment expressed. Love was a fine thing, I thought, but it did not blind me to the nature of this man. It had not been coyness or affection, when I'd called a monster the night we first met. It was the truth of him. Charming at times and so easy to love, but a monster nonetheless.

"It ends now," I said.

"So it does," Dread Empress Malicia softly agreed.

There had been changes in me, and that I saw through the illusion she had come to us through was a herald of them. Whatever trick the Empress had employed to turn Diabolist's own device to her purposes was but a pale imitation of what glamour could do, and even as I thought this I suddenly knew I could use glamour as well as any fae. My fingers clenched. Mantles never leant power without a price.

"Malicia," Black said. "Your presence is no longer unexpected."

"Amadeus-" she began.

"The Closed Circle, Alaya," he said calmly. "You cannot possibly have missed that. You own two of the members."

I turned to watch the illusion. It was no meat-puppet, this time: this was the Empress in her full glory come to grace us with her presence. Even through sorcery she was lovely beyond compare. Tall and sculpted and more perfect than any mortal could truly be, her favoured colours of green and gold silk dipping into a low neckline it was hard not to glance at. The most beautiful woman in the world, many called her. Any other time, I would have allowed myself a guilty moment taking in the sight. But right now words had been spoken that forbid me such distractions.

"That's why you asked," I said. "Because you realized Diabolist wouldn't have pulled all this off without being noticed."

"That she unearthed Still Waters was beyond my predictions," the Empress said. "It blindsided me as much as you."

"That's not a fucking excuse," I hissed. "That's what the two of you are supposed to do. Keep the Wasteland under control while I keep Callow willingly in the fold. Black was in the Free Cities most of the year and I'm not even giving him a pass here because Scribe's people should have picked up on this. The two of you have spy networks that cover half the godsdamned continent. This goes beyond mere failure. I've kept my part of the bargain. You haven't."

Black was watching Malicia, and something passed between them wordlessly. My fury spiked.

"No, this doesn't get swept up under the rug," I said through gritted teeth. "The two of you don't get to settle this with each other behind closed doors. A hundred thousand people died. A major city was made into a tomb, and now I'm learning this was part of a plan? There is no part of this that's acceptable. I've gone along with everything because you're supposed to be the reasonable ones, the kind of people who nip this shit in the bud. Fucking Hells, I didn't declare war on Diabolist a year ago because there was an understanding that she would be contained. My sympathy to your 'political concerns' doesn't extend to allowing your troublesome elements to commit fucking genocide."

Black's face was grim.

"There is no excuse," he admitted. "In this I have failed you utterly."

If he'd said anything else, even pretended he actually cared about the dead, I might have struck him. But that flat admission of failure took the wind out of my sails for heartbeat. My heated gaze turned to Malicia instead. Black and I could settle our own accounts after the rest of this was addressed.

"You're not in charge," I said. "She is. And she seems like she knew what was going on more than you."

"I failed to grasp the full scope of the matter," the Empress said.

"You think?" I growled.

"How we came to current situation is regrettable, and for this I will make appropriate redress," Malicia said. "It does not change the choices that must now be made."

It was a practical way of thinking, that. At least on the surface. The truth of it was less pretty.

"But it does," I said. "All this, the oaths and the compromises? It works because I can trust you. To keep the Reforms going, to keep the highborn in check, to not tacitly allow an old breed villain to mass murder and turn Callowan cities into magical gate-making weapons. Did this really sound pragmatic, up in the Tower? Because looking around me, I see six legions all but gutted on the eve of a crusade and a story that's the best rallying cry for rebellion I've heard since the godsdamned Conquest. Now, I've fucked up quite a few times since being put in charge of Callow. I'll own that. But I have to say, I've yet to manage to fuck up quite this badly."

"We cannot," the Empress said, "weather a crusade."

"Praes cannot," I corrected coldly. "Convince me that Callow shouldn't open the godsdamned Vales to the Principate because, right now? I'm thinking it might actually be the lesser evil. How many of your own legions would stick with you, if it gets out you willingly allowed the Diabolist to rise? I come out of this room promising to hang every High Lord and make peace with the Principate, and I'm guessing no legion west of the Blessed Isle stays with the Tower."

"If you do this, Callow ends as a nation," Malicia said. "There is no ruling class left in this region, only the dregs of previous nobility. The First Prince will arrange marriages to these in order to bind her new border protectorate to Procer and station all her dispossessed fantassins in Callow as a garrison force. As a villain, you will naturally be killed or exiled. Your home will be ruled by royal second sons and daughters from then on, as permanent a battlefield as the northern principalities. Within three generations Callowan culture will remain mostly as some local quirks, while in every other matter Proceran law will apply. Callow will be fresh principalities in all but name, until even that is disallowed."

My fingers clenched until the bones turned white. So that was a blow against rolling over for Cordelia Hasenbach. My own fate was ultimately a side note: if I had to go for Callow to finally stop bleeding, then I'd pull that trigger without hesitation. I'd had a good teacher when it came to the lesson of not getting in your own way. But trading Praesi occupation for Proceran annexation wasn't what I'd signed up for. It did not escape me that Malicia was responsible for a lot of what she predicted – she and Black had been the ones to shave away Callowan nobility one assassination at a time, and it was them who'd ensured there would be restless former soldiers in Procer by feeding the flames of civil war. But responsibility wasn't how any of this got solved, much as I despised the notion of cleaning up a mess not of my own making.

"That might be true," I said. "It still doesn't make sticking with you shine in comparison. Callow still gets fucked under the Tower, even with me in between. The Principate are pricks, but at least they don't turn cities into graveyards. 'Low taxes but the occasional spot of genocide' is a pretty low bid to beat."

"There will be no second instance," the Empress said. "It was an extraordinary occurrence – and mistake – allowed to meet an extraordinary threat."

"The High Lords-"

"Are broken for a generation, now that you killed Akua Sahelian," Malicia said. "A generation is more than I need to ensure they never rise again."

"And what happens when the next extraordinary threat comes around?" I pushed. "Does Vale get it next?"

"Ah, you misunderstand me," the Empress smiled. "There is no next threat. So long as we are no longer the aggressor, which can be ensured in way satisfactory to you, we have the deterrent to effectively smother in the crib any call for a crusade. The weapon does not need to be used, Catherine. It just needs to exist."

That was what she'd said, just after Diabolist spoke to me. Her one sentence. Take this city without destroying it, and there will be no more wars. And she might be right, I thought. If any mobilizing invading army was immediately sanctioned by a Hellgate opening in that nation's heartlands, it would put a hard damper on the calls to go crusading. And if she never gave them a banner to rally around by attacking neighbouring countries, how many rulers were really going to be willing to risk that mess for a point of principle? It wouldn't be the pretty peace I'd envisioned, but thinking this could be done cleanly has brought nothing but disaster at my feet. And yet.

"Reparations," I said. "If you're really serious about this, everything that got wrecked in a Praesi war gets rebuilt on Praesi coin. And we're done with compromise within the borders. Callowan law as decreed by the crown is paramount. No more legions garrisoning our cities or Praesi ruling them. Callow is now sanctioned to raise its own army, answerable directly to me."

The Empress studied me.

"You ask for an independent nation under nominal Tower authority," she finally said.

"Diabolist took a ride on the crazy side," I said, "but she was right about one thing: there's always a cost. You want me to keep Callow in the fold? Fine. Here's my price."

"I will require Liesse to be under direct Imperial control," Malicia said, and it tasted like triumph.

"I'll want soldiers in the city as well," I bluntly replied, mastering myself. "Your people already pulled that trigger once. It's not happening again without my permission."

"You can't be serious," Black said, and he sounded genuinely appalled.

I turned to him, but his eyes were entirely on Malicia.

"Catherine is young, and so I forgive the impulse of seeking easy solution," he said. "But you, Alaya? We built this empire on the bones of men who make fortresses like this. We have seen them fail."

"We have seen them use those weapons and fail, Amadeus," the Empress said, and it was like I wasn't even in the room. "This is different. We avoid the conflict entirely."

"This is a clarion call for every hero on the fucking continent," Black harshly said.

I almost flinched, even now. It was rare to hear him curse, much less in a tone that icy.

"Think beyond your precious war, Amadeus," the Empress bit out. "It cannot be won. It cannot even be fought or we risk everything."

"This risks everything," he spat. "Let's not even talk about how it will look to keep a weapon built on Callowan corpses – this is foolish, in and of itself. It would have us dependant on a device not of our own making we barely control, and the dependence alone is enough to bury us."

"It will draw heroes," Malicia said. "I will not deny that. But we have killed heroes before, a great many of them. And now they will lack rulers backing them. A hero without a kingdom's backing is just a dangerous vagrant, Amadeus. A lesser threat than a full crusade, by any objective measure."

"It will not be green boys and scrappy orphans who come calling, Malicia," Black said. "Every old monster hidden in some faraway corner will crawl out of the woodworks to end us. You think the White Knight is the sharpest blade the Heavens have to bare?"

"You speak of beating back half the continent and tell me this is the threat?" Malicia replied, tone growing sharp. "Set aside your bloody pride for a moment and think. We did not build this empire so you could throw it all away because you want to bloody the eye of the Heavens over some philosophical point."

"We did not build this empire so you could bet its fate on a magic trick instead of preparations forty years in the making," he said, tone just as sharp and twice as contemptuous.

"Your way has Callow a battlefield for the fourth time in three years, Black," I said, and from the way both of them twitched I saw they'd entirely forgotten I was there. "I can't accept that. You can't ask me to accept that, looking at what's around us and who's responsible for it. It's... enough. Too much has already been done. If the heroes come, we'll kill them. Hells, the fortress doesn't have to stay here. We can fly it halfway into the Tyrian Sea and sink their boats as they come. The heroes will come with the crusade anyway. What do we actually lose by doing this? If the weapon is broken, well, the armies haven't gone anywhere have they?"

"Your own apprentice agrees with me," Malicia said. "It is not your way, but what does that matter if it works?"

Black closed his eyes. I could feel the weight of this settle onto both our shoulders, the pivot of this empire.

"Maddie," the illusion softly said. "Trust me. One last time. One last leap."

He flinched like she'd struck him, and it felt wrong for me to see this at all. Like I was looking at them stripped of their skins, of all the many layers of deception and protection they had accumulated since they were young as I was. But the gears at work were greater than any of us. With the pivot came more. My mantle stirred. Queenship would be granted to me by the Tower, by Name and by right. But not like the rulers of the Old Kingdom, no. Mine would not be so pristine a reign. If I was to be queen, it would be a queen cloaked in black with hands bloodied red. Though young and half-formed, the Name was taking shape. Beckoning. Behind my teacher and the Empress, I glimpsed a silhouette leaning against the wall in the back. A woman, with long dark curls and sloppily stained leathers. She had a silver flask in hand, and was taking a long pull from it. She met my eyes while wiping her mouth with the back of her hand. I know you, I thought. Not this face, but I know you. She winked, and just like that she was gone. I saw Black had opened his eyes, and that his hand was raised.

"I am done," the Black Knight said, "with half-measures."

I moved, Malicia spoke, but we were both too late.

"Destroy," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said, and his Name pulsed.

The array broke and the souls of the dead swept us all like a tide.

I... Dont see why Cat would side against the BK. He is right about everything he says, to use that thing would be to make the same errors as the old villains and the plan of Malicia is bound to go wrong story-wise.

Black is thinking long term here, why the heck Cat is not is something I dont get. 😊

raudhbjorn

I have to wonder if she's not trying a spot of reverse psychology or perhaps she's attempting to sever the connection between Black and Empress. The two together are an exponentially more dangerous for than either of them alone.

CipherJ

I'm with the Dread Empress on this one

The weapon is not meant to be used. It's meant to be Deterrence.

Mutually Assured Destruction is what's keeping our world from erupting into WW3

caoimhinh

Malicia is just using that as an excuse, she did this to weaken Black's influence on the Legions and strengthen her own hold of the Empire.

If she is the one controlling the weapon of massive destruction then she has greater authority, it has been shown already that she is afraid that the armies of Praes obey Black more than her, so all this was just so she could lessen his influence and enhance her own, very petty and stupid, as she should know better than to distrust the man who put her on the throne in the first place.

Catherine's observation that fewer Callowans means more people from the Empire manning the fields is also probable. So all this was a scheme with many advantages to her and with only the risk of angering Amadeus but if she could use the excuse of "we can use this deterrent so there will be peace" she thought Catherine would go along with the plan and Black would reluctantly accept her decision.

She underestimated how determined he was on not going to the old ways of Evil; she said it herself that he was now "like a raw nerve", he is in no mood for this shit anymore.

luminiousblu

You can't build the Death Star and not expect Luke to come and smash it. She's thinking about this politically, but a band of heroes old and young come together to take what is right and just into their own hands and crush the growing evil, when the king is cowardly and the princess polishes her nails – that's a guaranteed victory. Hell, that's basically Lord of the Rings.

Miles

MAD only works when it's mutual. Procer would need something equally destructive and both would need to be a lot slower and more obvious than liesse is

greatwyrmgold

The way Cat sees it, armies plus potential superweapon use is better than armies without emergency destructive option. I don't see why anyone would see keeping a dangerous tool in her arsenal that could easily do more harm than good as out of character for Catherine, since that's practically her M0.

usernamesbco

I think the weapon is redundant, and a blatant Stupid Evil style power grab on Malicia's part.

If Callow remains tied to the Empire don't they have Catherine's ability to gate a legion into the heart of whatever country is calling a crusade? Hard to focus on invading another country when your own is on fire.

It's also incentive for the Empire to play nice and not alienate Cat, and to keep her alive and in power. With a villainous Name it's not like she's going to die of old age.

Not that Malicia would have accepted that as an alternative. That would be power in someone else's hands. Her way lets her keep the weapon, with the implied threat she could find a way to use it on Callow if they got uppity.

The best play for Cat would be to destroy the weapon and keep her trump card to herself. She should have sided with Black.

Jeffery Wells

She's siding with the Empress because if the crusades are fought it's Callow they got first. They've been in war after war, had one of their greatest cities ruined and all its people killed, it's too much.

She knows Black is right, but she needs the bleeding to stop now, that's more important to her. Then, when heroes come to end the weapon (and all the villains) it won't be on the back of a crusade, and Callow doesn't bleed for it.

That's what matters to her most.

Zachary

I actually think it makes sense; Catherine has been manipulated by Malicia for a while now (remember how she was gradually coming to like and rely on her as she became more helpful?), specifically with the intentions of getting her to not oppose her when she unavoidably ran into conflict with Black over this idea. And Catherine hasn't spoken much with Black during this same time period, allowing to Malicia to "get her claws in her," so to speak. Malicia's mistake was believing that Black would ultimately back down after she pleaded for him to trust her and his apprentice sided with her (it echoes the situation in an earlier interlude where Black asks her about the resources going into Liesse and she just asks him to trust her).

Part of what makes this web serial good is that the author is one of the few (particularly in a genre like fantasy) who is actually capable of writing smart characters, like Malicia and Black.

Zachary

To be clear, Black is totally 100% correct. As we find out later, there are absolutely heroes who can wreck someone like him, and they'd have the weight of a story behind them if they decided to destroy the Liesse weapon. But it makes sense for Catherine to not agree at this point in time, before she has encountered those heroes. It also makes sense for Malicia to make this mistake, since Malicia has not been involved in conflict with heroes like Black has.

I actually kinda feel bad for Black during this whole situation, because he's totally correct and doing what is unquestionably the right thing, but Catherine doesn't understand and holds a strong grudge over it.

Levi Kalden

Two reasons.

1. It would be more of a coldwar Szenario where the weapon ideally isn't used.

2. she doesn't want more war on callowen ground

If this was reality it would be a ound decision.

But black is the one who is actually right storie wise such a weapon will always bite you in the but. Furthermore there is always the risk of someone else becoming dread emperor and using the weapon

Isa Lumitus

Damn it, Black! Couldn't you have put the giant chunk of floating rock into Red Flower Vale before you smashed it!?

I agree that keeping the weapon around is a Bad Idea, but at least try and get some benefit out of Destroying it!

ArkhCthuul

Well, I did not expect Black to act in haste in.... well any time.

But this thing IS too dangerous, even assuming they could control it well enough....

And Bard saluting the Black Queen?

Play Queens Fight for the Black Queen maybe? 😊

Aotrs Commander

Hmm. Problem with becoming full fae is... You become full fae. And I'm not sure that doesn't make Cat oh-so-much-more vulnerable to being twisted by the story.

The fact bard showed up practically confirms t.

Tab

Reading this a second time, after the latest chapter (Swan Song Redux), I think I understand it better. Cat and Malicia would have compromised if the weapon was not destroyed by Amadeus, and they would not be enemies. I used to completely agree with Black's stance, but now I see that he is blinded by his convictions, much like Saint. Good stuff.

ninegardens

Also re-reading after Redux.

... Personally I still agree with Black here... BUT the decision doesn't have to be made NOW. All sides can afford to wait, and think, and discuss, and plan a little. Black can afford to sit down and convince Cat. There is no time pressure.

I still think Black is RIGHT to be paranoid about stories... but I also don't think he needed to act in this particular instant.

Zachary

It's hard to blame him, though. This is a pretty huge betrayal of him on Malicia's part. And if they waited, it would likely make the "international" response even more negative than immediately destroying it.

Also, any explanation he gave would be countered by Malicia's manipulations, and she is far better at that than Black is. Even during this chapter, she successfully manipulated Catherine.

TeK

Been rereading after the end of Book 6, and seeing the kind of shit Heroes can pull off, I am absolutely on the Black's side. This is basically attempting to hold a continent hostage, and we saw how well that went with Triumphant.

Poetically Psychotic

While this could be disastrous in the short term, I'm inclined to agree with Black here. Having a 'win button' like a Hell Gate opening ritual is a) unsustainable in a narratively driven world, and b) removes any incentive to fixing the problems at the heart of the Empire. No need for reforms to increase efficiency or morality when no one can punish you either way.

vuthuha912

This is not Cold-War-style MAD. This is fantasy Kim Jong Un.

What the hell is Malicia smoking there? There is no way a WMD is going to go well. You are never going to use it. Ha ha. Try to prove that to the rest of the world. Your predecessors prove otherwise. They are all way going to assume that you are going to use it. It can deter people short term but it is not sustainable. What this weapon is gonna do is boost your enemy's morals. If they think that they are going to die sooner or later, they can be pushed to the extra mile. And you are going to be a push to make that decision.

If they push and you still don't use it. The weapon is still there, they are going to keep pushing, trying to destroy it before you decide to use it.

If you retaliate, well, that just proves their suspicion and throw gasoline into the fire. They double down on their efforts as now they have justifications, solid moral high ground, and all the other things.

Not to mention keeping the things can backfire horribly on you. Remember Chernobyl or Fukushima nuclear disaster? – this is a real-world example. The chance of this backfired on you is 10 times more in Creations, especially if you are a Villain.

Orchestrating the biggest hostage situation in recent memory is not the brightest idea. What if they are willing to take risks to deal with you? What if they are willing to sacrifice people to deal with you? Are you going to end the entire world if they do not comply? Russia threw 10 million lives at the German for their country. Vietnam was willing to throw 3 million lives at America just to get their independence. They were willing to throw more lives if the war continued. Wanna bet on how many lives the rest of the world is going to throw at you if you follow throw with your threat?

Sure, the Crusade is unavoidable, but the people fighting the Crusade can lose purpose and morale. It is a storm that can be weather if you play your card right. They are fighting in foreign lands, they just come out of a civil war, and most of their soldiers are not benefiting directly from the Crusade. There is this quote that I think can sum up the mindset of commoners "The closer to reality you are, the lesser the word of saints will mean". It is so hard to care about Good or Evil when you are hungry or homesick or tired. The Vietnam War proves that morale is key to any victory. Your enemies are not going to outlast you in your own country. Your will to protect is a lot stronger than their will to do what exactly – exterminating Evils, killing your best rulers in decades, killing your countrymen, and robbing your land of her resources?? How many commoners understand enough about the situation to care about fighting Malicia? To them, she is evil but just someone distant. She did not invade Procer. She was out of sight, out of mind. The war feels unjustified and can be portrayed as such.

Now, Malicia just hands the reason for the Crusade on a silver plate. If there is oppression, there is a will to oppose it. Continuing to oppress people, even more, is not going to make them stop rebelling.

Chapter 70: Reverb

"Six wars I fought since my coronation, so hear me when I say this: war may be fought for righteous reasons, but no war can ever deserve that epithet."

-King Jehan the Wise, apocryphal last words

It was a cork forced into a leaking barrel, not a long-term solution. I hesitated to call this luck, because Black was nothing if not calculated even at his worst, but the damage had been limited. Destroying the array had freed the souls of the Deoraithe but there'd been an interval between that unleashing and the city smashing back into Creation. The wards Masego had promised held, keeping the dead shades from turning a third of central Callow into a haunted wasteland, but Liesse itself was beyond salvaging. The wights inside had gone wild, tearing apart everything that wasn't nailed down and quite a bit that was. Thrice a ruin now, the old heart of the south. There was nothing inside left alive, not even the rebel forces who'd been dug in. That close to the flood of souls their protection had been about as useful a parchment shield. As far as my people could tell, the few that'd survived the initial onslaught had been killed by the rampaging wights. I'd been cheated out of my hangings, but it had been an execution nonetheless. Besides, there were survivors from the battle outside the city. I would settle my scores with Akua's lot one way or another.

"It remains a major strategic liability so long as we leave it like this," the Hellhound said.

I was avoiding the camp and the decisions that awaited me there, at the moment, but there was no getting away from Juniper. My general's face was calm, but there was a subtle hunch to her frame she had once lacked. Like she was trying to fold into herself. Her mother had died, I'd been told, while trying to hold the right flank. Her risen corpse had been hacked to pieces by her own legionaries and she'd had to be brought to the pyre in full armour to hide the marks. Juniper had put the torch herself, Adjutant said, while I lay half-conscious in a tent after crawling out of the ruins of Liesse. I might have died in there, if Thief had not come back for me. Black certainly would have, the backlash of his stand having put him in a coma he'd yet to wake from. Seated on an upturned stone, I watched the wreck of a once-great city and bit into mutton jerky. I offered the Hellhound a bite but got only a quelling glare for answer. Her loss.

"I'll be putting Hierophant to work," I finally said. "He believes the remaining wights can be brought under control."

"That leaves the shades," Juniper grunted. "I'm less than comfortable with having a jug of goblinfire in the middle of the supply line for the Vales. Much less camping by it. Those wards break, Catherine, and up goes two thirds of the remaining imperial forces in Callow. And you damn well know Duchess Kegan's been making noise. Ignoring her won't work forever."

The necromantic nature of the powers backing the Watch was out of the bag for good, to no one's pleasure. Procer would make something of that, no doubt. There were too many people on the plains who were seeing what was undeniably the souls of the dead for containment to be even remotely feasible, not that it was my secret to keep in the first place. And since the moment the dust settled the Duchess of Daoine had been loudly demanding her wizards be given access to the wards and the city so they could begin the work of weaving the souls back together into a gestalt. I'd had Adjutant's people take a look at her forces: the Watch was powerless at the moment. Nothing more than well-trained soldiers. I'd refused to meet with Kegan until Hierophant could have a better look at Liesse, but around dawn today he'd given me his verdict: the weapon was broken. Not for good, but it would take several years and massive resources to bring it back to even superficial functionality and I could afford the costs in neither time nor coin. One word, that was all it'd taken, and just like that Black had smothered the last hope for my homeland being spared the Tenth Crusade.

"The souls go back to Daoine," I told Juniper with a sigh. "They're no use to anyone here, and I'll need the Watch to take the field before long."

"A start," the Hellhound conceded. "Frankly, I believe we should torch the whole city with goblinfire. You've heard the reports."

Soldiers near the wards said they glimpsed dead loved ones speaking to them from behind the boundary, begging to be let out. Some of the mages keeping Hierophant's wards powered came back trembling and talking of whispers in their ears. Others lost track of time entirely for hours on end. I'd had to order the northernmost camps to be demolished and rebuilt south because the legionaries inside them were plagued with vivid and persistent nightmares. You couldn't kill that many people in a place without there being consequences to it, and killing was only the first of horrors that'd been visited upon Liesse.

"I'm not committing to that until I get assurances it won't worsen the situation," I said. "But as soon as I get back to Laure I'll make it an official decree that the area as far as two miles outwards is forbidden territory. Markers will be placed."

"There'll be adventurers heading in there even then," Juniper said. "Looters with more balls than sense."

"My options are limited, Juniper," I told the orc flatly. "I will not compound ruin with disaster. Ratface has a blade to the throat of half the Dark Guilds and Thief has her own people – I'll have to count on them to keep the situation as much under control as it can be."

"Heroes-" she began.

"Are coming," I interrupted. "I know. Marshal Grem still holds the Vales, that should ward off the worst of it, but I've already ordered a watch on the Hwaerte. The Smugglers will know if anyone tries to sail up the river. If we're lucky the first wave will only hit us with the crusade and we'll have winter to prepare unhindered."

"When have we ever been that lucky?" Juniper bitterly said.

The death of Istrid Knightsbane had changed her, I thought. Tempered her in some ways, but as in all things at a price. She'd always been sombre but her mother's passing had put out some ineffable light in her. It'd cut close to home in a way the rest of our campaigns had not, I supposed. More than once I'd thought of reaching out, but her grief was not something I could truly understand. I was an orphan, after all. Aisha would pick up what pieces she could. I scarfed down the last of the jerky and licked my fingers clean.

"There are going to be changes," I said.

She looked at me for a long time, then sighed. She gestured for me to move and I made room on the stone. The orc sat by my side, over a head taller and twice as broad. I studied her face and was surprised at how young she looked, even after all this. The Hellhound was such a force of nature it was easy to forget she was only a year older than me.

"What happened in the city, Catherine?" she asked.

No one had who'd not been in that room knew exactly what had gone down, not even Thief. There had been no order to arrest Black while he was unconscious forthcoming from the Tower, but I knew better than to believe the matter was at an end. I suspected the Empress would have tried it, if there wasn't a real risk the legions around Liesse would have refused and raised banner of rebellion around my teacher's sleeping form. That I could see no move on her part did not mean they were not being made.

"Lines were drawn," I said. "I'm still deciding on which side I'm falling."

"Are we rebelling?" she bluntly asked.

After a heartbeat of hesitation, I shook my head.

"Not for now, anyway," I admitted. "But we can no longer be dependant on the Tower for protection. Right now the situation is... fluid."

A year ago, I thought, I would have backed Black against the Empress without hesitation. Maybe even a fortnight ago. But not after today, not when he'd consigned thousands of my countrymen to death for a point of pride.

"We can't afford a civil war with Procer at the gates," Juniper growled.

"I doubt it'll come to that," I said. "But there was a break. The blades might be sheathed until the outside threat is dealt with but they'll come out eventually. I will not allow Callow to be the field where that struggle is settled, and that means an army giving them all pause."

"You want me to head it," the Hellhound said.

"You already are heading it," I replied. "Your responsibilities will just expand."

"Raising an army without the Tower's permission is treason," Juniper reluctantly said.

"I have permission," I said. "Or had. I will proceed regardless of whether that's confirmed. Like you said, the Empire cannot afford a civil war. Much less one fought against me."

"Callowan recruits, I assume," she said.

"I'd grab every legionary in the country if I could," I said. "As it is I've had Adjutant working on the Fifth and the Twelfth. The orc now in interim command of the Fifth has been... open to overtures."

"But not the Sixth," Juniper said, dark eyes studying me.

Her mother's legion. No, I'd not crossed that line. I would have liked to say I'd made that choice out of consideration for the feelings of a dear friend, but the truth was not as pretty. I'd refrained because Juniper in command of Callow's army was worth more to me than a chance of pulling into my orbit the remains of the Sixth.

"No," I agreed. "Not the Sixth."

She closed her eyes.

"I'll talk to Legate Bagram," the Hellhound whispered. "I know him well."

"I'm not asking you to," I told her, wanting to be exceedingly clear about that.

"I have already chosen the side I fall on, Warlord," Juniper replied, eyes opening and flashing with anger. "My words were not lightly spoken. Do not bring dishonour to us both by coddling me."

Only an orc, I thought, would find offense in someone respecting their grief. Best not to linger on this, and as it happened I had no lack of distractions to offer.

"The Fourth and the Ninth are the real wildcards," I said. "Precarious as their position is."

It had not escaped anyone's attention that the only senior commanders to survive the battle were both goblins and Matrons. Rumours of betrayal were already sweeping through the camps and in truth I'd done nothing to stamp them out. Adjutant had given me a report by voice only that I'd ordered him to never repeat: Istrid Knightsbane had been killed by poison, not sorcery or undead. He'd told me the cut that killed her was too clean to have been made with anything but goblin steel, and that raised questions. All legionary weapons were made with the stuff, straight out of the Imperial forges of Foramen, and the High Lords had definitely gotten their hands on some of it. Yet I very much doubted this was Diabolist's handiwork. The timing was off, and I suspected she would have gloated about it when we fought if it was her doing. If only to make it plain she had more support among Praesi than I believed, even in the Legions. It shouldn't be Black's either – General Istrid had been one of his most vocal loyalists. That left three likely culprits in my eyes, the ones who had the most to gain from that death.

First was the Empress, who'd had to know when considering her scheme that Black would stand opposed to it. Had she begun cleaning the upper ranks of his most loyal before the insurrection was over? It was unlikely she'd get an opportunity to make a kill this quiet for years. She was not to be dismissed as to practical for this, not after the flying murder fortress gambit she'd tacitly allowed. The second was the First Prince. Assassinating senior and famous commanders before an invasion was right up her wheelhouse, from what I'd heard of her. I found it hard to believe she'd managed to place an agent in the legions without the Eyes noticing it, but then she had shut down major imperial operations in Procer before. With the home front settled, she might be looking outwards. The last I hesitated to even think, because if it was true the Empire was done and this entire house of cards was going to fall down on my head.

It might be the Matrons. Isolationist as they were said to be, Robber had told me enough about the crones ruling his people I knew taking a few scalps to better position commanders of their own kind was not something they'd think twice about doing – if they thought they could get away with it. And if it was them... Suddenly it no longer felt like a coincidence I'd been offered desperately needed coin in exchange for a goblin settlement in Marchford. It felt like a calculated move to secure an ally before an uprising could be started. It might be I was being paranoid in thinking this, but in Praes the question was never if you were being paranoid or not. It was if you were being paranoid enough.

"General Sacker would not have a hand in my mother's death, no matter the rumours," Juniper sneered. "They were like sisters, Catherine. Their bond was decades in the making."

"I don't believe it either," I replied, only saying half the truth.

Goblins just didn't think the way humans or even orcs did. To them betrayal in the name of advancement was no betrayal at all. Still, I suspected that if there'd been an agent of the Matrons at work here it would be Marshal Ranker. She was the one who'd been left the senior commander here by the deaths, and though the rumours were impugning her reputation no one was daring to question her authority. Not even me, as she'd stepped lightly knowing that a Named outranked even a marshal in the eyes of the Tower if push came to shove. But neither had I helped her any with my not inconsiderable clout: as long as her reputation was in the gutter, I had an in with anyone who bought the rumours. And I needed the men, needed them badly if I was to give any of the jackals fighting over Callow's bleeding body any reason to be wary. The Fifteenth wasn't enough for that, not with the nearly one thousand men the fucking Warlock had left stranded on the wrong side of the Hellgate. If the villain had been here to deal with, we would have had words on the subject. The legionaries going in had known it was a possibility they would never come back, but the blow was still being felt and I doubted the bastard had done anything to try to save them.

"They may retreat to Summerholm," Juniper finally said. "Without Lord Black to mediate or the Tower ordering otherwise, that is the safest hold for them to wait out the mess."

"It's not happening," I told her flatly. "The don't get to garrison one of my fucking cities anymore. If they want to go east, let them go all the way to the Blessed Isle. The Empire can supply them there, because it sure as Hells won't be my granaries coughing out the goods."

The Hellhound stared at me, frowning.

"You are establishing borders," she said.

"I am," I acknowledged.

"That is too large a territory to cover for a single host," Juniper stated. "You mean to raise several armies, then, and that is beyond the writ of a general's authority. My command extends only to the Fifteenth."

"You would need to be a marshal," I agreed.

I'd had Hakram take care of the physical aspect of that last night. A marshal's baton was traditionally made of wood from the Wasteland, usually ebony, but I didn't have any on hand. The elongated stick I took out from under my cloak and handed to Juniper was stone, rough granite. It'd been sculpted, but where was no mandate from the Tower in formal Mthethwa to be read. Among the traditional relief of legionaries in arms was set my own heraldry, the scales with the sword and the crown. The detail did not escape the orc's considering eyes.

"They will never promote you to marshal," I said. "You've been with me for too long, your loyalties are suspect."

"Then this is a mere bauble," she said.

"It is the regalia of the Marshal of Callow," I smiled thinly. "It's not actually illegal for a serving commander to have other titles, you see. I had Aisha look into the legalities."

It wasn't nearly that clean-cut, no matter what I said. Lords and ladies of Praesi who served in the Legions had to renounce their claim to any noble title for the duration of their service. But that was landed titles, and what I was granting her was not. There was even a precedent, though a distant one: Dread Empress Maleficent II had showered her successful commander in the Free Cities with local honours, since those were much less expensive than rewards at home. As a client state under the Tower, Callow currently fell in the same areas as the subjugated territories down south the ancient empress had taken. It was a fairly thin excuse and the High Lords were bound to howl, but Malicia had a lot more to prove than I did at the moment. If she couldn't even finagle her way through this, what point was there in backing her? Juniper's thick fingers clasped around the stone.

"I dreamt of holding a baton, as a girl," she said. "But not like this."

Isn't that Praes in a sentence? I thought. Everything you want, just not the way you want it.

"You're now the highest commander in this kingdom," I told her. "Your rank of general is irrelevant. The Fifteenth, while remaining a legion, is also the first division of the army of Callow. Congratulations, Juniper. You're the youngest marshal in the history of this empire."

"I am not," she said darkly, "an imperial marshal. I can live with that disappointment, if I hold the command regardless. But if I am to be your second, Catherine, I will need my hands unbound. There will be conscription, even if limited. I will need forges to make what the Imperial ones in Foramen will no longer provide, and granaries to feed the soldiers."

"And you'll have them," I promised. "I will have this country ready for war, when it comes."

The Hellhound suddenly snorted.

"I suppose I should kneel," she said. "Are there no ceremonies to be observed? Should a blade not be laid on my shoulders?"

"That's for knighting," I told her. "It would also involve me slapping you across the face as hard as I can, and no offense but I'm not sure you would survive that."

"Then we do this the way of my own people," Juniper said, and rose to her feet.

She unsheathed her sword and bared her arm, cutting across leathery flesh. I rose and did the same under her expectant gaze.

"Under the gaze of That Which Lurks Below, I make these oaths," the Hellhound said, tone heavy. "I will make war for you, and be true in the shedding of blood. In lean seasons I will offer meat from my table, and in bountiful days be granted the same from yours. Your foe is my foe, your kin is my kin. I swear this by iron and salt, by grass and wind and the death of men. In ruin and glory, our threads are bound. Let they who would sunder this pact be devoured 'til not even bones remain."

She offered her bleeding arm and I met it with mine, crimson trails staining us both. I did not know her people's customs, but I knew those of mine. Not from teaching, for etiquette lessons had never covered the likes of this, but from old stories. From days when this land of mine had still be a true kingdom.

"Gods be my witness, and strike me down should I break this solemn oath," I said. "Honour granted will be kept, homage rewarded by sanctuary unbroken. To she who is faithful and true I will be the same. She who loves me I will love, and shun all that she shuns. No injury or slight shall go unavenged, be they the work of the great or the small."

"I name you Warlord," Juniper grinned sharply. "Willing and hungry."

"I name you Marshal of Callow," I replied, "and in my own blood anoint you."

The baton was touched with red, when she took it, the both of us having shed droplets. Fitting, I thought.

There would be more to come.

---

burdi

cat is not Squire anymore and no new name too..so she is now a no Name

Decius

I would not call the Duchess of Moonless Nights and Vicequeen of Callow a no-Name. Not to her face.

intermediarywebserial

Regardless, it looks like Marshal Juniper is a Name-in-the-making.

SlumberryStorm

I Think it is coming, just not here yet.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Are you sure she's not presently Squire? She explicitly outranks a Marshall on the weight of her name, and she would have said "because they think I have a name," or "because I'll soon have one," if that were the case. She might not be in the full of her power as Squire, but I can't imagine her without any Name at all

RoflCat

My guess is she's in the middle of a pivot right now.

Her Name will depend on whether she sides with Black or Malicia.

But until she make her decision, she can just work on making the Fifteenth into her proper army, and for that we have her promoting Juniper in this chapter.

Decius

Why would her name depend on whether Black or Empress side with her?

sidereus

She still has claim on the Name of Squire, even if all that remains is an infinitesimal sliver beneath Winter. There cannot be any other Squire or claimants, because even if she only has the smallest modicum of the Name in her it is still the full fledged Name and bound to her.

stevenneiman

Unless they lose their Name and then get another one in a separate event, Transitional Names stay with their holder right up until they upgrade to a keeper Name. Take Masego for an example. He went from Apprentice to Heiropant in an instant once the conditions for the new Name were met, and there certainly wasn't a transitional period where he was just Masego before he was ready to start dissecting miracles.

Jeffery Wells

She's still Squire, but it is very weak, tenuous. Her mantle of Winter has helped out the Name and filled it with her Far aspect, making it a shell.

I think it's very unlikely she'll become Knight if Black dies, at this point. If Black hadn't broken the Array it looked like she was going to transition into a new Queen Name.

maresther23

Now we pick up the pieces

glassgirlceci

Fantastic, as always. I didn't expect the skip to the aftermath, but it makes sense. It seems we'll have to continue holding our breath for Catherine's name! D:

Stormblessed

A nice interlude and piece of falling action after the harrowing events of last chapter. I was almost afraid to read this chapter because I was scared of what happened to our villains. I just really want Cat to point out that Bard was there watching Black and to suggest this is all Bard's plot to sow division amongst the villains.

Also Juniper remains extremely awesome. I'm glad she can still talk openly with not-Squire (maybe-Squire?). I'm also super excited for her to be taken off the reins and leash and given more authority. I want to see what she does with it. Can a character with Juniper (or some other legion general) get a name? Or is what she does as a general so unname-like that she can't get one? Would Juniper receiving a named be a bad thing character wise? As in, lessen how awesome her character is/be a cheap way to provide character drama/character development?

B

I don't think Juniper will get a Name, simply because it would be **too** good for Cat. Hakram being the first orc to get a Name since their race was conquered shows how much of a badass he is. A **second** orc getting a Name that **also** serves under Cat shifts the focus away from Hakram being a badass to Cat being a granter of Names to Orcs. It cheapens Hakram & Juniper's exploits while elevating Cat to essentially being a God of the Orcs.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Yeap, agreed with your point about it being too good for Cat. Also, I don't know if it's a foreshadowing or a Chekhov's Gun but one of the Quote of the Day was a commentary by Juniper of the Red Shields, but was not preceded by any Name. Might be a hint that Juniper doesn't have a Name.

DroughtBringer

Buildup.....

Gah! I love it but it's not Friday yet... 😊

Engineer

Marshal of Callow sounds like a Name...

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Huh? How is a rank that's only existed for a day going to be a Name? I'm not sure you understand the fundamentals of how this works.

Engineer

Keyword in my sentence was “sounds”.

The weight of the scene, the oaths spoken and the fact that the Ruler of Callow in all but Name just promoted Juniper to the highest rank in her army (basically Callow’s answer to the dynamic between the Black Knight and the Dread Emperor/ess) makes it easy to think Juniper just got Named.

cloudy

A Name in the making, like Adjutant perhaps?

BryceWilliam

if she was going to have gotten a name, it have been now. the narrative weight of this moment is one of the strongest turns in the 2’s relationship. Jun just swore to follow cat before the tower, she already was, but there is weight in oaths. extra so when replied to with “I name you..”

no, jun’s shot at a name has passed, this being her best bet.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Huh? Adjutant isn’t a “Name in the making”, it’s a bona fide Name and has been for a long time now.

Reading these comments is making me dumber 😊

Aeon

I’m expecting Cat’s new Name to be the Black Queen or something. Maybe something a bit more specific than that, but I definitely expect her to become a Queen, rather than a Knight. Her goals and motivations are too different from Knighthood.

In other words, keep up the good work. I love this story.

Big Brother

Honestly, I DON’T want Juniper to get a Name. Like B said, it would cheapen everything she’s done. She’s made a name for herself as a brilliant commander despite being un-Named.

Drd

She doesn’t need a Name to be awesome, as she already is.

taliesinskye

Oh man, the wording of those oaths was so good. Chills.

Felix Joseph Baumann

Does nobody else here in the comments notice the insanity of Cat as a currently unnamed villain swearing to the Gods (above), while her Marshall swears to those below? I can not even fathom the possible consequences of such an unorthodox oath, but I assume them to be quite cataclymic.

werafdsaew

Cat swore to the Gods, so above Above or Below?

werafdsaew

*both* Above and Below

Naeddyr

CAT-aclysms ahoy!

Thenre

I think she swore to both Above and Below, maybe hinting more towards a neutral Name and place in Creation. I mean the whole reason she's a Villain is the inability to accept the helplessness of leaving your fate in the God's hands, and that includes the manipulations of the Gods Below and Fate.

onedollargum

In Chapter 13:Forgery, she set herself against both sides rather fantastically:

"When heroes and villains come knocking in the name of fate," I spoke, tone calm and measured. "When they try to drag us back to where we were by force with a Choir behind them or the host of some howling Hell – I'll kill them all. Every last one of them."*

She's thwarted the host of a howling Hell. After weathering a crusade we'll see if she can establish a neutral zone.

Nairne .01

I'd love to see a thriving neutral zone to be honest.

burdi

i just realise maybe cat will have no Name at all, she already got Winter power which super strong...she killed akua soo easily, without a Name means she is not evil nor good...a new path.

satoshikyu

So what exactly IS Cat's Name now? Like it seems fairly clear she's broken free of Squire, but no actual Name has been given.

She's embraced Winter, so is she Winter Queen? Gotta get an actual Name at some point, the guessing game is ridiculous.

NZPIEFACE

Tinfoil theory:

Author doesn't know and he wrote himself into a hole.

Now he's dragging this out to see the comments.

Nairne .01

Lets hope not.

Anastas

"Squire" is hanging on by a thread; it's firmly on the way out, I'd say, but I don't think Cat's firmly grasped or formed a replacement yet.

Ed

Damn dude you have several chapters that are a fantastic story but just a fantastic story then you hit chapters like this and remind me there is POWER in your writing, excellent thank you.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Typo thread!

some 'the' and 'her' are missing their first letter.

Also, sometimes during action scenes in previous chapters, I have to scroll back up and figure out what had happened. For example, when Akua's necklace with the phylactery was removed I didn't realize she had died. Also, during the throne room scene, I thought Cat was planning her attack with the ice not actually doing it.

Vortex

One thing I love about this chapter is it highlights the contradictions and parallels of this story.

Although Cat was originally an orphan with heroic tendencies, she became a power hungry, ruthless villain.

Although Juniper is an orc, she is one of the most honorable and intelligent characters in the story, and is far more principled and outspoken than Cat.

Although Juniper's oath is savage and bloodthirsty, while Cat's oath is formal and righteous, they are saying the same things deep down inside. It gives me chills down my spine how perfect this is.

lennymaster

Yes, it struck me too how the essence of their oaths is the same despite the difference in wording.

"Under the gaze of That Which Lurks Below, I make these oaths, I will make war for you, and be true in the shedding of blood."
"Gods be my witness, and strike me down should I break this solemn oath, honour granted will be kept, homage rewarded by sanctuary unbroken."

"In lean seasons I will offer meat from my table, and in bountiful days be granted the same from yours."

"To she who is faithful and true I will be the same."

"Your foe is my foe, your kin is my kin."

"She who loves me I will love, and shun all that she shuns."

"In ruin and glory, our threads are bound. Let they who would sunder this pact be devoured 'til not even bones remain."

"No injury or slight shall go unavenged, be they the work of the great or the small."

The only part that has no direct equivalent is: "I swear this by iron and salt, by grass and wind and the death of men. In ruin and glory, our threads are bound.". And that part is probably more decorative after having already sworn on the Gods Below.

werafdsaew

Cat being ruthless? More than before, but still less than the likes of Diabolist or Black.

Cat being power hungry? Maybe she will be in the future, and maybe that's how she'll fall, but right now no at all. Her goal since book 1 has been to get power, and use it to fix Callow, and she hasn't deviated from that yet.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Letouriste

I...I don't follow:o cat is already making moves like all politicians do but she doesn't know if black and malicia will really fight each other or just make up.sure black was pretty decisive there,i expect him to crush the trueblood and malicia to try to reinforce her position...but isn't a little too soon for mustering what is pretty much a rebellious army? she doesn't plan to fight that out but the message that give to people can't be good

NZPIEFACE

Name can't just "make up". What makes them a named is their strong ideals of the world and the fact they reinforce them. When two ideals clash and you can't get a compromise... you get a story.

Seabornia

I utterly want Cat's new Name to be connected to Apocalyptic myths in one way or another. It would be fitting to story narrative to sidestep Good vs Evil confrontation. Probably Black will transcend his name too, as currently his powers backlashed on him.

thespaceinvader

Anyone else feeling Cat getting the Name of Warlord?

It wouldn't be what's been teased recently, but I believe it's been mentioned as a historic Orc Name, and it would fit her better than a LOT of other names at the moment, especially as the events of last chapter seem to have closed off Black Queen which was a name in the rising until Black Knight Destroyed the array.

Gunslinger

It's been stated that Warlord is strictly an orcish name. Cats not going to be that.

grzecho2222

Not that I don't agree with you, but a lot of people said to Cat what she can't do

Gunslinger

@grecho Haha that's a good point to remember but this was stated by the author themself

NZPIEFACE

Names are mired in history.

What defines a name is what people think of it and the traditions that follow it.

An orcish Name given only to the chief of all clans will only be given to an orc.

werafdsaew

According to Black in Chapter 15: Company, Warlords are "mostly known for their propensity to put entire villages to the torch and take back their inhabitants to the Steppes as thralls."
Does this sound like Cat? No.

Jerick

The assassinations were the work of the Empress I'm sure, yet I don't think they were aimed at reducing Black's hold on the legions. I suspect instead they were aimed at removing high ranking officers that would refuse to side with Cat if she were to ever rebel against the tower.

Now that seems insane but it was when Cat brought back the orders of knights that it clicked just what it was that the Empress wanted, what her endgame was; Suppressing Callowan culture simply will not work long term. For as long as competent leaders are there to guide desired cultural changes and suppress undesired ones Callow will stay under the rule of the tower. But that needs an broken string of very capable rulers which is impossible. Ineffective rulers are an inevitability and it just takes one taxing Callow to the bone, one allowing them to die in droves, one being a mad Tyrant to stoke the fires of rebellion and start the wheels of story moving towards a free Callow. Cultural suppression is purely a short term solution and both Black and Malica sought a true long term victory.

But how to do that? Well there is one idea that holds the diverse Empire together. One idea that keeps it functioning when backstabbing and self interest should make it fail. The quest for the tower. If they could imbue the Callowan people with the quest for the tower then it would shift their response to being oppressed by a poor ruler from pulling away and freeing Callow to climbing the tower themselves to replace the ruler. If Black and Malica could do that Callow would remain part of the empire for countless generations. But in order to create that cultural shift they need a Callowan to climb the tower, they need a Callowan Dread Empress.

Cat's banner projects a message she never intended and I sense Malica's subtle hand in that. The rumors and talk by Callowan people about Cat standing up to the tower quite possible is something the Empress is seeding and encouraging. In the end Malica will give Cat everything she wants, just not in the way she wants it.

However the Wandering Bard has managed to successfully throw a wrench in the plans and the rest of the world is not sitting by while the Empire does its thing.

Ethesis

That is an interesting theory.

I'm wondering if Cat becoming the Queen of Winter (the only one of winter left) supersedes her name.

I don't think the upper fae get names.

There is too much speculation about Cat shedding the name of squire and not getting a new name, or that her fae powers somehow prevent a name. She said that she is close to getting a new one, but not just yet, she is in the middle of a transition.

Also, Cat is not fae, not really. Sure she might have a lot of fae power behind her, but she didn't become fae. She is a warlock said something else, neither human nor fae.

werafdsaew

I agree, except I think it's more likely that Black Knight is the one pulling the string. His desired outcome from chapter 55 is for Cat to replace him and work with Malicia, so he needs to ensure that his followers would side with Cat when he's gone. Since Istrid has no personal loyalty to Cat, she might decide to side with Malicia rather than Cat when Black's gone, and that is why she has to go.

Decius

And Assassin was in the area.

Gunslinger

Things are really looking bad. A crusade on Callowan soil will devastate the country so badly there won't be much for Cat to rule once everything is done.

Not to mention Black is gonna be leading a crusade of his own against the high lords and Cat's going to be against him (maybe)

Then there's the wildcard Tyrant with his puppet Hierarch. Ohh boy are we in for a ride.

Finally considering Cat didn't talk about it and from her assuming the role like she still had Malicia's authority means she's still going to be the Black Queen. I'm assuming her actual transition will happen during the coronation or something

Riaan Theunissen

Don't forget Thief.

She's plainly stated there's somethings she won't stand for. Her current view of Black and Malicia hasn't been given yet, but it must be... interesting, was done, revealed and hinted at in the last few chapters regarding the two of them.

Anastas

I wouldn't call Hierarch a "puppet", exactly. He's refusing to do anything out of principle while the Tyrant uses his silence and the other Cities' respect for the Name and their inability to understand the Hierarch's zealous egalitarian democratic qualms in order to push his own designs through what passes for the League's decision making body.

I'd say Anaxares is more like a paperweight. He doesn't really *do* ANYTHING, but getting actual work done would be *so* much harder without him to hold it all together.

Thenre

Impatiently awaiting the Black Queen.

lupus7

hey what happen with dark elf that akua have for mercenary?

Nairne .01

What dark elf? Am I missing something?

Nairne .01

EE, you really know how to wind up our engines and then make us wait for the transition.

naturalnuke

An oath sworn to the gods above for Callowan tradition to match the oath said to the gods below in the orcish way.

As William once said, "that has a shape to it"

Snowfire1224

I'm not sure who Cat should side with, Malicia or Black. I get bad vibes from Malicia, although I'm not sure why, but I can see where it would be good story wise to have Cat fight black.

Raider

Anyone else notice that Cat's personality has pretty much gone back to how its always been? I thought winter was supposed to changing her?

Nairne .01

Supposedly, but really just supposedly, she has always been winter-like. Even the Winter King said that "its like she was born of winter" (the wording might have been different, but I hope you get my meaning). So what changed is probably the winter-like hunger urges got stronger, but for now, she is not visibly succumbing to them.

Decius

Well, after her antics at Winter Court, her heritage received an in-universe retcon to be part fey.

Dawn

Was Black's plan to eventually replace Malicia with Cat? Cos now I think she's more likely to side with Malicia given what he did. I mean what was his plan doing that? If Thief hasn't saved Cat, then they'd both be dead. Sounds like he's completely lost it.

Thea

Black knows Cat knows The Song. We know basically nothing about the ramifications of knowing The Song in person, neither requirements nor consequences, but chances are it puts Cat's path at odds with Malicia's life... and Black still supported Cat.

Shequi

Cat's logic in thinking Ranker might have been responsible for Istrid's death is... off.

Ranker was already the senior officer of the Legions. Istrid's death doesn't benefit her seniority among the Legions at all – only Grem and Nim equal her, and only the Named outrank her.

Nairne .01

Except it might have been to make herself (Ranker) indispensable as Marshal for Cat, you know the upcoming Crusade and what not. That seems a little weak though, so maybe you are right. I would not bet on it though as we have too little information.

alegio

So... Cat will side with Malicia and then after Malicia dies/gets betrayed she will become Dread Empress? If this happens AND Black survives to become Cat's Black knight I will be Happy.

Random Internet User (tm)

Cat totally has a name! Protagonist.

It's just that noone from any side dares mention it, or else they'll be the next to get steamrolled. :>

"Oh, hey look- it's the protagonist. Let's kill 'er!" Then the weight of the story comes and squishes them flat, muahaha.

Lovely chapter, by the way.

Barthumphries

I'm late reading this, but just wanted to point out that I've been calling her Warlord Catherine for a long time, even over Word of God (author)'s postulation that she wasn't fit to become Warlord.

Warlord Catherine the Squire, Queen of Callow, Duchess of Moonlit Night.

Rabblrouser

This chapter gave me goose pimples.

vuthuha912

Um... Cat... I don't think Black was being prideful when he destroyed the flying castle. He is trying to save both of you from the guaranteed death by the story and making a disastrous decision in terms of ... everything.

It is not just the story that is the matter, it is common sense. Set aside the logistic of controlling, maintaining, and fueling the fortress, you are literally using your own people's souls to fuel the thing. It is like digging their ancestor's graves up, desecrating their corpses then parading them in front of their families faces. Your subjects will think of you as nothing but a puppet for the Tower and sold them out for power. They will rebel even before the Crusade comes or worse rebel and join the Crusade. Like Tyrion said it can be hard ruling over people who want you dead.

Aside from that, the fortress would be too strategically important if it were to be used as a deterrent. By relying on it, you will be caught flatfooted when it is destroyed later. I mean not everyone is rational and such you know. They might even call Malicia or you Triumphant reborn, determined to conquer the entire world with a flying fortress. If such an idea were to spread, well, maybe losing a few thousand people taking the Tower is not so bad after all.

Black knows that he won't be able to protect both of you if heroes like Hanno were coming by a dozen at the same time. The Bard obviously can outplay him. Cat is too young and Malicia is too ignorant of the world outside of the Tower. Sabah is dead because of his carelessness. And now, to see a story trap so obvious, you know he is not going to stand there and let it kills both of you. He is doing it out of love or worry or paranoia but he is

Chapter 71: Reprise

"It is easiest to win a game when no one else knows you're playing."

– Dread Empress Maleficent II

I was no longer capable of staying in a fully warded tent for more than a few moments before I got this itch. It always began on my palms, small pricks that I would have thought were drying sweat if I still sweated. Then it was the bottom of my feet, and from there it was only a matter of time before I felt like scratching out my own skin. I had, the first time, and hadn't realized what I was doing until there were long gouges in my arm scored by my own nails. They'd bled, and when Masego had seen to the wound his face had creased in surprise. It was not inexact, he'd said, to call what ran through my veins blood. But it was more than just that, now. It was as useful a reagent as fae blood, he mused, and perhaps more in some ways. That it was no longer warm was something of a hint in that regard, but his current theory was that the liquid in my body was Winter. I dimly remembered my veins freezing solid, when I'd ripped apart his work. That had not been a metaphor, or a passing thing. He'd insisted on a full study of my body after that, not that I'd protested much. Even naked I no longer felt the cold, save as some sort of strange perception – warmth and frost were like... colours, more than anything else. That my skin could feel colours should have worried me, but the worry never really came.

It had been dimmed. This entire fucking world felt dim, and I had to force myself to work up anger at that.

The results of his exploratory spells had been illuminating in all the worst of ways. My bones were no longer bone. They had shattered, he told me, then been made anew in ivory. I'd been under the impression that ivory was a sort of bone, but I'd take Masego's word on the contrary. He'd muttered something about pores and marrow before telling me he'd need several months of invasive regular procedures to get a clear idea of how my body now functioned. He'd then absent-mindedly added that my while my heart still beat that seemed to have nothing to do with moving around blood, which was just the latest horrific episode in the shit I'd been putting my body through since becoming the Squire. I'd naturally told him that his proposed studies weren't really feasible, and we'd settled on him having a look whenever the both us had the time to spare – which was, admittedly, pretty rare. The two three-hour sessions we'd done since had seen him grow more and more interested, which usually when a boy was looking at my naked body had different connotations.

Two facts I would have almost preferred not to know came out. First, he told me my body should no longer actually be considered a body. It was, objectively speaking, a 'construct'. I'd pretended I knew what that meant and gone through the usual dance of inviting him to elaborate to I could figure it out from context. There is nothing natural about a construct, was the part that struck me hardest. It is made, not born, and so does not function as truly living thing would. He'd refused to outright state it, since he was still lacking proof, but I'd gotten out of him that the 'flesh' and 'blood' I now wore had precious little to do with what had been those same things before Liesse. I had been born anew, in a way. Not a pleasant one. It was also why my limp was back even though the Hashmallim had healed it. Beyond what he told me, I glimpsed something that managed to bring back the taste of fear to my mouth even if only faintly. Fae were known for illusions most of all. Was I just wearing a trick of light, a deception of Creation? Could I be dismissed, the way fairies and devils could be? That wards were now anathema to me might be a hint in that direction.

The second fact had been shrouded in inscrutable magetalk babble when he started expounding about it, as he told me about something called 'Principle Alienation'. One of the limits of sorcery, apparently, and also the reason diabolism was such a popular branch of it. I got him to talk in actual Lower Miezan after a while, and the basics of it were this: any mortal individual trying to use power was shackled by the limited mortal understanding of Creation and its many layers. A mage could not use the powers of a demon, at least in part, because they could not perceive the fabric of the world the way a demon did. Hence why Praesi were so fond of binding otherworldly creatures into their service, gaining access to powers they themselves would not be able to use. I was no summoner, and told him as much, but his reply ran along different lines than expected. I was wielding powers a mortal could not, so it followed that whenever I used them I became less mortal.

I'd not felt all that different, after coming back from Liesse, and some part of me had kept to the wild hope that the consequences would not be as dire as I had foreseen. His verdict finally disabused me of the notion. The moment I began calling on Winter my mind would move along similar lines as a fae's. My thoughts, my perceptions, my desires: everything I considered to be me would become a pale mirror of themselves. I'd not cheated my way out of the ramifications of being fae, I'd just made myself a... different breed of the species. The deeper I drew on Winter the more I would become some creature wearing my own face, and though that creature would keep all that I was it would not truly believe in them. My beliefs would just become duties enshrined in ice, as binding and unmoving as those that had doomed the Queen of Summer. I could be fluid and powerless, or unbending and powerful. I spent the rest of that night in my tent getting as drunk as I could and neglecting a dozen urgent duties, wishing my hands could still shake at the terror I felt. I'd always treated my body as a tool, a vessel to get me where I needed to be. Now that it had become exactly that I was realizing the deep divide between saying something and living it.

Yet I had no time to spare for my own troubles, not with the catastrophes laying just beyond the horizon. And so after I sobered up, the following morning I sent for Duchess Kegan of House Ismail. Hierophant as well, and him before the other. He had an axe to grin I wanted settled before going into the other conversation. I poured myself a cup of wine as Masego sat himself at my left, wetting my lips on the Vale summer wine and finding the taste of it almost sour. Some part of me wondered if it was a consequence of the changes I'd gone through or just another cost for the mantle I had claimed in full. Winter took everything. Maybe even the smallest of pleasures. I offered the blind mage a cup but he shook his head.

"It's barely past Morning Bell," he said. "Did you even break your fast?"

I had not. Eating, while still pleasurable in some ways, did not seem to be something I needed any longer. The hungers I still felt had nothing to do with food.

"Ranker," I said, deciding to change the line of inquiry.

"Ah," Masego said, glass eyes shifting under his cloth to look at me. "Is it finally time for sanctions? I would have thought she would be in the tent for this."

"I've had Hakram look into your complaint," I said.

His brow rose.

"Three mage lines attempted to stick me inside a ward in broad daylight before the better part of a hundred thousand soldiers," he said. "How much investigation can possibly have been needed?"

If the situation in the camps wasn't such a mess, the fact that he'd actually lodged a formal complaint with the Legions would have carried a lot of weight. Especially given who his father was. But the lines of command were shaky at the moment. Ranker was both the senior commander here and the subject of the complaint, and while I outranked her as both Named and Vicequeen of Callow that authority was half a fiction. Her legion would stick with her whatever happened, and likely General Sacker's as well. I couldn't just bury this, of course. Not only did I owe Masego better than that, she had turned on an ally in the middle of a fucking battle. The problem was that she'd had reasons for that, and not bad ones.

"As I understand it, the ward wasn't actually meant to harm you," I said.

He scoffed.

"It would have left me bereft of sorcery in the midst of men attempting to kill me, had it succeeded," he said. "Murder with a borrowed knife."

I didn't disagree, but the old Matron had been careful to cover her back before acting. She had, before witnesses, cried Duchess Kegan to order that Hierophant not be harmed. Which practically speaking would have done nothing – entire parts of Kegan's host had just seen dozens of their own incinerated without warning, they would have attacked whatever she said – but it did give Ranker plausible deniability. Combined with officially stated worries about Hierophant being corrupted by demons, she'd not technically done anything I could punish her for. And pushing the matter regardless when the situation was so volatile was a recipe for a fight breaking out.

"I can't actually punish a marshal, Masego," I admitted. "With the Empress being silent and Black unconscious in theory I'm the supreme authority here, but I don't have the support in the Legions to force the matter. What I can offer is a compromise."

"An attempt was made on my life, Catherine," Hierophant said, cocking his head to the side. "Support is irrelevant. Give me two lines of mages and I will turn her camp into a crater with a bare half day of preparation."

"That's exactly what I'm trying to avoid," I said. "You're right to be angry. Furious, even. But you can't wipe out a few thousand people for one woman's decision."

"I can," Masego disagreed, "if they shield her from retribution."

"I'm not asking you to just let this go," I said. "Hakram's been in talks. The mage lines involved will be punished."

It was a good thing Adjutant needed so little sleep, because since my return I had been running him ragged. This was arguably the most delicate negotiation I'd sent him on yet, given what could come of a failure. I felt Hierophant's stare on me though neither his eyes nor his body moved, the subtle weight of his attention.

"Executed?" he asked, and his voice was hard to read.

"Demoted back to the ranks," I said. "All pending transfer to another legion, pay docked for a year's worth."

"A slap on the wrist," he said. "This is not even symbolic. No, rather it is symbolic of them getting away with it."

I'd thought he would say that. I'd not blamed Adjutant when he'd come back with those terms, though I'd been less than pleased. Marshal Ranker was not the kind of goblin easily talked into bending the neck, much less when she believed herself to be in the right. The days where I had considered the Legions my teacher's domain and therefore sacrosanct were over, though. And the Praesi were not the only ones with hired killers at their disposal.

"I had Adjutant push for the Legions they transfer to being posted in the Wasteland," I said.

"Out of sight is not evening of the scale," Masego said.

"No," I agreed. "But Ratface's staff now has a representative from the Guild of Assassins attached. Those mages will be heading back to Praes through cities I control."

Masego frowned for a moment, then his expression brightened.

"Ah," he said, beaming. "You're implying you'll have them killed before they reach the Wasteland."

I could have done without it being stated that bluntly but yes, that was exactly what I was implying. It was a waste of no doubt competent mages, but Ranker should have fucking thought twice before taking a swing at one of mine.

"You need me to be 'satisfied justice had been done' in front of everyone else," Masego continued, sounding pleased even as tried to wink before remembering halfway through he no longer had eyelids.

The sight of that was a little distressing, but I'd cope.

"Pretty much, yeah," I said. "No need to rub elbows with the goblin that tried to take you out, but try no longer to be publicly out for blood."

"I never get to scheme," Hierophant mused, appearing rather chuffed. "It's rather pleasant to be involved in your plots."

"I'll take that as a yes," I said.

He nodded.

"Good," I grimly said. "Because you're not going to enjoy our talk with Kegan nearly this much."

His expression soured, but before he could begin to speak I raised my own voice and ordered the legionaries outside to let in the Duchess. I'd hear her arrive a little while back, but this needed to be wrapped up before she got involved. Masego would be easier to talk into things after being mollified. Some part of me wondered what kind of person it made me to be manipulating one of my closest friends without hesitation, but the voice wasn't as loud as it used to be. Or nearly as persuasive. The Duchess of Daoine parted the flaps of the tent with her hand and sketched half a bow in my direction. The stare she gave Hierophant was distinctly less than friendly.

"Your Grace," she greeted me. "I am pleased your strenuous duties have finally allowed time for audience."

Yeah, I'd kind of deserved that. Even at the kingdom's peak there been nobody but the royal family higher in rank than the head of the House of Ismail – she likely wasn't used to being given a brush-off, much less one as blatant as one I'd repeatedly given her.

"Take a seat, Duchess," I said. "I'm told you have grievances to bring forward."

"An understatement if there ever was one," Kegan sneered, and pointedly sat herself across the table from the both of us. "My men were murdered, and the very murderer sits at your side. Not an auspicious beginning."

Hierophant opened his mouth, but I raised my hand.

"Let her lay it out first," I said. "You can give answer afterwards. Duchess, the floor is yours."

"Seventy-three dead, without even ashes to bury," Kegan said. "Thirty-nine wounded permanently. Do I need to call witnesses forward? This entire host saw the killings."

"Your men attempted to kill Hierophant as well," I said, and her face turned dark with fury.

"Is the defences of one's life now a crime in the eyes of the Empire?" she barked.

"The Empress isn't here," I said calmly. "I am. And I am not condemning their actions, only establishing the full facts. Do you have anything to add?"

"Murder of Deoraithe is a breach of our treaty with the Tower," Kegan coldly said. "And I believe that under the regulations of your own legions, the wanton killing of allied soldiers qualifies as treason."

"So it does," I agreed, and was more than a little glad I sat down with Aisha before this. "'Wanton killing' being defined as 'killing without just pretext' under the same regulations."

"Are you implying there was anything just about this?" the Deoraithe said, and her tone could have frozen oil.

"I think this was a tragedy," I said. "But also a largely accidental one. Masego, if you would explain yourself?"

His glass eyes were fixing the duchess with a stare as unfriendly as her own.

"I was not aware I needed to explain my actions to aristocrats," Hierophant said, the disdain he put into the word ironically reminding me of the same highborn he was looking down on.

"I'm asking you to clarify why you did what you did," I said. "Lest your actions be interpreted inaccurately."

That, more than anything else, jolted him into talking. Throwing around rank here would have been completely useless.

"Upon returning from the dimensional fold in which I battled the three demons," Masego said, "My sudden juxtaposition to Creation brought back with it a large quantity of demonic essence. That essence having corrupted soldiers, I purged the location before it could further contaminate. Any further killing was made in my own defence."

"The killing of corrupted individuals regardless of Praesi citizenship is legal under purge protocols," I clarified for Kegan. "Which the Black Knight declared the moment the rebels called forward their demons. Hierophant hasn't broken Tower law by doing this, and killing men that were attacking him is similarly legal."

"I could have killed twice as many," Hierophant flatly said. "You should be thanking me for my restraint."

I almost winced. I really, really wished he hadn't said that. Reading a room had never been one of Masego's talent, but even by his standards this was a blunder. Predictably, Kegan's face was a mask of bitter and poisonous fury.

"You feed my people to demons, murder them and then those trying to protect them," she hissed. "And you require thanks for it?"

"The Lord Hierophant misspoke in an attempt to hide his deep regret at the tragic necessity of his actions," I lied. "Please forgive his lack of manners."

"I am the Duchess of Daoine," Kegan of House Ismail softly replied. "I do not forget. I do not forgive."

It was rather sad this wasn't even the worst I'd anticipated this conversation could go. Masego looked about to speak again but the look I sent him smothered that in the crib.

"Deep regret," I stressed.

"I did not mean to harm them," Hierophant sighed, sounding his age for once.

It was rare for him to have to face consequences for the collateral damage that followed in our wake. Most the time, it was our foes that got the worst of it. That sentence was probably as good as I could hope for, though Kegan understandably seemed less than appeased.

"Before you speak again," I interrupted. "He could not know your men would be where he reappeared."

I didn't know if that was true and frankly didn't care what the truth was. She would be in no position to gainsay me anyway: the mages could understand what Hierophant had pulled on the field in the whole of Calernia could probably be counted on one hand.

"And he was not the one who ordered your soldiers forward," I continued. "That would be Marshal Ranker."

It was unfair of me to throw her under the chariot here, to be honest. It was Masego who hadn't kept anyone in the loop when he'd done... whatever it was he'd actually done. I knew how he got when he had a puzzle in front of him, everything else fell by the wayside. It was something I would have to change in him, the going off without a word. Trying to fix the moral compass of a man raised by a monster and also an incubus was far beyond my ability, but I could at least fashion a facsimile of one through practicality. As long as he understood discussions like this would keep happening if he didn't change his ways, he should be willing to adjust in order to avoid the tediousness. That aside, Ranker had given orders according to what she believed to be the lay of the battlefield and her mistake had ultimately been understandable. By my reading of the reports she'd believed the entire army would collapse if the centre wasn't reinforced, so she'd merely taken what she saw as the lesser risk. But Kegan hated Ranker deeply, had for decades. And the marshal wasn't one of mine, quite the opposite. If doing her disservice was what kept the peace, she could go hang.

"Regardless of orders, there is fault," the Deoraithe said, but there'd been a noticeable thaw in the poison. "My men were killed at the Lord Hierophant's hand."

Ah, Black. Even now your lessons are useful. People always preferred blaming an old enemy if you gave them the chance.

"And for that there will be redress," I said. "Though there was no ill-intent, the deaths cannot be ignored. To start, Hierophant will help your mages reform the gestalt in Liesse."

Masego turned to me, displeasure visible on his face, but that was the least of the concessions I could and would make. Kegan set aside her anger for a moment, more interested in the prize I'd put on the table: confirmation that no one would contest the souls of her people. Keeping her wizards at bay had, in an unexpected way, made what must have once seem as a given feel like it was now a concession. I'd count my blessings in that.

"Full access to the city will be granted?" she pressed.

"Under supervision," I said, and before she could argue I raised a hand. "Not out of distrust, Duchess. That city is a nightmare made stone and my people are the ones who've been keeping an eye on it. I do this to avoid you losing a few of your practitioners in the bargain."

"It would not be necessary if access had been granted since the beginning," Kegan said, but did not disagree any further.

"Hierophant," I continued, "will also put his considerable prowess in sorcery at your disposal in order to help your practitioners ensure the gestalt cannot be stolen like this again. After which he will never speak a word of those measures to anyone, by royal decree."

"Catherine-" he began.

"We fuck up, we pay up," I bluntly told him. "This isn't Praes, Masego. We don't get a pass because we're Named or powerful. If the laws protect you, they protect them too."

He turned sullen at that, and that was the very reason I'd not warned him of this in advance. Look at me, Kegan, I thought. I'm going against one of my closest and most powerful supporters to set things right with you. Keep that in mind before deciding I'm an enemy. I knew the blind man's irritation would pass after he dug into the thick of the sorcery that was involved in what had been promised. There was a reason I'd chosen that out of all the possible avenues of making reparations. The Duchess would see one of the foremost Named in the Empire put to the service of her people, while Hierophant would forget this was a punishment at all after the first month. And if this required going to Daoine for a while, it just so happened that would keep Masego out of the reach of the Empress and the Calamities for while. That also had its uses. But I'd have to give more, for what I wanted out of Daoine. Masego had no part of that, though, and it would be better if he wasn't there at all.

"Hierophant's actions took place while he was under my command," I told Kegan. "Therefore the responsibility is mine in part. In my function as Vicequeen of Callow I'll offer further reparations, but I believe my comrade's part in this is done."

Masego mostly looked pleased he wouldn't have to keep being involved in this, but it wasn't him I was watching out for. It was the Duchess. In her eyes I could see the struggle: make a play for further punishment and risk whatever other indemnities I would offer, or show goodwill she didn't think he deserved and bank on that adding to the honeypot? Greed won, as I thought it would. The Duchess was about to have some lean years, if my suspicions about the costs of replacing the Watch's casualties were true. She'd want to hit me up for coin more than try and likely fail to have Hierophant further punished.

"That part of the grievance is considered settled," she conceded.

Good. Masego didn't bother with courtesies when he left the tent as quickly as he could, but the two of us had cats to skin of greater import.

"A moment," I said, and my heartbeat stilled.

The air in the tent cooled. Once that would have seen every surface in sight frost over, but I'd gained more than just power when I'd claimed my full mantle. Winter hung thickly in the air, a barely visible pale mist. No one would be able to scry through that, and my perceptions were extended far enough no one would be able to come and listen in without my knowing it. I felt the legionaries outside shuffle at the sudden drop, the two as visible to me as if I was standing before them, and I raised my voice to send the pair away. When I turned my eyes back to Kegan she had gone pale. Fear, I noted. It wafted off her like a scent. I breathed it in and smiled. It would be easy to get what I wanted from her. All that was needed was to weave myself into mind like a quiet whisper, slithering into her brains until terror ruled her and my words were her only relief. She would beg me to serve. If I twisted her just right, set a sliver of darkness and ice deep inside, I could have her plagued with nightmares that would keep her on my leash forever. My fingers clenched. Callowan, I told myself. She is Callowan. The urge lessened. It still lurked, but the power was no longer waiting to lash out.

"Gods," the Duchess said. "Your eyes, they... It is true, then. You are no longer human."

My eyes? I raised an eyebrow and a light tap of the finger on the table had it frost. I looked upon my reflection and found nothing amiss, fixing the Deoraithe with a quizzical look.

"Like frozen ponds," she whispered.

Useful, I thought, if they were truly this disquieting. The part of me that should be finching was utterly silent.

"We will not be overheard," I said. "Would you be entirely opposed to some honesty between us, Duchess? It should limit the tediousness."

She shivered at my voice, or perhaps the cold.

"I am not disagreeable," she managed with laudable composure.

"There is a war coming," I said. "I would like to know where Daoine will stand, and before it reaches our doorstep."

"The terms of our treaty with the Tower require a host of no less than ten thousand soldiers be provided in case of foreign invasion," she said cautiously.

"If I was here on behalf of the Empress, this tent would be warmer," I said.

She stared at me for a long time.

"You speak of rebellion," she said.

"Nothing quite so... turbulent," I replied.

"Then what, exactly?" she pressed.

I smiled, broad and sharp.

"Do you play shatranj, Duchess?" I asked, voice echoing strangely.

This time I knew why she shivered.

"I do," she said.

"To have a game, you see, you need an unspoken assumption," I murmured. "That all the pieces will obey."

She stayed. She listened.

And after, she made a deal.

First update of the month, which means extra chapter in the usual tab. This one is titled "Prosecution I", the first of a two-parter from the POV of Hanno (the White Knight).

TameCurtsy

This story has seriously fallen off. I'm not really talking about the plot, that's great. Same with the characters. And the dialogue. And the worldbuilding. What really has gone downhill has been your first of the month comments.

You used to include the link to the bonus story. But now you don't? I just don't understand why you would do this to your audience. This link: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/03/02/prosecution-i/>

If you want to make it up to us, a surprise bonus chapter part ii in the middle of march will do nicely, thanks in advance.

Big Brother

Tame, you're an ass. Quit being lazy and just scroll a little bit further.

Morgenstern

You don't even have to scroll. Just look at the two "previous" right under the chapter. And there IS what you were searching for. Just have to click it...

Morgenstern

*ahem* >> "previous" and "next" tabs << that should have said. Though "previous" is the one where "Prosecution I" stands out in bold letters.

Gunslinger

Is this supposed to be a joke? Even then it comes off really bad, especially when you've replied straight to the author.

TameCurtsy

"Hey author, your story is great, but [ridiculously superficial criticism]. Why oh why would you do that to us. [Shameless attempt for an early extra chapter]"

Sorry you guys didn't like my comment! Rereading that first paragraph, I could've made the joke more obvious/balanced, my bad.

Jonnnney

We get an extra chapter at the beginning of the month. Are you incapable of reading a calendar?

If it's any consolation, I laughed. I just hope it didn't upset EE.

Big Brother

Hot damn. Cat is getting really good at her Role.

Gunslinger

She played poor Masego like a fiddle

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What's the problem with manipulating him in the way that Cat did? It seems like she manipulated him into an outcome that's going to be good for him that he'll also enjoy. I'm not really seeing a problem with keeping Named beholden to some fair-ish standard of conduct.

aurabolt1

Because it is hypocrisy. Because as someone with similar social abilities to Mesego, he defended himself-arrows are still pretty able to kill Named mages as they are with anything else-and he's getting manipulated and punished for it.

He doesn't manipulate Cat. To do the same to him is wrong, when he trusts you as much as someone with his upbringing can.

Gunslinger

Once again Cat gets more power but with greater costs. The worst thing is that whatever happened to her will most likely not subside with the coming of her new name. I wish she'd get a break for once but this will be a lesser work then.

Ohh and if you you can do support the author on patreon (<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>)

Contributions there are why we get 4 chapters this week.

matbag248

Too bad there's no goal of 5 chapters a week, or even 7 chapters. We can only dream.

Gunslinger

Honestly more chapters would be highly unlikely even if we can allow the author to do this full time.

But I suspect reducing the financial burden would allow them to work on editing the previous books for publication

werafdsaew

I suspect more chapters would simply lead to shorter chapters.

Vortex

I am very happy with the quality of the chapters now. If more chapters equals shorter or lower quality chapters then I would rather we stay at the current setup.

NZPIEFACE

Subside? It's more likely to strengthen man.

Gunslinger

Sadly yeah, Winter is not going to be solved by a second Resurrection

Aeon

Building up her powerbase, huh? I suspect that the Winter effects will be somewhat permanent, but that at least some of it will be alleviated. Can't have Cat lose her humanity completely. We're getting there. Still can't wait to see her new Name.

Rook

I'm actually hoping all these changes and drawbacks stay permanent and significant. Part of playing the narrative, which is where the real power is in this setting lies, is understanding how your weaknesses and strengths fit into place in a story.

Physical or magical drawbacks aren't really drawbacks here, and strengths aren't necessarily strengths. Black is a rather small man of at best average physical capability among named, and has weak named abilities to boot. Despite this he's one of the most dangerous characters around by several orders of magnitude. Captain was insanely strong and was crushingly dominant after transformation, but she got killed by a Hero that wasn't particularly noteworthy – almost solely because she was on the wrong side of the narrative.

Similarly, Cats new Fae qualities being SO heavily dependant on the story being told means they're a ridiculously sharp double-edged sword. She could be bound and beaten by ants because of her characteristics the way the Summer Queen was; or just as easily manipulate the story so those exact same characteristics make her utterly unstoppable instead, potentially surmounting even Black in this sense. Being so distinctly polarized means you have a lot more *weight* that can be shifted against or in favour of you.

To me this is super interesting, since the idea of the protagonist earning her victories via cleverly wielding her weaknesses as a weapon – along the lines of her currently comatose mentor – is way more appealing than just a bog standard Named bulldozer with lots of strength built in.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What makes you think Cat can't lose her humanity completely? Remember the battle early on where she zombified her half-dead self? Foreshadowing, man. Without the "halfway" part this time.

ayon96

Think in the future in another pivot she will get back some of her humanity!

Engineer

I like...

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

This is just chapter after chapter of blue-balling, I missed it when I didn't have to wait for chapters, they were just magically there! Crazy, right?

spotted one typo where two words were fused together, 'her' and some other word~

glassgirlceci

This is one of those things where, cognitively, I know it's awful to lose parts of yourself, lose your humanity bit by bit in a Faustian bargain for power. I'm thankful I don't have to live if myself, and I do feel sorry for Cat, but...this is just so *cool*. Seeing her badass and terrifying and manipulative... Whatever happens in the future, that was amazing, I love it so much!

Sniggs44

I like how Cat manipulated Masego. The best kind on constructive manipulation, where you get someone to do something they are disinclined to, but they'll ultimately benefit from/enjoy. If she's going to be an evil chessmaster then this is the best kind she could be, it bodes well.

The commentary about how she has to "inflexibly solidify her values or lose power" (or w/e) was fascinating. Brought to mind scifi artificial intelligences, which have their core values inalterably enshrined in their coding. If she's really transitioning into some sort of inhuman intelligence, these early days are the most important in terms of ensuring she's not going to deviate from her core human principles. "Protect Callow(ans)", "don't needlessly commit genocides", "minimize suffering", etc are all good prime directives to set in stone while she still has control over how her new mind is being formed.

Here's hoping she can reconstruct her psyche in a non-psychotic way before the next big disaster hits. Still being a blank slate in the midst of the upcoming conflict wouldn't be conducive to her coming out the other end a well adjusted human being.

Decius

There are no safe, stateable directives for a sufficiently powerful being to mindlessly implement.

What would have been great for Cat to do before she became Winter would have been to establish internally consistent / values/.

lavos

Considering most people, if not in fact everyone, don't have truly consistent values that would be pretty hard.

Daemion

We need another chapter from another perspective soon, to see how everyone else thinks about Cat now. Maybe Nauk will wake up soon and provide that insight? I really liked his part in Commanders.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

NZPIEFACE

I've been wondering, what's so dumb about your phone?

Shoddi

My Silly Theory: Ward is in truth, not a name but a statement of condition. The "dumb phone" itself is a technological "ward" preventing them from electronically scrying more in-depth comments. Thus, they are limited to a five-word expression of approval.

Or it's just Ward's bit. I've no problem with it. Carry on.

Gunslinger

I've always assumed this was the work of a strange bot

AshSlanabrezgov

Modern mobile handheld spell arrays with touchscreen which operate on daemon-infested OS like Android, or iOS, are termed as smart phones. Eldritch mobile handheld spell arrays from the yore or modern simpler ones are named dumb-phones.

There are things, unholy things that operate under Windows-to-hell Mobile but let those sleep in the dark and never be named.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

@Ash but a pre-"smart" phone isn't going to be able to display a webpage, let alone comment.

I don't have a "problem" with "Ward" here, but since we need a different opinion represented: what the fuck is the point of leaving a comment that doesn't say anything? It's self-important bullshit cluttering up the comment section for everyone else. It's just like a middle schooler commenting "First!" It's pointless and really kind of rude.

goliath1303

You must be young enough that you probably never had a phone that wasn't "smart". You 100% could get online with the old flip phones, blackberries, etc. Now, just because you could do so, definitely does not mean most people did. It was hellish nightmare to be quite honest. If I remember right you would have additional charges added onto your bill(That's right, this feature existed even back when almost everybody was still locked into a contract, which was a while nother headache.) based on either pages viewed or time spent online. I really don't remember how the billing worked because I almost never used it due to how much it sucked. I remember I had a girlfriend that would always use it on her blackberry(Which used to be considered a pretty good phone.) to check her social media.

All in all, using mobile internet back in the pre smartphone era was a miserable experience and one I, as well as most people I knew, avoided using in order to retain our composure and sanity. The ability to view websites and comment was absolutely a thing though.

As to the rest of your comment, I have to agree that these comments are unnecessary and slightly annoying. Like usual though, you are unable to communicate with others in a civil manner. That, unfortunately, detracts from any valid points you make. My knee-jerk reaction is actually to disagree with whatever you're saying when you post rude, out of proportion, criticisms like this, attacking somebody over a simple comment. The worst/best part of your comment though, is how unself-aware you are. You actually ended that overblown rant by calling Ward rude! The irony of that is just mind boggling.

AshSlanabrezgov

I think that most important question which must be solved by Cat fast is this – “To be powerful but rigid, or to be weak but flexible?”.

And fk the existential crisis aside – it is price she has to live with. It might be painful but what sold is sold.

Back to the main question. To be successful villain, here are abstract paths that can lead to her achieving her goals.

1. Become fairy and use brute force granted by title of Dutchess to achieve her coming goals, while embracing shackles of fairies – shackles of stories. Problem here lies in that brute force might be enough to defeat some of Named idiots or rulers who want Callow be used and eradicated, she is villain. Villain Fairy against Bard who knows lots of stories, which sounds bad. And against Gods Above too, who give heroes unfair advantages against powerful foes.

Let's assume she becomes successful as a ruler of Callow. A rigid monster of frozen Order might be a curse to lands she governs.

2. Become fairy, become monster, but leash herself and give leash to someone with flexibility and her vision of future for Callow. Problem here is that she is too unique. There is no one who can fit a role of incorruptible and driven savior of Callow. Maybe give leash to Thief? She is somehow weak. - - Maybe use Masego and clone Cat's soul or split it to two different entities – one “Diabolist” and another “Bound Demon”? Or maybe it's possible to establish were-fairy procedure where she changes from flexible Cat to rigid Cat by some trigger.

3. Shackle herself from using Winter power to try and remain somewhat flexible. Maybe search for ways to evolve her Name into something that allows flexibility.

Thenre

Impatiently awaiting Cat's new name

Porkman

I don't really want Cat to rebel.

I want Black and Cat and Malicia to patch up their differences and then chew the Principate up through the methods of Rationality.

Reveen

Looks like the methods of Rationality is getting it's ass dunked on, boy.

Dylan Tullos

Porkman:

The last section hasn't been going well for the "methods of Rationality". There are a hundred thousand dead people who think Cat isn't doing a great job, and there about to be a lot more once the Crusade begins.

There's a really good quote from a wonderful book called The Traitor Baru Cormorant: "Your error is fundamental to the human psyche: you have allowed yourself to believe that others are mechanisms, static and solvable, whereas you are an agent."

Other people have their own plans, and they're as capable of reasoning out solutions as Team Practical Evil. It's important to remember that no plan survives contact with the enemy.

Porkman

@Dylan Tullos

The central caveat of this story is that Malicia and Black have read the "Evil Overlord List" and are actually working against it.

The way the story has been running and the world has been working has essentially been... "the universe will put its hands on the scale, but it needs a villain to mess up and make themselves vulnerable through a violation of the Evil Overlord List first." Black's whole thing has been to avoid list violations and watch the story and avoid situations where a dramatic reversal could happen.

That is his modus operandi.

The story says he destroyed the array out of pride (or at least that's how Cat sees it) and that isn't right.

He destroyed it because he knew that the demon array was a cursed sword which was guaranteed to fail at the most story critical point and destroy Praes.

That wasn't pride... that was seeing the world the way it is.

His disappointment is with Malicia for being seduced by the same "shiny evil superweapon" which have always been the undoing of Praesi rulers.

But he wasn't wrong.

The story has now changed from "The heroic Principate launching a crusade against the Empire of Praes who threatens to bathe the world in hellfire." to "The Principate attacking the beleaguered empire of Praes which has been devastated by a civil war with nothing to show for it but ashes."

Praes/Callow now has an underdog effect. Black, by destroying the Array, has given them a better chance. Because the array was an automatic win... for Praes's enemies.

If the situation in the camps wasn't such a mess, the fact that he'd actually lodged a formal complain with the Legions would have carried a lot of weight.

So when Cat transitions, she becomes The Winter Queen, yeah? 😊

Glow

Look at Cat go. Making deals like a real fae and all. Interesting about her body now being a construct. Is it now a mirror reflecting her role in the story?

I also wonder what's happening to balance her presence as Winter. There has to be something going on to bring Summer back...where's Killian again??

Hvitserkr

It's a bit disconcerting to see Cat having no second thoughts about assassinating three mage lines. They were just following orders after all.

Draconius Sinister

Hey @Eraticerrata, sorry to be a bother, but could we have a hard and fast definition of how command structures in the Legions generally go, who's in charge of what, and how things are different in the Fifteenth? Sorry if this is a weird/out there request, just kind of want to know how things break down! Also, great chapter, can't wait for the next one! Totally Not a Villain,

Hvitserkr

http://abridged-guide-to-evil.wikia.com/wiki/Legions\_of\_Terror

The Fifteenth had eight thousand soldiers before the Arcadian campaign (the size of two standard legions; understaffed on the mages and sappers) + three thousand Callowan knights (even the Thirteenth Legion only has a thousand riders; Grandmaster Talbot is a commander, but is counted as member of the general staff, and has three times more men than a commander usually does)

Also, iirc there were no official Kachera Tribune in the Fifteenth (there were Aisha and Ratface to make up for that, and now there's Thief as well)

Poetically Psychotic

Seems like she's going full on Khepri.

*vuthuha912*

Um... Cat... The mage lines are good soldiers, they are risking their lives to fight for you and others. The order they were given was logical and understandable. Hopefully, you are not actually assassinating them and just harassing them on their way to Praes.

Manipulating people for their own good, you are truly Black's successor.

Ranker can probably take a few minor symbolic punishments, Cat should make a show of it. Ranker may take it to protect people under her. Still, Keagan is truly a cunt, isn't she? If Callow collapsed, it will affect everyone under it. She can say she is an isolationist all she wants, the enemies won't be keen on all the nuances of Callow politics.

Cat can probably come up with some rewards or compensations for Keagan to smooth the whole thing over. A public funeral, some honors for the families member of the deceased, jobs and education for their children, land, money, tax granted, etc.

Now that Black is in open rebellion, there is no way of letting this slide. Malicia can't afford to be weak but she can't also just punish Black when she is the one who just gutted 6 of his legions and cost him 3 of his veteran generals. Still, a symbolic punishment is enough, strip him of some money or power and put him under house arrest for a bit. A poke on the wrist.

Honestly, she lets all sorts of thing slide, from those two cunts on the Ruling Councils to Akua Rebellion to various other highborns' insubordinations. Punishing the one person who is actually defying her for her own good while other unreliable fucks get a pass is ... not great.

Chapter 72: Curtains

"Tall your tower may be, but what was raised by the hands of men can by those same hands be torn down."

– Queen Eleanor Fairfax of Callow

The moon had come and gone, chased away by the approach of dawn. I still had the better part of a bell left until the sun rose, but I sat patiently. It would make the fourth time Archer went into the city now, and she'd come close enough the last I could reasonably expect her to succeed on this trip. I'd come to regret not bringing a folding chair for my vigil, but the log I was leaning against was comfortable enough apathy had seen me decline going out to get one. I enjoyed the silence, to be honest. The reprieve from everything. Out here I could allow even my thoughts to go still, though I never let myself to sink into sleep. I still could, I'd found out. Much like eating it was no longer something I needed to do, and when I did it was... less than restful. I always dreamt, and the dreams were not the pleasant kind. Winter devouring a world whole, until all that was left was ice and darkness. My eyes lingered on the ward setting the boundary around Liesse, and I found the same silhouettes from earlier had yet to retreat. Shades of the dead standing a vigil of their own. I could feel their eyes on me, fixed and unblinking.

There was hunger in them, but it was lesser than my own and that had them attracted to my presence like moths to a flame. Had I truly become the Black Queen, I thought, had my teacher not broken that transition as recklessly as he had the city, they would have been mine to rule. To shape and order as I wished, wresting true ownership of the weapon Akua had made from the Empire's hands. The shape of that was still seductive. It would have been a gamble, it was true, but then so was any other path. And it had been the only outcome presented to me I'd found even slightly acceptable. Peace in my time, huh. The freedom to rebuild Callow as it should be, safe and prosperous. That path led to a place where I was no longer needed, but that might be better for all involved. What salvation I'd tried to bring to my people had bled them as starkly as ruin, and would yet unless I found a way out. Keeping the damages to a minimum had failed, that much was obvious. It'd only ever been a mitigating measure anyway, not a plan. One of those was taking shape in my mind, even as I gathered more and more soldiers to my banner, but oh the risk of it.

Gamble was too light a word, but if every other path led to a land of graveyards it was a risk that must be taken.

Archer's presence was heralded by the retreating of the shades. Even through the translucent wall of the ward I could see her tying a rope atop the rampart and shimmying down smoothly. Some curious shade wandered too close and was immediately carved through in a silver blur, the other woman's longknife wounding it as if it was a thing of flesh. The others scattered immediately in a chorus of whispers I was careful not to listen too closely to. The sooner Hierophant bound those souls again the better for all involved. Archer tugged down the rope after landing and sheathed her blade, striding towards me unhurriedly. The ward pushed back her hair and clothes when she crossed it, but from the swagger to her step I knew she'd finally managed what I'd asked of her. A cold smile stretched my lips. Good. It was not the kind of thread I could allow to be left hanging.

"So if Zeze told you shit was under control in there, he was gravely mistaken," Archer told me with a shit-eating grin. "Get it? As in grave-"

"You've just ensured we will never sleep together," I told her frankly. "Your being an ass I can live with, but puns? I do have standards."

"Spoken like the Ice Queen of legend," the Named replied cheerfully.

She plopped herself down at my side, sprawling over twice the amount of space I'd occupied and elbowing me out of my comfortable stance. I threw back her hand in her own face and she yelped, more out of outrage than pain.

"Is that any way to treat your beloved minion?" she complained.

"Almost half of that was true," I noted. "That's a record for you."

"Ugh," she grunted. "You're such a joyless thing. I thought villains were supposed to be the fun ones."

"You've been part of two wars and several killings that will go into legend since linking up with me," I pointed out.

"Maybe, but I haven't gotten laid in like a year," she whined. "I'm this close to just dragging your pretty officer into a tent for the night."

I glanced at her. That could mean any number of people, given that her tastes did not discriminate between genders.

"The one with the funny name," she elaborated.

I raised an eyebrow.

"Ratface?" I tried.

"That's the one," she cheered. "Aisha gets real chatty after a drinks, and she had nothing but compliments for--"

"And this part of the conversation just came at an end," I announced firmly.

"You never gossip with me," Archer told me, displeased.

"I've delegated all gossiping duties to Hakram," I said, swiftly throwing my closest friend under the chariot. "And if you're being this much of a pest, you have something for me."

"Say please," she grinned.

"Please stop trying my patience," I sweetly replied.

I was rewarded by Archer rustling through her knapsack and dropping a cylinder of obsidian in my lap. I ran a finger down the length of it, and the soul bound within shivered. Oh, I thought. So you know who I am. That's an unexpected pleasure.

"Kind of wanted to stab her a few times," the brown-skinned woman told me in a conversational tone. "You know, for Hunter."

"I tore out her heart while she was still alive to feel it," I informed Archer.

The other woman blinked at me, then let out a whistle.

"Well shit," she said. "That's a way to get your displeasure across, I guess. Old school of you, Cat."

"She had a way of bringing that out in me," I muttered, eyes on the soul container. "I lost my temper when she sent an envoy."

Made an oath, even. Not the kind of thing I can back out of nowadays."

If you do this, there is no place in Creation or beyond that will safeguard you from me, I'd sworn. Not Heavens or Hells, not even if every lord in Arcadia swears to you. The doom I promise you will have men trembling in a thousand years when they speak of Akua's Folly and the woe that came from it. I could feel what I had spoken binding me as surely as if I'd sworn on the Gods Below.

"I thought about sending her to the Tower," I admitted. "She'd have a place waiting for her in the Hall of Screams."

"But that wouldn't be quite your vengeance then, would it?" Archer knowingly said.

That, and I no longer trusted the Empress with possession of Akua's soul. Not when I could no longer be certain another city wouldn't go up in flames for a weapon to be forged. It was one thing to use that weapon after it was already made, another to enable Malicia to commit mass murder if she got desperate enough. Even if it was Praesi who got the axe this time, which I couldn't be sure of. There was a part of me that was urging me to just destroy the soul. To make sure the possible liability was ended for good. But as reasonable as I knew that action would be, I couldn't quite bring myself to take it. I wasn't sure whether it was genuine hatred that had me stay my hand, or if I simply couldn't break the oath. Both were worrying liabilities.

"I have a cloak," I finally said.

"The murder cloak, yeah," Archer mused. "Called thus because you murdered someone for every piece you add to it."

I forced myself not to sigh. It would only encourage her.

"Haven't added her banner to it yet," I said. "I was thinking maybe something more pointed was in order."

Archer eyed me sideways.

"Shit," she said. "Her own soul, really?"

"It can be done," I said. "I've heard the Warlock bound someone's soul to a chamber pot once, Masego should be able to do something similar."

"I can't decide whether that's better or worse than skinning someone and making a cloak out of that," she mused.

"Past a certain point the nuances don't matter much, I think," I said.

"That's where you're wrong," Archer said, face turning up to stare at the sky. "They never do. We just tell ourselves otherwise so we can think someone else is worse."

"Never took you for the philosophical kind of girl," I said, head leaning back next to hers.

"That's because it's pointless to dig to deep," she shrugged. "How long are we going to live, either of us? Not long enough to see more than the smallest bit of Creation. If that's my limit, I want to sample as much of that bit as I can instead of just getting miserable about all this Good and Evil twaddle. Ain't no settling that, no matter how hard you try. If you get involved you just get chewed up like all the others before you, and I don't owe anybody that."

"Hate to break it to you," I said, "but you are involved. What do you think we've been doing for the last year?"

"I have no idea," she admitted, sounding pleased at the notion. "But you're a pretty shit villain and you gave the Choir of Contrition the finger, so I'm looking forward to finding out."

I wouldn't get a better opening than that, I thought, so I might as well speak up now.

"You got a letter," I said. "From Refuge."

"Huh," she grunted. "What's in it?"

"Are you implying I'd read your personal correspondence?" I said.

"Haven't you?" she snorted.

"Of course not," I said, and let a beat pass. "I have people for that."

"I can't believe you're half-assing even your spying on me," she sighed. "Was it from the Lady?"

I hummed in agreement.

"She says the debt Refuge owed the Tower is settled," I told her. "That your mandated service as my fae specialist is at an end. Didn't actually summon you back, though."

"She wouldn't," Archer said. "It's not how Refuge works. The Lady of the Lake's not a queen, Cat, she's just... the woman with the biggest stick, I guess. We learned from her, but we're not like an army or anything. We do whatever we want."

I made a noise of understanding, not willing to comment on any of it given my continued sharp dislike for Ranger.

"So what are you going to do?" I asked.

"Don't be thick, you chump," she sighed. "I'm staying. You should know that by now. But you should also know I'm going to leave eventually."

I had known that, deep down. Of all the Woe she was the one least bound to me. Adjutant and Hierophant had attachment to the Empire, and Thief to Callow. But Archer? Archer had come for reasons entirely her own, and would leave when she tired of them.

"To where?" I asked.

"I don't know," she laughed. "But there's so much I haven't seen. The Everdark, the Titanomachy. And you must have been told this entire continent is a nowhere. There's nations on the other side of the Tyrian Sea that are larger than all of Calernia. Hells, we don't even know what's to the west."

"No one's ever found anything in the Skiron ocean," I reminded her. "Except sea snakes that were a tad unfriendly, and not the small kind."

"Doesn't mean there's not," Archer murmured. "Wouldn't that be something, Cat? Being the first Calernian to walk an unknown shore?"

"It would be," I admitted.

I'd be something untainted, too, and there were few of those left in my life.

"Maybe I'll go with you, Archer," I said. "Gods, there's bound to be a day where I'm done. Where I can finally just leave."

My tone was tired, but it was not kind of tired sleep could cure. Archer stirred.

"Indrani," she said. "Call me Indrani."

We stayed there until dawn, laughing and talking of places so very far away.

It was always odd to see Adjutant loaded with parchment instead of weapons, but not a bad sort of odd. It wasn't unfitting, just different from what I was used to seeing. This time, though, the look I gave the scroll he handed me was harsh. It contained names, thirty-four of them. Mages taken prisoner after the Second Battle of Liesse.

"And they're currently in containment?" I asked.

"Under ward and guard," the orc said. "Both our own. The Fifteenth took custody of all prisoners."

"I'm not recognizing a lot of those names," I told him. "I expected highborn."

"They're all mfuasa," Hakram informed me. "The Truebloods weren't willing to gamble on Diabolist with kin, at least not important ones."

Servant lines, huh. Old retainer families of the High Lords who'd been in their service for so long they were above peasants in the Praesi pecking order. Akua had sent the same to me as expendable envoys when we'd had our little chat before the battle. I shoved the scroll under my arm and unfolded the other one he'd handed me.

"Nearly two thousand," I said, raising an eyebrow. "I knew you'd grabbed a few, Hakram, but not that many."

"They're not all Praesi," he said. "There's some Helikean mercenaries and even seven drows."

"Exiles?" I asked.

"Soldiers don't go to Mercantis when they've still got a home," he said.

I wiggled my elbow at the scroll he still held in hand.

"And what's on that?"

"The names of the highborn within the household troops," he said. "I've had Aisha look into them, to add notes regarding their background and what could reasonably be asked for ransom."

"Ransom," I repeated softly.

"I know," he said. "Not what you want. But it's not a small sum, Catherine. And the moment you start raising armies and rebuilding the country, our coffers are going to bleed like a stuck pig."

"The Tower is meant to pay reparations," I said.

"The Tower's gone silent," Hakram growled. "That is not a good sign."

That was too true for me to deny. I'd expected Malicia to begin talks with me the moment the dust settled, and that she'd so far made no attempt was raising my hackles. Something was afoot. I needed the coin, that much was true. And yet. I handed Adutant the mage scroll back, and refused the one with highborn names.

"The closest road," I said. "It's between Ankou and Southpool, correct?"

"Closest paved road," he corrected. "There's dirt ones all over the region."

It was half a bell past dawn, and that meant matters were in need of settling. The prisoners first among them, since they were beginning to be a noticeable drain on our supplies. I looked north, where the road we'd spoken of would lay.

"We'll begin on the outskirts of Ankou," I said. "One every mile."

"One what?" the orc asked.

"Do you remember what Black did, after the Liesse Rebellion?" I said.

Adjutant had never been slow to understanding.

"The Countess Marchford and the Marchioness Vale," he said.

"Nailed to the gates of their own manors," I mused. "I have a lack of those at hand, so the side of the road will have to do. One every mile, Hakram. Crucified."

They wanted to make a fucking statement with their rebellion, did they? I could make one as well. You come here and you murder Callowans? This is what happens. This will always be what happens. Let them think of that every time they passed a corpse left to the crows.

"You still have a list in hand," Adjutant finally said.

"Take care of the other two," I said. "And throw in the mercenaries. I've no mercy left for those. Then you can assemble what's left."

"Should I have gallows raised?" he asked.

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. Necessity and dues. Always the hardest balance to strike.

"Do," I finally said.

The orc studied me closely.

"Will they be used?" he said.

"That'll be on them," I said. "They're going to get the only thing any of us ever get. A choice."

I waited in my tent with a bottle of aragh and the latest reports while he saw to it. The Taghreb liquor was already tasteless, and it had a kick. It was one of the few drinks I could still enjoy. By Noon Bell my sappers had raised the gallows and the remaining prisoners were herded out of their camp and onto the plains. Four companies of heavies stood around them, and as many regulars kept them moving in good order. They looked haggard, I saw when I left the tent. Not tortured or beaten, but kept on the least amount of rations possible and in chains even when they slept. A far cry from the resplendent soldiers they'd once been, decked in the Wasteland's finest arms and armour. Adjutant was at my side when I stood before them, his looming presence a weight additional to my own. I gave him a nod and he barked orders, legionaries using the flat of their blades to silence the quiet talk of the prisoners.

"You know who I am," I said.

One of the prisoners in the back called out something and there was a splash of laughter.

"Adjutant," I said.

He went himself. Even those who'd laughed went utterly silent at the sight of the man being dragged to the gallows by his hair, kicking and screaming. The goblins slipped the noose around his neck and the lever was pulled. The sharp snap sounded like the crack of thunder across the eerily quiet assembly. Feet hanging above the deck, the corpse moved with the breeze.

"You know who I am," I repeated, and this time no one spoke. "I would be within my rights to hang every last one of you. It would, in all honesty, make my day."

I sighed.

"But I am not a wasteful woman," I said. "You are dead, make no mistake about that. Tribunals have been convened and a verdict passed."

I'd stood before soldiers, once and spoken words like this to deserters. I'd come to care for them, in the end, but that had never been what was meant to happen was it? It had been a weakness on my part to get attached. One I was in no danger of repeating with this lot.

"The manner and time of this end is at my discretion," I said. "I own your deaths. And I would rather spend them than throw them away. The last time I made such an offer, there was the promise of release and amnesty at the end of service."

My tone went cold.

"You get no such mercy from me," I said. "You are rebels and murderers, the willing tool of a madwoman who met her deserved end. You will die fighting for this land you butchered, be it tomorrow or in ten years."

I flicked my wrist and Hakram gestured at an officer, who brought forward a standard and plunged it into dark earth. Gold on red, the cloth was. A golden noose set against crimson, with the words of dead men written beneath. Gallowborne. The best of the worst.

"You can refuse," I said. "Where that leads you is behind me. Or you can kneel, and make an oath."

In the end, they knelt.

Thief found me right before Evening Bell, as I was beginning to consider going out to look for her myself. She didn't bother to sneak in this time, striding straight into my tent and dropping into her seat with a grunt. Vivienne took the bottle of aragh on the table and pulled directly at it without asking, setting it down after with a loud thump.

"It could be worse," Thief finally said.

"I didn't expect your report to be pleasure reading," I said. "Not that you ever bother to write those."

"Get used to it," she said "I'm not leaving a parchment trail for the Eyes to get their hands on."

Fair enough, I conceded. I knew better than to put stock in the delusion there weren't informants in the Tower's pay remaining in my own legion, much less all the other ones camped by Liesse.

"Start with the worst," I said.

"Southpool," she grimaced. "Eldermen and former nobility are meeting. The whole city's incensed about their levies being wiped out."

"Rebellion?" I asked.

"Nothing overt," Thief said, "but if they want to get their hands on weapons, the nobles are the ones to talk to. It's not a good sign they're involved."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"Get the names to Ratface," I said.

Her face blanked.

"I'm told he has an envoy from the Assassins in his staff," she said.

The implied question was quiet clear.

"Not unless they force me to," I said. "They get a warning first. I've seen enough dead Callowans for several lifetimes. But if they actually rebel, Vivienne, it'll be more than a handful of old men who end up killed. That I won't allow."

She slowly nodded. Whether or not that had convinced her I couldn't tell.

"The south is a mess, but uprising's the last thing on their mind," she told me. "With Dormer and Holden emptied and Liesse... well, I'm not sure there's a word for what happened to Liesse. Refugees are trickling back to the other two, but with Liesse gone everything in sight of Hengest Lake is lawless. There's bandit packs forming to claim what food is left, and village militias aren't above looting other villages to keep their families fed through winter either."

"I'll send a detachment south," I grimaced. "It'll take a while to get supplies in place, though. Isn't the governor in Vale doing anything?"

"He's driving back any refugees camping in his lands with the last of the city guard," Vivienne darkly said. "City's under martial law and he's started rationing."

Another mess to deal with. There was always another one waiting around the corner.

"Laure?" I pressed.

"The Governess-General has kept order," Thief said. "My people had some quiet talks with those who wanted to start riots for a spot of looting. Summerholm and Denier are steady too, word's still only trickling in. Expect trouble when it's no longer rumours."

"Ankou?"

"Marshal Grem sent in a garrison force," she said. "Quiet for now, orcs in armour marching through the streets have a way of making people think twice about throwing stones. And before you ask, the north barely even noticed the rest of Callow is on fire. The Baron of Hedges has been heard saying the chaos to the south is a Praesi issue, not his people's, and he won't send even a copper down in aid."

Those isolationist pricks. Even during the Conquest they'd barely sent any men to fight the Empire. As far as the sheep-fuckers were concerned they were a kingdom of their own, whatever the maps said. Southpooleans might be backwards mud-lickers but at least they pulled their godsdamned weight when catastrophe came calling.

"We'll see about that," I muttered. "They'll be sent an invitation to Laure soon enough."

Thief hummed.

"A little closer to home, did you know-"

"I know," I quietly said. "I have him a bell out of courtesy. If he doesn't come to me after that, I go to him. And I won't be polite."

"So long as you know," Vivienne said.

I leaned back into my chair.

"I need you to do something for me," I said. "Quietly."

Blue-grey eyes faced me.

"How quiet are we speaking?" she asked.

"I'll glamour you a body double and keep her out of sight," I said.

Thief let out a sharp breath.

"Why?"

I reached for the aragh and filled my cup.

"Not that long ago," I said, "I was given a choice where none of the outcomes were really a victory. Just a different kind of ugly compromise."

I knocked back the glass, allowing it to hit the table with a satisfying clang.

"So I had to ask myself – am I really playing the right game?"

I smiled grimly.

"Let's find out."

The Blackguards had made their own little camp within the camps. They'd raised palisades, had sentinels posted at all times and allowed no one in. It didn't matter. I'd had Adjutant send people to keep an eye on them, and the ripple that had gone through the soldiers earlier could only have one reason for it. Black was awake. He was awake and his four hours had run out. By now Scribe would have filled him in on everything going on – that she knew about, at least. That was as far as courtesy would take me. I went directly for the gate, which was little more than a moveable part of the palisade. It opened, but that was as far as I was allowed. A dozen Blackguards blocked the opening behind and one went forward to speak to me. I cocked my head to the side, inhaling the scent of him. I knew this one.

“Lieutenant Abase,” I greeted him.

He pushed up his visor, but his hand never left the pommel of his sword.

“Ma’am,” he said. “It’s actually captain now.”

The Blackguards wore no insignias when on campaign, as my teacher disliked the notion of leaving the enemy the capacity to easily pick out his retinue’s officers.

“Congratulations,” I said. “I know he’s awake. Move your men aside.”

The Soninke grimaced.

“I’m under orders not to let anyone in,” he said.

“His orders?” I asked. “Or Scribe’s?”

“Orders,” he replied. “That’s all that matters.”

My eyes flicked to the men behind him. Fear, I sensed. In him and the others both. I wondered if it should be considered some kind of accolade, to be capable of causing that in soldiers who had fought at the side of the Calamities for decades.

“You were kind to me,” I said quietly. “Whenever you could. So I’m going to give you one chance, to reconsider being the man who’s in my way.”

“Duty has no end,” he said in Mtethwa.

It had the cadence of a saying, I thought.

“My patience does,” I replied in the same.

Winter flared but I did not weave the same kind of brutish applications I’d once used to crush throats or shatter bodies. It was closer to a glamour, really. The man’s eyes went wide and he screamed, clawing at his plate as he felt hungry shadows tear into his flesh. The sound of swords unsheathed was heard ahead and I fixed the soldiers with a measured stare. Little bundles of life and warmth they were, huddled inside their steel shells. So very fragile, and what had they done to earn restraint from me? They were not in my keeping. They were obstacles. My hand rose.

"Enough," Scribe's voice rang out.

I looked at her. There was no sign of fear on her, no scent. Impatience at most.

"Clear them," I said, voice ringing with the cracking of ice.

"Stand down," the villain ordered.

I watched them sheathe their blades, and only then withdrew the weaving inside Abase. I strode past him without a second look, feeling myself slowly begin to thaw. I'd expected guilt, however slight. It never came.

"He is recovering," Scribe told me flatly. "You could have waited until tomorrow."

"That you would presume to dictate that even now," I said, "is why a decent man was just screaming. I've given you a bell. You have no right to expect more of me, not after what happened in Liesse."

"What happened is that he saved your life, child," Scribe coldly said. "A sentiment you grow less deserving of by the moment."

"Loyalty's a fine thing," I said. "Until it starts to blind you. Look around you, Scribe. Does it seem to you like anything was saved?"

"You have no notion of the sacrifices that were made for your sake," the woman said.

"You have no notion of the sacrifices I was forced to make," I replied. "This entire conversation is unnecessary. If I wanted him dead do you really think you could have stopped me?"

"Careful now," Scribe softly said. "That sounded like a threat."

"I assure you," I said just as softly. "If I ever threaten you, there'll be no doubt about what I'm doing. Get out of my way or take me to him, I don't care. But I'm going. Now."

I was past being scared of her, no matter the ice in her eyes. What I smelled off her in that moment was resentment, and just like that the pieces clicked. I laughed.

"He's ordered you to let me in, hasn't he?" I said.

"His judgement is impaired," she said.

"No," I said. "It really isn't. He just knows me a lot better than you."

I brushed past her and she did not try to block me. She kept pace in silence as I went deeper in, absently noting that the camp's layout was different from legion doctrine. His tent should have been in the centre but it was further back. I did not need a guide to feel that much. He was seated when I came in, Scribe at my heels. Plain trousers and a loose white shirt, leaning back on his seat before a table. No armour, no weapons save the knife at his hip.

"Catherine," he greeted me. "That will be all, Eudokia."

I felt her stiffen without turning.

"I am staying," she said.

"No," he gently replied. "You are not."

"I will not let you kill yourself on some orphan girl's sword, do you hear me?" she hissed. "We are better than this. You are better than this."

"I knew the likely consequences before acting," he said, smiling at her. "Go. Do not mourn me too long, if it comes to that."

"This is not how we end," Scribe insisted. "You promised, Amadeus, you-"

"Until the last step," he murmured. "I remember. We do not always get to choose where it happens, old friend."

He rose to his feet, slowly, and pulled her close. She did not struggle, and I was uncomfortable watching how closely she moulded herself against him as he embraced her. Black withdrew after a moment and kissed her brow.

"Everything ends," he whispered gently. "We have always known this."

He spoke something in a tongue I did not know and she replied in the same. The look she shot me before leaving was a thing of hatred, but she left regardless. I stayed silent and standing as Black seated himself again. After a moment, he unsheathed the knife at his hip and set it down on the table. Slowly, he turned the handle towards me.

"If that is the intent," he said, "let us not waste time."

He tugged at his collar, of all things, baring his neck. I sat across from him. I did not take the knife in hand, but neither did I tell him to sheathe it.

"I will ask questions," I said. "You will answer."

His lips quirked in amusement, and I felt like breaking his teeth.

"A trial," he mused. "Fitting, I suppose. Ask."

"When we planned my fight against Diabolist," I said. "I mentioned drawing her into Arcadia. You knew what would happen if I did."

And you didn't warn me, I left unsaid.

"Of three things you must be watchful, when assaulting the stronghold of a villain," he said. "A pivot, a trial..."

"And a monster," I completed. "So that really was your intention from the beginning. Getting me close and bound, so I'd get a clean shot at killing her when she flinched. It's why you went after her father from the onset."

"I was not confident in our breaching her defences otherwise," Black said. "Not without significant sorcerous support it was dubious would be available. Even getting you in that position was difficult."

"Our," I repeated. "That's the first untruth you spoke to me tonight. There was no our. You made a decision, and took a gamble that would have seen me enslaved or worse if it failed."

"I did," he admitted, without any frills. "And did so knowing you would see it as a breach of trust. Had you not pieced it together yourself, I would have told you afterwards."

His heartbeat did not change, but with him that meant less than nothing: he was the one who'd taught me to both use and fool that trick. He was also, I knew, one of the finest liars I had ever met. I'd once put quite a bit of faith in his old promise he would never lie to me, but that faith was running ragged these days. Would he lie, right now? There were ways more pleasing to me to frame his actions, if that was his intention. That he would have revealed his breach of trust to me after didn't change the fact that it had happened, and he'd know damn well how little of a difference it would mean to me. I was making me furious, having to look for deception in every sentence of a man I'd once been able to trust implicitly. He had robbed us both of that trust.

"You let me believe she took you prisoner," I said. "You had the means to warn me you weren't. Why didn't you?"

"In part because I was not certain you would be able to deceive her," he said. "In part because of the story you used to become Duchess of Moonless Nights. It was my understanding that if you slew Assassin while believing he was me, it would prevent the eventuality of a... repetition of pattern."

Patricide, he'd danced around saying. Even now neither of us were comfortable with the implications of the word.

"You shot yourself in the foot," I said. "No, not just that – you emptied a full godsdamned quiver. If you'd spoken to me about it, we might have found a different way to take care of that. But you didn't trust me, Black, and so here now we fucking are. The two of us with a knife between, and me having genuine reason to kill you."

"I believed at the time that it was an elegant solution," he said. "The arrogance of an old man, in retrospect. Cheating Creation is never quite so simple as one would prefer."

"There's a lot I can forgive you for," I said. "And did, though I shouldn't have. I even let go of the fact that you Spoke to me in Summerholm the once, after a few years. Made excuses for it, that I was under influence myself and making what could have been a costly mistake. But this... It's actually worse, you know. Before the battle even began, you were already treating me like a tool. Not an equal, not even an apprentice. A fucking tool."

"That is who I am," he told me honestly. "In the face of conflict, that will always be how I act. I will reduce all individuals involved to instruments, and seek what I consider the best outcome. I will not spare myself a distinction, though I do not consider this to improve the principle of the behaviour in the slightest."

And it didn't, I thought. It made no difference. I used to think it did, but there was nothing laudable about not particularly valuing your own life long with everyone else's. That just meant he was one of his own many victims. It was a sort of madness that seemed principled on the surface, until you saw it in action. Saw what it cost everyone around the madman. What admiration I'd once given this had just been fool's gold, the shine leant by an unbroken line of victories. Now that the break had come, only the ugliness of what it truly was remained. Black was, I could not longer deny, a fundamentally evil man. That he used practical and sometimes beneficial means to pursue his objectives in no way redeemed that. I was ashamed that this disappointed me, deep down, that I had expected more when he had been so honest about what he was from the beginning. Because to me, he had been charming. Kind, even loving in his own way. Yet a monster still. It was an effort not to reach for the knife.

"You disregarded every word I said, before wrecking the array," I said, tone surprisingly calm. "I made – Gods, you could almost call it a plea. To end the bleeding. To spare my people another war. You didn't even bother to answer."

He inclined his head in disagreement.

"I weighed it," he replied. "It did not tip the balance. I believed then, as I do now, that keeping the weapon was certain to ensure the destruction of the Empire at the hand of heroes. I still believe it a miscalculation on Malicia's part to assess that having it, even unused, would not lead to a crusade. It would not only ensure it but begin a story that makes victory effectively impossible. She did not account, you see, for the Bard. Without her existence, perhaps a peace would be feasible. With her being given this thread to use, however, I would think it likely we would all die within two years."

"You didn't either," I said. "Account for the Bard. She was there, right before you used your aspect. And she was smiling."

Of all I had to consider, that was maybe the only mark in his favour. That he was human, and he'd been wounded like a fox being hunted so he could be herded in the right trap at the right time. That he'd run into someone better at this than him, and we were all being made to pay the price for it.

"That," he said mildly, "is quite worrying. I did not think her capable of operating independently of a heroic band or Name. I have journals that include notes from my time in the Free Cities, as well as several other matters. They will be given to you."

"No," I said quietly. "I don't think so."

"I assure you," he said, "the contents are both accurate and useful."

I pushed back the chair and rose to my feet.

"The most arrogant thing you've said tonight, you didn't even bother to speak," I told him. "It's the assumption that I'm still your successor."

Black was not, for all his flaws, an unintelligent man.

"You are no longer the Squire," he said.

"There's not enough of the Name left for me to qualify," I said.

"Then," he began, and on his face surprise and fascination warred.

"I don't know yet," I smiled. "But I breathe easier knowing it's not something you anticipated. Because I know you. If I walk out of this room after slitting your throat, it's still part of your plan. I'd still be playing a part you set out for me."

Contingencies, I imagined, would see to the death of the Calamites. And I would left in an uneasy partnership with the Empress, preserving the legacy he had sought to build.

"There's a part of me right now that just wants to let you go," I said. "To call our slate clean. Debts paid for sparing your life. But that's now who I am. I'm not you either, tough, and I don't want to be."

I snatched the knife and lunged over the table, driving it into his belly. He let out a soft gasp, and then I twisted the blade.

"You'll live," I said. "But it'll scar. And whenever you look at that scar, I want you to remember tonight. The choice I'm giving you. Gods forgive me, but monster that you are I still love you."

I looked into his eyes, that pale green gaze that was always so unsettling.

"I am," I said, "going to build a better world. Even if I have to drag everyone into it kicking and screaming. So there's your choice, Black: either you make yourself into a man that deserves to live in that world, or you're just another corpse I step over on my way there."

I left the knife in him, stepped away, and paused by the edge of the tent on my way out.

"This should go without saying," I said. "But if you're still in my lands by the moon's turn, I'll put your fucking head on a pike."

A heartbeat passed and I smiled, the burden of years leaving my shoulders.

"Take care. I'll see you when the war comes."

Foxfire710

i have this theory that Black and the calamities were the instrument of the change and current form of the empire and Praesi but not it's true representative just the instigator of the change. Akua was the avatar of the old Stories and culture in an attempt to reassert power over the new empire. With these two things in mind now that the avatar of the old Praesi Akua has failed the power of the old ways has weakened and the new has proved its superiority. And with black the closest thing to a representative of the new stories is dying and with and a horde of powerful heroes gathering I believe a new named will appear with aspects that provide strength by following ways of the new empire and not like the named of old. I highly doubt it would be Catherine she has all but severed herself from the empire and did not share blacks ideals

greatwyrmgold

Akua is the thesis. Amadeus is the antithesis. Catherine, we hope, is the synthesis.

vexingvision

I really hope the final book in Cat's saga consists of her and her jolly band of adventurers traveling to new shores, fighting sea serpents and being mysterious.

Not going to happen, I know, but I hope she finds the glorious smart-arsed humanity inside of her again eventually.

That, or the final book is all about Robber. I'd be cool with that, too.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

But has she actually lost that glorious smart-arsed humanity of hers? Just a chapter ago she was bantering with Archer, remember. She's **in danger** of losing it, sure. I can imagine a day where puns are "pun"ishable by death 😊

But you don't need to go find something you already have.

Nethermore

Aah, I see now. I was kind of miffed over the last few chapters over Cat not getting a new name already. I interpreted it as the author being a tease, but ultimately the Blavk Queen was too predictable for Catherine Foundling to become. It all makes sense now.

Devin 0

Say, does anybody else think that A Practical Guide to Evil could be a kick ass setting for a tabletop RPG game? The natural small groups of characters with great ability to influence events around them seems like a natural fit for a tabletop group. Plus the way the universe naturally tries to adhere to narrative stories is very interesting and well suited to storytelling.

Thaddeus K

Yeah, I think so too. I've thought about the system for such a thing, and keep coming back to FATE.

Kizuna

Gee, you think? Lol.

I mean, it's basically ripped straight from FATE. The basic concept, at least.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

"Tall your tower may be, but what was raised by the hands of men can by those same hands be torn down."
– Queen Eleanor Fairfax of Callow

It sounds like a likely fatal error to assume the "hands of men" built much of the Tower

Devin 0

Have there been any varieties of devils yet that might make decent stone masons? I didn't really get that impression from any of them, they seemed to feral.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I wasn't necessarily thinking of devils specifically, but I don't see why that wouldn't work. Some devils can build and maintain their own weaponry, after all, so clearly there's a spectrum of ability.

Perihelion

But was Bard smiling because of the castle? Or because of the wedge it would drive between Black and Cat?

Barthumphries

Don't think anyone else has mentioned this, but she did just kill her father. Her mentor, the one who chose her, guided her, set her up with everything, she's now cut ties with.

ayew

just reread this and want to point out that i ship cat and archer platonically so hard. its the cutest/3rd scariest friendship of all time.

Isa Lumitus

You know, I kind of like the narrative symmetry here. Black stabbed Cat, and gave her his old Name. Now Cat stabbed Black and refused his current Name.

Mental Mouse

And this will have effects on Black as well...

Kizuna

Phew. That was a tough read. Not because of quality, just what happened.

Kizuna

Also, what's the deal with Archer obtaining the Cylinder from Liesse? Didn't Thief already get that and "stow" it?

Arfoire

It is a facade created by Cat and Vivienne to fool the rest that Cat didn't retrieve Akua's soul from her body.

Christian Oaks

No the soul she took first was that of a newborn baby which was akua's contingency plan.

Aotrs Commander

*facepalm*

*sigh*

Well. It was most fun while it lasted, but this third book, was, I felt, not as good as first two. (I mean, considering how much I was loving those, that's not a hugely damning statement, but true nonetheless.) I fear at this rate, all Cat will manage in the end is to become the next Dread Empress in everything but name, and anything she achieves will be undone the moment she stops.

Since it pretty much seems at this point, she's not gaining any new allies, just fear or leverage controlled minions (because that's not absolutely typical Old Evil standards...), while slowly but systematically burning through her her current allies.

Bard and the Gods Above must be laughing SO DAMN HARD about now.

So, let's see how things go from here...

ninegardens

So... did Cat just Brand Black... because this looks a hell of a lot like how she branded William, and that worked pretty much exactly as stated...

aran

Black, knowing that by renouncing him as her mentor Catherine just canceled his death flag: Just. As. Planned.

308924810a

Sooo @erraticerrata What the heck happened to these new ex-praesides Gallowborne?

As far as I can figure out the unit isn't mentioned again after this point.

Christian Oaks

Presumably spent in her many wars kept distanced from herself so she would not grow to care for them

vuthuha912

Despite thinking that Black's decision in the throne room is a good decision and thinking that his plan is a good plan, he not telling Cat about it and using her like a tool, even if it is for her benefit (he fed her the victory), is still a break of trust and the reason why I don't really subscribe to the end justifies the mean thing. If you use the philosophy to the extreme, it will erode trust and cooperation between everybody in society and society will collapse. There are times for harsh and ruthless measures but one should never be too willing to use them while other better options to achieve the same result are on the table. Obviously, it will be difficult to decide when it is time to use it.

In Black POV, Cat is his subordinate and apprentice and while he is still capable of trusting his subordinate and he will when it is their specialties, in this case, he might not think that it is necessary to get her opinion. I mean this is Akua – an obvious Stupid Evil and plans involving taking her down are meant to succeed. His other friend trusts him enough to know that he won't put them in danger, they let him do the planning and they follow his plan blindly. He is treating her the same way he treats the Calamities. He should be treating her like how he treats Malicia.

I do believe that a great ruler needs to be willing to dirty his hands to actually achieve anything worthwhile but they should also be one who can inspire, nurture, forgive, and be just. The base of a nation should always be good and good actions should be encouraged if it wants to last more than a decade. Morals and good are not something useless, they are meant to keep society moving. It is hard to dip your toes in evil but don't let it submerge you and Black obviously falls to it, not completely but more than needed.

It is interesting, isn't it? Black is quite charming and lovable but he is not really good at understanding emotions. He misses how much his death affects the Calamities, he misses how much all his friends love him, and most damagingly, he misses how much Cat loves him. If she didn't love him, she might even let the whole thing go since she won't be expecting him to care for her opinions (she did ultimately benefits from his decisions and he never tried to harm her) or she might just kill him. But she does love him, and that is why the betrayals of trust hurt so much, she wants to trust him and she wants him to trust her. Even after the betrayal of trust, she still forgives him and finds a way to save his life. He must think that after that break of trust, she will kill him. Is it because he is a Villain and a Praes that it never occurs to him that other people's love for him is more than skin deep and they are willing to do a lot of things to keep him alive? He loves them but never thinks that they love him back just as deeply? *Sigh~~~* Quite selfless of him.

Epilogue

"You who pass this gate, know yourself beyond hope."

– Written above the gates of Keter, earthly seat of the Dead King

He would not speak to her until he was no longer in a vulnerable position. Alaya had known this because she knew the man, how his mind functioned. Amadeus did not treat from position of weakness. Her Black Knight arrived a few days earlier than anticipated at the Red Flower Vales, taking refuge with the loyal legions that garrisoned it in the face of Procer. The empress had found a degree of dark amusement in the way that Catherine Foundling's armies now lay between the armed forces most loyal to the two most powerful villains of Praes. Almost like a matron breaking up a childish squabble between her wards. As always, the girl thought the worst of them. A civil war would not have been an acceptable outcome even if had a crusade not been in the making. The coming struggle would be steep enough without wasting soldiers in settling a matter best addressed privately. The current assessment of the younger villain's loyalties was growing clearer with every movement she made in the absence of instructions from the Tower, and the picture painted was not promising.

The remains of two legions had been suborned to the insolently named Army of Callow, followed by the announcement of large-scale recruitment across the kingdom. The girl's return to Laure had been followed by an energetic centralization of power around the yet-unbestowed crown, though it seemed she had learned from her previous blunder. A bureaucracy was forcefully being assembled by drafting any remotely competent Callowan and withdrawing talents from the Fifteenth. Given the girl's propensity for charging at the first battlefield in sight, the power would effectively be wielded by Baroness Anne Kendal over the next few years. A former rebel with close ties to the House of Light and the last remnants of Callowan aristocracy. In the optic of consolidation of power within the kingdom, it was not a blunder. From the greater understanding of Callow within the Empire, it was a warning sign. A cohesive power bloc capable of ruling was being formed in Laure, one with bone-deep enmity towards the East.

That the Duchy of Daoine seemed to have turned into one of the crown's backers was also worth a second look. It was a well-positioned source of manpower with hard borders and a history of resisting Praesi rule. The girl would need to squeeze the northern baronies for coin, however, or risk leaving the upset south in the lurch. An angle to use, if necessary. If it came to rebellion, further partition of Callow was now a feasible solution. When the south had been bound together by noble rule and marriage alliances it would have been a misstep, the seed of a rebellious Kingdom of Liesse being sown, but now that the city was wrecked and the aristocracy decapitated matters had changed. A southern vassal state dependent on Tower subsidies to recover would remain largely tranquil. It was what had once been the calm centre of Callow that was now trouble, the cities built by the shores of the Silver Lake. Large urban populations, strategic trade location and now a fledgling bureaucracy indebted to the crown made them the beating heart of Catherine's power within Callow. Alaya had stayed her hand, for the moment. Killing the girl would ignite country-wide rebellion and besides she had yet to overstep the tentative terms reached in Liesse. Pressure could be applied through the promised reparations and the precarious western border.

Which was not in the empress's hand at the moment, strictly speaking, but in those of her Black Knight. One of several matters in need of settling. Alaya thought of the raised hand, the word spoken that had undone over a decade of careful planning, and grew cold. Dread Empress Malicia set the unnecessary emotional spasm aside. A mistake had been made, in placing blind trust. The extent that leaning should ever be indulged was in trusting individuals to act according to their nature. Anything more than that was asinine sentiment, a weakness on her part. When the mirror flickered with life, she was awaiting it. Dressed blood red, a sprawling dress with long sleeves and a neckline that was more suggestive than revealing. The golden circlet on her brow was almost an unnecessary touch – the dress alone would be enough for Amadeus to understand that it was the Dread Empress of Praes that had given audience, not Alaya. The silver mirror revealed the sight of a man unarmoured. A loose white shirt did not quite cover the sight of bandages covering his abdomen, but the pale green eyes were as sharp as she had ever seen them. Alaya felt a surge of fury. It was the Empress that had given audience, but it was Amadeus that had come.

"You are wounded," she said, smoothing away the emotion.

"So I am," the man agreed, tone almost amused. "It has been a year of sharp lessons, and this one sharper than most."

"The girl," Malicia said, and it was not a question.

Even now, after it all, the fury returned. Not directed at him but at the arrogant child who dared believe she had even the shadow of a claim on her Black Knight's life. In this, she had overstepped. Catherine Foundling had never been properly taught the precarity of her position.

"A point," Black said, "on the nature of trust. How that blade cuts both ways."

"She has earned no trust," Malicia coldly said. "The ability to kill is the grace of a killer, not a qualification to rule. Whatever measures she now takes are no erasure of past failures."

"Yet I wonder," the man mused. "Regardless, she is not the reason for this audience. The matter is best set aside for now."

"Is it?" the Empress said, voice smooth as silk. "Your wayward apprentice raises armies and appoints officials loyal to only her. The matter is not to be dismissed as a mere detail. It is a pressing reality, and a liability in the making."

"I had hoped," Black said, "to avoid the losing game that is the attribution of fault. That line of conversation would ensure otherwise."

The unspoken read thus: her loyalties were shaken by the Diabolist's massacre, and it was your inaction that allowed this to unfold.

"I have always known fault to be as much a matter of nature as opportunity," Malicia replied.

The unspoken read thus: you gifted great power to a nobody and never bothered to instil loyalty more than skin deep, this was inevitable.

Black sighed.

"Do you not find it tiresome?" he said. "To leave so much within the margins?"

Malicia's face was a frozen mask of disdain.

"You have lost the right to make that request," Alaya said.

"Shall we speak of trust, then, my Empress?" Black softly replied. "I am not without words to offer on that subject."

Guilt never came. She would not apologize for taking measures preventing him from throwing away his life in a hopeless war, however slighted he felt by the truth that he had become a foe to his own survival. That was on his own head. Not even love would make her neck if she was in the right.

"Warlock agrees that the weapon should have been kept untouched," Malicia said, and there was a part of her that enjoyed the flicker of dismay on Black's face.

"Wekesa would eat every child in Callow if it allowed him to research without interruptions," he replied. "That endorsement rings empty."

It was also first blood. He was not, she knew, plotting to seize the Tower from her. But the knowledge that if he had the Warlock would not have stood at his side was a crack in the certainty that lay at the heart of him. What she need break to salvage even shards of what they had once been.

"And who whispers agreement in your ear, Black?" the Empress asked. "Scribe? If you slit her own throat she would assume you had reason. She has made a virtue of being a tool."

It was not a mistake to have spoken that, though Alaya regretted the sharpness of the words. But Malicia knew that the cruelty was necessary to lower the worth of the unconditional support in his eyes. The Duni's face grew cold, the first stirrings of anger.

"You speak of matters you understand precious little," he said. "There is no part of you that does not come with condition."

Malicia met his eyes with equanimity. Alaya flinched at the old whisper spoken aloud. Black tiredly passed a hand through his air.

"I should not have said that," he said, the threshold of an apology.

"You rarely speak without meaning," the Empress said, refusing the crossing.

Something passed in the man's eyes she could not put a word to, and that was a rare thing.

"We were better than this, once," Amadeus said.

"Were we?" Malicia wondered. "Forty years, and never once did we cease dancing around that single truth."

Her eyes went hooded.

"There is only one throne in this empire," the Empress said. "You are not sitting on it. There is a reason for that."

"Emperesses who thought crown meant right have often reigned, in Praes," the Black Knight said. "Rarely, I remember, for long. A mould unbroken ever only makes one thing."

"Don't you speak to me of making," Alaya hissed. "Twenty years you made Callow your playground, only ever returning to take lives and let me clean up the messes while you gallivanted back. You only ever remember the necessities of rule when they get in the way of your games. You make plans without ever bothering with the actual people, writing them off as liabilities to dispose of if they do not immediately obey. Praes is not an essay. You cannot unmake everything of it because it strikes you as inconvenient."

"It is worse than inconvenient," Black said. "It is flawed. The Wasteland has made a religion out of mutilating itself. We speak of it with pride. Gods, iron sharpens iron? We have grown so enamoured with bleeding our own we have sayings about it. Centuries ago, field sacrifices were a way to fend off starvation. Now they are a staple of our way of life, so deeply ingrained we cling to them given alternative. Alaya, we consistently blunder so badly we need to rely on demons to stay off destruction. We would rather irreparably damage the fabric of Creation than admit we can be wrong. There is nothing holy about our culture, it needs to be ripped out root and stem as matter of bare survival. Forty years I have been trying to prove success can be achieved without utter raving madness, and what comes at the end?"

His tone grew harsh.

"The only person I ever thought actually understood this put her seal to the destruction of two decades of gruelling work to acquire a fucking magic fortress," he hissed. "Some godsdamned throwback from the Age of Wonders that will go down in flames and take the Empire with it."

"Your way," Malicia coldly said, "is insufficient."

Now that he'd opened his wound, she could bare her own.

"The Legions will fail," she said. "The Calamities will fail. Your ramshackle effort at successors will fail. Did you think that just because you were clever, just because it was hard, it would be enough? We took Callow, Black. We put chalk to the slate. The Heavens will throw crusade after crusade at us until the mark made is erased, because we are not allowed to win that fight. The only way to survive is not to fight at all, and for that I needed a tool."

Malicia stood ramrod straight.

"A hundred thousand dead?" she said. "I would bleed thrice that number without batting an eye, because without the tool we lose. We break, we end, we come at an end. I warned you off Akua Sahelian because she provided what I needed: a strong enough deterrent to keep the wolves at bay. And I did this behind your back, because if I did not you would have gotten in my way. Because you have fallen in love with your own legend. The Black Knight, undefeated. How far is that from invincible, Amadeus? Shall we talk history on that subject?"

"This makes us a leech," Black replied coldly. "And that is exactly how we lose. If we are a net drain, we are removed. That is a fact. There is no keeping Callow if by the sheer act of keeping it we foster constant rebellion. And if we lose Callow, it all comes down on our heads."

"We have already lost Callow," Malicia replied harshly, "and three legions with it, all thrown into the lap of some fucking orphan girl because you thought you could be cleverer than Fate. Do you truly not realize that the terms of the occupation both failed to pacify Callowans and fostered unrest in the Wasteland? One does not conquer an entire kingdom to grant it effective independence twenty years down the line, Black. We were meant to profit from it."

"They were meant to profit from it, were they?" he said. "After fighting tooth and nail against every measure that made is possible, they still deserve spoils because – what, they were born to that privilege? That they were even spared was a concession. But they were allowed to grow fat off a conquest they actively hindered. I held my tongue because you used their rapaciousness for your own purposes, but oh what a mistake that was. The point isn't to make Callow a pack of plundered provinces, it has never been that. It's to ensure we never again destroy ourselves invading that country. Are we so enamoured with that kingdom's crown we cannot allow anyone else to wear it? We win by slipping the noose, not moving the border. By breaking the pattern that has whipped us ever since Maleficent made an empire out of Praes. It is irrelevant who actually rules Callow so long as we no longer need to invade to avoid starving. From that moment on, we start to grow. To change. To be anything but a snake cursed to eat its own tail and choke. Anything less than that is defeat. Anything more than that is expendable."

He was panting, after. A sac of venom decades in the swelling finally emptied.

"There have been bad nights, since I took the throne," Alaya said. "Nights where I wondered if it would not have been better had you become Emperor and I your Chancellor. You have laid those fear to rest. This, this is why you cannot rule. Because you're not interested in ruling Praes, only in securing a war camp for your pissing match with the Heavens. You cannot butcher your way into having a different homeland, Black. It's a pretty plan you laid out. But you are not the only living man in Praes, and so it fails. Because the Empire is not an instrument, it is a nation and that nation wants things. It will not docilely wait until your point is made."

"Enough," Black said. "Gods, enough. There comes a time where the wound is no lanced, just bled."

"Agreed," Malicia said. "There will be no further argument. You have made a mess, and as always I will clean it up. You remain in command as my Black Knight. You will hold the border as best you can, and rein in your apprentice as necessary. As for me, I will take the measures necessary for survival. You will not approve of them. I no longer care."

The Empress would have ended it there, but Alaya could not.

"We will survive," she said. "And when the danger has passed, as much as it ever can, you will come home. I will not throw you away, Maddie. We are not beyond mending."

He smiled, ruefully.

"Can you feel it, Allie?" he asked.

The Empress frowned.

"It's quiet," he said. "Subtle. I suppose it always starts out that way, when one loses control."

"The Tower will not fall," Malicia said.

"It may not," he said. "I genuinely don't know. For the first time in decades, Alaya, I don't know."

He laughed.

"It's strangely invigorating," he said. "To have every plan you ever made ripped apart. Do you remember what it was like, when we were young? When we still felt wonder?"

"Black, you are worrying me," she said.

"Your terms are accepted," Amadeus said. "Not that there was any doubt. I will come home, in the end.""

He looked away, and strangely smiled.

"I wonder what it would look like," he murmured. "A better world."

The mirror darkened. Alaya went still, something like grief but deeper than the word could ever mean taking hold of her. Dread Empress Malicia rose to her feet.

There was no rest, the old saying went, for the wicked.

Brandon Talbot had only stood in the throne room once before as a child, when King Robert still ruled and his aunt had introduced him to the royal court. He'd been so young he barely remembered any of it, and in those days he had been of precious little import. Aunt Elizabeth was to be engaged to the Shining Prince, so he'd warranted an official introduction but nothing else. In those days there had been no talk of him ever becoming Count of Marchford. The union of Elizabeth Talbot and King Robert's eldest son had been expected to be fruitful, leaving him only the head of a cadet branch meant for knighthood and little else. How strangely the world spun, that he now stood at the side of the Queen of Callow instead of kneeling with the guests. Those he had to share that distinction with were, admittedly, something of a mixed bag. None could deny that Baroness Anne Kendall was a patriot and a woman of great wisdom, and though her surrender in the wake of the Liesse Rebellion had lowered her esteem in the eyes of some he did not share those misgivings. The Governess-General, he knew, was nearly as influential as the queen in some parts. If not more. Chancellor in all but Name, men whispered. Queen Catherine's open fondness for the baroness had been taken by many a sign she was not determined to wage war to the bitter end on the aristocracy.

At the baroness' side stood the argument for the opposite belief, the newly-appointed Marshal of Callow. The title left him a strange taste in the mouth. There had never been any man or woman titled such in the history of the kingdom, as supreme command of the hosts was always held by the royal family or the paladins of the White Hand. It was a Praesi title and not even an old one, created during the Reforms. That a greenskin not even twenty-five was now second only to the queen in the command of Callow's armies had been oft commented upon, and openly mocked in the north. Popular sentiment, though, had not been incensed. The 'Hellhound' had no small place in the legends already being peddled of the Arcadian War and Akua's Folly. The orc was seen as the second coming of the still-feared Grem One-Eye, and one that had proved it would protect the innocent even in the face of the hordes of Hell. Brandon was no fool, and so had never tried to speak against the appointment. The heart of the Army of Callow was still the Fifteenth, and it would be months before any of his countrymen rose to true positions of influence in those massively expanded ranks.

To the queen's right was the same man as always, that tower of burnt steel and fangs that was Hakram Deadhand. The Adjutant. Even when the old crowd spoke of the unseemly predominance of orcs in Queen Catherine's court over cups of brandy, there were few who dared slight this one. The skeletal hand of the Named was said to snatch the life out of fae and mortals alike, the steel of his axe gone stark red for all the blood he'd spilled with it. Grandmaster Talbot had spoken with him occasionally while on campaign and more often now that precarious peace was restored, and found him both personable and polite. More dangerously, he was also very attentive to details the queen was known to have little patience for – though in truth Brandon had judged her not nearly as disinterested as the rumours implied. The Deadhand had taken to building the kingdom's court with the same savage enthusiasm his forebears had displayed raiding Callowan farmland: the new offices overseeing the nation's granaries and treasury had been highly unpopular with the aristocracy at first, but their undeniable efficiency in mending the south had done much to quiet the grumbling. The Grandmaster was one of the few of his people high enough in rank to understand what was being built, though. A war machine unlike any he had ever seen. Callow was being put on war footing long before the first blade left the sheath.

There was a reason the Order of the Broken Bell had been charged with recruiting every youth in the kingdom that could swing a blade and ride a horse.

The last man to share the queen's side was the only he could muster true dislike for. Hasan Qara, who for some godforsaken reason insisted on being called Ratface, had been named Lord Treasurer of Callow after resigning his commission from the Fifteenth Legion. The Taghreb was said to be some Wasteland lordling's bastard, though bastardy was considered a lesser taint in the East. He was also, as far as Grandmaster Talbot was concerned, a crook and a criminal. His lordly title remained a pure courtesy one, at least, without any lands attached. It was still a bloody disgrace that a Peer of the Realm would meet with the likes of smugglers and hedges mages in broad daylight. The Bastard Lord, as some already called him, had begun what he termed a 'much-needed reform of the hellish nightmare that is Callowan tax collection'. That governors no longer paid taxes directly to the Tower or even the short-lived Ruling Council had thrown the old system into disarray, every governor and noble trying to short-change the crown whenever they could. Lord Qara's taxmen and their Legion escorts were already a dreaded sight, and the complicated maze of exemptions and tariffs he'd had the queen put her seal to always seemed to have her allies come out wealthier and her enemies poorer. He was clever, Brandon disdainfully thought, but in the way Taghreb usurers so often were.

As the admittedly tedious ceremony chugged on towards the moment of proper coronation, Brandon turned his eyes to the crowd that stood witness. Baron Darlington of Hedges and Baroness Morley of Harrow were of the highest rank among those, surrounded by kin and lickspittles. Both, he'd been told, had declined the queen's invitation to her coronation by telling her envoys their health would not allow them the journey. The second envoys she had sent came with a minstrel, and as the tune of the Lord's Lament played in their halls the nobles had reconsidered their refusal. The pointed reminder that Queen Catherine was not above having even royalty shot when it suited her had struck true. The last landed nobles of Callow had faces too solemn to be truly pleased of being in attendance, but rumours of the crown's young reforms had seen them hurry south so they would not be made to feel the sting of disobedience through their coffers. As far as nobility went, the only others worth the note were the envoys of Duchess Kegan of Daoine.

That the ruler of the last duchy in Callow had sent her own eldest son and high-ranking officer of the Watch to attend had rightly been seen by many as endorsement of the queen's reign by the Deoraithe. Ties had been made there, Grandmaster Talbot thought, that he knew little about. Inquiries were in order. The queen had yet to appoint a Chamberlain for her household or a Keeper of the Seals to have her decrees upheld and her courts of law put to order, after all. It was no certainty that Queen Catherine the First would keep all the seats of the old King's Council, but if she did Brandon intended on seeing the remaining seats filled with proper Callowans, not Daoine interlopers. Neither did it escape his notice that Kegan's son was a handsome lad, not much older than the still-unmarried queen. Another matter to ensure never came to fruition, though he could hardly blame her for trying. He had himself ensured that his representatives at court were well-bred young men and women of comely appearance, merely to have that avenue... open, should it take the queen's fancy.

The rest of the guests in attendance were the representatives of governors and guilds, as well as every elderman in Laure. Brandon had expected trouble when their ancient prerogatives inside the city began being taken over by the crown, but the Deadhand was a clever sort. They'd been offered appointments in the new offices, and with enough accepting their influence came to benefit the reforms instead of being plied against them. They stood there with awe befitting commoners being allowed to witness the birth of a dynasty, however fragile its line of succession. As the sister sent by the House of Light finally ended her droning and recitation of old phrases, Queen Catherine bent her head to accept her crown – though, in all honesty, given her height she had not strictly speaking needed to do so. Eyes flicking to the crown, Brandon grimly smiled. No gold or jewels in this one. It was a jagged circlet of iron that sat heavy on her brow. A warlike crown for a warlike queen. The old regalia of House Fairfax would not see use again, the cloak of black and patchwork that Queen Catherine wore a dark replacement for the old ermine-bordered mantle of the Fairfaxes. Rumours had spread that Akua Sahelian's own soul had been added to the banners of the defeated, that the Wastelander witch could be heard screaming in torment if one listened closely enough.

A saying was born of it that had Grandmaster Talbot shivering every time he heard the words: crowned by dread and cloaked by woe.

"Before you stands the ordained Queen of Callow," the sister said. "Kneel."

One after another, they did. Only standing by the throne like him were spared that, as Catherine Foundling slowly sat the ancient throne of the kingdom. Brandon was not the first to notice – he first saw when he followed the queen's gaze, the raised eyebrow on her cold face. It was difficult to tell how many there were. A few dozens? Less than a hundred, surely. Brandon had fought their like before, but their garments were no longer the same. On unearthly steeds of every shade the fae rode through the hall, the Fair Folk as terrible and beautiful as they'd always been. Brandon found he could not look away from the fae at their head. Riding a horse of ebony, the man was soberly dressed for his kind. A simple tunic, though the buttons seemed made of shade, and over a pale and narrow face a black silken blindfold covered an eye. There was a sword at his hip, without a sheath, and even looking at it hurt the knight's eyes. It was that one the queen addresses.

"The Prince of Nightfall," she drawled. "An unexpected... well, pleasure's a strong word."

The procession of fae ended when the prince reined in his mount before the queen, inclining his head in respectful greeting.

"Prince no longer," the fae smiled. "I have abdicated my title, as have all with me. The Hunt claims no lord amongst its hunters."

Brandon's breath hitched. The Hunt. Was he speaking of the Wild Hunt? The rapacious fairies that made sport of mortals fools enough to wander into the Waning Woods, or walk ancient mounds under pale moonlight.

"Should I call you Larat, then?" the Queen mused, and her voice echoed with something eldritch when she spoke the name. "Why do you darken my hall, Nightfall?"

"Do we not stand before a queen, forged of Winter?" the fae asked.

"I paid the price for that, thrice over," Catherine Foundling said. "If you think the mantle can be taken back, we're about to have a conversation on the subject of fatal mistakes."

The fae laughed, and it was like the tinkle of silver bells.

"You mistake me," he said, and his sword rose.

It clattered against the stone, laid at the feet of the queen. One after another the fae passed and threw their own blade, a pile of death rising. Brandon Talbot was living a fever dream, witness to a scene ripped straight from legend. It was all too vivid to be real.

"We swear to your service, Queen of the Hunt," the fae said. "Queen of Air and Darkness, Sovereign of Moonless Nights. We swear 'til the day of last ruin, 'til all debts are paid. We would ride beneath your banner, in this world and every other."

The Queen of Callow rose to her feet, as bright and terrible as any of them, and softly laughed.

"What clever foxes you are," she said. "Your oaths I accept, in the spirit they were given."

Her sword hissed as it left the sheath, and she stood before the fae.

"Kneel, and rise in my service."

The Hunt knelt, the Hunt rose, and Brandon Talbot knew he would never forget the sight of this so long as he lived.

A crusade, Cordelia Hasenbach thought, should be decided in a manner grander than this. There would be speeches in the coming months, every herald in Procer and beyond speaking the writ of the Mandate of Heaven handed down to the children of the Gods. Spreading the call to the Tenth Crusade wherever there were ears to hear it. The First Prince herself would address the Highest Assembly on the morrow's eve, giving an oration she had first prepared years ago. The motion would not warrant a vote from the Assembly, though she knew it would pass should it presented. By tradition only the highest office in the Principate could call for a crusade, though it would be an empty thing if no other nation joined their voice to it. Procer had fought crusades alone before, but every one a disaster. She would not repeat that mistake. The young woman had dedicated the span of her life to ensuring it would never be made again. For all the pageantry that was to come, the Tenth Crusade was born in one of the lesser halls of the palace in Salia, with barely a dozen people seated at the table.

For Procer, only she and Uncle Klaus were present. The Prince of Hannover had not been granted seat as a prince but as the future commander of Procer's armies in the campaign to come. The grizzled old soldiers had spent more time drinking mead than speaking, so far, save when matters military were raised. Assurances had been needed that the Principate's armies were readied for war, no matter how righteous the cause or urgent the need. The Thalassocracy of Ashur had sent three representatives only, members in good standing of their foremost War Committee. Citizens of the Fourth tier one and all, most of which would take command of Ashur's fleets when the hostilities began. Their very presence had been leverage for Cordelia to use, a gift from Magon Hadast. The only citizen of the Second tier in all of Ashur had not sent diplomats but soldiers, the agreement to join the crusade implicit to that decision. The envoys, after all, would not have leave to negotiate diplomatic matters. Only those pertaining to war.

The Dominion of Levant had sent the most envoys, in her judgement a consequence of its ever-fractious people. The current Seljun, the figurehead ruler of the Dominion, had officially deferred the decision of whether or not to join the Tenth Crusade to the Majilis. Though literature often drew comparison between the Highest Assembly and the Majilis, for they were both councils composed of the highest nobility in their respective nations, Cordelia had never found much similarity beyond the surface trappings. The Levantine council was a toothless and ineffectual beast, with every lord and lady among it having right of veto and every interest in ensuring power was never centralized within the Dominion lest their own privileges be curbed. Princess Eliza of Salamans had fought two wars and died an attainted traitor to ensure the Highest Assembly would never be such a plague on Procer, or the First Prince relegated to being little more than a first among equals. As it was, the entire Majilis had come to Salia to treat with her. The five lords and ladies of Levant, all descended from heroes. Cordelia's agents suspected every one of them had applied veto if a smaller delegation did not involve them personally, and she was inclined to believe it.

They only ever ceased their squabbles when they perceived her to be high-handed, the old and well-deserved hatred of her people the true mortar that kept their nation together. They had been the most difficult to speak with, ever looking for slight or arrogance in every sentence of hers. It was for the best Uncle Klaus had spoken little, given his mild contempt for a nation he liked to say existed only because the Thalassocracy willed it so. This was, to an extent, true. Some of Cordelia's predecessors would have waged war upon war to claim the lands, had Ashuran fleets not made seaborne invasion of Procer's old principalities a fool's errand to attempt. It was still less than courteous to say as much, and the Levantines had easily ruffled feathers when the hands involved were Proceran. Invitations had been sent to the Titanomachy through the Dominion, as the Gigantes killed on sight even diplomats of Procer, but the giants had declined to send even an observer. Their borders would remain closed, it seemed, no matter how dire the threats to the east. Cordelia had ruled for too long to be disappointed by the confirmation of her fatalism. That bridge had been burned too thoroughly to be rebuilt, even several centuries after the betrayal known as the Humbling of Titans.

The Gigantes had long memories.

The elves of the Golden Bloom greeted visitors with arrows if they were not heroes, and were said to have removed their domain from Creation besides. Even were it otherwise, Cordelia would not have sought them out. They had never joined their number to any of the crusades, and their inclusion in the Tenth would have had stark diplomatic consequences when it came to dealing with the Duchy of Daoine. Entrenching opposition in Callow would be needlessly costly for what the Hasenbach desired to be a war fought mostly in Praes itself. Popular sentiment in Callow was rather difficult to read, these days, but they were a people of long grudges who had never quite forgiven their occupation by the Principate. Should foreign soldiers fight over their fields for too long, there was no telling if the Callowans would turn on the crusaders.

Still, it was the League of Free Cities that troubled Cordelia. She'd come so very close to securing a truce and south-eastern border with it, until the Tyrant of Helike began his war. Even that had been an acceptable outcome, if she was to be honest. After the initial victory of Helikean forces over Atalante and the brutally effective Praesi intervention that took Penthes out of the war, heroes had created a deadlock over the siege of Delos without easy resolution. Though the loss of life involved was regrettable, it had given Cordelia opportunity to exhaust the strength of a dangerous element outside her borders by funding and arming Nicae. She'd even lightened the burden of restless soldiery within her realm by sending a few thousand into the war. She had believed Helike triumphant and ruling the League to be the worst possible outcome, and so when the forces of the Tyrant and the Magisterium moved against Nicae she had considered direct intervention. That a Hierarch would be elected in the wake of the city's fall had been beyond her predictions, and more worryingly the Augur's as well. Now no ruler in the region would treat with her, even privately, as usurping the Hierarch's prerogative might see the rest of the League turn on them.

Attempts to begin diplomatic correspondence with the man himself had been utterly ineffective. That her agents reported Anaxares of Bellerophon to be a long-serving diplomat, even if one in the service of an Evil polity, had been a promising beginning. Yet the man had put every missive she sent to the flame, and had reportedly been personally offended when her envoys tried to speak with him in person. Whether or not the Hierarch was the puppet of the ruler of Helike had yet to be determined, but the head of the League seemed disinclined to rein his member-states. Or even speak of the matter. Perhaps the only redemption of the situation there was to be had was that the Hierarch had not spoken in the favour of war, and his absence of a grip on the cities meant it was unlikely a unified League would march against her. It was still a liability. Her uncle had made it plain that at least twenty thousand men would have to be left south to discourage incursions from the Free Cities while the crusade was being fought. A loss, she would admit, but not a crippling one. Ashur and Levant would both contribute much larger hosts to the war when they gathered their strength.

"Late spring at the earliest," Lady Itima of Vaccei announced. "But we will march, First Prince. All of us. There can be no other choice."

Set on the table before all the representatives were two reports from her agents in Callow, speaking of the same city. Liesse, though it had been ripped from its ancient grounds and dragged across the kingdom. The first report detailed what sparse information she had been able to gather about these strange undead the Diabolist had been able to make. Wights, the Praesi called them. One had even been obtained and smuggled across the border, and examinations by wizards had established the alchemical nature of the transition into undeath. The Empire had unveiled two weapons through their civil war, and though this was the subtlest of the two it was perhaps also the most terrifying. If all the Empire needed to sow undeath was access to a city's cisterns, none of them were safe. The Empress' reputation for having a large and extremely effective web of spies had cost her dearly in this. A less demonstrably far-reaching ruler would not have seemed so immediate a threat. The other report held mostly technical notes, but it was the sheet of parchment with the drawing that had truly stuck a blow. The sight of the city of Liesse with a mass of dead above it, and the Greater Breach the weapon had opened on a Callowan field.

A Hellgate, and not a passing one. Gods, Cordelia had known there was great madness waiting in the east but even she had underestimated the depth. No crusade had ever managed to land even a glancing blow on the Hellgate that lay within the depths of Keter. It alone had been enough to maintain the terrible grip of the Dead King for untold centuries even with entire battalions of heroes failing to end him. The thought of the Tower with the ability to create Hellgates at will was enough to put a shiver up anyone's spine. She'd been open about the weapon being either damaged or destroyed during the civil war, the truth of that was still uncertain, but she'd not even had to raise the notion of it being possible to repair herself. The Levantines had done so without prompting, and pressed for a dismantling of the Empire to ensure it would never be capable of making the likes of it again.

"As for the charter you proposed, we are in agreement as well," the lord of Tartessos said. "It will require the signature of the Seljun to be binding, but the Majilis can provisionally ratify it. Your... appreciation of our concerns has been noted, and does you honour."

Cordelia was very careful not to let the triumph show in her eyes. This was the true victory she had won today, the founding of her Grand Alliance. Though it had been presented as a council of nations participating in the Tenth Crusade that could adjudicate internal disputes, there was no clause forcing the alliance to end after Praes was laid low. Years of diplomacy had finally borne fruit. The treaties would prevent Procer from attempting to expand into the Dominion again long after she died, and with this foundation she could forge ever closer ties over the length of her reign. With the three great powers of the west so aligned, the Principate's attention could be turned to the true enemies. The Chain of Hunger. The Kingdom of the Dead. The Everdark. The treaties were not even a pale shadow of those that bound together the League of Free Cities, but they could be built on. They would be.

Cordelia knew she would not see the continent know true peace in her lifetime, but she could lay the foundations for those that would come after her.

The envoys were entertained for refreshments after the negotiations closed, yet the First Prince did not linger overlong. She had spoken to the Augur, last night, and been given prophecy. Fortune comes to you unannounced, her cousin had whispered. You may yet grasp it. Some of the White Knight's band had survived the struggle against the Calamities in the Free Cities, and were said to be heading for Salia with the man himself. Crusades, Cordelia knew, were a call few heroes let pass them by. Though no formal declaration had yet been made, the ways of Named were not easily understood. The Heavens may have whispered secrets in their ears, as they did the Augur. The flaxen-haired prince dismissed her attendants after retiring to her rooms, unweaving her braid herself. She was not unaware that it softened her features when unbound, and though she knew she was no great beauty she could sometimes pass as one with the right ministrations. She did not hear the window open, and was frowning at letter from the Princess of Tenerife when someone cleared their throat.

Cordelia froze. It was a woman. Short of hair, pale of skin with blue-grey eyes. Her leathers were loose over a slender frame. Callowan, the First Prince thought. She has the look.

"Would you like a drink?" Cordelia Hasenbach asked.

The woman snorted.

"I wish," she said. "But getting into this place was hard enough sober. Have you ever tripped into a moat? It's honestly the worst."

The First Prince smiled pleasantly.

"I will take your word on it," she said. "I would be remiss if I did not ask who you are, of course."

The stranger plopped down onto a seat across from her.

"I am a halfway decent thief," the woman said. "A patriot, when I can afford to be. But, most importantly—"

She sharply smiled.

"— I am an envoy from the Queen of Callow."

"Are you now?" Cordelia said. "I believe I will be having that drink, myself. We have much to talk about."

The Hierarch saw many things, close and faraway. Deals being struck behind closed doors in this very city, armies mustered and betrayals paid for. In a cold room of black stone, he watched the most beautiful woman he'd ever glimpsed wipe away a tear and clench her teeth. By the crackling hearth of an inn he saw a knight and a champion clasp arms with older heroes, whispering of Heaven's Mandate. He saw a young girl on an ill-fitting throne, lost but unwilling to retreat. He saw the fields of a Hell tilled and strewn with villages, its people never having known a blue sky. He saw knives bared beneath the earth, north and south, skins of black and green ghosting through tunnels. He saw a green-eyed man grinning in the face of havoc, alone with well-worn maps. He saw... a silent young girl, her skin pale as porcelain. Her blue dress was light and her hair cut in a short bob. Her eyes met his, impossibly.

"Curious," the Augur said. "You were not within the sparrows."

"The People have decreed omens to be ignorant superstition," Anaxares told her.

"Ah," Agnes Hasenbach murmured "You too. No star left uncharted."

Hierarch woke in a dirty alley, huddled under a threadbare blanket. It had been the clink of coppers being dropped in his begging bowl that woke him. Anaxares was not alone. At his side, leaning back against the husk of a wall, a woman sat with her knees gathered to her chest. She smelled of liquor and sweat, though the black curls he could see framing her face were pristine. The stranger drank loudly from a silver flask before turning to him, and when he saw her face he recognized her. Aoede of Nicae. The Wandering Bard. The heroine offered him the flask, wiggling it in a farce of temptation.

"It's the good stuff, for once," the Bard grinned. "Don't skip, doesn't happen often."

The Hierarch of the League of Free Cities, anointed temporal ruler of a hundreds of thousands of souls, tightened his blanket around his frame. He looked aside and pretended the woman did not exist. He had gained much practice in this skill of late, with envoys from the Free Cities and beyond.

"You know, when the second wave of Baalite settles came to Ashur they brought animals from home with them," the woman said. "One of them was a large flightless bird, called an ostrich. Odd creatures. Liked to bury their heads in the ground, a feeling I can empathize with. When the first famine came, though, the big fat ostriches were slaughtered like poultry. Even though their heads were in the sand."

Anaxares stared ahead, silent.

"Tough crowd, huh," the Bard mused. "It's too late to stay out of it, Hierarch. You're Named, now. Means you're fair game."

"I did not choose this," Anaxares said.

"So I've heard," the Bard said. "Kairos has that thing villains often do, where they confuse symmetry with humour. Probably got a giggle out of waving an old mistake in my face."

The diplomat eyed the woman, who was drinking again. After so long not being able to afford wine, the sight of the liquor being guzzled had his body feeling pangs.

"None of this was meant for you," he finally said.

"Oh, that touch was probably just a drop of arsenic in the wine," Aoede shrugged. "But I made your Name, sweetcakes. Back in the days before I knew better."

"Prokopia Lakene was rightfully elected," the Hierarch frowned.

"Right's a pretty broad word, when it comes down to it," the Bard said. "She was silvertongued like you wouldn't believe, true, but that's where I went wrong. The moment the tongue was gone, so was the Name."

"The League survived her," he said.

"The League's skin deep," the Bard said. "None of the forces behind moved any differently after it was formed."

The heroine offered the flask again, and this time Anaxares took it. The liquor within was sweet and tangy, tasting of apples. Much stronger than wine, or anything he'd ever drank before.

"Or it was, anyway," Aoede said. "But now here you are. And you've got a lot of – well, people is a bit of stretch but you get my drift – puzzled. Both upstairs and down. So here I am too, welcoming you to the neighbourhood. Instead of fresh bread and a bottle of wine, you get overly personal questions and maybe a dollop of sinister threats. Depending on how it all pans out. Have another pull, diplomat. It's the sweetest thing either of us will taste for a while."

Anaxares did, before handing it back.

"I abstain," he said.

The woman sighed.

"That's not how it works," she told him, as if he were a witless child. "Right now you're sucking at the teat but you're not swallowing. There's always a side picked, Anaxares. Always."

The Bard waved her flask enthusiastically.

"See, that's where you're raising questions," she said. "'cause Kairos forged you, and Kairos is in deep with the folks Below. But you let the White Knight and the Champion go, sparing me a deal that would have been... costly. Your people like a bit of sulphur on the altar, it's true, but their idea of worship does little more than keep those in a fresh coat of red. And I'm sorry to say, but you're what we call a mumbler. You speak the words when the right stars are out but there's no real meat to the faith, you get me?"

The Bard leaned closer.

"It's fine if you want to fuck around like a raft on the tide for a while, Hierarch, but keep in mind sooner or later you're going to hit shore," she said.

That, Anaxares thought, or drown.

"What," he asked patiently, "do you want from me?"

"I want you to stop taking a nap in the middle of the board," the Wandering Bard said. "Stepping around you is already getting tedious, and Kairos is better at it. I don't mind having a few layabouts around, sweetcakes, but only when I put them there. You're no work of mine."

Anaxares studied the woman for a long moment then shook his head.

"I do not answer to your Gods," he said. "They drew no lots and hold no appointment."

Something like surprise flickered across the woman's face.

"You're Named," she reminded him.

"I am citizen of the Republic of Bellerophon," he replied.

"You were created with purpose," the Bard said flatly. "Fulfil it."

"This purpose was not voted upon by the People," Anaxares said. "I do not recognize it. Forcing it upon me is unlawful."

"Look, the puppet show in your backwater dump is good for the occasional laugh," Aoede patiently said. "But you've been sent up a rung, Hierarch. That's not the game you're playing anymore."

The Hierarch smiled.

"I know you," he said.

"We've met before," the Wandering Bard agreed warily. "Had tea and everything."

"No," Anaxares said. "I know you, old thing. You are the sound of the lash, the deal in the dark. You are the servant of stillness. I deny all you peddle."

"You are mad," the Bard said. "And putting a knife to your own throat. They will take you apart."

"If the Heavens seek to impose their will, they will be made to stand before a tribunal of the People," the Hierarch serenely said.

"Your own fucking Gods will bleed you like a pig," the Wandering Bard hissed.

"Then they, too, will be hanged," Anaxares noted. "As honorary citizens of the Republic, they are subject to its laws."

"You-"

"Aoede of Nicae, I charge you with treason," he said, rising to his feet. "Collaboration with foreign oligarchs and agitation in the name of wretched tyrants."

"You can't be serious," the Bard said.

"Should you fail to be present at your trial," the Hierarch continued calmly, inexorably, "you will be tried and convicted in absentia. As per League law, you may petition the Basileus of Nicae to request amnesty on your behalf."

He looked down at the woman.

"It will be denied," he told her. "But to petition is your right."

Eyes wide, the Wandering Bard opened her mouth to reply but between two heartbeats' span she... disappeared. As if she had never been there at all.

"This," the Hierarch of the Free Cities said, "will be added to the record as an indication of guilt."

He left the alley, the quarter, the city until he found the boy awaiting him. Kairos Theodosian took one look at him and laughed, his red eye burning.

"Now there," the Tyrant grinned, "is the madman I was waiting for. We are going to have such fun, you and I."

In the depths of a Hell that had long lost its name and number, a monster opened his eyes. In Keter, a stone that was an old and treasured gift shone red. It had not done this since the days of Dread Empress Triumphant. The Dead King laughed.

"Finally."

Doesn't Cat still owe Night some debt? like 7 rulers and 1 at his feet or something? Her talk with the summer captive made fulfilling that seem like a pretty bad idea, especially when "... 'til all debts are paid." is included in his allegiance. Doesn't even seem all that unlikely to accidentally fulfill; there's plenty of rulers/princes around and he'll inevitably be one of her sharpest swords to cut them down.

I can't comment. Spoilers. 😊

Mental Mouse

Well... I can say that the "seven crowns and one" will be a long wait, but totally worth it. And the sequence fulfilling it will involve some of the weirdest and most spectacular battles and other shenanigans in the Guide, even counting the ones that just wrapped.

Jeffery Wells

Yes, seven crowns of mortal men, and she will probably fulfill it in large part by destroying every kingdom involved in the crusades.

Things may or may not have changed. Spoilers. Catch up to the latest posts. 😊

This is a great story.

eireknight

I hope the dead king gets involved

slendyllovespie

He will. I think that's what Hierarch saw Malicia doing.

I love this novel, webseries, or work of beautiful fiction. Whatever it is I love it and I love reading the Bellerophon's part because his words speaking of the Laws and Beliefs he holds true and self-evident sound so hard-boiled and I enjoy the sound of them spoken aloud. I'm glad he made the Bard eat the People's Law.

hue hue

The isekai comrade is my favorite character of the Guide. I hope he gets a happy end Holy. Shit. Just caught up to this point and it is. Going. Down. Anaraxes is starting to really become a badass in his own right, and the fae swearing fealty to Cat gave me chills. I love this story!!

That point where he goes from Anaxares to The Heirarch just gives me goosebumps.

Oh yes, he can't rule because he doesn't care for its culture and people. Sure, he totally was doing all of this thing for his benefit and not your power. He takes on Cat for you and your reign. He was preparing to die fighting so that you could live. You just have 2 jobs – hold the leash on Praesi and make Cat like you.

Then you try to commit a story of suicide by building a Death Star. He knows his shit. He lost Sabah for underestimating the power of story. You, the one who never leaves her ivory tower, never deals with heroes, and never risks her life doing any of his jobs, decided that you can do his job better than him. Girl, when the guy who deals with heroes, tells you he can't win against so many heroes to save your life, you should probably listen to him, you idiota ~~.

Malicia ... how is invading Callow to stop Praesi from starving and having to pay a ruinous price for foods from smugglers equated to not caring???? He fucking cares, okay. Not for the benefit of an individual like any Praesi Highborn because he needs their political support but for the collective benefit of the whole country.

Honestly, I have lost my patience with Praesi ruling class, not because they are evil or shit but because they can't even be evil right. If they just looked at their action for once, they would never try to mess with Callow – their food supplier while the entire South is under attack. You don't, do that. You help the country get on its track so you can get sustainable benefits later. Sure, you lose some money in the short term but letting the tree grows so you can eat fruits every year is objectively better than cutting the entire orchard down for woods. It is like they relish the fact that they need to pay nearly 3 times the amount of money needed for their own survival, not getting taxes and great political power. Just by promising to prioritize food exports to certain provinces for a set amount of years, they can probably get a lot more. Monopoly is a thing. Moreover, if you are not doing it too overtly and making a deal with Black & Malicia on the limit, you can probably hold that power for a long time. Didn't Marzus get killed because he was being too obvious?

As I said before, if 40 years of more taxes, money and stability do no change their mind, they probably should step out of the way.
