They built it up as well. With the raising of the Wicked Enchanter and that bit about the Barrow Lord still being able to be tried under Procarian Laws. Also Cat specifically mentioned that the details of the Red Axe's trial be kept secret. So there's a good chance most heroes won't hear of this, well at least till one of the Princes slip up, which tbh probably means its definitely going to happen.

Oshi

That won't matter so much. It might actually help. The Princes can say they can get the Heroes even in death to bend to the law of Pocer. The heroes will be quietly pissed, the villians will smirk and the Princes won't give a damn. They got what they wanted.

Javvies

I don't think the sentence is being kept secret.

Just ... the details of Red Axe's offense and involvement with Bard. That's what's being kept secret.

The sentence of death can't be kept a secret, not and be of any use – you violate the Truce and Terms, you die ... even if you're a Hero.

KageLupus

I think you are right. The play here is to keep things mysterious enough that there is some plausible deniability. I would imagine the Proceran trial happens very quickly and also has the details sealed.

At the end of the day you have two trials that only a very few people know about, and the number that know about both is even smaller. Both trials have the same outcome, the Red Axe being executed for her crimes. Most people who hear about it are going to hear that she was given a trial and executed. If Procer claims it was their trial and execution and the Named claimed it was theirs then you have some confusion. But that can all be played off as politics since everyone knows there really was a trial and the Red Axe really was executed.

Cicero

I think a big thing to remember is that the Procer Princes are the audience that needs to be appeased, not Procer as a whole. So even if the general populace doesn't believe that the Highest Assembly executed the Red axe, the fact that the Princes will be appeased is sufficient.

Miles

It just seems like such a bad idea. Every thing that can go wrong is another hook for Bard to use against the principiate and the terms.

Princes find out she's a zombie full of explosives? They'll throw a fit that they didn't get the trial they wanted and got played for fools twice. First with the trial and second with the green fire.

Heroes find out she's a zombie full of explosives? They'll separate into sides and have yet another hero on hero conflict. Also explosions and green fire.

Hanno finds out his executor was undone? He won't trust cat again, and probably won't find the explosions and green fire amusing.

Cat finds out about the explosives and goblin fire when they blow all around her? Well she's gonna survive but she really should have known the Bard would leave those there. After all, Bard helped that reputation get started.

Also this is the beginning of a proper villain story for Cat. Before, her powers came from wanting to protect people, this time they come from wanting to meet a personal ambition. Time to start counting the death flags.

Mental Mouse

Probably not goblinfire and explosives – that's Cat's own schtick. But making her undead could give her another round of agency... or worse, could open the door for the Dead King.

And they never did compare stories about the attempt on Frederick, which is worrisome.

NerfContessa

I joked about that.

And they are actually doing it.

No way this is going to go smoothly.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Oh shiiiiiiit.

Sir Nil

Oh. That is a smart compromise Cat.

Insanenoodlyguy

No. No it is not! This is the biggest mistake we've seen her make!

Oh the execution is clever to be sure, but consider it: This woman was beaten, her overall plan snuffed, and her death quickly and quietly dealt with, by her enemies amongst them a top villian.

And now, for purposes of prolonging her death and execution, the villian is RESURRECTING HER.

This is ANOTHER CHANCE. You never, ever give somebody like this another chance! Because it has to stay secret long enough to be pulled off, which means incredibly high risk of discovery! Puppetering her corpse would be one thing, but actually letting her come back? i'm sure Cat will have some control over her but that's just until she hits a full Heroic Resurrection, which again, she now has a shot at!

You never bring back your own enemies, ESPECIALY when "It's too late." Cat fucked up.

erebus42

It depends on how cognizant she is and how many openings are provided. This could very well end up as another trickster story depending on how things play out rather than a revenge/rebellion from beyond the grave.

erebus42

Depends on how cognizant she is, how on the ball Cat is, and how many openings are provided. This could very well end up as another trickster story as apposed to a revenge/rebellion from beyond the grave depending on how things shake out.

hakureireimu

Um...she's not being resurrected; that's well beyond Cat's power.

Salt

Funnily enough, the Priests would agree that this is just unholy mimicry of life by the echoes of a deceased spirit, rather than any resurrection; while the Praesi would argue that this is resurrection in every sense that truly matters, with the soul actually being pulled back from the afterlife and the soul being what really matters.

The point is that she's being raised to a semblance of agency and definitely to a point of sentience and cognition. That has some potentially ugly consequences, and not just from the Red Axe herself.

Liliet

Nah, the Praesi would 100% argue she's now undead which is a distinct state in which she's not entitled to [a long list, fought over through many bitter civil wars].

The problem here is, the Red Axe MIGHT cause trouble, but the trouble if this is not done is kind of MORE ASSURED.

Salt

They might if she was being raised as some sort of standard necromantic construct. But then there would be both no point and no question of whether it's possible or not, which is contradicted by Catherine commenting on whether or not it could be done. And warning people to back up, which is generally a story tell for doing something extreme or impressive.

What Cat is likely to try to do here is something that far surpasses making of a zombie and approaches what the Dead King does with his revenants – actually calling the soul (or the echoes of the spirit, if it offends the priests I guess), back and binding it so that the Red Axe is for all intents and purposes able to properly be tried by the highest assembly. Something approaching the kind of pseudo-avoidance of death that is the golden promise for aspiring necromancers everywhere.

... which is partially where the trouble comes from. If you do something that makes said zombie enough of a revenant that it is sentient and can be questioned in a trial, then said abomination is likely going to also come back with its sentience intact, including any malicious intents associated. Possibly even part of its power.

The other part is the actual accomplishment of raising a Named dead to a degree of completeness rarely ever seen. Rarely, with the exception of... the dead king. Not the best association to have at the moment for a Villain, especially if some malicious entity releases the truth that the hidden horror appears to be strangely fond of Cat, almost treating her as a very young peer rather than an Enemy.

Liliet

Oh that plot thread has been dangling in the background for a while 😊

mamm0nn

All this nonsense discussing what kind of dead she is and won't be any more, when really only one thing really matters: How many sharpeners will Cat shove into her?

beleester

It's not actually that rare – Catherine got herself raised as an undead at First Llesse, and this was portrayed as a fairly normal contingency for a villain to have. Akua also had a contingency to bind her soul if she died, which is how she ended up in Cat's cloak. It's not just something necromancers aspire to, it's something that Praesi necromancers do so often that they have laws about it.

The only unusual thing here is that Cat is reviving her without any prep work beforehand, but I guess Night is particularly good at this sort of thing.

Miles

If she manages that she might be coming into a name that let's her use her enemies' powers. Not just once like with Take, but permanently and with powers. Done tight, she might even come out with a better set than ranger, learning-mastering-surpassing not skills but Nameds' abilities.

In short she could become a Power Ranger.

Sir Nil

Perhaps, but Cat made the point that while it might seem that way from her perspective, from the perspective of the wider world the Red Axe is a short-sighted fool who threatened the institution keeping Calernia from getting glomped by DK. Which story takes precedence really depends, but Cat has the Bard shard in her so she probably knows what she's doing.

TameCurtsy

Sounds like Catherine might've gotten herself an angel of a deal out of this...

Daltos

I can't tell if this is supposed to be ironic or a pun. Or worse, both.

Big I

Hahaha, that's hilarious. Didn't see that coming. So much for your death with dignity, Red Axe.

sengachi

Yeah that's ... that's not something to laugh about.

For all that the Red Axe has frustrated the protagonists of this story and for all the harm she could have done, let's not forget who she is. She is a woman who killed her rapist in an attempt to bring down a system which protected that rapist and others like him, knowing the cost of that act would be her life.

Her death may be warranted under the oath she forswore and to forestall worse consequences, but who she is, what she did, and why are not things which deserve mockery.

masterofbones

That system exists to save the world. She intentionally chose her own petty revenge with the gleeful intent to cause the world to be overrun. That's a pretty unforgivable crime. Rape hurts one person. She tried to cause worse than rape to the entire world, leaving herself safely executed.

If she thinks 1 rape deserves execution, she deserves execution a million times over.

Liliet

> with the gleeful intent to cause the world to be overrun

Pretty sure that's not what she intended. She just didn't think the risk was all that great, which was stupid of her, not malicious.

> If she thinks 1 rape

One rape? Really?

Dude, the Wicked Enchanter had been... making his way through countryside village after village.

Miles

Burninating the countryside, burninating the peasants

Zggt

She thinks that a future founded on ugliness is not worth fighting for. The Red Axe knew from the start she deserved execution for this, she is not stupid. In her view, her not acting on this would have made her complicit, and she'd rather die. It is selfish of her, but her nature as a Hero was to fight to the death for what she believes in, similar to the other more extreme heroes. By any measure, I'd consider her just as much a culpable madwoman as the Tyrant was in his crimes, but there is a moral depth that separates them quite clearly.

We can assume that while something as personal as vengeance was involved, Above's influence subsumed that. They don't seem to be nearly as keen on the whole “free will” thing as Below.

Liliet

Correction: Above does not override the free will of its Chosen in any case ever seen so far, though it does occasionally traumatize them into being more obsessed with what was already their core motivation than they would have otherwise been.

Red Axe is not noted to be associated with a Choir, so her desire for justice subsuming any urge for vengeance is all her, unaugmented.

mamm0nn

You don't need to take away one's free will if your priests and your people have made trust in the Above absolute and unquestionably by propaganda from birth. Also, Named are at least a quarter derived from their free will by their providence and such, we've seen them also mentally and in decision-making influenced by Story.

Liliet

Providence and story are a feedback mechanism echoing decisions made in the past. People have agency in SHAPING it for the future as much as they themselves are influenced by shapes from the past.

And I would dearly love to see the world you describe where everyone actually functionally follows their religion 100% of the time. Be it in-universe or IRL.

Oh, and all the religious doctrine is actually shaped by the priesthood, not the decrees of the Gods themselves, which priests have been repeatedly roasted for by heroes. Again, mortal agency.

mamm0nn

And yet here are heroes that are so consistently believing themselves and Above to be the absolute right and all those of Below being evil for being with Below at all.

Liliet

I mean. Above and Below's selection mechanisms work as overall very effective filters for who goes where. You get a scattering of exceptions, moreso in Evil nations than elsewhere (which characteristically heroes from Good nations would have very little knowledge of), but overall the rule DOES hold.

Aotrs Commander

The moment she decided her desire for revenge was more important than other people's lives, she became every bit as bad as the villan she killed. Bad in a different way, but just as bad.

She deserves nothing BUT mockery.

Being a victim does not in ANY way excuse your for your own crimes, not at all.

If she wanted to wait until the immediate crisis was over and gut the dude like a fish, I'd have been right there beside, her holding the knife ready, having already pinned him to the floor by a spear through his genitals (and so, I think, would Cat), ready to set his screaming soul on fire for infinite pain forever.

But she didn't do that, and for that she deserves no sympathy, mercy or regard. Death is the very least she deserves.

Liliet

She did not directly kill people with her actions. She disturbed a delicate system in a way that would probably eventually lead to more deaths, but given how she was not privy to the intricacies of it – you know, NOT being part of the leadership of the Grand Alliance – I don't think it's quite equivalent.

Salt

Agreed. It's not as if Catherine herself had any conception of national level intricacies before sitting in that seat. Someone with zero experience ruling might wrongly assume that there IS a better way than the GA and the terms precisely because they have zero experience ruling. That's a failing of utter stupidity and inexperience, not a failing of malice towards life on the continent.

Liliet

Yeah.

Ultimately, what she's guilty of is oathbreaking. The oath was asked for for a reason, and just because she's unaware of that reason doesn't mean she's not beholden to keeping her goddamn word.

Shveiran

Pardon, but that's a load of BS. The continent has been at war for years. Everyone and their aging aunts knows that. To realize that to break the coalition that is fighting the enemy to a stalemate is AT LEAST EXTREMELY LIKELY to cause the enemy to win, is not a revelation that requires a public office or a degree in history to achieve.

"Not privy to the intricacies of", come on. This isn't understanding how Mercantis could mess them in the money bag, that is someone nearly everyone cannot understand. This is pretty damn different.

She decided to throw a stick in the wheel of the cart treading on the edge of the slope, because she didn't care for the cart.

We want to say her personal history makes her sympathetic? All right.

But let's not pretend she didn't understand that trying to collapse the Terms would at the very least hamper the war effort, or that losing the war means death for all Calernia.

She got it. She just thought that's as no good reason to stay her hand.

Liliet

"break the coalition" is not an obvious necessary consequence of her actions. It's not obvious how necessary the villains are to it, it's not obvious what they even do at all, and it's not obvious how they'll react to something like this.

Pretty sure her idea was to change the Terms (phoenix rising from the ashes), not collapse them and anything like them for good.

Shveiran

Nearly half the coalition is led by murderous villains. How? Just... how could that possibly work without an amnesty. Because that is what she took a swing at.

Shveiran

edit, actually half. I keep forgetting the that the drow are a sovereign state.

Liliet

A more conditional amnesty? Amnesty decided on a case to case basis? That seems to be an obvious thought for someone who doesn't really have to organize the logistics for bringing villains in in the first place.

masterofbones

Gotta get villains to agree to that. Having a tenth, a quarter, or a half of their number get executed just to satiate the heroes isn't gonna fly with them, especially the ones who are borderline, and might be at risk in the future. Nah, if the two sides don't get treated as peers, the side treated as inferior isn't going to join at all.

Liliet

See, this is less obvious to a layperson than it is to us now that Cat's spelled it out in detail.

Shveiran

Is it though?

Who could possibly think "these guys were our enemies until yesterday, but now that we are fighting a common enemy, they should have no right to attack us but we should be able to decide who of them gets to live and who gets to die."

I mean, that's an angry revenge wet dream, not someone anyone expects to actually work. I fantasize about going to work, tell-off my boss and being put in charge in his stead, but I know it's not actually going to happen.

Agent J

You're arguing a lot in favour of ignorance where the woman in question has done everything to fight that stigma.

She had no intention of changing the Terms. She wanted them gone, said so herself. She told Cat that they had to do better.

If they don't, they all die. An ultimatum she is not too stupid to understand.

I don't believe it's stupidity or malice that are fuelling her. I believe it's fucking selfishness, but it doesn't matter.

Intent does not outweigh action. Her actions are atrocious and have the potential of destroying a content. And, as this argument seems to have started on the premise of "who she is, what she did, and why are not things which deserve mockery", I have to hard disagree.

Liliet

Actually I'm not arguing in favor of "don't deserve mockery". I'm always down for a good round of mockery of characters I have sympathy for.

But she IS ignorant no matter how much she wants to insist she's not. She believes a "better" is just around the corner, they just need to try. She doesn't KNOW the detailed strategic situation of the Grand Alliance. She has no way to.

hakureireimu

Delusional seems to be a better word here.

Liliet

Eh.

Mental Mouse

More like "fanatical". The Terms stand in the way of her revenge, so the Terms have to go.

Shveiran

I guess what the disagreement between us boils down to is that "she has no way to".

For you (I think?) she lacks information, she is not a head of state, she is likely not very educated (I think she comes from a village?) and so she has no way to know how impossible a solution is to the problem she poses. And thus while you may or may not excuse her action, you find that she herself is deserving of some sympathy.

(sorry if I got something wrong)

The thing is, I don't disagree too much: she had no way to know the details, at least. But I do believe everyone, no matter how poorly educated, has the means to understand that they do not, in fact, understand something.

All it takes is for you to stop for a few moments, think really hard about what you know, and sum it up. That is something I believe everyone is physically capable of doing.

And so, I believe that not doing it is a choice.

Could the Red Axe understand the details? No. Could she realize she was hacking at the foundations of what was keeping the continent above the waterline, with no real understanding of what was load-bearing and what wasn't? Without a plan or a layman understanding of how the pieces were linked?

Yes. I do believe she could.

In my opinion, that is why she is undeserving of sympathy. Mine, at least. Because she either didn't bother to, or chose not to care, while playing with the lives of millions.

Javvies

There's another set of consequences that Red Axe ignored.

The Truce and Terms have put a stop to the further depredations of all of the Villains who signed on, at least for the minimum duration of the war effort, and now they're known to Heroes if they start crossing lines afterwards.

Without the Truce and Terms, all of the currently signed on Villains would be free to resume any/all of their malign activities, and the Heroes are going to be too busy with the war effort to stop them – and if you say the Heroes/Grand Alliance can try to pull an Order 66 on them ... they're Named, they're Villains, effectively none of them are going to go out quietly or without collateral damage, and almost all of them are at/near the front or at critically valuable installations such as the Arsenal, and any attempts to take them would have serious negative consequences for the Allied/Heroes forces they're stationed at.

In addition, without the Truce and Terms, the Heroes are going to be way too busy with the war to stop the depredations of any newly spawning Villains anytime soon.

Plus ... since Cat basically forced Procer and the Dominion into accepting the Truce and Terms along with her help, even if the details aren't known, it's got to be known that they happened more or less concurrently and since they didn't a lot of time and effort making sure Cat was known to be a Villain ruling Callow ... taking out the Truce and Terms could easily cause her and thus Callow (and probably the Drow) to stop helping fight the Dead King.

In short, taking out the Truce and Terms has major negative consequences that are pretty straightforward and obvious, above and beyond the direct and immediate value of the various Villains towards the war effort. Consequences that Red Axe realistically had to have been at least partially aware of.

Liliet

Mm, yeah, you summed up my position well.

I understand yours, too. I just see not noticing what you don't notice as such a basic thing to human condition, it really doesn't turn off my sympathy.

Even as I agree with the sentence completely)=

Abrakadabra

She did not kill people directly with her actions, huh? So the Enchanter is not part of the people? What about The Kingfisher Prince? Well he lived, sure, then it is no problem if his neck is shanked by some steel.

Liliet

No, the Enchanter doesn't count.

Frederic is a good point, but he's a person, singular, not people plural.

Shveiran

Of course he counts, that no one cares is another thing entirely. She still murdered him in cool blood, and thus claimed there was no need for tribunals: everyone who doesn't like someone can bring an axe to their necks.

That is of course very far down the priority list right now, but that is a thing she did still.

Murder is murder. Saying "he was bad" doesn't change the fact that enforcing that reasoning means everyone with a grudge is entitled to act on it. And no one gets to judge whether or not they were "bad" but the people swinging their axes.

But seriously, she didn't kill anyone with her actions directly? My god, if one step removed is all it takes I suppose Cordelia never killed anyone. She just gave orders, after all, people could have chosen not to follow them. And Tariq didn't kill the Legion detachment following Amadeus, he just created a plague in a village, it was them who decided to go there and get infected.

I suppose if you are in a lifeboat and I sink it, it's just destruction of property and not murder: it's the water and tiredness that drowns you, not me. If I tie someone in the woods and then set fire to the forest, well, it's the fire that did them in, I just caused the fire. If I cover a car in gasoline and it only ignites when someone throws a cigarette, is it their fault because the fuel wouldn't have caught fire without their intervention?

No, sorry, I can't agree with that. She decided to hack at the system. If the system breaks and drags everyone down with it, that's on her whether she thought it likely or not.

Javvies

Let's not forget that the Truce and Terms has stopped the further depredations of all of the Villains who have signed on, at least for the duration of the war (or until they die fighting).

And that without the Truce and Terms, they can resume their malign activities and the Heroes are going to be too busy with the war effort to stop them.

Also, the Heroes are largely going to be too busy with the war effort to stop any newly spawning Villains.

Liliet

Stupidity and malice are often indistinguishable in practice, and often call for the exact same response, I cannot argue with that in any way. Still different things.

mamm0nn

"She did not directly kill people with her actions."

I feel there's a certain Prince with a handsome neck-scar that questions your statement. If it were possible to kill him with his own sword, she would've struck down not just a person but a Named, a Hero, a hero and a Prince. All to take an axe to the Terms, not because of anything the Kingfisher himself did, only because his death would lend itself best to make it fall apart. That means she's willing to kill a lot more people if that was what it took.

Liliet

True, but that's a different argument.

Salt

I think this is a bit too extremist. Being a victim doesn't excuse you for your crimes, no, but that knife cuts both ways. Being a criminal doesn't mean you no longer deserve the sympathy of a victim.

She was wrong and deserved her sentence, she fucked up pretty badly. She also was a tragedy on a level that makes the background stories of most Villains look like sunshine and rainbows.

It isn't some sort of "they're 100% terrible and bad" vs "they're 100% justified and good" dichotomy. She can be considered both fully deserving of death, and worthy of sympathy for being a victim at the same time.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, she doesn't.

You assume she's setting up the system for failure, but remember, this is a STORY. She honestly believes that a better way will be found, but it may well only be found at the darkest hour when no other options exist. It's the sort of thing that drives Cat nuts, but it drives her so nuts because it does keep happening.

Big I

The Red Axe becoming undead is the perfect ironic reversal. I think that's funny. Should I also not laugh at the absurd shenanigans of Irritant or Traitorous, or even Cat herself, because of the body counts involved?

Traitorous masterminded his own coup attempts. What do you think happened to the other people he was plotting with?

AbraKadabra

I call bullshit on that. Frederick has nothing to do with the rape, but was a convenient tool, to wchive her plans. So laughing at people WHO treat others as tools is Just fucking dandy as far as I am concerned.

Tenthyr

Oh dear.

Hanno isn't gonna like this.

erebus42

No he won't, but he ceded her remains to them fairly. Much as his very nature prevented compromise around the trial it will also no doubt keep him from making too much of a fuss about this.

Salt

Let's be honest though, the way she mislead him to allow for this is the furthest thing from fair. It's trickery borderlining an outright betrayal of Hanno's trust.

He thought he was handing over the remains for the sake of necessity – even if the desecration of her corpse was something he personally felt was utterly despicable – and for her part Catherine actively encouraged this implication. He didn't allow it so that the Red Axe would be made to suffer a second time after having already suffered the sentence that was demanded for justice to be done.

He might actually kick up a fuss about it, and he wouldn't even be in the wrong to if he did. Cat knows this herself, which is why she wasn't even able to look him in the eye. A technicality of the wording of their agreement doesn't somehow erase the reality that the White Knight extended both reasonability and cooperation as far as his bottom line would possibly allow – without hesitation and to a Villain, no less – and Cat is about to return that gesture by more or less spitting in his face.

For all the necessity of it, she knows full well that everything about what she's doing here is ugly, and it shows in her own behavior. This is going to be one of the ones she's not proud of, even if the needs of the queen demand it.

Liliet

It's still for the sake of necessity is the problem.

It's ugly, it's awful, it's pretty mean towards the Red Axe, but it's not unfair towards Hanno. He stood on the wording of law for this, not the spirit of kindness. That's what he got in turn. Is it horrifying? Yes. Is it an abuse of technicalities? Depending on what you consider the intent of the law to be.

One could argue that if he agreed to surrender the corpse, he agreed that the protection of the Terms is withdrawn upon death. That would in fact be reasonable and logical as a legal ruling – if there's no sentence of "you're now an outlaw and we don't extend any legal protection to you anymore", death sentence serves as that in a pinch.

I think in the future it would be... reasonable to include the details of what will happen to the body after death right in the tribunal deliberation.

But this one time... yeah. I hope Hanno agrees he surrendered this one fair and square.

Salt

I don't think anyone can argue that she schemed her way into being technically lawful in this. The point is that this is a win that really feels like a loss, because it is the definition of unfair for Hanno, who we all know deserved better. He didn't surrender this outcome, because it was never brought up with him. A Villain he held in high esteem hid it in the fine print, when he was treating her as a decent enough person who could be trusted not to do such a thing to an ally.

You know what Hanno wasn't doing? Looking out for a scheme in the first place, because he was genuine in trying to negotiate with Cat in fully good faith. You know what he wasn't thinking? That Catherine should be seen as an enemy simply because of the color of her cloak. He doesn't somehow get redefined into someone who deserves to be sucker punched this way because his relatively flexible bottom line clashed with Catherine one time, especially in a complex situation where Cat herself partially agreed with him.

So yes, she got the drop on him, when he wasn't even on guard for this kind of a trap because he was negotiating in good faith from the start. Many cheers and celebrations.

I'm not seeing this as a glorious victory for Cat for being clever, though. I'm seeing it as a rather sad loss where she's forced to spit in the face of one of the few Heroes who ever really treated her with respect from the beginning. Something that results in a loss of trust from the kind of person that both Catherine and the comments section has been wishing for Heroes in the guideverse to actually be since forever.

This is the kind of bad-faith negotiation that justifies people like the Saint automatically distrusting everything Villains say, as if there's an inevitable scheme to be caught in for being stupid enough to fully trust Villains.

This is something that is sad to be forced to resort to, because that lost trust is going to take a hell of a long time to come back, if it ever does at all.

TeK

Yeah, that's what Cat meant by "down in the mud". Sometimes, there are no good outcomes. She exploited the trust Hanno gave her, and I am not even sure it will accomplish the original task. Like, it already sucks to be Hanno, but the trust was betrayed not even for the surefire win, just a chance of one. The fact that Red Axe is gonna be tried is gonna be public, no doubt about it, but that would just raise pointed questions. From Hanno for one, but also, from every Named who will naturally conclude that if Red Axe was tried under Assembly, she was either spared under the Terms, or, well, raised as an undead abomination of everything good and holy. And sure, the latter will appease Villanous Names, or at least amuse, but that's not gonna do any favors to the assembly itself.

My guess is the trials under the Procer will also be a subject to the seal, but such a thing is near guaranteed to missfire in the world run on tropes in the best worst moment possible. Not to mention the sheer logistics of 23 (?) backstabbing schemers keeping a secret. You might as well try to use pure air as a bucket.

Liliet

Yeah, I think this scheme has a lot of failure points.

I don't think Hanno considering Catherine his enemy forevermore is one. He'll be offended, upset, angry, but he won't think she's the new Dead King / Tyrant of Helike for this.

Shveiran

Personally, I hope he sucks it up and moves on. He doesn't have to like it, but he has to know that they stood on a precipice, was asked if he had a solution and said no, and then refused the solution others suggested. So someone found an ugly solution not to jump in the precipice that went around him.

I trust Hanno not to act on this, because to act on it is to say you take issues with everyone not jumping in the precipice.

Liliet

Yup.

Hanno and Frederic acted in accordance with their own moral principles. Catherine and Cordelia let them, and if the actions they were forced to take as a result are worse than them breaking their principles would have been in the first place, well hey, they were warned and warned repeatedly.

And if it's not worth and sticking to their principles was still worth it, well then, everyone wins except for Red Axe, prince Langevin and the Dead King, don't they?

Liliet

Catherine isn't his enemy for doing this. She did her best to avoid infringing on his interests. She's still on his side. Her "scheme" is for a purpose he's perfectly aware of and agrees with and aware she's working towards.

Salt

She isn't the Enemy, but there is a big difference in being an ally and a trusted ally. Roland, the Grey Pilgrim, and the Blessed Artificer are all "allies", for example.

At the end of the day, this IS something that at the least pushes his bottom line, if not necessarily crossing it – in that he considered justice to be fully accomplished by the lawful execution, and she's pushing it beyond that.

I think that people are somewhat overestimating exactly how binding a technical difference is for Hanno, especially since his agreement with Catherine isn't some sort of general-purpose Truce and Terms law so much as just a one time concession based on circumstance.

He is someone who became a Hero by spurning the laws of his homeland as being lawful but not "Just". His view of justice is heavily intertwined with law, but it's hardly something simple enough to be fully satisfied by a technicality of it.

Liliet

And I think you might be overestimating how important it is for him that Red Axe not be tried twice.

Oh yes, they kept it secret from him. You know such a thing exists as 'plausible deniability'? He did not conspire with them and he did not agree that this would be done to Red Axe, he acted within the limits of his jurisdiction and those only. As is, it's true and no-one can dispute it. If he'd known he might have been compelled by the letter and spirit of the law he believes in to fight this outcome, but he was not obligated to know and they were not obligated to let him.

It's like how Frederic did not protest against Red Axe being executed in general but refused to do it personally because principles.

Catherine let Hanno play his role in accordance with how he believed he should act. She tried to push, he refused to bend, she backed off and let him have his perfect trial.

If he ALSO, SEPARATELY, wants to dispute the actions taken afterwards and the ultimate fate of the Red Axe, that's a very different question than whether he'll discuss sentencing ahead of time.

Not all withheld information is a betrayal.

Salt

In my eyes the fact that she had to hide it at all and the fact that she couldn't even look him in the eye is plenty proof that she knew full well that it was a severe betrayal of trust.

Not to mention that Hanno isn't a Proceran Prince. Justice isn't some shiny label that he wants to be viewed as upholding – it's something he believes in from the bottom of his heart. Catherine understands this, as she has similarly strong beliefs about other subjects, and for matters of the heart it's not about plausible deniability. The guy truly does want everything to be as Just as he can possibly make it.

I think Catherine the Queen will do what she needs to do, but Catherine the person is anything but OK with pulling this on someone who has been nothing but genuine and respectful to her

Liliet

Yes, but sometimes the point of justice is what happens to the other person at all, and sometimes it's what YOU do.

Justice is not a consequentialist framework, it's a deontological one. It's fine if a villain falls off a cliff to their death, but it's not fine if you push them. The result might be the same but your actions were not.

And yes, Catherine is highly disturbed by what she did and by pulling things behind Hanno's back. I believe that says more about what kind of person she wants to be than about her being terrible horrible no good as she is right now.

SpeckofStardust

Honestly Hanno has to publicly react in full disapproval of this, cause otherwise the heroes are going to think that he won't defend them from being thrashed via Black Queen, at the end of the day as long as the next trial doesn't go off the rails Catherine just loses some respect from the Heroes. And that's an acceptable cost.

Liliet

Very true!

That's why Catherine's going to keep this under wraps for as long as it takes for him to only be able to express disapproval and not actually sabotage it.

Decius

I don't think the protection of the T&T is withdrawn upon death, but I think that the protection can be repudiated by the protected. Hanno only claimed that repudiating it wouldn't stop that trial, because it was based on events that occurred while under T&T.

But that trial ended with an execution, and only an execution. It did not end with a ruling that prevented the use of necromancy on the corpse.

sivarajan

I think the Terms will continue to protect her, and having already served her sentence, she's free.

Liliet

Well, the problem is not so much the necromancy as that T&T seem to more or less explicitly include "and you will not be tried by the Highest Assembly for crimes against Procer as long as you're subject to these laws instead".

The necromancy is a separate problem lol

Shveiran

Honestly, if even Praesi don't consider undead an acceptable state of citizenship, I feel like it is a fair assumption to say that the Terms' protections end with death.

Pretty much all legal system do, after all. Crimes like graverobbing are not punished to protect dead people, but the mental ease and "sense of propriety" of their relatives and loved ones.

As the Terms are just the skeleton of a system born for war time, I doubt they include that kind of scope.

Javvies

Plus, they're fighting the Dead King.

Who is known to have a habit of reanimating Named as Revenants in his service.

I find it likely that the Truce and Terms explicitly not protect someone once they've been killed and reanimated as any kind of undead, otherwise, if the Dead King killed and reanimated someone, putting them back down would constitute a technical violation if death/undeath do not void the protections of the Truce and Terms.

Time1ock

I doubt Hanno would face much Narrative backlash if he were to break his word here, since this is a perversion of the sentence he dealt out to a Heroine. Especially since he did not make that promise with full knowledge of what she intended with the corpse aka he did not go into it with 'open eyes' .

Furthermore, Hanno is a representative of the Heroes in the GA. If he let this go without a word, it would establish the precedent that anyone with the political will can mess around with the corpses of Heroes and perhaps even their Heaven's ordained afterlife. There is no way this is going to go over well with that lot.

Honestly, this might in a round-a-bout way accomplish Red Axe's goal in breaking the Terms.

But, I'll admit I'm biased here since I truly want Cat to fail and lose for what she just did and have this whole situation come crashing down. Honestly, what she did really rubs me the wrong way.

ruduen

“‘Graverobbing is not a particular concern of the Seraphim,’ the White Knight replied, sounding almost amused.”

I mean, she's not even stealing it this time. Is there anything more specific available regarding how they treat Necromancy?

erebus42

Hey they were given legal right to do with her remains as they will. I don't know about specific but it seems like while it's not outlawed by the Grand Alliance and is probably employed in certain areas and situations it's probably not looked at particularly fondly overall. They mentioned that being undead is technically illegal under Heresy laws in the Principate. I kind of want them to get a Necromancer or other death related Named who would be able to employ their own undead or be particularly good at dealing with the Dead King's legions and servants.

Ninestrings

So next chapter is a Weekend at Bernie's style comedy of Cordelia and Cat marching the Red Axe's corpse around with a nice scarf on to hide the scar?

Ninestrings

I also am vaguely hoping that her brain gets scrambled to some extent and shenanigans ensue.

Cordelia: You have been charged with Treason, how do you plead?

Red Axe: Cantaloupe

*Cat at the back of the court frantically making “Wrap it up” gesture with her hand.

Salt

The Red Axe could end up getting a few victories for herself with this kind of a second chance to be fair, albeit while still being dead.

... which would make this a Red Dead Redemption for her

Sugar Roll

I doubt it. She's about to be raised—not resurrected. She will be under Cat's control.

vernal.ancient

Ah yes, because "this undead abomination is completely under my control" always goes perfectly for villains 😊

Sugar Roll

Maybe, maybe not. The Dead King still hasn't lost control of his abominations and it's been thousands of years. We might end up waiting for ages for that to happen.

MagnaMalusLupus

Tell that to Good King Edward the Seventh.

Sugar Roll

How long did he wait?

Ninestrings

I mean the golden rule of necromancy is "Don't raise up what you cannot put down" Red Axe isn't so big a player that this should be an issue.

The undead abomination stuff tends to go haywire for villains when their reach exceeds their grasp.

laguz24

I wonder how the red axe is going to react when they bring her back. Probably something pithy about once not being enough. Also I really want to know what terms they agreed to regarding the ealamal.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm more worried it will be a successful escape attempt.

masterofbones

Proper response: "well if one rape merits one execution in your eyes, trying to cause the entire world to be converted into unwilling slaves to be experimented on by the Dead King deserves at least a few more.

Liliet

One? Honey. Oh honey.

Also, she wasn't TRYING to cause that. It would have been an honest accident!

Myriad

Nah. Any law will equate act with reckless disregard. That is, you are not allowed to hide behind the fact that you didn't specifically intend to harm someone, even if you ended up doing so, to evade punishment if you had to act by refusing to consider or blinding yourself to the obvious consequences of doing so.

So if someone is pulling you up from a cliff to save you from a mortal fall and if someone else rightfully or wrongfully kills that person saving you, causing you to fall to your mortal death or serious injury, the law will allow your representative to pursue wrongful death or damages against the murderer even if that murderer had no specific ill intent to you in particular.

Similarly, here, it really doesn't matter if Red Axe had no specific intent to damage the fight against the Dead King. It was an obvious consequence and that the Red Axe intentionally and willfully disregarded that consequence does not mean she cannot, legally or otherwise, be held responsible for it.

Liliet

And yet, accidental manslaughter out of neglect is still a different charge from murder.

Shveiran

This varies from legal system to legal system, but in general, the distinction matters (and usually doesn't absolve) for crimes consisting of simple acts where the will of the individual can easily be determined. And when the consequences greatly get out of hand IN A WAY THAT COULDN'T BE PREDICTED BY A REASONABLE PERSON.

You call me names, I punch you, you fall and break your neck. Breaking one's neck is not a reasonably expected consequence of being punched, so I am not charged with murder (though I am charged, and not just for the punch).

I decide to burn down a house at night. Someone inside burns alive. The risk is something I couldn't not have taken into account (whether or not I did is irrelevant: I should have) so I'm charged as if I had wanted that result.

Again, this is the general principle: every country has it a bit different.

Liliet

Yeah.

I'm just saying that people being idiots doesn't diminish my sympathy for them is all.

Shveiran

Fair.

As we discussed above, them being unwilling to recognize their ignorance before acting greatly diminishes mine. But that's just me.

Liliet

See, unlike the "just don't fucking skin people, didn't think I needed to spell this one out for you" (as a random example, I've got nothing against Raphaella personally), this doesn't really generalize. People always act in ignorance of SOMETHING. Like... all knowledge to be possibly had in the universe is infinite, people's knowledge is finite no matter how much effort they pour into learning what they need.

And like "in her case, she should have poured more" is a valid judgement and I'm right there with you.

But "if you act before you've learned EVERYTHING you're a rotten radish" is functionally a call to inaction, to everyone, ever.

Knowing when you need to shut up and listen and when you need to act is a delicate balancing act, not an absolute moral rule.

Red Axe failed hard. I'm right here judging her. I'm just also here sympathizing with her because, like, people, y'know?

Javvies

Sure, our legal systems have a range of charges covering "you killed someone" for various circumstances, and blind accidents or accidents caused by neglect are included.

Red Axe, however, killed Wicked Enchanter and tried to kill Kingfisher Prince knowingly, intentionally, and of her own volition, attacking the Truce and Terms providing the Grand Alliance the coordinated backing and support of almost every Named on Calernia in the war effort against the Dead King ... which has been grinding on for at least two years in what is effectively a stalemate, though they're selling hopeful victories and progress through their propaganda.

Her killing of Wicked Enchanter would fall under premeditated murder, and conspiracy murder, and probably conspiracy treason, and conspiracy espionage.

Her attempted murder of Kingfisher Prince probably couldn't be proven to be premeditated, but it was definitely an knowing and intentional act. Might have a hard time adding conspiracy charges to the attempt on Kingfisher Prince, though.

At best, Red Axe fully bought the propaganda, and thinks the war is going much better than it actually is and that the Villains aren't actually needed, useful, or contributing to the war effort, far less how vital they've actually been, although, I would expect that somebody probably told her that the actual state of the war wasn't as rosy a picture as the propaganda when she was found and recruited.

At best, she vastly underestimated the value of the Truce and Terms to the Grand Alliance and the war effort.

She still committed murder and attempted murder, not manslaughter or anything caused by neglect.

Even if we ignore the value to the war effort, the Truce and Terms have also put a stop to the depredations of the Villains who have signed on ... and without the Truce and Terms, they can all go right back to whatever they were doing before ... and all the Heroes are going to be way too busy with war to put a stop to any of their malign activities, and the Heroes are also going to be too busy to stop the depredations of any newly spawning Villains.

Liliet

What are you even arguing about? I never contested that she did murder and attempted murder. I argued she didn't GLEEFULLY CAUSE THE SLAUGHTER OF MILLIONS.

Javvies

She gleefully attacked the Truce and Terms. The immediate consequence of ending the Truce and Terms is to the war effort. It's effectively providing aid and comfort to the enemy, only worse. However, the Truce and Terms also put a hold on signatory Villains doing Villain things to the Proceran/Levantine/Callowan people. And ensure that there are Named tracking down and bringing onboard any freshly spawned Named, cutting short their malign activities.

Without the Truce and Terms, the signatory Villains can bail on the war effort and resume their Villainous and malign endeavors against the Proceran/Levantine/etc common folk who are away from the battlefield, and the Heroes will be too busy fighting the Dead King to stop them, or any additional newly spawned Villains.

And, y'know, without the Truce and Terms, Cat, and thus Callow, (and probably the Drow) are likely to bail on the Grand Alliance, what with Cat being a Villain and all.

Plus, Red Axe almost certainly got told more about what's actually going on with the war when Archer's band found her and while traveling with them.

Liliet

The secondary effect of villains being in the Truce and Terms INSTEAD OF doing something else (and instead of needing to commit heroes to stop all that) is not obvious either.

And you seriously think Archer and Co gave her geopolitics lessons, rather than telling bawdy stories?

Javvies

...
Villains going back to doing Villain things is somehow not an obvious consequence of ending the Truce and Terms that pointed them at the Dead King instead of doing Villain things?

Also, while Archer and company probably did tell a lot of stories ... I fully expect that they also told Red Axe at least a little about the realities of fighting the Dead King's armies and that every Named was needed because the truth wasn't as good looking as the propaganda said things are.

Liliet

Archer and Co haven't been on the northern front actually as best I can tell. And they're none of them strategists. Well, Archer can be when she focuses, but I strongly doubt she would, especially when it comes to Not Contradicting Official Propaganda.

And no, it's not obvious. Who's to say it's the Truce and Terms that keep them there in the first place? Maybe they're looking to get something and the T&T is just what they negotiated themselves in the meanwhile (NOT obvious that there's nothing to get there; if nothing else, Cat herself had an ulterior motive to aligning with the Grand Alliance from the start). Maybe they're already threatened/mind-controlled into compliance and have nowhere else to go. Maybe they're not complete idiots and understand that the continent is where they keep their stuff so they shouldn't let DK eat it.

Mental Mouse

They already told us what Cat & Yanno wanted regarding the ealamal: People of their own on-site, including the Rogue Sorcerer and Forsworn Healer.

Jworks

Whenever Cat partakes in genuine evil it always feels like a mistake, hopefully this doesn't come back to bite her.

erebus42

Eh I don't know if I would call this genuine evil though. It certainly will piss off quite a few people if and when it gets out though.

Salt

She just executed a girl for doing exactly what she herself did at the same age, under Terms that she herself admits are ugly and horribly unjust, while betraying the trust of her colleague to a degree where she's too ashamed to even look him in the eye, for the explicit purpose of executing someone twice.

As far Catherine herself is concerned, this is the kind of hypocrisy that would have had a younger Catherine Foundling want to kill her for. It's reminiscent of how Black Spoke at her to force her to watch him hanging Callowan traitors. Except nowadays she's not just executing traitors so much as executing them and raising from their rest so they can suffer execution a second time.

It's a Necessary Evil, sure, and she's not exactly cackling in glee about it, but let's not pretend that this isn't blatantly evil rather just a really mean way of being good.

Liliet

Catherine killed those two

1) with the implication from the Black Knight that they'd be back on the streets doing the same thing in 5 or so years if she did nothing (probably a blatant lie, he'd have filled in if she didn't, but she didn't know that and had no way to guess);

2) NOT during a war for survival of the whole continent;

3) ...with the personal approval of about the highest authority to be found in the entire country at the time.

This is about as different from the Red Axe's situation as going home from work is different from deserting in wartime. It's not the act itself that's the problem in this case, it's the context and implications, and consequences if it is unpunished.

> betraying the trust of her colleague to a degree where she's too ashamed to even look him in the eye

I mean, Catherine's not all that shameless overall. She's a shameless liar, but she doesn't have all that thick a skin when it comes to actually ugly deceptions. Yeah she feels guilty about this. That doesn't mean it's the worst crime ever committed. This is Catherine, not Indrani.

> for the explicit purpose of executing someone twice

Yep.

Unpleasant? Yes. A horrifying evil? I'm not seeing it. Not any more than a death sentence ever is, period.

> As far Catherine herself is concerned, this is the kind of hypocrisy that would have had a younger Catherine Foundling want to kill her for.

I'm not seeing it.

Younger Catherine Foundling sparked a war so she could get promoted and hopefully do good. Her moral standards if anything rose with time.

> It's reminiscent of how Black Spoke at her to force her to watch him hanging Callowan traitors.

...Which was a pretty necessary and timely lesson about 1) the consequences of her actions for other people, 2) facing and owning them. Not one administered in a particularly gentle way, and it was the method itself that Catherine perceived as a violation – the Speaking – but the making her watch thing? That was entirely fair.

Salt

You seem to be confusing admitting that the morals of her actions are lacking as some sort of disapproval of the practicality of them. They're not the same thing. You can understand and agree that she chose the only road available to her, and still be aware that the only solution available to you is anything but a moral one.

Honestly, this reasoning you're putting forward seems far too close to the kind that demands a pat on the head for being gritty rather than a realist understanding that it's nothing more praiseworthy than undertaking the burden of committing necessary evils so that others aren't forced to.

Having to choose the lesser evil doesn't somehow whitewash the action into not an evil at all – the fact of the matter is that “Necessary Evils” are called Evils for a very good goddamn reason. They're not Necessary Super-Gritty Goods That You Should Feel Fine With Because Justifications Never Matter

There's a reason she attempted every other possible method before being FORCED to resort to it; it's not as if Catherine is somehow delusional enough to seriously believe that the approval of the Black Knight – who she herself outright calls a monster even as she loves him like a father – somehow makes it any less morally wrong.

The fact that her first murder was under the explicit approval of the authorities means less than nothing when said Authority is the Black Knight. Amadeus is the one who Catherine stabbed and told to reform himself into someone deserving to live in a better world, not some paragon of morality to look up to. She's trying to be better than him, not the same.

Why does this matter? Because acknowledging the fact that what she did is still morally wrong even if it was practically necessary is the exact kind of thing that stops you from sliding down any slippery slopes. It's what proves people like the Mirror Knight wrong, when they claim that her Necessary Evils are some sort of slow corruption into madness. Remembering it is what let's you avoid choosing the wrong road, when in the future you do have a choice and the less morally correct choice is by far the more convenient one rather than a necessary one.

Her Terms, her enforcement of them, and her latest resurrection of the Red Axe was not just, nor fair, nor kind, nor anything resembling good. It was Necessary, and not an inch more. Catherine being strong enough to look the truth of this in the eyes instead of hiding behind “oh but it's not really evil because I was desperate” is what makes her a damn adult.

TeK

Ok, gotta disagree on something here. You divide necessity and evil, as if there is some objective morality. There isn't. We all uphold our own personal hierarchy of moral values, and it just happened that "killing rapist" never was an outmost value in Cat's worldview. Which is fine, I guess, but really, she didn't do anything noble, she does not martyr her conscience or something like that. She made a choice, because she values one thing above another, that's it. Everything else is empty words.

Because morality is not universal, and we all value different things differently. And yes, sure, we more or less agree that some things are bad, but the badness is relative. I think murder is pretty bad, and life is valuable, but if my life is threatened and there is no other choice, I would rather choose someone else dies. Look at that, I tried as hard as I could to not spell out "morality is relative", but guess what.

Acknowledging that you did a moral wrong even if it was necessary does not stop you from a slippery slope. The opposite, if anything. Once you had found yourself a convenient justification, you can ignore your conscience entirely.

I agree with Black on that one. You should just be honest with yourself about what you do. What you choose. I would rather not have a fastfood burger than get morbidly obese, but by the same token, I would rather eat a burger than starve. It does not mean I consider eating fastfood good or bad, only better or worse.

So if Cat chose between not getting a nice dinner and letting Red Axe go free, I am pretty sure she would let her go. But unfortunately, nice dinner is not on the table, on the table is the fate of millions.

See, I wrote all this, but I had a hard time articulating quite exactly what I disagree with. Necessity in the context you use sounds like nothing but justification. It's an excuse. It's an exception. The moment you use exception at all, the entire system falls, the precedent itself is enough for you to break your own values on a fucking whim. It is better to have a solid established hierarchy of values that you can adhere to every day. That way, you abolish the very concept of exception, and it's no longer about "well it's bad, but one more time". Either it's an acceptable trade, or it's not.

No exceptions.

Salt

I also have to disagree, because it comes perilously close to equating practicality or necessity with morality.

As if ideal is defined by what you have to live with, rather than defined by what you should strive for despite what you have to live with.

Practicality is simply ONE of the many considerations to take into account when determining morality, not the only consideration or even the all-important one. For heck's sakes, it's "the practical guide to evil" not "the practical guide to not-evil because it's not evil when practicality determines ethics".

Here's the thing – the discussion of moral ethics in casual discourse (and generally as shown in the guide verse for the Good-side of the spectrum) are based on three factors. Character, correctness of action in moral law, correctness of action in outcome. Loosely translated into virtue ethics, deontological ethics, and utilitarian ethics, if you want to open up an academic can of worms. Some interesting characters/entities take one of them to an extreme at the expense of others (like the Pilgrim), but generally it's a mix of the three.

This, and the truce and terms in general? Still fully within the bounds of outcome as a basis. It's almost completely outside the bounds of moral law as a basis – whether you include Catherine's own morals or that of greater society – especially considering that she herself finds value in many of the same moral laws that the Red Axe does, if not necessarily in the same order of precedence.

Virtue? It's a bizarre mix of cold blooded ruthlessness and bleeding heart empathy, with varying degrees of mercy, cruelty, fairness, and unfairness given the situation.

So could you consider her and her actions as less Evil than someone who would gleefully partake in this? Sure. Could you say it's not wholly Evil, since morality isn't something so simple as to be fully black and white? Sure.

Can you say this could be anything approaching 'good', 'moral', or not significantly evil, overall? Absolutely not, in my opinion, unless Catherine really is starting to turn her back on all of her old values virtues and moral laws, in favor of outcomes. Something like that would be THE definition of a slippery slopes

When the ugliest needs of the Queen override the wants of the woman, that's not too far off from walking the thin line that she's always been. When those same ugly needs of the Queen are no longer opposed by the wants of the woman, that's when she really starts to become an Evil that needs to be put down.

This is why Black is such a monster, he has no moral laws to ascribe his actions to. He has little in the way of personal virtues. It's exactly why Cat needs to NOT follow in his footsteps no matter how painful it is, because at the end of the day the Black Knight is every tiny bit the monster that Catherine has been calling him, even if he is a reasonable one.

Tek

>equating practicality or necessity with morality

Yes, that is, in fact, exactly what I do.

>As if ideal is defined by what you have to live with, rather than defined by what you should strive for despite what you have to live with.

I classify practicality as striving to the best possible outcome in accordance to your ideals. No contradiction to me. It's not a desirable outcome, but you still chose the one you desires the most out of those available. You wouldn't be able to make that choice without some form of ideals.

>For heck's sakes, it's "the practical guide to evil" not "the practical guide to not-evil because it's not evil when practicality determines ethics".

I laughed out loud on that. Good one. Though I imagine it is more of a catchy title, because "Practical guide to what is considered by common morality to be evil, even though all morality is relative" is quite a mouthfull.

I think you misunderstand deontology a little. A person who just wishes to attempt to kill everyone he meets is still deontologically ethical, because the outcome doesn't matter, only actions do.

That being said, I get where you are coming from, and I agree with your point about Black. Still, the moment there is an exception, deontology (and moral law) is no longer applicable. If the rule is "killing is bad*" with an asterisk the size of War and Peace, it's no longer a moral law, it's a passing fancy.

Black is a monster not because he ascribes to mostly consequentialist ethics (oh god, that is some mighty stretch). Black has virtues, albeit most of them are born out of practicality, and he also has rules, although again, born out of practicality. But the virtues and rules are never created from a thin air, so you either take it from another person, society at large, or create on your own in accordance with your goals. And don't you dare imply that creating virtues and laws for yourself is somehow inherently more evil, because those are fighting words.

The problem with Black is WHAT values he has, not that he has values about outcomes instead of actions. Or to be more precise, what makes Black EVIL is how his highest value is to WIN. His vision will be put into the worlds, whatever it takes. It is, mostly, outcome based, but what matters is WHAT outcome he is aiming for.

I am genuinely suprised how you argue that looking only at the outcome is evil. Or maybe understand something. I need to take some time to process that, I can't coherently represent my position atm.

Salt

Practicality by definition is simply the exercise of considering feasibility rather than theory or ideals. Not some flawed reality in attempting to strive toward ideals. I'm wondering if this entire debate doesn't stem from your using a rather strange definition of "practicality" in the first place.

In academia this is why ideal and practicality are treated as two entirely different things, with ideal sometimes taking practicality into account but never ever ever ever being conflated with it as an equivalent.

Morals are far more ideals than practicality. Ethics is the field of study regarding what SHOULD be acceptable or not, rather than what we need to currently accept or not.

Morals are not defined by what is attainable, as far as current knowledge allows us to determine.

They are simply what should be attempted to attain, regardless whether or not it is currently possible.

I'm arguing that virtue ethics, deontological ethics, and utilitarian ethics are all competing theories, but it is generally agreed on that none of them (ignoring the many many sub branches of each) fully encompass the needs of human ethics as a whole. As a result, in real life and apparently in this setting, it's usually a mix of the three that gets used as an actual system of morality – individually or on a larger scale.

Meaning that yes, I do consider that a character who is only justified in a consequentialist sense (and debatably at that) and not at all justified in a deontological or virtue ethic sense – as seen from the viewpoint of most of the characters in the story, if not said specific character himself – is pretty much severely immoral.

I am also not going to try seriously debating radical relativism vs natural law or any other form of objective morality here, especially since it would require about a ten page dissertation of the common arguments for and criticisms against before we can even have a halfway functional discussion on that. Not sure where you're getting that radical relativism is either an inherent truth or academically general consensus, but at any rate we will have to agree to disagree.

Tek

Yeah, I got off tangent on that one. I am not sure what position exactly I was trying to defend, and I feel like I don't have the necessary education to actually debate it now. I guess I'll go educate myself, as well as brush up on the proper meanings. I retract my disagreement with you until then. All I am currently is confused and slightly embarrassed.

Liliet

(I have a very specific position on what exactly is the outcome Black is aiming for, how his WIN dereferences at its base (if not necessarily in all situations, because he's still a person and sometimes just wants to have been right all along). If you are interested in talking about that, just give a signal)

Salt

I might, if you don't mind linking to this discord channel you're talking about. WordPress is a terrible platform to have a conversation on, even in text.

Liliet

I'm not hanging out on the official Guide server right now, but here's my personal handle:
Liliet#1061

TeK

I feel like we've talked about it. You wrote about it on reddit and invited me to Discord, but I never actually joined. But if you can refresh my memories, I would be grateful.

Liliet

tl;dr he wants a better future for Praes, specifically for people who live in it

Liliet

P.S. he has no moral laws to ascribe his actions to. He has little in the way of personal virtues.

Just marking this with a "LOL", contact me on reddit or discord dm's or hell even in this convo for more details.

Salt

Key word is "moral" laws, and "moral" virtues, not laws and virtues at all.

I'm not really sure why it's "LOL" to say that a character who blatantly doesn't care about whether his actions or intentions are morally considered right or wrong, is immoral. Especially when it was outright spelled out in the early books, while he was still being fleshed out.

The Bard's description of the moral difference between him and Catherine was

>"She won't, though," the Bard replied. "That's not her nature. She's the very worst kind of villain, you see – the kind who thinks they're doing the right thing. In that sense, she's even more dangerous than her teacher. He doesn't labour under that impression."

As in he quite literally thinks he's not doing the "right thing" and just doesn't care. Not sure where the idea that he's in any morally justifiable is coming from, since he's characterized as knowing that he isn't a moral person at all, even by his own standards.

Liliet

> who blatantly doesn't care about whether his actions or intentions are morally considered right or wrong

Who blatantly insists he doesn't care about that, you mean. All while brooding to his best friend that he's made himself a liar, a cheat and a murderer, insisting to his student that he's a morally terrible person she shouldn't emulate, and actually attempting to construct a moral argument for why attacking Proceran infrastructure was totally morally okay in the same sentence as denying he'll do that (that last one was a fucking gem).

Amadeus high key cares.

> the kind who thinks they're doing the right thing. In that sense, she's even more dangerous than her teacher. He doesn't labour under that impression."

> As in he quite literally thinks he's not doing the "right thing" and just doesn't care

Yees, that's definitely why he told Catherine in chapter 1 that Named are defined by "what do you think is right and how far are you willing to go to achieve it".

Amadeus is far more critical and cynical towards his own actions than Catherine, but not because he doesn't care. It's because he does that he defines himself as morally unjustifiable, otherwise he'd just make up whatever ethical system was convenient for his argument at the moment to insist he's perfectly right. If he didn't have standards, he wouldn't have had trouble living up to them.

I'm not saying he's justifiable*, I'm saying he cares.

*not saying he's unjustifiable either. There are a lot of different lines one can draw for what is justifiable or not, and Amadeus uses multiple at once, which is what results in the unpleasant "I believe that what I am doing is horrifying and immoral in every way but I also consider it unjustifiable to stop doing it as long as I live" result.

Salt

If your argument is that Amadeus considers himself morally reprehensible but thinks that his justifications are rational and that he intends to follow them, I don't think I disagree at all.

My point was that Cat's is right about her actions being immoral here, and that Black's approval doesn't matter at all since he's someone who is blatantly immoral.

Practical/necessary and moral aren't the same thing. She can be simultaneously correct that her action was necessary and also correct that it was immoral

TeK

Unlike Catherine though, Red Axe holds "kill the rapists" as a supreme ethical value. Hence her actions. There is no hypocrisy happening, Catherine never betrayed her ideals.

Liliet

I threw in Amadeus's approval for one point only – consequences.

There's no divorcing morality from consequences. Is it moral to push a button? That damn well depends on what the button does, doesn't it?

Oh, the Terms and the enforcement of them isn't moral per se. But it's not immoral either. It's – amoral. It's Lawful Neutral. It's just, if not necessarily fair, because justice is always limited by what can be done. Catherine is doing justice towards the soldiers fighting in the north and the refugees whose lives depend on how well they fight.

I agree that this is a probably bad idea, and that it does harm and potentially even more harm.

I disagree that this is Evil, or evil, any more than any punitive justice system is ever an evil.

Salt

There is also no divorcing morals from ideals, either. Practicality doesn't somehow retroactively change the ideals to fit the action, especially when the Character's own personal moral ideals and the setting's moral ideals both pretty much say her actions are about the furthest thing from good.

Even Catherine doesn't think she's some sort of neutral "can't be judged either way" character. She outright compared herself to the accomplice of the rapist that she killed in THIS chapter. By her own set of standards she's actively questioning whether she's still the one holding the knife.

I'm always a little flabbergasted at the comments section wanting to believe that Catherine never does the morally wrong thing. Half the story is about doing 'evil' things for totally rational reasons. Protagonist-centered morality is a powerful drug, man.

Morals are never limited by practicality, they're by definition the ideals you strive for. How well you CAN adhere to them is limited by practicality, but this doesn't retroactively change the ideals themselves, nor does it change your failing to adhere to them.

Liliet

Well, I consider every execution of a deserter Catherine ever authorized to be a failure to live up to her ideals.

...when they are taken to the highest extreme.

See, ideals are like mountains. You can try to climb to the very top, but you probably won't be able to. How high you manage to get is what ends up your result, and while Catherine believes she should be higher, I don't believe she's so low as to be called "what child!her would have wanted to kill".

jworks17

Salt already covered this pretty well, but working towards a greater good can very commonly be evil in instants. When the Grey Pilgrim killed that Proceran town to stop Black he was working towards a greater good, but what he did was doubtlessly evil.

I think cat did what she thought was the correct thing to meet her goals, but executing a heroine for murdering a rapist, then raising her corpse to lose its head again in the hopes of decreasing political pressure in the high council is doubtlessly an evil act.

It is a practical evil, but she rarely deals in genuine evil, she mostly deals in practicality. I find her to be at her best between good and evil, doing what makes the most sense without tipping the scale one way or the other.

aurikdomi

well people definitely called it. kill her, raise her and try her again.

RoflCat

I guessed for something slightly off, but still two 'deaths'

First death as a Named, removing all her aspects to be turned into artifacts under Grand Alliance to help with the war effort. Nothing as powerful as Severance, but even the ability that makes her immune to magic should be a great help.

Then physical death.

Lord Haart

That would have actually been a great resolution... Even if Red Axe wasn't executed by the Highest Assembly I think the loss of Name aspects would have been fitting given her Name was given specifically to stop the Wicked Enchanter, which she did. She may have even been able to argue that she stabbed Frederick due to an illusion from the Hunted Magician – who could say otherwise? It would be nearly as good as death in the eyes of most Named, too, so wouldn't have threatened the T&T all that much. The main issue is that it's a clear reinterpretation of the T&T which does so undermine or somewhat, which could spell danger.

Frivolous

Let's face it: We shouldn't be surprised. Catherine has a history of creative necromancy. It only began with undead suicide goats.

The latest iteration will be Red Axe the Twice-Executed.

Jarwain

Didn't it begin with her animating her own body when near death?

Liliet

Yes. Yes it did.

Catherine, to Red Axe: "yeah dying twice sucks, I know. I really, actually do."

RoflCat

Clearly she should start with "decapitation? been there, done that"

From Book 2.

"You're dead," the Lone Swordsman said. "I cut your head off."

"Eh," I shrugged. "I got over it."

Liliet

YES

sivarajan

Necromancer? But I hardly know 'er!

Adrian_V

I have to get this right way: i just read the quote and i am all like "Oh boy, this can't be good..."

And lol that last bit is right out of praesi culture xD. I can't already see everyone but the praesi clamoring "what the fuck?" while the praesi look at them like uncultured hick for never hearing of undead standing trial lol

Also who was Farrier?

Frivolous

Commander of the Gallowborne. I think Summer incinerated him, poor fellow.

Konstantin von Karstein

John Farrier, the tribune commanding the Gallowborne.

Frivolous

I think the best and most shrewd part of this necromantic and legal plot by Catherine and Cordelia is that it denies the Intercessor the opportunity to more easily make allies out of those heroes and villains who disagree with the Truce and Terms.

I mean, it was smart for Catherine to insist on the terms of Red Axe's T+T trial to be put under seal, but I don't think it will have much practical effect, because the trial won't be a secret to the Intercessor, and she can travel anywhere and talk to any hero or villain antagonistic to the T+T. She can spill the details to them, which means the seal won't do any good. Not alone, that is.

On the other hand, if the Red Axe is tried in public (and it probably will be public) by the Highest Assembly, the HA can broadcast far and wide that they executed the Red Axe for trying to murder Prince Frederic, but they don't have to broadcast that she was an undead abomination at the time, if they even find out. And I doubt Cat and Cordy will bother to tell them.

Which means that if the Intercessor tries to use the Red Axe's story as a persuasive argument against the T+T, she'll have to fight against the common knowledge that the RA was executed by the HA for attempted regicide, not by Hanno for violating the T+T.

And best of all, Hanno himself agreed that he wouldn't talk about the T+T trial, which means he is honor-bound to not blab about the RA being an undead abomination, which means he can't refute the HA's own story.

Sure, he'll be furious at Cat and Cordy for twisting and trapping him this way, but they won't care.

Liliet

What I'm worried about is whether it'll undermine Catherine's own efforts to keep the T&T's legitimacy. If the intent is for everyone to think the Red Axe was in fact surrendered to the HA instead of the T&T trial, while the point of not doing so is so everyone would not balk at the idea, Catherine might have just outsmarted herself.

Frivolous

It's only the villains and the heroes who would care that the Red Axe was given over to the Highest Assembly in violation of the Truce and Terms. No one else will, I think.

Catherine can privately explain to the villains, and Hanno and the rest of the heroes will probably figure out eventually, that RA was an undead abomination when the HA tried and executed her.

The villains will congratulate Catherine on her ingenuity. If Cat threatens them enough, they won't talk.

The heroes will be incensed, and they may talk, but Hanno can keep them in line if he wants to. It will help that RA tried to kill Frederic. and anyway, Catherine already has a reputation as a necromancer and she herself has been an undead abomination, so it won't be news to them that she did it yet again.

The real problem will be Frederic, who is both hero and prince. I have no idea how he will react to this plot twist. He should probably be the angriest of them all. On the other hand, he's had sex with Cat and sex is known to make males lose their perspective.

It will be quite odd for Fred to look at Cat later and see the woman whom he had sex with, who also raised his would-be killer the Red Axe as an undead, but who also saved the Truce and Terms and kept the Principate from imploding.

Will he admire Cat for her ingenuity and political adroitness? Will he loathe her for her twisting and mutilating the rules so that the RA could be tried twice? Will he be gratified that she kept the Highest Assembly from losing faith in his idol Cordelia? Or will all that be ignored because Fred likes Cat personally and because he has been her lover?

All I know is it could be really really awkward for Freddy.

Liliet

I think Frederic of all people will understand. He's been kind of in the middle for all this – subordinate to Hanno and present for the disastrous meeting of heroes, Cordelia's eyes and ears among Named, her deputy to Catherine, and the person who decided that his personal principles override practical concerns on this one because surely they can figure something out without making him break his own preferences in half.

They did. And he's partially responsible, just for that.

The problem is, which details are going to be kept secret from whom? Catherine appears to want the very existence of the T&T trial kept secret, which is fucking wild. Or does she just want the fact that Hanno's sentence was "death" and the rest was improvisation by her and Cordelia kept secret? With Hanno not allowed to clarify otherwise? Because that's its own brand of nastiness, towards Hanno. Does she want it secret from the Highest Assembly, but will bring in Named on the logic of a need to know basis? Thaaat's not going to hold for long, is it?

Just... what.

Javvies

I believe that Cat it's interested in keeping the details about why and how Red Axe was working with Bard – specifically/especially working with Bard in order to overthrow the Truce and Terms – a secret.

The sentence cannot be kept secret. For one thing, Hanno already told the Heroes that he was expecting that he would be executing Red Axe.

For another, the villains/non-Heroic Named need to know that Red Axe got executed for violating the Truce and Terms.

I think the theory Cat is running with is that they're going to let people know that they executed Red Axe, but they're going to leave out the details about Red Axe's actions voluntarily being part of Bard's efforts to bring down the Truce and Terms, as opposed to a Bard plot to attack the Arsenal and destroy the weapons the Arsenal is developing to fight the Dead King.

That is ... they're leaving out the details about Bard's plots as being primarily an attack the Truce and Terms, and everything else being just a sideshow to Bard, and letting the official/public interpretation be that Bard was primarily attacking the Arsenal, and any threats to the Truce and Terms were secondary effects.

Liliet

That's what Catherine said.

When looking at the Red Axe's reaction, she also good as admitted that it was a trick that Red Axe might or might not have seen through, and that there was another purpose to keeping the proceedings secret beyond what she specified it would be for.

Shveiran

Personally, I think that IN ADDITION to what she said she wanted the seal for, she wanted the REASONS the Red Axe was executed to be put under seal.

Not to keep them secret, but to keep them from being official. Ora at least, publically official in a way that can be brought up in a political play.

My reasoning is, if the trial is under seal, the Highest Assembly cannot know for sure that the REASON the Red Axe died is not because the Highest Assembly herself judged her guilty. It is a fig leaf, of course, just like I doubt Cat's necromancy will be so good as to fool anyone that the Red Axe is actually still alive (that kind of necromancy was never her forte and the only undead we saw who weren't obviously undead are the DK's infiltrators).

It's a fig leaf.

But hey, fig leaves can matter.
They allowed us to display statues and paintings of naked people in churches for centuries because the artists could point at them and say "Nuhu, he's not naked, are you mad? There is a leaf. I never drew the naughty bits, that would be vulgar, THIS is art."

It can be a way for Cordelia to prevent a precedent being set, which was what she was actually afraid. It muddles the water.

That can be enough to spare the First Prince a loss if she can milk it properly. And if Cordelia can't, who could?

Liliet

Hum, makes sense.

That would be nice.

Frivolous

If Cat wants to make Red Axe look like she is alive, she doesn't have to rely on her own necromancy. She can just get Ivah to glamour the Red Axe into looking like she's alive and breathing.

Does that make sense?

Shveiran

She could, admittedly. Yet I still fail to see why she would want that. That secret is coming out, and what Cordelia needs is a way to save face and avoid a precedent. A technicality works better than a lie, cause a lie can be revealed at a later date.

Javvies

Yeah ... pretending Red Axe is still alive is of dubious value.

She needs to be known to have been executed when it comes to Named.

As for the public ... she violated the Truce and Terms, and tried to kill a Proceran Prince and fellow Hero ... then got tried and executed for her crimes. Unless the Procerans try to drag out their trial overlong, it'll simply be a matter of fudging and/or blurring the dates and timeline of events for public consumption.

Cordelia isn't worried about the public with respect to Red Axe's actions ... she's worried about Proceran nobles. Red Axe being undead for her trial means that they'll see that the Heroes are willing to kill their own to keep them in line – which itself is an important thing – but also that Cordelia has the connections to get Red Axe in front of them for her attempt to kill Frederic even after her execution.

Shveiran

Yeah. It's not the victory she wanted, but it's not a defeat.

edrey

For once i think this all part of the bard plan, at least cat should read her memories about the bard. If the WK found out its going to be a mess

Liliet

I don't think there's a way WK might nOT find out

hakureireimu

I don't even think that keeping it a secret long term (after the 2nd trial) is the plan, since Cat knows that Villains can't keep secrets.

nick012000

Hopefully the Dead King won't be able to usurp control over the Red Axe's undead form and turn her into a Revenant puppet. The Red Dullahan?

dadycool

Ooh, putting an undead corpse on trial? This might actually be a good precedent to be made, given DK. I can't remember if Praes has ever put a corpse to trial, but it's only a couple steps between this and putting one of Cat's goats on trial, like the Tapiers.

Javvies

Dread Emperor Revenant? I think it was.

The one who was already Dread Emperor, died, and returned as undead to resume being Dread Emperor.
Also, the reason why undead aren't allowed to become Dread Emperor/Empress anymore.

Liliet

He spoiled the stew for all others to come)=

(There were more undead Dreads than just him, at the very least IIRC Sanguinia)

TeK

Yeah, some people just can't become walking undead abominations without screwing up things for the rest of us.

TimeLock

Since this was the third trial, I fully expect this to blow up in their faces.

benthelynx

It has. They just don't know it yet.

onedollargum

An ugly affair.

Liliet

Holy shit lmao.

It does make sense though. The one way to get someone out of the jurisdiction of the Terms after they swore to them... death.

Hanno is not going to love this, but, well. He got all the forewarning there was to be had.

Jack Reader

I think Cat's play here might be to get Cordelia to seal the records of the trial on HER end, and with the records double-sealed, all the information that will be publically available was that Red Axe stood trial and was executed.

Sure, Hanno will learn of it, and Mirror Knight also might through his Principate connections, but as far as the Heroes and Villains and procerans at large are concerned, Cat and Cordy will be able to fudge the sequence of events until it fits the necessary narrative and and call it a day.

Of course, this is basically handing ammunition for Malicia/The Wandering Bard/a progressively more desperate Malicia that cut a deal with the Bard to screw them over at a later date, but borrowed trouble is better thsn present trouble.

Liliet

Huh, yeah. If they just keep everything secret from anyone and answer all requests from people who weren't present for a part of it with "well she's dead", and all requests from people who WERE part of it with the same, that might actually fly.

Soronel Haetir

Death is usually said to settle accounts owed by the perpetrator. I do see raising the Red Axe as a mistake.

TeK

Yeah, it settled her accounts under the Terms. As a walking cadaver, she is no longer a Named, so she isn't under the protection of the Terms. So she is just a Proceran citizen accused of attempted regicide.

sivarajan

Didn't we just see undead Named? The question is whether she's the same person. If she is, she'd still be protected by the Terms, having just served her sentence.

Liliet

That depends on whether death officially releases you from oaths and negates your citizenship and all other shit.

A ruling can go either way, and Hanno's agreement to surrender her body... well, implies.

Adrian Eric Gorgey

Holy shit Catherine. Trying a dead woman? That's fucking brutal.

masterofbones

Ah, the classic weirdness of the death penalty in a world with resurrection magic. Do executed people get a second chance? Do they get re-executed? Weird questions for a weird situation.

Liliet

Necromancy, not resurrection. Cat's not undoing the White Knight's sentence. The Highest Assembly can sentence her to a lifetime of servitude to Frederic as an alternative to execution* and Cat will be like "haha, yeah, about that" and put her right back into the grave as the "lifetime" is already over.

*Hypothetically. I am well aware of the 100000 reasons why they would not do that lmao

Liliet

Okay, um, so.

If this goes public (to Named) the way it happened – the White Knight sentenced and executed Red Axe under the Terms, then surrendered the body as it was no longer under their protection – and then as a consequence of said execution and subsequent lack of protection she stood trial necromancy'd before the Highest Assembly – that'll work.

If, however, the public impression ends up being that Hanno and Cat gave Red Axe over to Procer...

Catherine might have just picked out of the two evils, BOTH.

Shveiran

I see where your concerns come from, but I personally doubt the Red Axe will rise as anything but a clearly undead individual. We saw only one instance of undeads that could pass for living, and they had to inhabit the body of living beings to do that anyway. Not to mention, it was the work of a much more experienced necromancer.

The Red Axe will walk to the trial as an undead abomination. And anyone looking at her will be able to tell.

That's my prediction, at least.

Liliet

Perhaps 😊

TeK

Yeah, about what I had expected. I argued to do as much. But wouldn't it still lower the Principate's influence or something, since they were second to pass the judgement? I do believe similar argument was made already.

Also, I wan to point out that practicality and principles are not polar opposites. I mean it is obvious deontology vs consequentialism, but I personally believe in neither. We all hold some values and principles as subjectively superior, and then act in accordance with said set of values. It's both, if anything. We all hold principles on a basis of nothing more than sheer faith, and we all act practically in enforcing those, if not always smartly. That Cat holds a supreme principle peace, while Cordelia holds duty is no reason to dismiss those as dissimilar to Hanno's justice. Or Red Axe to be fair.

The fact that she is willing to potentially throw millions under the horse for the sake of principles, does not mean she is more principled than Cat, she just has different out, and, accordingly, act different. Well, at least I think that is the case.

Salt

I don't disagree so much as finding this as not entirely accurate/complete if we're going into the formal moral debate. The ethics of "Principled" good in this serial is a mix of deontology and virtue ethics, leaning more toward deontology, but two are decidedly not the same thing. Put very simply, virtue ethics defines morality as adherence to virtues and focuses on personal traits – your character. Deontology defines morality as adherence to normative moral laws and focuses on actions – how well you follow those moral laws. Utilitarianism defines morality as almost entirely based on the outcome – claiming that all goodness can be quantified into utility.

Meaning that Catherine is in many ways virtuous, and if you squint a little she could be considered utilitarian. Her standing in terms of "Principled", in the deontological sense, is pretty shaky. She breaks far too many normative moral laws, both her own as well as that of greater society, to actually be considered adhering to principle in an action-focused view.

Which is largely where the disconnect is coming from – because generally deontological principles work better for the individual and utilitarian ones work better for many people. She started out as the Squire not having much issue on the deontological end as she could keep a fair majority of her actions as both high in utility AND deontologically principled as she was only beholden to herself and her few close relationships. The "needs of the queen" end up causing her to have to choose between the two – which ends up being the obviously more fitting option of utilitarianism for the role of a Ruler.

She's upset about becoming less principled and more evil because, in terms of at least the deontological framework and (to a lesser degree) the virtuous framework, she actually IS becoming less principled and less evil. Not less practical, mind you, or less well intentioned, but good intentions and practicality are two pieces of a puzzle that has many many many pieces, if you're only looking at ethics.

Salt

Typo, and more* evil, not less evil

TeK

Yeah, basically her dilemma is "good actions do not always produce good results" and "bad actions sometimes produce better results", and so now she actually has to pick and choose, which one she values more, actions, or consequences. She can't combine the two anymore.

Although she actually can. You don't really have to pick one side. You can choose a set of rules as pretty moral, and the set of outcomes as pretty moral, and then rank them in the list of personal importance as she feels it. For example, killing is bad, unless it's a killing of a rapist, unless it endangers lives of millions. See? Pretty simple, ain't it.

I would argue with you whether the term "less principled" is really applicable to the choice here. I mean, I would concede evil, at least from the point of common morality, but I don't think Catherine becomes less principled. I personally think she becomes more principled, because she explores her own moral system in depth on the testfield of actual moral dilemmas. As in, she understands her own principles even more, so she can act even more in accordance to those principles, which in turn, makes her more principled.

I would consider a "less principled" person the one who doesn't know what he wants, and so values one thing above another in one moment, and the same thing beneath the same other thing the next. Who doesn't really know why he makes the choices he makes, and what choices he will make in the future. Who is as much in the dark about what he will do, as an independent observer.

Salt

Mostly agreed, although that use of "principle" is dangerous.

If we are purely considering it principle as in having any principles at all – having some fundamental basis that determines behavior – then in that sense every Named who ever lived is extremely principled, and most of the common folk besides.

In the context of a moral discussion, principle becomes a fundamental basis for ethical behavior, at which point Catherine is not ethically principled, favoring practicality instead.

It is not so "killing is bad, unless it's a killing of a rapist, unless it endangers lives of millions.". There is no such thing as "unless", for the ethically principled.

For ethical principle, it's three separate things: "killing is bad". "rapists are bad". "endangering the lives of millions is bad".

Some people decide to attempt follow as many of those rules as possible despite practicality, this makes them principled but not sufficient for necessity's calling. Some people decide to forsake some of those rules in the name of practicality, because "if not us, then who", which makes them in many ways ethically unprincipled, but necessary.

Tek

Yeah, I guess we are near the area of playing definition game. For me, yes, principle is just a proposition of value that guides behaviour, so most people have it. i'd argue, everyone has it, really. What I consider to be a principled action, is, well, an action according to ones own principles, which necessitates really only one thing: a self-awareness of what your principles entail. As well as an ability to distinguish what your principles are, and what is momentary whim or outside influence. And, obviously, to fight those whims and outsiders off.

I guess I am a tad biased, because I don't see being ethical as following a specific set of rules commonly accepted in western society, but rather, following any set of rules at all. The word "unless" can be used in regards to principles if there is a hierarchy of those, or in other words, if some upholding some principles is more valuable than upholding others.

In the end, I mainly argue that principles and practicality are not mutually exclusive, nor could they really be. You don't just decide what action is practical from nothing, you decide it based on the outcomes you consider desirable, and you decide which outcomes are desirable based on the moral values you hold. Following that logic, truly practical action necessitates principles by it's very nature.

Salt

Honestly the only part I have issue with is the very strong assertion of pure relativism

In my views, that's not a big issue. Catherine's own set of "ideal" ethics and common ones found in society are pretty similar, in scope if not in actual order of precedence.

The very fact that she does feel so distraught about often being forced to do things that both she AND society thinks is wrong, pretty much answers the question of whether she can be considered deontologically moral.

If she becomes character whose innate morals were starting to deviate from that of society/her own at the beginning of the series, rather than one who is very upset even as she is forced to violate them, I'd outright say she's already fallen down the slippery slope.

TeK

Honestly, I am a supporter of a pure relativism, if it's a thing. I think that we have largely similar rules of behaviour because we are largely similar and because we live in largely similar environment, not out of some, I don't even know, mandated by heavens morality?

I agree with the rest, but for different reasons, I feel. For me, she feels distraught not because of the actions she took, but because life handed her a really crappy choice of what she could do. So naturally, she felt crappy, as you would if you had accidentally stepped with a sneaker into what you can only assume was a dog poo, thought it was just a dirt and tried to scrape it with your hands only to get your hands in it, while getting progressively LOST IN THE MIDDLE OF FUCKING SUBURBS, AND YOU ARE LATE TO THE JOB INTERVIEW AND YOUR PHONE LOST ALL CHARGE AND THE SUN IS SLOWLY MELTING YOUR BRAIN AND WHY THE FU~

Sorry, got off tangent again. The point is, she felt crappy because she was handed a crappy choice, that left her no choice that would've fit in what she considers acceptable action.

And well, I am not sure again what I argue for. I'm gonna lie down. Sorry.

Juff

Typo Thread:

realm where simultaneously > realm were simultaneously deathly downwards > deadly downwards
They make from > They are made from home," I > home." I into way to > into ways to try, even > try – even such a thing, > such a thing – in in > is in Enchanted > Enchanter what my ally > what might allay respond, "In > respond, "in to be parade > to be paraded issues Mercantis > issues with Mercantis

I glance at > I glanced at blood end > bloody end a murder and > a murderer and “ That I (extra space) an eulogy > a eulogy has issued with > has issues with then decided it > then decide it an herbal (for UK, it should be “a herbal”, because we pronounce the ‘h’)

Salt

I don't disagree so much as finding this as not entirely accurate/complete if we're going into the formal moral debate. The ethics of “Principled” good in this serial is a mix of deontology and virtue ethics, leaning more toward deontology, but two are decidedly not the same thing. Put very simply, virtue ethics defines morality as adherence to virtues and focuses on personal traits – your character. Deontology defines morality as adherence to normative moral laws and focuses on actions – how well you follow those moral laws. Utilitarianism defines morality as almost entirely based on the outcome – claiming that all goodness can be quantified into utility.

Meaning that Catherine is in many ways virtuous, and if you squint a little she could be considered utilitarian. Her standing in terms of “Principled”, in the deontological sense, is pretty shaky. She breaks far too many normative moral laws, both her own as well as that of greater society, to actually be considered adhering to principle in an action-focused view.

Which is largely where the disconnect is coming from – because generally deontological principles work better for the individual and utilitarian ones work better for many people. She started out as the Squire not having much issue on the deontological end as she could keep a fair majority of her actions as both high in utility AND deontologically principled as she was only beholden to herself and her few close relationships. The “needs of the queen” end up causing her to have to choose between the two – which ends up being the obviously more fitting option of utilitarianism for the role of a Ruler.

She's upset about becoming less principled and more evil because, in terms of at least the deontological framework and (to a lesser degree) the virtuous framework, she actually IS becoming less principled and less evil. Not less practical, mind you, or less well intentioned, but good intentions and practicality are two pieces of a puzzle that has many many many pieces, if you're only looking at ethics.

Salt

Disregard this, meant it as a reply to another post... I wish I could delete posts when I fuck them up and post them in the wrong place.

TeK

Or at least edit them when you maek typos.

vernal.ancient

... I can't tell whether the "maek" was accidental or on purpose, but it illustrates the point beautifully

Aotrs Commander

HA! Once again Necormancy Solves The Problem. I keep telling everyone how useful a tool necromancy is, but no-one (save maybe Cat) ever listens...

vernal.ancient

It is a pretty useful skill, though it's no Animal Husbandry...

Sugar Roll

I can see named pushing for an ammendment to the terms after this. Cremation soon after death sounds reasonable to prevent anything similar from happening again in the future.

Frivolous

I don't think I agree. It's too useful to preserving the Truce and Terms for cremation to be allowed, unless Hanno gets really upset and demands that it be forbidden.

I do wonder how many times a body can be raised as a zombie. It's known that magic or an aspect can repair things that should not be repaired, so technically a zombie ripped to pieces can probably be put back again. But can it be reanimated again? I'm not as sure.

I mention this because it might come to pass that a Named might violate the T+T and the laws of more than just one nation. It might therefore become politically expedient to be able to execute someone 3 or more times.

Liliet

The important legal sticking point here is whether or not death means one's ties with the T&T are cut. Or is it not just death but a death sentence specifically? A death sentence carried out? Being raised as a necromantic construct? Being raised as a necromantic construct after a death sentence is carried out? Being raised as a necromantic construct after a death sentence is carried out only if the representative for your side agreed to surrender the body?

There are so many fun distinctions possible here!

IncognitoMe

I'll just leave this here:

Interlude: Kaleidoscope

"Spoken like a man I'll have raised from the dead just to execute a second time."

Dread Emperor Malignant III

IDKWhoitis

Something about a necromatic construct in the presence of the Highest Assembly strikes me as a stupid idea. I'm not saying the Dead King is guaranteed to usurp the reins on the Red Axe, but there are many storylines that can exist, and not many that don't result in the Red Axe becoming a problem down the road.

A trial en abstinencia or bringing the corpse as is might have been more clever.

Bakkasama

The real question here though is whether we get a sidestory about the MK escaping from the GP's purview in order to stop the Red Axe from being unjustly executed by Procer, only to find out she is undead and assume that it was murder instead of execution.

Liliet

I think MK is one person we're done with for the moment in this storyline.

Still waiting for the answer on who's Constance.

Daniel E

Given that Red Axe had an extensive conversation with Wandering Bard, I wonder if this outcome was foreseen. An undead Heroine who hates everything about Truce & Terms might be end up being a lot more trouble than expected.

Liliet

This seems a bit... too specific?

Daniel E

Possibly, but given that she had an extensive chat with Wandering Bard, I wouldn't discount the possibility of further mayhem by Ms. Axe.

Liliet

Oh I am high key not discarding that 😊

Daniel E

Gods below I hate the lack of editing here. I meant to say, given that Bard anticipated her own demise, warning Red Axe of her fate doesn't seem far-fetched.

Liliet

Red Axe knew she would be dying from the very start of the scheme.

It's the "raised as undead to stand trial twice" that's a bit too specific.

Captain Amazing

So the logic here is that she stopped being a hero when she became undead and the custody of the body was legally transferred? I want to see her come into a villain Name and then apply to the Terms again as undead. Her grey moral motivations cast as Evil instead of Good. How do they argue against it? If the Terms for whatever reason stopped applying to her then surely nothing would stop her from joining again once they do. It screws everyone over so hard and I love it.

Shveiran

Considering who the Grand Alliance is fighting, I seriously doubt there isn't a clause that prevents undead from applying.

Shveiran

Or at least require approval.

superkeaton

Necromancy is a most valuable tool. Cut your cake, and eat it too.

Abrakadabra

Okay, I did not expect that!

Skidaddle Skidoodle

Lets see, she gets to somehow resurrect completely and throw a wrench into the proceedings. Bard has something to do with it and spirits her away. Bard is very smug about the whole deal and Cat is frustrated as always. We later learn that it was all a ruse within a ruse and Masego or Roland (or Masego) or Masego put a very faint untraceable tracking spell on the corpse which they use to beat the bard once and for all at the end.

trashdragon

Fuckin' hell, pathetic is right.

Like, there's no audience or jury here that can be swayed by her words. The only purpose the gag serves is to preserve the precious decorum ad the fee-fees of these powerful people who seem to have little to no interest in actually confronting the stark reality of what they believe to be necessary. Which to me makes Cat and Cordelia making mouth noises about feeling bad about it feel hollow, and make the Red Axe's criticism of their little system feel like a self-fulfilling prophecy.

If they're going to do awful things for what they're convinced think is the right reasons the least they can do is suck it up and allow their victims a voice, and get in nose deep into what exactly it is they're doing. For all that I don't care for Black or his smug bullshit he was never this much of a moral coward.

Konstantin von Karstein

She said herself she didn't intend to hold to the T&T even 1 second, and knowingly put millions of people in danger. She doesn't get to criticise those who want to stop her.

matesbe

"Confronting the stark reality that" Red Axe is an oathbreaker and murderer who put the lives of half the continent potentially in jeopardy?

No one at the trial doubts that they're doing the right thing. Some may sympathize with the Red Axe; in fact, I imagine many do; but they all feel like executing the Red Axe is the right move to make, morally and practically.

benthelynx

Well this isn't going to end with either the red axe escaping or the dead king interfering in the second trial...

ohJohN

This seems like a weird, overly complicated solution to the problem?

Like, Hanno's only objection to the "try twice, execute once" approach was that it precluded a fair trial:

> "I will not promise a sentence or an executioner before a trial has been held," the White Knight said. "This is not a compromise, it is a perversion of the oaths we all swore. It does not matter what the Red Axe has done: she has rights under the Terms, and among these is a fair trial."

And Cat is able to successfully work around that objection

during the same conversation*:*

> "Procer could be allowed to dispose of the body as it wishes, at least," I said, and sighed when Hanno began to respond, "In the eventuality that there is a body, yes, not to make assurances either way. But if there is a corpse, White Knight, can it not at least be ceded to the Highest Assembly?"

Why not apply that exact same logic to the original plan? Agree to give her a fair trial under the Terms, and if she happens to be sentenced to execution (as literally all of them expect), agree to assign Freddy as the executioner and set the execution date a month later, giving Procer time to hold its show trial.

Even if Hanno's concerns were explicitly about making any decisions before a fair trial could be held (which they weren't, since he agreed about what to do with the corpse, should there be one), they could have made those decisions after the trial. Seriously, if the three of them had met directly after the trial instead of before, none of the arguments he made would still apply – nothing would have been decided before the trial or influenced its outcome, and their obligation to her under the Terms would already be fulfilled. I guess they'd have to formally revise the specifics of the sentence ("tomorrow morning, by me" to "in a month, by Freddy") but that seems less like a miscarriage of justice than acceptable judicial discretion – death is the important part of the sentence, determining when and by whom should allow for practical considerations, to a degree.

It just seems like an easy compromise to make, or at least worth discussing further, and it's weird that none of them bothers – especially since Cat jumps straight to the necromantic solution! Why take that risk before exhausting your other options??

Mental Mouse

Also, Hanno was responding to a request to have the Proceran trial first, and now the Proceran trial will be after the Terms trial.

Satan

Christophe is gonna be pissed when he finds out the proceedings of the trial are being withheld. Not to mention the whole resurrection business.

Chapter 40: Campaign

"A war is not always won with daring, but it is always lost without."

– Florianne Goethal, Princess of Brus

When the First Prince left the Arsenal, it would be with a talking corpse in a locked box.

The work on my end was done, and it'd been exhausting enough that I slept fitfully for a few hours after returning to my rooms. Archer kept watch, and intercepted messages and reports before they could reach me. I woke up halfway to Afternoon Bell with a stiff leg, the undead Red Axe remaining as a little bundle of senses in the back of my mind I could look into if I so wished. I could snuff her out again with a snap of my fingers if I so wished, a precaution I'd judged necessary given who the heroine had made deals with when she still breathed. Let Procer have its trial, and Cordelia settle her princes. I'd made it clear it was the last favour I'd be doing her for some time, and that now it was her time to deliver.

Among the messages Indrani passed me was one from her, which turned out to be a good start on that. She'd officially ratified a treaty making the ealamal a weapon under the Grand Alliance, if not a weapon of the Grand Alliance. Yannu Marave and I were being invited to post up to three hundred soldiers each to stand guard over the weapon, with Procer itself promising to limit its own garrison at five hundred. Twenty slots for 'scholarly observers' were offered for each us, with access to the doomsday weapon, though if Named were to be part of that twenty it would require unanimous approval by a vote of the signatory members of the Grand Alliance.

All this we'd agreed over the Lord of Alava's strong wine, but the added list penned by Cordelia's own hand of all Named she was willing to grant access was an unexpected boon. As I'd expected Hierophant wasn't on it, but both Roland and the Forsworn Healer were. Only a few villains were among them: the Harrowed Witch, the Forgetful Librarian, the Royal Conjuror and the Hunted Magician. Three out of four were Proceran, but honestly of my lot they were the most decent folk that'd be able to get something out of looking at the corpse. The Affable Burglar was the only Named she went out of her way to specify would be allowed under no circumstance, which honestly was fair.

Aurore was delightful, but she had the worst of Vivienne's old habits paired with a moral compass to make a priest weep.

I penned a quick diplomatic thank you note for the First Prince, then a longer message for Lord Yannu mentioning I was still willing to back up his nomination of the Healer if he was willing to do the same with mine of the Rogue Sorcerer. I was willing to get it all going this very evening, if he was. Most of the other messages were minor, the only one of decent importance a formal confirmation that the war council would begin tomorrow through the Mirage. I'd already agreed to that, though, so it wasn't a surprise. What was, however, was the official report I got from the Arsenal research council that a functional, usable Unraveller pattern had finally been made.

Mind you the estimated costs for one were still higher than I'd like – about the same as a good horse – but it'd be worth the coin if they worked as advertised. I'd spend a good horse's worth of gold on an artefact capable of destroying a beorn or even a turtle-ship with a single touch without hesitation, considering how necromantic constructs tended to be the Dead King's means of shattering shield walls. Hells, with a decent supply of those the Lycaonese would be able to hold Twilight's Pass until the Last Dusk – they were a damned stubborn folk, and their fortresses would hard to invest without Keter's monstrous siege engines.

"We've got Unravellers," I told Indrani, grinning. "We still need proper field testing, but they seem to hold up. The Blind Maker had a breakthrough while we were busy politicking – apparently wood soaked in Arcadian water works just as well as that murderously expensive stuff we were bringing in from the Waning Woods."

It was easy to forget that, for all the intrigue permeating it at the moment, the Arsenal remained first and foremost a research facility. That'd not stopped just because nobility had swarmed all over it.

"I want a full quiver," Archer replied without missing a beat.

I snorted.

"Sure, if it comes out of your pay," I said. "Even for your beast of a bow the size of the thing will be a little hard, though."

I passed her the report, which included dimensions, and she looked disgruntled. Yeah, that was more a lance than a javelin. She might be able to throw them – scratch that, she'd definitely be able to throw them – but unless she had a bow made specifically for firing Unravellers she'd not be able to use them as arrows.

"Alexis's silver bow will be able to handle them," she reluctantly admitted. "It's a Gigantes artefact, it can change its shape some."

Huh, good to know. Just for that the Silver Huntress had earned a guaranteed place among the Named that'd be joining the offensive into Hainaut. Assuming said offensive was agreed on by the Grand Alliance, though I expected it would be. That bridge the Dead King was building didn't leave us much of a choice. I had a few questions for Indrani – including whether or not she could spare the Harrowed Witch, now that her old band had been gutted – but we were interrupted by a messenger. The White Knight was requesting, firmly but politely, a moment of my time. I didn't allow myself to sigh until I'd sent back an affirmative that Hanno could call on me.

"Want me to stay?" Indrani offered. "If you want a loomer, I can loom."

"I won't be needing a loomer, no," I amusedly replied.

"I've been practicing this thing with the knives, too" Archer told me, "Where I'm carving away all casual at a piece of wood, but then I change the angle and it makes this sinister scraping sound-"

"You're not going to intimidate the White Knight with sinister wood scraping, 'Drani," I told her, lips twitching.

"You can't know until we try," she insisted, then peered at me piercingly. "Good to have that chat alone, then? Shiny Boots is bound to be a little miffed over your latest bout of corpse-snatching."

"He'll have to get over it," I said. "I broke no laws."

"Because that argument always works with heroes," Archer drily said. "I guess you haven't had a polite and oddly preachy argument in too long, something's got to be done to scratch your itch."

"Out with you," I grinned.

"But what about what's right, Catherine?" Indrani said in a deep voice, looking at me stoically. "Have you thought about the children, or how this will make angels sad?"

I bit down on my laughter, since otherwise it'd just encourage her.

"Away, witch," I said. "Go chuck terrible sculptures at Masego."

"Heard that might get illegal soon," she replied, cocking an eyebrow at me.

I let out a startled laugh. I'd forgotten my teasing promise to Zeze from when we'd been mopping up the last enemies in the Arsenal, but I shouldn't have expected him to – or to have failed to inform Indrani of it.

"I'll make you royal art thrower," I promised. "Court title with a legal exemption and everything."

"Make sure it sticks under Vivienne too," Indrani requested, "I'm fairly sure the wench likes him better than me."

I managed to keep a serious face at that, which was quite the achievement, and ushered her out before the White Knight could arrive. I was a lot more dishevelled than I would have allowed myself to be in front of Lord Yannu or the First Prince, but unlike them Hanno had seen me on campaign. Staying in a tunic and comfortable boots wouldn't be taken as an insult by him. I poured myself water waiting for him, and before long an attendant was knocking at my door. I dismissed the young woman in question at the door and welcomed him in myself, gesturing for the salon in front of my room. The White Knight was dressed just as fancily as me, his tunic grey to my green, and if anything his boots were more worn than mine.

I found Hanno's face hard to read as he entered and sat, though his continued silence save for simple courtesies did not bode well. He sat and declined the water I offered, expression calm. I lowered myself on the seat on the opposite side of the table, raising an eyebrow to invite him to begin.

"You made the body of a heroine into an undead prop," the White Knight said.

Calm, but it wasn't a friendly kind of calm.

"Legally speaking, Procer did that," I noted. "It employed my services in doing it, true, but I acted on its behalf."

"I expected better of you," he said.

"Oh, fuck off," I flatly replied. "I wouldn't have had to step in if you'd compromised with Hasenbach yourself. The way I asked you to."

"What she asked for-"

"Was hard to swallow," I interrupted, "but she asked it for a reason. Refusing her is fine, Hanno, but if you do then something has to be done to address those reasons. You can't just call it politics and say it's out of your wheelhouse, not when your heroes are half the reason we're in this mess to start with."

"There was no call to compromise, Catherine," the White Knight said. "If the Principate is proving incapable of fulfilling basic treaty obligations it agreed to, it should not be further indulged with concessions. You are acting in a manner that will secure signatures for your Accords but destroy any trust there might be in them."

"I'm acting in a manner that keeps Principate conscripts, food and coin flowing," I said, voice grown cold. "You know, those things we need if we want to have any chance at all of beating Keter. What was done breaks no laws and did not interfere with the sentence you passed under the Terms. You have no grounds on which to complain."

"You could have told me of your intentions," Hanno said. "You chose, instead, to scheme."

His eyes narrowed.

"I am not blind," he said. "You pushed to have the details of the trial placed under seal so that word of the trial in the Highest Assembly will spread among the people of Procer long before the one in the Arsenal does."

"Named will be able to ask about the sentence passed on the Red Axe, as is their right under the Terms," I replied. "They will be told, if they do, that you personally executed her."

It'd come out eventually that Procer had tried a walking corpse, that much was certain – there were too many Named for loose lips not to eventually spill the truth, and the Arsenal itself was not airtight – but by then it wouldn't matter. Hasenbach would have had town criers all over Procer spreading her story first, an apparatus that no Named could hope to match in speed and scope. The people of Procer would treat it as rumours, not the true story, while Named would have the White Knight's own word of having killed the Red Axe to count on. Hanno's own reputation was being used to anchor this, which I suspected was part of the reason he was angry.

"You build your tower on a foundation of lies and confusion," the White Knight said. "It can only crumble."

"If this was about ten people, or even a hundred, you'd be right," I said. "When it comes to a few hundred thousand, though, to millions, then all those stories in the back of your head stop mattering. The scope is just too large for a pattern like 'the secret coming out' to make a dent. Even if rumours linger, more rumours can be seeded to dislodge them."

"More lies," Hanno said. "Making a game of treaties can only lessens them, Catherine."

His expression tightened.

"There was a moment, in that room where we had come to speak with the First Prince, where you decided I had become an obstacle," the White Knight said. "Already you had it planned, suggesting that Procer to get custody of the corpse."

"I'm not one of yours, Hanno," I mildly said. "You got in your own way and it needed to be done, so I did it. If you want pretty ends, get them yourself. Below deals in much, but rarely that."

"This has cost you trust, Black Queen," he said. "From heroes, and from me. You made the choice to go behind my back instead of working together."

And that was true, I wouldn't deny it. But this pretence that I was just a scorpion stinging out of habit was infuriating me, because I wouldn't have had to do anything of this if he'd godsdamned handled it himself.

"This has cost you respect, White Knight," I replied, voice gone hard as steel. "Because the longer you speak, the more I can't help but notice that for all your whining you haven't given a single alternative."

The conversation ended there, which was for the best.

—

Sometimes I thought about how much gold had been sunk into building the 'Mirage' and winced, but I had to admit that at least it looked impressive.

It wasn't that the room itself was large, or all that richly decorated: it was a circle with a radius of maybe a hundred feet, and the place was aggressively bare of ornaments. Nothing had been brought into here that might interfere with the enchantments, and even we had been warned to keep our clothing simple. No jewelry, and no weapons were allowed in – and for me in specific, neither my yew staff nor the Mantle of Woe. At the centre stood a great table of stone, carved with small runes that could be touched to silently signal you were requesting the right to speak, and around said table twenty seats of stone had been assembled. Those seats were within boxes of clear glass, which would serve as the medium for the magic, but in truth the entire room was an intricate ritual array hid under the floor tiles.

With all the glass and the strange table, surrounded by smooth walls of polished stone, the Mirage made for an unusual sight. I claimed my seat with a limp, letting a mage attendant close the glass panels behind me, and breathed out in surprise when within moments I began to see around the table people that were thousands of miles away. The illusions were damned convincing, too: I could see the flush on Rozala Malanza's cheeks, and the details of the folds on Itima Ifriqui's skin. It was a shame that there would be no refreshments offered at this war council, given how long it was likely to last, but Hasenbach had suggested that after an hour we vote on taking a pause so at least I wouldn't stuck in this box forever. It was going to get warm in here, I suspected, considering the openings in the glass were small and meant more to let in air than address heat.

There were too many commanders in the Grand Alliance for them to all fit in one room, much less warrant the expensive arrangements necessary to be connected to the Mirage, so it was only the very highest rung of command that'd been invited to this war council. For the front in Twilight's Pass the Kingfisher Prince had come in person, while an illusion Lady Itima Ifriqui of Vaccei stood in for the Dominion troops in the region. For Cleves, an illusion of my old foe Princess Rozala Malanza of Aquitan had been conjured up while Lord Yannu Marave had claimed his seat in person. For Hainaut, grizzled old Klaus Papenheim has been brought in phantom form while the Kingdom of Callow had its representative in my person. Though not a general, the First Prince naturally had a seat of her own as the highest military authority in Procer.

Going by numbers Callow's presence in the room was almost slightly small, and in truth I'd been offered the right to bring in an Army officer from the Pass to even the numbers a bit, but I'd declined. Dragging Pickler or Kilian into this was unwarranted for essentially the same reason that neither Razin Tanja nor Aquiline Osen were in attendance even though they fielded troops in Hainaut. Hells, it was why General Pallas wasn't here even though her Tyrant's Own numbered more than the troops Lady Itima had brought up north. None of those commanders were of the highest authority in the front. If I told Razin to send out his foot, the boy did it. If the Iron Prince wanted the kataphraktoi to screen the flanks of Alamans skirmishers, screen those they did.

While all those people would be told of the decisions made, and participate to the planning of the campaign itself, the hard truth was that none of them were influential enough to warrant a seat here. And not all seats were equal in here, either. I spoke for the entire Army of Callow and was the informal representative for the drow as well, which meant my word weighed heavier than that of any single Levantine or Proceran save perhaps Cordelia herself. Their authority was diluted by their numbers, not strengthened: Itima Ifriqui could not speak for the captains under another of the Blood, and Malanza couldn't speak for the Lycaonese holding the Pass. My army's chain of command was fundamentally unlike theirs, when it came down to it. Theirs forces were a messy patchwork of personal noble troops and free captains answering this way and that, while mine had been inherited from the relentlessly professional Legions of Terror.

Given the difficulties Cordelia still had in getting her princes in line I might actually have more soldiers under me than she did, regardless of Procer fielding a significantly larger force overall.

There was no small talk, and barely even greetings. Once the spells were stable and the mage-attendants had made sure the links were matched silence was given without even needing to be called for. Everyone knew why they were here, and how serious the matters at hand were. It was the kind of weight that tended to make small talk feel like whistling in a graveyard. Hasenbach did not let the silence linger for long, opening the council with a few brisk courtesies and then getting us started in earnest with the unfortunate realities of our war.

"All of you have, by now, received the information that the Witch of the Woods obtained during her sally beyond enemy lines," the First Prince said. "The Dead King is raising a bridge in northern Hainaut, in the flatlands known as Thibault's Wager. Troops are being massed on the northern shore, and fortifications have been raised to harden the site against assault."

Itima Ifriqui of the Brigand's Blood rapped her knuckles against the table before her, requesting the right to speak and having it granted immediately.

"Did we get hard numbers on what is being massed?" the Lady of Vaccei asked.

"The initial report by the Witch estimated around two hundred thousand on the northern shore," the First Prince replied, "but that was more than two months ago. We have not been able to scry the location since."

"I mean no disrespect to the skills of the Lady Witch," Princess Rozala said, "yet it occurs to me that the Hidden Horror might well have allowed her this vision. I won't argue against the necessity of break that bridge, but it seems to me we are being provoked to battle on his time and terms."

She was right about that much, in my opinion. While I honestly doubted Neshamah had given up the game with the bridge on purpose – he wasn't infallible, we took him by surprise sometimes – he was aware that we knew about his bridge and couldn't afford to let it stand. He knew a battle was coming in this 'Thibault's Wager', and he'd be prepared accordingly.

"I've been sending native outriders and Helike cataphracts deep into enemy territory," the Iron Prince told us after being given right to speak, "and the reports from the survivors all speak to the same truth: the Enemy is withdrawing deeper into Hainaut. We still get regular raids on our lines but the army Old Bones wanted to strike with while the plague ravaged our backs broke into smaller forces. We think at least half of them are headed north."

I touched a rune on the table with my fingers, which drew Hasenbach's attention, and she gave me the right to speak a heartbeat after.

"It's a safe bet he's fortifying the Wager," I said. "The longer we wait to make our offensive, the more heavily dug-in the dead will be. Revenants, constructs, earthworks. He'll make that place into a fortress."

Possibly literally. The flatlands would become even more strategically valuable after the bridge was built, should we fail to stop that, so it would be a sound use of resources to raise a fortress there. The right to speak passed back to Lady Itima.

"A surprise strike through the Twilight Ways is the answer," she said. "A strong force with Bestowed can shatter the works and retreat."

"And the moment the dust settles on that raid, the Dead King will begin raising a new bridge," Frederic pointed out. "It would be worthwhile for him even only for the forced attrition – how many elite troops and heroes will we lose with every attack?"

"The work can't be done in a day," Princess Rozala disagreed. "It will slow him down enough that we'll get breathing room to muster a proper answer."

"Your theory rests on the Hidden Horror's means to build staying the same," Prince Klaus retorted. "They won't. The longer this goes on, the more bodies he can mobilize."

"If we strike at all, it should be to win lasting gains," Lord Yannu said. "There is only so much blood we can afford to spill over that bridge."

"The strategic reality is that a raid is just pissing away lives," I bluntly agreed. "We have to be able to hold the region, or we'll be doing this again and again. Even if we make this Wager impossible to build in, what prevents Keter from starting work on a bridge a hundred miles upriver?"

"We would be committing to a major offensive entirely on the Dead King's terms, Queen Catherine," Princess Rozala replied. "And if a severe enough defeat ensues, it seems likely that the Hainaut defensive lines will be unable to withstand the counterattack."

"If Ol' Bones gets two hundred thousand of his finest on the south bank, we won't be able to withstand a plain attack," the Iron Prince grunted. "Your instincts are good, Malanza, I mean no slight to them. It'll be a nasty piece of war to slog through, for sure. But I don't see that we have a choice. The Black Queen put her arrow in the eye: this is going to keep happening until we secure the shores of Hainaut."

"It would make the principality easier to defend," the Kingfisher Prince noted. "Barring disaster, having a moat between Hainaut and Keter should offset the casualties taken winning it."

"A plan that accounts for victory but not defeat is not a plan, it is a daydream," Lord Yannu said. "If disaster does happen, how does Hainaut hold?"

"I will be bringing reinforcements from Callow," I said. "The Duchy of Daoine has agreed to send six thousand men, under condition that they are used purely for defensive warfare. Lady Dartwick will hold the command."

Duchess Kegan had been willing to shake loose some of her soldiers, if they were used only to man the defensive lines. I didn't even grudge her the limitations, considering those lines were going to have to be manned regardless: skilled as Deoraithe fighters were, on the field I would rather have more legionaries in the ranks. I would have liked some Watch, mind you, but Kegan had been understandably unwilling to let any of them near the greatest necromancer to ever live. I didn't want Neshamah to get his hands on that mass of souls the Watch got its powers from either, so I'd live with the disappointment. Besides, if they stayed in Callow then they were for Malicia to worry about – and given how few troops were left to defend my borders I wanted her to worry as much as possible.

"Six thousand will not hold back the tide, Your Majesty," the Princess of Aequitan said.

"Neither will hiding behind our walls," I flatly replied. "And even if we suffer a defeat, the Ways mean there will always be a path of retreat the enemy can not follow us into. That will mitigate casualties, and the defeated force could then retreat to the defensive lines faster than the dead can march and replenish its ranks with the reinforcements from Daoine."

"Companies of volunteers are also being raised from the refugees in Brabant," the First Prince said. "Though they will not be ready in time to participate in a summer offensive, they can at least serve as a strategic reserve."

"Starvelings in dwarven tinpots," Lady Itima snorted. "How many of those poor souls are you raising?"

"Between ten and fifteen thousand," the fair-haired princess replied.

A pretty number, especially when you added my six thousand Deoraithe to it, but no one here was fooled. How many of those ten to fifteen would truly be fighting fit, instead of sickly elders or children too small for the breastplate? If it was even half I'd count us lucky. Procer was at least a year past scraping the bottom of the barrel when it came to recruitment, these days it was digging into the floor under the metaphorical barrel. Still, warm bodies with spears could hold the defenses we'd raised. Not well, but long enough for reinforcements to arrive. And with Named to stiffen the backbone, we should be able to avoid a general rout the moment the volunteers first saw what an offensive by Keter looked like.

"Ten thousand starvelings can hold a wall, Itima, if they have a Callowan backbone spread through their ranks," the Lord of Alava said.

"Might be," the Lady of Vaccei grunted back.

"Though our hand is being forced, there is another reason I'm in favour of an offensive in Hainaut," I said. "The Hierophant is close to a breakthrough on a weapon that would make an attack on the Crown of the Dead feasible – and reclaiming Hainaut would be necessary before such a step."

It was good news I'd given them, and it was treated like it. Only Hasenbach knew of Quartered Season in any depth, though both Malanza and Marave were aware that I'd had Masego working on something since the foundation of the Arsenal. Klaus Papenheim, in particular, had finally traded that grim Lycaonese scowl for a distinctly wolfish smile.

"Within three months we should have the artefact itself," I continued, "and though the time required to make it a fully functional weapon is uncertain, it would be ready for use by next summer."

Meaning if we took back Hainaut this year and dug in over the winter, we could attempt to end the war in a single stroke the following year.

"Might we expect a fuller understanding of this weapon soon, Your Majesty?" Princess Rozala asked.

"Once the initial trial is complete, in three months, a briefing will be arranged," I said. "Before that I will only fully inform the First Prince herself and a designated high officer for Levant."

The Levantines shared a look.

"I will be that officer," Lord Yannu said. "It will be confirmed by the Majilis before the end of the day."

I inclined my head in acknowledgement.

"In light of what I've said, I'd like you all to reconsider how you're looking at the offensive ahead of us," I said. "While it's true that Keter will be expecting us to attack, at this time I don't believe the Dead King will be expecting an all-out and sustained offensive to reclaim all of Hainaut. This could be an opportunity for us to do real damage."

"You're suggesting we destroy the Enemy's forces in Hainaut," Frederic said. "Bold."

"I'm suggesting that if this is to be our last offensive before we move against Keter itself, it's in our interest to destroy as much of the Dead King's armies as possible," I said. "Better to face them on the field than behind the walls of the Crown of the Dead."

That siege would already be hellish enough without Neshamah being allowed to pull back his armies in good order and turning his capital into even more of an impregnable nightmare.

"We don't have the numbers for that kind of campaign in Hainaut," Prince Klaus pragmatically said.

"The Firstborn forces under General Rumena are willing to participate to that offensive," I said. "And I'd like for commanders on the other fronts to consider sending reinforcements."

"The defense of Cleves will be made significantly harder by the absence of the Firstborn," Princess Rozala said.

"Perhaps that will remember Gaspard Langevin the realities of his situation," I said, tone gone sharp. "Sve Noc's patience is not without limits. Besides, it is Twilight's Pass I would expect more soldiers from."

"Holding the grounds we've taken is not leisurely, don't let the stalemate fool you," Lady Itima said. "Your raiders ought to have told you this much."

"You believe the Unravellers will stabilize our front enough we can afford to thin the ranks," the Kingfisher Prince said, eyes narrowing.

There was some undisciplined talk at the talk of the artefacts, since to my surprise the news hadn't made it everywhere. Lady Itima had held no idea, and to my surprise neither had the Iron Prince – he must have been away from reliable scrying relays.

"I wouldn't take my mages from you, but Special Tribune Robber and Sapper-General Pickler would both be of great use on this campaign," I said. "Not to mention a few hundred Lycaonese foot."

Prince Klaus looked a little flattered, I saw from the corner of my eye. Well, he knew what I thought of his people as far as soldiering went. Lycaonese fought fierce and rarely broke, there were few better men to field against the dead. Frederic's horse was famous as well, but they were mostly retinue troops and Hainaut was already well served in cavalry by my reckoning. Between my knights, Lycaonese cavalry and the kataphraktoi we had a fine array of heavy horse, while Alamans horsemen made for fine skirmishers and outriders.

"If the Unravellers prove reliable, I would agree to lending troops to the offensive," the Kingfisher Prince said.

Not that he could keep Pickler or Robber from leaving if I recalled them, but it would be undiplomatic to withdraw my soldiers without first consulting the commanding officers of the front.

"You don't need my lot, not when you've got Tartessos screamers," Lady Itima noted. "I'll send Moro and a company of sworn blades, but no more."

"I would be willing to contribute Alavan captains," Lord Yannu said. "Should the campaign be soundly planned."

More heavy foot, these, allegedly the finest in Levant. I nodded in thanks at both Levantines.

"If the Firstborn leave and our Levantine friends split their forces, I do not believe I can spare much men," Princess Rozala said, tone faintly regretful. "And of that little no horse, if the drow no longer screen the coasts."

"Setting aside the details of the offensive," the First Prince said, "I now ask formally: is this is council in favour of a summer offensive in Hainaut?"

The vote was unanimously in favour.

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, so there's an extra chapter in the tab of that name. Titled Charlatan IV, it's the last of the sequence.

Javvies

Yep. Hanno's not happy about what's happened with Red Axe's corpse. We all saw that coming.
And I expect that most of the other Heroes aren't going to be happy about it when they find out either.
Villains might be amused.

On the other hand, Cat's right – Red Axe's actions caused problems, and Hanno wasn't considering the larger picture of problems that Red Axe contributed to and Cordelia needs to deal with.
There weren't any good solutions, far less any that could be considered Good.

Also, this is basically confirmation that Cat and Cordelia were interested in being able to confuse, blur, and spin the details and timing for public consumption, rather than truly keep secret the sentence.

dadycoool

I half expected Cat to threaten him with something like "Would you like me to tell my people that the Heroes are getting upset that dirty work got done?"

caoimhinh

I expected Cat to remind Hanno of what she told him 3 chapters ago when he admitted he had no solution to this issue:
"Then pray, hero. And I'll see what I can get done down in the mud."

I thought she would say something along the lines of "I warned you. Did you expect a clean solution down here in the mud?"

Liliet

I don't think Cat would appreciate if HE reminded her of her snappy one-liner either. Remember how flustered she was when he brought up what she said to the Choir of Endurance? Yeah, what you're proposing is high key not Cat, bless her self-conscious dramatic soul

Shveiran

That is comparing apples and oranges, I feel.

She was embarrassed because that one-liner was spoken from a version of herself she no longer aligned with, not completely.

This time, I'm pretty sure that she stands by what she said; even more now than then, in fact.

Liliet

It was still a silly dramatic bit of theatre.

Shveiran

I do not disagree, but there is a lot of difference between a snappy one-liner thrown at enemies she no longer wishes to antagonize, and something she still believes but could maybe, possibly have been phrased a bit more placidly.

I'm not totally convinced that even that isn't exaggerating, to be honest: this chapter saw Hanno talk about how she "lost his respect" for solving a problem anyone else refused to address, and I can't imagine Catherine being embarrassed because she sharply reminded him he was washing his hands clean of the matter and leaving it in her lap.

Liliet

Maybe.

caoimhinh

Nah, that time she was embarrassed because apparently there's a pun somewhere in there. Something to do with bottom-feeders, if I recall correctly. She even states that to Cordelia "I didn't say it because of the pun!".

Cat always stands by what she says, and it is not "high key not Cat" for her to remind people of what she has said before. We have seen Catherine remind Malanza, Tariq, Akua, and Cordelia about their previous conversations and invoke parts of it, particularly the parts when she made offers that were refused, which is pretty much what happened here: Hanno refused to take Cat's offer of compromising in something, so she had to do things on her end without his help.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, i withdraw my previous concerns though. I thought Cat was walking into a villain mistake, but she accounted for it. This story's biggest point of vulnerability was it's discovery. If she is letting it be discovered this easily and accounting for that instead of trying to suppress it, it can't form into the crashing wave and will but dribble at her feet. The hurting of the relationship with White Knight is unfortunate but survivable.

caoimhinh

Indeed, though it seems to me that Catherine handled her conversation with Hanno quite poorly. She reacted with harshness and coldness to his complaint when she could have calmly explained the necessity of her actions. Not an excuse nor a justification, but a reasoning, and Hanno would have listened and made his peace with it even if he wouldn't agree to such course of action. Heck, she knew this was coming, she should have prepared for that conversation, she had time to think of what to say and how to say it. Hanno did not need to agree with her by the end of that conversation but there was absolutely no need to go about it with such rudeness.

That whole conversation, Catherine was all "shut up, I got it done, suck up your complaints"

This is not the first time they have argued and disagreed over a subject, nor will it be the last; but it was the first time that she spent the whole conversation being rude to him.

hakureireimu

I disagree; Hanno already knows about the necessity of her actions and her reasoning. They are simply have a disagreement over their values, and that's not something mere words can gap, similar to their previous disagreements over the pray vs act dichotomy.

Liliet

Hanno knows the reasoning and they've had this conversation several times already.

What Catherine could have addressed and didn't was Hanno's complaint about the breach of trust on her part – she didn't just do this, she also did it behind his back.

Of course, the breach of trust results from a lack of trust of HER in HIM – she expected that if she gave him the veto right (which she'd effectively be doing by not tricking him), he would be obstructive.

And it's... not unreasonable, given context.

I think Hanno has a lot more to reflect on from this than Catherine does.

'Ladi Williams

Actually, this was a conversation they have had times without number. He was coming with the same complaints without have an alternative to put forward. She was tired of saying same things over and over again.

Shveiran

This.

dadycoool

"Excuse me, Cat. This wool is uncomfortable on my face." Too bad he really didn't have any alternatives to give. Indrani's a treasure.

Ooh, a war council, complete with holograms for those not physically present. It's good to see how they manage all this.

IDKWhoitis

I'm kinda surprised that the Named didn't get an official seat, or at least Hanno also get invited.

Liliet

Named don't hold battlefield command, they're flatly subordinate to battlefield command they're attached to. Hanno handles his own assignments of who goes where, sure, but so do Razin, Aquiline and others Catherine has brought up as examples of who DIDN'T make it to this council.

Hanno's not a general and he's not pretending to be.

IDKWhoitis

I think even if the Named are theoretically not included in battlefield command, they are important assets that must be accounted for. A front could do more with less troops if Named are a part. Therefore, when looking at how many troops are being strategically redeployed, keeping the Named in mind must be done. In not only quantity and positioning, but also condition and favorable groupings.

At the same time, from a political standpoint, the villains have a non official representative at the table making important decisions. In a different context, this isn't too much of a probelm. But in the context of Hanno being tricked and cut out of decision making process, it sets a Trust trap for the future where the Heroes cooperate less than they do now. The heroes either ignore what strategy is laid out in front of them by the committee (arguably the best case) or actively propagate the perception that Cat is controlling the Grand Alliance (worst case in my eyes, as it breeds hidden poison for future endeavors).

Liliet

Everyone's keeping them in mind already. Information bits are taken care of, the point of the war council is to make sure the politicians are on the same page. Named stay out of mundane logistics by choice – unless it directly concerns their Name, it's not their problem and they're not going to think about it.

Actually, I think you're right, not including Hanno IS an oversight. If he'd been present for these, maybe he'd have a better appreciation for how goddamn important keeping Procer whole behind their backs is.

Javvies

On the one hand, that assumes that they didn't offer to include him, only to have him refuse – probably something along the lines of he's not a general or ruler, and therefore has no place in discussions concerning non-Named policies, politics, and other matters.

Or that he was invited and decided not to show for this meeting because of what Cat and Cordelia have done with Red Axe's corpse.

On the other hand ... this appears to, at least on the surface, be an entirely secular meeting – the principals or designated representatives of the primary battlefield commanders and the member nations of the Grand Alliance.

We should also keep in mind, Hanno was pretty clear in the infamous Hero meeting that Heroes should not have sway or influence over the Grand Alliance members and their policies solely on the basis of being a Hero.

There's doubtless going to be another meeting, likely between Cat and Hanno, it isn't clear who else might be an appropriate attendee, concerning the Named response and reallocations necessary for the threat.

It's also possible that they are dealing with the non-Named stuff first, and Hanno will be brought in to discuss coordination between mundane policies and decisions and Named/Heroes.

Liliet

Hanno being invited and refusing way back when they were first figuring things out is about what I'm thinking for this.

IDKWhoitis

Although if that were the case, I feel like Cat would have mentioned that or it would have been conveyed in some other manner. This meeting is obviously important enough that any absences would be noted immediately by Cat or the other members.

Although thinking of it further, this could be one of those things delegated/shrugged off by Hanno earlier on when Cat was taking all the responsibilities.

I think Cat should push for him to be present at the next of these meetings, for the sake of perspective. And because I think Hanno is going to be sensitive to the appearance that Cat is withholding information.

Liliet

Yeah, that's what I mean. I figure he established that he wouldn't be present for those two years ago, so there's nothing Cat feels like she could note about this one.

And that's what left him oblivious to the actual urgency of Cordelia's request I think, so yeah, I agree Cat should demand he come.

WuseMajor

I feel like, if Hanno had come back with a counter offer or something, or at least some kind of assurance that Cordy could take back to her people, that might have solved things. The Red Axe and the Bard set up a situation that the treaties really just...didn't take into account. I feel like, if they had all agreed that the treaty wasn't perfect and things needed to bend a bit, things might have resolved better.

But then the Bard's Broken Tower was still going most likely. Hopefully, it's run its course by now and they'll be able to work to regain trust after this, but who knows.

Liliet

Hanno has a good point in that what Procer was asking for went specifically and exactly against the treaty it signed – it seems Terms directly specify that yes, a hero attacking whoever will definitely and explicitly be ONLY tried under the Terms.

Hanno doesn't have a good point in that the flat answer of "I don't see what we possibly could" when Catherine said they needed to give her something, did not exactly inspire the kind of confidence Catherine would have needed to bring him in on the plan (thus effectively giving him a right of veto, as all he'd need to do is specify what would be done to the body during the trial).

He really needs to pick what part he's complaining about, the solution or the not being told about the solution. Because both together only serve to weaken each other.

Abrakadabra

By not telling him she also protected him. He can honestly claim He did not know. Which is better than furthering the doubt among heroes that Hanno got corrupted somehow. As for Catherine, they did not expect better from her. The side benefit might be some mild respect from the villains for being clever.

Liliet

Yeah, and Hanno is not seeing it because he still believes he could have his cake and eat it, too.

Ninestrings

This is gonna be a god damned bloodbath.

A quarter million undead at least, being commanded by the wildest and most powerful mage on the planet.

That bridge is gonna burn for a thousand years.

JJR

"And now that we've discussed the plan in great detail we can expect it to go off without a hitch."

-Literally No One

Probably not going to happen because non-named tend not to play to stories like this, but it would be kinda funny if Princess Rozala actually did sent a large group of soldiers to swoop in at the last second but not tell anyone.

Jack Reader

The thing is, Hanno wasn't complaining that what Catherine did was wrong and morally repugnant, though it was. Our boy Hanno is much too canny to try and argue that to the Black Queen, which, if we were to contrast with Taylor Hebert's "Queen of Escalation", could be called the "Queen of Pragmatism". What Hanno was complaining about here was that Cat chose to cut him out of the decision-making process, and went behind his back to get things done instead of even trying to bring him into her plan. And he is correct in that, if he and Cat are to work together in their roles as representatives under the T+T, they need mutual trust, which Hanno had so far actually given to Cat, before she broke it. In an interesting reversal of roles, Hanno is the one that came in talking about the relationship between Hanno and Catherine, and Cat was the one to turn it into an issue between Above and Below.

Of course, Cat wasn't wrong to go over his head, because if she had brought the plot to him, in the best case scenario he would have had to sign off on it, which would have dirtied his hands and put his position as Representative of Heroes in jeopardy if it ever came out (which obviously would in the worst possible moment); and in the worst case scenario he would have refused to cooperate and actually made things more difficult. Neither of them was wrong, but neither of them can afford to be right either. It just goes to show the ugliness that is politics.

Xinci

Yeah, the mutual trust part being broken is a bad pattern to get in to. We have sadly seen it ruin things at the most tenuous of times, in multiple instances. Hopefully, Cat will work to avert such a thing but Creation does love to retread its tragedies with different actors.

Shveiran

She didn't really go behind his back, though.

They had a talk where they discussed that concessions were needed or Procer risked collapsing. Then Hanno said "I don't think we can do concessions", and Cat said "Then pray, White, and I'll see what can be done here in the mud".

Then they had a talk with Cordelia, and Hanno doesn't give an inch. Then he leaves and the two of them stay.

Was there any doubt she would have done something to address the issue? She straight out told him. Then he refuses the compromise, leaves them, and acts surprised that there was further discussion on the subject?

I'm kind of disappointed in you, Hanno.

How could you expect anything else? In fact, I dare say you didn't expect something else, or in refusing that compromise you'd have likely condemned Procer and everyone else.

It's kind of convenient to indulge in idealism while relying on someone else to fix the practicalities, but heroes will be heroes... at least don't bitch about it afterward, though.

It's kind of embarrassing.

nimelennar

"What Hanno was complaining about here was that Cat chose to cut him out of the decision-making process, and went behind his back to get things done instead of even trying to bring him into her plan.”

She didn't cut him out of the decision-making process. Hanno did that to himself when he categorically refused to discuss the sentencing of the Red Axe. If you make it clear that you can't even allow yourself to hear what theoretically might need to be done if a “guilty” verdict is returned and the likely sentence imposed, you forfeit any right to complain about what people have to do to mitigate the obvious political damage that would result from that sentence.

Liliet

Honestly, Hanno's wrong in how he mixed complaints here. He complained that what Catherine did was morally repugnant... AND that she didn't bring him in on the plan. Yes, White Knight, she was treating you as an obstacle, are you saying you wouldn't have been?

For all of his love of trials, he doesn't really get how adversarial process works, does he?

You don't get to both insist that you will not discuss the sentence ahead of time AND complain you weren't told the discussion about it that other people held ahead of time AT THE SAME TIME, honey.

Xinci

Hm, I do wonder how true Cats' statement on “the truth comes out trope” would be. Information propagation between small and larger groups doesn't change that much, so how well the true events would come out may depend on where the Heroes/major dispersals are located. That is what gives Cordelia the advantage in putting a proper spin on things here.

I do suppose perception is really the biggest part here rather than the pattern actually not being viable to larger sample sizes.

Cat not finding a method to keep trust with Hanno is rather unfortunate, and hopefully not a recurring pattern. As trust keeps being one of if not the most important underpinning factor for averting disaster as it strikes attempts to create better institutions.

Burlyraven

Okay, we've been teased on Cat's coming Name for a while now, but I seriously do not see how this attack goes well without her coming into it in full. Either she's the Named leader of this host, or she earns her Name as she stumbles out of the remains of the thousands she committed to the attack. Considering too many story threads are saying that we have a year to wait for the final offensive, this is just feeling like too big of a pivot.

dadycoool

Yeah, if nothing else, the scope of this threat requires something really big, like a Naming.

edrey

Well, Hanno mentality is the problem but that is heroes for you. As side note i was half expecting the spell for that weapon would come from the scorched apostate, that kid was talented.

TeK

So what do you think DK's plan here? I think either it's a bait for an all-out assault to strike at other fronts, or it is some kind of a ritual that would benefit from having near hundred thousand living bodies being near it.

I mean, no way it is JUST a bridge.

mamm0nn

Cat arrives at the bridge

Cat: Oh no, it's actually an aqueduct. The Dead King is stealing our water!

Meanwhile at the dwarven side of the siege

Dwarven soldier #14325: Darn, me socks are getting wet again. Makin' me grumpy and slightly less inclined to charge.

Dead King: Trading two hundred thousand on the surface for a mild inconvenience to the dwarves is definitely worth it.

Shveiran

Thank you. Truly.

thearpox23

The Dead King's armies are basically Shrodinger's armies at this point. He can simultaneously afford to throw away a hundred thousand troops for a minor advantage, but also get his defensive potential for Keter reduced if the Grand Alliance gets a couple efficient victories.

Frivolous

Not sure I agree. The Dead King knows how to create a permanent gate to a Hell. Diabolist was only the second person known to do it. Neshamah was the first.

If he ever runs out of zombies, he can always open another gate and use the devils that pour forth as troops.

thearpox23

I was addressing the way characters (mainly Cat) think and are strategizing dealing with Neshamah's fighting potential, not his actual strategic options.

Javvies

Opening a permanent Hellgate, or a Greater Breach, isn't that complicated in terms of skill/knowledge by Praesi High Lord trained mages.

The problem comes in the form of needing a massive amount of power to do it (which also means massive amounts of wasted power radiating out creating massive amounts of magical fallout), and devils summoned via hellgate are more complicated to control.

Also, once you open a Greater Breach/permanent Hellgate ... it's there forever, and you can't decide you want to close it ... which means it's going to be letting out demons for the rest of time (or until some Hero drops an Angel on it – and you).

mamm0nn

Unless of course you conquer the entire Hell and fill it with undead and supposedly people to prevent there being demons and devils on the other side of the Hellgate to come out. (The only living person we saw that told Cat about there being people living in the Serenity turned out to be a Malicia fleshpuppet. Technically we never saw anyone alive native to the Dead King's lands, so we cannot say for sure whether he actually has human farms in his Hell.)

Letouriste

I have this weird conviction DK want to bring back Dread Empress Triumphant from the hell she probably conquered. A metaphysical bridge fueled by the death of tens of Named and hundreds of thousands of soldiers could do the trick

Liliet

Dead souls don't actually go to Hells, as was firmly established fairly early on. The Triumphant saying is just a saying that survives on tradition + narrow spread of actual knowledge of how Hells work. There's a reason Masego rolled his eyes every time someone uttered "may she never return" early on too.

thearpox23

The bitch dropped her own tower on two opposing armies and two legions of her own soldiers in a gigantic conflagration. If she had a plan to go to hell post-defeat, she could've pulled it off. And no mage or spiritualist would be able to trace the ritual afterwards because of the above-mentioned conflagration erasing any and all evidence. That Masego rolled his eyes at the idea speaks more to his narrow focus on the specifics of the legend than on the much more important question of 'Could Triumphant have actually gone to a hell?'

For the record, I don't particularly anticipate Triumphant's appearance, and even less that the bridge is in any way related. But I would not discount it entirely.

Liliet

I am.

She's dead. Heroes killed her. She's worldbuilding.

thearpox23

I enjoy your confidence.

Liliet

Me too

Frivolous

You know how the city in the old Transformers cartoon movie turned into a giant Transformer?

This could be a bridge that transforms into a colossal Revenant with a footprint capable of squashing an entire town at once.

7imelock

So we have the Red Axe, a heroine (specializing in anti-magic and presumably able to use Light) brought back from the dead against her will, restrained, and with a long-ranged death switch held by none other than the Black Queen herself, is now going to the heartland of Procer to take part in a second execution. This second execution that one could argue to be extremely cruel and unjust, given that Hanno, the Sword of Judgement, was deceived in what nefarious purpose they would use the corpse for when he passed his sentence and was understandably upset when he found out.

Oh, and the First Prince and the Black Queen have, as step three (or at least four if we include transporting Red Axe and her second sentencing separately) of their plan, distributing misleading and false rumours about her trial.

And now they think this morally unrighteous and unjust plan (that Catherine may or may not have implied to be infallible), with multiple steps, is going to go off without a hitch.

Furthermore, Cat has now lost the trust of Hanno, and probably quite a few other heroes, just in time for the summer offensive against DK. Wonderful.

Eldrene_ay_ellan

I think the plan bears startling resemblance to Malicia's plan to acquire Liesse as a weapon. A situation that seems hopeless, deceiving and going against the most central convictions of an ally, multiple glaringly obvious points of failure and the need for all of it to not only go off without a hitch but remain a secret.

It's a terrible plan, if a problem cannot be solved cleanly trying for the quick easy fix is not inherently better than waiting to see if an opportunity presents itself.

Frivolous

I don't think the Red Axe came back as a Revenant, with intact aspects. I don't believe Catherine knows how to do that.

I'm virtually certain that the Red Axe can't use Light anymore. She's an undead raised with Night. Using Light when you're animated with Night seems very very contradictory.

I don't think the second trial of the Red Axe will be cruel, unless the Highest Assembly uses something nasty to kill her a second time with. I mean, the first execution was pretty humane. A single slice through the neck with a Light-imbued sword had to be very quick and almost painless.

Liliet

To be fair, Catherine did establish through questioning that the traditional punishment is boiling in oil. On the other hand, I'm extremely not seeing what that's going to do to an animated corpse besides being a pretty bit of ceremony. I recall raised Catherine in Liesse taking an arrow to a hand and barely even noticing, and I'm seeing exactly 0 reason for Catherine to spend effort on giving Red Axe functional pain receptors.

Decius

It just needs to be boiled in oil for longer.
A regular human boiled in oil feels pain until medium rare.
A specialty undead boiled in oil feels pain until extra crispy.

Shveiran

That's... not how not having pain receptors work? It would destroy her, not making her feel pain.

AceOfSword

"villains : [...] the Forgetful Librarian"

I have questions.

Earl of Purple

She's the lady Cordelia is using as an archivist in her new spy headquarters. We know little about her, save she's been Named a while and was discovered by accident.

Shveiran

Oh, Hanno.

You are usually on my very short list of esteemed heroes, buddy, but you really took a nosedive here, didn't you?
For all your calm and thoughtfulness, you turned into a full teenager protester here.

WK: I don't like what you did!

BQ: Do you deny that this problem had to be addressed?

WK: No, but I don't like what you did!

BQ: Did you have a different plan to address it?

WK: No, but I don't like what you did!

BQ: Did you not, in fact, physically leave the room where a solution could be found without making any suggestion to a possible solution?

WK: Yes, but I don't like what you did!

BQ: If I had done nothing, would you be any happier with the consequences?

WK: No, but I don't like what you did!

BQ: In light of all this, do you feel you have a right to be angry here?

WK: Yes, because I don't like what you did!

BQ: Would you like a lollipop, kid?

And there is nothing wrong with teenager protesters. Heck, I was one. But they are meant to protest and raise awareness, not lead the fates of nations. This kind of attitude has no place in the shoes you are wearing, pal.

Drop one, or the others.

Liliet

...Kind of, yeah.

I hope Hanno reflects on this and finds some realizations.

Shveiran

I know, right? I don't want to dislike Hanno, Sister damns it. Stop making me dislike Hanno, Hanno!

Liliet

Eh, everyone can be a buttface sometimes. I still like him.

Shveiran

Oh, me too. I just like him less. Kind of the same with Frederic, really. Which I'm still heart-broken about.

Liliet

Eh, I love 'em just the way they are. Characters who are in no way idiots are just boring -_-

Juff

Typo Thread:

would hard to invest > would be hard to invade you," I grinned. > you," I said with a grin.
began to saw > began to see wouldn't stuck > wouldn't be stuck illusion Lady > illusion of Lady brough up > brought up participate to > participate in Theirs forces > Their forces
Quartered Season > Quartered Seasons remember > remind little no horse > little to no horse

Frivolous

I find it interesting that Hanno kept complaining about Catherine's lies.

I guess that in the 2+ years since he and Catherine first met, absolutely NO ONE bothered to inform him or the other heroes that the Woe's motto is Lies and Violence. Not even Tariq, who had a good look into Catherine with Behold before Sve Noc came along.

It seems a shame that this sad neglect has occurred. So very sad.

I can only guess that until now Catherine has been relatively straightforward with Hanno. Which just means she's not a pathological liar, only a practical one.

Liliet

Catherine does get by on being straightforward and honest most of the time. Her lies are effective BECAUSE they're few and far between so you're not really on guard – when she does try to lie, it's these really blatant silly things, isn't it? Like "I don't speak Ashkaran" or "this was my plan all along", those charming affectations.

And then there's actually a trick, and you fall for it because 99% of the time doing exactly what Catherine Foundling suggests is in fact the best course of action for you with your interests fully taken into account, no false bottoms.

Hanno should really do a bit of reflection though, on whether he wants his and Catherine's relationship to be an adversarial process or a cooperative one. Because if it's the latter, he shouldn't have refused to discuss the sentence – perhaps not with Cordelia, but with Catherine, absolutely. And if it's the former, she's completely within her rights to look at a solution he'd be obligated to object to, as he looks to his adversarial obligations over the cooperative goal, and say "I'm keeping this secret".

Like, it's an exact match. He cannot complain that Catherine didn't tell him her plans about THE SPECIFIC THING HE REFUSED TO DISCUSS, REPEATEDLY, EVERY TIME SHE BROUGHT IT UP THE MULTIPLE TIMES THAT SHE DID.

Raved Thrad

This brings to mind the scene in Twilight where they're arguing as to who needs to sit the throne and die, after Saint slashed the crown. As Catherine gets set to talk, Archer comes up from behind and puts her hand over her mouth, saying "the last thing you want to do when you're winning is to have Catherine Foundling talk." Or something to that effect. 😊

Liliet

Heh.

Ragnarok Ascendant

Hanno...okay, yes, I saw this coming, but I never really like heroes in this story in general given how inflexible they end up being. The utter refusal to see a bigger picture and bend aggravates me.

Liliet

omg Aurore
my new favorite Named

Hanno has a point which is that Catherine did not tell him ahead of time. It's a sign of existing lack of trust – she worried that if she told him he wouldn't agree to give over the body, which... well, that sounds like a "him" problem, too.

Catherine's talking like he was objecting to what she did rather than how she handled it, which is fair as he objected to the first part too – but I got the impression his main problem was the second. He'd thought they were closer and had more trust between them than was the truth.

I don't think he's chosen the best way to address that, which is nothing new for Hanno. He's excellent at some things, but he's no politician and no diplomancer. Charisma is decidedly NOT his highest stat.

I hope this doesn't turn into a disaster)=

Tom

> Only a few villains were among them: ... the Hunted Magician.

What could go wrong?

trysalvages

Why has the iron prince been away from scrying? Staking a bid on him being somehow compromised now.

Kyrius

Why should Hanno sacrifice his principles? Cordelia turned down a name that would solve her Prince issue because she didn't believe a Named should Rule Procer. Protecting Procer is her job and yet she has never shown willingness to sacrifice her principles to save the country even during a coup with a war they were losing. Protecting Procer isn't Hanno's job, its Cordelia. She chose the non practical option (she didnt know about Bard and she still wants to use the Angel even today). And yet some in the fanbase are more mad about Hanno not doing it then Cordelia turning down that Named. So its not really about practical vs principles.

trashdragon

To add to your comment; the entire premise of why Hanno should let Cordelia and Cat just do whatever is that it's necessary for the war against the Dead King. Okay, Sure. But why doesn't this argument apply to the nobles of Procer that are getting uppity solely because they're butthurt over the war effort cutting into their coffers even with all life on the continent in the balance. Apparently war necessity doesn't apply to them and Cordelia has to needs to pussyfoot around with political wrangling instead of just bringing them to heel in the name of survival? She just had a team of heroes sent to Mercantis to bully them into keeping their wallets open but we can't do the same to Proceran nobles?

Of course there's a reason for this, it's that Cordelia has a political agenda of keeping her power base and the general power of the Proceran nobility intact and free of heroic meddling. And she's piggybacking this agenda on the back of the war. And Cat is going along with it because it advances her long term interests of keeping Procer on board with the Accords. And it's heroes (no matter what wrong they may have done) who get used as sacrificial pawns to protect the ambitions of self-interested politicians.

For anyone who's familiar with Metal Gear, this is exactly the kind of shit that drove Big Boss into creating Outer Heaven. And I wouldn't blame Hanno for a second if he did something similar when the smoke clears with the Dead King.

Mirror Night

I find it hilarious so here in the fanbase argue that Hanno should sacrifice his principles when Cordelia turned a Name (Warden of the West) that solve her Prince issues not because it was practical but because her principles said a Named shouldn't rule Procer. So she basically caused Prince Issue by refusing a Name cause her principles are so important. And I should note these things matter more for Names cause going against your core tends to weaken you and make you more likely to fall or lose your name. So Cordelia is not willing to do whatever it takes to save her country and cannot do her job because of that but Hanno should be making a compromise when Cordelia refuses to compromise her core principles? Saint was right kill all the Princes.

As for Cat wow really cannot take criticism. This is a lady who gets mad at Champ for the Captain cloak threatens to kill her despite you know the terms saying everyone gets a free pass for bygones even Rapist. Even after Champ does this Cat still gets mad at her and the Levant Heads for inviting her to a meeting so again not practical that is pure emotion and putting principles or at least sentimentality first. Hakram has to talk her down and again shows the importance of Hakram because he tempers her while Indrani just amplifies Cat's worse impulses. Levant should put Villains on Roles despite it being against their Principles but the HBICs dont have to compromise at all. She then goes on to attack a little girl in Pascale cause she failed to her job to protect Tancred and refuses to apologize for no reason besides Principles that say she shouldn't have to cause she is the Black Queen. Despite an apology costing her jack, she can do it in private and having Pascale afraid of her has zero practical benefit. So Cat cause of her Principles refuses to make the even smallest concession that costs her nothing at all.

So Hanno and Levant should sacrifice their principles despite Cordelia and Cat refusing to do the same. Cordelia is especially egregious cause its her nation on the line. So Hanno should give his for something that isn't his job and when its Procer welching on the deal. But Cordelia doesnt have to when is her job to protect Procer and she refuses to do so cause her principles. I expect characters to be hypocritical. I just find it so funny that the fanbase gets so blinded by Protag Centered Morality they fall for it as well.

AbraKadabra

Cordelia refused the name because she did not want to be influenced by it. There. Your first point obliterated. 🤪

Lord Haart

That... WAS the point though? The Name would protect Procer in the short-medium term but not the long term; Procer may survive, but will become just a regular story like everywhere else.

I think the point here – and the one Red Axe was making – is that you can't always assume "how to survive" is more important than "why to survive". I tend to agree with OP here – I see exactly why Cat is how she is but she gets in her own way and her alignment with below comes with a price – she isn't tied down by principles, but she's going to have a hell of a time creating a legacy of principles with the Liesse Accords for this very reason.

Even Black has a principle (victory and defeat), Cat is more pure utilitarian but with two major flaws; 1. She is still human and has personal bias, 2. She has urgency/survival bias which stops hey from really questioning the kind of society she will create, or the sort of Named who will follow after her – people who will start civil wars, raid other nations to kill their leaders, and even protect the most foul abuses of power by those under their leadership. All in the name of a greater good Put like that, it really sounds alot like the criticisms of Above I see on here a lot, no?

(For all the above, I love this story! It's called the Practical Guide to Evil after all, and at this stage I think Neshamah is effectively Cat's sixth guide, after Black, Malicia, Larat, Sve Nov and Kairos. It's actually pretty neat that each book has had a guiding figure who leads Cat a bit further into doing things "by any means necessary").

trashdragon

Especially since we've already gotten a taster of what a society being built by Catherine looks like. It involves heavy handed military rule with administration completely dominated by the Legion with Catherine placing her closest confidants in the highest positions of power and outright hand-picking monarchs. It means powerful spy networks that suppress any hint of dissent via blackmail, assassination and shows of force. It means the Clergy becoming an arm of the state. It means Callowans being removed from their lands to make way for Goblin settlers.

A lot of this was inherited from Black, sure. But instead of hand the power in Callow back to Callowans like she originally wanted she essentially doubled down on Callow as a military junta backed by Praes. Except now Callow might end up at war with Praes anyway, which was the entire point of Black conquering Callow in the first place.

Is this whole mess justifiable by wartime necessity? Maybe. But the problem with authoritarian war measures is that the power taken is almost never given back. And Catherine herself think's almost entirely in terms of war measures and the thought of relinquishing powers rarely even enters her mind. Will the world under her Accords be some medieval fascist dystopia? Maybe, maybe not. But I don't trust Catherine to prevent it from becoming so.

Shveiran

→ Especially since we've already gotten a taster of what a society being built by Catherine looks like.

We didn't.

We saw what she could scramble together with the existing pieces between two country shattering conflicts (the Fae/Diabolist and the Crusade).

Noticing the limits of what she built with little resources, less time and a tight timeline does not really inform us on what she could build without those constraints, especially with a narrative victory in her sails, which in the Guideverse kind of counts for a lot.

AbraKadabra

Bullshit. Callowans removed for goblins to make place, huh? You have a rich imagination because there was none of that ever written.

sengachi

“apparently wood soaked in Arcadian water works just as well as that murderously expensive stuff we were bringing in from the Waning Woods.”

-This is an experimental research mood.

“This has cost you respect, White Knight,” I replied, voice gone hard as steel. “Because the longer you speak, the more I can’t help but notice that for all your whining you haven’t given a single alternative.”

-Well damn if that isn’t the crux of the problem right there. It’s understandable to take a principled stand. I’d even argue that politics and life would be harder if we couldn’t trust people to take principled stands even when it’s a sub-optimal decision. But you can’t criticize someone else for not taking a principled stand without providing an alternative to get what they need.

kinghaart

It really underscores the difference between Above and Below again.

Below will do what it takes to get the outcome every time, precedent be damned. Every decision is made in the context of itself, with as much knowledge and forethought as possible, but ultimately still limited to the context of that question. Lessons from the past are generally ignored; hence why Villains are so often considered insane – they try the same thing and expect different results. Even the Calamities still operated within this general mode, despite being more self-reflective and precedent-aware than nearly any other Villains to date short of (arguably) Irritant and Traitorous. Below rewards ambition and testing limits and boundaries.

Above, by contrast has principals, and these are unerring. There’s a clear hierarchy of them, too, and if a Hero is in a dilemma where one must be sacrificed the answer is always clear, even if it’s just to pray. And Above rewards that sort of blind faith by saving the day with Deus Ex Machina most of the time, or having some other silver lining like with Heroic Sacrifice.

When looked at in these terms, it’s clear that while Cat is a different sort of Villain than others in the story, she’s not actually outside the bounds of Villainy altogether.

Satan

We know too much of the plan. By the power of tropes it must fail or at least be significantly altered by a new development.

aran

I do sort of suspect that Cat has paid for short-term success with long-term failure here. It's not clear that there were good options, but it's also not clear that she acknowledges the latter at all.

Going through with the judgement reinforced the hero/villain truce terms as inviolable (which both Cat and Hanno agree was necessary right now). But it also established, to the heroes, the pretty monstrous cost of such a truce.

Right now, with a world-ending threat to fight, the heroes (or most of them) are willing to pay that price. Afterward, when the threat is gone, and Catherine is hoping the heroes will nonetheless go along with her Accords? I'm not sure that she can count on even Hanno's support.

Chapter 41: Coterie

"The only thing more inconvenient than being part of an alliance is not being part of it."

– Prince Luis of Tenerife

The last time I'd seen anything near this scale had been the Doom of Liesse, when every major Callowan and Legion force west of the Hwaerte had engaged the Praesi and wights under the Diabolist. Yet, however apocalyptic that day had been, in the end it'd been only one day. The Grand Alliance's attempt to reclaim Hainaut would be a great deal more sustained than that.

The numbers were staggering, when put to ink and impossible to ignore. The Army of Callow would be fielding, in this campaign, a little under thirty thousand soldiers – the entire Second, Third and Fourth Army. Counting only the forces of Lady Aquiline and Lord Tazin the Dominion would be offering up at least twenty thousand, but if Lord Yannu's promises of Alavan captains came through the numbers should end up closer to twenty-five. General Pallas had seven thousand in fighting fit, though before mustering the full roster of the Tyrant's Own she'd want horses brought in since the kataphraktoi were running low on remounts. General Rumena still had thirty thousand to pledge to the offensive, the thinned numbers having actually strengthened the southernmost host of the Firstborn in several ways.

The exact numbers of the Proceran forces in Hainaut were harder to determine, on the other hand, since their chain of command was the stuff of nightmares for any Legion-taught officer. As in most things warfare, the Lycaonese were a notch above the Alamans: the armies of Hannover and Neustria were under the combined command of the Iron Prince, they shared supplies and kept track of their casualties. While they relied a little too heavily on the nebulous rank of 'captains' for my tastes – officers that could command anywhere from a hundred to a thousand foot, horse or even a mixed force of both! – but they were typically well organized and well trained. The northern royals fielded, between the two of them, a solid eighteen thousand. Including four thousand of that solid Lycaonese heavy horse we could never have too much of.

The Alamans forces were contrastingly disorganized, which to my admitted surprise hadn't even proved to be entirely their fault. The last Princess of Hainaut – elder sister to the current one – had hired every fantassin company she could get her hands on the moment Keter began to stir, but a lot of those had taken severe losses failing to defend the northern shore. Half the originally contracted companies no longer existed or no longer fielded the amount of men they said they did, and maybe a quarter of the current mercenaries in Volignac service were 'successor-companies'. Those were, essentially, mercenary companies raised from the survivors of broken ones and laying claim to an old contract under a different name as the successor of the disbanded company.

The mercenaries were trouble, and not just because they were fiercely independent. Fantassin captains habitually lied about their numbers so that they might claim more supplies from the Grand Alliance, or bargain for better remuneration, and weren't above lending each other soldiers to fake their way through inspections. We hung the captains we caught at this, but that tended to lead to desertions so we had to be careful. It didn't help that even the principality Alamans troops had their issues. There were the forces of three royals serving in Hainaut: Prince Etienne of Brabant, Prince Ariel of Arans and naturally Princess Beatrice of Hainaut. The Arans soldiery was steady, but also under the prince's personal command and he was often reluctant to take risks. If Hainaut fell his principality was the next on the block, he often reminded us, but for all that the Brabant folk were arguably more trouble.

Not because they were as cautious, on the contrary: Prince Etienne had bankrupted himself arming everyone he could in his principality and sending them north when the situation in Hainaut first went bad, which while a brave and necessary gesture was also the source of the trouble. Maybe a third of the Brabantines were actual trained soldiers, even their 'officers' were green as grass and though when they had the upper hand they were enthusiastic fighters their morale was otherwise... fragile. I'd not call a coward anyone who took up arms against Keter, but when you put shoemakers in armour and sent them to fight the likes of beorns they had a distinct tendency to rout. The conscripts had to be closely watched, and carefully used.

The forces under Princess Beatrice Volignac were the fewest, since they'd been bled hard failing to defend their homeland, which I found a damned shame as, practically speaking, it was a force entirely made of veterans. They fought hard, mercilessly, and with a burning spite I could only admire. They were also in some ways the least well-equipped, and the heaviest draw on Grand Alliance resources of the forces in the region: the capital of Hainaut had fallen, as had most its largest cities, so there was little coin behind them and only sparse land to feed them. At this point, the House of Volignac had more fortresses under its rule than towns – and its armies weren't even the largest force within those fortresses.

Accounting for the inevitable lies and grandstanding, our estimates had the total Alamans forces in Hainaut at around forty-one thousand. Fantassins companies made up for about fifteen thousand of that, and the Brabant conscripts maybe another ten to twelve thousand, so that meant more than half the number was less than reliable. If we got lucky the armies of Twilight's Pass would be able to send around ten thousand our way, mostly Bremen and Rhenia men with maybe a few from Brus. Which meant that at the end of the day, when all those forces would be brought together, there would be around one hundred and sixty thousand soldiers on the field. And that would be on the Grand Alliance's side alone. We were, typically, outnumbered at least two to one by the dead.

The campaign hadn't even begun and already the numbers involved were giving me a headache, so naturally I'd consulted the finest military mind at my disposal as soon as she was fit to be scried.

"It's logistically impossible for you to feed that many soldiers as a single force," Marshal Juniper of the Red Shields bluntly told me. "You'll have to separate them into several armies or you'll run out of supplies after a month or so."

"Our scouts have confirmed the Dead King left the roads mostly intact," I pointed out. "If we march along Julianne's Highway and spread out to prevent raiding, we could have an active supply line."

Named after an ancient First Princess of Procer, the highway was one of the major roads of northeastern Procer: it began in Salia, headed east through the city of Aisne, up into Brabant through the major trade city of Tourges and ended up north in the city of Hainaut, capital of the eponymous principality. It was large, made for wagons and very well-maintained. The Dead King had skimmed on the upkeep some, our scouts had said – which made sense since he didn't usually use wagons of his own – but ensured it remained in state to be used by his troops, and therefore ours. It was pretty much impossible to feed this large an army without using carts and wagons to bring in rations so I expected we'd need to do some repairs while we campaigned, but my sapper corps should be capable of handling that much.

"The Hidden Horror will ruin that road the moment it becomes obvious it's the axis of your offensive," Juniper growled. "Think, Catherine. His priority is stalling us while he finishes his bridge, he'll pull out every stone from the defensive line to Hainaut if that's what it takes."

"That's just as much of an issue if we split our force into smaller armies," I pointed out. "They'll have to follow roads as well, if smaller ones. And we might move quicker, with the Twilight Ways, but he's got better awareness out on the field. If one of our forces pulls ahead of the others it'll get surrounded and annihilated."

Or worse, slaughtered and raised anew. Sure, we could open gates into the Twilight Ways – but we could only open so many, and only make them so large. An army trying to retreat from an active battle would lose most its numbers to the retreat, assuming it could even pull one of those in good order. My legionaries and the Lycaonese probably could, but the Levantines and the Alamans? They were brave and hardy fighters, I meant not disrespect there, but they weren't disciplined.

"You're looking at it from the wrong way," Juniper said. "Going up the Highway you'll get stuck in one of the natural bottlenecks. The dead could mass in Lauzon's Hollow-"

It was the name of a natural 'pass' leading the highway into the hilly and rocky highlands of Hainaut, which while not exactly narrow was steep-sloped and easily defendable. Last year during our offensive we'd taken the dead by surprise there, smashing the force defending it with a deep raid of kataphraktoi backed by Named and then held it open long enough for our army proper to arrive. That trick, though, would not work twice.

"- or the overpass fortresses at Cigelin," she finished.

Fortresses was something of an oversell there. Les Soeurs de Cigelin, or the 'Cigelin Sisters', were a pair of large towers overlooking a dip in the hills the highway passed through. They'd been built atop very abrupt slopes at the point where the dip was deepest, one on each side, but the real danger was the chain-gate they commanded. A massive chain allowed a portcullis of enchanted steel to be raised or lowered across the road, and while it was hardly an unbreakable obstacle given enough mages or sappers it would be a costly strongpoint to force. Last time we'd used the Ways to go past it and then struck the garrisons holding the towers from the back, after drawing them out, but it'd slowed us down by at least a sennight. There wouldn't have been nearly as many nasty surprises waiting for us near the capital if not for that delay.

We'd torn down the fortresses and the chain-gate as we retreated, of course, but I knew better than to expect not to see them standing again this summer.

"We need those places under our control, Juniper," I pointed out. "By the time we get to the capital it'll be filled to the brim with corpses led by Revenants, which means a siege unless we want to throw away several dozen thousand soldiers storming the walls."

And we couldn't have a siege without supply lines to feed our soldiers, that much went without saying. Julianne's Highway was our best bet at such a thing.

"You are throwing away your only strategic advantage, superior mobility, to turn your army into a lumbering battering ram you want to smash through every gate until you reach Hainaut itself," the orc growled. "Losing scrying is making you too cautious, Warlord. If you split your army in three along three lines, the first taking the blue road towards Luciennerie in the west—"

I kept an eye on her profile in the mirror but the other was on the map spread out in front of me, displaying northern Procer. Luciennerie was a minor fortress by size, but it was the key to western Hainaut and more: holding it would give us control of the blue road when it went further west into Cleves, and so allow us to anchor our flank to our allies there.

"—the second marching up Julianne's Highway in the centre and the third going east by the old mining roads, aimed at Malmedit—"

Malmedit was a city, at least in principle, though even before the war against Keter it'd been turning into an empty husk. The city had grown out of multiple mining towns fusing into a single larger one, and lived off the ore trade, so when the ore had run out the people left for greener pastures. The Dead King had dug tunnels from further north that connected to the old mine shafts and he used the city itself as a staging area, since the lands beyond Malmedit itself weren't really fit to march an army across. If we took the city, though, we could collapse the mine shafts and shut the door on Keter's fingers.

"—then all three losses would be severe enough he'll have to commit to battle," I finished with a frown. "But he won't shy from that, Juniper. He has the bodies to spare, and he knows that if he defeats even one of those armies he can turn this entire campaign into a rout by collapsing that flank."

If either the eastern or western army was beaten back, the central one would have to withdraw or see its supply lines cut by raiders. If it was the central army that was beaten back it'd be even worse, as both other armies would have to retreat for the same reason.

"So he'll commit forces against all three offensives," Juniper said. "He'll be going after that victory hard, because if he wins it and finishes the bridge he has a decent change of overrunning as far as southern Brabant before a defence can even be mounted. And when his armies are committed, his reserves emptied, then the fourth army – the one you kept back, kept quiet – take the Twilight Ways and hits the capital directly. While it's been stripped of defences."

My eyes narrowed as I stared hard at the map. It was a bold plan, it was true, but then that tended to be Juniper's preference. And the basics of it held up to scrutiny, I thought. Once the dead committed to the battles, once they sent their soldiers out, it would not be possible for them to be recalled in time. They'd have to race across broken terrain, often without roads, while we cut through with the Twilight Ways. The army that assaulted the capital would be taking a risk, but if it paid off... We could keep a strong garrison in Hainaut then send forces to hit the enemy in the back as they tried to hold off the army going up Julianne's Highway, taking the dead in a pincer. Victories there, which should ensue swiftly, would open the road to the capital and allow for supply lines to be established.

Hells, with the dead out west and east stuck defending fixed positions we might even not suffer too badly from raids on it.

"It could work," I admitted. "And the smaller armies would lessen the burden on our logistics a great deal. Mind you, that's also thrice as much supply line to defend."

"I'd wager they won't even raid, at the start," Juniper grunted. "Keter will want you in deep before striking, it won't want to risk spooking you. After that, well, that's what you've got all that Alamans horse for. It sures as Hells isn't to win battles."

I snorted. The Hellhound's enduring dislike of Proceran light horse continued to amuse. Especially since she'd several times suggested Callow acquire its own in the past, should we ever get the means. Juniper appreciated the value of light cavalry on the field, which was hardly surprising given her taste for winning by manoeuvre. It was just that she believed, and I tended to agree with her, that Alamans light horse was useless against most kinds of undead. Unlike Proceran peasants the skeletons wouldn't break and flee when charged at, and the riders just weren't armoured heavily enough to withstand staying in melee long. As skirmisher, outriders and patrols they were still leagues better than anything else we had but given how many of them we had I'd have eagerly traded a few thousand for their equivalent in northern horse.

"It needs refinement," I said. "And I'll need to take it to the other commanders. But it sounds like the bare bones of a plan."

We didn't leave it at that, of course: I still had at least two hours before crippling headaches indisposed the finest general of my generation, and I intended to use every moment of them.

—

It was another five days until the delegation from Mercantis arrived at the Arsenal.

I was not part of those who received the six merchants lords led by an ambassador. Given the amount of gold the crown of Callow still kept in the city – from the coin the dwarves had paid me for my... mediation down in the Everdark – I'd been expected to, and my absence did not go unremarked. I left them to the First Prince, knowing that as long as I kept handing her such pretty hooks there were few fish she would not be able to catch. My hours were spent arranging the upcoming campaign, consulting both Vivienne and Juniper when I could and then taking those increasingly refined plans to the regular war council. Prince Klaus had his own notion of how the campaign ought to be conducted, but they were not incompatible so steady progress was being made.

After two days of being ignored, the diplomatic party from Mercantis realized that I had not the slightest intention of reaching out to them. They tried to arrange something through Cordelia, who to my great amusement 'declined to interfere in Callowan affairs', so when faced with that failure they finally took direct steps. It wouldn't be that easy, though. When the merchants sought an audience with me I passed them off to my designated heiress Lady Vivienne Dartwick instead as a calculated insult. They'd walked out of the room as soon as it was halfway polite to do so, Vivs told me afterwards. Good. I wanted them angry: anger would dull their edge, and dullards was what I wanted to deal with. The letter I received from Cordelia that evening was short and unsigned, but undoubtedly hers.

They want you at the table, the First Prince said. They want something from you. Anger them further.

It was heartening to see that these days Hasenbach knew me well enough not to even doubt my ability to infuriate other people. I was no noble, and I was hardly a deft hand at the games of those born to that station, but when it came to giving slights it must be said that I was rather well learned. I sent a messenger to arrange a meeting with the head of their delegation, Ambassador Livia – making sure her name was misspelled, a detail as petty as it was personally satisfying – but sent Lady Henrietta Morley as the Callowan representative. Vivienne's secretary was known as a lady as a courtesy title, as while she was the heiress to Harrow she had no lands of her own, and she held no formal position in my court. I was later told that sheer disbelief that she'd be snubbed this way had Ambassador Livia stick around for nearly half an hour before she left in a fury. I received a formal letter of complaint about my rudeness from the Mercantians, and without missing a beat responded by handing it over to Archer so that she could do a theatrical reading of it in the meal hall.

Indrani got a few Alamans priests to sing as a background chorus while she declaimed it in the style of epic poetry, which I thought was a nice touch. It was the little pleasures that made life worth living.

I knew Hasenbach had read them perfectly when they still tried to get me in a room after that. Mercantis officially requested an audience with the high officers of the Grand Alliance, to speak of the large loans it had extended over the war effort, but to my amusement this time I didn't even have to do a thing. Lord Yannu flatly refused to have the matter considered a Grand Alliance one, since neither Levant nor Callow had taken loans. So what was it that Mercantis wanted from me sorely enough they'd suffer repeated insults and still try to have talks? The merchants lords of the City of Bought and Sold were a proud lot, and not afraid to make their displeasure known when provoked. Whatever it was they wanted, they must want it very badly.

The following day I threw in another slight for good measure, requesting that they be contained to lesser parts of the Arsenal while war councils were held through the Mirage, and it must have done the trick because that afternoon I got another letter from Hasenbach. They want Cardinal, it said. Owned or buried. It took me, I had to admit, almost entirely by surprise. But it shouldn't have, looking back. A neutral city at the crossroads of Calernia, whose neutrality would be backed by several realms and a treaty binding Named? It was a natural rival for Mercantis, who would still benefit from the ease of transport over lake and rivers but lose out in most other regards. Cardinal would be, to the Consortium, the death knell of their influence.

It would do worse than destroy them, in their eyes: it'd make them just another of the Free Cities, another squabbling city-state the great powers would run roughshod over with little consequence.

"Owned or buried," Vivienne repeated.

I'd shown her the letter before consigning it to flame.

"Buried begs no explanation," I grunted. "So long as the Red Flower Vales remain a fortified border instead of a city, Mercantis is still presumably the main trading partner for Callow."

Trade with Procer had, even back in the days of the Fairfaxes, never been widespread. It'd been mostly restrained to luxuries, and even that much had died after the Conquest when Praes shut down the borders. Mercantis' days of influence over my home were soon to disappear anyway, though. Even if Cardinal never saw the light of day, I intended on seeing peace between Callow and Praes: my homeland's grain would start heading east instead of downriver, and the need for a middleman starkly decline.

"Owned is trickier to ascertain," Vivienne frowned. "The land for Cardinal will have to be ceded by Callow and Procer, so they can't possibly think to buy it. At a guess, they want control of the trade in the city."

I slowly nodded. It made sense. The concessions needed for the Consortium to have such a stranglehold would probably involve privileges granted by laws and treaties, which they could not help to secure without Callow's assent. They had leverage on Procer given how it was in debt to them – though thanks to Cordelia's caginess they likely didn't realize quite how badly indebted the Principate was – but they had little they could realistically strongarm me with. The Callowan gold in the vaults had been placed there by the Kingdom Under, so they couldn't do a thing there without angering the dwarves. That left pretty much only threats to sabotage the finances of the war effort as a whole. After all, while the defensive fleet of Mercantis meant it would be hard to attack militarily the city had so few mercenaries left to call on at the moment that the thought of it attacking Callow with any degree of success was laughable.

"So we know what they want," I grunted. "And why, at least in part. Now we move on to the trickier parts."

We had their aim and their angle of attack. In a sword fight that would be enough for any halfway decent blade to settle the match, but diplomacy was not so clear-cut. Hasenbach would have sweet-talked them into a degree of trust towards her, by now, since she was good at being mannerly and they believed they had a knife at her throat. The nature of this game was that the First Prince just wanted to settle this to everyone's satisfaction – but mostly Mercantis' – while the Black Queen was just being the worst sort of ruffian. Catherine Foundling, right? What a wench. Have another cup of wine, ambassador, and tell me more about what you want so that I might help you get it. No, on the silk glove side I considered us to be well handled. It was the steel I'd have to bring to bear, and that was more delicate than you might expect.

Too much steel and you had a fight on your hands, too little and they shrugged you off. There was an art to it.

"It can't be anything physical or provable," I mused. "Else we'll have a legitimate diplomatic incident on our hands."

My being a prick to their diplomats wasn't that, even if they liked to pretend otherwise. I was in no way obligated to grant them an audience if I didn't feel like it, though after my slights if the shoe was ever put on the other foot they'd be perfectly within their rights to humiliate me just as publicly.

Assaulting the diplomats, though, would be something altogether graver. It'd soil my reputation, Callow's and push them closer to Malicia.

"Don't forget the Tower will likely have a man or woman in the diplomatic party," Vivienne pointed out.

I didn't bother to say that we couldn't prove that, since even if I had doubts that Malicia had outright subverted one of the merchant lords into her service I had no doubts whatsoever that she'd bribed at least one to spy on her behalf. There was a reason they'd been brought in through a fake location and kept blindfolded through the translations. So the enemies to beat here were fear and greed, I thought. Fear of being left behind by the world that would rise from the fall of Keter, greed for gold and influence and power over others. I didn't have the know-how to craft an acceptable settlement deal with Mercantis, but that wasn't to be my role here anyway: the First Prince would see to that end of it. My part was forcing the merchant lords to back down from their ambitions, so that Hasenbach could slide in and offer them that alternative.

"So it will," I murmured back, then shook my head. "I need to talk to Masego."

Vivienne cast me a wary look.

"Why?"

"Because he knows the wards of this place inside out," I said.

Including those protecting the diplomatic quarters where our friends would be sleeping.

"Make it known to the First Prince I'll need a few days," I told Vivienne.

I did not insult her intelligence by specifying this should be done secretly. It was important that she and I not be seen to be collaborating, as part of our strategy rested on the appearance of us being at odds. If I was out of control, Cordelia could not be asked to prevail upon me with sweet reason. Why, I was trouble for her as well! I'd wager some of them would suspect something was going on, but the cordial working relationship between Hasenbach and myself wasn't exactly public knowledge. And it couldn't be denied that my stint as the Queen of Winter had left me with a... reputation. I was not above using that, if it came down to it.

"I'll handle it," Vivienne said, then cocked her head to the side.

She hesitated.

"Yes?"

"What for?" she asked. "The days, I mean."

I hummed, considering.

"Best you don't know," I finally decided.

"That reprehensible?" she asked, brow rising.

"It's better for the both of us if you keep your hands clean," I patiently said. "You know that."

She breathed out, as if gathering patience of her own.

"I know you're trying to smooth the path of succession," Vivienne said, "but this is getting out of hand, Cat. I don't need to be protected."

"A lot of your appeal as a queen will be that you're made of paler cloth than me," I bluntly replied. "It would be counterproductive for you to start tainting your reputation."

"I ran with you for years as the Thief," she said. "That ship has sailed."

"You also fought in a rebellion against Praes," I pointed out. "Look, Vivienne, I didn't pick your name out of a hat. I can trust you to take care of our home, and I respect your ideals. But we have to be practical about how this gets done or there's going to be trouble. I'm a warlord with no real claim to the throne, and you're deriving your legitimacy from the howling void that is mine. If this is going to hold without a civil war, you need to be popular enough no one wants to fight you. That means sometimes you'll have to be distanced from necessary evils so your reputation stays clean."

"There's no one else here, Cat," Vivienne calmly said. "For whose watching gaze are we doing this distancing?"

My irritation mounted.

"If you're not going to be involved, there's no reason for you to know," I said.

"To give advice," Vivienne said. "To provide a second pair of eyes. To make suggestions. Unless you no longer consider me fit to serve these purposes."

"I didn't say that," I sharply replied.

"I know," she said. "But you've been using this as a reason to take a step back from me, Catherine. For some time now."

That sounded like an accusation, even if she'd tried to make it otherwise. It was also infuriatingly vague.

"What are you saying, exactly?" I asked, frowning.

"That it would be natural if it stung," Vivienne delicately said, "that even after all you have done, since the truth about Diabolist has been known, there are some among our countrymen who would rather see me reign than-"

My fingers clenched.

"Enough," I cut in. "Enough. We are not talking about this."

She looked at me, and it burned that Vivienne looked not angry but instead tired and a little sad.

"We will have to, sooner or later," she replied.

"I have actual real problems to deal with, Vivienne," I told her through gritted teeth as I rose to my feet. "Instead of... whatever this is. Handle what I asked you to."

I didn't wait for an answer. I left the room limping, headed for Masego and the answers he'd have for me.

It felt like fleeing.

laguz24

Mercantis, the city that bought and sold it's way into irrelevance. Also, alienating your friends cat that is not a good idea.

Ninestrings

I've figured out Cat's new Name.

The Troll Queen.

naturalnuke

The bards most insulting play; trying to settle Cat with the Name of Fool.

Javvies

Yeah. Most of Callow isn't happy about Akua still being up and around. That's ... probably going to cause other problems down the road. Actual problems, rather than just grumbling and Cat not wanting to talk about it.

It makes sense that Mercantis would be worried about Cardinal. On the other hand ... Cardinal is going to be landlocked, while Mercantis isn't. Cardinal is definitely going to be a major center of power, but it is not exactly in the best location for a major continental trading center. Although, with the Accords, Mercantis might not be as necessary for being an intermediary between Praes and the nominally Good-aligned nations.

dadycool

That is a good point, with Mercantis being an easy water route, but Cardinal is going to be the main trade, etc, route across the mountain range, isn't it?

Javvies

Yes and no.

As I intend it, Cardinal is going to be in the Red Flower Vales, more or less.

That is, the traditional, and formerly only, point to reliably cross the mountains between Procer and Callow.

There is now also the Stairway, that the Alliance burned through the mountains for the northern invasion of Callow.

The Stairway is likely to be better for transportation, considering it was made to provide passage for an army, and presumably doesn't have sudden elevation changes.

The Vales are mostly naturally formed and are a well known choke point, plus have been fortified to prevent easy travel, plus had half a mountain dropped on one of the passages.

At any rate, Cardinal is likely to be a regional land trading center, between nearby principalities of Procer and Callow, and probably a center for magical reagents and components for magical workings, because of the school. And information, that's going to be a commodity in Cardinal as well.

But Mercantis is basically a Calernian equivalent of late medieval to Renaissance Venice, I think. At least in terms of waterborne trading potential.

agumentic

The Stairway is too up north, far away from any rich places. And it's simply not wide enough to sustain major trade through it. The Proceran attack was never intended to be constantly supplied, they had to reach a big city on what they had or starve. So I expect the Stairway to end up largely irrelevant in the aftermath.

Mercantis would still have advantage over Cardinal in the matters of normal trade, but that normal trade is only a part of its influence, maybe not even a majority. Cardinal is going to have more legitimacy because it will be backed by all major crowns of Calernia, which means it will be seen as better place for all diplomatic matters, and its financial institutions such as banks will be more trusted as well. Involvement of other power on the high level and constant movement of people in and out of positions will mean more opportunities for intrigue. It will have all the mage academies, which means that's not only rare reagents but all strange artefacts Mercantis now sells in its private auctions seen in Archer's Extra Chapter are going to end up. Last but not the least, there will be a lot of Named there, which means it's going to attract influence and narrative significance just because of that. So, Mercantis is not wrong to be worried.

caoimhinh

There's also the matter of Cardinal is supposed to be the equivalent of the U.N, so it's gonna have A LOT of relevance and influence as the neutral ground where representatives of all nations on Calernia can gather, which was to a certain degree a position that Mercantis had, as it has been shown in previous chapters that they served as intermediaries for trade between the Free Cities, and also between Praes and Procer.

Jago

The Starway is a military road burned by brute force on the flanks of an impassable mountain very rapidly with a limited energy source in a short span of time. Almost certainly it has sudden elevation changes, as it was made the point where the width of the mountain chain was the smallest. Probably it is something like this: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/San_Boldo_Pass.

That is a military road built by the Austro-Hungarian army in a hundredth day in 1918.

hakureireimu

I think the Cardinal will be in the Twilight Way, as the Arsenal proved that you can have permanent settlement in a fae realm long term.

Konstantin von Karstein

I doubt it, logistically it would be too complicated. And one of Cardinal's goal is too prevent war between Procer and Callow. With a neutral and very important city protected by all GA members between the 2 countries, the only way to invade is through the Stairway, which is at most 20 meter width.

Javvies

On what basis do you derive that width for the Stairway?

As far as I remember, nothing specific was said about its width other than it was big enough to efficiently move an army through.

And presumably it's a relatively smooth, fairly level (or at lowest only gradually sloping), more or less straight shot though the mountains.

Besides ... even if you're right and it's only 20m wide, that's still wide enough to allow for a multiple lane route in both directions of travel.

Konstantin von Karstein

From the second chapter of the 4th book: « It was difficult to put a finger on the exact size of the passage from this perspective, but I'd gauge as broad enough for two large carriages to pass simultaneously without getting too close.»

It could be use for commerce, but if remember correctly northern Callow is much poorer and with less things to trade, so Cardinal will still be a greater trade hub, even without counting all the raw materials the mage schools will need.

And I was giving the width to demonstrate that it would be in Callow's interest to put Cardinal in the Red Flowers Vale, so the only way possible for an invasion of Callow by Procer is the Stairway, a ridiculously defensible position.

Javvies

Oh, good catch. Still, I'd assume that it's basically a high quality roadway by virtue of being burned out of the solid rock. And then any improvements necessary for an army to use it, first by the Crusaders, and then Juniper probably had Pickler and the sappers review it for any needed improvements when the Army of Callow moved into Procer.

Yeah, the Stairway is going to be ludicrously easy to fortify, and ridiculously hard to force if defended.

On the other hand, the Vales are also easily defended and difficult to force.

That said, Cardinal is going in the Vales for multiple reasons, not just putting a neutral party as a buffer in between Procer and Callow. Though that is a rather nifty side benefit.

Liliet

I think Arsenal is going to end up part of Cardinal, but there will be a Creational part, too.

Abrakadabra

Or alternatively, the Arsenal will have several entrances, in the vicinity of each capital. If it is possible?

Liliet

It might, but it's likely to be administratively subordinate to/part of Cardinal.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

We know for sure that it will be on a mix of formerly Callowan land and formerly Proceran land, ceded to it by both nations.

Darkening

Sure, it's landlocked, but the more gates they get up for the twilight ways, the more irrelevant ships get as a trade method. When people can outrun ships with carts and without any risk of storms sinking their cargo I imagine that will shift trade lanes dramatically. Wonder if the twilight ways have oceans or if you can just walk to ashur?

Javvies

The Twilight Ways are limited ... most merchants aren't going to be mages, after all. And Permanent gates are massively limited in who can make them and how many can be made.

Xinci

Actually, they may have had a good point, all you need to activate a gate is an offering of blood. Given the ways seem quite amendable to travelers and nomads they might actually be a great avenue for regular trade.

Madover

In my head the reason as to why Mercantis is afraid of Cardinal is not the loss of trade per say but power.

Cardinal offers something that the merchant lords don't like and that is a reliable option for trade between nations that is neutral on the good/evil and thus can negotiate with both and they have the hypocritical benefit of not dirtying their hand by negotiating directly with a hated nation.

That would destroy Merchantis capacity to unilaterally dictate and enforce terms of trade with all nations as now there is an alternative aka competition something they never really had, most of the raw resources come from the big kingdoms like procer and callow, so with Cardenal they can reliably trade ignoring the city estare which only source of income and influence at a international level is trade, so with competition the merchant lord cannot just look down rulers as their displeasure would not mean a economic crisis or collapse of the hated party.

Liliet

So there'll be a limited amount of Permanent Gates, sure. Put one in each major trade center – which are big cities where a lot of things are going to be happening and there's a great many reasons to put a gate – and that's all you really need for Twilight to be a trade route medium.

Anyone who has blood can open them.

iLissuin

It doesn't matter that Cardinal is landlocked if it controls the Twilight Ways after the war. It would become a trading center without peer. It could move goods from any two places in Calernia faster than Mercantis could ever dream to do so.

Miles

I hate to say it but Cat is taking on even more nonpractical villain flags in this chapter. Maybe that's the name influence but either way it's something she needs to get a handle on if she wants to live. Sarah O'Connor

Liliet

I don't think it's Name influence, just the same psychological fraying that had her leave the frontlines.

TheCelestialEquation

But it will be a center of magical learning, so normal trade route tendencies will probably go out the window!

Javvies

That only goes so far. And only for certain categories of goods.

Cardinal will likely be a de facto center for magical and/or alchemical components; and information. It'll import things like luxury goods and paper/parchment.

But I don't think it'll really be a physical center of many trading routes.

I don't think Cardinal is going to be very useful for Praesi looking to import grain from Procer, for example. Maybe a deal gets worked out there, but the actual route the grain travels will probably not go through Cardinal, and will probably be more or less what it was before the Crusade got in the way of commerce, which would be by water.

Deals might get worked out in or through Cardinal, but I suspect that most of the physical trade routes, especially for large mass or bulky items won't go through Cardinal, unless they're starting from and/or going to places in the surrounding regions (that is, nearby in Callow or one of the close Proceran Principalities).

dadycool

Juniper's plan is getting way too much screentime. It's one thing to give vague details so they know what the other is talking about, but she's a known liability and sort-of leak. Her plan is definitely either what one of their enemies wants them to do, or it's not going to survive five minutes.

Cat can be quite the bitch. Way to good-cop-bad-cop with Cordelia. Maybe Mercantis will finally feel the pressure of real competition soon.

Interesting conversation between Cat and Vivienne. I wonder if Viv understands that the throne was an unexpected side-effect of Cat's plan to improve Callow lawfully. Correct me if I'm wrong, but I don't think Cat ever really wanted to be queen, just a position where she could make the lives of the common Callowan better. Disposing of the crown would probably be a relief when all is said and done.

Liliet

Juniper is not a leak. The Grey Pilgrim had cleared out what the Empress had put into her head, that's the entire reason for the headaches now.

Catherine + Cordelia cooperation is A+.

Just because the crown was an unexpected side effect and Catherine doesn't actually want it long-term, doesn't mean it wouldn't be nice if people APPRECIATED her in this role. It is, in fact, perfectly natural for it to sting, and Vivienne has hit the nail on the head sounds like.

It's not an "actual cross purposes" thing, it's an injured pride thing, and you cannot really reason with it.

It's really fucking sad that the way Catherine is handling it is isolating herself =x

Darkening

She may not want it, but Vivienne is likely right that it hurts that people don't want her even after all shes done and sacrificed for them.

agumentic

I don't think that the reverse of the Unspoken Plan Guarantee would apply here. This is more of a description of a plan in a heist movie – we need to know what the plan is so we can understand what the hell is going on and what is the objective in the first place. So while things won't happen precisely as planned and there's a room left for wild improvisation in the climax, the general skeleton of a plan and its objective will remain as described. In a way, the story and the reality here are the same – plans are useless, but planning is indispensable.

Liliet

This, yeah.

Note how after the basic outline of multiple armies and the routes they will take it goes back to "and then we discussed details". The screentime was given to the basic info without which we the readers would be utterly lost as to who what where at all as things happen.

dadycool

OK, yeah. Usually, the plan is a voiceover detailing what we're currently seeing the thieves doing, complete with the mastermind turning to the next person and the POV doing the same, but that's hard to do in text form. I also see what you and Liliet are talking about. The skeleton was sketched out, then the screen faded to black with a "now let's get serious."

tigerquoll

Typo thread

"The only thing more inconvenient than being part of an alliance is not being part of it."

– Not being part of one?

They were brave and hardy fighters, I meant not disrespect there, but they weren't disciplined.

I meant no disrespect there/ I meant not to disrespect them there (probably the former).

tigerquoll

It was important that she and I not be seen to be collaborating, as part of our strategy rested on the appearance of us being at odds.

As part of our strategy.

Juff

but they were typically > they were typically

As skirmisher > As skirmishers perfectly > perfectly mustwant > must have wanted ascertain," Vivienne > ascertain." Vivienne

Liliet

I think it's meant as "not being part of it", as in "an alliance exists but you're not in it".

Abakadabra

Exactly. It is fine to not be in an alliance, until the other players have no alliance either. But if an alliance exist, not being part of it can be bad.

In todays terms, it is fine to not be part of trade agreements with other countries, until there are no trade agreements at all. For example if I was Russia, it is desirable to be for me to be part of the EU. But if it is not possible to be part of it, Than it is better for me to destroy the EU, than being excluded from it. If it is also not possible, than I will make my own union with whoever I can lure in. (That strategy led to the conflict between EU and Russia which culminated in the ukanian crysis btw.)

Liliet

thanks for the insightful explanation of that one -_-

Abrakadabra

You are welcome, wether You want it or not. 😊

Liliet

To clarify: I'm Ukrainian. I come to this website specifically to NOT discuss the war directly to the south of me.

Also, there's like half a dozen other reasons for it, all of which suck and aren't relevant here.

Abrakadabra

Sorry.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think there was also the fear that a pro-EU Ukraine would endanger the Russian fleet's base in Crimea.

Liliet

This is definitely a great place for this discussion! 😊
😊 😊

Agent J

Coward.

Xinci

Ah, I was surprised Cat may have felt stung by them not wanting her as Queen once her methods came to light but with more thought it makes sense. She gets attached quite easily and has shown a pattern of distancing herself when she knows things cant work out. In a narrative sense, it is necessary to distance herself from Callow and views that shape her as the "Black Queen", but it cuts her away from her roots. Everything she has done has been to safeguard Callow and improve its chances, and given her focus on results/practical methodology, supporting her results supports her views. It's a painful thing to leave all you knew and fought for, even if it's necessary.

This is even more important for someone who is narratively aware like Catherine, feeling your own people against you must sting for someone like her. Still, if she is to have a greater Name and a greater Role she needs to be more than that, and as such, she needs to be cut away from some of her former ties to get a Role that is more purely viewed by everyone.

Liliet

Yup.

Catherine's sensitive to rejection and this is a pretty big one, considering it's all been for her homeland. She's basically martyring herself here, in the reputation + belonging way, and the emotional reaction to it not being pretty makes sense.

I hope she sorts out her attitude towards Vivienne, though.

Liliet

Oh Cat)=

Ouch.

Burlyraven

If Cat were a Hero, this would be a story in which she realizes she needs the power of friendship in order to win, and gets the band back together. Considering she's nominally a Villain, it's far more likely that the cracks that are showing now are only going to become fissures and canyons. Her story is showing too many signs of her taking the path towards being one of the dark and lonely Old Powers in whatever new world comes for me to think otherwise.

At the very least, there may be some very lonely times ahead, and soon.

thearpox23

Hey, maybe Akua actually does something redeemable by helping Cat through this, even at the cost to herself. It'd usually be Hakram helping Cat, and with Hanno's friendship semi-ruined, she really is the only one with the understanding and the ability to get through to her without being shut down.

dadycoool

Referring to her as an Old Power made me think of her as a Lovecraftian Old God. Depending on what kind of Name she develops, she might be anything from a crippled hermit (Old Toph stomped into my mindscape) to an Evil Galadriel in the new world that she will likely create and immediately get shunned from. If nothing else, she can party it up underground with the only people shorter than her.

Burlyraven

I was thinking more along the Old Toph lines, honestly. I just get the feeling that all paths from here (good, bad, and ugly) lead that way.

Liliet

I think the pacing is wrong for this to be cracks that will stick. Lots of minor conflicts have been accumulating in a way that feels like it's leading towards some resolution. And Guide's rhythm so far leads me to believe Catherine will find a new fairly positive equilibrium by the end of the book.

Tom

I agree. I mean, it's "A Practical Guide to Evil," not "A Sad Old Tale of Sad Villains Being Sad."

thearpox23

Historically, powerful trade centers had always had their magnates feel significantly less patriotic about their city than the regular folk. After a certain amount of wealth it becomes possible to settle anywhere, and so the bond to one's place of origin grows thinner. And whether or not Mercantis as a city gets any rights or benefits over the Cardinal, there is nothing stopping these Merchant Lords from being the first investors and businessmen in the newly found city.

Let their personal greed overpower their patriotism. Or at least that is how I expect the resolution to go.

caoimhinh

So... why don't they use the Twilight Ways for the supply lines?

Seems weird that half the issue with the strategy was that they needed the supply lines defended. I initially thought they couldn't gate that far due to some interference or due to the lack of scrying in the region, yet they can gate the fourth GA army to strike the capital from the back. Surely the supplies can arrive though a gate after the armies have settled in their respective positions?

The issue Cat spotted was that they couldn't gate out in a retreat since making the gates to enter so many people requires time and effort, but gating out requires no such thing, and they can also open smaller temporal gates for smaller groups of people, which the returning caravan now depleted of goods would be.

Then what's the issue? Using the Twilight Ways would provide safety for the caravan of supplies to each of the 3 or 4 locations of the armies, and not need to take as many guards as it would take if they use ordinary roads. Although they obviously need to still have patrols around that area to scout for remnants of the undead armies, there's no need to risk their supplies walking those roads when they can just gate to the armies' camps.

SpeckofStardust

The three armies are moving front lines intended to be fighting the undead at every point, opening and closing gates constantly for the front to act as a supply line is likely going to go poorly as a full supply line in neither small or easy to use. they'd be able to do it if they weren't planning on being on the offensive for this entire campaign.. And even then the supplies don't all magically come from a single location that everything can start from.

Liliet

This.

Liliet

Only permanent gates can be used by non-Named non-mages, and they don't have the mages (let alone Named) to spare for supply lines.

Daniel E

I like the bit of info we got about the aftermath of Juniper's compulsion, though I'd expected we would have seen more about the Legions in Exile by now.

LizAris

Aw poor Cat...

On the other hand, no one pisses off diplomats quite like our Black Queen. Letting Archer do a reading from the ambassadors, from the city that enslaved her, is absolute genius. Drani definitely enjoyed that.

I don't think I'll ever get enough of Cat and Cordy working together. I bet Cordelia first put on the crown she never thought she'd have such a useful, and usefully rude, ally.

Liliet

00ooooh I missed the personal touch for Archer part. Fucking beautiful, wreck them Drani!

308924810a

So the discussion of two thirds of the Brabantine Proceran troops being green as grass makes me think that EE needs to remember that he's just also said these guys have been at war for two years.

Either this is a now-unjustified reputation based on early showings, or the author is forgetting the time skip.

Mercantis should be easy to attack through the Twilight Ways, and unlike Keter they don't have enough forward-deployed forces capable of pressuring defences to be able to divert armies from a deep strike on their city.

Finally, my understanding of the logistics situation is that it was physically impossible to field a force of more than two hundred fifty thousand in antiquity (and then only when you had a waterborne supply route), and that's more or less the size estimate for the force that Persia invaded Greece with. And that Napoleon was able to figure out that by splitting his army of hundreds of thousands into parallel columns of no more than fifty thousand each he could speed up the pace of requisition of food from villages along the path of March, reducing the time spent on that and the strain on his supply chain in order to speed up the march. Unfortunately this trick is much less effective if all of the villages along the path of advance are dead.

However the Twilight Ways completely change the logistics equation, my understanding of them is that for anyone who can open a gate all of the trade and agriculture hubs on the continent are maybe a week's travel away, so it actually makes more sense for an army to march united and fight divided than it does to march divided and fight united. By which I mean that they all stay together while on the move so it's easier to get supplies to everyone through Twilight, then they either take the time to crush fortresses along their path, or they split off enough of a force to siege them and keep on going with the main body of their force if they're so concerned about giving the enemy more time to prepare for their arrival.

Once every target fortress is circumvalated with inward and outward facing palisades and is beyond easy reinforcement the amazing marching speed advantage of Twilight allows them to either crack the places one by one, or else reinforce the siege forces when they realize the dead are marching to relieve a particular siege.

Twilight means that normal difficulties with reuniting divided forces, with denying battle to an enemy you see coming and want to retreat from well before he gets in range, with supplying truly massive forces in the field, and with fortresses in your rear providing basing for attacks on your supply train, do not apply.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

With regards to the green troops I don't know if it's that inconsistent. They're specifically noted to be conscripts which means that even with training they might not have the build or the mindset to be soldiers in better times. Not everyone is cut out for that. Combine that with the fact that their morale is known to be inconsistent and it's entirely possible that they've been mostly deployed defensively or as Garrison's, in such a way that they haven't accumulated much experience against anything but Neshemah's dregs.

mavant

Can you say more about the impossibility of fielding a single force above some size bound? I don't quite follow that part. It seems like the bound would be mostly on flow rate of goods through the supply train, right? Is the implication that by splitting an army you can use more separate routes to supply it and thus have more supplies per unit time? If so, then does the 250k number imply something about an assumption of the throughput for a standard ancient road?

mamm0nn

Reading these plans made me actually realise something incredibly troublesome: we've seen but the reliable basis of the Dead King's might. The Dead King can also summon and control demons and devils, as should be obvious by power, age and him being the first to create a permanent Breach. He's currently going full undead theme, but he could potentially summon a host of devils against that fourth army if they try to corner him this way.

More troublesome, right now he's going slow and steady. If he summons demons, they can corrupt his undead with no problem to morale and likely strengthening them instead, though they do become more unwieldy to handle. Possibly requires him to make one-way feedback undead to not get corrupted through the connection himself, too.

But right now, we're looking at the Dead king leisurely and safely going about this. If he were to be truly cornered he could demon things up and Calernia is dealing with twisted undead running rampant instead. Probably doesn't do that right now, as it would corrupt and wreck the regions he takes and has a risk of backlash when those more difficult to control forces may turn around. But when there's true risk and resistance...

Liliet

Well, that's what all these heroes are for! One in particular managed to all but solo 8 demons with only one getting away recently! Where was he anyway-

-oh. Oh yeah.

mamm0nn

True, but as we've seen in Book 2 the demon is indeed very powerful but their regional effects being allowed to fester amongst a group of people is a league above that. Named cannot just negate massive numbers, and demons given a few days can make an entire army. Why the corruption demon didn't also have an entire army of corrupted squirrels and deer at the time, I don't know, but when it appeared a thousand Silver Spears didn't even have the time to run away fast enough before they were corrupted pretty much entirely.

Liliet

Maybe it does require a sentient base to work with, and horses count because they're specifically mounts for people?

Consider: corrupted bugs 😊

Javvies

Could be a minimum threshold requirement for one or more factors – ie, size/mass, intelligence or other mental qualities, or maybe you need a soul, or any number of other possible factors. Either to be affected in the first place or, perhaps more likely, in order to survive the process.

Or the horses got Corrupted because they were in physical contact with their human riders as the humans got Corrupted.

The horses might not normally have “survived”, if they weren't being used as mounts when they got exposed to Corruption.

Or maybe the horses didn't actually survive to merge with their riders, maybe the horses died and their corpses got absorbed and merged with their riders. This could be an explanation if a soul is required as a buffer or sacrifice for a subject to be transformed by or survive exposure to the Corruption infection.

At any rate, the Dead King really doesn't want a Corruption demon anywhere near his undead. Remember, all his undead are magically linked to him, which means that Corruption could potentially transfer through that link from the exposed undead to him, if he can't permanently sever the link quickly enough. And I rather suspect that's far too great a potential risk for him to even consider running. I expect that he'd instantly sever links with, if not have self destruct, all of his undead in the area if he learned they were anywhere near a Corruption demon.

Liliet

i thought about the 'merged with their riders' option but there was a separate horse the demn was in and yeppppppppp re: DK also running risks with demons

Javvies

That was the Demon itself, not just the aura effect.

I suspect the Demon itself has fewer limits and more flexible options than its passive aura, especially if it's actively choosing to do something.

The difference between sunlight and sunlight focused through a magnifying glass. Normal sunlight is like the passive aura, the Demon choosing to do something like focusing that sunlight through a magnifying glass. The latter can be used to start a fire ... the former is just unfocused power.

Liliet

Mm, yeah, that's also a very plausible explanation.

Either way, we DO have precedent for horses being the only non-sapient being Corruption worked on. Note how Marchford's still inhabited: with people hidden away, it seems the streets etc didn't retain any.

Liliet

*sapient, not sentient. Goshdarned terminology.

Javvies

Eh ... I feel like the Dead King popping devils and demons would just end badly for everybody. Including him.

I mean, that's the kind of thing that could actually convince or drive people to summon Angels in order to counter (or at least seriously consider the option), despite the risk of Bard interfering ... and he knows that Bard can interfere with Angelic manifestations, and likely has no interest in risking Bard interfering with an Angelic manifestation.

Oh, sure, if he limits himself to summoning devils, nobody will risk Angel's. So devil spamming is probably still on the table, but devils are relatively manageable.

Also, I'm pretty sure he knows that Cat has Akua on a leash.

For some reason, I think any sort of plan relying on devils or even demons against the side with the person who was(is?) Named Diabolist isn't going to go very well.

Plus, between Akua and Masego, they'll know basically everything about devil's and demons that the Empire every discovered ... which probably includes stealing the information that the rest of Calernia discovered as well.

Besides, they're seriously off brand for him.

mamm0nn

Don't underestimate devils. Masego or Akua on terrain of their choosing with a few days of prep, sure they can do a lot of damage. But that's wards and thresholds that devils and demons are weak against. When it comes to more direct damage, magical or otherwise, and more impromptu protections, then devils will take a lot more energy per devil to get rid off. An army of devils defensively summoned in Keter, Masego can do little against to turn the tides.

Akua's power of devils back when she had it, was that she ruled them by summoning them. That's as far as we know impossible for her to do to devils already in Creation without a lot of time and effort, as opposed to summoning the ledgers of devil names her city held which bind those devils to unbreakable pacts. Someone else's devils she would be a nice addition against, but not a tide turner. Pilgrim and other heavy hitters will do more in that fight.

Demons, that one as I said before is more if the Dead King is ever really cornered or threatened even mildly. He won't risk the demons when there's no real need for them because of what the demons are, the angelic retribution probably isn't that great a factor when he does fall back to them.

laguz24

What can't he stand to lose? Nessie is a long term planner and player, he doesn't summon devils and demons because he did not create them also there is the story groove of evil diabolists failing and demon summoning is a one way ticket to failure or him becoming unstoppable which means a story based defeat. No he wants to keep himself beatable so the heroes don't get providence shoving them all the way to the happy ending.

mavant

In B4 Cordelia invents the concept of soft dollar fees to appease mercantis

~~in B4 Cordelia retires to start the first hedge fund~~

VoteNo1

We're losing the top spot on topwebfiction for some reason. Go vote people!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Chapter 42: Castigation

"Do not look down on fear, my friend: it is the rare case of a voice in your head actually helpful to your survival."

– Dread Empress Prudence, the 'Frequently Vanquished'

I'd seen some profoundly beautiful things over the years. I sometimes liked to remind myself of that when the bad days came. I'd seen the first breaths of Liesse reborn under twilight, the peace born of a good man's sacrifice. I'd walked the ancient cities of the Everdark, where flowers lit up the dark and poetry paved the streets as a riot of colours claimed the rooftops. I'd been hosted in the finest palaces of Salia, felt a storm sweep over me from the heights of the Tower and strolled through the mad bazaar at the heart of Skade. I'd even glimpsed the last glory days of Sephirah, before death came for it. I'd seen wonders enough to fill two lifetimes, and perhaps before I died I might see yet a few more. It felt good to remember that, to believe that.

But I'd known terrors the likes of which few could fathom, too, and it was those I would be calling on for this kind of work.

There was no lack of them to draw from. Black had preferred. I recalled, to use fear as a watchman's cudgel: sparingly, measuredly, and always bluntly. He'd seen it as a tool, and not a particularly good one. But while my father had been my first teacher, he'd not been the only one. I'd learned from the Empress and the Diabolist, exemplars of the most horrifying Wasteland virtues, and then from even harsher creatures. The King of Winter and his patient, farsighted cruelties. Shrouded Sve Noc, a godhead born of fear and blood and kept hallowed through the same. Even the Dead King had, in his own way, been a teacher: you could not fight such a monster as long as I had without learning some of its ways. And so, honouring those many tutelages, I set to crafting horror.

I began with the smell.

Death had a particular reek to it. It came to the aftermath of battles along with the rest of the carrion, that stench of blood and shit and steel – with the rotting of flesh never far behind, even as the crows gobbled up the dead and flies burrowed into the flesh. I drew from the Doom, from the Battle of the Camps, but it wouldn't be enough. Death come to a city wasn't quite the same, even before stone and flesh began to burn green. A hint of the Hierarch's madness spread through the streets of Rochelant, red hate bleeding out of every pore, and more from the burning blaze of green that'd begun at my very feet and devoured a fourth of Summerholm. All this I wove together and made my own, then slipped into the sleeping mind of Ambassador Livia Murena.

Her sleeping self sunk into the dark and gave me my opening: a glimpse of the winding streets and beautiful avenues of Mercantis. Night coursing through my veins like a river, eyes closed as I cut myself off from my senses and skimmed around the edge of the wards protecting the ambassador just the way Hierophant had taught me, I smiled and sunk my teeth into the older woman.

I began with murder. Livia Murena felt warm blood splash her face as a drow in the colours of the Losara opened the throat of a man with an obsidian blade. The ambassador screamed and stumbled away, wiping away with her hands and finding them soiled red. There was no relief to be found away from the drow. She turned the corner into an avenue only to find it burning green, legionaries dragging people out of houses and butchering them in the streets, eyes cold and hands steady. Livia Murena ran, finding a large plaza with a sprawling marble fountain, but painted Levantines of the Brigand's Blood were there. Some amused themselves by drowning people, holding their heads under the water until the panicked scrabbling against the stone died, while others were pulling down a great statue with hammers and rope. Livia Murena let out a strangled sob, and as she did a painted warrior threw a barbed javelin at her that tore through the flesh of her shoulder.

Bleeding, in pain, she ran again.

She found only horror. Orcs tearing at the corpses of merchant lords with hungry fangs, armoured ogres smashing through villa gates to rip apart those huddling behind them, Taghreb and Soninke making bonfires of paintings and tapestries to roast the loot they'd ripped out of pantries over the corpses of their owners. Goblins made servants race only to shoot them in the back with crossbows, the drow blinded the young and let them bleed out screaming, jeering Callowans dragged entire families to the gallows to hang. Livia Murena wept but kept running until she found a tall house. Hers, I intuited, but it was not the house she sought. A wife, and though the face did not come to my mind's eye long blonde tresses and fair skin did. It was enough.

Green flames and heavy smoked filled the halls of Livia Murena's home as she raced through them and up, up the stairs and at the end of a too-long hallways where finally her great bedroom could be found. Relief as she found her wife standing there, besides the great canopy bed. Cassia, she exclaimed. With a crisp, resonating twang a coin went spinning. Livia Murena's eyes went to it, spellbound, watched it rise and fall and land onto the open palm of the Black Queen, who had been sitting in the dark. The coin, shining gold, had landed on the side showing crossed swords.

"Do you believe in fate, Ambassador Livia?" I asked.

And before she could answer, her wife burned green. I drew on the screams from Three Hills, for that. I remembered those well. Cassia screamed and screamed and screamed, until mercifully she died. I met Livia Murena's eyes and smiled, thin and sharp like a blade slid between the ribs.

"Not the right answer," I told her. "Let us go again."

And we did.

Mercantis was put to the sword and the coin showed swords and Cassia burned.

"Not the right answer," I told the weeping ambassador. "Let us go again."

And we did.

And we did.

And we did.

Nott until dawn did I let her learn the lesson this had been meant to convey. Cassia burned, the screaming having grown more vivid as the sleeping ambassador filled the gaps, and Livia wept exhaustedly as she fell on her knees. Like an old friend I leaned forward, offering a girlishly mischievous smile.

"Fate's a trick, Livia," I told her, and showed her the coin.

It had the crossed swords on both sides.

"The only way not to fall for it," I said, gently smiling, "is not to flip the coin at all."

I left her dreams alone, after that, but she slept not a wink anyway.

—

I was in Hakram's infirmary room more often than my own quarters, or the offices made available to me — I'd pretty much handed those over to Vivienne — so it was there that messengers came to find me. It was the same with Archer, when she returned from the little errand I'd sent her on. I dipped my bread in the warm potage that was to be my morning meal, cocking an eyebrow at my friend.

"So?"

"Didn't drive her mad," Indrani replied, settling into the seat by my side, "but I'd bet it was a close thing."

I popped the bread into my mouth and chewed on my mouthful thoughtfully. I'd walked the line just fine, then. If I kept doing this for too long I'd probably break the ambassador, which wasn't the objective here, but I wanted at least one more night of this. Once could be dismissed as a fluke, but twice? Twice was a warning.

"What'd she look like?" I asked when I'd swallowed.

"Exhausted and twitchy," Indrani said. "You really didn't pull your punches there."

"She needs to be more scared of me than she is of Malicia," I replied, "and if we're to get through this without Mercantis trying to blackmail the Grand Alliance, then I need that fear deep enough in the bone that they know exactly what the consequences of that would be."

"Hey," Archer shrugged, "you know me – I could care less if you want to turn the lot of them into gibbering wrecks. I'm just surprised it's the two of us alone having this conversation, I guess."

I threw her an unimpressed look. That had been less than subtle.

"If you have something to say, say it," I told her.

She sighed, passing a hand through her long dark hair. Unbound, today, and a little messy. It suited her.

"You been fighting with Vivienne?" she asked.

My fingers clenched. She noticed it, unpleasantly perceptive as she was.

"So that's a yes," Archer mused. "I'd ask you if you want to talk about it, but I don't think you've ever actually answered that question with a yes in your life."

"That's pretty rich, coming from you," I flatly said.

Our last tense heart to heart had required half a fistfight to get started. She looked more amused than offended, waving the reply away.

"Sort that shit out, Cat," Indrani said. "I won't try to use sweet reason with you, because Gods know the odds on that are steep-"

"Hey," I reproached.

"- but her sister cold-hearted logic will do," Indrani blithely continued. "It's too late for you to dismiss Vivienne from her place as your heiress: she's got support, and when it comes to us she knows where a lot of bodies are buried. So if you won't talk to her because she's your friend and you're being pissy for things not really her fault, then at least do it because otherwise you're being a pretty terrible queen."

I grimaced. Archer didn't really care about Callow except maybe in the sense that a lot of her stuff was there and it'd affect some people she cared about if it got destroyed, but that didn't mean she was unaware it was good angle to take with me. She wasn't wrong, at least, that I couldn't just let this go forever.

"I don't like that I have to do things, now," I admitted.

Indrani's brow rose. I snorted.

"I mean that, when we disagree, I have to compromise with her now," I explained. "Not always, and not on everything, but it still irks that I have to do it at all. I gave her the title in the first place, and 'Drani it's not that I think she'd done badly with it, on the contrary-"

"But she's got power of her own now," Archer finished. "And she doesn't always agree with you."

"I can't just tell her to fuck off either, when we disagree," I tiredly said. "If I do that in public she'll lose a lot of support in the Army of Callow, and if she loses the Army there's a lot less dissuading nobles from taking a swing at the crown down the line."

It wouldn't be a sure thing, and I was doing my best to polish her military record so that she'd have some reputation with the soldiers, but at the end of the day Vivienne just didn't get on with them the way that I did. On occasion I'd taken some petty satisfaction in that, given how the nobility made no qualms of its preference for her and more people back home that I was comfortable with shared that opinion, but it was a hollow thing to embrace. After putting her in that position in the first place, how much of a prick would I have to be to relish her difficulties? It wasn't a minor matter, either. There weren't Dartwick household troops for Vivienne to call on, she had no personal holdings and most noble forces had either been abolished with their titles or curtailed under Imperial law. Within Callow, after the war it would be the army Juniper and I had built that'd stand as the largest amount of people with swords.

My banner had the sword weighing more than the crown on the balance for a reason.

"I bet it's like a burr in your boot that some of the folk back home like her better now," Indrani knowingly said.

I breathed out, keeping my face calm.

"I'm starting to get tired of hearing that," I evenly said.

She squinted at me.

"Yeah, that's about the face you would have made," Archer said. "And Viv's never been great at handling your moods, so now you two fine ladies are in snit. Lovely."

"It'll pass," I grunted.

"It'll pass when you have a drink with her and you spell it out," Indrani said. "But you already know that, Cat, you just don't want to do it. I'm guessing you'll get to it once you're done tripping over the pride you keep claiming you don't have."

I flipped her off, but without much heat, and she took it in stride.

"Go find out what the Mercantis delegation will do to proper up their defences after tonight," I said, having tired of this conversation the moment it began. "I want to know as soon as possible so I'll know how to get around it."

Another night of this, maybe two, and then I'd be ready for the talks. Even as she left, I began to consider the shape of the nightmare that would plague Livia Murena tonight.

It was not going to be any more pleasant than the last.

—

I'd let Hasenbach pick the room where, at long last, the diplomats would get their meeting.

I went to visit it beforehand though, to have a look at what I'd be working with. It was yet another hall from the seemingly endless supply of them the Arsenal had to offer, though this one was clearly not meant for meals. Multiple tables facing each other in half-circles, enough room between for servants to pass and no less than six ways in – as much for refreshments as the fetching of documents, I figured. Well lit, but with chandeliers and mage lights. I could work my way around both of those, I knew the tricks. It would do. I'd need to strike the right tone from the start, though. Come in alone and with not a thing in hand, when they'd be laden with attendants and papers.

I trailed a hand atop the smooth surface of the table, enjoying the grain of the wood, and frowned in thought. Ambassador Livia had only gone through another night of my tender attentions before

I – Archer – had judged her to be on the ragged edge. Not a faint-hearted sort, that one, but I suspected a great deal more used to doling out cruelty than suffering it. Part of me wanted to throw in another night just to be sure, but there would be risks to that: the protective amulets the ambassador had worn after the first time might not have been a match for Night paired with the Hierophant's eyes, but if the Mercantians asked for heroic protection this would get trickier. No, best to end it here.

Today, this very evening.

I napped through most of the afternoon, as using Night had been less than restful, and woke less than half a bell before we were due to hold the meeting. The clothes I was to wear were only of middling import, a simple grey tunic and matching trousers, but I made sure to wrap around myself the patchwork banners of the Mantle of Woe and set a jagged iron crown on my brow. With the last errand I'd asked of Indrani tucked away into my pocket and my dead staff of yew in my hand I limped to our appointed time, though with careful timing so that I would be the last to arrive. Not so late that it would be remarked upon, but just enough to be mildly insulting. The doors were opened for me by attendants, and even as my name and titles were announced I flicked an assessing glance at the people within.

That Cordelia Hasenbach had brought a number of scholars and secretaries was nothing unusual, but that she'd brought a full fifteen people with her was. She must have pieced together that she'd be handling the actual negotiations here mostly on her own. My gaze did not linger on them, instead moving to the delegation from Mercantis. Ambassador Livia Murena was easy to pick out from the rest: she sat at the centre, and her ostentatious gold and ivory chain of office was hard to miss. On the ivory medallion at the end of it thirty silver coins had been carved, the ancient crest of the merchant lords of the Consortium. Seven golden braids hung from her left shoulder, over a robe of deep blue silk that made it plain the ambassador was overweight.

Most of the diplomats were as well, for fat was considered a sign of wealth and power among the merchant lords of Mercantis. All wore blue silk and the seven braids denoting that they were here on the behalf of both Merchant Prince Fabianus and the Consortium itself – the prince's business could carry three braids of gold, and the Consortium's seven in silver, but only both in agreement could command the seven golden stripes – but for all the riot of bracelets and rings dripping from their arms and ears laden with and precious stones, no one save Ambassador wore anything around the neck. Each diplomat had an attendant standing behind them, all of them young and beautiful and utterly still. Mercantis did not practice slavery, it was said. Of the Free Cities, only Stygia still kept to that horror.

Yet Indrani had been raised a slave there, and called such, though no doubt if pressed her owner would have had papers proving it was mere bonded service. All very legal, nothing at all like slavery. That was the trick, you see: the 'servants' began with the debt of the sum it had cost to acquire them, and though they were paid for their work the roof and food they were provided cost them money. The debt increased, and the service continued until death – and then was passed onto children, for debts always carried in Mercantis. I kept that knowledge in mind, looking at the dark rings around Ambassador Livia's pale brown eyes that cosmetics did not quite manage to hide, and found that guilt never came for the torturous horror I'd put this woman through.

I'd done worse to people a great deal less deserving.

"Queen Catherine," the First Prince greeted me amiably. "I am glad of your presence."

"Your Majesty," Ambassador Livia said, tone even, "we are—"

"Let's wrap this up quickly, Your Highness," I interrupted, looking at Cordelia. "There's a war on, in case you forgot."

The ambassador was well-trained, so she did not betray her offence at the casually offered insult. It wouldn't be the first I'd thrown her way since this started.

"I assure you, Your Majesty, that I have not," the First Prince replied, eyebrows rising the faintest bit.

A warning to tone this down? No, I decided after a moment. She would have had other ways to reach me if restraint were called for. I slid into the seat at the edge of the part of the half-circle kept empty for myself and my delegation, seeing from the corner of my eye the dismay that flickered across some Mercantian faces when they realized I had come alone. That was not the mark of someone taking all this seriously. I drew lightly on the Night, softly, and wove a thread that slipped into the shadows beneath the table and to the side. It remained hidden, waiting. I leaned back into my seat, looking impatient, and waited for someone to speak.

"I must protest the insults you keep offering us, Queen Catherine," Ambassador Livia said. "Has the Consortium not been a generous and understanding ally? What have we done to earn such treatment?"

This was the part, I thought, where I was supposed to demur and weave and bob and all those little diplomatic dances. So we could keep talking in precise truths and pretty lies, keep this all civilized as we tried to a war of words just as dangerous as one of steel. I did not bother.

"Either you genuinely don't know the answer to that question," I said, "and speaking with you is a waste of time. Or you do know the answer to that question, and you are still wasting my time. Which is it, Ambassador Livia?"

Her face tightened for the barest fraction of a moment before going almost unnaturally slack. That one had stung, huh. I glanced at the First Prince, whose face was the very definition of polite serenity.

"Is this serious?" I asked.

"It is, Queen Catherine," Cordelia amiably replied, then half-glanced at the diplomats. "Though perhaps we should see to the purpose of this meeting, given the demands made by circumstance on all our hours."

Under the table, she traced with a finger a Y against the Night. Yes, it meant. I was not to keep pushing them, she wanted this to advance.

"That would suit as well," the man to the ambassador's side smoothly said. "If there are no further objections?"

An expectant gaze went to me. Ambassador Livia had regained her calm on more than a surface level, so it was her I replied to.

"By all means," I drily said. "The suspense has me all atwitter."

"Given information recently acquired by the Consortium, it has become necessary to revisit the matter of the loans extended to the Grand Alliance," the ambassador said.

N, Hasenbach's fingers traced against the table. I pushed back my chair and rose to my feet.

"There are no such loans," I flatly said. "As Lord Yannu Marave made exceedingly clear, I believe. This meeting is at an end."

She looked, to my faint amusement, genuinely surprised. For career diplomats, they really weren't catching on to this game quick. It wasn't that they were fools, I thought, but simply that they weren't used to so bluntly being dismissed. Mercantis might not be a power in the leagues of Praes or Procer, but it'd always been influential – and when crossed, it was not above spending coin to make its displeasure known.

"Perhaps the honourable ambassador refers to the loans extended to the Principate and its constituent principalities," the First Prince mildly said. "I am sure the unfortunate wording will be rectified, Queen Catherine, if you give the ambassador opportunity to do so."

I cocked a brow at the ambassador.

"We did not mean to imply that the Kingdom of Callow is indebted to the Consortium, Your Majesty," Livia Murena lied. "My apologies for the misunderstanding."

Barely refraining from rolling my eyes, I settled back into the seat.

"As was mentioned by our esteemed ambassador," the man at Livia's side said, pouty red lips offering up a smile, "the Consortium has learned of the particulars of Proceran debt. Given the almost... reckless borrowing practices that were used, doubts have been raised as to the capacity of the Principate of Procer to repay these debts."

"Gods Below and Everburning," I said, tone openly contemptuous. "You really are going to insist on being the Tower's borrowed knife, aren't you? No matter how many people warned me, I'd genuinely not believed that the Consortium would make that glaring a blunder."

"A hollow accusation," Ambassador Livia replied. "And one thrown very carelessly, I might add. There are limits to our tolerance, Queen Catherine."

Y, Cordelia wrote. I changed course, snorting in feigned amusement.

"You know what?" I mused, "Maybe you're right. I just assumed that you lot are going to try something as hilariously ill-advised as attempting to coerce an alliance that commands more soldiers on a single front than there are people in all of Mercantis. That was premature of me. Go on, then. Speak."

I thinly smiled.

"Prove me wrong," I said.

There was a beat of silence.

"We recognize the heroic contributions made by the Grand Alliance, and Procer in particular, to the safety of all Calernia," Ambassador Livia said. "It is why we have been so willing to extend loans, and at rates with little precedent. The Consortium will continue to support the war effort however it can, rest assured that this is not in doubt."

"That is most pleasing to hear," Cordelia mildly said. "His Grace Fabianus has reconsidered my request to expel the Praesi embassy, then?"

I smothered a grin. She had them there, considering Malicia was the Dead King's open – if rather lethargic – ally.

"The high court of the Consortium is debating such a measure, Your Highness," Ambassador Livia smiled.

"Indeed," Cordelia Hasenbach smiled back, just as pleasantly, "yet I recall hearing the debate was to be set aside indefinitely. Has this measure been revoked?"

"That is quite possible," the ambassador evaded. "Given the length of our journey here, our news are grown quite out of date."

"You were leading up to a 'but', Ambassador," I said. "Do get on with it, instead of insulting the intelligence of everyone in this room."

"While the Consortium remains firmly behind the war effort," Ambassador Livia said, tone aggressively calm, "given the financial troubles of the Principate and its extensive amount of loans it has been suggested that assurances must be sought. Else a collapse of Proceran commerce could feasibly, in the coming years, bankrupt Mercantis itself."

"A reasonable worry," the fair-haired princess replied. "I have pondered this issue myself, as it happens. The Highest Assembly is willing to sign a treaty guaranteeing a set portion of the taxes collected by the office of First Prince until the debts are settled. Would such an assurance be acceptable to you?"

Promising coin that had yet to be collected, huh. I supposed that was one way to make up for lack of revenue. Mind you, if Cordelia's eventually successor refused to pay up there honestly wasn't that much that the Consortium would be able to do about it. Unless the treaty is guaranteed by the Grand Alliance itself, I thought, and glanced at Hasenbach. Even the most firebrand of First Princes would hesitate at antagonizing its two most powerful allies in such a way. Canny woman, I thought, not without fondness. It wasn't like myself or the Dominion would refuse to be guarantors of this: it'd give us some leverage over Procer after the war, which given how short-lived Proceran gratitude tended to be would prove most welcome.

Somehow I doubted it was a coincidence that this arrangement would end up soothing some of the lingering fears about Procer belonging to the two nations Hasenbach wanted to keep as close allies. Circles within circles within circles, with this one.

"It would go some way in abating worries, Your Most Serene Highness," Ambassador Livia replied, "yet to invest more coin into the war, the Consortium seeks more practical dividends."

Ah, and there we were. Her eyes went to me but did not linger. She never looked at me for long, I was beginning to notice. Even when she was talking to me. The nightmares had left a mark, as they were meant to.

"It has come to the attention of Mercantis that plans are being drawn for a city to be raised at the heart of the Red Flower Vales," the diplomat with the pale brown eyes said. "Cardinal, is it not?"

I drummed my fingers against the tabletop in open impatience.

"We recognize such a city for the opportunity it is," Ambassador Livia said. "And so in place of further loans, the Consortium seeks instead to purchase monopolies on the trading of certain goods in Cardinal."

I cocked my head to the side. Huh. That was cleverer than what I'd been expecting, actually. They had to know that purchasing land ceded by Callow and Procer was not a suggestion that'd go over well, but monopolies over trade that did not yet exist was another story. By putting up gold now they could get a stranglehold on certain kinds of trade down the line, effectively pushing out any competition by being the sole providers for long enough that people would grow used to relying on them. It was their old role as middleman made anew, I thought with a touch of admiration. The merchant lords were a greedy but they were not without wits. This was actually halfway reasonable, as far as demands went, which had me rather wary.

"And how long would these monopolies be expected to last?" the First Prince asked.

"Permanently," Ambassador Livia said. "This would reflected in the price offered for them, naturally."

I did not need Cordelia's finger to trace the N to know this was not to be tolerated. So this was to be the pivot of this little adventure. Now they would push, or be pushed.

"Mercantis," I said, enunciating the word slowly. "The City of Bought and Sold. The most impartial place there is to be had on Calernia, for coin is queen and it claims no party."

"A lovely compliment, Your Majesty," Ambassador Livia replied, smiling like a shark.

"Spell it out," I said, leaning forward. "What happens, when I laugh at this and tell you to crawl back to your island."

I drew on Night. Slowly, quietly. The shadows of the room began to lengthen, in the spaces between the glow of the mage lights and the chandeliers.

"There is no need for such hostility," the diplomat said. "We will not withdraw our support for the war effort, as I have said. Yet it would be difficult for the Consortium to consider extending further loans when it would be courting its own bankruptcy."

Which sounded all nice and reasonable, until you knew what we knew. Hasenbach had told me that Malicia was almost certainly aware that Procer needed the flow of gold from Mercantis to keep its head above the water. Malicia had in turn told at least some of these fine fellows the piece of information. This had the Empress's touch all over it, the more I saw the more it was obvious. As usual, Malicia had played to all the angles. Merchants not in the know would not consider ending loans to be enemy action, and if the Grand Alliance reacted harshly they might turn to the Tower for protection against our perceived tyranny. Merchants that were in the know, and there were bound to be a few, would consider us to be deep enough in the hole that they could extract concessions from us if they didn't push it too far. No doubt the Empress had made promises of protection to encourage that perception, and leaked information about where our armies were.

Very far from Mercantis, the bottom line was.

"I'm curious," I said. "You must believe – I can't understand this, otherwise – that you have the upper hand here. And I have to ask, Gods, I really have to ask-"

The Night deepened, the light dimmed.

"Why?" I coldly asked. "Why is that you think that, exactly? Explain it to me."

"No threat has been made, Queen Catherine," the ambassador said. "Your behaviour is-"

"Let me tell you what happens," I softly interrupted, "if you choose to become my enemy."

I met Livia Murena's eyes. Darkness deepened around us, and came a faint sound like the dying whisper of a scream.

"I will not be civilized," I gently told her. "I will not keep to laws and treaties, to decency or the milk of human kindness. If you become the tool of a woman who has allied herself with the King of Death, if you willingly make that choice, then I will visit a ruin on you that will still haunt the sleep of men in a hundred years."

She looked away, towards the First Prince.

"Your Highness-"

"Don't look at her," I said. "It won't help. She can't stop me, and she doesn't particularly want to."

The ambassador's pudgy fingers tightened around her chain of office and she turned back to me, gathering her courage, but my hands had slipped in the pocket where I had stowed away my last surprise.

"Do you believe in fate, Ambassador Livia?" I asked.

She did not answer, eyes fixed on the golden coin in my hand. There were crossed swords on the side that could be seen. The other woman's breathing went uneven, her hands trembled, and still I waited. Sweat drenched the back of her neck, smudged the cosmetics on her face, and in her eyes I saw reaped the terror that I had sown.

"Yes," Livia Murena hoarsely answered. "Yes, I do."

"Then let us keep to laws and treaties," I said, my smile never reaching my eyes. "To decency and the milk of human kindness."

Or else, I did not say. She heard it anyway.

I did not speak another word for the rest of the meeting, or need to.

Sir Nil

Good reminder that Cat is scary when she wants to be.

LizAris

I can just about SEE Amadeus, a whole continent away, blinking back tears of pride.

Salt

His flair for unnecessarily dramatic gestures really rubbed off on her. I mean, lengthening shadows to scare people? Flipping a coin and asking cryptic questions about Fate? A+

Amadeus is the dude that first made her a Squire by dramatically stabbing her for absolutely no reason, instead of just poking her forehead. He'd be absolutely beaming if he found out about it.

Liliet

Yeah, we're all going to continue pretending that stabbing had no effect other than being silly and did not set up anything for the future. Haha.

Anyway YEP.

Miles

She did stab him back several books later, FWIW.

Her family owes him 2 more stabby stab stabs..

Liliet

Yeah, and I bet he was pretty surprised the return stabbing was nonfatal.

Letouriste

That's...

I never thought about that

Liliet

You're so welcome!

Liliet

So, this is funny.

shikkarasu

He'd probably lecture her on the dangers of monologuing and posturing. I imagine it's one of the reasons he uses fear sparingly; intimidating displays can pin you down into a trope. Cat is willing to risk it due to her skill with Stories. She knows better than Amadeus exactly where the deep end is, so she can afford to swim closer to it. She has -and I say this without hint of irony, nor shame of pun- truly stepped out of his shadow.

Liliet

I think he'd compliment her on playing well. She stepped out of his shadow narrative game-wise back at First Llesse and he knows it. He's never been less than completely proud of her and he never underestimated her.

He'd mention the danger, just as a point of prudence, but he wouldn't lecture her when it clearly worked as intended.

And he would definitely clap.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

At least in that part she is a classic, and classy, villain.

Javvies

Heh.

Being known as a Villain, especially one who has made examples of their enemies has its uses.

The nightmare sendings definitely helped. But the fact that Cat crucified hundreds of Diabolist's captured supporters after Akua's Folly makes the threatened ruthlessness more believable. The fact that Cat has a reputation for torching cities to get at her enemies wouldn't hurt either.

Of course ... Cat absolutely would have done it – never make a threat you aren't willing to carry through on.

Fear is a tricky method to use for more delicate ends. Cat seems to have threaded the needle here.

Cat and Viv are both prideful and touchy about it, even when they try not to be. And Archer is being the voice of reason here? That's ... yeah. Hakram, wake up and get better. Cat needs your relationship wrangling skills.

Miles

Done what? What threats?

Just more nightmares. Cat has something to protect now, and that makes the costs of lashing out matter.

Insanenoodlyguy

If mercantis is in Praes' pocket, what she does IS protection. No. She'd rather not do it, but she'd do it if pressed.

WuseMajor

"Threats are useless unless you have previously committed the level of violence you are threatening to use. Make examples of the enemies you cannot control so those that you can will be cowed. This is the foundation of ruling."

—Dread Emperor Terribilis II

...It's something of a pity that Cat has done what was necessary to live up to this advice.

Salt

Yeah, right on the money.

Lots of people here complain about her conscience still acting up when she's forced to do stuff like this, but that's actually one of the best/most complex things about her character.

Cat isn't someone who's blind enough to confuse Good with striking at Evil. She has to, lest her Good become the act of striking. She knows and fully admits that her actions are Evil, even if her intentions are not. The ambassador somewhat deserving it is a just silver lining that soothes her conscience a bit, not a justification.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure Indrani is cannier regarding close interpersonal relationships than Hakram is. He's good at wrangling casual acquaintances and people he meets once and never again. Indrani understands how close bonds tick.

Raved Thrad

She just prefers to hide her sensitive nature under a guise of brutishness. 😊

Liliet

More like she's always running fast enough feelings can't catch her ♥

Salt

For real, Indrani with the brutal callout on Catherine's little tantrum. Hakram may have phrased it in a way that's easier to swallow, but I'm more with Indrani's style of straightforward bluntness on this one.

Vivienne isn't somehow wrong for not doing everything Catherine wants or for disagreeing with her. She hasn't done anything wrong for not being associated with the burden of the necessary evils that Catherine herself chose to take on, nor is she wrong to want to share those burdens as a friend. The sting of Callowans thinking that the Black Queen is a little too Black nowadays, has nothing to do with Vivienne either.

Catherine needs to just swallow her pride and just have an adult conversation with Vivienne, and Archer was being a damn good friend for going through the trouble of making sure Cat couldn't run away from this.

Liliet

Mhm!

Darkening

I dunno, hakram hand-led Thief's insecurities pretty handily.

Liliet

He couldn't have come up with a handier method before things got out of hand though

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Gotta hand it to him, that prince among men has a steady hand. Why, just look at the role he played in keeping Christophe and co from catching Cat and 'Drani red-handed a while back, or the hand he's always had in administrative matters. Hands down the most reliable of the Woe overall, I feel, even as the others may be better-suited to various roles.

Liliet

He's Catherine's right hand for a reason.

shikkarasu

Don't forget that the official announcement of Vivian as Heir Designate was written in his hand. He handles so much, it's no surprise that he beats Zeze at shatranj so handedly.

Frivolous

I didn't know Night could be used to invade dreams, but I should have guessed. Catherine effectively tortured Livia. Very crafty, very cruel.

Also, burning paintings and tapestries is just bad form. They should be kept as souvenirs or sold instead.

JJR

AKA

Pillage, then burn.

Miles

Oh yeah? Then why do they call it burn and pillage? Check mate.

Alshain

Maxim 1!

thearpox23

Night can be used for almost anything. It is a medium that can be shaped, much like light or arcana, not a spell or swiss knife

Frivolous

Eh, you probably can't use Light to give someone else a nightmare. With Night, on the other hand, it probably comes (un)naturally.

I do wonder what the range on that power is. Could Cat use it to invade the dreams of someone unwarded and far, far away? After all, Sve Noc is Night, and Sve Noc are goddesses. I have some doubts that distance on the same plane can hamper them too much.

Maybe if even one drow is in the vicinity, they can extend through that drow.

.

Salt

You could probably use light to give someone a dream of being a beloved Heroic do-gooder. Visions of traipsing around in shining armor, praising the will of Above and saving small children would have Villains like Kairos vomiting in revulsion or screaming in terror. Possibly both.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hey, remember when Tariq used Light to create a magical plague? Good times.

You might still be right about the nightmare thing, but I'm skeptical.

Javvies

I'd say that most Light-wielders wouldn't be able to use Light to send someone a nightmare. On the other hand, I'd also say that most Light-wielders can't use Light to create plagues. To be fair, before we saw Tariq do it, I'd probably have said Light couldn't be used that way at all.

So while it's probably technically possible, it's going to be a very rare skill. And possibly require a Name with a relevant skillset, if not a direct Choir link.

Although ... nightmares could be one way of describing what Contrition did to William. And what he said it would have done to "convince", aka mind control/brainwash, people. So ... yeah, definitely possible to do something similar with Light, though I'd call it near certain that doing so is going to be an exceptionally rare skillset amongst Light-wielders.

thearpox23

Each medium (i.e.: Light) obviously follow their own rules and limitations that make them better suited to certain tasks. If I had to give a limitation, I'd have used the Night's seemingly innate weakness against demons, not dream manipulation.

Because when it comes to such things as sending nightmares and magical plagues it seems much more a question of intent than ability. There aren't a lot of heroic narratives where the hero indiscriminately wipes out a multitude of civilians in cold blood after all. As for nightmares... What the hell do you guys think prophetic dreams are?!

SpacyRicochet

I got the "Gandalf jazz man" video in my head with this remark! 😄

Miles

The stuff Pilgrim has done with light gives tons of people all kinds of nightmares.

onedollargum

NiGHTS into Dreams ;D

Liliet

I'd THOUGHT Catherine would be able to invade dreams as a High Priestess of Night, but this is the first time she's actually done it. I thought it could work as a long-distance communication method, but I guess apparently not.

We know Night can be used to invade dreams in principle because that's what Sve Noc did to Cat one time in Everdark, the fake Name Dream.

Mental Mouse

Sve Noc have also been using dreams to simply communicate with Cat, keeping her up to date on developments and stuff they've learned (like MK's dalliance).

Liliet

Oooh, yeah, good point. Still, Sve lived in Cat's head moment to moment for a while, it's not necessarily quite the same as a hostile invasion towards an unwilling recipient.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

One of the first things we saw Night used for was the transfer of information directly between minds, both in real time and after the fact, so dreamwalking is honestly not that much of a reach.

As for burning paintings to cook 'loot' that came from a pantry, that's Cat's basic anti-aristocratic tendencies leaking through. She only barely tolerates a very rustic sort of luxury.

Liliet

Hahahah, yep ♥

Anomamdris

Now that is diplomacy...

Also, I am also very curious at the whole "Financing" cities in fantasy fictions such as these. What prevents a nation from establishing its own currency and inflating the value of that to fund it's war purchase? Why are Mercantis coins or letters of credit needed? How would these LCs be any better than a Proceran LC (I presume actual coin is not being transferred). If it's a case of a third party guarantee, said guarantee needs to be backed (i.e. the person who would be selling Procer goods feels it won't survive, but Mercantis will, and therefore would be willing to accept it's LCs – which seems strange to me.)

I get financial backing from Cities/Countries that has its own standing armies or an extremely rare resource (which can be put to practical use), but never been able to understand how a bank can dictate terms without these. Money is only worth what people say it's worth.

Also, what stops the alliance from simply 'conscripting' Mercantis and it's resources?

Miles

Because money is a medium through which value is exchanged. Coins and bills are not actually money, they are tokens which represent money to enable deferred exchanges. Printing more bills and minting more coins doesn't actually increase the amount of money, it onlyincreasesthe number of tokens that represent the same amount of money. In other words it just reduces the amount of money each individual or coin represents.

When a state creates more tokens, they are in effect taking money from everyone who has the existing tokens. It's expected in small amounts, since bills and coins wear out with use, but if the state goes crazy with printing more then it becomes more practical to just not accept that currency any more.

If that was too complicated you can think of it this way: The State is like a wealthy merchant whom everyone trusts to be the final arbiter of their bookkeeping. If this wealthy merchant starts lying and adding extra zeroes to his own books, then using the made up money when trading with others, that trust will evaporate and he will be no more wealthy than any peasant out on the streets.

James Nylan

I think you just argued for abolishing the fed. Careful with that 😊

Cicero

No, he just pointed out the limitations of power that the Fed is subject too, and why the Federal Reserve cannot just "create" enough money to do something like just abolish rent or any of the other proposals to "solve" the coronavirus problem by creating money.

There are a couple complications in money supply that justify the Federal Reserve (assuming it acts in a restrained and rational manner).

First, economies create new wealth, thus increasing the money supply to enable new transactions around this new wealth is perfectly fine, and does not damage the value of the money held by other people. A central bank to make sure that the increase in money supply is limited to this new increase in wealth is reasonable – if it can be established with sufficient credibility that it will not increase the money supply otherwise. This is covered by the Federal Reserves' mandate to prevent significant inflation.

That credibility is the purpose that Mercantis and other such "financial cities" serve. They have credibility that Procer itself does not. People will look at Procer and say "they are fighting to survive, so they are lying about the wealth that they can produce in order to get wealth from us to fund their defense – don't lend them anything." While if Mercantis is loaning them money, people will say "Mercantis always collects their due, it must be safe if we loan our wealth to Procer through Mercantis."

Second, there is the claim that the effective money supply can fluctuate due to mistaken assessments of wealth and corrections to this mistaken assumption (ie, booms and busts). Generally assumed to occur through changes in the velocity of money. This is used to justify monetary policy (the kind that is generally reported as adjusting interest rates), in which the Federal Reserve adjusts the money supply to counter act this maladjustment of the velocity of money. Supposedly smoothing out the boom and bust cycle. This is covered by the Fed's mandate to maintain full employment.

The second claim is disputed by the Real Business Cycle theorists, who claim that it is not mistaken assessments of wealth, but actual real changes in wealth that drive the business cycle.

The justifications of the second claim are also disputed by classical economists who insist that the Federal Reserve is not capable of consistently accurately determining the maladjustment and so are more likely to harm than help by attempting to correct for it.

Miles

No. Economists already know all of this. It's one of the few economic theories that's been proven with empirical evidence (sort-of. Prenazi Germany).

Alan

I've zero knowledge on this, but from reading Discworld "Making Money" I understand that the nation backing the currency needs to be trusted. Procer as a whole should be more powerful and trusted than a single merchant city-state so that's why the OP is asking why there isn't a Procer currency.

Cicero

Powerful does not equal trustworthy.

In fact, since Mercantis' power is entirely tied to it's credibility as a banker, Mercantis is more likely to be trustworthy than Procer.

It's the same reason that France was trusted less when it came to bonds/coinage than merchant princes from Italian city states.

It's also one of the reasons that the US and Great Britain are financial powerhouses.

Great Britain repaid it's bonds from WWII despite near ruinous debt ratios. (Of course, the US did help a lot with that, but still, compared to most other participants in WWII, Britain displayed unusual financial probity).

And the US repaid it's bonds in full after the Revolutionary War instead of defaulting or partially defaulting (like most revolutionary states do). It's why Hamilton was so important as the first Sec. of the Treasury. It was mainly due to him that the US repaid it's war bonds and so established a credibility of repayment that currently allows us to borrow at such high levels.

Miles

There's also the fact that these nations are on the gold standard or silver standard, not fiat. To make more coins they have to mine more gold or silver, respectively. Exchange rates in these standards are based on weight and purity. There aren't many tricks they can pull to make their coins more valuable than other coins that won't quickly become obvious.

Abrakadabra

Exactly. Which is a strong argument for the gold standard opposed to what we have today, which is a black box no one person can truly understand and can be disrupted or even destroyed with one mass hysteria...

Though Cordelia now has similar problems, because the very notion that the grand alliance might lose, can freeze up further loans, making it a self fulfilling prophecy.

Abrakadabra

Which is exactly why the Black Queen threatened military action. If we lose to the dead King, we will Drag you along, If it is the Last thing we do.

Abrakadabra

Which is exactly the reason Bk threatened military action. 'If we die to the dead King, we will Drag you along If it is the Last thing we do.'

Miles

You can put yourself on the gold standard if you really feel that way. Just buy gold the moment you're given a different currency and spend gold when you need to buy something.

And if that seems horribly inconvenient well that's why we use fiat.

Abrakadabra

Yeah, bs.

Miles

The entire push to go back to the stone ages of currency standards was a transparent attempt to sell gold that only ever gets brought up when there's an opportunity or need for that sector to bring in some extra profits. Try questioning your fake news for once.

Tricks314

While you are correct that fiat money (paper currency) is worth only the value that people say it's worth, most medieval fantasies operate on commodity money (or actual gold and silver coinage) that do have intrinsic value due to the raw materials they are made out of. In this example, Poncer cannot simply mint additional money because chances are they simply don't have the raw gold and silver needed. While they can reduce the amount of gold/silver in their coins doing so will result in rapid and widespread inflation as the coin changers can tell the silver/gold ratio by the weight of the coin (The anime Spice and Wolf has a really good episode about this subject).

The act of buying on credit is not the same as a fiat currency as credit is a promise of later repayment of debt. It's rather difficult for a country that no longer exists to repay their debts, making Poncer's credit much less attractive to merchants as they are actively fighting a war on their own land and running out of money feeding their armies and defending against the dead king. Mercantis, on the other hand, is farther away from the conflict and not actively involved in it, not to mention they have a steady reserve of currency making their credit a lot more attractive. Basically, credit is more attractive the higher the chances of repayment.

Historically, large financial institutions like Banks and Churches can dictate terms due to the large amount of cash reserves they have and by lending to the Kings and Lords at the time. Wars tend to be expensive (soldiers have to be armed and eat) and kings usually have to seek financing as taxes typically can't support a prolonged war. Therefore they usually go to the banks who lend them the money in return for favorable concessions like property or taxation rights.

Finally, while the Alliance can "conscript" Mercantis, it's too much effort to do so. As Cat mentioned they are spread thin against the Dead King as is, and Mercantis is an island which will send an invasion force that can be used to hold the dead at bay.

Liliet

Making it a much more attractive option to ""conscript"" Mercantis by smiling nicely and saying: you give us money, we fight, everyone wins and nobody raises the question of if you have to or are doing it out of the goodness of your hearts, okay?

It's horribly inconvenient to the Grand Alliance to actually make moves to coerce Mercantis, but if they wanted to, they could. Everyone knowing that is what allows the equilibrium of Mercantis being definitely independent and definitely doing what they say based on their own considerations.

The GA will even give them offers, concessions and guarantees in return for the valuable service of not making them come over there.

boballab

"What prevents a nation from establishing its own currency and inflating the value of that to fund it's war purchase? "

First in these settings the "currency" is actual coin and the only three ways to inflate it's value and they are:

1. Make the coins more pure. Higher the the gold or silver content of the coin the more value it will have however if you make the coins more pure you better up your gold or silver mining or you run into the second method of inflation on top of it.
2. Have fewer coins in circulation. Less coins in circulation the more value each individual ends up being.

Both of those methods actually up the value of the coin but they will also make it harder to trade and people that need to change their coin because they need to buy alot of things in a short period of time such as war supplies can't afford to do that. Which brings us to the third method and is a complete ripoff and has very major downsides the longer it goes.

3. Debase your existing coins. This is what Monarchs in the real world did when they went to war, they put more lead or other less precious metals into their coins so they could make more coins to buy more stuff with. This is all based on doing it, getting what you need and wining before everyone knows you did it, because until they know they think the coins are the same as your old ones because they went by weight, coin weights the same and your coin is "known as good" they treat it that way. So you basically trick people into believing the coins which are less valuable are still as valuable as the old ones, but once the merchants and other countries find out they adjust exchange rates and prices and you are back to where you were.

Second in most feudal settings each country already does have their own coin that they mint because no one really wanted some other country to control the amount of coin and thus their economy.

Playing with the coins is a good way to end up screwing yourself in the end because the market will react to anything the ruler does to bring about an equilibrium.

Mingablo

I highly recommend watching this YouTube video (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aIQY44LCIjc> – The History of Global Banking: A Broken System? by Economics Explained) because our history was most certainly the inspiration – and if you can identify the source then you can see where EE may or may not have diverged. This system seems far simpler than the earth equivalent, Calernia is still in the mercantilism phase, but has developed a system of international exchange. The loans they are taking out appear to be from private banks in a currency that is backed by a mercantis central bank. The value of currency at this time appears to be based on the gold content of the coins, not sure if they've moved to fiat currencies yet – which is basically understood worldwide. As for “conscripting” mercantis and its resources, they could, but that would completely tank their reputation and they have no time or resources to do it right now. It's glossed over for a reason, this stuff is hella complicated.

Liliet

If you squint, what Cat is pulling here is kind of low key exactly that.

There's just a lot of polite fiction on all sides, backed by the fact Mercantis is far away territorially.

erebus42

“AMBASSADOR LIVIA! Do not take me for some conjurer of cheap tricks!”

dadycool

“I'm trying to rob you blind.”

erebus42

“Or at the very least extort you for the greater good!”

doominator10

I need the sauce for this chain.

erebus42

The initial post was a riff on a quote by Gandalf the Grey from Lord of the Rings. The rest were just fun little amendments

sivarajan

The next line in the original was also "I'm not trying to rob you."

Miles

"Then let us keep to laws and treaties," I said, my smile never reaching my eyes. "To decency and the milk of human kindness."

Fill in the changes in your mind, if you wish, or do not. But pgte is in 3rd place and that is just uncalled for.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

This is one of the better ones

Miles

Best part, I realized later, is what line comes after the section I quoted. Entirely an accident.

[i]Vote,[i] I did not say. We all heard it anyway.

dadycoool

Holy fuck! Badass Cat is a BAMF. Yes, she's a monster doing monstrous things and threatening to do more of them, but damn!

Liliet

Cat specifically considers the monstrousness of her actions in the chapter. Keeping in mind the Indrani backstory chapter, I wholeheartedly second the resounding "nah" she arrives at.

dadycoool

Yeah. She may have had a lot of teachers, but she's a product of Black's Callow to the core, supplemented very mostly by his personal teachings and opinions.

Liliet

Not sure how this relates to my point, would appreciate clarification and discussion :3

dadycoool

I think, in response to the Indrani backstory part, I was specifically thinking of how well Cat's always gotten along with greenskins due to her Tavern Wench past where the Orcs were basically her heroes, which is only true because of Black's War Doctrines and him ruling the place. Also, due to Black's teachings, she knows exactly what she's doing, what the consequences would likely be if she pushed too far, and that those consequences would outweigh the benefits, but only to a point, because slavery and Indrani. So, maybe because of all her teachers she knows how well it gives her what she wants and because her core is Black she knows (previous sentence).

Liliet

Huh, nice.

LizAris

YESS and the Catdelia partnership continues. For all of her words and diplomacy Hasenbach sometimes just needs a really scary hammer of Night.

All I could imagine after "and she doesn't particularly want to" is Cordelia sitting in her corner like

"Thank god this one is on my side. Knelt in front of her for a reason. Ya'll dumbass Merchants wanna listen to me now??"

Unrelated note—the proportion of queer Calernians makes me very happy 😊

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, it's nice to have your existence acknowledged. That proportion is a bit higher than in reality, no?

Liliet

We notice every single one, we don't notice those who don't violate the norm.

Okay, so maybe in PGTE specifically the queer couples/preferences get more mentions, but that does nothing but balance out the overwhelming hetero mentions of the rest of media in our world.

It's not like the narrative asides need to be statistically representative for some reason.

Konstantin von Karstein

Indeed:)

Miles

Doubt it. Lots of people hide and be invisible. Doesn't seem as necessary in Calernia.

Salt

I'll be honest, I found it a little hard to take Cat's whole "bad cop" act too seriously here.

I mean she did a good job, it's just overshadowed by the absolute hilarity of Cordelia playing a precisely-tuned political game with national representatives by... secretly finger-painting instructions under the table to the foremost Villain of her generation.

I can just imagine her thought process, planning for this. "Should I convey my intent with discreetly hidden glances? Or perhaps innocuous gestures accented with almost undetectably subtle changes in tone?"

"... you know what, fuck it, it's Catherine. I'll just draw Y/N under the table for her and call it a day"

Liliet

I don't know what option is better: for them to have agreed upon it beforehand or for Cordelia to have improvised this in response to Cat's improvisation. Both are fantastic.

A+ best colleagueship would see 1000 seasons of a tv series about.

LizAris

What always strikes me is the proportion of people in power who are openly queer. Malicia, Cat, Warlock, Livia, etc. Very neat.

dadycool

I've always noticed that it's the "Evil", or at best neutral, characters that are LGBT. I've always figured it was because they don't have the "HERESY, VULGARITY, AND PERVERSION" stigma that classical "Good" would have, given the Judaeo-Christian elements of the morality system.

Konstantin von Karstein

The head of the Holy Society (now Great Inquisitor or something like that) is a trans man, and no one bats an eye. The Ashuran ambassador was openly gay, and there are miracles that make possible for lesbian women to have kids. Light is given by Above, so it's a confirmation they don't have a problem with same-sex couples. Above and the Good countries have no stigma against queer people, even if the rest of their morality seems indeed based on the judeo-Christian one.

Frivolous

Hey. I hadn't noticed the now-Inquisitor was trans. Could you kindly link me to where that is confirmed or implied?

Konstantin von Karstein

From Interlude: Candle in book 5:

«They had not changed at all since he'd first gazed on them when they were both fifteen and Simon still believed his rightful name to be Simone.»

And there is another reference, when Cordelia said to himself that the « accident of birth » (or something like that) of Simon was corrected.

Frivolous

Thank you. Really appreciate it.

Liliet

Cordelia is bi.

We just get more Evil/Neutral POV than Good, it's an accidental statistical bias.

Ninestrings

"Don't look at her," I said. "It won't help. She can't stop me, and she doesn't particularly want to."

First Prince: Whistles innocently

Liliet

Ambassador Livia, in her head: What do you mean she doesn't want to?!

Ambassador Livia in her head, two seconds later having remembered what her own position is: Oh. Right.

Burlyraven

Heh, the half-hero Archer comes along to smack some sense into Cat before she goes full tragic fall of the villain. And more Cat as the dark trickster is always welcome.

Liliet

HELL YEAH

boballab

It would good to see Cat indulge in her inner Pyromanic even if it was only in someone else's nightmare. Besides now if Merchantis ever catches fire and burns down, even by accident, the Ambassador will make sure Cat gets blamed.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Ma'mm, the Deducing Diviner themself has aided us in this, and swears on their name they have seen the events. The fires, though tragic in scope, started humbly when a goat in a stable kicked over an ill-placed lantern. That's the whole of it."

"SHE USED THE GOAT TO DO IT, I JUST KNOW IT!"

vernal.ancient

I mean, they didn't say the goat was ALIVE at the time, so...

Konstantin von Karstein

If the story of the undead goats spread, she would be totally right to accuse Cat 😊

Liliet

Honestly, considering the way Cat described the fire, I'd say she's sharing her PTSD more than indulging her pyromania.

Much as one is funnier than the other, I've always found the memes based solidly in accurate characterization to be higher quality in the end :3

doominator10

Hold on, there might be extenuating circumstances. If the fire's not goblin fire, heck if it's not just regular fire that looks green if you squint at it real hard, then Cat may be able to get away with some plausible deniability with that.

boballab

Remember Cat got blamed for the fire in that city when someone else set it on fire and she used that trick to get through it and that was just plain old normal colored fire.

Mental Mouse

Nope, goblinfire is one of the Legions' points of terror – and now one of Cat's.

Juff

Typo Thread:

preferred. I recalled, > preferred, I recalled, heavy smoked > heavy smoke
Nott until > Not until not to flip > to not flip then. If I kept (extra space) back home that > back home than would the army > would be the army in snit > in a snit facing each other > faced each other save Ambassador > save the Ambassador tried to a war (missing word) suit as well > suit us as well
Highness," Ambassador > Highness." Ambassador
"Indeed," Cordelia > "Indeed." Cordelia pleasantly, "yet > pleasantly. "Yet eventually successor > eventual successor a greedy > greedy would reflected > would be reflected and came a > and there came a spencer

This is the most Evil we've seen Cat in a long time. It's easy to root for her laissez-faire humanistic form of villainy, but chapters like this are reminders of the problems of humanism as a basis for morality.

Liliet

-looks at the part of the chapter where Cat ponders whether she feels guilty about scaring Livia-

Yeah, nah.

Also, I'd be curious to hear what exactly you mean by humanistic/humanism in this concept? I'm not sure clear on the terminology, this seems like an interesting take.

dadycool

Probably the "Humans applying their own morality to other species" version, specifically about the pleasure the Orcs and Drow seem to be deriving from their actions. Of course, using that description/explanation, you could replace "Humans" with "Americans" and "Species" with "Countries" and have the same effect. Probably wouldn't apply to the eating of human flesh or gouging out kids' eyes, but we probably/definitely have other habits that are about as horrific to other cultures.

Liliet

...that does NOT sound right

dadycoool

As in "That's messed up" or "That's completely off the mark"?

Liliet

the latter

sivarajan

In the context I have usually heard it, humanism refers to any moral framework not based on religion.

Liliet

...then I'm really confused about the original point.

Salt

Well, at the least Cat definitely is a humanist as a character, in terms of modern humanism which is very closely tied together with secularism and materialist philosophies.

It was pretty blatantly spelled out when she had her argument with Hanno about the stalwart apostle (the scorched apostate's heroic mirror), considering her reasoning was about as humanistic as it gets. Hanno (correctly) pointed out that it was a humanist complaint rather than a the practical complaint she was claiming it to be, since in the guide verse world, both faith and the higher power the faith is offered to are proven to be both tangible and practical as a solution.

Although, not sure exactly which correlation spencer was going for here. I suppose the most obvious one would be that a system of morality based on purely human/mortal views is innately flawed due to the innate imperfection in human views – as we all have our biases and blinders. Normally modern humanism responds to this by simply disbelieving in higher powers, but in this setting it gets messier since higher powers undeniably exist.

Liliet

Higher powers also undeniably leave it to humans to figure out their own shit. See also: Hanno's musings on slavery and evolution of morality.

Guide is a setting where Gods exist, but it's also a humanist setting completely, in this sense. That's what makes it so interesting to me.

Salt

Half correct – it's a humanist setting for the Villainous half, and a nearly complete rejection of humanism for the Heroic half.

It's only Below that specifically wants you to grasp certainty for yourself – rewarding you for it accordingly. In the eyes of below, it's only the sum of human actions that matter, and the victory you grasp with your actions will retroactively make you worthy of victory in their eyes.

AKA there are no principles. There is no natural law of morality. Do what you want, and your victories or defeats will prove that you are right or wrong. Quite literally "one grace, victory/one sin, defeat"

Above is the opposite, they reject extremist humanism. They reward a giving up of agency – like Hanno or the Stalwart Apostle. They say there are a predefined set of virtues/principles that should be aimed at, and how willing you are to give up your own desires and your own control for the sake of those principles, is what makes you deserve to win. The Choirs/Above rewards heroes accordingly, for following this philosophy.

AKA There ARE principles. Those principles are paramount, above your own wants or desires. Natural law of morality is spelled out for you by the Choirs. Follow those laws, and in doing so you make yourself worthy of victory before the battle is ever fought.

This is why Catherine is a 100% Villain that is paradoxically also Heroic in intent. She follows only her own idea of morality and her own desires like a proper Villain should. She's a Hero at heart because the morals she wants to follow and the desires she wants to achieve are... coincidentally Heroic. Bringing peace, saving the poor and innocent, all that good jazz.

Hanno's thoughts on Heroic morality? Just further proves that the Above half of Creation doesn't support Humanism at all. He noted that Heroes are often mistaken about what Above actually wants, not that they're rejecting what they think Above wants for the sake of their own agency.

Liliet

You are incorrect?

Hanno's point was that insisting someone "wasn't following the will of Heavens" was ubiquitous, often on both sides, and could not be used to practically figure out what the will of Heavens actually was. He's also commented on priests for "speaking for the silent Heavens".

It's also completely incorrect to say that either he or Stalwart Apostle "gave up their agency" at any point. Yes, I know that's what Amadeus said. I'll even be willing to believe he wasn't just talking shit and genuinely believed it. Doesn't make him the author's intended mouthpiece, if only just because Erratic is a better writer than that.

Stalwart Apostle was not in a seconds-matter urgent situation. She took the time to pray before she could / would have to look for other solutions. It worked. Pascal's wager, you lose nothing and might gain something by believing; there's a reason Pascale is her name. Catherine's lashing out at her was bullshit born out of an entirely different reason, one that had nothing to do with her agency and what she did with it.

Hanno did not receive any input from his Choir other than the coin's answers. Cooperate with the Delosi bureaucracy, ignore it or throw the coin for them? His decision. Bring Kairos's tower down with his party inside it? His decision. All attempts at training to take down the Black Knight, successful and not? His decisions. Helping put together the Crusade? His decision. Calling Black out for a duel? His plan. Going North afterwards? Him. Giving heroes lectures on collateral damage and how to avoid it? His coin didn't print that speech out, it's not a printer, it's a coin. He has (jokingly?) threatened heroes with throwing the coin for them when they were in a dispute. The decision to go south, the decision to throw the coin for each individual he met in the burning Salia – that was alllll him. Talking to Catheirne was him, telling her that she was dangerous because she swept people up in her enthusiasm easily was him. The coin had 0 role in any of that, nor the Choir of Judgement in any other way.

Saying he "gave up his agency to the coin" is like saying a person who looks something up on wikipedia "gives up their agency to wikipedia". They offload some of the work, and there are tradeoffs involved perhaps in reliability and how well it matches what they want (I think perfectly in the Choirs' case by their very nature, but that's not the point), but their AGENCY? The decision what to look up is still theirs in the first place, and just because they precommitted to using the result of their looking up whatever it is, doesn't mean that doesn't count as their decision either.

The segment I am talking about in the previous post is this:

> The interesting thing about morality, Hanno had found, was that it evolved across the years. Living through shards of a hundred heroes and heroines' lives had made it impossible to deny as much, though he disliked the thought that concepts like Good and Evil could be mutable. The Book of All Things, after all, did not change – neither should ethics. Yet, a few thousand years ago, most of Calernia had once practiced slavery. The ancestors of nations that now found the very notion repugnant had then been unable to function without it. Procerans, in days before there was a Procer, had raided each other for plunder and workers. The Titanomachy had built its wonders as much by the legendary craftsmanship of the Gigantes as on the backs of a hundred thousand Arlesite slaves. Even Ashur, his homeland, had once kept a citizenship tier beneath them all where forced labourers and servants were inducted into. But over the years, that ugly reality had been... outgrown. Recognized as unworthy of all those who would call themselves the children of the Heavens.

> And so slavery went from commodity to sin, and Creation was made a little brighter.

The entire world of Guide functionally runs on humanism. Even Choirs are culture-relative: EE has confirmed Yan-Tei doesn't have them. Gods Above have set guidelines for following guidelines, not even guidelines for setting guidelines, see Golden Bloom elves for an extreme "wut" example. That sure ain't what Gods Above "told" the rest of Calernian Good to be like, eh?

Salt

Nope. The point you're mistaken on this one is about what the IRL ideology of humanism means in the first place, not the characterization of the doods in the story.

Humanism, at the very core of it, is one that considers humans solely responsible for ultimate progress, determination of morality, and goodness.

This is why modern humanism is so heavily tied with secularism, because the belief that a “higher” entity – one above humans – even exists at all is contrary to humanist belief. Not all religions have such beliefs, but the vast majority do.

The fact that the Heroic characters in the story still made the choice to follow Above doesn't mean that they're humanists in any way shape or form. That has nothing to do with “humanism”. The important bit is that they chose to believe that the judgement or metaphysical status of Above (no matter how vague their guidelines) as greater than that of mortal human beings in the first place.

Hanno believing that humans are not qualified to Judge, and only that the “higher” spiritual entity that is the Seraphim being capable of perfect Justice, is by definition the exact opposite of a humanist belief. It doesn't matter that he made the choice to flip the coin, the fact that he's choosing to rely on flipping the coin rather than choosing to believe himself capable of Justice, makes him the antithesis of humanism as an ideology.

Humanist Apostle wouldn't have prayed to a higher power to save her, because to be considered a “humanist”, she can't really believe that said power is higher and worth praying to in the first place.

Hence why Agency comes up, which also doesn't mean what you appear to think it means. It's a fairly complex IRL sociological/philosophical term that EE made a valiant effort to explain through story dialogue, but he may have been overambitious on that one, considering the mass confusion I've been seeing in the comments section.

Agency in terms of decision-making capability can mean either the physical/involuntary capability, or a voluntary and intentional action where there is outside influence or guidance (goal directed action)

It's a rather controversial topic on sociology/philosophy as well in terms of underlying beliefs due to personal experience and societal beliefs affecting the ability to truly make independent decisions, so I can't actually blame EE that much for most of the readers only latching onto the (much simpler) involuntary capability part of it instead. He did pretty well explaining it through context, it's just a very VERY complex concept/topic in the first place.

As a tl;dr instead of copy pasting an intro to sociology lecture here though, ingrained beliefs causing you to choose to allow an outside actor to interfere in your personal decisionmaking is 100% considered a giving up of/a loss of agency, obviously to varying degrees depending on situation. Giving up agency doesn't (necessarily) mean you're not the one making the choice or that you're physically compelled, and I imagine involuntary agency is not what the "Black Knight" was talking about in his conversation with the "White Knight", since otherwise his monologue makes no sense whatsoever.

Liliet

I do know what agency is, and I see where we talked past one another a bit.

I'm saying that the world of Guide runs on humanism. And sure, some characters don't think so, but they're observably, provably wrong. Above basically runs a mirror maze that reflects their own values at them in a way that makes them ooh and aah and go "yeah Above is sooooo right!!!!" because values it professes directly towards them never conflict with their own... WHAT A COINCIDENCE, HUH. Religion is religion, but people who observe the world make functionally humanist observations even if they don't profess the philosophy per se.

So humanism-guided actions are based on objective reality, and actions based on objective reality well enough end up looking like they might have been guided by humanism, because it's the underlying mechanic whether you know it or not.

As for agency, Stalwart Apostle received exactly the effect she asked for – trading her Gift for the ability to wield Light. If asking other people things and predicating your next actions on their reaction is giving up agency, boy do I have bad news for you about whether agency exists at all.

And sure, Hanno gives up a millimeter of agency when he flips the coin...

...which is an individual choice he makes separately every single time. When he's not willing to subordinate his actions to the coin he doesn't flip it, and this happens most of the time.

As a matter of fact, Hanno has used the coin 3 ways:

1) a powerup mid-fight. He didn't really doubt what the verdict for Kairos or Amadeus would be, and in fact had been fighting (and trying to kill) Amadeus for a while before flipping. No agency loss involved, or at least no expected agency loss, as "the coin shows laurels" would be very much a freak and absurd outlier indicating something somewhere had gone very wrong (and if anything be helpful as an indicator of whatever that is, allowing Hanno to exercise his agency with that additional information);

2) Information gathering method. Hanno didn't know those people in Salia, he could not have any meaningful agency regarding them. Sure, there was a tradeoff in how little information he got from the coin leading to how narrowly he could use it, but the alternative was not him exercising personal agency instead, it was no information at all – so either doing nothing or random actions. Not more agency-full;

3) "I literally don't give a shit and would like you to fuck off", aka some Proceran nobles at Vales asking for Hanno's arbitration. In that situation Hanno's personal decision making was that he doesn't want and doesn't consider himself qualified to do the thing. He used the coin for that, and it didn't give him input on whether he should arbitrate disputes between nobles in the future. For all that he personally cared about the outcome of that flip he might as well have been flipping an actual coin.

When there is actual personal decision making to do, Hanno doesn't flip. He didn't flip on Cordelia, he didn't flip on Catherine, he didn't flip when heroes were squabbling. Whenever there's any actual agency-differentiated decision to make, he does not ask angels what it should be. He acts on his own, and if he flips, it's because he expects / knows that the coin's answer would line up with his.

Often he doesn't flip when he expects/knows what the answer would be and doesn't want to do that. So, when he doesn't want to do what the angels want, he doesn't do it. His agency is perfectly preserved.

Salt

We'll have to disagree, because I think you're using a very VERY large stretch to try justifying "humanism". One that wouldn't fly in an IRL setting where we don't have physical proof of things like gods, let alone a fiction setting where such exists.

Humanism is not a narrow, positive, philosophy. It's broad enough to be more of a denial of metaphysical spiritualism or the supernatural more than anything.

The fact that you believe that humanism is correct isn't a proof for humanism being correct, it's just proof that you're a humanist. Personally I just cannot understand how someone can believe that a fiction world that runs on quite literal invisible supernatural story tropes that railroad entire nations like Praes into particular stories, one which is verifiably created by what many view as higher powers, one in which higher powers frequently intervene, and one in which a good half the population has a rather fervent belief in the metaphysical superiority of higher powers, is somehow a purely humanistic one.

Also no, I really don't think you understand agency, if you still think the fact that being able to make the conscious decision means you haven't given up agency.

Giving up of agency, I will try to make it even simpler, includes willingly choosing to give it up because of your beliefs. It is not about the number of actions that you defer, so much as how willing you are in deferring how far you're willing to take it.

It is about the degree of willingness, not about the numerical proportion of how often intervention/guidance is relevant.

Hanno would off himself on his own sword if the Seraphim told him it was necessary for Justice. He routinely walks around aimlessly, letting the invisible force of Providence take him where it believes he is needed. He actively avoids even forming his own judgements, rather than letting his judgements be superseded, because he simply does not believe that a flawed mortals like him should ever judge at all.

He's someone who is willing to let any decision of ANY importance be superseded by another agent, if they wished to intervene. That's the definition of voluntary loss of agency.

The Tyrant's view of Hanno – “all desires his own faded while that horrid thing intertwined with the Seraphim – I wish to be just – tainted everything” is about as close to a blunt author acknowledgment of it as you'll ever possibly get.

Liliet

When you google something, do you surround your agency in looking for things to Google, or do you use google to facilitate your agency?

When you check your email, do you surrender your agency to whoever wrote you emails that day?

Hanno wishes to be just, not to be obedient. Those are different things. And he decided he wanted to be just on his own, not on someone else's advice – he went to the Face of the Just in that temple, he chose to push on even after a warning from the old man. “I wish to be just” is as clearly his agency as it gets, even if it's born out of trauma. A hypothetical of “he would off himself if an angel told him so” is a hypothetical that remains unproven and needs a lot of clarification of circumstances.

(There are a lot of circumstances under which Catherine would off herself, too, and some of them would involve other people saying so, though admittedly few. Under analogous circumstances Hanno would, too, sure. If the Seraphim just told him to out of the blue? I'd think he'd question if that's actually Seraphim and if they're okay and if he should still listen to them, first) Kairos's opinions on various motivations are... special.

And avoiding forming your own judgements on things you're underinformed about is nothing but prudent thinking.

I'll leave humanism alone, a terminology debate is not what I'm super interested in, here.

Liliet

Note:

> The Ophanim were at his side, helping his tired old bones stand straight, and though in their whispers there was sorrow there was also something other.

Trust. They trusted him, the murmurs said, to make the choice. They had seen as he saw, tread in his wake for the seemingly endless days and night he had been the Peregrine. They'd been at his shoulder for his every mistake, his every bitter triumph, and still they trusted. Sometimes that was the only reason he woke with dawn, the knowledge that hand in hand they could still do more. Sometimes that was the weight that pressed down on his chest and choked his lungs, the strain of that unearthly trust. Tariq had tread with angels in his wake for so long he'd forgot how it had felt before.

> "Should you not have answers?" he asked, voice choked. "Are you not the Watchers Kindly, the burning wisdom of many eyes?"

> Old friends, he thought, help me. Help me see, for once more I am lost. But they had no answers for him, would not take the burden from his shoulders. But they stood at his side, holding up his tired from, for in the end they were the Choir of Mercy and though they could not save him they would at least share in his suffering.

One time, Peregrine DID try to do what Good is memetically famous for doing and defer his agency to the literal angels over his shoulder.

And the answer was "lolno".

Mirror maze. No answers except those you yourself bring.

Avren

This chapter was a cut or two below this web novels average quality. I dont want to say it but this one was a bit cheesy and cliché.

Liliet

Beauty's in the eye of the beholder.

Nothing's too cheesy for PGTE to incorporate it, that's one of the things I love best about it.

Avren

Sure but when i think of PGTE kind of cheese i think of something like Cat coming back to the infirmary at the end of the chapter to find Hakram's throat slit and a coin with swords next to him. We have different taste in cheese ~_(\ツ)_/~

Liliet

What the fuck.

Yeah, we have VERY different taste in cheese!!!!!!

Salt

100%. The whole thing started out rather cheesy to start, with Black's naming sense for his personal guard being one of the most egregious puns we've seen to date. We started with the first chapter of the first book containing an absolutely awful dad joke

(He called them "blackguards", aka both the ye olde English word for "male scoundrels" and also Black's guards in a literal sense)

Liliet

Oh yes, that IS one of my favorite PGTE puns ♥

AbraKadabra

Eh... No.

Nicholas Guyett

I think you might be forgetting to account for the fact that this was primarily a performance that was leveraging the combination of exaggerated and earned reputation to force Mercantis to think more pragmatically about how important it is that the Grand Alliance win this war.

Particularly within this setting, it necessitates a certain amount of narrative cheese to do it right.

Avren

My main gripe with this chapter is that stories about overpowered demigods vs normal people is not fun. Those kinds of stories are only fun if there is an actual challenge involved.

Honestly the challenge could also have been the moral dilemma of Cat torturing a defenceless woman but we already know that she has done worse and isn't even squeamish about it.

The casual callousness of what she is doing could also have been a good point but the story doesn't really focus on that and just moves on.

The challenge could have been the confrontation with the Mercantis group but even there Cat is always in complete control of the situation from start to finish. I was half expecting the Ambassador to piss herself at the end there. So we end up with a chapter where Cat is just playing with ants. Sure the story moves on but the chapter is lacking imo. Not that big of a deal, i dont have to like all chapters.

Liliet

> stories about overpowered demigods vs normal people is not fun

Stories where power levels escalate endlessly aren't fun. "So Last Season" isn't fun. Cat's at the top of the power totem pole, the story has been about that since Book 4. It is precisely a story about an overpowered demigod surrounded by normal people and trying to take care of them, and how the overpoweredness does and does not help.

It is important and valuable to periodically show the overpoweredness in question, to avoid making it an informed attribute and keep the readers' understanding of Catherine's level of ability fresh.

Also, there was very blatant subtext here about how Catherine's ability to weave a nightmare was 10% functional power for that in Night and knowing Hierophant (an institutional power, that one!), 90% the horrors she'd seen and willingness to dredge them up. Did you know she remembered the screams of people burning alive in goblinfire at Three Hills? I didn't! I might have been able to guess, but knowing is a different thing. Did you know she remembered Summerholm (First or Second?) as "a blaze starting at her feet and devouring a quarter of the city"?

This chapter was about a lot more than just "oh look Cat is >9000". It was about the attitude and skill and resolve she'd learned and earned the hard way. It was about her deciding that she didn't feel guilty about doing things to Livia because of the beautiful and young "attendants" standing behind her and other ambassadors and her knowledge from Indrani of what those are. It was about her casual coordination with Cordelia. It was about her skill in showmanship.

It was about how, for possibly the first time in the story, Catherine made a threat for the purpose of avoiding following up on it, and the interlocutor listened.

Avren

This is devolving into meaningless arguing. Yes i do know that Cat wove what she saw into the nightmare, yes i also read her justification about why she doesnt feel too bad about torturing a woman or how she coordinated well with Hasenbach . I've read the chapter as well. For the last time, i dont have to like each and every chapter. I feel this was a particularly weak one, it happens.

Liliet

And that is completely fair. I just challenged what sounded like an "objective"/"universal" assertion in your logic. Didn't presume you meant it as such, just engaged with the written text on its own terms.

Cause I really like writing and theory of what writers do wrong and right and this particular issue is a THING for my at least enjoyment >x>

Liliet

So, a bunch of cool shit:

- Cat's nightmare creativity. She more or less explicitly spells out that she's drawing on her own trauma for this – take the mention of her remembering the Three Hills screams clearly in light of how many years it's been since – which is an excellent take;

- more low key queer characters. A+ could always use more;

- Indrani's backstory being DELICATELY brought up. I'm with Cat on not feeling guilty about this shit. You represent the system, you get treated in accordance with what it deserves;

- Indrani calling Cat out on her absolute failure wrt Vivienne. I'M SO HAPPY WE HAVE HER;

- Catherine/Cordelia cooperation. From Catherine's estimation of signals at the start, it really does sound like they improvised the Night-based signaling on the fly through sheer mutual understanding, which is THE BEST MOST EXCELLENT A+ I LOVE THIS;

- there's an interesting interplay between projecting power by bringing lots of people and projecting power by bringing no-one. There's a particular... threshold one needs to clear before this becomes an option, and Catherine Queen Of Nightmares just successfully did. Love her and love this story.

mamm0nn

Ah, I knew that something like this was coming. For all that Cat has been forced in the "For the Greater Good" corner where doing anything but would be chaotic stupid villainy, we shouldn't forget that she's not actually a Hero or bound to a redemption story or some form of kindness. And Mercantis right now isn't even just being troublesome but still contributing enough to not be just struck down, they're the people that believe Cat to be bound by the Greater Good only to misinterpret themselves to be part of said GG.

I was really hoping for something along the lines of:

"I think there's some kind of misunderstanding, Livia. All of this political nonsense I have to go through, all of these people I need to work with and whose opinions I have to respect, you're not one of them. And the Cardinal, it's not actually part of the war against the Dead King, it's my pet project. My way of carving myself into the annals of history, my lofty ideal to grasp as a Villain."

"There's no Greater Good or concessions for the war there. It's just you, trying to worm yourself into a Villain's ideal. Do you know what happens when someone tries something like that? Their city burns. Forget all of this clutter that has nothing to do with You and I and My City. If you oppose me and my ideals, I'll just burn Mercantis to the ground for your insolence, whether now or after the war. I honestly don't care, I can do either."

Liliet

Eh, too crude. She DOES need Mercantis to keep Procer afloat still.

A very tempting idea though!

mamm0nn

Crude, indeed. I tried to keep my comment short where EE can spend a whole chapter to refine her words and actions into a subtle and refined statement.

Considering the massive debts though, burning down Mercantis to take the gold and make the debts go away is a viable, if not indeed troublesome Story for a Villain, way to resolve it for now. And considering that gold is a hard value in this story it seems rather than something that becomes relative at best at a government league, it's not as if the current situation will remain viable for long either.

Liliet

Um, people live there. We're talking about Cat, not an abstract villain. She has lines in the sand she would like people to be aware she doesn't cross and she cares about more things than villains "normally" do, which has also been significant in her diplomatic relationships.

Also, gold still stands for 'ability to buy things'. I'm not sure burning down Mercantis and taking all of it will help much, as it might just destroy the exact resource they wanted in the first place. (Mercantis gold to buy services Mercantis provides)

mamm0nn

Burning down a city in medieval times is not the same as calling a bombardment or nuclear strike on it nowadays, and the Legions of Terror have the discipline to not go raiding and pillaging and raping if Cat told them not to. She can go to Mercantis and make it burn, without setting the lower residential districts on fire. She has been willing to do similar things before, such as the siege of Marchford had the Silver Spears had successfully retreated there, or marching to Liesse to kick Akua's teeth in before she'd got her evil scheme up and running. Not to mention, she never discarded that 'People need to know you're willing to do what you threaten them with.' as a lesson as Black taught her. I wouldn't say that her marching on Mercantis for this is crossing a line she would never cross. The contents of the dreams she sent Livia, yes, but not the act of military intervention on the city itself.

With the gold I meant the rather complicated and perhaps even abstract detail that to (real world) governments and banks a currency isn't at all as absolute and relevant as one may think it is, even when we're talking a gold standard. To them a debt isn't a number or something that can be cashed in by the debtor, rather than a much more complex matter. But if you're wondering why almost all countries just rake up their debts ever further as we speak, it's simply because those debts don't actually work as a raw number the way one may think they do.

Considering the Alliance doesn't have any trade partners for an income of vital goods outside the Alliance, and all countries that could enforce repaying the debts are already their enemies or insignificant in size to back those demands, Procer can quite literally ignore the debts and if need be even the need for gold at all. Who's going to enforce the debts, and how?

If the people accept it, who's going to stop them from switching to silver or coupons instead? As long as they produce the food and other necessities themselves, which the Alliance does while Mercantis doesn't control even a vital part of that trade, the city of Bought and Sold has no actual leverage to force Procer's hand.

The only real leverage Mercantis has, other than Story enforcing the gold standard which I doubt it does for non-Named, is that it can stop the stream of gold. It can choose to stop granting loans, but just like real life governments lending from banks the country can then just ignore the debts or take the currency by force if there's no equal or greater policing force to enforce the bank's rights. As much as we may believe otherwise, at the end of the day that's how it works if the country chooses it works that way, even in the real world.

Liliet

Ah, that, yeah, I agree re: burning just the upper districts. It's still going to be a very nasty business though, for servants and children and the aforementioned slaves if nothing else, and Cat Would Rather Not. Sure she would if she were pressed, but that's exactly the angle she's taking here. "Don't MAKE me".

mamm0nn

Oh yes, absolutely. I just think that the bar for her doing that is a little lower than most people and Mercantis themselves may think.

Liliet

I'm not sure Mercantis has realized that's an option. Or, had realized, up to this point. Existential threats tend to fall outside of people's imagination.

Sunday

After a solid week of nonstop reading, I've finally caught up. One of the best pieces of media I've ever read!

Liliet

Welcome to the heaven of strict on-schedule updates and hell of there being a whole three days in between them!

Miles

How do ital[i]cs[/i] work here?

Miles

Oh I see. It's .

Satan

Cordelia and Catherine, playing hand and brain chess.

Chapter 43: Conclusions

"I have been assured that my enemies lie behind every shadow, which is why they will henceforth be illegal."

– Dread Empress Sinistra III

During one of the first conversations I'd ever had with Black, he'd told me that he did not believe rule through fear alone could be sustainable. I found it one of those lovely little ironies of life that my first teacher had arrived by cold pragmatism to share that belief with Cordelia Hasenbach, who'd gotten there largely on account of being a halfway decent person. Whatever the reason, in practice it'd ended up meaning that while we could have bullied Mercantis into withdrawing with nothing to show for its efforts they'd instead been thrown red meat. Not in the quantity or quality they'd wanted, but enough that they'd have something to chew on besides their pride.

In the event of a lapsed debt by princes, Hasenbach committed the office of First Prince to taking up the debt in their name and repaying it from diverted taxes at a fixed rate. She also guaranteed payment in goods if coin was not forthcoming, for up to a third of the worth of debts and offered that both commitments she'd just made would be guaranteed by a treaty under the aegis Grand Alliance. To sate the hungriest of the merchant lords, she even sold a handful of monopolies as well: only for a duration of ten years, however, and they would solely be enforced in Proceran lands.

Mostly it was monopolies on goods in which Mercantis already dominated trade – perfume, cloth, dyes and enchanted luxuries – that were sold, which would essentially serve as a ten-year stay on competition in those goods whether or not the monopoly was enforced in Callow. My kingdom had neither the skilled artisans to begin trading in such goods nor the gold to sink into building the workshops necessary for their creation. In time we might, but the merchant lords would have quite the head start by then and no competition from the greatest realm on the surface of Calernia while they took it. My people lost nothing with this and might yet gain, though. The audience ended coolly but not with hostility, and the matter was considered settled.

For now.

The following days went by quickly, the last stretches of haggling over how the Hainaut campaign was to be raised and waged – Malanza was still trying to trade back some of the drow sigils for Arlesite foot and horse, the Iron Prince wanted fewer prongs on the attack than Juniper's suggested three – occupying my hours along with regular meetings with the White Knight to discuss which Named should be assigned to the campaign. So far it was skewing a little heavily favour of heroes for my tastes, but we were starting to figure out what a functional roster would look like. A haze of anticipation hung in the air of the Arsenal, as all awaited the arrival of the envoys from the Titanomachy.

They were the last loose end left to tie up, and when they were tied we'd return to the business of war.

—

When the Gigantes did arrive, they startled me with their swiftness.

We had less than a day to prepare between the first warning that the three giants had reached Iserre and their unexpected arrival in the Arsenal. The fortress in Iserre where they'd appeared was used to cross into the Twilight Ways but wasn't actually one of the translation points, just a shortcut to head towards one in southeastern Salia. Which made it all the more of a surprise when the three giants emerged in the translation room of the outer gatehouse to the Arsenal most of a day later. Neither the swiftness of the march nor the direct crossing into the first level of Arsenal defences were something any of our people would have been able to replicate, Hierophant privately admitted to me.

I got the message the Gigantes were sending, as I expected the Procerans and Levantines did as well: there were mysteries at their disposal we could only dream of, and we should not get too cocksure even after all we'd managed to build.

The hastily arranged welcoming party for the envoys ended up being a headache to wrangle. The Titanomachy still did not have any formal diplomatic relations with the Principate, and while it was dubious they'd attack the First Prince if she stood before them that did not mean they would be willing to speak with her. Which meant Hasenbach couldn't come, and if Procer couldn't have someone in attendance then to save face it would be best if the Grand Alliance simply 'elected to send a single representative'. I voted for Lord Yannu Marave to handle it, given the Dominion's cordial if distant relations with the Titanomachy, but he voted for me and the First Prince abstained.

A round of bickering later, I ended up sent out when the whole matter was settled by our being notified that Hanno intended on going to greet the Gigantes himself. If the heroic representative went so must the one for villains, while Lord Yannu and I could not both go – it'd make Hasenbach's absence all the more glaring. Masego tried to be there as well, rather transparently so he could have a look at the Gigantes from close with his magical eyes, but I turned him away. He could try his hand at that later, when the diplomatic claptrap was over with. And so I found myself standing once more atop the stairs leading down to the stone floor where the translation ritual would take place.

At least I wouldn't have to go down the damned stairs again, so there was that.

I wore formal clothing in black and silver, a crown set on my brow and the Mantle of Woe on my back as a pointed reminder of the two offices I was standing for here. The White Knight was in plate with a sword at his hip, though he'd chosen not to wear a helmet. We'd exchanged a few courtesies after I arrived, a dozen attendants from the Arsenal staff standing behind us, but while there'd been no brusqueness from either part we'd quickly lapsed into silence anyway. Neither of us were in much of a talking mood. There was a little more to it than that, of course. Since our conversation over the fate of the Red Axe, we had not once shared words save in our official capacities.

There was a price to everything, I'd learned that lesson early – and never forgotten it since, as fate went out of its way to refresh my memory every few years. My thoughts did not get to linger on the subject, as a shiver of power in the room warned that the Gigantes were soon to be among us. Leaning against my staff, I had a look over the edge from the high vantage point.

Immediately it became clear that this was not the usual ritual. The gates in and out of the half-realm that served as the funnel into the Arsenal had a particular look to them, like a cut into the fabric of Creation that rippled outwards, but the large gate beginning to open was nothing alike. A broad and tall rectangle bordered in shining glyphs came into being at once, with a muted blast of air, and along the inner side of the border there was a small tremor. The filling of the rectangle wavered, and I realized it had been almost like a cut as the layer between the Arsenal and the travellers crumpled and shrivelled into nothing. Slower than our own method, I noted, but it looked more stable and their gate was perfectly aligned with the ground on both layers of reality.

I wasn't sure that was actually possible under the laws of Trismegistan sorcery.

The Gigantes came in without fanfare, or for that matter human mages guiding their translation. I'd not been sure what to expect, as I'd never seen any member of their race before and illustrations in books tended to vary wildly. Their height was impossible to miss, of course. The tallest must have been thirty feet tall, and the others but a few feet shorter, which had them standing taller than the ledge I've been using to overlook the platform. Though there was some variation between them, their skin was a deep brown and looked rather coarse. Though shaped not unlike humans in much greater proportions, there were easy differences to pick out: they had long, powerful legs and their necks were noticeable shorter.

Their clothing was light, eerily beautiful white cloth which had no stitches but instead complicated folds that revealed a triangle of brown flesh beneath the neck and went down in a tunic that covered down to the lower legs. It was belted with flashing bronze, fashioned as a hundred little cards of the metal interlinked, and the short-sleeved cloth revealed arms covered by winding, curling patterns of flowing gold. It was the same with the parts of their legs bared, and their sandals were polished stone bound by sinuous copper strings. Two had beards, of the same dark brown as their skin, which were without a moustache and went down to their chest in luxuriant curls – to the side they went up to where ears would have been on a human, though on the giants there was only smooth skin and a small cartilage-like ridge.

All of them had shaved their heads in part, though the one without a beard instead had a long stripe of hair beginning near his – – her? Hard to tell, I saw no difference in body shape – brow and going all the way down to the back. Their eyes were startlingly human-like, though, I found. Perhaps a little pale for our kind, but otherwise much the same as ours and similarly topped by eyebrows.

The gate collapsed into the ground behind the giants without a sound, and there was not a trace of it in the heartbeat that followed. They took slow steps forward, careful of the arched ceiling above, and the tallest of the three – he had a beard, and unsettlingly luminous blue eyes – subtly moved his head and arms while his body otherwise remained eerily rigid. Hanno moved, at my side, the way his own head moved to the side displaying what I believed to be friendliness and deference. The Gigantes shot me a cursory look, which I returned with a face like a blank mask.

“I am Ykines Silver-on-Clouds,” the giant said, his Lower Miezan only slightly accented. “Amphore for the Hushed Absence, envoy of the Titanomachy. I greet you, Queen of Callow.”

I’d not expected him to recognize me, to be honest. It unsettled me some, even though I could reason it away at the cloak and crown being rather distinctive. Amphore wasn’t the title Hanno had called this one by, I thought with a frown, when we’d last spoken of the Gigantes. It’d been skope, I was certain. From context I’d gathered that amphore was a higher title, though I was uncertain as to what it entailed. Before I could answer the greeting, the envoy turned towards the White Knight. They moved their bodies in ways that were too quick and slight for me to really catch any of the nuances.

“I greet you, Guest of the Nine Peaks,” Ykines said.

“I welcome you in peace,” Hanno replied.

"Indeed," I said, forcing myself not to cock my head to the side. "You are all welcomed to the Arsenal, as guests of the Grand Alliance."

"We receive your hospitality," Ykines Silver-on-Clouds said. "Slumber will be required for some hours. After, the Titanomachy can be heard and hear in turn."

Blunt, though I didn't particularly mind. I didn't hound the envoys with small talk, instead passing them to the awaiting attendants. Most of the hallways of the Arsenal were too low even if the giants bent their bodies, so it would be a specific itinerary they had to follow. Their rooms would be fitted for them, at least, though they'd be lodged in the Repository instead of the Alcazar. Their 'quarters' were a repurposed warehouse, though it'd been decorated richly enough I wouldn't have believed it if told. Following through exactly on their word, the Gigantes disappeared into their quarters and did not stir in the following hours. Knocks on the doors were not answered.

It'd been early morning, and it was only mid afternoon that they emerged. Lord Yannu's presence was requested, as was the White Knight's, and for a few more hours the doors closed. They broke only for a communal meal – Gigantes apparently did not eat much meat, to my surprise – and then cloistered themselves away for one last hour. The two humans left after that, and I was not entirely surprised to receive a messenger from Hanno soon afterwards. I agreed to meet without delay and limped my way to one of the Alcazar halls not too far away.

He'd changed out of his armour, I noticed, and settled into his usual grey tunic. A few papers and scrolls took up part of the table where he'd sat, as well as a quill and inkwell, but it looked a light workload. The White Knight duly rose to his feet when I entered, which I dismissed with a grunt as I took a seat on the other side of the table. Hanno had asked for the meeting, so as I sipped at the glass of water he'd poured for me I waited for him to speak.

"The Myrmidon has volunteered to participate to the Hainaut campaign," he told me. "Since the Grey Pilgrim will be participating as well and the Mirror Knight will be with him, the Anchorite must stay in Cleves. The principality grows too lightly defended otherwise."

My brow rose. Not the conversation I'd expected, though it wasn't unimportant either. Cleves was admittedly getting low on Named, since both the Exalted Poet and the Maddened Keeper had come from that front and they wouldn't exactly be coming back.

"I can leave the Red Knight there, if you're worried," I said. "Though not the Headhunter, that tracking trick is much too useful."

The Red Knight was one of the finest killing Named on my side, but she was also deeply unpleasant in a lot of ways. There were only so many times you could be told that the weak should die and the strong take what they wanted before it became more than slightly grating. No, given the difficulties inherent in juggling a coalition of Named it might be wiser to leave her regardless – I could even cite Named running thin in Cleves as the reason why when she inevitably complained about being left out of the offensive.

“That would be appreciated,” he nodded. “I also intend to reassign the Stained Sister from Twilight’s Pass to the Cleves theatre, unless you have a major objection.”

My brow rose.

“She’s been doing well there, last I heard,” I said.

Hard old girl, the Stained Sister, and her affinity with Light made her very useful against the massive necromantic constructs that the Dead King used as siege engines up north.

“I need someone to take up leadership in Cleves,” the White Knight admitted. “With the Mirror Knight gone, the eldest hero in the region is the Anchorite and they are... not a good fit.”

Yeah, spending forty years in exile in the mountains did not tend to do wonders for one’s social skills. The Myrmidon was probably second in the heroic pecking order there, right now, but while an impressive fighter all her languages except some obscure Penthesian dialect were a little shaky. She also despised the Red Knight, a feeling violently returned, which made her even worse a fit. The Knight wasn’t exactly a leader of villains – I’d assigned mostly Named with an independent streak in Cleves partly as a way to prevent her from gathering a power base – but she was the strongest of my lot in the region, which carried some weight.

“You need someone good with Light assigned to the Pass,” I said. “We’re already pulling out the Forsworn Healer, they’re starting to look a little bare up there.”

Of the three villains in Lycaonese lands – the Bitter Blacksmith, the Affable Burglar and the Skinchanger – only the last was truly fighting fit in my opinion. From Above’s lot the Daring Pyromancer had proved worth twenty times his weight in gold since he’d come from the Free Cities and the Bloody Sword’s appearance as the first Lycaonese hero of the war had been a massive morale boost for his countrymen, but for all their skill neither of them could smash a beorn the way a Light-wielder could.

“The Stalwart Apostle will be heading there, the Astrologer has agreed to take charge of her,” he countered.

Ugh, that Ashuran lunatic. I didn't care how often she'd predicted storms, what she did was just specialized scrying and not some sort of unearthly discipline. Still, she was older and not prone to getting herself killed. There were worse mentors to have. Like the Skinchanger, who the Lycaonese would probably have gone wild over as their first Named in at least half a century if she'd not also been a shapeshifting cannibal. That, uh, tended to put a damper on things.

"The Unravellers are proving effective, so I'll make my peace with it," I sighed. "You hear back from the Swaggering Duellist?"

"He still considers his honour sworn to the protection of the First Prince until next winter solstice," Hanno replied, "even if she personally orders him north. We'll be without him."

Shame, the man might be next to useless in an actual battle but he'd be a right headache thrown at Revenants.

"The roster's taking shape," I mused. "Archer is leaning towards releasing what's left of her old band, right now. If she does, I take it you want the Paladin for up north?"

"His presence would neatly fill the niches left empty by the departure of the Stained Sister and the Forsworn Healer, when combined with the Stalwart Healer's assignment," he agreed.

Replacing strong hands with weaker ones, but then if we wanted our finest fighters in Hainaut we couldn't then complain they weren't elsewhere. I sipped at my water, and a moment of silence I offered as an opportunity to speak up ensued. We were done with Named, then. Good.

"How'd the talks with the Titanomachy go?" I bluntly asked.

"Fruitfully," he replied. "A formal proposition will be made to the Grand Alliance this evening."

My brow rose.

"Good news," I said. "What are they offering?"

He met my eyes calmly and did not reply. I knew instinctively, from the start, that this wasn't the silence of someone choosing his words. I still waited.

"So it's going to be like that," I eventually said, voice gone quiet.

"You cannot have it both ways, Catherine," Hanno simply replied. "Lord Marave will soon attempt to arrange a formal meeting of the Grand Alliance, during which he and I will present the offer made by the envoys of the Titanomachy. That is all I have to say on this matter."

It was on the tip of my tongue to correct him, to say that he should be calling me Queen Catherine then, but I mastered my temper. I would not further salt these fields out of petty spite. I breathed out, studying him. I felt, I'd admit it, a tinge of sadness over this. We'd been friends, in our own way. It had been a friendship with many boundaries, but a friendship nonetheless. Perhaps we might be that again, someday, but even if we were it wouldn't be the same. I looked for an echo of the same thing in him but found only a tranquillity that now seemed... cool. Distant.

Perhaps it always had been, I thought, and I'd just been too busy staring at my reflection in the pond to notice.

"Then we're done talking," I said. "I will see you when the proposal is made, White Knight."

For a moment I thought he might speak, but instead he nodded.

I had neither the words nor the right to change his mind, and so I simply left.

—

The message came within moment of my having returned to my quarters, and I wasted no time agreeing to the time suggested — a little after supper, this very night. A note from Vivienne was awaiting me also, as it happened. Her people in the Arsenal staff had seen Lord Yannu and the First Prince having a private meeting that began not long after my own with Hanno. The Levantine lord made no such effort with me, I could not help but note, and somehow I doubted it was because he'd expected the White Knight would fill me in. Hanno had, after all, taken pains to make it understood that he would not meddle in the political affairs of the Grand Alliance.

Was Marave showing goodwill to the First Prince, to make up for the times we'd made common front to leverage her? Callow had common interests with the Dominion, it was true, but my kingdom was far and Procer was close. Careful Yannu might simply be living up to his name once more, hedging the Dominion's bets when it came to its alliances. It was unpleasant to be the one left out of the loop this time, but I would take it as a helpful reminder that my influence within the Grand Alliance was not something everyone enjoyed. I'd concentrated a lot of power in my hands by virtue of being both Queen of Callow and representative for villains, and while no one was trying to replace me that didn't mean no measures would ever be taken to check me.

The council came quickly, and after an afternoon's worth of anticipation I found the proceedings rather anticlimactic. The White Knight standing as witness, Lord Yannu brought out written transcriptions of the proposal made by Ykines Silver-on-Clouds on behalf of the Titanomachy. The goods offered were well worth a second look, I silently admitted to myself. Two hundred wardstones, around a hundred artefacts suited for fighting and the temporary services of ten artisans from the Reticent Fidelity – a Chorus whose preoccupation was such artefacts, and whose members were some of the most frequent traders of their kind with Levant – to adjust them before they were used, as well as lend their expertise on the fronts so long as it did not involve combat.

In 'exchange', the Gigantes required two of their spellsingers – whose identity had yet to be determined – to have full access to the Arsenal, its resources and all its public projects. They also wanted formal recognition by the Grand Alliance of their people's right to use the Twilight Ways.

Tempting as the artefacts were, I was honestly inclined to hold out for better terms given what was being asked of us. The Arsenal had cost a fortune to make and carried the research of some of the finest minds on Calernia: we ought to ask for more than trinkets if we were to share it with the Titanomachy. Then Lord Yannu put the final part of the offer on the table, and I was glad to have held my tongue.

"The Titanomachy acknowledges the threat of the Dead King's rising," Lord Marave said, "and though they will not make war at the side of Procer, they offer instead a gift: a great warding, raised along the shores of the Tomb, that will turn away the dead."

I saw the hunger in Hasenbach's eyes at the words and knew the giants had us. I set aside the strategic implications of such a gift, instead wondering that the Gigantes knew to make it at all. It was not yet common knowledge that we were to have an offensive in Hainaut. I eyed the White Knight and the Lord of Alava, wondering how much they'd told the giants, before admitting to myself it didn't matter. The Gigantes might have made the offer meaning to begin the work in Cleves, were the shores were somewhat secure, and going east along the water with our armies in support. Besides, even if it turned out these two had been overly chatty the results they brought more than justified it.

It was tempting. Gods, but it was damned tempting. If we took back Hainaut all the way to the shore and behind that wave the Gigantes came in to raise wards rivalling the quality of those beneath the Red Snake Wall, the nature of this war would change. The heavily fortified Lycaonese lands would become the main path of invasion for Keter, and the lakeside fronts would stabilize almost overnight. Enough that it might be possible for us to take a stab at the Crown of the Dead itself, should Masego come through with Quartered Seasons.

"Gigantes do not bargain," the White Knight told us. "This is the only offer there will be, and I ask you consider it seriously."

Hasenbach thanked him, and it was agreed that we would reconvene tomorrow after having 'considered' matters, but everyone in the room knew how this was going to end. It was just a matter of how long we'd delay before accepting so we wouldn't be looking too desperate.

—

There were still a few days left to my stay in the Arsenal, but it was swiftly coming to an end.

As soon as the treaty with the Gigantes was wrapped up and my own few affairs settled, I'd be returning to Hainaut to begin arranging the campaign from there. Indrani would be coming with me, and perhaps eventually Masego as well – it depended on how the Quartered Seasons project was looking – but there were others I would be leaving behind. I was looking at one that'd sting the most, once more settled in the same old infirmary seat that'd become as a second bed for me. The only sign that Hakram was healing was that the healing mages had removed the breathing spell, trusting his lungs to carry him without the help now. Otherwise, his sleeping form had not changed.

"I'm going to have leave you behind," I quietly said. "'Drani's right. I could stretch out my stay by doing some planning from here, but it'd just be delaying the inevitable."

It still sickened me to think that I'd be abandoning him to this little bed in this little room, when the only reason he was wounded at all was that he'd fought for me. A knock on the door jolted me out of my thoughts, though it also irked me more than a little. I'd instructed my people not to disturb me.

"Come in," I said, tone forcefully even.

I'd give whoever had the come the benefit of the doubt, if they were willing to interrupt against my clear instructions. It was not some nervous messenger who came in, though, but Vivienne Dartwick. I immediately bit down on the sharp words already on the tip of my tongue. Vivienne did not look nervous, not exactly. It'd take more than our current disagreements to make a woman who'd faced down a Princess of Summer feel nervous. But she did look... cautious. Hesitant. And she'd noticeably dressed down.

In Salia she'd gotten into the habit of wearing nice dresses. Nothing extravagant – she was Callowan, and we were at war – but there'd been a distinct noble tinge to it. It made sense. Her father had been a noble, if one stripped of his lands after the Conquest, and she must have worn clothes not unlike those when she'd been younger. I'd never occurred to me how different it made her look until just now, when I saw her for the first time in ages in something closer to the leathers she'd worn as the Thief. There were still skirts and leggings beneath the long shirt, but this was a notable departure from usual.

"Cat," she greeted me. "Do you have a moment?"

She had a bottle in hand, I noted. The glass was of poor quality, so it was probably Callowan. Vale summer wine? She'd come prepared. Or trying to bribe me, like I was a drunk that could be bought with a favourite poison.

"I asked for-" I began, and saw something in her face close.

I bit down on the sentence. The hesitance, the dressing down, the wine. Gods but she was trying, wasn't she? When it wasn't even her fault. And there was something about the change clothes that left me a sour taste in the mouth. It felt a little like abasement, and I did not like what it said about either of us that she'd thought it might work. Poor timing was no reason to bite her head off.

"Never mind," I said. "Come in, close the door behind you."

She nodded, but the wariness did not leave. She looked a little at a loss as to what she should say, even as she sat down at my side in the same chair Indrani usually did.

"I was saying my goodbyes," I told her. "Or maybe warning him they were coming, I suppose."

I wasn't going to leave tomorrow, after all, even if the date was not far in the future either.

"I still can't believe he was wounded this badly," she admitted. "He was never our finest fighter, but he always seemed so... solid."

I grunted in agreement.

"Nobody's solid against demons," I said. "At least the Mirror Knight cut him before the taint could spread."

Otherwise... I thought of Nephele's pleading eyes, and my staff coming down. I closed my eyes for a moment and breathed steadily, in and out, until the cold fear that'd seized me ebbed low. Gods. Even just the thought of having to do the same to Hakram...

"It's been a long few years, hasn't it?" Vivienne said, tone almost thoughtful.

She was looking at me with an expression that was hard to read. My jaw clenched in embarrassment.

"For everyone," I said.

"For you more than me," she said. "We're both tired, Cat, but it's a different kind of tired."

"A hollow excuse," I said.

The heights where I now stood had been reached through a pile of corpses. I would not spit on those deaths by moaning about the burdens of authority. Vivienne said nothing for some time. It did not mind, though the silence was not exactly comfortable.

"I have been putting together a census of Callow," she suddenly said.

My brow rose in surprise. I'd not actually heard about that.

"The Fairfaxes only held them infrequently and by unreliable methods, but under the Carrion Lord the Empire gathered a great deal of trustworthy information," Vivienne continued.

Black had probably been most interested in population numbers and what the local trades were, I thought, since that information would allow him to follow the flow of coin. Lack of gold where there should be plenty would have told him which nobles were trying to raise troops to rebel.

"What do you intend to do with it?" I asked.

"I want to fund workshops and guilds to foster certain trades," she said. "We have the materials to make dyes and the manners of cloths that have enriched Mercantis. Royal coin could help our people enter the trade. And we could organize much, through guilds: the lumber from Holden and what was once Liesse would be worth a fortune out east, where they so sorely lack it. Trading cattle with the Clans upriver for amber and fur would not only enrich us, it would give the orcs a reason never to resume raiding."

"You need peace for that," I gently reminded her.

For there to be any trade with the east, to have the coin to make any of this at all.

"I know," she assured me. "I really do. I understand that the war with the Dead King is what matters right now."

She met my eyes, the blue-grey of them grown pale under the glow of the magelights.

"But I need you to know that I won't be a... parasite," she said. "I won't just coast to the throne on your reputation and then do nothing with this. You put trust in me, Cat. And I know some of it is because I learned to see what you see – how much more we could be, if we stop seeing greenskins as the enemy – but I want to believe you saw in me the makings of a good queen."

Her voice had grown raw. I held my breath, somehow afraid it would be enough to interrupt.

"I want to live up to it," Vivienne said, eyes gone hard as stone. "I will live up to it."

Slowly, I breathed out. She did not speak a word more, only searching my face with something like desperation.

"I know," I quietly said. "I never saw you as a..."

I did not stay parasite, though the word echoed in the silence anyway. I passed a hand through my hair, mulling over my words. However inarticulate my first words had been, I saw on Vivienne's face they had at least taken the edge off of the apprehension. With clumsy hands I ended up reaching for my pipe, that old gift from Masego that had become so dear to me, and filled it. Moments later, a touch of Night was enough for me to breathe out a long stream of wakeleaf. Vivienne had been patient, and so I talked.

"I believe you'll be a good queen," I said. "I genuinely do. And while I have been an able warlord, I don't think the talents that helped me there would suit peace times."

I'd grown too used to having my orders obeyed without questioning. I'd grown too used to resorting to violence to get my way, to schemes and assassinations and all the bastard ways to see your will done. Those methods had their place for any queen, but they'd come to be just a little too close to my hand. Too easily grasped. I liked to think I had done the best I could for my people, but I would not deny I had done it as a tyrant. Vivienne was not weak, but even as a heroine she'd disliked killing. It would not be her first resort. And the plans she was already making only reinforced my belief I'd made the right choice of successor.

"That's part of what makes me angry, I think," I admitted. "I know my name will make it onto the pages of history books, Vivienne. But back home, I can't help but suspect I'll be remembered as the dark days before you took up the crown."

I smiled, a tad bitterly.

"Necessary days, most will agree," I murmured. "They were savage times and so Callow required a savage queen. But we were well rid of them and her, afterwards, so that a more enlightened era might take their place."

That enlightened era, I thought, was sitting next to me with something like grief on her face.

"It won't be like that," Vivienne fiercely said. "You know I wouldn't let them..."

I took her hand for a moment, clenched it in a gesture too hard to be gratitude but too grateful to be anger.

"I can already see the current," I gently told her. "And its inevitable end."

It wasn't without reason it was happening. This had not sprouted from thin air as if by divine intervention. Deciding to keep Akua in my service had cost me much esteem among even my most loyal, and back home sending Callowans to die on foreign fields against the Dead King had become increasingly unpopular as the soldiers stayed abroad and the taxes stayed high. I wouldn't face revolt over this, I suspected at least in part because anyone who might feasibly lead one was either dead or part of my armies. But I'd turned Callow into a cradle of armies, and only that. My only legacy among my people would be the victories and defeat I had led my soldiers through.

It was not an enjoyable thought.

"Archer chewed me out," I admitted, "in that way she does when she pretends it's not what she's doing."

"Because Indrani is much too tough and aloof to care about it when her friends quarrel, naturally," Vivienne amusedly said. "It would be beneath her to ever meddle in such things."

I grinned, though it faded after a moment.

"She was right, though," I said, "when she castigated me for clutching to my pride when I like to claim I have none. I've said for years I was ready to abdicate, Vivienne, and I thought I meant it. But then I had to deal with genuinely sharing power – not just delegating it – and it got stuck in my throat. It matters more to me than I like to admit, the authority."

"It's all right, you know," she said. "To be hurt that after all you've sacrificed, the gratitude passed so quickly."

I breathed in sharply. That was perhaps, I thought, the closest anyone had come to actually reading me right when it came to this.

"Maybe it is," I said. "But all these years, I've always told myself I was taking that next step because it needed to be done. That I'd surrender it all the moment I was no longer necessary. And maybe that's half a lie, always was."

The words came out in a stumble, perhaps more honest than I would have liked.

"But I'd like to live up to it, Vivienne," I softly said. "I'd like to be the kind of woman who genuinely believes that."

I gathered myself, after a moment.

"I'm sorry I took it out on you," I said. "It's not your fault, and it was ill-done of me."

"I'm sorry too," Vivienne replied. "For what this will do to you, before it's all over."

A knot I'd not known was in my shoulders loosened. I smiled, and she smiled back. Sometimes, I thought, the things that mattered could still be fixed. Sometimes you got to them in time. A hoarse breath sounded, which I realized a heartbeat later that was neither mine nor Vivienne's. I hurriedly rose to my feet, wincing in pain at my bad knee, and arrived just in time to see Hakram's eyes flutter open.

"Cat?" he groaned.

"I'm here," I told him.

It'd been a hard few years, there was no denying that.

But sometimes, just sometimes, we got lucky.

Javvies

Reconciliation between Cat and Viv is good.
Viv has plans for the post-war future, also good.

Hakram is awake! Even better.

That's a pretty good offer from the Gigantes. Honestly, the ward on the lake shore against the dead would probably be worth what they're asking for anyways.

Distance between Hanno and Cat ... could cause problems down the road, especially if it worsens.
Although, honestly, Hanno, not giving Cat a heads up on what the Gigantes offered? That's just petty.

Insanenoodlyguy

On the plus side, now they can sleep together without it being a risk! Here's hoping they get trapped in a cave in awaiting rescue jussssstttt long enough to be bored and naked.

Miles

Hhhhhhiiii Jaaaack /(slash)

““I want to live up to it,” Vivienne said, eyes gone hard as stone. “I will live up to it.”

Slowly, I breathed out. She did not speak a word more, only searching my face with something like desperation.

“I know,” I quietly said. “I never saw you as a...”

I did not say <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> though the word echoed in the silence anyway. I passed a hand through my hair, mulling over my words. However inarticulate my first words had been, I saw on Vivienne’s face they had at least taken the edge off of the apprehension.

caoimhinh

I wonder (and actually hope) if the Gigantes could do something about Hakram. They have ways to magic that other races’ sorcery are incapable of achieving.

shikkarasu

They make artefacts, he needs prosthetics....

AbraKadabra

Which probably can be the same thing.

Xinci

Yeah, they could probably weave him prosthetics from “living” concepts of Creation to get around the soul issue. Honestly, the Gigantes would know best how to meld a concept to him and his soul as they have the depth of connection to the world that other sorceries don’t have without the safeguards that Light has.

Salt

It would be much better than using standard trismegistan sorcery imo, as they’re going into a fight with the Dead King who invented trismegistan sorcery and was confirmed by EE to be quite literally the most skilled sorcerer on the continent.

Wouldn’t even put it past him for one of the twists to be the Dead King putting an intentional flaw in the foundations of the “Trismegistan sorcery” that he spread to the rest of the world, so that every single person who used it would be at an utterly crippling disadvantage when fighting him in the future. A Jade Empire style backdoor Light-based prosthetics clash with him being a Villain, Jaquinite sorcery is too closely tied to Above-miracles, Trismegistan could be risky when fighting the dead king, and Cat doesn't do devilish pacts. Spell singers that use a completely alien and hyper-advanced form of sorcery would probably be a narratively and practically better option if the giants were willing.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

Now. She only needs to convince them. That hakram is worth years of their lives.

Jude Taggart

Cat and Viv are friends again, The gigantes have made a great offer, and Hakram is awake. Happy times before the dark?

Thanatoss

Yes, too happy chapter, we are going for a hell now guys. Assassinations, betrayal, army destruction. New Plague? What with Amadeus and Ranger? Maybe there will things go downhill?

Salt

Rather worried about Black to be honest. We know the Bard was the one who pushed him into becoming a Claimant for Dread Emperor. I'm rather worried that he'll end up in trouble or at odds with Cat, simply because we know that him attempting to Climb the tower is something that is at least partially the result of Intercession.

Actually if you look at it, the Bard was the one who pushed the first domino in every event that caused him to go down the road.

The Bard stopped the Elves from killing Akua to prevent second Liesse. This resulted in causing a rift between him and Malicia.

The Bard intervened to help the White Knight's band survive/ maim the Calamities in the free cities – setting up the story that killed Captain. She told him immediately afterwards to go murder his little friend in the tower and rule until someone does the same to him. This was the loss where he realized that no pattern of three started, and that the "Black Knight" was dying

After the role fully died, and he was captured by the Pilgrim, he figured he was at the end of his story and accepted death. The Bard once again intervened, this time directly talking him into becoming a claimant.

Not a fuckin clue what her game is with this one, but anything that has her fingers in it is guaranteed to be trouble.

Ninestrings

Anyone want to bet Hakram was feigning sleep for the last twenty minutes just so he didn't have to deal with all the relationship drama again?

LizAris

Viv: "Cat, do you have a moment?"

Hakram, cracking an eye open: If she doesn't agree, I'm going to listen to the whole gooey goodbye before waking up

Letouriste

No bet

Eleron M Pfoutz

That's a sucker's bet. 5 GP.

Benjamin Smith

Providence throwing Catherine a bone, just once.

Ninestrings

No that was the Kingfisher Prince.

nimelennar

How do we know that isn't his Choir?

Darkening

Providence isn't a Choir, it's the luck every hero has guiding them.

Liliet

Choir of Bone? 😊

dadycool

The Angels with 69 wings?

shikkarasu

Read this while listening to Phantom of the Opera. Made coffee come out my nose.

Darkening

Well, that's a suitably dramatic time to wake up. Nice to see the story throwing cat a bone lol.

onedollargum

Reconciliation is a time of healing. I wouldn't be surprised if Hakram caught just enough story spillover to wake up.

It might also be that by damaging ties with Hanno, Cat's starting to put the woe back together- Her name is returning, Archer's old band is breaking up, Masegeo's research is near a breakpoint and Vivi's reconciling. Hakram waking up at this point is almost inevitable =D

dadycoool

Now that sounds interesting. Now that Vivienne's in the Arsenal, an excuse can be made for her staying with the group and ruling from afar. Especially considering this is the first time in a long time that all five of them have been in the same region and also conscious.

Konstantin von Karstein

Vivienne is to take command of the Deoraithe troops at the front. Also, she's not Named anymore.

dadycoool

That would actually be a good place for her, including cementing in their minds that "This is the future queen." Also, she might not be named, but she's still part of the Woe. Cat didn't have a Name for years. She still doesn't, in fact.

Konstantin von Karstein

Sure Cat doesn't have a Name, but she's the high priestess of Night and has the corresponding firepower. Vivienne does not have any supernatural capability, you can't compare the 2.

dadycoool

I want to give some rebuttal about how not having a Name doesn't mean Stories, Tropes, and Types don't apply, but the only two people who that would work for are Cordelia and Abigail, and even then Cordelia isn't affected nearly as much as Cat Jr. So, it's more that Cat has the narrative weight from another source (Night), in a way that Vivienne doesn't. I guess in summary, "Yeah, I agree."

Konstantin von Karstein

I am not speaking of narrative weight, you're right on that front. I just say that Vivienne can only be useful in a commanding or administrative position, while the others (especially Archer) are much more personally powerful and can have a big impact on the frontline.

naturalnuke

Whooooo!

Insanenoodlyguy

"It's all right, you know," she said. "To be hurt that after all you've voted the validity passed so quickly."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

This isn't one of the better ones, though there have been worse.

Again, what I dislike is taking a genuinely powerful emotional moment and... changing associations. In a manner that is funny and snappy and ends up sticking better than the original because it's funny, see? And then you cannot read the original without thinking of the change and PLEASE STOP DOING THIS. COME ON. PLEASE. IT SUCKS.

galanailo

That's like complaining about fanfiction as though it were stealing from the original work. It's not quite the same, even if there is a point there, and if the existence of fan works ruins the original show for you then that's your problem, not theirs. And you whining about it in ALL CAPS isn't going to change that.

I mean, Jesus, if these really bother you that much then I feel like you need to think about if something else is involved and if it's healthy to think this way, or maybe at least reconsider your relationship with this comment section. You've as much right to fruitlessly complain and moan about it as they do to post it, but if your comment was serious (maybe I'm misreading sarcasm or playfulness?), then I'd be concerned.

Liliet

If there's a porn fanwork scene posted right as text in the comment section under the chapter, yes I will complain about that too.

My comment IS serious. I only give so much space in my head to fictional characters and stories about them, but to the degree that I do? That happens, and I do not like it.

KageLupus

Normally I don't find these as annoying when they twist an emotional moment, but I also agree this one was a little weak and there were some other lines that would have worked as well without that emotional baggage.

"We thanked him, and it was agreed that we would reconvene tomorrow after having 'considered' matters, but everyone in the chat knew how this was going to end. It was just a matter of how long we'd delay before voting so we wouldn't be looking too desperate."

Liliet

Okay this one is genuinely funny and good.

Taking a line that was neutral in the original and adding drama to it regarding voting is MUCH BETTER.

And funnier.

Burlyraven

Okay, lots of very good things happening here, but also lots of cause for concern. Cat's a Villain, and when sympathetic Villains get closure and have heartwarming moments before major battles, bad things tend to happen to them. The fact that the other leaders and dignitaries are cutting her out of meetings and discussions is more alarming because of that fact. I'm not getting outright betrayal vibes, but I do have concerns.

TeK

She does not yet have a defined Name though. But reconciliation coming in time and a loved one waking from the coma in exchange for humility and protagonist striving to be better are decidedly not Villainous tropes.

caoimhinh

Catherine has never been one for Villainous tropes. It's one of her greatest advantages that she has Heroic tropes on her side despite being a Villain, because she is an Anti-villain who genuinely wants to do good.

Pilgrim was even certain that “Dramatic Return in the time of need of her friends” was something inevitable for Cat, which prompted the Saint of Swords to grunt and observe that that was not a Villain’s story, yet she knew Pilgrim was right, and she didn’t like it.

AbraKadabra

Yeah. I bet she will be the Villanious Hero. 😊

Liliet

Cordelia was cut out of Cat’s meetings with Yannu previously.

It’s just the normal tumble of politics.

flashburn283

Geeze, way to milk an injury Hakram, and all so that Cat would learn a lesson about honesty.

Minions, why do we put up with them?

erebus42

Because then we’d have to actually do all that boring gruntwork ourselves.

onedollargum

YEAH!

LizAris

FINALLY!!! Ah but I have missed the feel good chapters. Thank you EE for a little brightness before Cat goes back to slaying zombies.

I won’t call it a reconciliation because I think that’s a little too strong—Cat and Viv weren’t really even fighting, it was more misplaced anger— but I really loved the dialogue here. Not only that Viv will take up the crown and make it her own, but a herald of the end of Cat’s story. And a recognition that she is a warlord who has had a very...interesting relationship with justifications, and she’s willing to look that right in the eye even if it hurts.

It seems like a small thing but I am SO glad Cat was there when Hakram woke up. That just speaks volumes about their relationship. And of course the first thing out of his mouth is her name. The loyalty between the two of them is phenomenal.

And shit, now I have to wait three days for more of my favorite orc.

dadycoool

“Clearing the air” is what came to my mind when reading your comment on Cat and Vivienne.

And yeah, narratively there’s only one time when he can wake up, and that’s when Cat is there to greet him. Maybe it was her and Vivienne, the girl-turned-woman that he was advising in Cat’s absence for a long time, “clearing the air” that did it.

LizAris

Yeah that’s a good way to phrase it—what can I say, after a new guide chapter my brain abandons any attempts at eloquence xD

But you make a great point about the weight Viv brings, esp considering her relationship with Hakram, and how incredibly far THAT’s come. She’s the heir who he’s both terrorized and guided in her path to backing the warlord he loves, and I like to think the fact that Viv is doing a little of his work here for him jolted him awake.

dadycoool

Lots of wow this chapter, but special mention to Cat and Vivienne’s making up, complete with Hakram waking up.

I like how Cat made an effort to keep her face blank, exactly the same as someone purposefully keeping their mouth shut when a language you don’t know is being spoken.

Liliet

Ooooh yep good catch.

Xinci

I do doubt it helped much given how minute expressions of body language are for the Gigantes method of communication she was probably a bit of an open book.

Salt

Which begs the question – if the Gigantes communicate through body language and minute facial expressions, does that mean that, to a Giant, the other races walk around constantly shouting rubbish in Giantese?

nick012000

I wonder... Vivienne, the Shining Princess? It's starting to sound like she's getting some of her old resolve back.

caoimhinh

The Good Queen.

Liliet

>Vivienne comes into the name of Good Queen at coronation
>Catherine standing in the back groans and buries her face in her palms. "I don't know what I expected"

Tohron

The Name that would really annoy Cat would be the Vivacious Queen. Having the Name of her successor be a pun on her successor's actual name is something she might not be able to handle.

erebus42

Well wasn't that sweet and heartwarming. One friendship potentially irreparably sundered, another mended anew. That being said, I really hope the Skinchanger gets some page-time now, she sounds cool. I mean a shapeshifter alone is pretty cool, but a shapeshifting CANNIBAL?! Come on!

LarsBlitzer

I know! The evocative Names, the powers that come along with them, and the personalities that shape them are part of why I love EE's creativity. I'd like to see the Red Knight and the Swaggering Duelist in action, and I suspect we will before the book's through.

On another note, I think it's perfect timing for Hakram to wake up. With Masego champing at the bit to get a glimpse of Gigantes magic, part of the terms including magical artifacts, and some leeway on what those artifacts would be I'd wager my lucky D20 Cat would lobby heavily on getting her Adjutant on his feet ASAP. They can rebuild him; they have the technology.

Liliet

I don't think it's irreparably sundered. If anything, the fact it was brought up with Cat's reluctance to make things worse even as her spite wanted her to, right before she mended things with Vivienne, looked like a good sign to me.

Must have been an enlightening conversation for Vivienne. "I promise I'm good enough for this – oh. Oh your problem is that you knew that. Oh okay"

Salt

This was the foundling edition of "its not you, it's me"

Liliet

THAT'S EXACTLY WHAT IT WAS

jworks17

I don't know why but this chapter really cemented in my mind the difference between the old story- the beginnings of cat, the formation of the Woe, and Cat's legion's campaign in Callow- and the new story revolving around Procer and the dead king. I feel like it's been so long since we've seen the Woe in this light, and It's something I missed without realizing it. Old world blues.

Anka

I'm... extremely disappointed in the White Knight. He didn't even make an effort to understand why what Cat did was necessary, and is now being extremely petty about things. I know that's entirely in his character, but it really makes him out to be just like every other "Good" Named out there – only willing to accept blame when it's good for their side and not the "bad guys".

Cat had a reason to not tell him about it before she resurrected the corpse to re-stand trial, because it might have caused a problem, and it was for the sake of continuing the alliance. The same can't be said in not telling Cat what happened in the meeting with the giants – yes, she didn't need to know and he didn't need to discuss it with her, but there was no reason not to. He stonewalled her and cut off their friendship simply because she had to do what she needed to.

I know that narratively inside and outside the universe it makes sense, but it still hurts to see.

Raved Thrad

Dammit, the suspense is killing me. With Catherine pinning all these hopes on Vivienne, I can't help but think this might be a death-flag on her. Doomed shipping aside, I have to admit that she's one of my favorite characters, and it would really hurt if she were to die. Especially if it were to happen off-screen, the way it's happened to so many others we'd come to love.

Liliet

No, Vivienne's not going to die. Like, where would the story even go from there? It'd be snipping a heavily built up plot thread, not enhancing it.

Nell Rampello

It's all a matter of what the future is for Cat. Is she going to abdicate like she plans? Because that will only happen once they get peace, and if peace never happens, she never abdicates. Or maybe she will abdicate and find a whole new adventure. Go with Archer to a new continent for adventure. Or maybe the Tower assassinates Vivienne, and Cat has no choice but to climb the Tower herself, like the song she hears keeps indicating.

Vivienne taking over just seems like too happy a path for this story. Cat tries hard not to be a villain but always ends up a bigger one by necessity.

Liliet

Guide's one of the lightest and most optimistic stories I've read in a while, and not because I avoid the genre. It's got superhero comics levels of concentration of heroes lowercase, and it has an international alliance consisting wholly of non-corrupt officers who genuinely care. A politician caring only about their own country and not everyone else as well is villain level. Continent sweeping political changes are being made by people in charge who genuinely care and look to the future.

The main character has won over ancient goddesses of blood and death through Power of Friendship, that's the level we're talking about here.

I think Vivi will be fine.

Solesealedsoul

He protec
He attac
But most importantly
He is back

Shveiran

Godsdamn it Hanno, are you for real?

"Oh hey, Catherine, let me ask you for a meeting after a secluded talk with the Gigantes. Oh, but let me begin by addressing a Named issue that is not urgent but that I want to address now anyway for some reason.
Then let me -pause- without saying I'm done.

Oh?

Oh, you thought I had something to add? Possibly concerning said secluded meeting, which you'd hear all about anyway?

But I don't. Of course I don't. I don't know why you'd think otherwise.

I'm not being petty, of course, I just wanted you to know that the next time you fix all of our messes for me, I'm going to be an hindrance ratehr than just an ungrateful prick."

Godsdamn it Hanno. Screw you and your nonexistent horse. I'm trying to give you the benefit of the doubt, so please pull your head out your ass and stop proving me wrong!

dadycoool

Now that you spell it out, wow. What an asshole. He spent all that time proving to us that he's "Not like those /other/ Heroes that are pretentious pricks! I'm practical, like you! I know how to make the hard decisions and not hate myself too much!" and then he goes and does this. Le sigh. Heroes will be Heroes, I guess.

Liliet

Wow, this whole "heroes will be heroes" thing is getting annoying.

Can we not pretend that every single thing any hero has ever done wrong is an inevitable characteristic of all of them that proves they're all bad? This is reaching chinese robber fallacy levels at this point.

I don't think Hanno meant it this way when he invited Catherine. He's not the greatest at diplomacy, and it's entirely possible he did invite her right after the meeting on purpose to communicate something, but I don't think the idea was to hurt her. Just... to clear the air.

Sure, it ended up coming out in an asshole way, but... I think that's Hanno just not being all that good at people.

Also it's not characteristic of all heroes either way bla bla bla see above.

vernal.ancient

Yeah, social skills wise, Hanno is at kind of a weird point; he's got enough empathy and intelligence to figure out other's motivations and feelings, but he seems somewhat unaware of how he presents himself (on a moment to moment basis, I mean. I think in general he's aware that he ranges from calm but compassionate to aloof and indifferent most of the time, he's just never quite sure where on that spectrum he's falling right now)

Liliet

Hanno isn't aware of how he comes off in general either, considering his confusion two years ago about why the heroes even treat him as a leader.

He does his best, the poor thing, but I think living with Gigantes instead of humans for a decade kind of warped his perception there.

vernal.ancient

Maybe. I feel like that's less about him not knowing how he comes off and more him not getting why his calmness and insight would be valued over a more 'typical' hero's passion and energy, but it's been a while since I read the chapters where he wondered about it, so I definitely could be wrong.

Definitely on the Gigantes, though; just spending a decade with another human culture would provide a major perspective shift, even more so being around a bunch of hyper-powerful giants (who I think are also immortal? Don't know if I'm remembering that right) whose ways of communicating are basically opposite how humans normally do things.

dadycool

Now that you mention it, having just come from a meeting with the Gigantes, he was probably speaking or listening in their language and probably 'heard' something she didn't mean or she didn't 'hear' something he was trying to communicate.

With the "Heroes will be Heroes" thing being annoying, we've just come from five whole books where every Hero has been what the Mirror Knight was during the whole Arsenal arc. We liked GP, WK, and Frederic because they were a breath of fresh air. Hanno's perceived asshole-ness felt like him being unable to escape the nature of Heroism, in the context of this Villain Protagonist story. In the back of our minds, I think most of us realize that the worst Hero is still better than the best Villain, but when the best Villain is Cat and the Heroes don't tend to even try and see her as a human being, for five books mind you, any pedestal we might've had for them has been repurposed as Cat's Lesser Lesser Lesser Footrest. (Can't have it above the best goblin ever.)

Salt

Thing is Hanno DOES see her as a human being though.

He refused to “Judge” her for being a Villain, even though she was reputed to be the worst thing since unsliced bread. He intentionally kept an open mind, resulting in the sword of judgment being willing to try not just cooperating, but being -actual friends with the high priestess of murder.

Him being distant with Cat here isn’t some self righteous proclamation about the evils of having a black cloak. He treated her as a trusted friend and got bit for it when she went behind his back, so he takes a step back and treats her with cool professionalism instead of as a close confidant.

There’s... absolutely nothing at all assholeish or holier-than-thou about that. That’s literally how normal friendships work between peers. You lose trust when you betray trust.

Cat knows this too, she’s neither a teenager nor blind to social relationships. Which is why she’s just sad that it had to come to this rather than indignantly angry – she knows full well that it’s a reasonable response, if not a forgiving one.

Liliet

...I don’t really think Hanno forgetting what languages Catherine speaks and doesn’t is particularly likely. On a subconscious level though, it could be influencing him.

And it’s inaccurate to say that over five books every hero has been like MK. Sure, William has been actually worse, and those three tragic dumbasses from prologue 4 are pretty Christophe-like, but you do have to not have been paying attention to say “all heroes were like that”.

Unless, again, by “like that” you mean “opposing the protagonist”, which, just... 😏

Tariq and Laurence specifically discussed seeing her as a person and kind of feeling like shit about it at the start of Book 4.

Just, I don’t like Protagonist Centered Morality?

Shveiran

You can like what you will.

What I have a visceral dislike for is characters that murder and endanger hundreds, thousands, sometimes millions of life for a point of principle without ever considering if maybe murder is wrong, or the possible consequences, or doing their fucking research before they draw their fucking blades and march across the continent to kill people they know nothing about.

And it is AMAZING how many of the Heroes fall in this category.

William may have been the worst offender or at least close, but let's not pretend he was an isolated incident.

Thief, Hunter and Conjuror were along for the torture and the deployment of goblinfire in the middle of a fucking city. At night.

Five bands (which, let's be generous, means at least 15 heroes because they wouldn't number less than 3, even if not 25) tried to destabilize a country on the verge of collapse without a thought of the consequences for the people starving or dying of cold.

A shitton of them said "sure, a Crusade? Let's go murder people, I'm sure those Callowans and Praesi citizens defending their homes which we are invading are all wicked warlocks, right? And surely, this couldn't bring to an escalation or wanton loss of life in any way should we, by any chance, not achieve total and immediate victory. Sounds fun."

That's about 2 dozens of them!

Maybe Tariq had some larger design, but the rest, including Hanno, pretty much jumped on board because Crusade. I guess HE at least refrained from murdering random soldiers defending their borders, but we KNOW that wasn't true for the rest of his support team and those using the Stairway.

The Saint tried to roll the dice on a Principality and the armies of the Grand Alliance without any idea of the odds.

The Maddened Keeper released eight DEMONS in the fucking Arsenal during a war with Keter.

That's DOUBLE the demons THE DIABOLIST used in her whole career even including her allies. God.

The Exalted Poet and the Red Axe were complicit in an invasion of the Arsenal which- again, but it bears remembering- is the place where the weapons to repel the DK are being developed! God! Again!

I'll just mention fucking Cristophe or I'll be here all day.

The Blacksmith being betrayed by a godsdamn hero was not enough to persuade her that maybe not all Heroes are good and not all villains are bad, which admittedly is a minor, minor offense compared to the rest but still made me want to punch her so hard.

Now Frederic would rather keep his hands clear rather than avoid the risk of the Alliance collapsing, while fully aware of the risks, so even if I'd still marry him I also have to hate him a bit now.

And now Hanno joined the band, because he saw a powderkeg about to blow, and said "I'm not going to help keeping it from exploding". Which while a bad mark in my book, given his extensive record would not be enough to earn my dislike if it wasn't for the fact that he now keeps going "I wanted that problem fixed, I didn't want to fix it myself, I refused to give any constructive input regarding a fix, but I'm still going to bitch about how you fixed it".

See how many there are? That's about fifty Heroes! Fifty! As a conservative estimate!

"Protagonist centered morality" my ass, there are a just a FEW atrocities here that have nothing to do with opposing Catherine Fucking Foundling.

Liliet

The Maddened Keeper was a villain/neutral, Cat specifically mentioned her as the only one in the group Christophe arrived with who wasn't a hero.

And sure, a lot of heroes have done a wrong thing in their life. I'm very much not disputing that. I don't think "ugh, heroes" is a reasonable response to that, though.

masterofbones

He's hiding pointless pettiness behind a thin veneer of justice, and acting smug about it. That's exactly what pisses people off about heroes in this story. This isn't him not trusting Cat, this is him continuing the dumbassery that got her to go behind his back in the first place.

"No, I won't tell you things that you will find out later anyway, because that would make your life easier and I'm a prick". He has no reason to withhold this information, he's just doing it to be a dick.

Salt

Yes, because it definitely makes zero difference to know the opposing party's bargaining chips before going into what is a glorified international-level haggling session.

I mean it's not as if the dude doesn't have VERY real flaws, but when the White Knight gets accused of being... smug(???), you know there are some rather heavy biases there

The guy so aggressively avoids gloating or being smug that it's almost unrealistic for a person to be like that all the time. Dude talks up his accomplishments with all the swagger of a limp rag, and actively walks around denying accusations of having virtue, rather than just being an agent of it.

Liliet

I'm not seeing any smug? 0.0

He's drawing a boundary, for his own sake because he realized he trusted her more than he should have, and it's interfering with his duties.

I'm pretty sure Cat's "did he ever like me or was it all just me projecting" is insecurity multiplied by Hanno's Gigantes-nursed facial control.

He IS doing it to send a message of "I'm not sharing anymore", but being a dick is not a purpose. Just... an unfortunate side effect that I think he isn't quite noticing.

(I wonder if he also now has his own doubts of "did she ever care about me or does she view all people as tools or obstacles and affection is in the eye of the beholder")

Fable

Have you considered that Cat has proven that he effectively has no levers on their relationship, while Cat does?

She speaks for a nation and all the villains.
He acts as the first among peers for all heroes.
She is willing and able to act dishonestly for her principles.
Hanno's principles require complete transparency.

Cat is growing in power from her coming Name.
Hanno is fixed in the experiences he has.

And yet this needs to be an equal partnership in order for it to actually work. Hanno is a new hand at this, and he needs to demonstrate that he has some leverage to bring to the table, even if he has no idea how to politic—that is not his Role.

I'd say to throw the dude a bone, but the man has no personal ambitions. There's precious little to concede to him that he doesn't already have a right to. The one thing that he asked from Cat in the aftermath was transparency. A compromise with his principles. Which she refused to give or make assurances for, or even show remorse over.

I just hope Cat finally looks at this from Hanno's side before all is done and find something to mend the relationship.

Shveiran

She said we need to fix it or this all burns. He said "I'm not compromising".
She said "I'll fix it myself 'down here in the mud' "

Then she said let's have a talk with cordelia and find a solution.
Hanno makes zero concessions.
Pot is still boiling.
Hanno leaves.

Cat fixes the mess.

This is going behind his back? Come on. COME. ON.
They aren't children playing tag, millions of lives are a stake!
He didn't see this coming? IT'S NOT DOING IT BEHIND YOUR BACK IF YOU TURN YOUR BACK TO THE PROBLEM, HANNO! That's just the solution being taken where the problem still is, aka, where you are refusing to look at.

Breach of trust my ass.

Salt

You're confusing Cat looking at it with the perspective of a guideverse Villain with some objective reality. Except the entire point is that Heroes and Villains don't play by the same rules to begin with.

Of course she says we have to stack the odds, she's a Villain who has lived her entire career by the rules of a Villain. Villains never make the one in a million long shot. Villains don't take a stand against overwhelming odds. They play dirty until the shot is no longer one in a million, and the odds are no longer overwhelming. Because otherwise the only ending they get is their heads on pikes.

Heroes aren't villains. There are thousands of years of history irrefutably proving that Calernian Heroes can reliably make the one in a million long shot, as long as they're being a good enough do-gooder. The odds being overwhelming means the odds are about as good as they'll get, if they're taking a hard enough stand for some principle. Above quite literally rewards them proportionally for holding to principle, the same way Below repays villains for working to prove that people can get by on their own.

Catherine thinks rolling the dice is braindead stupid because for a Villain, that's just asking to roll a pair of snake eyes. It IS stupid for a Villain

Hanno thinks it's fine because when Heroes roll the dice, Above rolls for them, and their dice are always loaded. They're just playing to Heroic advantages

You either put full faith in the Heroic route to roll those loaded dice – which Catherine is rather incapable of due to her personal worldviews – or you take the Villainous route and cheat by your own methods, maybe even bastardize a Heroic story or two if it helps you rig the jury. Either way can actually work just fine in the guideverse, but only one option is specifically open to Catherine.

The only thing you're proving here is that you've gotten very into the guideverse Villainous way of looking at the story

Shveiran

I've gotten into the REALISTIC way of looking at things, thank you very much.

If practicalities weren't a thing, the Fortunate Fool would have strolled into Keter and killed the Dead King, instead of, you know, dying.

Javvies

And Amadeus's Conquest and Occupation of Callow would have failed early. It definitely wouldn't have lasted anywhere near as long as it actually did or been as successful as it was.

Sure, the Story matters. On the other hand, it quite clearly isn't everything.

Remember, framing events into the right Story gave Cat a chance to defeat the Duke of Howling Winds. It was by no means certain that she would, and she had to actually carry through and put serious effort into exploiting the opportunity the Story permitted her to have.

Aotrs Commander

Yeah, Hanno COMPLETELY lost the smidgen of respect for me when he flatly refused to look at the problem, flatly refused to engage to even try to present an alternative, placed his personal feelings and beliefs above the importance of other people's lives and then got pissy when his allies had to work around his deliberate obstreporusness. He managed to convince with that action that my initial impression of him was correct, that for all the affability he sometimes projects, he's a fanatic and just one more symptom of the underlying problem.

So, we are down two exactly TWO heroes (Roland and Frederick) who ACTUALLY live up to the name; unlike the rest who just wear white hats and who are better than the villains only in the sense that the latter has produced confirmed rapists among the number.

Mirror Night

You realize Frederic could have helped mitigate this mess by actually charging Red Axe and agreeing to execute her himself? So you cannot say that he doesn't put Principles in front of what is Practical.

Still Named don't compromise Core Principles. Cordelia didn't want to get a Name which solve her Prince Issue cause she felt a Name should not rule Procer. Let us not act like Hanno is the only one who ever puts Principle first.

Cat is being petty to Viv for no reason and I see less complaining about that which doesn't have anything to do with Principles or Practicality.

Shveiran

For Cat and Vivs, yeah, but that doesn't endanger the world, does it? That's why I'm not bitching about it, personally. Also, got fixed before it was too late. Which isn't true for Hanno, since if it was up to him the pot would have boiled over.

True on Frederic, though. Roland is the only one with a clean record, by now. He doesn't always come through, but he has yet to willingly put people at risk.

Salt

Nah, this is one of the rare cases where the YA protagonist is being more mature about it than the readers are

I mean seriously, you're criticizing him for siding with... the Gigantes? The same Gigantes that he was taught by and lived with, the same way Catherine did with the fifteenth back in the day? Hello?

Catherine is just a coworker of his. The Gigantes are Hanno's teachers and old companions. They're the ones who fished his dying ass out of the water and taught him the skills he needs to be the White Knight. Of-fucking-course he sides with them over a casual coworker, especially when he's acting as a diplomatic intermediary to their ambassador. To bring her into that fold would be to extend a measure of trust that she is in no way shape or form entitled to.

Hanno wasn't wrong to react this way, nor is he an asshole. He's the literal sword of judgement who spent the last few years extending trust and friendship to the also quite literal high priestess of murder and cannibalism in the dark. She betrayed that trust, specifically in a way that touched one of the VERY few bottom lines that the guy has at all, and subsequently lost some trust for it.

We know it wasn't for no reason, but it doesn't change the fact that she did, and Catherine herself, for one, is actually mature enough to recognize it and know that it's fair, even if it is unpleasant.

Catherine isn't some perfect untouchable paragon of goodness and wonderful computer-like rationality that all side characters are obligated to approve of. Her actions are often imperfect, and people are allowed to react negatively to them once in a blue moon.

masterofbones

This isn't about keeping secrets or choosing sides though. Cat was going to find out the details very soon. He was literally just doing it to be a dick.

Salt

You don't typically leak the bargaining chips of diplomatic negotiations before going into the negotiations, especially to the exact same person who just proved herself capable of pulling one over on him if he isn't on guard this way.

You don't get to kick a man in the nads and call him a dick for wearing a cup the next time you interact. That's just a sensible precaution when you don't know if a kick to the nads is on its way.

Hence "you cannot have it both ways Catherine"

Javvies

What negotiations? There weren't going to be negotiations and Hanno knew it.

Unless you're going to say Hanno lied when he told them, in the meeting, that it was the one offer the Gigantes were making and there wouldn't be a second one or negotiations over the first ... it was a take it or leave it offer. And whatever anyone thinks about Hanno ... I don't think there's anybody that could honestly argue that he would be lying when he said that.

There's no upside to not telling someone in advance about a one time take or or leave it offer. And there's no downside to telling them in advance. At least, that's the case unless the offer is secretly an attempt to screw them over with the fine print or with the long term ramifications of some of the clauses that might not be readily realized or thought through initially.

Also, it seems that Yannu told Viv and presumably also Cordelia something ahead of time, or at least it appears to be the case.

Honestly, Hanno was just being petty in not telling Cat anything about the offer. At best.

Salt

Cat resorts to doing shady things to get her way all the time. We just saw her mentally break down the representative from Mercantis to get her way with them. Are you seriously saying it's unwarranted to wonder if she might try something similar with the Gigantes, if she doesn't like their offer? Cat also showed not even a week ago that she was willing to bend the rules and make a total mockery out of even a legal trial in the process, and be dishonest about keeping him in the loop

He's not a white-cloak version of Malicia either, he physically does not have the ability to see through every possible plot of Catherine's even if he's suspicious, considering nowadays she trades blows with the Bard as far as plotting goes

So if you're the white knight, not the white schemer, the only thing you can reasonably do when you no longer fully trust the black queen is to take these kinds of precautions, in case she is trying to pull another fast one

Javvies

There is no reason to think he has a clue that Cat sent the Mercantis representative threatening nightmares to warn against doing something stupid and being Malicia's proxy.

Plus, it's a damned good offer from the Gigantes. And he knows, and could easily have told her, that the Gigantes don't do negotiations like humans do, they don't haggle, they just make a single offer, which had already been conveyed to Yannu and him. Hell, the only reason to try to negotiate for more would be partly (a) to see how much more they're really willing to give, because everything you can get out of them is needed, but also (b) the negotiating principle of never taking the first offer.

Also, and this is an important difference – Mercantis was trying to (a) control and/or kill Cat's pet project of Cardinal, and (b) was going to fuck Procer and the Grand Alliance over for Malicia and the Dead King. The Gigantes are offering some rather significant assistance that if successfully implemented would be a critical gamechanger for the war, and asking for what is, admittedly, a significant level of access to the Arsenal in exchange for that assistance. And, honestly, the lake ward against the dead by itself would probably be worth giving the Gigantes everything they asked for.

Plus ... Cat is neither dumb enough nor suicidal enough to try to strongarm or pressure the Gigantes. And Hanno should be well aware of that.

As for Cat having not told him everything that she and Cordelia planned to do to address the domestic political pressures Cordelia was facing ... he very explicitly took himself out of having any knowledge or involvement.

They didn't make a mockery out of the trial. She was tried and executed. Just now her corpse is going to go to a second trial and get executed.

Hanno doesn't get to say "I have no involvement in dealing with internal political matters nor do I have any interest in helping you solve them" then get upset when he doesn't get involved or informed, or have input into the process of coming up with solutions, or get upset that the necessities of coming up with a solution without his assistance results in working around him or methods that he doesn't approve of.

As I said, this is basically Hanno being petty because he's upset over not being told about something he said he didn't want to know about.

Salt

No, Catherine very explicitly took him out of the plans that she and Cordelia were about to make. She rather explicitly lied to him when excluding him from the initial conversation with Cordelia, and when he gave her another chance to talk about it right after the execution she didn't bite. In a twist of irony, the way she was silent on the subject when talking to him after the execution is an almost exact mirror of the way he was silent on the subject when talking to her before the negotiations.

As far as trying and executing someone who was already tried and executed, for no reason other than political convenience? That is the definition of making a mockery out of the trials. This is even if you completely ignore the fact that she outright rigged another trial two days prior.

The hilarity of it is that most people were on the other side of the argument when the Pilgrim was fighting against Catherine, because he thought it was "necessary". The dude got absolutely crucified when he betrayed Catherine's trust by breaking an oath, and all he could offer for an explanation was "I believed it was necessary".

"I believe it's necessary" wasn't a good enough excuse when Tariq betrayed Catherine's trust. It wasn't reason to stop working with him, but no one argued that Catherine was somehow being a petty dick when she didn't extend him friendship or trust afterwards.

"I believe it was necessary" still isn't a good enough excuse, when Catherine betrayed Hanno's trust the exact same way. Hanno is still working with Catherine, but it's silly to blame him for not extending trust or friendship afterwards.

And the thing is, Catherine isn't even saying that. She's commendably honest enough to understand that this knife cuts both ways, hence why her reaction was "I had neither the words nor the right to change his mind".

Aotrs Commander

He a hero. He doesn't get to hide behind "but he's acting like a normal person," he's a capital-H Hero, that means he has to be BETTER.

If he can't be Superman, or Captain America or Optimus Prime or Ace frackin' Rimmer, then at the least he needs to be Jack O'Neill and losing in a contest to see who is worse between himself and Arnold smeggin' Rimmer.

Aotrs Commander

Frag-damn WordPress and it's not-editable comments, ye gods I've had so much trouble on various places trying to say stuff this last couple of days. (It's not like talking at people on the internet is literally the only interaction I get outside of family these days or anything...)

Yes, the end of the last sentence was hyperbole, but only just in Hanno's specific case, unlike some other "heroes" I could mention. Jumped-up farty little smeghead though Rimmer is, I'd trust him to fix a defective drive plate more than Mirror Knight (even assumng MK had the requisite skills) even knowing Rimmer would screw it up and kill everyone..

Salt

That seems rather hypocritical to me. Being Captain America comes with BOTH the privileges and the burdens of being Captain America. Not just the burdens.

You can definitely criticize "Captain America" harshly for every single instance that he falls short of the standard of Captain America. That is entirely fair and correct.

But if that is true, Villains also have ZERO right to complain about being vanquished by captain America. The Red Skulls of the world don't get to mock Captain America for his "principles", or act as if the Captain Americas of the world are no better than the Red Skulls of the world, or whine that Creation is wrong for always letting Captain America beating Red Skull.

But if you are of the position that Heroes are not innately any better than Villains, like Cat or Black does? That they do not deserve to always win, that they are no better than any of the rest of us, that they don't hold any moral high ground and their vaunted "heavenly" principles aren't worth any more than the so-called "base" values of men and women?

Then how can you justify judging them like they are above you in reality, while simultaneously treating them like they are below you, or at best at eye level?

To her credit, Catherine neither believes that Heroes are innately better than a Villain is, nor does she judge them more harshly than she judges Villains – she is consistent, unlike many other Villains, and in my opinion it is most other Villains who are hypocrites in this. Not Catherine.

ninegardens

The fact is Cat keeps expecting him to say more. He doesn't. The weird silences and such are as much to do with her expectations as they are to do with his actions.

And she has those expectations, because up until a few days ago they were co-workers AND friends. Now they are just Co-workers. Hanno is treating her professionally, but not with Warmth. If she wasn't EXPECTING warmth/confidence/trust many of these weird silences might not even be noticeable.

Shveiran

The point is the lack of collaboration, not WARMTH.

Juff

Typo Thread:

aegis Grand > aegis of the Grand heavily favour > heavily in favour after all we'd managed (extra space)
I've been > I'd been participate to > participate in appreciated," he nodded > appreciated," he said, nodding within moment > within moments were the shores > where the shores treaty was the > treaty with the the come the > come the wearer > wearing
I'd never occurred > It'd never occurred change clothes > change of clothes
It did not mind > I did not mind

Earl of Purple

Hakram lives! And my eyes got moist.

Hooray!

Frivolous

I'm not sure why Catherine is very unhappy about the opinions of Callowans.

My reasoning: Even without the preserving effects of her imminent villainy, Cat is going to live a long long time due to her closeness to Sve Noc. She has to start thinking as an immortal does. And one thing an immortal can do is change history. By which I mean she can change the way history is written and interpreted, by getting close to the ones who write history books, by changing the opinions of present-day people, etc.

So what if the Callowans currently despise her? She has a lot of years to change their minds. And if she can't do it in the present generation, she might succeed in 3 or 4.

Plus she'll be living in Cardinal, educating untold numbers of heroes and villains, of mages and priests, of lords and princes. A really influential educator has nearly unlimited power to change the minds of the masses. Even if she can't change their minds directly, she can change the minds of their rulers, divines, scholars, etc.

Also, I'm super happy that Hakram woke up. I think it's almost too sweet that the first thing he said was Cat's name.

Matthew Wells

She's unhappy because she's ruling a bunch of ingrates who need to be convinced stopping a Lich King is the right thing to do. Just because they can be convinced later doesn't make it any less stupid for Mercantis or her political opponents or whoever to be worrying about political power during an existential total war with a god.

Frivolous

Hmm. I'm not sure I agree. Cat's disappointment and angst over Callowan opinion don't strike me as being strategic or political in origin. Her reaction seems personal to me.

But like I said, she needs to get over thinking in the short term. Immortals can't afford to angst over mortal opinions, especially when those opinions can be reshaped to something more pleasing.

Salt

It's because she's as human and flawed as anyone else, not an infallible perfect protagonist like the image that sometimes gets pushed around here. It's actually something in line with the direction that the characterization has been going for a while now, with the Everdark arc ending with "mortal till the end" rather than "let's become more of an immortal inhuman god-thing".

The rational mind in her knows that Callow isn't unreasonable to see her this way – she went into this with eyes open from the start, not in denial. She knew that she wouldn't have the best reputation when she started with “justifications only matter to the just”, and when that no longer fit her she still made the conscious choice to do the dirty work that she thought was necessary before abdicating.

But she's a human being, meaning that despite knowing how irrational it is, she can still be upset at sacrificing so much and only getting the recognition of being some dark product of dark times that came before more celebrated rebuilding – even if she knows that's what she realistically. Because it's not about logic, it's about petty pride and emotion, slowly built up over time.

This was just her finally admitting it out loud, in confidence to Vivienne, because while she can't immediately fix that flaw of hers, she can at the very least own it instead of pretending otherwise and causing more damage to her own relationships

vernal.ancient

Well for one thing, learning to think that way (or any way you're not used to) takes practice. You don't just wake up one morning, say “you know what? I don't care what anyone thinks” and then actually feel that way (trust me, I've tried). You have to practice the mindset.

That said, I'm not so sure about the idea that moral opinions don't matter to immortals. For one, the Dead King generally doesn't mind that most mortals in Calernia see him as the local Satan figure, and he's currently embroiled in a war with every major power except the card-carrying villains, with a story that's most likely building up to his death. And even he goes to the effort of ensuring that his own living subjects approve of his rule. Heck, while most of Cat's job as Priestess of the Night is teaching Sve Noc about stories, that includes caring about moral opinions so you don't fall too far into the “evil gods” side of the spectrum and end up getting slain by a band of angsty teenagers with crazy hair (and probably too many belts and zippers, if we're taking the FF analogy all the way)

Frivolous

Did I say that mortal opinions don't matter to immortals? If so, my mistake; I meant to say that to immortals, mortal opinions are flexible when the right pressure is applied.

The Dead King doesn't really try to make most people outside the Serenity not fear or hate him. I think he could if he wanted to, but he just doesn't care.

It would help a lot if Cat had any friends among bards who weren't the Wandering type. She'd learn how flexible people could be with the right methods.

I am also biased because of course I'm a real person. I've seen what the Internet and especially Twitter and Facebook can do to what people think. Human beings can reverse their opinion completely many times over the span of a lifetime. Cat would benefit from RL social media experts and spin doctors.

vernal.ancient

At the start of the chapter, Cat doesn't mind the merchants having monopolies on dyes and such in Procer because Callow can't afford to make those things anyway, so she just focuses on her army. Viv, on the other hand, sees how much money those things make and thinks "so where can we get the gold to make it ourselves?"

Just wanted to appreciate that little contrast

vernal.ancient

Looking back, your original comment doesn't actually say she couldn't care; one part of your response to Matthew Wells above could be construed that way, if one ignored the context of the original comment, and I guess I was tired enough when I posted my response to both forget the original point and conflate it with my misunderstanding of your response; that's my bad. Your actual point is a good one

Frivolous

That's very polite and gracious and considerate of you to post. Thank you.

mavant

Vivienne's plan seems dangerous. Ere the end of it, I foresee Callowans dyeing by their own hand.

mamm0nn

"I'd grown too used to having my orders obeyed without questioning. I'd grown too used to resorting to violence to get my way, to schemes and assassinations and all the bastard ways to see your will done."

Uhm, Cat? Have you heard of the things you did in the last four books? Pretty much none of this applies, rather the opposite has always been the case for you moreso than others. And I don't think you've ever really tried your hand at assassinations on-screen other than telling Robber to go nuts that one time.

Darkening

I mean, they did bait a bunch of Callowan Noble types into blundering in such a way that she could hang them for treason because they were being inconvenient politically. Sure, they had to actually perform the illegal action, but she deliberately led them to it. It was mostly Thief we saw in the interlude, but as far as I know that whole thing was at Cat's behest. And I suppose the time she tried to murder Malicia repeatedly in Keter is basically assassination.

mamm0nn

True. Though a Named trying to kill a Named in another Named's kingdom in a rather direct confrontation when they both know the other knows is hardly an assassination. More like... a Story-influenced series of fights with a half-hearted theme of secrecy and surprise slapped onto it.

Salt

I mean, for having her orders not questioned, she's had entire armies tripping over each other to volunteer to die for her. She has an entire race that sees her as the divine manifestation of the gospel of their murder-god

For violence and scheming, she quite literally started the story by manufacturing a Callowan rebellion so that she could rise through the ranks during wartime. That's the entire reason she felt so guilty about letting the Lone Swordsman go, since she knew full well that it would kickstart a rebellion she could put down to gain power, even if thousands of Callowans died in the process. Black also explicitly admitted to not putting down the rebellion himself (even though he easily had the capability to), because it was convenient for letting Catherine develop her power base.

She also wasn't above making a deal with the Dead King – Malicia just beat her to the punch. Followed shortly by a war of enslavement over the entire drow race, and then after returning to the surface she ran circles around everyone with her schemes during the Prince's graveyard.

So... yeah she probably has heard of the things she's done over the last several books. Getting her way through violence and schemes is pretty much on point considering her history.

Of course, she was also on the defensive against Malicia, Akua, and the Crusade, meaning she's not exactly alone in guilt for this, but the bar for "I'm not as bad as Malicia, Akua, or the tenth crusade" is set so low that it's underground. Probably a good thing, all in all, that she's judging herself by higher standards than that.

mamm0nn

Oh oh. The Gigantes granting a magic McGuffin means of thwarting the Dead King and the big issue of his undead army BEFORE things look dire and they can really use such a Giant Deus Ex Machina? That sounds like it can only be betrayal or bound to blow up in their faces. And honestly, if the Gigantes can make these wards (for their own island), then why wouldn't they let the Dead King roam a bit more through the lands of their most hated human kingdom before really helping?

Matthew Wells

This is the last second save. We just skipped 99% of the fight between books while the Giants let the undead run around their most hated enemies.

Anonymous

"You cannot have it both ways, Catherine,"

Silly Knight, once again you forgot the alternative! [/wolf-salt]

("You can't have the advantages of both the good way that you should have taken AND the bad way that you actually took. You only get to keep my approval if you take the good way." "So what's this 'good way'?" "Heck if I know.")

Darkening

Let Procer fall apart and lose the war over a point of principle, presumably. But that's okay, surely the gods and angels will see your purity and save the world for you if you're just Good enough~

Salt

> surely the gods and angels will see your purity and save the world for you if you're just Good enough~

I know this is facetious but that's... actually how it does work in the guideverse. Below pays you back for the debt of championing their principles, while Above empowers you more the better you adhere to their principles. That's the problem with Above/Below in the first place.

Above will try to let you win if you're principled enough, even if you are the dumbest motherfucker to ever walk the earth. (See: Mirror Knight, Valiant Champion)

Below will try to let you win if you're clever enough, even if you are the biggest asshole on the planet (see: Triumphant, Tyrant)

Salt

Edit: I guess it would make more sense to say below pays you back for championing their cause more than their principles, considering that they don't have principles so much as "your victory retroactively proves that you were correct and deserving"

beleester

"But we lose the war if this happens!" cuts both ways – why is it okay to tell Hanno "Shut up about your principles and go along with the show trial, or we lose the war and we all die", but it's not okay to tell the Proceran nobles "Shut up about your show trial and let the Heroes have their principles, or we lose the war and we all die"?

And of course, neither Procer falling apart nor the Truce falling apart are certainties, simply probable risks – people can reasonably disagree about uncertain long-term predictions without being evil or stupid. Cat has even pointed out that allowing Procer to demand more concessions because they're less committed to upholding their obligations to the alliance is a perverse incentive. It's not as clear-cut as "Either we have the Cadaver Synod or Procer dies."

Anonymous

Saving the world: No matter how badly anyone's fumbled their Roles before, somehow the world is still here. Anthropically, an observer can only observe a world which hasn't already ended. In practice, the world actually finally ending might be met with a measure of disbelief/incredulity. Entire countries being ground into paste, now, to the misery of all their survivors... that's happened before.

Then again, when it's just replaceable people or countries which are on the block (rather than the entire war as a whole), the side of Good becoming even more the underdog, then being willing to sacrifice even the people you most care about for the sake of Good can be lauded as Goodness...

Considering the choirs, it would be amusing in a morbid way if Good straightforwardly won because it wasn't hypocritical enough – if it actually kept fighting fair when the other side wasn't, to the point of its own destruction. Not much chance of that, though, from what we've seen so far.

Hmm.

Cat's talks with Cordelia come to mind, Cordelia unable to compromise without dying socially (and losing the crown). Betray the interests of the Alliance/Procer and Cordelia loses the Alliance/Procer, becoming no help to it or Cat. Be tainted with an unsavory reputation by Cat—even with unsavory dealings later dramatically revealed at a pivot—and the White Knight loses the Heroes under him, becoming no help to them or Cat. The consequences of the Pilgrim's tainted reputation from being saved by Cat also come to mind.

This still doesn't forgive the White Knight's attitude. That he blames her for what he himself can do nothing about, even if he feels distancing himself from her is compelled by political necessities.

I find myself somewhat frustrated by that I cannot put together a functional mental model of the White Knight's thought process—if there is an internally-consistent perspective, a White-Knight-point-of-view thing to read would be welcome, given that everything we see from Cat's perspective are through the lens of her own interpretations.

When in such a situation, I begin fearing that a character is an unintentional strawman: a character serving as a stand-in for a person who didn't make sense to the author, whom another character gets frustrated at how they don't make sense. The concern being whether the real person made choices which made sense to themselves, whereas the character made slightly different choices which make sense to no one. Whatever the case, it is more productive (and fun!) to gaze instead at the inconsistencies of my own mental model and try to think of ways to put it together that I haven't thought of yet, which could explain matters. ...But it is a red flag when a character says something which seems to have a good point and another character says nothing at all instead of something insightful(/which gives insight into their own thought processes), or when a character thinks something which seems to have a good point and yet keeps it to themselves without saying it out loud and having a chance to hear another character's point of view.

Anonymous

Wait, not 'straightforwardly won'. Why did I write that!?
'straightforwardly lost'!

(Answer: 'Because of how easy it is to flip a bit and how hard to notice at the time'...)

Xinci

You could read the Winter Interludes perhaps, it contains his pov. Good's virtues make a lot of sense under a generational model. A Good society, like all cooperative strategies, works only if a majority of its actors are cooperative. A dissident actor, like a Villain, can quite easily ruin the development of such a society as they will outcompete it or just survive in it far more easily than those who cooperate. If attempts are made to try to punish the dissenting actors, then you may get mutual destruction so other means of pressure may be used to have them act as cooperators. Cat proved herself a bad, and so is being cut off from other forms of interaction so she may only act(at least obviously) in a cooperative fashion due to the restrictions of her position in the grand alliance. I still think Hanno probably wouldn't have stopped her even if she told him what she planned to do.

Xinci

To clarify the generational comment somewhat, Good can afford to lose individual societies so long as it has properly consolidated capital to form new ones over each individual Good societies lifetime along with having other "related"(due to at least partially following its dogma, which aids their survival and mitigates corruption) societies to pitch in to address threats that other Good societies aren't adapted for. So by making sure the dogmatic qualities that keep those living in those Good societies Good's rules, they can retain their function and keep out those who would twist them for another purpose(bad actors/Villains).

Morgenstern

Hm. Strange. The Interlude is in the chapter overview, but the actual chapter 43 before that isn't. *rubs chin thoughtfully

Morgenstern

Ah. The link for Chapter 43 is not entirely missing in the menu (anymore?), it would seem, but got shunted between Chapter 40 and 41, somehow.

Interlude: Ebb

"The highest form of victory is not mere triumph over another, but to use such a triumph as the foundation of your own. This way superiority is demonstrated not only over one defeated but also one victorious, proving your own cunning to be beyond both."

– Extract from 'The Behaviours of Civil Conduct', by High Lady Mchumba Sahelian

There were some who called Mauricius indolent but he preferred think of himself as patient.

The expensive chilled wine – genuine Baalite red, not the imitation the Ashuran brewed on this side of the sea – before him slowly warmed, the coating of frost on the goblet slowly dripping down onto the table. He had yet to touch it. His eyes remained on the lights of the city instead, on the warm glow that set jewels to the dark and the heartbreakingly beautiful mosaics of the Irenian Plaza displayed below the hidden balcony. It was a common tale in Mercantis that Aeolian himself, the famous Tormented Painter, had died moments after putting the last touches of colour on the work. Mauricius knew the truth behind the unspoken boast, for he'd cared to learn it.

Aeolian had been eighty-three and dying when he'd begun the work, debt-ridden to the extent that he'd been willing to spend even his last days on the mosaics if it meant his children would not inherit the crushing burden of his lifetime of indulgences. Yet the City of Bought and Sold preferred the shorter tale, the one that claimed to own a work so beautiful it had taken the life of a Named to make it. It made the mosaics no fairer to behold, Mauricius thought. They were, regardless, a wonder of this world: moving with hour and sun, a living story of interwoven sorcery and skill. But buying the life of a Named spoke of power, and for the merchant lords of this city there was nothing more intoxicating than that.

Mauricius ought to know, as the eldest of the living merchant lords.

Behind him, past the sculpted marble arch bearing a discreet muting enchantment, the shadowy silhouette of a waiting attendant stood still. The service in Sub Rosa was second to none, even in this island where every delight could be bought, though the truth was that Mauricius had taken a balcony tonight largely for the view. Few people even knew that this place existed, hidden behind wards and secrecy as it was, and most believed the Irenian Plaza to be entirely surrounded by the three edifices that were the heart of the Consortium's power in this material world.

The Forty-Stole Court, the Guild Exchange and the Princely Palace.

Power, wealth and influence – all nestled closely together like chicks gathering for warmth. Knowing what was to happen tonight, Mauricius had thought it fitting that he should be close to the beating heart of Mercantis. Two men were to die tonight, after all. The merchant lord slid a finger along the rim of his goblet, watching as beads of condensation slid down the sinuous length of silver. Even now, in manses across the city, his fellows would be scheming behind closed doors. Dear Livia's return from this Arsenal bearing the answer of the Grand Alliance had thrown the Consortium into disorder.

Several of the most influential among them had voiced a belief it was treason for Ambassador Livia Murena to have agreed to such unfavourable terms when half the City knew that the Principate was so deeply in their debt it couldn't even see daylight. It was said that there'd been foul play. Given that Livia had not let her wife out of her sight since returning to the city, Mauricius believed there might be a thread of truth there. Not that the opposition cared. The Consortium buried bleeding hearts long before they might rise to a position where their words might matter, but there were some who objected to fleecing the Grand Alliance on more practical grounds.

If the Dead King won, they first said, we would rue our schemes. That found little purchase, for this was not the first crusade to struggle against the undead. Always these ended in bloody sacrifice and the resumption of the ancient stalemate, as the aftermath decided which among the living nations had been the winners and the losers of this particular iteration. Yet when it had been argued that in the aftermath of the Grand Alliance's victory a burning gaze might be turned to Mercantis, more had bought into the argument. Cordelia Hasenbach was a civilized woman, and her anger could have been appeased should it prove lasting, but it was not so with her allies.

The Dominion was a pack of savages that killed each other on a whim, and Callow was a cauldron of long hatreds. There was a reason that the Consortium had never tried to seize Callowan lands, though it had often had the strength to do so and feasibly keep them. The scheme of taking Dormer and adding it to the holdings of the City had long been discussed, but never once undertaken. The lesson had been learned well from the Brief War, when Atalante had tried to annex part of the Callowan south after buying passage for its war fleet from the Consortium. Jehan the Wise had butchered the invaders, which had not been unexpected, but he'd then began to raise ships for a retaliatory attack on Mercantis itself. Which had been.

Embassies of the Merchant Princess Clarissa had made it known that the City was not involved in the invasion beyond having sold passage through its waters, but the Callowans hadn't cared. When Daoine ships bearing soldiers of the Watch began docking in Dormer, Clarissa had realized that the Callowans would go through with an invasion even if they were likely to lose, even if the mere undertaking of it would bankrupt them for a generation. She'd emptied the coffers of Mercantis appeasing the king of Callow, and no merchant lord had ever seriously talked of taking Callowan land again. Jehan the Wise had been a Named of heroic bent, the practical sorts were now eager to remind the City.

The Black Queen was a monster that gave even the Wasteland pause, and the Consortium wanted to extort her?

Mauricius had been privately amused by that rejoinder, for the Black Queen did not truly give the Wasteland pause in the slightest. Some days he wondered if anything ever did. Poor Fabianus had been stuck in the middle of it and lost what few feathers he'd still had. Their Merchant Prince was first tricked into keeping the First Prince's secrets, and then was pushed so strongly to reveal them that he'd preferred to recuse himself of such matters entirely than continue to be involved. Given that Fabianus' office held little direct power but a great deal of influence, that decision had practically ended his reign in every real sense.

Mauricius smiled and looked at the shadowed mosaics down below. A decade ago, most of the city had thought him the strongest contender for that very same office. He was among the wealthiest few – trading arms in the Free Cities was ever a tidy profit – of the Consortium, he'd served in the Forty-Stole Court for over a decade and save for that little offence when he'd had his first wife's lover and the man's entire family sold into slavery, there were no black marks on his record.

He'd made sure they all ended up in Stygia, so that they were actually slaves even in the legal sense. He was not a forgiving man, and preferred his revenges to be of the thorough kind.

Though Mauricius was reputed to be somewhat indolent, back then that'd been in his favour. No one in the Consortium wanted too motivated or skillful a prince lest the days of the Caepio, who had ruled as kings in all but name, return. He'd campaigned for the office, of course. Sunk a fortune into buying the love of the streets, the votes of the Lesser Courts. But he'd not fought for the support of other merchant lords. Indolent, his supporters had mourned in the years that followed. After Fabianus was elected to the office. None of them ever learned that he'd never sought the title at all: while most saw the elections as a gaping pit for coin, he'd been after a profit. Mauricius had required twice as much as he'd invested in the election as a bribe, to let Fabianus win.

He'd kept a single gold coin from that bribe, as a sentimental token, and as the lights of Mercantis shone in the distance the merchant lord took it out of his robes and idly toyed with it. The luster of it brought out a hunger he knew would never be entirely sated, but Mauricius was a patient man. He'd learned as a boy that the patient always got their day, if they picked the right opportunities. And what was this era of chaos, if not a great banquet of opportunities? The Consortium was fighting itself, the recklessly hungry and the cravenly cautious at odds in the markets and the courts. Praesi gold set tongues wagging, or silenced them, while the long shadow of the Grand Alliance blotted out old certainties.

Mauricius had taken the Dread Empress' bribes, of course. And he'd listened to the honeyed words of her envoys, to the schemes she wove even here in the City. He was not in the habit of refusing coin, though her plots he'd been lukewarm to. At least until it had all unfolded exactly as she had predicted: dear Livia scared into a barely acceptable settlement, a band of Named coming to keep the City under the boot and the armies of the Grand Alliance charging into Hainaut. Far away, and soon to be bloodied. All the while Consortium had turned on itself in bitter infighting, needing the guidance that its Merchant Prince had surrendered the right to provide. And so Mauricius had agreed to the plot, seeing the need for it.

In the distance, what he had been waiting for all night finally appeared: a red light blinked into existence atop a tall tower, for three heartbeats before disappearing.

Merchant Prince Fabianus was dead.

Indolent, patient, Mauricius waited. It was the better part of an hour before a messenger for the Forty-Stole Court found him. Fabianus was dead, he was told, and elections would need to be had. An emergency session of the Forty-Stole Court was to be held soon. And still Mauricius waited. It was almost another hour before he was presented with a second cup of chilled wine, and only then did the merchant lord smile.

"Thank you," he told the shadowy servant.

Prosperus Soranus was dead. That was what the cup had told him. And with him gone, Dread Empress Malicia had lost her puppet candidate to the office of Merchant Prince. All that gold she'd sunk into preparing his election would be gone unless she found another flagbearer for her interests. And even if she tried, that candidate might just lose to Mauricius should he try his hand at being elected. The Empress would suspect his hand at work, but she was a practical woman in her own way.

More gold was coming his way, and soon.

Merchant Prince Mauricius would walk the line, prevent debts being called in early but refuse to extend 'dangerous' loans. Negotiations would be opened again, seeking better terms. Malicia would get what she wanted, a Mercantis unwilling to meekly serve as the coin purse of the Grand Alliance, and the Grand Alliance would be pleased by the rise of a Merchant Prince willing to actively steer policy to their advantage if certain terms were met. There was wealth to be made, standing between the Tower and the West, and even more between the West and annihilation. Mauricius slowly rose to his feet, finally ready to attend the emergency session of the Forty-Stole Court. He was eighty-three, today, and so when he looked down at the mosaics of the Irenian Plaza it was with something like understanding.

"You'd understand, wouldn't you?" Mauricius mused. "You died clutching your brush, after all."

—

Leo had been raised to revile the name of Hypathia Trakas.

His mother had hated it before him and her father before that, a chain going back all the way to the first Trakas to have inherited a mutilated throne after Basilea Hypathia lost the ancient rights of their line. There was a time, Mother had taught him as a child, where we shared power over Nicae with none. In those days the Trakas had ruled as kings, titling themselves Basileus not out of humility but as a means to claim descent from the legendary emperor Aenos Basileon – and so primacy over all other crowns come from the collapse of his ancient empire. But Hypathia Trakas had been arrogant, and unwise. She had made such disaster of the Second Samite war that a swaggering thug of an admiral had been able to carve her throne in two: thereafter, there would be a Strategos as well as a Basileus.

Yet the truth was that, for all the bile that Mother had passed onto him, neither of them had truly expected that they would be able to right this ancient wrong in their lifetimes. They had been taught the dominance of their enemies when Leo's own father went to sea and never returned, taken by 'Stygian pirates' on one of the safest stretches of water of the Gulf. Father had been of a military line, an old one and more importantly one foe to Strategos Nereida Silantis. The warning was heard clearly, and the alliances carefully sealed by Mother withered on the vine. The Trakas had tradition on their side, hallowed blood and the sacred duties only an anointed Basileus could undertake. They even had deep influence in matters of stewardship.

Yet the Strategoi had swords, and without those what was the rest worth?

Leo Trakas had been fresh to the throne when the war with Stygia and Helike erupted, though of course it was not so simple as that. In private the war had been a cause for despair, for when steel was out the Strategoi had excuses to meddle in every matter be they high or low. Leo's palace would be filled with spies, appointments stripped away and granted instead to supporters of Strategos Nereida and the treasury of the office of Basileus plundered at will for war funds. Silanis had even developed ties to the First Prince of Procer, who now showered her with silver and soldiers even as the latest Theodosian madman set the Free Cities aflame. The years ahead looked grim.

And then the armies of Helike and Stygia encamped beyond the walls of Nicae, and Leo realized he'd underestimated the threat of the enemy being fought. Penthes had collapsed into civil war, Atalante outright capitulated and Delos so badly mauled it was good as out of the war. Bellerophon was busy somehow failing to invade the territories of a city at war with itself, as was the wont of the People, but that was hardly a relief. Nicae stood alone, and in the streets the people were afraid. Even the arrival of a band of heroes – and Leo would not soon forget they had gone to Nereida, not him, even though the Trakas stood closest to the Heavens by Nicean law – had done little to improve the mood.

This was no danger to Leo Trakas, for his strengths were not the kind that could be unmade by the displeasure of the people. His blood was in his veins, his authorities writ into immutable law. It was not so with Strategos Nereida Silanis, whose authority came from the sword but also from the love of the people. Strategoi hated by the commons had a tendency to take sick and die, so that the old families might elect a more suitable replacement in their stead. And so Leo Trakas sent what few servants were still solely his to whisper in the right ears, to wonder if once-bold Nereida had not gone craven in her old age. The whispers took, for Nicae's strength had stayed behind its walls during the war, and when the enemies assaulted the wall the Strategos fought in the ranks.

It amused Leo Trakas a great deal, in private, that though he had paid a man to kill her during the battle the assassin died to a stray arrow and the Strategos was still killed by a Helikean blade.

Leo surrendered to the Tyrant of Helike himself, the red-eyed monster humming and grinning like a lunatic all the while before offering terms that were highly generous: the only concession required of Nicae would be its vote in the election of some nobody Bellerophon diplomat to the office of Hierarch of the Free Cities. Unearned as the acclaim was, the city thrummed with praised for his 'having tricked' the Tyrant into gaining nothing of worth from Nicae for his victory. And so when the opportunity had come, when the old families had come to him and asked for him to officiate over the ceremonial council that would elect the next Strategos, he'd done what every Trakas since Hypathia's own daughter had craved like a drowning soul craves air.

"No," Leo Trakas had smiled, savouring the word like fine wine.

They cajoled and whispered sweet promises, at first. And when that failed, oh but how they raged and threatened. Yet it was all but air, for Leo was beloved of the streets – fickle as they were – and they were not. To Nicae, it was a Strategos that had made a disaster of this war. They were not clamouring for another, not yet. And Leo Trakas intended on having seized power properly, by the time it occurred to them that they might want to. At first he courted the First Prince's support, for Cordelia Hasenbach had wasted no time in initiating correspondence, but when he saw the wind turn against Procer in the councils of Kairos Theododian's puppet Hierarch he leaned into it.

There was nothing the people of Nicae loved more than a good settling of scores with the Thalassocracy, and such a war would put him at odds with Procer regardless. That lion was getting old anyway, he'd heard: there were rumours of the Dead King raiding to the north, even as Praesi and Callowans smashed Proceran armies left and right. The League of Free Cities was riding high, in contrast, and Theodosian was a madman but he was a successful one. He was also not as wary of his 'allies' as he should perhaps be, for when Leo began reaching out to the other cities for alliances he found more takers than he had expected. Basileus Leo Trakas had already restored the old powers of his blood, but still he hungered for more.

Was his line not descended from Aenos Basileon himself, who had ruled over the great cities that did not yet call themselves free? There were none more fitting than Leo to rise to prominence in the League, to replace Helike and its twitching goblin of a king as the power behind their simpleton Hierarch. Gods, but in those heady days he'd come so very close to getting all he wanted. How had it all gone so wrong?

"The rioters have seized the amphitheatre, my lord Basileus," Captain Attika told him.

Leo looked down at the kneeling captain of his guard, letting the calm on her face settle his own unease. The game was not yet over, he told himself.

"Better that than the treasury," the Basileus finally said. "Have the Valeides and the Petros answered my messengers?"

"They have not, my lord," Captain Attika admitted.

It was a grim tiding, when even his closest allies within the old families were not willing to consider lending soldiers to keep order in the streets – or at least prevent looting of the granaries and the island-gardens. Most of Leo's soldiers were bound to guard the palace and the treasury, which limited his ability to enforce peace in the streets.

"Two days," Leo said. "In two days we will receive the Stygian grain and the dole will appease the people. We only need to hold for that long, Attika."

His captain grimaced.

"I fear that the riots might be as much from the northern news as the rationing, my lord," she admitted. "And Stygian grain cannot mend such accusations."

"Hasenbach," the Basileus hissed. "Her work, this. None of the others have the subtlety for it."

When the threat had first come through the Grand Alliance – that band of robbers – that Leo might be named a friend of the Dead King if he did not surrender and come to terms with 'Strategos' Zenobia, he'd laughed at the letter. Procer was too busy warring against the dead to meddle in the south, and the Black Queen had proved a rather distant patron to General Basilia. As for the Dominion it was a pack of squabbling tribes that the only civilized lot among them, the Isbili of Levante, had little control over. They couldn't agree on the colour of tablecloths without honour duel, much less genuine diplomatic policy.

There was a lot less to laugh about now that word of the condemnation had been smuggled into the city and riots shook the streets. Zenobia Vasilakis might be a mere country landowner, well beneath any of the old families that tended to claim the office of Strategos, but she had partisans anyway. Though with no real ties to the ruling naval elite of Nicae, the Vasilakis family did have a record of meritorious service in the army – which had often been neglected in favour of the fleet, over the years. Army folk kept tight loyalties, which was half the reason Leo's own mother had taken a husband from one such family.

The Vasilakis reputation had won Zenobia sympathies, even before the Grand Alliance's official recognition of her as the legitimate ruler of Nicae cemented her status. Leo's attempts to present her to the old families as a country agitator out to replace the influential lines from the city had been largely successful, but after such honours from great crowns it wouldn't matter. Grand Alliance backing made them as powerful as any of them, in practice, and ties to General Basilia's Helike only added bite to her candidature. Zenobia had not been elected under the proper ceremony, which would have required Leo to officiate, but fewer people cared every week.

"I cannot speak to that, my lord," Captain Attika said, "but I will say that should we lose the grain to rioters, it will deal your reign a great blow. I wager they will call it Zenobia's dole instead, and the streets will sing her name."

"The docks are also guarded by our... friends," the Basileus said. "They would not hesitate to disperse riots."

The thrice-cursed Dread Empress of Praes had massacred and stolen his fleet in the same stroke, but there was nothing Leo could do about that. What he could do was trade the Praesi access to the port for repairs of the ships in exchange for them funding Stygian grain shipments and providing the coin that let him keep paying his army even after the collapse of trade in the Samite Gulf. If Ashur weren't fighting a very polite civil war with itself Leo might have been afraid of reprisals for the sacks of Smyrna and Arwad he'd ordered, but until the Thalassocracy dealt with its succession crisis Nicae would remain safe.

"I fear that would only incite further unrest, my lord," Captain Attika said. "Would the sight of the dead slaying the living not seem to put truth to the accusations of the Grand Alliance?"

Leo's fingers clenched. He'd not considered that. Any thinking man would grasp that the Dead King fielded no armies this far south, but angry mobs were not renowned for their wisdom. No doubt his enemies would seize on the opportunity presented regardless of the truth, too.

"Then we must secure the docks with our own men," Leo reluctantly said. "All is lost, without the grain."

He peered at his kneeling captain.

"Where would you suggest the men be taken from?" he said.

She hesitated for a moment.

"The palace," Captain Attika finally said. "It is much easier to defend, and less likely to be attacked. Greed will lead rioters to try their hand at the treasury sooner or later, my lord."

"Agreed," the Basileus said.

Or rivals from old families under the guise of rioters, even. None of that lot was above plundering the coffers of the state to fill their own.

"See to it, Captain Attika," he ordered.

"My lord," she replied, saluting.

After the door closed behind her, Leo Trakas sat alone on the throne he'd been the first of his line to ever fully reclaim. And still the thought niggled away at him – would the Trakas of days yet to come name him as another Hypathia, another fool who'd wasted the gifts of fate? The long tapestries and slender columns around him gave no answer to his musings. No, Leo told himself. The game was not yet over, and this could yet be salvaged. Once the grain ships had come many of the rioters would disperse and he could finally suppress the riots. After he regained control of the city, he could come to terms with 'Strategos' Zenobia.

To his knowledge she was still unmarried, if a decade older than him, and perhaps the surrender being forced on him could be turned into a marriage alliance instead. He doubted Zenobia was any more eager to be under the Grand Alliance's thumb than he was to be under Malicia's. A united Nicae would be able to force Helike to end its incessant war-making, especially if it clasped hands with Stygia, and Leo could count his debts to the Tower settled if he made that savage Basilia cease attacking the reign of Malicia's Penthesian puppet Exarch. Perhaps sending for a painting of Zenobia was in order, he thought, so that he might have a notion of what he'd be in for.

With Captain Attika gone he'd expected servants to begin attending him again, but the hall was instead eerily silent. Leo frowned. Was something wrong, or did someone simply need to be switched? The Basileus became uncomfortably aware that his regal clothes came without a weapon, or more protection than a few layers of cloth could afford him. There were armoured statues here in the hall, though, bearing the gilded armour of his forbears and matching ceremonial blades. Yet if he were to leave here having strapped on such a sword and there'd been no trouble, if servants saw him... Laughter was the death of fear, and much of his reign now depended on fear.

Silence lingered throughout his thoughts, and that as much as anything else made the decision for him.

The blade of Basilea Sousanna Trakas came clear of the scabbard with a hiss. It fit his hand well, as Sousanna had been tall for a woman. As he recalled she was best known for her victories against encroaching Stygia and having extracted tribute from the hill tribes later to become Helike, so at least half of the old use might see the light of day again. Sure-footed even if it had been years since he'd last held a blade, Leo pushed open the great gates of the throne hall and slipped into the corridor beyond. Still not a soul in sight, he saw with dismay. That was not natural.

Had his own servants begun to flee the palace, abandoning his cause?

More worryingly, there was no trace of his personal guard. There should have been four in the corridor, awaiting his orders, but instead only further silence awaited. Leo decided to head for his quarters in the deeper palace, where more guards should be awaiting him. Tense moments walking through deserted hallways came at an end when he found the butchered corpse of one of his soldiers on the floor. Stabbed in the back, he found, and the body was still warm. It was a coup, must be, and by heading to his quarters he'd be putting himself into the hands of his enemies.

He must turn back now, find the barracks and convince soldiers to escort him to the manse of an allied family. The Valeides might have denied him more men, but they could not refuse him shelter without dishonouring themselves: his father had been brother to their patriarch's wife. Discarding the last pretence of being in control, Leo ran for it.

He heard it as a whistle first. At the tune of a half-familiar song, though he could not remember the name of it. The Basileus abandoned the corridor it came from, banking left to shake whoever was whistling. Except the same slow, mournful whistle awaited him there. Dead end after dead end, until he began to hear the words.

*Did we not lose,
A hundred times?
Did we not win,
A hundred times?*

His blood ran cold. And as the snare tightened around him, Leo Trakas ran until there was nowhere left to run. Cornered in his own palace, surrounded by tapestries speaking to old glories as slowly the sound of hooves on stone came closer. The scent of blood was in the air. Back to a splash of blood-red silk, a golden sword in hand, the Basileus of Nicae stood his ground as rider came into the flickering torchlight. Her voice was clear, strong.

"For we did lose,
A hundred times," General Basilia sang, a sharp smile on her face.

Her sword was already in her hand, dripping red on the stone. Behind her, a pack of riders followed her into the corridor – red-handed savages, defiling a palace older than their entire misbegotten city.

"And we will win,
A hundred times," General Basilia sang, the smile fading from her lips and sinking into her eyes.

She leaned forward on her saddle.

"You warned of me consequences once, Leo Trakas. Shall we now finish our talk?"

The Basileus of Nicae spat to the side, defiant.

"Once a hound, always a hound," Leo said. "You will fail your new masters, just as you failed your last."

"Where was that spirit," General Basilia laughed, "a year ago?"

Her blade rose, and so did his. She spurred her mount and he ran forward, ran and yelled until the horse was past him and he felt a flash of heat across his chest and face. Blood, he found as he stumbled onto the tapestries.

"'till falls the age,
And end the times," the general softly said.

Darkness came. And just before it, dread. Gods, if they'd taken the city – the undead the Tower had left, would they not burn the city as they fled? Malicia would not suffer the port to stand, if she could not use it.

Leo Trakas' last word was a rasping gurgle as he tried too late to speak a warning.

Big Brother

As Malicia's pawns fall, the era of her influence begins to wane. And so the rat becomes cornered, 'ware its poisoned bite.

Anomandris

True, she is definitely not going quietly into the gentle night...

In terms of the Story, I have a feeling that she is gonna be higher on the totem pole of the big bad than DK, with only the Bard above her.

thearpox23

I am puzzled as to how you arrived at that. Imagine if in the Lord of The Rings the heroes decided to forego fighting Saruman in favour of defeating Sauron first, and the guy was still sending raids and causing trouble till after the ring was tossed. That's the situation with Malicia now. Her whole plan of hoping the Grand Alliance is too exhausted to fight her after the war with DK is not what I would call "higher on the totem pole than DK".

Miles

She's higher on the pole because she'll be alive when he is dead.

Konstantin von Karstein

I doubt he will die. He will probably be trapped in the Serenity, or impeded one way or another by the Autumn Crown.

nimelennar

Easy, that: he's been dead for far longer than she's been alive.

Miles

That's the joke .gif

hakureireimu

That's a big assumption, considering that Amadeus and Ranger are gunning for her.

Anomandris

I need a Black interlude...

Or Ranger (That would be funnnnnnn)

boballab

The Empress is only alive at the moment for 2 reasons.
1) When the last we saw Ranger, when she joined up with Black, she still was recovering from her fight with the Summer Queen. 2) Not even the Dead King was able to keep Ranger from reaching him no matter what was done so he actually quit trying and there was the draw with the Summer Queen. Both are technically in the lower tier of "godhood" something Malicia is not. If a fully healed Ranger wants Malicia dead, she will be dead because she won't be able to stop her and remember Ranger never liked Malicia she only help her because of Black.

A.B.

Also while she may not be higher to the world by the time the dead king is handled everyone else will be tired and broke. It won't be grand alliance vs D.Empress but just Cat. So for the stories POV she will be the big baddest even if not for the world.

Liliet

Actually that's what happened to Saruman, too, cleaning him up was the last arc of the books.

Malicia's going to be the Scouring of the Shire.

Shveiran

...Anyone that liked the scouring of the shire, raise you hand. I'll wait.

In all seriousness, that is usually considered one of the few mistakes of granpa Tolkien. It generally reads as anticlimatic as the conclusion of the series, and here we wouldn't even have the "hero coming home" feel to carry us.

I sure hope EE doesn't go that route. If Malicia will be last, she'll likely need to be relevant. Not a Shire Saruman.

shikkarasu

I'm hoping that Amadeus will take the Tower. We know he's a claimant for it. If not, then I imagine Cat will, having abdicated the Crown. Either way, if it happens post DK it will likely be the "establishing the new Status Quo" final story beat, rather than a story arc of its own.

caoimhinh

Yeah, I think it would be much better if Amadeus beats Malicia without the Grand Alliance's armies and without Catherine.

And I hope we get to actually see it, not a "After the last battle against the Dead King, Catherine received a message: Dread Empress Malicia was dead." sort of thing.

nimelennar

Raises hand

Come on, the Scouring is pretty much directly out of Tolkien's life experience of coming home after WWI and finding that the idyllic place he'd been longing to return to had not, in fact, been left untouched by the war raging across the rest of the continent.

I can understand not liking it; it is yet another conflict (if an easily resolved one) taking place after the climax of the book. It certainly wasn't a "mistake," though.

Rey d`Tutto

It isn't vengeance, it is the only justice those who would not be capable of passing into the "West" would be able to get.

The Nuremberg Trials are Real Life. The Scouring of The Shore was Tolkein's take on the idea.

Even the "Book of Revelations" contains parts of how the "bad guys" get justice.

Just because the imminent threat is gone doesn't mean wrongs won't be righted.

Branwen

Bah I loved the scouring of the shire! It's a much needed reminder that war is inherently destructive and even if heroism is called for it comes at great cost. And the scene with Meriadoc blowing his horn of Rohan and rallying the hobbits kicks enormous ass and is lowkey one of my favorites in the whole series XD

iLissuin

I shall raise my hand proudly.

The Scouring of the Shire was essential to the greater themes of the story: the Shire is what they fought so hard to protect and thus needed narrative closure (it should have been in the extendeds). It is the cost of the journey, the true conflict for Frodo and Sam.

In many ways I see this as a parallel to Cat's relationship with Callow. She's currently fighting "Mordor," but what will await her at home? What of Callow and Cardinal? I highly doubt that Malicia will just let what Cat has built stand, and she is closer to home than Cat will be for a long time. Besides, this conflict of what the end of the war shall bring has been heavily foreshadowed.

What I am very curious about is how Black and Vivi will factor into the equation. What will they bring to Cat's "Shire"?

lordcirth

I liked the scouring of the shire! It gave a chance for Merry and Pippin to come home in style. Not just coming home as strangers, but as heroes. And to show how they had changed and grown, without being overshadowed.

Liliet

Raises hand.

Clint

Not to pile on, but I thought omitting the Scouring of the Shire from the extended cut of the movies was one of Peter Jackson's two big errors in an otherwise phenomenal set of movies.

(The other was reducing Gimli and the dwarves into nothing but a bad joke.)

Anomandris

That's kinda why I said in terms of the story. Yes DK is Sauron-esque in his power right now, but my feeling is that Malicia is gonna end up causing a lot more problem to Calernia in general and Cat in particular than DK. It's not a plot thing, its where I might see the story going.

Maybe I could have used better wording – Antagonist totem pole?

Mental Mouse

Saruman didn't cause problems on the scale of Sauron – he took a final chance to piss on the Shire, and then he got squashed like a bug. Once the DK is defeated, Malicia will be in much the same situation – if Black and Ranger don't get her first, she'll be facing Cat's full attentions, with Cat riding a newborn Name, wielding the Bard's powers, and riding every story in the books.

Malicia is Doomed with a capital D.

Miles

DK is the smaller threat here. He's always been happy to go back to his hole after causing just enough trouble to avoid ending his story. He wants to be the villain who gets knocked down, not the one who gets killed, and is happy in his immortal retirement.

Malicia is trying to actually take over.

Liliet

It's been pretty explicitly spelled out that THIS TIME the Dead King is playing for keeps. Because he thinks he can, because he thinks he cannot afford not to. Precedent isn't much help here – the last time he made a decisive move, it was the end of Sephirah.

caoimhinh

She already has. In fact, most of the conflicts of this novel can be attributed and linked to her in some way. Her actions caused the Tenth Crusade by sponsoring the Doom of Liesse, and she is the one who unleashed the Dead King on Calernia again by inviting him.

Malicia doesn't believe herself capable of facing the other nations, so her style is not a direct confrontation. Instead, she causes a lot of fires around so that the other powers on Calernia have to be too busy putting them out that they can't come against her... which works on the short term, but not on the long run, because eventually they are gonna look at her and decide she needs to be put down so that the fires end.

So yeah, she is the final antagonist of the series because she is, in fact, the first and I don't personally think she needs to cause one last disaster in her final confrontation (though she is probably desperate enough to do that) because she is already the one that caused the whole mess in the first place.

It's as if Saruman had been an evil sorcerer that when Gandalf and co. went after him, summoned Sauron on Middle Earth to get the heroes off him. Then after ending Sauron's forces, the heroes need to kill Saruman because that was his fault.

That's the kind of situation Calernia has with Malicia.

Jago

Raises hand

As nimelennar said, it is the moment when you return home from the war and discover that both you and your home have changed. Frodo is the veteran that suffers from PTD, even if the term hadn't yet been coined when Tolkien returned from the war.

The Lord of the Ring has a bittersweet ending, but that doesn't make it less, it makes it honest.

On a separate note, you must remember that Sauron was Morgoth lieutenant, so already a "lesser" evil.

Moodprint

When people refer to the Dead King as DK, I keep reading Donkey Kong in my head, and I cant help but chuckle a little

anonymous4968

Bayou Bogie fits my mental image of the Deadlands. uwu

grzecho2222

Still possible that Dead King will summon Triumphant to shed "Big Bad" position to her

Liliet

She's dead.

crowlute

Sigh. I'm tired of this "place on the totem pole" meme. Positions on totem poles have nothing to do with one's importance, and it's a disrespectful statement to actual indigenous people

Mirror Night

I mean I think its gone fairly well for Malicia. Not her first candidate in Mercantis sure but its her Second Option. Nicae is done for the foreseeable future as goblinfire burns down the city and the ports. Ashur is bogged down in a Civil War with two of their major cities sacked. Did it go 100% perfectly not really but I doubt Malicia thought Nicae could hold back Helike forever anyway.

Odd

Malicia's pawns think it's going poorly for her because the goals she told those pawns she wanted are not being fully achieved. If those goals are false, where does that leave the situation for her?

Liliet

Still bad, between Amadeus and Catherine.

There's only so many times you can move the goalposts on what your victory conditions are before you follow in Traitorous's steps.

Miles

Cat is getting blamed for the sacking. It's the fulfillment of a threat she made in a dream.

Also there are lots of fires and zombies

Big Brother

The sacking is being done by Basilia in a completely separate city/country from the one whose envoy Cat threatened.

Anomandris

"Standing between the Tower and the West; and between the West and annihilation"....not a great place to stand, mate..

Also, was that Assassin in Mercantis?? (Please let them not be working with Malicia)

Big I

Sounds like they're behind the unrest in Ashur, since they're going through a succession crisis and Assassin was supposed to kill their leader.

caoimhinh

Yes, Assassin killed Magon, the head of Ashur.
But that 2 years ago, no? I doubt he is still there. Though it is telling that his son and successor (who is on the side of Malicia) was not able to seize power completely.

Shveiran

I think he died at Thalassina, actually? I believe he was in charge of the fleet during Warlock's dramatic exit

Konstantin von Karstein

I think Malicia even complained about it.

Liliet

No, Augur told Cordelia about Hadast being about to be Assassinated during the peace conference.

Shveiran

You are thinking about the father, but I was talking about the son.

Liliet

Oh.

Konstantin von Karstein

He's delusional if he thinks he can stay there for long. The GA will have no patience for that.

Liliet

Actually, I can see the GA seizing the opportunity to have someone stand there. It's not great for his life expectancy and he knows it, judging by the age comment at the end, but he can do a lot from that position.

Shveiran

Not really? I mean, that's what he thinks, that's clear. I'm just saying...He plans to toe the line between the two super-powers, but that is impossible as the two superpowers want irreconcilable things.

If he extorts a few concessions from the GA that are not outrageous enough, they might tolerate it, but that means Mercantis doesn't collapse their economic situation, and that Malicia won't tolerate: the money bag doesn't collapse without Mercantis, and the money bag is how she can sabotage the war effort.

She won't sit pretty and hope the DK delivers, that's not her style.

If he pushes enough for Malicia to be satisfied, though, the GA will stop playing nice and remind them that coin and influence are not worth shit if the opponent has enough swords and no qualm over using them.

I guess it is possible for Malicia to find another scheme, but Mercantis does seem the weakest link... and therefore the best target.

Even if she starts attacking elsewhere she has no reason not to keep attacking there as well.

talenel

The problem is that Cat can't really afford to sack Mercantis. If she does that, then the money bag still disappears. So Malicia's best plan is to bleed the Grand Alliance enough that they are hapless once they have defeated DK for good. And a Merchant Prince who is clever enough to walk the line where he will bleed every coin and favor he can is honestly almost more of a positive for her then having a puppet Merchant Prince.

Javvies

Yes and no.

Mercantis still has no idea exactly where "reluctantly tolerated, if barely" ends and "bad things happen to Mercantis" starts as far as pushing their demands goes. There's clearly a point where Mercantis gets trashed immediately ... but before that there's a point where Mercantis gets tolerated for the duration of the war and then demolished instead of fulfilling the terms. Remember, if Mercantis gets sacked by Procer/the Grand Alliance, even if they don't launch a punitive expedition until after the war, the debts and concessions owed to Mercantis can easily be written off. It's easier to pretend to accept and put up with things you don't like if you know it's temporary and are planning on getting rid of them.

talenel

Yes they can write off all their past debts and loans is they wipe out Mercantis. But then where are they getting any money from? No one will be lending them money after they destroyed their last major borrower. And the GA for all it has a powerful army still is woefully lacking in funds. They need Mercantis, its trade, its business, and most importantly its money. And, after the war, they'll still need those things to function and begin the process of rebuilding.

Now if Mercantis is being sufficiently unhelpful that it doesn't matter, then they will be spitefully wiped out by Cat as Calernia burns around them. However, if they provide just enough recalcitrant help that the GA can still function, then Cat, being her practical self, can't afford to nuke them. Especially since it will just make recovery for the rest of the world much more difficult.

It's the one downside to being practical. Cat would never copy Jehan the Wise and bankrupt her people just for spite. She's too reasonable for that.

Shveiran

But she wouldn't be bankrupting anyone. She'd take a stroll through the Twilight Ways and portal a few glaciers down on the city. Mercantis has no mage or Named worth a damn, I doubt she'd need an army to do it... and if she did, she has one that still has to go south.

Culling them after the war causes no problem to the GA. Sure, they might need funds to rebuild, but they need that less than they need crossing off gargantuan war debts.

And from a practical standpoint... if she is stepping down anyway, she is removing a tick from the continent who would do little for anyone save profiteering from the war-torn kingdoms' impoverished state.

Not crossing off Mercantis after the war is not a practical measure, but a moral one. Because, you know, it's still a lot of death even if they are ruled by dicks.

Liliet

Well, there IS a band of GA Named in the city now... :3

Big I

So I'm guessing we've just seen the Naming of the next Merchant Prince and Tyrant.

On an unrelated note, I hope we get to see the fall of Stygia and Mercantis in this story to the Legions or the Army of Callow.

"There can be no peace between orc and lash." And how cool was that story about Jehan the Wise? Long prices indeed.

Raved Thrad

I laughed out loud at the part where the Mercantian was recounting how Callow had been faced with penury for a generation and they didn't care. Savages indeed.

"You're going to pauperize yourselves if you attack us!"

"Then let's make it good, yeah?"

"Ok, ok, we'll pay you to go away."

"Score!"

caoimhinh

I don't know about them getting a Name.

Basilias, I could see, since even Catherine sees Kairos in her when she grins.

But the merchant prince position is not a Name, and this guy most definitely didn't do anything worthy of getting a Name.

Anomandris

I think the Interlude and the last chapter seem out of order in the Chapters list below (or so it seems on the mobile) – might want to fix that?

Raved Thrad

An interesting turn of events, the Basileus falling to a Basilias...

Burlyraven

Ah, what delightful insight into the lesser villains of the story. These events were either entirely according to Malicias plan, or she's been slipping lately, if two of her supposed most important assets can be removed from the board so easily.

KingJulius

I think this is a sign of her power waning. Both halves of this interlude seem to be tools of her dying before they can accomplish her schemes.

talenel

We are seeing these things from an outsider/tool's perspectives. They aren't party to Malicia's plans. And honestly these things seem to have gone pretty well. Nicae is pretty much destroyed as an entity and I don't think she could have ever really trusted Trakas as an ally. And Mercantis has a very powerful and effective MP who will do a good job of bleeding the GA without giving the appearance of being a figurehead and thus a straight-up enemy.

Ninestrings

Mercantis: I see you loading up ships there to attack us

Jehan: Yep

Mercantis: hahaha that makes no sense though you'll lose a lot of money on that

Jehan: Yep Continues loading

Mercantis: Hey man why not stop doing that Jehan: Nope.

Mercantis: I... I'll pay you not to?

Jehan:...how much?

Raved Thrad

The day Mercantis learned just how long a Callowan's long price is.

WuseMajor

Unfortunately, they seem to have forgotten. Might be time to remind them again.

Frivolous

It kind of makes you think that Callowans have bigger dicks than anyone else. Yes, including Callowan women.

After all, there's only one letter of difference between long price and long prick.

When they decide to fuck you up, you'll know it.

Sun Dog

Angry horse people. Track you down and punch you in the mouth because your grandpa shortchanged their grandpa.

Raved Thrad

The other Callowan motto: "Vengeance is its own imperative."

Adrian V

I am not sure who will end up more fucked, i think Mauricious didn't think on how whatever happens in the free cities would affect him, and i am not sure what will happen to Nicae.

Also credit where is due Leo's last thoughts were at least about his city and people's safety, pity it came too late but is aparently more than what that guy in Penthes (and his brother) are/were capable off,

Back to that merchant i think he doesn't realize he is on the end of an era, he is sticking to old ways and that could sink Mercantis.

Liliet

I get the impression Mauricius is fully aware he's signing up for a WILD RIDE and going for it on purpose. Eighty-three, YOLO, etc. It's not like he has a "stable" option in this climate.

And yeah I noticed that too about Leo. For all that he was kind of a shit throughout his internal monologue, at the end his thought was about the city in his charge.

Shveiran

Leo Trakas: fucks over his city and everyone else looking out only for his own legacy throughout his life.

Also Leo Trakas: has a last-moment ehipany while dying that maybe if everyone died it would be bad, which affects nothing.

Sure, let's give him a point for that. So long as we count the 10000 that were scored against him as well.

Adrian_V

Well, Cat aside near everyone get points in the asshole scale, and even her too (lets not forget she basically went and tried to enslave a whole race, luckily she got better)

Shveiran

Sure.

I'm just saying that HOW MANY points they get in each category kind of matters.

Liliet

I'm not really counting points, but sure.

Miles

Did we not vote,
A hundred times?
Did we not win,
A hundred times?

For we did vote,
A hundred times.
And we will win, a hundred times.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

caoimhinh

'till falls the tale,
And ends the books.

Raved Thrad

Most of a random Jora comment in Guild Wars: "Hail to the future! It is an axe age, a sword age, an age when shields are cleft asunder! It is a wind age, a wolf age, before the world plunges headlong into battle!"

Abrakadabra

Wow, that is terrible. Sounds like a bad copy of that song by Brothers of metal: prophecy of ragnarok.

Raved Thrad

It is derived from poetic (skaldic?) descriptions of Ragnarök. The Norn (of which Jora is one) are giants (relatively speaking) who live in the snowy North. Their culture revolves around hunting, brawling (among themselves), drinking, and killing things. Oh, and dying heroically, but really heroic Norn usually manage to put that off for a while.

<https://wiki.guildwars.com/wiki/Norn>

Abrakadabra

I see. Thanks.

Liliet

Okay, this one IS funny.

edrey

Well, i am sure the augur would save nicae, with atalante priests maybe? Stigia is the problem. For mercantis, on the other hand? There are the dwarfs, the herald sound noble enough to help, they are in the war too, after all, scare them a little shouldnt be a problem

Ryan

"Prosperus Soranus was dead. That was what the cup had told him. And with him gone, Dread Empress Malicia had lost her puppet candidate to the office of Merchant Prince."

This guy seriously thinks he outplayed malicia? I think he is in for a rude awakening.

"There were none more fitting than Leo to rise to prominence in the League, to replace Helike and its twitching goblin of a king as the power behind their simpleton Hierarch. Gods, but in those heady days he'd come so very close to getting all he wanted. How had it all gone so wrong?"

Poor Leo to paraphrase Azula of the fire nation, You were never even a player.

Anomandris

Plus he thinks he can outplay not just Malicia, but Cat and Cordy.

Thats like the answer to the question "Name three Calernian women you do not want to play politics with"

Liliet

I disagree re: Mauricius. Malicia IS short on options, and he's not claiming to have outplayed her, it's not like this results in her LOSS. She just wins slightly less, and that's just how the game goes.

I get the impression he's fully aware he cannot outplay either of the three women involved. However, he can make himself a person valuable to all three of them as a workable compromise – he's not completely Malicia's puppet but he's as good as she's going to get without sacking the city entirely, and well, the Grand Alliance did just send a band of Named there. Malicia is going to have to settle, and he's the ideal candidate for everyone involved. Sane enough to deal with the Grand Alliance without dismissing them, mercantile enough to give Malicia periodic bites.

Nobody's going to like it, but as long as they don't dislike it at him, he's fine.

letouriste

it's not about outplaying her, she probably guessed it could go this way and didn't care. The guy is still willing to do what she want

Forum Explorer

No, I think Black outplayed Malicia and knew that this guy would be Malicia's contingency. But since he's just trying to ride the wave between maximizing profits and being destroyed, he won't actually be that useful of a pawn. Sure, Malicia can bribe him, but there is a much sharper limit on what he's willing to do. Plus his YOLO attitude means threats won't matter nearly as much to him.

Javvies

Heh.

Things aren't going the way Malicia wants them to go ... but she's the type that has contingencies to trash as much as possible that she can't get to go her way.

Very much approve of the bit about Jehan the Wise and Callowan willingness to get revenge.

But Mauricius is definitely underestimating Cat's willingness to do terrible things to get enemies or those who help them. I rather suspect that Mercantis is going to have more trouble with renegotiating the terms than he thinks they will. And I suspect that if/when he finds out about the nightmare messages Cat sent Livia, he'll reconsider – because he damned well ought to know that having made the threat, and how explicit it was, Cat basically has to follow through or she'll never be able to make another threat believable. Plus, he was just thinking about what Jehan the Wise did, and that he was a hardcore Callowan Hero, while Cat is equally Callowan but also a Villain, and thus presumably has less restraints on what she'll do to people.

Liliet

I get the impression he's not going to be renegotiating Livia's deal directly. He's going to conduct further, additional negotiations for more loans, while accepting the deal Cat nightmared Livia into.

He's not underestimating anything. He's going to play by the rules. He just expects that by the rules, he'll still profit.

Javvies

Even if you're right, that he's not going to try to renegotiate what Livia agreed to ... and I got the impression that he was planning to renegotiate, or at least try to. The point is, the basic point of the message Cat sent was that Mercantis cannot afford to try to push Procer, and thus the Grand Alliance, too far, because crossing the line into unacceptable conditions means Mercantis gets razed. And there's no real way to tell exactly where "reluctantly tolerated, if barely" ends and "bad things happen to Mercantis" starts.

And I got the impression that he thinks he'll have more leeway to push Procer (and thus the Grand Alliance) than Livia does. Remember the past where he thinks about the Grand Alliance's armies marching into Hainaut, "soon to be bloodied"? I get the impression that he thinks that the forces of the Grand Alliance aren't going to be available to pressure Mercantis soon.

Also, I suspect that he's seriously underestimating Cat.

Rey d`Tutto

Cat, without Named (but maybe a few Firstborn), would wreck Merchantis.

Cat & the Woe?

Jago

The main problem is that he thinks it is "a Crusade as usual", with the crusaders being bloodied and all ending to a standstill and al going on as usual. But the war is an invasion of Procer by the DK. If the Crusade fails at least half of Procer fall under the DK and Marcanis larger client disappears. The DK doesn't seem to care for trade outside his territory, so what is the utility of being the trading gate of the continent when the interior doesn't trade at all?

Procer fall, Callow is conquered by Praes and they trade food directly, half of the Free cities are wrecked for generations, the Titanomachy seem mostly an autarchy, so little trade from there, too. It ends like Venice in the XVIII century, when trade was across the Atlantic to the Americas or along the Cape of Good Hope to Asia. A sill famous has been, but not the economic power it was.

And if Procer fall they can say goodbye to the money they loaned.

Liliet

> And there's no real way to tell exactly where "reluctantly tolerated, if barely" ends and "bad things happen to Mercantis" starts.

There is though. Sure it's a zone of risk, but the GA does need Mercantis and it needs it for specific things. If the 10 things it absolutely needs are fulfilled but the 2 additional things it would also like aren't, the game continues to be played – and the difference between 'absolutely needs' and 'would also like' is calculable with sufficient intelligence.

Juff

Typo Thread:

preferred think > preferred to think Ashuran brewed > Ashurans brewed through kind > thorough kind while Consortium > while the Consortium soldiers we bound > soldiers were bound without honour duel > without an honour duel them as powerful as any of them > her as powerful as any of them
A the tune > The tune as rider came > as a rider came fading form > fading from

WuseMajor

So, today's was called Ebb.

I'll place a bet on the next one being Flow. As in the Ebb and Flow that Procerians keep talking about.

I suspect we'll see how these two situations play out for the people who think they're winning right now. If not, then perhaps a few more such situations, ending with how Malicia feels about things.

Or...hmmm...Perhaps Amadeus will comment on something?

Liliet

OH YES PLEASE LET THE NEXT ONE BE AMADEUS'S

Shveiran

I know right? We still have next to no clue what he has been up to for two years.

We had some rumors about Sepulcral and a dragon being involved, but nothing certain or even detailed.

I need some Not!BlackKnight goodness.

Raved Thrad

It's a miracle, really, when you consider that he's been running around with Hye for two years and neither is half the world on fire, nor has Ranger boinked him to death. After all he is just another squishy human now...

Liliet

Oh goddammit, way to make me like a character right as he's dying)= Leo was a twat, but he could use those extra seconds for a warning... he would have used them well. He wasn't a good guy and he was kind of an idiot, but in the end, he did care.

Mauricius, now, is interesting. I'm expecting he'll be another big player now, having expertly placed himself in exactly the place he's qualified to make big waves from. I kind of like him, I won't lie, though it's in a "wow what a terrible person" way.

Mental Mouse

Leo hadn't earned the chance to give a "final warning".

Liliet

I really really really cannot understand this logic.

Being able to do a little bit of good is not something you need ot deserve first, even if you're following the 'deserve' framework isn't it HOW you deserve other things?

Mental Mouse

It would have been a moment of redemption, and he hadn't set up anything to warrant that.

Liliet

I... what?

This is not even circular logic, this is like... I don't even know.

Either his last moments being spent on telling Basilia to beware IS sufficient for redemption. In which case it's sufficient and he has "set up" by being the kind of person to react like that.

Or it's not enough, in which case it's not redemption and there's no problem.

There's nothing else there. It's not about him, he's not doing it for himself, he's doing it for the city. How it reflects on him is the opposite of the point. It's just a reflection, and whatever you think the reflection is, it's not relevant to the act itself?

Mental Mouse

The "reflection" would affect how he's remembered afterward, the stories that follow him. This falls under "call no man happy until he's dead" – he hadn't earned a break on his posthumous reputation.

Liliet

Basilia's the only person there. If she doesn't tell anyone, no-one will know.

Also, an entire city full of people NOT being razed by undead KIND OF MATTERS MORE than Leo Tracas's posthumous reputation?

Mental Mouse

Yes, and Below won that round.

Liliet

I am really confused as to your point right now.

Sparsebeard

I can't see things going well for Malicia in the free cities. Nicea falling to alliance aligned forces means that her allies in the region are dwindling.

If anything, undead are bound to rally surviving Niceans to fully join to Grand Alliance... which could shift the balance and have Malicia's other allies in the region reconsider.

Unless Leo was foolish enough to let Malicia bring a Dead Waters level WMD in the city, I can't see the fall of Nicea not being a huge setback for her (and even then, she loses one of her few allies).

caoimhinh

Yeah, and oh boy, they are sooo gonna say this is 100% proof of Leo being a friend of the Dead King. The last of the Trakas is gonna be the most vilified one.

I wonder if the new Strategos will become Basileus.

And this situation kind of has to be a wake-up call for the rest of the Free Cities.

AbraKadabra

Yeah. I am still disappointed that Bellerophon Just left. After all who is bigger tirant Than the dead King, who will use and opress you even beyond thí point of death? The People might reconsider things if they see undead killing and torching in the south.

Gabe

I need books to read for the last leg of the summer. Since I figure that anyone reading the Guide has somewhat decent a taste, forgive me for talking about something other than the chapter here and ask if folks here have any recommendations on which books I should seek out?

I'm decently well read, so maybe skip recommending your Tolkiens, Pratchetts and Sandersons.

Anyway, I appreciate any suggestions and wish you the best.

vernal.ancient

If you want something a bit like Cat's military adventures in earlier books, you could try Codex Alera by Jim Butcher. The battle scenes are fun, the strategies are both impressively audacious and reasonably believable (at least to me, though my knowledge of tactics and strategy comes exclusively from Wikipedia, YouTube, and the occasional history book), and the characters are fun and snarky.

The Kingkiller Chronicles by Patrick Rothfuss is a pretty good read, if you don't mind that the last book of the trilogy has been indefinitely delayed. It's been a while since I read it, and I can't really put my finger on any one thing that I enjoyed, but I found it enjoyable from start to finish. Apparently, the prose is of very high quality if you're knowledgeable about that sort of thing (I'm not, so I can't really tell the difference between it and 'acceptable but basic' prose)

kini

If you want more "soldier's eye view of fantasy ", check out the Tales of the Black Company or Malazan Book of the Fallen

filtern

The Gods are Bastards is a good fantasy web serial. Great characterization, a similarly sprawling cast, and intrigue

Javvies

Mark Alan Edelheit. The Chronicles of an Imperial Legionary Officer series is the main series, and is set a thousand years after Rome lost a legion. Turns out they got transferred to a new world and founded the Malzeelan Empire. But the story of Rome has mostly turned into their creation myth. At any rate, the Imperial Legionary Officer in question is one Captain Bennulius Stiger, and he's about to get unpleasantly surprised by his new assignment.

The Karus Saga series is the story of how that Roman Legion got lost in the first place, and if it continues will probably get to where they found what will become the Malzeelan Empire in a later book.

Javvies

Dammit. Just noticed the error.

It's Marc Alan Edelheit.

Marc with a "c" not Mark with a "k". Fucking autocorrect.

Other authors you may or may not like:

Terry Mancour's Spellmonger series is also entertaining. Not sure when the next book is expected, but with ten books already out (I think of a projected thirty) there should be enough material to keep you reading for a while.

Glynn Stewart – I thought the ONSET series ended a bit abruptly, but IIRC, he cut it shorter than intended because it wasn't popular enough to keep going or something along those lines. ONSET is urban fantasy, as is the Changeling series. Starship's Mage is based on a premise that I haven't seen often – humanity went to the stars, but only because of magic – specially trained Jump Mages are able to teleport starships up to a lightyear at a time. The Martian Protectorate is ruled by the Mage-King of Mars (the first Mage-King used magic to fully terraform the planet) There are eight or nine mainline books, but there's also a side series of currently three books covers some of the events that get foreshadowed in early books and contribute to stuff in later books, but the mainline series main character isn't involved with. Book one is technically a compilation of five shorter stories that were originally released as more of a serial. The Duchy of Terra series – you know how usually in sci fi stories when Earth gets conquered by aliens, we plucky humans figure out a way to throw them off the planet? Yeah, that isn't this story, but on the upside, we got annexed by the terrifying tentacled overlords who are trying to uplift and integrate us as valued and productive members of the Imperium, instead of their religious-imperative slaver neighbors, who are our other neighbors and would happily conquer and enslave us if they had the opportunity. At this point there is a complete sequel trilogy and a subsequent sequel trilogy has been started.

He's also recently started a new series, I think it's called Teer and Kard, book one is Wardtown ... I'm not entirely sure what genre to call it ... there's magic, but also sixshooters, repeating rifles, and a major Wild West vibe (at least in the starting region), but it very definitely used to be a fantasy world, only in this one the probable elf-equivalents invented gunpowder, the steam engine (probably), and landed on the continent where events are set in iron ships.

Jonathan Moeller ... his stuff tends to be a faster read for me, but since he writes insanely fast, you usually aren't waiting too long for the next book, but the next book he puts out is usually in a different series, as he usually has three or four active series going simultaneously. Frostborn/Sevenfold Sword/Dragontiarna are high fantasy, and could be considered arcs of a single series.

Ghost/Ghost Exile/Ghost Night are a different high fantasy setting and are also basically arcs of a single series. Demonsouled is also high fantasy and has a completed sequel trilogy and a started subsequent sequel series. The Silent Order series, starting with Iron Hand, are science fiction.

The Cloak Games/Cloak Mage series are mostly urban fantasy, but there are some classic high fantasy elements ... but it's three hundred years after the Conquest of Earth (and humanity) by the Elven High Queen, the Elven homeworld has spent as long in the hands of elves who successfully rebelled against the High Queen and continually attack Earth.

Evan Currie ... I enjoy his works ... but sometimes the waiting for the next one in a given series takes a while.

The On Silver Wings series has eight books, it's sci fi.

Odyssey One is sci fi and has seven or eight? Books, I think, plus two parallel spinoff series.

The Superhuman series is a near future Earth ... and genetically engineered superpowers (plus increased aggression) are the weapon of choice by an alien AI probe to exterminate all life on planet Earth.

hue hue

Okay, I am a simple man who easy to impress, thus this is not a serious read list but ALL those make my monkey brain happy:

– The experimental logs of the crazy lich. A comedy web novel with some things taken from D&D and chinese novels. It's pretty fun to read, has memorable cast, but each arc has at least one scene where the silly aspect goes to zero and made my eye water a bit (again, I am a simple man easily impressed)

-The girl who bore the flame ring & The girl who ate a death god. Both novels are from a series about girls in different parts of the continent greatly changing the politics. Simple read like If the first book of the Guide was a one shot

-The lazy king. A demon of Sloth gets powerful as fuck, but he is also lazy as fuck. We mostly see his surroundings and how others demons react to him and the holy war incoming

-No game no Life. My guilty pleasure this one. What the first anime episode, If you liked I recommend checking the novel

Rey d`Tutto

From my "read &/or reading" list.

PGtE. You are Here.

Somebody mentioned "the Gods are Bastards." Good fantasy with a modern feel.

The Legend of Randidly Ghosthound. Chapter 1278 is the most recent release on this webnovel.

Jim Butchers' Dresden Files. Modern fantasy. Cannot recommend highly enough. Dead Beat features "Sue", the Chicago T-Rex. Asimov, Herbert, (Heinlein), Greg Bear, Niven, Robert Asprin, & Hambone1330

The last has a monthly HFY webserial in as hard Sci-fi as HFY gets @

<https://deathworlders.com>

I could recommend more, but that's a few hundred hours. Get some sun.

Really. Go outside. Vitamin D is a thing. Make some. I'm near Seattle. Supplements suck.

Rey d`Tutto

Also <https://www.royalroad.com/fiction/26294/he-who-fights-with-monsters>

But really. Get Sunlight while you can.

Miles

Worm by John C McCrae (parahumans.net)

Also check the recommendations threads on /r/rational if you're into the practical aspects of this story

Topwebfiction.com if you're into the superpower fantasy aspect

Mental Mouse

If you haven't read All Night Laundry, you can do that now. It's a web serial which recently wrapped up its main story (2400+ daily installments with graphics and text!) and is now waiting on the epilogues. We've been waiting a while, but trying not to noodge the author, because he Iron-Manned ANL for most of 7 years, and he deserves a break.

It is not at all like Guide – it started out as interactive, but the author eventually had to tone that down (and eventually cut it off) so he could actually finish the damn thing. Follows our protagonist from "dammit, I'm out of laundry and have a double shift tomorrow", through "I hate time travel!" to "we are going to kill a god", and on to... well, I don't want to spoil the ending, but it's glorious.

Frivolous

I wonder how much money Malicia still has. Praes is supposed to be rich, but all these bribes must be costing the Dread Empire something.

Sepulchral certainly isn't paying taxes or tribute to Malicia. Plus Praes isn't getting taxes from the cities destroyed by the Ashuran navy and Masego, that time he swallowed the souls of an entire city.

Javvies

And Foramen is under goblin control.

It's a good question.

I suspect that she's probably running a deficit, but I also suspect that the Praesi treasury has numerous well filled vaults that Malicia can draw on.

Although, it probably actually depends on who controls which mines. Remember, Praes has gold and various gemstones as exploitable natural resources. That's something that is definitely useful, at least for a while.

Morgenstern

... aaaand there's a "Next" link on chapter 42 leading to chapter 43 – but in this Interlude, the "Previous" link leads back to 42 instead of 43. Really strange.

Morgenstern

Hm.. where did my last comment go? Before this one, there should be a "Chapter 43 does not show up in the chapter overview" comment. 😊

Morgenstern

Funnily enough, now the "Previous" link DOES actually lead to back to chapter 43 (instead of chapter 42, which it lead back to when I started posting this). How the hell did that get fixed in the seconds I've been typing this? =P

Chapter 44: Cliff

*"I am only seen when blind
And dawn always kills me
My omens can be divined
But my gifts are all empty."
– Taghreb riddle*

Neustal had been little more than a tower by the road, once upon a time.

It had since become the end of the grounds held by the living in the war for Hainaut, that little crumbling watchtower raised into a stout keep by the sappers of the Army of Callow. From it the fortifications of the Grand Alliance spread out like spiderweb, filled with steel and people and wood. Hainaut was too large for a wall to be raised across its entire lowlands, at least by human hands, but we'd done the next best thing: a series of trenches to defend in depth, as deep as we could dig them. The defensive line was not straight, no single stroke of the quill on a map, but instead just as chaotic as a coastline. The trenches bent and twisted to reach fortifications already standing or avoid swamps, or hard stone or hills.

Even if we'd raised a wall across all this land, we wouldn't have been able to defend it. It'd simply too long to be manned with the numbers we'd need to turn back a proper attack by the dead, our forces spread thin where Keter would concentrate as will. Instead we had the trenches and the knots, the strongholds along the line where troops were massed and kept vigilant. Patrolling along the desolate length of the trenches companies went with carts carrying along an ingenious Lycaonese invention, what they called the holzburgen: the parts of a small wooden fortress made easy to assemble with nothing more than nails and sweat, cleverly using the carts themselves as walls.

When too badly outnumbered by raiding undead the patrols would fort up and send up signals should scrying be scrambled, bringing in the second line of defence. Further south, along scrying relays, we had established large mobile reserves that could be mobilized without prior warning. Each counted a vanguard of horsemen and kept several mages capable of opening a gate into the Twilight Ways, which meant most of the time our people arrived in time to relieve the patrolmen. We rotated which soldiers were assigned to the reserve as well as the location of said reserves, lest the Dead King be able to map out our ability to respond to his attacks.

The reserves had been half-emptied when I'd had to hastily assemble an army to deal with the undead plague that'd emerged behind us, but they had since been filled anew. Not for long, though. We would be moving into the lands held by the dead, soon, and to get the knockout blow we wanted we would need as many soldiers as we could field. Already many were here, and the stronghold splayed out below felt like a living, breathing creature: a great beast of old with a thousand hands and feet, twisting and turning and bleeding out fires from its skin.

As the wind passed through my hair, I let the thoughts pass through me. Neustal's roof was lead, and sharply angled so that rain would slide off, but there was just enough room for someone to stand at the edge of the ledge. It'd rained the night before, and the tiles were still slippery, but my footing was sure. It was not my first time standing here.

The moon was nearly full and glaring down at us all through the cover of dark clouds, and there was a cloying humidity to the air that told me more rain was coming. It was enough to frizzle my hair as it was blown forward in strands – the wind was at my back – and have sweat bead the back of my neck. The sensation was not unpleasant, feeling the wind flow around the Mantle of Woe as I closed my eyes and slowly breathed in and out. Try as I might, I could not reach it again: that elusive moment in the Arsenal when my Name had stirred awake, when I'd felt my hold friend bare his fangs again. I suddenly opened my eye. My ears did not tell me she was here, though they did not need to: we were bound by something altogether more intimate.

I said nothing, only taking in the sight of the dark plain and the shifting moonlight that stretched out beyond the bustling walls of the stronghold. Eerie as they were, the lowlands of Hainaut were beautiful to behold.

"It is a strange habit you've picked up of late, dear heart," Akua Sahelian said.

"Is it?" I softly laughed. "I've had stranger, I assure you."

The shade stood at my side, undaunted by the heights. They weren't something that could kill either of us, although... I put my weight in my good foot the slightest bet, felt the tile begin to slip, and my stomach tightened. And in that moment before the drop, in that instinctive fear that was ingrained in our hindbrain, I felt like I could almost touch my Name. Almost.

"You told me you feared heights, once," Akua said.

"I did," I acknowledged.

"Yet you confronted that fear," she said. "Mastered it."

"Mastery is a bold claim," I smiled into the dark.

I'd stood on the edge of the orphanage's roof, night after night, until I could stand through the trembling. Until I no longer felt like throwing up. And I'd beaten back the fear, eventually. And yet even after all these years, in that blind moment before the drop, still my stomach clenched. No, mastery was much too bold a claim.

"A strange habit, and a strange mood to match it," Akua softly said. "I do wonder, Catherine, what fear it is that brings you to the ledge this time?"

I did love it, against my better judgement, that sometimes she just got it without needing to be told a single thing. I hated it as well, of course. It was like being naked, and while I was not shy about my skin my thoughts were a different matter. I'd been warned not to let Akua in, of course. Not to let her slither into my inner circle, else I find I had made a nest of my bones for this most beautiful of snakes. It was too late for that now, though. I'd already made my choice as to how this would end, and there would be no turning back. Too many prices had already been paid.

"I've been having this dream," I idly said, closing my eyes.

I extended my arms to the sides, like a Levantine ropewalker preparing to cross above the pit, and without a sound found that the shade had moved out of the way.

"I always stand on the edge," I said. "But it's rarely the same. Sometimes it's that roof from when I was a girl, but more often something else."

My arms had opened my cloak and so the wind traced slow fingers against the hem, setting it aflutter.

"It's been that glacier at the heart of the Fields of Wend, with the dark waters below," I said. "It's been that drop into the tunnel to Liesse, during the Doom. The walls of Keter. The end of the Laure docks, on a moonless night. There's always a drop, and darkness below."

I was awake. My eyes were closed, but I was awake.

"Then how do you know you're not asleep, right now?" she murmured into my ear.

The hair on the back of my neck raised. I smiled, slowly breathed out and opened my eyes. I leaned forward, arms still extended, and risked the edge of the ledge. My stomach clenched with that familiar streak of ice, but still there I stood.

"In the dream," I confessed, "I always fall."

My feet grew numb as lead, and down into the dark I went. And never did a scream leave my throat as I tumbled into the quiet stillness, the cool peace of utter night.

"Not tonight, then," Akua murmured.

Damn her, I fondly thought, for understanding every part of it. She was standing at my side, now that I'd brought back my arms to my chest, pretending she had never gone behind me and spoken into my ear just the way she used to when she was still but a spirit bound to the Mantle. We both knew otherwise, but we left that truth untouched.

"Not tonight," I agreed.

Tonight my feet did not slip. My leg throbbed with pain but still I looked up at the half-veiled moon, breathing out. In and out, calm. My Name did not stir, though it felt frustratingly close.

"There is a place outside the walls of Wolof," Akua eventually said, "where old stone were raised in a circle for some long-forgotten ritual. Water flows beneath the earth, so great clusters of Wasaliti lilies – purple and pale – grow there among the grass."

She looked out into the night, faintly smiling.

"When the moon is at its highest," she said, "you can lie among the lilies and grass like a bed, and the shadows they cast look like the great ribs of a giant."

I studied her for a long moment.

"It's not a place of power," I said.

"No," she quietly said. "I found it, as a child, and shared it with no one. I have not been there in many years."

A secret for a secret, I grasped. Had she known I'd spoken to no one else of the dreams, or simply suspected? No matter. A secret for a secret, I thought once more. It sounded like the way a Praesi would think of... well, that word was best left out of this. Too dangerous for all sorts of reasons, the least of which the stories it brought with it. The silence we kept clung heavy to the air, carrying with it an offer. She had made it to me before, though rarely in too explicit a manner, but it'd been a while since I'd been genuinely tempted. Killian had taught me to value trust over the press of flesh, bittersweet as the lesson had been to learn. If I turned my head to meet Akua's eyes, it would be accepting the offer. Falling off the ledge, just a little bit.

I leaned forward. The fear came, and I did not fall.

"We are who we are," I said without turning.

I was many things but a Callowan most of all, and she was the Doom of Liesse. Forgiveness was not the stuff my bones were made of, and a hundred thousand souls were still waiting for their long price.

"So we are," Akua Sahelian agreed.

Her tone I could not read. Disappointment? Frustration? Even long gone from the Wasteland, she was still a daughter from that circle of Creation's finest liars.

"Why did you come?" I asked.

Safer grounds. Like a slap on a butterfly, my words tore through the last remnants of what had been hanging in the air.

"One of the patrols came back mauled," she said.

I cocked a brow. Hardly unusual. Keter had gotten bolder in prodding out defences over the last month – the Iron Prince believed we were being tested to see if we were building up to an offensive, and I tended to agree – so it was not the first time blood ended up on the ground. We'd already begun to raise the numbers on the patrols, it was a good way to blood our conscripts before the looming battles.

"Razin Tanja was on one of them," Akua said.

Not wounded, I decided, or she would have told me immediately.

"Hard losses?" I asked.

"Near half," she said. "The dead got to them before they put together their wooden fortress."

"It shook him," I said.

"So Adjutant's watchful eyes reported," Akua agreed. "I believed it might be of interest to you."

"You were right," I said, taking a last look down.

Not tonight, I thought. There would be a night, sooner or later. Everyone got one. But it would not be tonight.

We'd see about tomorrow.

—

The Lord of Malaga was in his quarters, they told me.

We'd held Neustal long enough that what had once been a sea of tents with palisades had become closer to a fortress-camp, barracks being raised in stone and timber while smaller houses were raised in a sort of separate officer's district. In those muddy 'streets' nobles and career soldiers from places spanning half of Calernia were made to rub elbows, which had been fascinating to watch when it didn't end up involving loud arguments. It would have been an exaggeration to say that the timber house where Razin Tanja lived was part of a 'Levantine quarter' within the district, I reflected, but not a claim entirely without foundation.

For practical reasons – being able to find officers easily, ease of supply and security – we'd gone along with the natural tendency of people to stick to their own, so it was no surprise that warriors in the colours of the Binder and Slayer's Bloods were all over the street when I limped my way to Lord Razin's abode. A Binder asked me to present my wrist before I was allowed in, so that she might ascertain I truly was who I appeared to be. The Levantine mages might be rubbish at illusions, but Binders dealt with blood from the moment they began in their trade: what flowed through my veins was proof enough of my identity, as far as they were concerned.

I was not announced in, though neither did I catch the young lord by surprise. I'd half-wondered if he would be drunk by the time I arrived, but he didn't look it – morose, sure, but then I'd be the same if I'd had to watch half my patrol get butchered by undead. He was seated and did not rise when I entered, though he offered a nod.

"Black Queen," Razin of the Binder's Blood greeted me.

"Lord Razin," I replied, brow pulling into a frown.

He was bruised on the cheek, a purple shiner crusting around the edges. It made him look younger, and more beaten down than one of the five most powerful nobles in Levant should ever feel.

"Did your watchers not mention I am unharmed?" he drily asked.

"Not wounded is what I got," I admitted without batting an eye. "Though that hit on your face will het nasty if you don't attend to it."

"It has been cleaned," he dismissed.

"You have healers," I pointed out.

And even if somehow none of the Dominions could be stirred to heal one of the head of the greatest lineages of the Blood, he could have borrowed some from another army. The aristocrat smiled bleakly at me, and I was once more reminded of how few battles he'd seen before our first meeting in Iserre. There'd been an arrogance in him then that'd been cut down to size since, I thought, though the remnants of it lingered. Funny things, people. So fragile in so many ways, and yet even the starkest of lessons found it difficult to change what lay at the heart of us. Like hardy weeds in a garden, the worst of us was often the most deeply entrenched.

"I am aware, Your Majesty," he said. "This is a choice. The bruise will fade, but the ache will be... a useful reminder."

I wanted to chide him for that indulgence, but how could I when my leg still ached from standing atop the keep? Hypocrisy and I were not unacquainted, but I tried not to seek her company. I claimed a seat at his table, since it was clear he was not going to invite me, and it was telling that a tired grunt was the most objection he was able to muster.

"What happened?" I asked.

"That poor orc you strapped to a wheelchair will have the report by now," he acidly replied.

He probably would. Hakram was doing his best to replace his missing limbs with those of a hundred busy attendants, and Hakram's best tended to see things through.

"And I'll read it," I said. "But that's not what I'm asking. What happened, Tanja?"

The young lord looked aside. Not to a window, for we had not made those – too dangerous, given the risks of infiltration – but to a tapestry-covered wall. It was a while before he answered me, voice exhausted and raw.

"We didn't see them until it was too late," the Lord of Malaga said. "The skeletons were far and slow, so we took our time. Even considered duels."

My brow rose. He knew I disapproved of those.

"My cousin Alis was with us, fresh from home," Razin said. "We were close, as children."

His fingers tightened, almost imperceptibly.

"She is also without the Talent."

A sting that'd followed him all his life, I knew, as the descendant of the most famous mage lineage in Levant. Blood were raised to try to emulate their ancestors in all things, so that they too might prove worthy of the same Bestowal. It would have been hard on a youth, understanding that even if he did everything right an accident of birth meant he'd never be fully able to live up to his legacy. Someone sharing that hardship would have been a dear friend.

"One of our riders saw our line's colours on the armour of one of the skeletons," he said. "Enamelled scale. The pattern was an old one but undeniably Tanja, One of our own, snatched up during some crusade and now fielded as a footsoldier!"

His smile spread, and grew bleaker.

"Alis has – had – no deeds to her name, Black Queen," Razin Tanja told me. "Levant is united against Keter, our people no longer fight honour wars. She lost her finest warring years in obscurity. And so I thought I could do this for her, give her..."

"A duel that'd make her reputation," I quietly finished.

To Blood, honour and reputation often mattered more than gold. A grand gift for an old friend.

"The skeletons were barely more numerous than us," Razin said, "and they would not have engaged wooden walls. I delayed to bait them, sent out our horse to take the flanks at a distance to prevent them from retreating when they got close."

"It was a trap," I said.

"Ghouls had burrowed beneath the earth," the Lord of Malaga said. "So when the skeletons were close and we began to make the walls, they rose in ambush."

I let out a long breath. Shit. Yeah, that was classic Keteran tactics. The ghouls would have done some damage, surprising the Levantines like that, but there couldn't have been too many of them or the digging would have been easy to notice. No, they'd been a unit sacrificed to prevent the holzberg from being raised before the skeletons closed the distance. With numbers like that, the dead had never been going to win the skirmish. The Dead King had just traded corpses for corpses, knowing he could afford to bury us one patrol at a time. Rough night, going through that. Especially if it got your favourite cousin killed, which by the look on his face I was guessing it had.

"Alis?" I asked.

"She died after having slain three ghouls single-handedly," Razin said. "Her deed was deemed worthy of being added to the Rolls."

I remained silent. I'd not known her, so even commiserating with his loss seemed like a lie.

"Go on," Razin bitterly said. "Have you not warned us again and again that there is no honour to be found in this war, Catherine Foundling? That our ways are that of fools, when kept to in the shadow of the Crown of the Dead, and that we must discard them or suffer loss."

His teeth gritted.

"As I have," he said. "As I might again."

I could have excused him, I thought, spoken of good intentions and everyone making mistakes. But I was not his mother, or his friend, and what he had done should not be excused. So instead I leaned back into my chair and sighed.

"I was sixteen," I quietly said, "the first time I made a decision that got people killed."

His stiffened, dark eyes narrowing in on me.

"I'd killed before," I noted. "But this was different. I didn't swing a blade at them, it was just... consequences."

"What happened?" Razin Tanja rasped out.

"I spared a man," I said. "Not out of mercy, but because I needed him to escape and cause great troubles. It's not only your people who make their reputations by putting down lions on the loose, Razin. I spared him when I could have taken his life, and because of that people died."

I half-smiled.

"It could be said they hanged because they chose to scheme rebellion," I said. "Or that they hanged because the Carrion Lord ordered they would. The choice I made wasn't the only one that led us there."

I traced the wooden surface with my fingers.

"But when I was made to look at those corpses hanging from the gallows," I said, "I knew it was on me. That the decision I'd made had its hooks in all the others, that maybe I wasn't guilty but that I was at least responsible."

God, there'd been a barmaid who'd flirted with me. The look in her eyes, before the drop... For the life of me I could not remember her name, and it made me feel oddly ashamed.

"So what did you do, after?" the Lord of Malaga asked.

I'd wept, that was the truth of it. Wept in an alley where no one would see me, afraid and alone and a long way from home. And in the weeks that'd followed I'd come close to abandoning my path, until my confrontation with Akua had the Blessed Isle granted me... perspective of a kind.

"There is not panacea to this, Razin," I told him. "You grow number to the losses, eventually, but it never entirely goes away."

"Some wisdom, this," the younger man scoffed.

"Remember tonight," I told him quietly. "Beyond the bruise. Remember the mistake, how it felt as it rippled out into the world and took something dear from you. And use that to never make the same mistake again, Razin."

His jaw set, and slowly he nodded.

"There will be other mistakes," I said. "Other defeats. Own them too, Razin Tanja, use them to rise – or you'll be mourning a great deal more than a cousin."

He chuckled, though the sound was mirthless.

"The more I gain, Black Queen, the more I am afraid," he said. "What was there to fear losing, when I had nothing?"

You and me both, kid, I thought. Yet I had said all that I had to say, and if there was someone who would ease his grief it was not me. The most kindness I could offer was to leave and make room for them to step into the space I was occupying. I rose to my feet, feeling my leg throb and offered him a nod. He did not object to my departure.

"Black Queen," Razin of the Binder's Blood said, sending me off with a sharp nod.

I hesitated, fingers lingering against the table.

"I'm sorry for your loss," I finally said.

The silence followed me out.

—

Hakram's people found me before I'd even made it out of the officer district, before my feet had found a destination – I felt too restless for sleep, even this late – and the news were whispered directly into my ear. I thanked the messenger absent-mindedly, my thoughts already racing ahead of me. Finally. It was about time he arrived. That they'd not caught sight of him before he was already deep in the stronghold was not unexpected, if hardly pleasant to hear, but his destination at least was predictable. It was always the first part of any camp he visited, unless prior demands on his time had been made. Night settled on me as a veil as I limped out, not to make me invisible to eyes but to mask my presence.

It was a weave taught to me by Andronike herself, a use of Night inspired by a spell that'd once been a favourite of the Twilight Sages: I would be seen as unremarkable, and details of me would be difficult to remember. Adjutant had called it a poor man's Scribe, which had the benefit of being both amusing and pretty accurate. In the soldierly parts of the stronghold I would not have bothered, for my face – or more accurately my mantle and staff – was a key that opened gates and lowered wards. But no stronghold as large as Neustal, whose span occupied several tortured miles, could be filled entirely by soldiers. We had cooks, launderers, sutlers and peddlers.

A few brothels as well, though after a few incidents where laundresses were harassed by soldiers we'd confined them all to a particular district. That way there could be no confusion as to what services were by offered by whom, and there would be no qualms about flogging anyone who didn't understand what 'no' meant.

The Legions of Terror and the Army of Callow both forbade camp followers, which these people effectively were, as they slowed marches and drained as much resources as they provided. Here it would have been a fool's errand to try the same, though, considering Proceran armies had them in spades. I'd first believed the Lycaonese didn't, but it turned out they just armed them like they did essentially everyone they could afford to. These helfer and helferin only fought under specific circumstances, and otherwise essentially served the same purposes. The Levantines had brought few aside from warriors up north, but their rank and file had been eager enough to partake of the creature comforts.

If the civilians were to stay then there could be no question of them staying outside the walls where they might would be vulnerable to raids by the dead, so Neustal had whelped civilian quarters to stash them away in. It was towards these I headed, limp and all. In particular towards the long loghouse that was the busiest brothel in the stronghold, though I did not take the entrance a patron would. I went to the back, and slipped past the hired toughs guarding the entrance. The man who was arguably the most famous hero of our age was smiling and laughing with the brothel girls and boys as he deftly wove Light to heal their pains and sicknesses.

The Grey Pilgrim looked utterly at ease around them, and more surprisingly they around him. I'd started near enough the bottom of the ladder to know that just because some smiling highborn was comfortable around you didn't mean the feeling was reciprocated. Peregrine was the name they used for him, so they knew who he was, but for all that they did not seem intimidated. And they really had no reason to be, didn't they? Unlike kings and Named, they were not of that small slice of the world that Tariq Fleetfoot kept a wary eye on. They really did have nothing to fear from him.

Not unless their deaths would prevent a greater evil, anyway.

I waited until he was done. Unlike soldiers, these people wouldn't have the benefits of priests and mages to call on for healing – not by right, anyway. If the Pilgrim wanted to do a little good here, far be it from me to stand in his way. The night was long, and I was not yet tired. They pressed a cup of wine on him before he left, which he only half-drunk, and when the Peregrine wandered back onto the streets I was but a step behind him. There was no question that he had not known of my presence, for even if he'd somehow missed the Ophanim would not have. He did not turn or look at me, but something in his bearing acknowledged my presence.

"There are others in need of healing," Tariq said.

"There's always people in need of healing," I replied. "Hurt is tireless."

"Too often it is those who offer comfort, north of Levant," he said. "It is shameful how the occupation is treated by some."

"We're not targeting the brothels, Pilgrim," I sharply said. "Or even civilians. But I won't assign healers to these districts that would instead be with patrols or manning our infirmaries."

We already had too few, be they priests or mages. I'd not forbid any volunteering their hours, so long as it did not result in exhaustion, but I'd not command the death of soldiers fighting Keter to accommodate people who'd come here knowing this was a war front. We were a stronghold, not a town. I was not unreasonable for denying something they had no right to ask for.

"Then do not deny me my works, Catherine," the Peregrine replied. "If I can allay suffering, I will."

"No lack of that going around, these days," I grunted.

"Denial or suffering?" he asked.

"No danger of either running out, I reckon," I shrugged. "But they're not why I sought you out. We're overdue a talk."

He cast a searching look on me, and I was unsurprised to realize that my veils of Night were nothing more than puffs of smoke to those eyes.

"You have held to your word when it comes to young Razin and Aquiline," he said. "I take it you now want them removed from your care."

"That'd be nice," I said. "Though on occasion they forget to be a pain in my ass, so I don't mind lending the equally occasional hand."

"Headstrong youths can be troublesome, it is true," the Peregrine said.

I eyed him, almost amused. How many decades had it taken him to get the art down of saying something like that without even the faintest hint of irony?

"So I've heard," I said. "But your headstrong lordlings aren't why I'm here."

"Ah," the old man calmly said. "It's to be that talk, is it?"

"Yeah," I grimly replied, baring my teeth. "Let's talk about the Wandering Bard, Tariq."

caoimhinh

I just wanna point out that I feel tricked that today's chapter is not called Interlude: Flow.

Well played, EE, well played.

ruduen

Anybody want to place bets on if it's going to come within the next couple of chapters, or if it's going to be a long enough gap that we forget about Ebb before it comes?

alele

Wouldn't even be the first time it happened.

Miles

You know what else isn't the first time? When reading the intro quote I thought this would make a great Votey, but I couldn't think of a good set of attributes so the riddle answer would be "a vote."

My last hope is to leave this link here so I ctry to read the chapter without being distracted by every line.

Ok I admit I fibbed a bit: this hasn't happened to me before, I'm just pretty new at making these.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

ctry is what you get when both the n and the space get fatfingered into the backspace key.

Now go vote already so I can stop telling embarrassing stories about myself in public for your enjoyment.

Salt

Should be hanger, because that's what every chapter ends on

WuseMajor

I give even odds the next chapter will be Hanger or Flow.

Well, or they'll be slotted in near the climax of this part.

boballab

Or it can be Tide as in Ebb Tide, that period of time between High and Low Tide as the water flows out.

shikkarasu

10 Denari that Flow is in the double update on the 4th. A further 5 that it reveals some plot that has been brewing behind the scenes for a book and three quarters.

vernal.ancient

Nah, the next three chapters or so will all be the first half of a well-known word or phrase, then the chapters will finally start completing the names in the reverse order from when they were introduced 😊

Javvies

This talk about the Wandering Bard with Tariq is due. Possibly overdue, considering he's the one who swore Bard wouldn't be a problem.

It may also be a discussion that should involve others. But maybe they can be brought in later, depending on how things go.

On the other hand, there's a lot of egg on Tariq's face over Bard.

Although, since it's Tariq, I'm half expecting him to try to come up with some sort of justification and/or excuse for Bard. And possibly the other Heroes involved in her plots. Not sure if he's had the "pleasure" of being introduced to and getting to know Mirror Knight yet.

Pethrai D'arkos

Except he had. They were both at the Battle of the Camps. Granted we don't really get a sense of how much they interacted and Mirror Knight came off as less knight templar-y back then but still; good judgement backed by the Ophanim should have provided him with a reasonable idea of what to expect.

JJR

Ophanim aren't the Judgment choir though, they are mere seers.

Eleron M Pfoutz

I think they meant personal judgement, not the Choir. But I suspect Peregrine will certainly temper Christophe's stupid willingly.

TeK

I think "headstrong youth" just about explains Mirror Knight to Tariq. And to me, if we're being honest.

Pethrai D'arkos

Sure, it's a known heroic archetype and a damn good one when it comes to monster slaying or smashing flying fortresses. The problem is that it doesn't work here. He incited a brawl among Heroes that almost got one of them killed, has taken a pretty heavy swing at the foundations of Calernia's first long term international coalition, and I'll be damned if there hasn't been at least one case of his coursing after a flashy target leaving entire companies to get slaughtered because he was out of position.

ethericsentinel

Perhaps for Interlude: Flow we'll need to wait until just after Chapter XX: Hanger.

danh3107

The riddle's answer is stars, if anyone was curious.

onedollargum

I was thinking "darkness" myself.

hakureireimu

Dreams makes more sense.

TeK

What about "only seen when blind"? I thought it was darkness or somesuch.

Decius

I thought it was "I am seen only when I am blind" not "I am seen only by those who are blind"
Omens make me think of a comet or planet.

TeK

Oh comet, devil's kith and kin...

Vortex

I think darkness, oblivion, or night make more sense. The last line does not make sense with stars. At least stars give light.

Zggt

Huh, I went with the moon, since as opposed to stars, it only reflects the light of the sun; which, without an atmosphere is blinding, also playing into the "face" of it.

Rob

Pretty sure it's a Dream. Like you know, the dreams Cat is talking about in the chapter?

Ninestrings

Tariq just chilling in the brothel healing people and talking shit is pretty up there on the wholesome scale.

Dude's just got chronic dadfriend syndrome.

LizAris

It—it's a chapter!? What is this??? I feel robbed. EE you totally did this on purpose.

Not that I will complain about more Cat! More Cat is always welcome. As is Cat giving advice. Was kind of expecting something like this to happen to Razin given what we've seen of his approach to the undead. Also, the more tidbits we get on the Lycaonese the more I love them. Free swords for everyone.

I've also been waiting to see Pilgrim, and will be excited to hear what he has to say. Although the real fascinating interaction this chapter was with Akua, who steals the show more often than not...Cat will have to wield the power of not-friendship very carefully. I'm also starting to wonder what reins Akua in if she does decide to get back-stabby...she's pretty powerful and independent now, so I will just have to keep hoping for the completion of this redemption arc. I'm nearly positive Akua has some idea now of how Cat used to memory-wipe her in the Everdark. Wonder if she's ever resented that? Does Cat have any (albeit smaller) measures like that still in place?

TeK

I honestly can imagine Aqua resenting Cat for memory-wiping her. Admire, if anything.

TeK

Can't*

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Akua*

Frivolous

I don't remember Cat ever wiping Akua's memory, in the Underdark or not. Could someone please link me to the relevant chapters or interludes?

lauatagan

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/22/chapter-66-tremors/>

Search for the word "Marker", Cat deleted the conversation from Akua's memory.

Frivolous

Thank you, lauatagan.

KageLupus

Cat doesn't have any protections against Akua turning on her, which is itself all the protection she needs. You can't half-ass being a friend to someone, especially a Praesi noble trained in intrigue from birth.

Cat showed Akua what she could have had if it weren't for her entire upbringing. The friendship, the camaraderie, without any of the hidden meanings or long cons or anything else she was used to. It does double duty as both carrot and stick. Akua wants to keep that feeling, but it is also a constant reminder that she is the Doom of Liesse and that can't ever be fully forgiven. At this point Akua is as likely to turn on Cat as Vivienne or Archer.

Juff

Typo Thread:

simply too long > simply be too long concentrate as will > concentrate at will hold friend > old friend slightest bet > slightest bit claim," I > claim." I old stone were > old stones were gone from > gone from out defences > our defences patrols, it > patrols; it het nasty > get nasty Dominions > Dominion's

His stiffened > He stiffened Akua had the Blessed Isle > Akua at the Blessed Isle had not panacea > no panacea news were > news was were laundresses > where laundresses by offered by > offered by might would > would reckon," I > reckon." I

thearpox23

I'm starting to get worried about Black. Erra's silence is rarely without meaning.

letouriste

i think this is because he is staying voluntarily in the background. I'm not worried anyway, He has Ranger with him. He is probably the happiest he ever been

masterofbones

Maybe he's under the protection of uhhh.... what's their name? Something about writing I think. But they like Black.

thearpox23

Scribe left the party. Black's with Ranger, who as powerhouses go, is the best you can get on the continent.

It's just that the novel's not so simple as counting the powerlevels, and Erra is good at plot twists.

dadycool

Oh, boy. A Precipice! I can't wait for someone to toss her off a cliff and turn away, trusting the fall to kill her. Bonus points if they cut off her head again.

Komplode

If I could pop into the future, the rest of this story isn't the first thing I'd use that power for, but it's definitely up there (along with The Wondering Inn) in the heavy temptations section, I suppose that's partly why I enjoy it so much, the relief from the agonising wait for the next chapter/book, which is momentarily satiated before it begins again.

Komplode

I wonder if the Wandering Bard isn't unaligned simply because she outlived the social constraints of her society dictating her alignment, and over the centuries as she's collected more and more stories her role has become more and more nebulous thereby freeing her actions in some ways but also constructing them in others, ie only interacting with the named

James Felling

I always saw the Wandering Bard as the one neutral in the game. Not of Light or of Darkness, just a sort of referee there to make sure the rules are followed and to prevent things getting too far out of balance. She and the Dead King are opponents because he is a rules lawyer who is breaking the balance toward one side. She does not like what Cat is doing because she is taking the eternal conflict and nullifying it. I don't think she really has a choice in the matter.

Rey d`Tutto

Autocorrect is not your friend. Or mine, or his, hers, or the rest of them. Cat ain't nullifying the game, she's altered the playing field and rulebook.
Name BS has been muzzled, not killed or exiled.

Burlyraven

I do wonder about the imagery being used in this chapter. Standing on the edge seems pretty simple, and something of a pattern with Cat's power ups, but the fact that it's a fall into an abyss is worrying.

If the dark abyss is meant to be the pool of Night, and the dreams are about Cat embracing her role as High Priestess of Night in full (and possibly making Night worship a true opposite to the house of Light), that's fine, as far as fine can extend to high villainy. On the other hand, the fall could be Cat fully letting go of her heroic tendencies (her fear of heights being a metaphor for the last of her old humanity; a concept reinforced by the fact that her Name holding off for another night is followed by a very human and empathetic moment) and fully diving into the power of Below.

I could be wildly off, but the fact that Akua was present (and in a very seductive role) is very concerning, even with the presumption that Akua is still trying something akin to a redemption arc.

Salt

I think it's a quite literal fear, rather than the fear representing something.

Really I think the biggest fear that she's learned to tolerate but not really face and overcome is the fear that there won't be a payoff at the end. The war a loss, the Accords a failure, no lasting peace, and no "better world". The Evils were always just a means to an end, and if the promised end doesn't exist, then Cat is left with nothing at all.

I think it fits, because the last time she had anything resembling a Name at all was second Liesse. Her single biggest failure that really jarred her out of the thing that, as Black mentioned in the very first chapter, makes Named a Named. "The belief, deep down, that they know what is right and that they'll see it done."

It set a fear in her that maybe what she wasn't correct, if this was the result. A stake made of a hundred thousand lives, pushed further in by almost making another MONUMENTAL mistake right afterwards – if after all that she still nearly made the mistake of allowing the Liesse-weapon to be kept around, then how much was her judgement really worth?

Honestly though, for all that the metaphor is pretty and melodramatic, I think the dreams where she always falls mean shit for all, and that's the entire point of the riddle at the start. Sure she could glean some omens or "hidden truth" from her dreams, but those gifts are all empty. It's not some vision of an unavoidable fate written in the stars, it's just her old trauma and self doubt talking.

The fear is useful though. She should let herself feel it, rather than trying to suppress it or ignore it. Embrace it, overcome it, make it hers. Once that fear really is mastered that way, and she once again has the ironclad belief that she knows what is right and has the will to see it done, the Name will follow naturally.

Frivolous

An interesting worry. I don't see that at all.

My own nerve-wracking hypothesis is that the Cliff of the title refers to the fact that heroes will always survive a fall off one.

Which is to say, Cat may receive a hero's Name, and become obliged to Above and Hanno.

I don't know what will happen if the Black Queen, representative for villains and First Under the Night, becomes a hero. Will Sve Noc reject her then? What does it mean when someone can call upon both Night and Light?

Cat's Name could be Queen of Light and Darkness.

Eleron M Pfoutz

Queen of Twilight.

WuseMajor

"It's time we had The Talk Tariq."

"Very well. When two people love each other very much, or come to a suitable price..."

vernal.ancient

"Or are just trying to unwind after a stressful hunt, or..."

Eleron M Pfoutz

"...Or have a very tense swordfight in a nearly empty arena..."

Pethrai D'arkos

...have more feelings for a goat than society thinks they should, or...

Komplode

Does anyone think that Cats next Name will be more unaligned rather than 'evil' maybe some variant of neutral, probably chaotic based on the way she messes with peoples 'stories'

JJR

She's messed with the underlying narrative structure if the world so much her new name will be UNDEFINED ERROR.

masterofbones

"My name is... 404? Dafuq does that mean?"

hakureireimu

Unaligned rather than Evil makes it hard for her to be the Villain representative, so

Javvies

"Unaligned" in the context of Names merely means a Name that can be that of a Hero or that of a Villain, depending on its current incarnation and bearer.

That is, a Name that is not specifically and explicitly always tied to either Above or Below.

Ie, the Name of Squire is one such Name, with the Villain path typically leading to Black Knight and the Hero path typically leads to a White Knight or a Paladin variation Name.

As is Apprentice.

I suspect many, probably most, Transitional Names fall on the category of so-called "neutral" or "unaligned" Names that can vary between being empowered by Above or by Below.

Thief is reputed to be another such Name.

Ranger likely is as well.

And, honestly, as long as Cat doesn't get an explicitly Heroic Name, which I think we'd all agree is ... unlikely, and as long as she doesn't start throwing Light around or demonstrating other Above-exclusive powers, any Name Cat gets will be assumed to be empowered by Below.

Death Knight

Yeah of course it ends there fuck. I'm seriously considering to stop reading this book until it completes... Ah who am I fooling? I'm fucking addicted. See y'all on Friday.

Shveiran

Ok, Tariq. Buddy.

Here we go.

Just like we practiced.

Just don't drop the ball, ok? No pressure, you got this. You had two years to grow and come to terms with this new reality. You are not the old man thrown into the new world anymore.

You are smart. You are wise. You got Ophanim for eyes.

You got this, you GOT this, you got THIS.

Who's the local wise man? You are, that's who!

Pivotal conversation? Pfff, no big, right?

You got this.

And sure, your record took a few hits in recent years, and sure, you are not without black marks talking with this particular character, but that just means you can pull the heroic tradition of pulling out a win against terrible odds. You got this.

You got this.

Yeah.

...Just don't drop the fg ball, alright?

Please, I'm begging here mate. Don't drop the fg ball. I'm so sick of hating you people, I can't take the angst anymore, I'm so friggin' tired.

Just don't drop the fg ball, alright? Please?

Cos I swear, if you drop the fg ball... I'm sorry, I'm sorry. Didn't mean to yell. My bad.

Just don't drop it, ok?

Please.

Rey d`Tutto

I heard that sun in a woman's voice aka Disney Musical Classic style.

Please don't sell out to Disney, but if you do, demand a "Musical" Animated adaptation.

Rey d`Tutto

Song.

Curse my typing, and autocorrect.

Nathan Taylor

"You grow number to the losses" You may want to consider revising this to more numb, numbed, or numb. While some dialects accept number, in written language it pulls you out of the flow since you have to interpret it by context.

Mental Mouse

And where is Tariq's new student while he's hanging around the brothel? Or is MK still under confinement?

And It does seem like Cat's name is waiting for a major transition – her fall into the abyss. And specifically linked to her fear of that fall....

Seth Kevorkian

Should this be 'Cliff (Redux)'? Book 3 chapter 43 is already 'Cliff'

Cap'n Smurfy

Pretty noticable error in this chapter. Back in Book 1 chap 8 its fairly explicitly stated the Legions of Terror have about their own number in Camp Followers with them on the March. Doesn't match with the forbidding of them here.

Dresden 67

That was in a permanent garrison outside Summerholm though if I remember correctly. Not actually an army in the field.

Cap'n Smurfy

Yes but the piece in question is Catherine recalling a passage from one of her books on standard Legion doctrine. She wasn't talking about Summerholm specifically.

mavant

I certainly didn't notice, but I admire your encyclopaedic memory.

mavant

~s/v/c/

superkeaton

I wonder what the fallout will be if Cat finds out Tariq kneecapped Masego's magic on the Bard's orders.

agesbe

But he didn't really. Bard told him to delay his actions by a few seconds, but he had no way of knowing what the repercussions of doing so would do, so he trusted his long-time ally to not lead him astray. For all he knew, acting too early would mean Masego dying as the Dead King might be killed before fully leaving Masego's body.

The fault lies with the Bard and the Dead King. Tariq is not to blame for Masego's magic loss.

Mirror Night

Not to mention it works politically because Masego would have been a real pain point if he walked from that affair with no personal fallout. Cause plenty wanted him punished for his actions and losing his Magic blunted that.

Kaedon

Just caught up after a couple weeks of reading. Mostly just posting so I can get notified of new posts

Rey d`Tutto

Friday & Tuesday, currently

mavant

Sometimes, when the fall kills you, you fly.

Time1ock

Regarding Akua's eventual fate, would her aid against the Dead King help mitigate it? If the Dead King is defeated with her help, she would have helped save far more than one hundred thousand lives, including Callowans.

jamesc9

So this is: if you steal an apple from a Callowan, what do you have to do, in order to be square with his or her grandchild?

Given that Mercantis was not invaded by the Watch, it seems to be possible.

Satan

Imagine the Dead King creates a living army and plants orders in their brains so that after they join the Alliance's army they destroy it from the inside during the big battle. Maybe he just spent 2 years of undead to reinforce the idea that he will only use monsters.

Chapter 45: Progress

"- one might then wonder if a kingdom's sufferance of a tyrant for a decade is not worth the inevitable successful uprising by an usurped relative and the golden age it will usher. Given the frequent petty cruelty and mediocrity of kings, might it not be worth inducing a great tyrant so that a great ruler will follow them?"

– Extract from the controversial treatise 'Ethics of Fate' by Kalchas the Gadfly, Atalantian philosopher

The tavern had closed hours ago, as it was the middle of the night, but the Peregrine had a knack for getting into places he shouldn't and I had a Night-trick decent with locks. I snapped my fingers and a few streaks of black flame sputtered to life in hanging lanterns, revealing a dirt floor to the large room. Just like the one we'd had in the Rat's Nest. Feeling just a tad nostalgic, I limped up behind the bar – a nice large oaken piece – and went looking through the bottles after leaning my staff against the side. Whoever ran this place kept a cudgel under the counter, I noted with approval. Good form.

I snatched up a bottle of what looked like genuine Neustrian schnaps, pulling the cork and taking a sniff. Apple, maybe? It'd do. Klaus Papenheim loved the stuff, and he'd offered it to me enough I'd acquired a taste for it. I took up one of the wooden cups and filled it, cocking an eyebrow at Tariq when he sat himself on the other side of the counter.

"What's your poison, Pilgrim?" I asked.

"I don't suppose there's a pear brandy lying around?" the old man asked. "Alavan, if possible."

I looked through the stock but there wasn't, sadly enough.

"Closest they've got is some sort of berry brandy," I told him, "and it looks Arlesite, though Gods only know from where beyond that."

"Now you have me curious, I'll admit," the Pilgrim said. "If you don't mind?"

I deftly set the cup down on the counter without turning as I took the bottle – some things never quite went, huh – and poured him a finger. I sniffed the bottle discreetly afterwards and almost gagged. It smelled like a whole bush had died in there along the promised berries. This might be the Grand Alliance's camp but I wasn't a robber queen, so I placed two golden crowns where the bottle I'd taken had stood. I cast a look at Tariq, who looked faintly embarrassed.

"I have been travelling light," he admitted.

He wasn't so crass as to actually outright request I pay for his drink, though, I noted with amusement.

"Heroes," I sighed, teasing.

I was actually out of crowns by I had a Praesi aurelius and a Proceran gran, which should more or less cover the costs. The gran was less pure, and so worth less, but some places refused imperial coinage as they believed it to be cursed. I vaguely remembered that one of the Dread Emperors had in fact tried to drive a chunk of Callowan nobility mad by cursing coinage a few centuries back so I couldn't even blame them.

"You're covered for the bottle," I said, and raised my cup.

He matched it with his, and the drink went down. I laughed after it went down, my throat aflame. Damn, but the Lycaonese liked it with a kick. Orcs would actually enjoy drinking this, which was a standard rarely met.

"Business, then," I said.

"Business," Tariq agreed.

I said nothing, only cocking an eyebrow as I leaned against the counter.

"I will assume," the Grey Pilgrim said, "that your intent is not to gloat."

"I like to think I'm above such things," I lied.

"Naturally," the Peregrine seriously agreed.

A beat of silence passed.

"That said," I thinly smiled, "I fucking told you so."

He sighed, but did not disagree. That was already promising. I'd not been sure exactly what to expect, as the silence and eventual assent from the Dominion when I'd gotten the Wandering Bard to be designated as formal enemy of the Grand Alliance had only told me he'd abstained from getting involved. His actual thoughts remained unknown to me.

"It is possible that the attack on the Arsenal was meant to aid in the long term," Tariq said, then grimaced and poured himself another finger of brandy. "But that is irrelevant. She has forced us to take her as an enemy through her actions, regardless of whatever intent might lie behind them."

"There's precious few acts you can't justify by saying they'll help down the line," I flatly replied. "That does tend to be the convenient thing about using the future for proof."

"Peace, Black Queen. I am not attempting to justify the Wandering Bard's offences against us," Tariq tiredly said. "Merely struggling to reconcile the woman I have known for a very long time with the one who is now my foe."

Much as I hated it'd taken him this long to get here, it was starting to look he actually was there so I swallowed the many barbs still on the tip of my tongue. Rubbing salt in the wound would get me nothing save a fleeting moment of satisfaction.

"Then we're in agreement that she's kill-on-sight," I said. "And that an order ensuring as much comes down on both your side and mine."

"You are unlikely to actually kill her, using such means," Tariq said. "But I do not disagree with the principle: her power comes from access to and influence over Bestowed, stripping her from these strengths is sensible."

"Sensible," I slowly repeated. "Yes, I believe so. Another sensible thing would be, for example, how you came to be so certain she won't die. I know why I think that, Peregrine, but you've been less than forthcoming about your ties with her."

"Should I complain to my representative under the Terms and being so clandestinely approached?" the Pilgrim drily said.

I filled my glass, conspicuously.

"This is just two old friends having a drink and a chat, Tariq," I toothily smiled. "Not an interrogation. Skirt around the letter of the law, me? Perish the thought."

He cocked a brow.

"Perish is the right word," the old man said. "How does the Red Axe fare, these days?"

"I believe they went with decapitation," I said. "'twas a little late to boil her alive, admittedly, and a brisk hanging would have been good fun but little else."

I suspected that Hasenbach had been amused, in that discreet way of hers, that from now when the execution by sword of the Red Axe was spoken of there would be a great deal of trouble over the nomenclature. Mind you, that it would add a dash of confusion to any rumours about the execution in the Arsenal was a more likely culprit for why she might have arranged that.

"You lost trust when you arranged that," Tariq said. "Some with our Bestowed, more with the man who leads them."

"Tell me something I don't know," I replied, almost rolling my eyes. "You disapprove, I take it?"

He sighed.

"No," the Grey Pilgrim finally said. "It helped stave off the collapse of Procer at otherwise minor costs. I only wish it had not forced a distancing between yourself and young Hanno, though perhaps it is for the best."

I drank of my cup, silently inviting him to elaborate.

"The cordiality of the relationship between you two has much been commented on," he said.

"If this is going to turn into another polite request I don't sleep with him, I'm going to get miffed at having to repeat I'm not interested," I warned him.

"I believe you," Tariq replied, sounding like he meant it. "But friendship is already seen as dangerous enough. You represent interests, the both of you, and those interests are often at odds. Friendship complicates that."

I waved him down.

"Bullshit," I frankly said. "If anything liking him made dealing with him significantly easier. But it's no longer an issue anyway. Let those fears be buried, and instead of dealing with fish market gossip we can perhaps deal with the endless undead armies trying to kill us all."

"I have yet to witness any power in this world or the next that quell gossip," Tariq amusedly said, "but your point is taken."

"Good," I said. "I believe we were talking about the Bard?"

The Grey Pilgrim conceded with a nod.

"We first met in the Free Cities, when I intervened in a spot of trouble within the Helikean royal family," he said. "I took her for a simple Bard, that first time, but recognizing her under a different face a few years later put paid to that notion."

Yeah, that'd do it. I still wasn't sure what his reading aspect exactly was, but it was frighteningly sharp even when the Ophanim weren't actively whispering secrets into his ear.

"And you knew she wasn't strictly one of Above's," I pointed out. "You weren't surprised when I told you I'd seen her work on Below's behalf."

Blue eyes sad, he nodded.

"That much became beyond dispute when she disrupted my pursuit of a villain in Lange within a decade of our first meeting," Tariq said, "forcing me to retreat from the Principality entirely and so lose the trail."

I whistled.

"And you didn't, you know," I delicately said, slicing a finger across my throat, "try to Mercy her afterwards, so to speak."

I glanced atop the hero's sparse crown of white hair apologetically.

"No offence meant, fellows," I added.

I didn't get smote, so I decided to ascribe a passable sense of humor to the Choir of Mercy. The things you learned, huh?

"None was taken," the Pilgrim informed me. "Though after your... colourful conversations with Contrition and Endurance, that could be seen as favoritism."

I winked above his head.

"Don't spread it around," I loudly whispered.

Long-suffering, he sipped at his drink and sighed.

"I did, in fact, try to kill her," Tariq said. "It did not take, evidently, and the misgivings of my patrons in pursuing her demise gave me pause. As did the eventual realization that the young villain she'd helped escape me had within the year died fighting another villainess, in the process exposing her schemes in Penthes."

Ah, I thought. There it was, the first of the missing pieces. Tariq trusted the Ophanim, and we'd already established that the Intercessor could affect angels.

"You thought she was another like you," I realized. "Only subtler and older."

"It was my belief that she was not a willing servant to Below, and so that she ensured all the victories arranged in their name would lead to starker defeats down the line," the Pilgrim admitted. "I suspected her forced service to be a consequence of the nature of her Bestowal, a storyteller's duty to attend to the foe as well as the hero."

"She's not like us, Pilgrim," I said. "Named, sure, but I get the feeling there's a lot less between her and the Gods than there is for the rest of us."

"The sufferings she attended to are on a scale we can hardly imagine," Tariq softly agreed. "And so I did not judge, Catherine, to borrow another man's words. Even with the wisdom of the Ophanim close to me, I cannot begin to understand the crushing burden of her purpose. Weighing the suffering of a century knowing it might spare another, patching and bleeding nations to prevent greater horrors – a millennia of ugly choices, one after another."

He looked grieved.

"And still she did good whenever she could, I have seen this," the Pilgrim said. "It was she who led me to heal Laurence after her duel with the Ranger, did you know?"

I blinked.

"I had no idea," I said.

I'd known about the duel between a younger Saint of Swords and Ranger, since Indrani had told me what she knew, but I'd never known the Pilgrim to be involved.

"I trusted her," Tariq admitted, "to see a path out of the dark even when I did not."

I'd never really had that kind of trust in me, but then I supposed there was a reason I'd become a villain and not a heroine.

"I still believe she seeks a better future for Calernia," the Grey Pilgrim admitted. "But that is not enough. I have seen the world we would make, through the Alliance and the Accords, and I am willing to fight for it. If she seeks to darken that path, then she is my enemy regardless of her intent."

Not exactly the ringing endorsement of killing the Intercessor first change we got I'd kind of been hoping for, but life was all about tempering your expectations. I'd settle for a grief-stricken fight between past comrades if that was all he had it in him to summon up.

"More will be asked of you," I bluntly said. "I know there are dangers, but by the White Knight's sentencing you've gained a pupil in Christophe de Pavanie."

"I am aware," Tariq frowned.

"What you're not aware of is how he's tied to that mess in Cleves," I said. "You know, the House of Langevin being made to eat crow."

"He's the reason Prince Gaspard abdicated in favour of his son?" the Pilgrim asked, sounding surprised.

Hasenbach had wasted no time spending the political capital she'd gained through the trial, though at least she'd been subtle about it. Gaspard Langevin had, officially, taken a bad wound and passed the burden of leadership to his younger and more vital son. It'd been an unpopular move in Cleves, where the man was respected, but Hasenbach had privately marshaled the Highest Assembly using his ties to the Mirror Knight as an anchor around his neck instead of the trump card Gaspard had likely seen them as. The army under General Rumena then leaving regardless of protests had made it very clear to him that he'd made more enemies than his house could afford, driving the final nail in the coffin.

"Not exactly," I said. "But he was involved."

I elaborated quickly, laying out the concerns Sve Noc had brought to me along with the plot and the difficulties the situation had represented for the First Prince: stark consequences to acting, worse if she did not.

"I'm assuming Hanno will speak to you as well when he arrives with the Mirror Knight," I said. "But I wanted you to know the nature of what's being dropped on your lap. He needs to be straightened up before he blunders into another mess like this, Pilgrim."

I grimaced.

"He's still the best match we have with the Severance," I reluctantly admitted. "And I'd be a lot more comfortable trusting him with that power if you were able to first look me in the eye and promise he wasn't going to shit the bed with it."

If anyone could do it, mind you, it was the Peregrine. As far as heroes were concerned, he was the mentor. To Tariq's honour, he did not balk or try to pass the responsibility to another.

"How long would I have with him?" the Pilgrim asked.

"If things go well, we want to try Keter next summer," I said. "I know it's not long, but..."

"I will do all I can," Tariq simply promised.

"Hells," I grimly said, "that's all I can ask, isn't it?"

And on that we toasted, cups rising in accord and going down with the same.

—

It was probably a good thing that our attendants were far enough behind they couldn't hear us speak as watched over the entrance of the reinforcements into the stronghold with threadbare ceremony.

"I don't know what my niece has been bribing the Levantines with, but I hope we have more in stock," Prince Klaus Papenheim appreciatively said.

The older man was eyeing the rows of heavy Alavan foot with an almost hungry look. I snorted at the sight. I'd found it difficult not to like the grizzled Prince of Hannover from the start, even knowing he'd almost been one of the leading generals in the invasion of Callow. He was from a mould I was familiar with, that I'd spent most my life around: an old soldier, a veteran who'd spent almost as much time on the saddle as reigning in his capital. My reputation with Lycaonese tended to be decent, for a servant of wicked power, but I'd not expected the old prince to take to me as well.

"Having infantry envy, are we?" I mused. "That ought to be a familiar feeling by now."

More a tease than a truth. An open ground exercises my army tended to trounce his own, but the moment the terrain got difficult the balance tended to swing harshly the other way. It'd been about as I expected, given the difficulty of using classic Legion tactics in the mountains when they'd been designed to win wars on the plains of Callow. On those plains, though, Black's war machine still reigned queen despite the best efforts of the opposition. The Lycaonese were good, but they hadn't mastered the tactics of the Reform yet.

They'd find it difficult to catch up there, since their lack of mage was even worse than my own. Unfortunately for them, they wouldn't have the workaround of having stolen a Legion or two as I'd done when founding the Army of Callow.

"Talk to me when your lot use a goat path without waking up all of Ashur," the one-armed prince scathingly replied.

The obligatory trading of insults having been seen to, I took a better look at the six thousand troops Lord Yannu Marave had sent our way. Most of them Alavan, by the colours on the shields and faces, but I was hardly complaining about that: the Champion's Blood coughed up to arm its heavies in good mail and plate, and they fought ferociously with their swords and shields. Two thousand of the Levantines were lesser captains sworn to the Holy Seljun instead of Alava, though the pattern for why they'd been chosen was neither the size of their warband nor their origins. Instead they were all, in majority, made up of slingers. Less a boon than the heavies, these, but still very much a boon.

The Dominion's armies were inferior to those of Procer and Callow in several regards, but they were also the only standing force that still fielded slingers – whose thrown stones had proved to have a great deal of bite against the undead than arrows.

"That was the last major force we were waiting on," I said. "The White Knight will arrive with Named and the latest from the Arsenal in a few days, which has us almost ready to begin the push."

"Weren't you waiting on some sort of Levantine bounty hunter?" the older man asked. "I was warned she might be trouble by the Silver Huntress."

"The Headhunter's a prick," I conceded. "But they're a prick with the finest tracking chops in the Grand Alliance. Archer went to fetch them, and they should both be here by dawn."

The Prince of Hannover cocked a brow.

"They?" he asked.

"Fluid," I explained.

He grunted in understanding.

"I want to split the Dominion forces between the armies when we move out," Prince Klaus said, "You know their discipline holds better when they're kept apart."

"I also know it'll be a cold day in Ater before you get Tanja and Aquiline to split," I snorted.

"They listen to you," the older man said.

"When it suits them," I shrugged.

"Then take them both with you," the Prince of Hannover said. "And leave me the Alavans."

"Fat chance," I replied. "I'd get both a guaranteed headache and fuck all slingers, Papenheim. Aren't your people supposed to be all about giving people a fair shake?"

"And yours are supposed to spend their days trampling Praesi out in Streges, but it's a strange new world," he grunted back. "I'll take the larger slice of fantassins and give you with Princess Beatrice if you agree."

Now that was a tempting offer. My officers just didn't have the knack for dealing with Proceran mercenaries without it going badly – falsifying a report in the Army got you caned and demoted, when it was considered common practice among those fantassin companies who even bothered with reports. Some poor Arlesite bastard had even tried to bribe an orc lieutenant, which got him his throat ripped out and ten more people hanged in the aftermath of the vicious brawl that ensued.

"Gods, you must really hate dealing with the Blood," I said.

"That leaves you who to run the Alamans, Prince Arsene? The man's got all the boldness of a wet towel and I've never seen him send out his soldiers when he could pass the fight to others."

Never to the extent that it was insubordination or harmful to the war effort, but the Prince of Bayeux was very clearly trying to make sure his forces suffered as few casualties as possible even if that meant other forces would suffer instead.

"I'll have Mathilda breathing on his neck and fill his days with petty mercenary squabbles, it'll keep him too twitchy to be a load," the Prince of Hannover said. "I can't do either those things with your lordlings."

I hummed pensively, the two of us watching the brightly painted ranks of Dominion soldiers streaming in. I'd theoretically be leading the Second and Third Army on my prong of the offensive along with the lion's share of the Firstborn, so in truth I wasn't badly in need of more heavy foot. If I got the army of Hainaut I'd get what I considered to be the cream of the Alamans forces in the region as well as their finest cavalry captain, which gave me a solid force to work with.

"If I were selected to lead one of the offensives," I said. "That might be a tempting offer."

The older man spat to the side.

"You'll get one prong and me the other," Prince Klaus said. "It's a done deal, and I won't hear it otherwise. The lordlings are still too green and the only other one I'd trust with a large force is Volignac."

Prince Beatrice Volignac wouldn't be getting a command that size, though. Not only was most of her principality already occupied by the dead, the appointment of two Proceran commanders would go over... poorly with the coalition forces in Hainaut.

"You didn't agree outright," he said. "So out with it. What more do you want in the stew?"

"I want first pick of the fantassin companies," I said. "If my flanks are held by Levantines, I can't afford runners in the mercenaries."

"You're a cold one, Foundling," the grey-haired man said. "Sticking me with both the company dross and the Brabant conscripts?"

"I'll cede General Rumena in return," I offered. "It'll keep your sigils in good order."

Unlike the Prince of Hannover, I could handle the Firstborn just fine on my own. Mighty Jindrich could hold field command and I'd handle the rest. Offering General Rumena was not a small concession to make, given its known power and its standing as the finest commander among the drow, and I could see the older man was tempted.

"Agreed," Prince Klaus said, and spat into his palm.

I did the same and clasped his hand.

"May the Heavens strike a liar," the Prince of Hannover said.

"Crows take the oathbreaker," I replied, and we shook on it.

I could feel he was just as eager as me to get started on his planning, but to our common frustration there'd be no going anywhere. The Levantines had yet to finish coming into the stronghold, and it'd be poor politics to slight them by leaving early.

Gods if it wasn't boring as all Hells, though.

—

"Glaring won't add lines to the report," Hakram said. "Though I praise the quality of the effort."

I sighed and dropped back into my chair, blowing at an errant strand of hair that'd slipped out of my loose ponytail and gotten into my face. Sinfully comfortable as the seat liberated from Arcadia was, it did not improve my mood.

"It's ridiculous that we still have so little reliable information on the fantassins," I complained. "I know we're thin on Jacks, up here, but this isn't even bare bones. It's bare bone, maybe, and even then I'd argue it's not a full one."

I'd sent for all we had on the fantassin companies of the Hainaut front after returning to my tent – which I still used for work, if not always to sleep in – and even as the parchments flooded in my despair at what little we actually knew increased. Half of this was rumours – many reported by our soldiers, sure, but that didn't magically make them more than rumours – while the solid information was... sparse. Company names, captains and numbers. A few records, including who had gotten commendations for bravery, and a few bits about which companies were known to hate each other or to have bad blood with the Army of Callow. The three largest of the companies had a little more on them, a bit about the leading officers and their reputations, but I had to admit this was largely a pile of nothing.

"I fucked myself negotiating with Papenheim," I noted. "I might have first pick of companies, but I can't even be sure what companies I should pick."

"Neither would the Iron Prince, dearest," Akua said.

Where Hakram had claimed a corner of the tent with several smaller tables set around his wooden wheelchair – though it was not all wood, and Masego had laid so many enchantments on the thing that wards sometimes confused it for a mage – Akua had instead claimed a seat around the table Indrani was still carving for me, and was lounging on it with a cup of wine in hand.

"Useless consolation," I replied in an irritated tone. "My favourite, how did you know?"

"I shall endeavour keep this revelation in mind, my heart," Akua silkily replied, "though it has nothing to do with the point I was making."

"Ah," Hakram exclaimed. "Beatrice Volignac. Clever."

I frowned. What did the Princess of Hainaut have to do with – oh. Shit, I hated it when Akua was right just after I'd gotten snippy with her. The Lycaonese weren't that much better at dealing with Alamans than my own officers, so the Iron Prince usually delegated that sort of thing to his most trusted among the Alamans royals, the Princess of Hainaut. The Prince of Hannover wouldn't be able to pick the companies any better than I, but Beatrice Volignac very likely could. She'd be assigned to my part of the offensive, too, so she'd have motivation not to be half-hearted about this.

"Set up a meeting with her, Adjutant," I said. "It's the kind of thing that needs to be asked in person. Tomorrow morning – wait, no, early afternoon."

It'd break one of those unspoken Alamans rules to ask her to do me that favour before she was officially folded under my command by our morning war council, even if the matter was effectively already settled.

"I'll see to it," Hakram said, his long and skeletal fingers jotting notes down on parchment. "You still need to decide where you'll be addressing the villains, Catherine. The earlier we settle that the better."

I grimaced. I'd wanted to wait until the White Knight was here to hold that, to ward off the perception that we might be plotting, but now that the last two of my lot were arriving with dawn the Named I represented under the Terms were due a proper council. Some were getting restless, too, so I was wary of delaying further. So far I'd put them off by saying all was best addressed after the war council settled broader affairs, but that excuse would be expiring tomorrow morning as well. That meant I'd be meeting with the villains assembled in Hainaut before sundown, like it or not.

"I would suggest far from anything expensive," Adjutant dryly suggested, a peek of fangs revealing his amusement.

His face hadn't changed much, I thought. So when he was seated, when the fold of his clothes hid the missing arm and leg and meat, it was almost possible to forget. Almost.

"Outside would be best," I agreed. "Though I don't want eavesdropping, which limits our options. There's not a lot of places here warded up right for that."

Most of them were war rooms, personal quarters or other places of import. None of which I particularly wanted to shove a bunch of rowdy villains into.

"Make a request to borrow wardstones from the Gigantes," Hakram suggested. "This is Terms business, not personal, so you would be within your rights."

"There any left so spare?" I asked. "I know we restricted who can make requests, but they still go fast."

"I'll know within the hour," Adjutant promised. "If it is feasible?"

"Then do it," I ordered.

Which handled the privacy issues nicely. Leaving actual location as the last hurdle.

"In the country will have to do," I finally said. "I'd rather not do this in the stronghold proper, if I have a choice."

Obviously we wouldn't be doing this on the Dead King's side of the trenches, so it'd have to be south.

"Akua?" I asked. "You've flown over the region often enough."

"There's a large hill with a fire pit perhaps an hour away from Neustal," she noted. "Formerly used by shepherds, I believe. No other larger significance."

Mhm. Using somewhere with a little more weight to it would please those who liked to feel important – the Rapacious Troubadour and the Summoner came to mind – but I didn't necessarily want to encourage the perception that this was a council momentous in any way. It was a relatively large assembly of Named, but it should be nothing more than that.

"It'll do," I said, then sighed. "All right, what's next?"

The night was still young, and so there was still work to be done.

Javvies

That seems ... slim to base such trust in Bard on, Tariq.

And you're going to have a tough job in pulling Mirror Knight's head out out his ass. And that assumes he's doesn't go all stubborn and resistant to being taught by and actually learning from you.

And preparations for the offensive. Only two lines of advance? Hmm. On the one hand, that's easier to defend against, but on the other, they can only afford to split their forces too much.

Hmm. On the one hand, Rumena not being with Cat means that we'll see less of them. On the other hand, that means we'll get to see Rumena in an Interlude, possibly even having a Rumena PoV Interlude.

Hmm. I'm conflicted.

Adrian V

To be fair MK has suffered so many slaps in the face that maybe he is starting to change, if only from the concussion at least

Javvies

Oh, come on.

Concussions don't make anybody smarter.

Through, I will admit the concept of beating the stupid out of Mirror Knight is one that provides entertaining mental images.

TeK

Selective brain damage has been known to treat certain mental disorders. Not that I advocate for lobotomy.

Raved Thrad

To quote from Hellraiser II: "The Doctor is in. I recommend amputation." 😊

caoimhinh

True, but spansks do make people more disciplined.

Christophe doesn't need to be smarter, he simply needs to stop misbehaving.

Shveiran

They work on children, to some extent, not on adolescents.

The receiver needs to see the punishment as the ire of someone greater (aka, a child's parent in the early years) whose displeasure is not just feared, it is considered a wrongness in the world.

I doubt Cristophe sees anyone's displeasure as an unbearable thing, or we'd not have come to this point.

Cicero

Except maybe the Grey Pilgrim still has that level of weight.

Your wise old grandfather, who always had a kind word and support for you, now is terribly disappointed in your recent choices.

And, let's not forget that the Mirror Knight has figured out that he screwed up pretty bad in how he dealt with the White Knight.

Javvies

Nope.

I'm pretty sure Mirror Knight is one of the ones who believes that Grey Pilgrim has been critically compromised by Cat, what with her "resurrecting" him, among other factors.

And then there's the fact that Grey Pilgrim is a Levantine, and thus automatically inferior to a Proceran like Mirror Knight, or so Mirror Knight thinks.

Remember, Mirror Knight is the asshole who was trying to justify Proceran atrocities committed against the Dominion to Levantine Heroes.

Also, we don't know how deeply Bard sunk her hooks into Mirror Knight, how far she got inside his mind. Other than "too far", of course.

Plus, I'm willing to bet his "girlfriend" was pushing pro-Proceran, anti-non-Proceran propaganda bullshit into his head too. That's not going to help any either.

I don't think there are any Heroes that Mirror Knight views as a proper/true superior, far less one that could count as a genuine Mentor figure.

Salt

The mirror knight was already proven to be more willing to admit and fix his mistakes than the vast vast majority of characters in the story, so him starting out with prejudiced beliefs is hardly a sign of being irredeemable.

In the span of a single day, he

- walked into the arsenal believing Catherine was plotting something terrible
- re-evaluated into believing someone was trying to set him and Catherine against each other, at the miscellaneous stacks
- apologized to Catherine for being wrong about her involvement in the plots at the Arsenal, before asking for her cooperation in uncovering the real traitors

His POV showed him recognizing and crucifying himself for every mistake he made during the arsenal attack as well

Zero idea where you're getting the idea that the Mirror Knight won't be willing to learn from the Pilgrim either. He actively cursed at himself for not having the magister's tact in speech and recognized/ was jealous of Hakram's social skills.

Considering we have hard proof that he's open minded enough to recognize superior personal qualities even in one of the most notorious Villains on the surface of the continent (who is also a literal man-eating orc), it's rather difficult to argue that he won't be equally or more open-minded about learning from arguably the most venerated Hero currently alive.

Especially since said Heroic mentor has made a decades-long career out of guiding troubled headstrong youths.

Shveiran

First off, he didn't say he would be unwilling to learn. He said that he likely doesn't see the Pilgrim as a superior.
And I concur.

Second, you say "the mirror knight was already proven to be more willing to admit and fix his mistakes than the vast vast majority of characters in the story"; but while he chastises himself a lot in his own mind, he never acts to FIX his mistakes or perceived flaws.

He still walks out on Catherine, he still draws on the White Knight, he still keeps the Severance. He has never, ever used these epiphanies to grow as a human being.

He chastises himself, then takes a new, rushed decision that causes more pain.

He says he realizes he knows shit, but that never seems to move him to listen to anyone else, or to stop him from acting without considering the ramifications of his actions.

The only growth the Mirror Knight has ever experienced is one in power.

Salt

Bruh, the Arsenal arc was like, one event that didn't even last a few weeks in total.

As far as before the Arsenal arc goes, he spent the large majority of the time prior to it being tossed at endless waves of undead. No shit he hasn't changed much before the Arsenal.

Are you really telling me some kid not changing his stripes with almost zero supervision, over a timeline that's a small fraction as long as it physically took the chapters to come out, proves he's some kind of irredeemable menace? That's goes so far beyond any realistic standard that it's not even in the same plane of existence anymore.

Tariq himself took ages longer to change his behavior than the length of the Arsenal arc. Cat got her more-power-doesnt-solve-anything lesson over several YEARS.

The Mirror Knight, of all people, is supposed to improve faster than Tariq and the Catherine? My dude, you out of yo mind

Javvies

Except for that two year timeskip.

Where, if things went more or less as they did in the Interludes where we saw Mirror Knight ... he spent the entire damned time offending his nominal allies with his attitudes and statements. And only realizing he offended them after he did so spectacularly.

Actually, given the two year timeskip, he ought to have learned at least a little about how to do better, so the relatively "current" Interludes are after two years of "recognizing the problem" and "improvement". I am not impressed.

Plus, Mirror Knight was one of the Heroes that went into Callow ... so he already had time with Grey Pilgrim and other Heroes that he could offend. Although, it's possible that after the first time Saint of Swords just told him to shut up, instead of turning it into a teachable moment.

Also, it could just be me, but I'm going to say that trying to justify atrocities, and excuse them as the right, proper, and Good thing to do, to the people they were committed against is basically never going to go over well.
Mirror Knight still hasn't figured that one out.

It's not like the Witch of the Woods just randomly decided to use Mirror Knight as a projectile weapon one day on a whim.
He straight up earned that kind of treatment with hard work and effort.

Mirror Knight is, philosophically speaking, a hardline Proceran Supremacist.

Jago

"And, let's not forget that the Mirror Knight has figured out that he screwed up pretty bad in how he dealt with the White Knight." And how much he craves that power, instead of being an indestructible battering ram. He craves Severance as it is the kind of power he lacks.

Jago

"And, let's not forget that the Mirror Knight has figured out that he screwed up pretty bad in how he dealt with the White Knight." I would bet that he will blame that on the White Knight for "not doing what was the right thing". Someone want to take the bet?

RoflCat

Isn't the whole respect your superior the core of Proceran (or Alamans? Whatever MK is from)? Like how Callow have their long price thing and Praes forever backstabby.

Christophe's issue was that at best he is a Big Guy who would follow order and smash into whatever need smashing, but his reputation/charisma create a followings that push him into being a Leader, something he's absolutely horrid at doing and fumbled so much it's become a trauma of sort.
Oh and the Black/White world view instead of seeing the grey that is reality.

And nobody was around who could slap him into line. White wasn't going to do it because 'I do not judge' and MK doesn't feel like White is his superior after losing Judgement MK doesn't trust Black Queen because Villain, even though her lessons are very much the thing he needed. the Proceran prince wanted to use him as a tool to cheat the Drow of their land other heroes like Antoine looked up to him with idol worship which push pressure on him to act like a Leader more.

Basically Tariq should be the first mentor figure that MK wholeheartedly accept as his superior. ('should', because we don't know how much MK still linger on the whole Tariq got revived by Catherine thing)

Javvies

Except Grey Pilgrim isn't a Proceran, he's a Levantine, and thus automatically inferior to a Proceran like Mirror Knight. Or so Mirror Knight's mindset goes.

And I'm pretty sure Mirror Knight is one of the ones that believes Greedy Pilgrim has been critically compromised by Cat.

Remember, Mirror Knight is the asshole who was trying to justify Proceran atrocities committed against the Dominion (and others) to Levantine (and other) Heroes.

Liliet

You see that as a personal failing. I disagree. It's a spiral: wherever his more gross views come up, people they concern start avoiding him. So he gets ever more isolated in the company of people who believe in that shit and reinforce it.

There is a reason education is a significant part of modern activism. A person who's never exposed to alternative views will not spontaneously develop them within two years while still in their old environment.

And most of Christophe's problem is that he was surrounded by people whose views his very existence as a hero he's reinforcing, and pretty much completely isolated from other heroes socially.

It takes a specific effort to reach out from someone deeming it worth it, be it because of seeing something in him and wanting him as a friend, because of a personal mission of education, or because of being his superior and needing to fix this shit for pragmatic reasons.

It's kind of like being in a cult. Not easy to leave.

Jago

Pro-change:

"I have skewed up, crippling one of the heroes of the coalition."

"Hakram is smart and charismatic."

"Apologized to Catherine" But then was totally unwilling to put down Severance at her and White request, even if it was their right to ask for that.

Against-change:

"He had to renounce to Severance."

"There were already traces of him blaming the "need" to wound White on him."

"His girlfriend's father had to abdicate."

"Wandering Bard and Tales: the Hero tats fall for want of a greater power." Never discount the WB.

Miles

Maybe the bard's displeasure. Or his fling's. I could see him being extremely weak to the sound of whimpers.

'Ladi Williams

Bah. Shock therapy used to be an effective and sworn by treatment for behavioral conditioning.

I'm sure it would work wonders on him. Come to think about it. His plate would transmit electricity wonderfully.

Salt

You'd probably need enough lightning to turn a small city into ash, to use it as corporal punishment against the mirror knight. The kid is a walking fortress that gets catapulted into armies as a form of transportation

Most likely the Mirror Knight will feel a mild tingle, while some poor cabal of mages loses a lot of confidence in their lightning spells

Clmineith

I'm not sure it's the lack of 'smart' the problem. MK is doing OK for his INT score, it's WIS that he's lacking. And possibly CHA.

Shveiran

People keep saying that.

I have no idea how "the guy never bothers to consider consequence or how logic a theory is before donning is tin-foil hat" translates into "the guy is smart enough".

I mean, I don't want to attack anyone here, but I'm very curious how you'd define "smart" if those are not black marks against him.

Clmineith

It's a good question. I admit, it doesn't seem logical, but it's RPG logic.

INT / intelligence is how he will solve a problem, or how well he will plan to make happen whatever aim he has.

WIS / wisdom is what make him choose that aim in the first place, considering consequences, and so on.

MK has very low WIS (as you said, fail to consider consequence, tin-foil hat, etc) but average INT. Not great, mean you, but not especially low. Or: once he's decide to do that tin-foil hat thing, he actually has not such bad strategy about it.

Of course, it's RPG logic, real life is different... but PGTE works on RPG tropes, so...

Javvies

Yeah ... except that if Int is problem solving ability ... I refer you to his plan to replace Hanno as the Heroic Representative by killing him, and also his plan to kill the Grand Alliance leadership if they didn't agree with him (or, rather, as he put it, not needing to kill the Grand Alliance leadership who agreed with him). Also, his plan to force the Villains to replace Cat as the Villain Rep with the former Hero (and currently not Named) Vivienne.

I'm finding it difficult to interpret any of that as quality problem solving.

No.

Mirror Knight used all his mental stats as dump stats. And he dumped them hard.

Pethrai D'arkos

Another way to think of it is that Int is your ability to come up with a plan (solidly average).

Wis is your ability to tell a good plan from a bad plan (a bit worse than sub par).
Cha is your ability to sell your companions on following through with a bad plan despite their better judgement (above average, not at Cat levels but who is).

Clmineith

I disagree.

His purpose is to replace Hanno: Low WIS tells him he can do that by killing him. Average INT tells him how to kill Hanno.

I'm not saying he has a GOOD INT. I'm saying it's not a dump stat. Or at least, it only became a dump stat after he got it average.

I'll place y about 18/22 to physical stats (and increasing with time), 2/3 to WIS (NOT increasing) and CHA, and INT at 9/10 (not increasing either). (And high LUK, because Hero).

Again, not great. Certainly, 90 percent Chosen have at least a couple more INT points than he does (from, say, Archer 15 to Masego 25). But he's not the village idiot.

Remember, having both very low INT and very low WIS make for a person barely articulate. Like, a troll or something.

MK is not THAT bad.

Mirror Night

I would say he has high STR and CON...Decent CHA and DEX...Average INT and Dumb Stat WIS

caoimhinh

No one is saying he is a genius or an intellectual, I think we can all agree that he has been shown that he is an average guy in that area.

Sure, he has made mistakes, but his mistakes are not fruit of stupidity, but rather immaturity.

Christophe is a stubborn guy with a fragile ego who is constantly pained by his social awkwardness and sought validation and authority by having strength.

It is not his IQ that is the source of the issue, but his EQ.

The issue has never been about Christophe's intelligence.

He doesn't need to be smarter, he needs to stop misbehaving.

TeK

I dunno bro, he did bot place his trust in Bard per se, he placed it in Ophanim. That is quite a difference.

KageLupus

I think that Tariq's point was that was the first time he noticed the Wandering Bard playing the long game, and it all turning out as a net Good in the end. I guarantee that the same pattern played out multiple times during the time he knew her, each one reinforcing the idea that when she looks like she is helping the bad guys, it is just to screw them over worse later.

Between that and the angels in his head whispering not to kill her, it doesn't seem too farfetched for Tariq to develop a deepening sense of trust towards the Wandering Bard over the many years he was a Hero.

Salt

Ironically, the Pilgrim likely saw the Bard in a positive light for the exact same reasons that he currently sees Catherine in a positive light. He has a tendency to approve of people who are willing to commit lesser evils for the sake of greater goods that way.

He even attempted to kill the Bard initially, before later admitting that her lesser evils appeared to have a greater good purpose, exactly like his relationship with Cat.

Rather difficult to call him an idiot for trusting the Bard back then, without also calling him an idiot for trusting Catherine now.

Charlie Hegarty

I mean /I would/ him call him an idiot for trusting Catherine frankly.

Salt

Somewhere out there, the Saint of Swords is smiling on you Points for consistency, at the least

Jago

"That seems ... slim to base such trust in Bard on, Tariq." The apparent trust or respect of his Choir seems a big basis for trust, from the point of view of the Pilgrim.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

"It was a relatively large assembly of Named, but it should be nothing more than that."

Oh Cat, you should know better than that.

WuseMajor

Yeah, and then thinking that too. Especially after talking about the Bard within the last week.

I mean, are you trying to turn this into a Thing?

TeK

I mean, what can possibly go wrong?

Sun Dog

Nothing. Nothing can go wrong. Soon she will be invincible.

caoimhinh

It would be nice if that meeting came in 2 Interludes like the one with the Heroes. I really like when Catherine is seen from other people's POV, they always say how amazing, cunning, and terrifying she is.

Like that time in the Arcadian Campaign when Cat was always struggling to handle the officers from Praes and the Duchess of Daoine, then when we got chapters from Kegan and Ranker's POV they were both scared of her and were absolutely sure that she had expertly manipulated them all during their meetings.

Shveiran

I know right? I can't get enough of those. They are an amazing ride.

Burlyraven

So should we start throwing names down for what that hill is going to be referred to after this meeting or wait to see what sort of meeting it turns into, Cat's intentions aside?

I'm liking the ring of "the Dark Summit".

dadycool

"Gathering of the Ravenous Shepherds"? "Circling of the Wolves"?

AbraKadabra

Parliament of rogues? 😊

I stole that one from world domination in retrospect.

caoimhinh

That name sounds pretty cool, but when I read that I imagine something like a gathering of the top brass of the Thieves' Guild or a meeting of several Pirate Captains.

Adrian V

I just want them to devolve into mad laughter and scare everyone else shitless xD

"Hill of doom", "Damned Hill", or something with madness

caoimhinh

"It is said that the Black Queen gathered over a dozen Damned for covenant on that hill, and used the sorceries of the Gigantes to ward off all prying in the vicinity. What was spoken in those dark hours is still unknown, but the eerie stillness never left that location ever since. Even birds and wolves are afraid to chirps or howl near it. Hence it is now called, the Silent Hill."

Aotrs Commander

insert that Doctor Evil and cohorts laughing scene from Austin Powers

Salt

"Gods below and everburning, it was just a routine meeting on a random hill in the middle of nowhere. Indrani, if you keep feeding the historians this bullshit I swear to crows I will have you han-"

– The Black Queen, covering up the events of the first Council of Deepest Terror (widely believed to have been held on the Dark Summit, year 13 B.A)

Insanenoodlyguy

"The fact that every single one of the fires that day started in the time period of the first Council of Deepest Terror, where each and every Villain is verified as being on the Dark Summit and thus nowhere near the fires, is not a collective alibi. Rather, it was the Black Queen's bold challenge to friend and foe alike: "You all know I did this but none of you can figure out how. This is why I lead."

Elvera Tanja, the Passionate Accuser, defending her 2nd year history essay at Cardinal University, "Unconstestable Dominance: The Black Queen's inscrutable power-plays forming the Council."

sengachi

"After all, they were goblin fire."

Pethrai D'arkos

I figure the meeting will go down as something like "Convocation of Hollow Souls."

sivarajan

The Dark Summit on the Dark Summit?

Burlyraven

Indeed. It has such a nice ring to it.

caoimhinh

How about the Damned Summit? The Summit of Damnation? The Council of Damned?

beleester

It's a recurring meeting (although this is the first one we've seen), so it's not going to get a title unless something really terrible happens. It's just Meeting #37 of the Official Council of Villains.

That said, I'm sure the villains would give it a super-chuuni name like "The Dark Summit" anyway, just for fun.

caoimhinh

It is the first happening before such an important offensive, no?

And maybe she does these meetings with smaller numbers of Named gathered, since the Grand Alliance tends to send them in different assignments and different fronts.

Of course, this could also just be "Session #13 of the Dark Council" or they may even call each large meeting that Catherine has with Villains a new particular Chuuni Name, partly just to annoy her XD

mamm0nn

Obviously it's going to be the "Yeah it's still on fire. I know it's been 20 years."

Miles

The ashen lake.

Miles

It's been foreshadowed, there's even a fire pit.

Sir Nil

I'm worried about the epigraph, hopefully it means that the current events are merely the necessary evils needed to achieve the Accords, or that something will go horrifically to shit so that eventually something will turn up to fix it.

hakureireimu

It might simply be referring to the Bard, who has a longer planning horizon.

Big I

I assumed it was referring to the Bard's/Heavens' M0: let the Villain win at first so the plucky teenager has someone to beat.

Miles

Atlantian philosopher. I think the point is that those games don't work. I mean we all know what happened to Atlantis

Isi Arnott-Campbell

It's Atalante, which probably isn't the same thing. If EE was gonna do Atlantis, he'd probably do it more unambiguously by drawing off of the original myth (super-wealthy island nation smote for its hubris), not just a sound-alike name. Based on my half-hearted googling, Atalante is probably named after a Greek heroine (it's also a far-right group from Quebec, apparently).

That being said, the specific Atalantean being quoted is called the Gadfly, i.e. Socrates, whose student Plato made up Atlantis to begin with for allegorical purposes.

<https://www.britannica.com/topic/Atalanta>

Liliet

I think this comment was a deliberate pun.

Mental Mouse

Regardless, Kalchas is clearly trolling at least a bit.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Atlantis of this setting was Kergel, an advanced civilization that thought itself superior and was destroyed for its hubris by the Gnomes.

SpeckofStardust

So we can all agree that the mercs have a crap-ton of spy's in them right?

dadycoool

Sadly not Jacks.

Juff

Typo Thread:

the sude > the side crowns by I > crowns but I said," I thinly smiled, "I > said"—I thinly smiled—"I look he actually > look like he actually example, how you (maybe "revealing how you") Tariq," I > Tariq." I that quell > that quells (or can quell, or change power to powers)
first change > first chance aware," Tariq frowned > aware," Tariq said with a frown (or something like that) promise be he > promise me he as watched over > as we watched over An open ground > In open ground lack of mage > lack of mages great deal of bite > greater deal of bite them," I shrugged. > them." I shrugged.
give you with Princess Beatrice > give you Princess Beatrice Prince Beatrice > Princess Beatrice seat liberate > seat liberated endeavour keep > endeavour to keep left so spare > left to spare

Miles

Went a bit overboard to make the list long there. A lot of these aren't typos, just style choices.

>aware," Tariq frowned > aware," Tariq said with a frown (or something like that)

Bit late to start complaining about this one. Gestures and expressions have been used as alternatives for speaking words since ch 0.

>lack of mage > lack of mages

Mage is shorthand for mage lines. Again, been the convention since book 1.

Fake typo corrections are annoying.

Ninestrings

I didn't realise how much I was looking forward to Klaus and Cat meeting until just now. Peas in a pod.

dadycoool

I love Tavern Wench/Bartender!Cat. That encounter had all the feel of "Sit, drink, and tell me about your troubles." Cat picking favorites among the Choirs is hilarious.

It's fascinating how she gets along so well with the Lycaonese, both the people and the drinks. Hagglng generals are hagglng.

Hakram is on one side giving his advice and Akua is on the other giving hers. All is right with the world.

Adrian_V

Maybe is the lack of sleep, but when reading Cat and Klaus part i suddenly had this image of both of them hooking up for a bit, then Cordelias likely reaction xD

Also villain meeting yay! normally i would say something is bound to happen but maybe it won't since already the heroes had a meeting that devolved into fighting so it could be a weird way to show them up if their meeting ends ok, of course Bard could always just drop in the middle of it....

'Ladi Williams

It's the lack of sleep.

Ewwwwwwwwwwww

Big I

It just struck me to wonder whether the Red Axe is going to go all Mimir, with her decapitated head still able to talk and offer advice. It'd add to all the Odin imagery Cat's got already.

TeK

I think Aqua is pretty much a Mimir to Cat's Odin, if with more homoeroticism than strictly necessary.

Pethrai D'arkos

Akua Crows damn it! I'm tired of seeing people refer to the Doom of Liesse as water!

ruduen

"‘I did, in fact, try to kill her,’ Tariq said. ‘It did not take, evidently, and the misgivings of my patrons in pursuing her demise gave me pause.’"

You know what might cause misgivings? An aspect which interferes with the senses of the creatures you're checking with. That seems like important information to make sure Tariq knows.

Miles

Yes but that wasn't a moment where would have heard it like that.

Liliet

Black swan problem. It's perfectly reasonable to assume something isn't a factor in a specific situation if it's vanishingly rare and you've never encountered it nor heard of it before, and there is a perfectly reasonable explanation for what's going on already.

When you see truck tracks on the road, assume a truck, not an alien spaceship masquerading as one.

Bard's a bit of an outside context problem, being the most direct instrument of Gods and whatnot.

And I think by this moment Tariq's heard of the ability. It's kind of critical to his sadly saying he still believes in her good intentions instead of vehemently insisting he knows she does.

Xinci

Also, an important factor is that she seemed to be able to mess with how Light targetted things. This doesn't necessarily mean that the Angels were acting out of order when they whispered that it may not be good to kill her.

ninegardens

Hheeyyy Tariq! You Aced it!
Good job!

And his reasons for trusting WB are... pretty damn legit. Specially if many of those things have happened multiple times. The detail of WB bringing him to save Saint makes sense- I always DID wonder how she survived fighting ranger. ... sigh such a cute and sad detail. The memory of the woman Cat killed. Even if she had reason, She was still one of Tariq's oldest friends...

caoimhinh

It had already been said that Tariq had saved the Saint of Swords after her fight with Ranger, one of Tariq's POV parts of a chapter showed it as the reason she hated Ranger. And during the fight between Saint and Rumena, she had a flashback showing us that Hye let her live, simply walking away after cutting her along the torso and apparently disappointed at the Saint's skill. According to Laurence, Ranger gave a look that said "is this all that you are?" before leaving her lying on the ground.

What we didn't know was that Tariq got there in time to put her innards back inside her opened torso thanks to the Bard's telling him.

Shveiran

What's that, Tariq?

You didn't drop the ball?

...Buddy, I'm so proud of you!
Well done! Heavens, what a relief that is.
Good job, Pilgrim, good job.

...

...You are going to die now, aren't you?

Godsdamn it, you are going to die.

'Ladi Williams

And it's probably the mirror knight that kills him. Cementing the fact that Cat has to kill him horribly and inconsequentially like a stray dog.

ninegardens

It's probably the fuckign Bard that will kill him. Using his trust in her... enough to make him hesitate... along with MK stupidity as a weapon.

Konstantin von Karstein

Probably not directly, but by being his usual stupid self. And he will learn his lesson while holding in his arms the bleeding corpse of his mentor.

Darkening

Well, it'd take something with the weight of a mentor's sacrifice to get Cristophe to stop being an idiot.

Salt

Careful what you wish for. That kind of mentor sacrifice + personality redemption tends to be accompanied by an equally dramatic and somewhat inexplicable powerup in terms of competence/overall success.

Which on one hand might be great, a halfway sensible Mirror Knight after a passing a personal crucible would be a genuinely huge asset against the Dead King.

On the other hand, he'd become an absolutely terrifying Hero in the prime of his life, who is thematically all about reflecting evil upon evil eye-for-an-eye style. In a story where your main protagonist is all about Necessary Evil.

The scariest antagonists aren't the ones that are comically misguided, it's the ones that in one form or another have a valid point

Jago

Or instead, it will be his fall from grace. He wants Severance, and the WB has a tale of a hero corrupted by the desire for power to leverage. Or one of a Hero redemption for his great sin.

The choice, for the WB, depend on how she can point those against the DK and Cat.

The only saving grace is that I think that the WB still feel that the DK is her greatest enemy.

Pipie

Nice to see Cat's still just talking to angels. Reminds me of Tyrant's inner monologue during his grand exit,

Djinn O'Cide

Only 222 votes this week, which is the lowest I've seen. Why not go vote now?

KageLupus

You know, I actually really appreciate the way things like gender fluidity are normalized in this story. Not just because i think they deserve more representation in literature in general, but because of the specific implications it has on this setting.

Cat just has to mention that the Headhunter is gender fluid and Klaus gets it. That means it is a common enough phenomena that people generally understand what it means and don't make a fuss about it. And why would they? Headhunter is Named, and sides with Below. Are you going to tell someone with superpowers and loose ethics that they are wrong about which pronoun they should be using?

I am probably reading way deeper into this than is necessary, or even reasonable, but I really do like the idea of Named having such wide ranging effects on the world around them. Named are the stuff of legends and stories and are known to be incredibly independent people. They are like celebrities that can punch people. It wouldn't surprise me at all if the setting's views on gender and sexuality wasn't at least partially influenced by centuries of Named saying "This is how I am and nothing in the world can stop it."

'Ladi Williams

I actually do not like the fact the EE felt it necessary to include modern gender issues into his story. But then its his story. He can write it any way he wants. It's still fucking awesome

John Doe

I think it's nice he doesn't try too hard to draw attention to it. It's just so accepted in the world that there seems to be no stigma against it. Nobody looks down on/attacks/needs to defend villains (or heroes, civilians, etc) for their gender/sexual orientation, it's not even an issue, and people's preferences are treated with the same amount of laissez faire as their favorite alcoholic beverage.

caoimhinh

Yeah, I think that's the best part of how EE gives them representation. It's just a natural thing, and they are people like all others, no big deal and it is not the defining trait of the person.

Way better than so many stories where it's just plain obvious how a character's introduction is simply for the sake of "representation" rather than for the story, and that ends up feeling forced to many readers.

In Practical Guide to Evil, a character's sexuality is background information, just one more detail of what makes the person. Basilia's defining trait is that she is the most badass General in all of Helike, Wekesa was the best mage Praes had in centuries, Yannu Marave is the top military commander of his nation, and so on with every single major character who just happens to be LGBT.

They are interesting and defined characters who simply happen to be LGBT, they are not some LGBT character that's forced into the setting for the sake of representation. The difference is important and not all authors do it right.

Something similar applies to skin color and ethnicity, here it doesn't go beyond "so this person from that nation" in most cases and the "discrimination" shown between ethnicities is more accurately the animosity born from the previous years of war between the nations, which has whole different connotations than the racism we see on Earth. In Calernia, every generation is a post-war generation.

Anyways, the point is that EE is awesome and has done an amazing job.

soulpaintedblack

This is why I still keep reading Guide, and why I dropped The gods are bastards. It's a good story people follow, not some propaganda. It is just... every time diversity is shoved in my throat, my patience wears down and so my tolerance. I would love to read a good story without gender politics.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yannu is lgbt? I didn't catch it 😊

Liliet

He was checking out Razin

caoimhinh

Not Razin, but one of the sons of Ifrima.

Liliet

I could swear he commented on Razin too somewhere but I wouldn't go looking in those interludes if you paid me so I'm going to take your word for it lmao

caoimhinh

The one I remember is when he was checking out Moro in Interlude Congregation III.

"The heir to Vaccei had gained a few fresh scars, fighting at his mother's side against the Marshals. What had already been a hard face on a hard man was now frightful to behold, the red marks left by goblin steel running jagged through the umber-brown and basil-green face paint of his line. The effect was strikingly attractive, though Yannu was careful not to let his gaze linger. He was over a decade older than the other man, after all."

Liliet

Hmmm. Maybe this is what I remember.

KageLupus

That is kind of my point though. In the story they are not issues at all, it is just considered a point of fact that is accepted by every character. And the real thing I was trying to get at is how I feel like the big driving force for that in-universe is almost definitely thanks to Named like the Headhunter.

My favorite thing about any kind of speculative fiction, whether sci-fi or fantasy, is an author going "What happens to the world if X is true" and then really digging into all of the consequences and changes caused by that thing. And I really think a case could be made that "What if people who took on a story role in real life got super powers" at least has the potential to lead to "People are more accepting of lifestyle choices because who is going to tell a Named they are wrong".

panic

I agree on this. It was subtle in the first few books in a way that was inclusive without appearing unnatural or distracting. Now it's just getting plain distracting to read.

sengachi

1) That's the thing though. These aren't 'modern' gender issues. They've been a standard part of every single culture we have relevant records for since people first started writing stuff down. Whether that's shrugging and being chill, assigning specific cultural significance or roles, or actively stigmatizing / outlawing it, it's been around forever.

So when one's making an entirely novel world with novel cultural practices, there's no sense assigning modern gender politics to it. One could as easily pick classical Rome, or a Native American tribe, or a pre colonial African tribe, or pre colonial imperial Africa, or one of the Pacific islands, or ancient Sumer, or any one of a thousand cultures and times to root a story's gender and sexuality politics in. Most of which didn't have a problem with this stuff. "Bringing modern gender stuff into it" is actually making a fuss about it or pretending it doesn't exist, and not making a fuss about it and having those people exist is "not bringing modern gender stuff into it".

2) Being inclusive is a good business decision for word of mouth and community based media. Minority groups tend to be starved for stories which include them, especially stories where their humanity isn't up for debate at all. So stories like that (like PtGE) get a lot of word of mouth spread in those communities. Those groups also tend to be aggressively positive and welcoming of new members, traits you want in a community fandom. Whereas the kind of bigots who'd stop reading a story because of this stuff, you might actually want to stop reading. They tend to be more gatekeepery and likely to harass other fandom members, creating a more toxic space. Which can drive down readership.

TL;DR: Active inclusivity gives a story appeal in story-deprived communities and drives out some of the most toxic would-be members of. It's a win-win as a business decision.

3) Lastly, have you ever considered that EE might be bi? Or ace? Or trans? Or any one of the identities represented in the story?

Saying "I don't see this as necessary" assumes that it's not important to EE on a personal level. When you're a cis straight allosexual person it's very easy to say "this isn't necessary" because it's not important to you. But not everyone who writes stories is like you, and sometimes including people like oneself and one's loved ones can feel personally important to a writer.

Xinci

I mean its pretty logical if you have people in a world where magic needs to factor in literally everything that things like sexuality and gender would become normalized.

pault52

I completely agree. Also it's really awesome to have enby/fluid rep that isn't alien or a shapeshifter

Daniel E

That's just what Dread Emperor Traitorous wants you to think.

mamm0nn

"A woman, the diplomat saw, then his gaze lingered on her throat. Not that she had always been that.
"Sire," the general said, dismounting hastily and kneeling.
"General Basilia," the Tyrant said, patting her armoured shoulder affectionately."
-Prologue 3

That said, it does seem that this setting implements the modern ideals a bit heavily at times. Ironically though, EE being much more heavy-handed with it in the first books makes this story pretty much Good white people vs the Evil coloured people because no country is quite a hotbed of not-Europeans the way Praes is while the most Goodish country is also decisively the most caucasian in both appearance and culture.

caoimhinh

I am fairly sure that the initial point of "the white guys are the Good Kingdom and the black guys are the Evil Empire" was a point of parody and playing with stereotypes.

Kind of like the Black Knight is a short white guy, and the White Knight is a short black guy, where it is a subversion of the stereotypes. Neither of them is the stereotypical Knight that people on earth usually think of when they hear their Names.

mamm0nn

Oh yeah, no discussion there. It stays much a jab at fantasy tropes which either stem from a more racist time or which are directly ripped off from the LotR. And no hate about this being a more deconstructed case here.
But when adding these lggpt elements to the story though, such acts hold consequences of making the tropes stand out starker and hold weight where they're otherwise easier considered a stab at the tropes.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, same for sexism. Praes was sexist in the past, until one Dread Empress « fired » a director of the War College. And telling Wekesa that his an abomination would be a bad idea for you and the city you're in.

Honestly, I don't see this kind of wide representation in a lot of fiction. It's a really nice touch, and it makes me feel good.

caoimhinh

It's not because they are Named.

It's simply because in Calernia no one gives a damn about other people's sexuality or gender identity. That's it, pure and simple, there was just no discrimination to begin with.

Named aren't given the privilege of living their sexuality the way they like, but rather everyone is. There are plenty of other situations we have seen through the books that show us that Named have a variety of privileges in their respective societies and countries of origin (military rank, authority, nobility title, etc), liberty of sexuality is not one of those, it is a self-evident right that everyone in Calernia has.

Javvies

I think the case was being made that the current culture of relative equality and openness likely has origins in the presence and activities of past Named.

And, to be fair, we do have at least some evidence that that is true.

There was that Dread Empress who fired somebody from a catapult for opposing the gender integration of the Legions at the Academy. And Amadeus pushed the Reforms through, resulting in species equality inside the Legions, which are a stepping stone towards broader species equality.

Jago

Note that "gender fluid" can be literal.

The Assassin has no known gender. The Dark elves don't care for sex after their power increase. I don't doubt that there are other examples in the setting.

Javvies

Assassin has always been referred to as male, well by using male pronouns, by Scribe, other members of the Calamities, and those close to them. That is, those who ought to be in a position to know.

It's just that Assassin also has some kind of super disguise power, probably Aspect based, that may or may not be shapeshifting, that includes female forms and appearances.

mamm0nn

"It is possible that the attack on the Arsenal was meant to aid in the long term," Tariq said, then grimaced and poured himself another finger of brandy. "But that is irrelevant. She has forced us to take her as an enemy through her actions, regardless of whatever intent might lie behind them."

"So what you're saying is that I've been Acceptable Good all along and that you were being a retarded fuck-up for fucking invading Callow with an Proceran army and a godsdamned Lawful Stupid paladin _after_ the Praesi occupation of twenty years ended, and kept at it after finding out I'm a decent person?" Cat hisses. "Because if you consider the notion of a Villain doing bad things for the eventual greater good _at all_, that's pretty much exactly and unarguably what you're saying. Fuck you and fuck your double standards, we wouldn't be in this shit if you told Procer to fuck off after I told you of the demon egg and took the Levantines with you on the way out."

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hey, could you not use the r-slur? It's dehumanizing to mentally ill and developmentally disabled people, myself being both.

Liliet

What Isi said.

And Tariq did privately mourn with Laurence having to fight Catherine. The pattern matches: believe in good intentions, recognise they are not magic and fight those you have to fight based on your own and your allies' understanding.

pirateddesigns

"...he was [i]the[/i] mentor."

Oh, shit. I did not catch the gravity of this back at MK's trial. Poor Tariq, killed by his well-meaning companions.

laguz24

He's been the "mentor" for years and he's still around, that is what makes him terrifying. Though, he is still so so dead.

agumentic

Tariq pretty much accepted that he is not going to survive this war, so even though he could avoid the dangers involved with the position of mentor, I am pretty sure he will lean into the role and accept story-given death to propel MK further.

JJR

"I have yet to witness any power in this world or the next that quell gossip,"

Demon of Absence should do the trick. Though it is understandable that he couldn't think of it.

Miles

This again. Those. Don't. Exist!

Salt

There is plenty of unverified gossip about them existing though

laguz24

There is most likely a demon of gossip or a villain under the Name: Malicious Gossip.

panic

Is it just me or has EE marketly increased the amount of PC nods at trans and gay people in this book? In the first few books it was just, there every now and then. But now it seems that each chapter we get some nod that X is trans and X is gay and X identifies as a bottle of brandy. Getting a wee bit distracting.

Daniel E

Oh man. The prospect of Catherine giving an 'independence day' speech to the largest group of Villains ever assembled has me grinning like mad.

Tom

> Mighty Jindrich could hold field command

I didn't have the impression that Jindrich was particularly tactically-minded

Also, can Hakram use Rampage to do paperwork really fast?

Daniel E

lol. Even if he could, I doubt there is a quill & parchment capable of withstanding the incredible forces being applied again them.

disappointed in CAT

Is Catherine more and more Stupid Evil?

It could be a function of her adopting roles like First Under the Night and Representative of the Villains, but Cat has seemed much more Classic Evil without the wit lately. Doing things like haunting nightmares, threatening ruin, etc. are invitations to get smacked.

Yes, she makes some quips while raiding the bar, and pays for her drinks here, but big picture I think something fundamental has shifted. She used to be commented on that she was a Villain but not one of Below's. It was more that she was unGood. Now though she leans hard into her reputation for being Evil, and I think it's problematic. I'm not sure whether she comes back from this.

ninegardens

Can you give any examples ASIDE from haunting nightmares of Mercantis?

In this chapter we have her... having a reasonable conversation with Tariq... another reasonable conversation with Klaus... and trying to organize her side of the war.
In previous chapters... she uses necromancy on a criminal to avoid civil war levels of danger (which Tariq agrees with)... and messing with the WB after being attacked.
None of that exactly screams "stupid villian ball"... unless there was something I was missing?

Mental Mouse

> Is Catherine more and more Stupid Evil?

No, she's always been willing to pull out the scary shit when it's needed – dropping lakes, ripping up that Everdark city (and stranding sigil-holders in Arcadia until they knuckled under), and for that matter undead exploding goats probably already qualified in context.

The nightmare business was tightly contained and non-lethal, just leaning hard on the Mercantis folks – who were being themselves being Dastardly-level assholes. ("Hey, if you wanna keep holding off the Dead King, well, you're gonna have to give us what we want.")

Satan

Didn't Cat already learn the purpose of the Bard? I thought she was a tool of the Gods to make sure that none of their creations can ever grow to threaten their positions. And she was selected for the job by being particularly "annoying" to the imposed order they created.

aran

"They?" he asked.

"Fluid," I explained.

I love the casualness there so much. Like, the people of Calernia – Good or Evil – might butcher each other by the thousands for simple political expediency, but damned if anyone will give anyone shit about their gender or orientation.

Mental Mouse

I do have a slight gripe with the brevity here, simply because swapping genders may be accepted (if only for self-preservation), but it doesn't seem common enough that "gender-fluid" should be a well-understood reference. "Changeable" would have been better, though "they change depending who they've eaten lately", would be a bit much.

On the other hand, that might well be something of a "Tiffany problem"...

Chapter 46: Vestibule

"I make it a habit to kill all the people at court who do not want to usurp me, as they are principled fellows and so eminently more dangerous than your average conspirators."

– Dread Emperor Iniquitous, first of the 'Mayfly Emperors'

As of dawn there were eleven villains in Hainaut, if I was considered to stand among their number even with my Name not yet fully formed.

We didn't even make up half the Named currently in the principality, though at least we did count for more than a third, yet I honestly couldn't think of many occasions where so many villainous Named had gathered together in the same place at the same time – much less while being on the same side. Not unless Revenants counted, anyway, which in my opinion they did not. It was a lot easier to herd cats when they were dead. This was not the sort of thing to approach half-cocked, but I found there was a remarkable scarcity of knowledge on affairs this: even more than heroes, Below's lot clutched their secrets tightly.

Fortunately for me, I had to the former heiress to Wolof in my service. And considering that Akua had once intended to rule all of Calernia, she'd paid even closer attention to the underlying currents of villainy that your average Sahelian scion would have. She'd wanted to avoid the mistakes of her predecessors, after all. Her ambition itself might have been foolish, but I had to concede she'd not gone about pursuing it foolishly. Save for one or two exceptions. When I brought up the subject in my tent early in the morning, over my breakfast, I found her almost eager to talk about it. It was subject of long-standing fascination for her, as it turned out.

"Alliances between villains have not been studied in great depth outside of Praes," Akua told me, still sounding pleased by the line of inquiry. "And aside from the Tower itself, there are none who can rival the records of Wolof on the subject. It was of great interest to my predecessors, as you might imagine."

Wasn't hard to. I'd seen enough corpses I barely needed to try.

"I recall hearing the Sahelians haven't raised the most tyrants, among the old families," I noted a tad more diplomatically. "Though you're up there for Warlocks, right?"

"The Mirembe of Aksum are not far behind us on the latter count," Akua said. "Six less, I believe, though it might have changed since I absented myself. They raised very different practitioners from my family, however, and their arts have not well adapted to modern warmaking."

I cocked an eyebrow, curious as to what Praesi highborn might consider sorcery aging poorly. Devils didn't exactly get dusty.

"Impractical?" I asked.

"Aksum was once known as the Cauldron of Beasts," she said. "The Mirembe have long been known for their interest in the crafting and alteration of life."

Monster-making, she meant. Charming.

"They dabbled in heredity as well, and created the first known stable breeding program," Akua continued. "The practices have since shifted, of course, but their work remains foundational."

I could see why their specialties had not aged well. In the old stories the Praesi always came at Callow with a few horrifying monsters that one of our heroes ended up killing, and the stories about the orcs that could breathe under water and the sentient tigers were infamous even out west. Not a lot of those had been successes in a more than marginal sense, though, and the Reforms would have been the final nail in their coffin – especially so after the Conquest proved that the Legions as envisioned by Grem One-Eye and my father were highly effective. And since every High Seat and more than a few lesser lords now ran their own breeding programs, it'd not given the Mirembe a lasting advantage.

"That aside, I would caution you to think of raising too many tyrants as a crown worth contending for in the eyes of the High Seats," Akua said. "The Yeboah of Nok once succeeded at claiming the Tower three generations in a row, but none of the old families were willing to allow rule of Praes to be clutched too tightly. Their lines was exterminated to the last, and the Sesay were installed to rule the city."

"I get your point," I drily said. "It wasn't in the interest of the Sahelians to win too much, even when they could."

"Exactly," Akua smiled. "Though even over periods of relative humility my ancestors were not the kind of people to suffer lack of influence. As the Empire often boasts the largest concentration of allied villains on Calernia in any generation, grasping the nature of such alliances was a necessity."

"Allied might be a bit of a stretch," I snorted.

Back in the old days Praes had usually counted more Named than the kingdom, but they'd so frequently lost in part because they were as interested in backstabbing each other as actually stabbing Callow.

"Perhaps not to the extent of the Calamites," Akua noted, "but you would be surprised. The most famous example would be the Black Knight and Chancellor of Malignant the Second, who all histories agree loved him deeply. It is why the man reigned a full decade and a half while his handling of the Empire can most charitably be describe as occasionally benign ineptitude."

There'd been a sprinkling of occasions like these throughout imperial history, she told me, but the pattern that emerged to my ear was that the bonds were usually between smaller groups: a pair or maybe three Named, often who'd come up through a transitional Name together. About half of the time they ended up offing the ruling tyrant and putting one of them up on the seat instead. Being a tightly bound band of five, and one essentially loyal to the ruling Empress to boot, was where the Calamities had broken fresh grounds.

"The Empire usually waxes and wanes between three and eight villains at any time," Akua said. "Though only four Names are considered to be part of the fabric of Praes."

I didn't need her to tell me which. Dread Emperor, Chancellor, Warlock and Black Knight. The four roles that'd been at the core of the Empire's way of life for centuries, Yet I was now learning that there were much more nuances to those roles than I'd believed. For one, not all Names came with every generation. Praesi highborn usually saw which had had come and which had not as an indication of what should be expected from a reign.

"It is usually seen as the mark of a weak tyrant to have a Chancellor but no Black Knight," she told me. "On the other hand, one who claimed the Tower with both a Black Knight and a Warlock but no Chancellor will be expected to aggressively contest influence with the High Seats – often with a measure of success, historically speaking.”

“But you get other Named as well,” I said. “There’s been other Assassins – in other places too, but more in Praes – and old Callowan histories speak of Necromancers too.”

Unfortunately the skill of Praesi in that branch of sorcery paired with the relative magical ignorance of my countrymen meant that old records could often only guess at if they’d been dealing with a necromancer or a Necromancer.

“Indeed,” Akua nodded. “Before the Wars of the Dead it was common for a Lich to exist, and since the heyday of fighting arenas in Maleficent the Second’s reign we’ve had recurring Gladiators. The latter is even more common in Stygia, however, and so somewhat looked down.”

“Of course it is,” I sighed “I take it Names without much precedent are also considered pedestrian?”

“The Captain and the Scribe were once underestimated for this very reason,” Akua said, then looked chagrined. “I was not immune to some shade of that foolishness, I’ll admit. I once thought very little of the Scribe.”

“She cultivates that impression actively,” I said with a kernel of sympathy, though it really had been a mistake.

The Scribe’s spies had been instrumental in keeping her contained, back when she’d been Governess of Liesse, and that was just a drop in the bucket of the quiet work done to hasten her downfall. The bloody coup against Hasenbach in Salia was a good example of what Scribe could when let off the leash, and its aftermath was still haunting the First Prince even years later.

“So I’ve head,” Akua neutrally said. “Regardless, the Empire’s traditional position as the leading light of villainy-”

Did that count as blasphemy, I wondered? Probably not unless she was talking about Light.

“- has meant that foreign villains whose defeats were not mortal have often fled to Praes for refuge. Treatment varied according to who held the Tower, but some rose quite high when the Dread Empire was expanding and looking for champions. Sorcerous, in particular, opened his court to many and gave them great authority.”

My brow rose.

"I don't recall hearing of any foreign villains in Praes during my lifetime," I said. "Which surprises me, considering the Grey Pilgrim has been terrorizing villains out west and south. There were bound to have been a few who wanted to get out before either he or the Saint strolled into town."

"The end of the last two gave pause to any possible takers, I expect," Akua drily said.

A beat passed.

"Black killed them, didn't he?" I bluntly said.

"They came in the decades preceding our births – the Reaver from Penthesand the Blue Mage from Ashur, to be specific – but they were brought in as helpers for the Purebloods," Akua elaborated. "Naturally the Carrion Lord brutally murdered them at the first halfway decent excuse and extended the purge to anyone associated with them. An entire branch family of the Niri of Okoro was forced to eat until their stomachs burst in what he called a warning about 'overly ambitious appetite'."

I coughed to hide the way my lips were treacherously twitching upwards. She noticed.

"It's considered one of the reasons for the later succession crisis in Okoro," Akua reproached.

"Very sad," I got out soberly. "Not at all ironic, or in any way cathartic to hear about."

I changed the subject before that woeful look she was giving me could lead to a reproach about the importance of not killing Wasteland aristocrats in amusing ways. Talk about not knowing your audience.

"Praes isn't the only place to have had villain alliances, though," I said. "We had the Sable Order, in Callow, and the Free Cities were whipped by the League of Rogues for a while."

The Sable Order had been a chivalric order led by four fallen heroes who'd gathered a lot of disaffected knights, bandits and penniless soldiers in an army and brought the kingdom to its knees. They'd had the run of the countryside for years, until the Albans managed to finally beat them on the field. The League of Rogues – although they'd never called themselves that, and the name had come with later histories – has been even more successful, the seven villains having occupied half the Free Cities for over a decade and cowed even Ashur for a time. About two centuries back, I figured?

I remembered them in part because they'd surprised me, as a kid. They'd been unusually steadfast allies even when they began losing ground, supposedly because they'd taken oaths of mutual loyalty to each other guaranteed by devils. I'd wondered why every villain do that for two months, until I got my hands on the second volume of Wicked Deeds and learned about the very ugly way the last two had died when the devils came to collect.

"The Iron Kingdoms are arguably a greater success story than either of these," Akua replied.

I blinked in surprise.

"Those collapsed almost immediately," I slowly said. "And they were a refuge for villains, but hardly led by them."

It'd been one of the history lessons from the orphanage tutors instead of one of my private forays, but I distinctly remembered being told this.

"That is what Proceran histories insist, yes," she amusedly told me. "And so most everyone believes. Fortunately one of my ancestors, Elimu Sahelian, served as court mage to 'Queen' Alandra so we reliably know otherwise from his memoirs."

"He served as what now?" I flatly asked.

"Court mage," she repeated. "It is an old practice of my family, dearest. We've gathered many secrets and artefacts this way, leaving with them when the cause collapse. We did the same thing with Theodosius the Unconquered himself, and a dozen other lesser hegemons."

I was quite itching to get my hands on the memoirs of whoever the Sahelians had sent to advise the man that was arguably the greatest military mind in Calernian history, but that could wait until later.

"So the Iron Kingdoms were a villain alliance?" I frowned.

These days some scholars even argued that the name 'Iron Kingdoms' was meaningless, that it'd simply been a very chaotic period in Proceran and Levantine history where rule of law had frayed nearly beyond repair in a certain region, but that wasn't yet the traditional view. Properly speaking, the words referred to a bunch of bandit fiefdoms that'd briefly seized control of most of current Valencis as well as the adjoining Brocelian Forest and Cusp.

"It was led by nine bandit and raider Named," Akua agreed, "the remembered kings and queens of iron. And while three of the 'kingdoms' collapsed swiftly, as you said, others fared much better. It was nearly nine years before Valencis was fully reclaimed, and it took over two decades before the five kingdoms in the Brocelian were brought down by heroes."

I let out a thoughtful noise. Yeah, I could see why Procer in particular would have wanted to keep that story quiet. These days the Principate went all Damned this and Damned that when Named got inconvenient, but it'd been a lot younger back then. It would have been a bad blow to its prestige if a pack of villains had been able to seize one of its principalities. The kind of blow that made fresh conquests consider rebellion and borderlands mull independence. The histories I'd been taught would be a lot more palatable to the Highest Assembly, and safer to own up to.

"Neither Praes or these alliances really fit what we have as a precedent," I finally decided.

"This is true," Akua easily said, "but attempting to establish direct precedents when multiple Named are involved is foted a fool's errand regardless. Valuable insight can still be gained from observing what led to the victories and the failures of these arrangements."

"Infighting," I drolly said. "And heroes. Occasionally armies paired with the previous too."

"Yes, very clever," she replied, rolling her eyes. "About what I might have expected, given your terrible essay on the Licerian Wars."

I gaped at her. Wait, what? Shit, no, it actually made sense that she might have read that at some point. Sure, it was a piece of homework I'd written half-drunk in the backroom of the Rat's Nest, but Malicia's spymistress had gotten her hands on it back in the day – she'd even mentioned it, when we'd first spoken in the Tower. The Sahelians had infiltrated the Eyes and the Tower, back in the day, though I was never sure to quite what extent. Merciless Gods, though, was this the only piece of writing that I was ever going to be known by?

"At least Hasenbach won't know about it," I mused.

"Mother sold quite a bit of imperial intelligence through Mercantis when her coffers ran low, so she actually might," Akua amusedly replied.

Goddamn Sahelians, I uncharitably thought. Given my luck, that fucking thing was going to end up my only written work to be passed down the ages.

"Regardless, my heart, you are correct that infighting is a recurring pattern," the shade mused. "Arguably the most important. It has been the end of many a skillful reign in Ater, and certainly precipitated the fall of the Iron Kingdoms."

"That's the nature of villainy, to an extent," I said. "You don't become one without being hard-headed, and unlike heroes we tend to see each other as potential threats instead of potential allies. That's a recipe for blood on the floor at the first disagreement."

Heroes did kill each other on occasion too, I wouldn't ignore that, but it was significantly rarer.

"Ah, but there lies the area of interest," she smiled, golden eyes alight with pleasure. "What aspect of villainy in particular drives us to conflict amongst ourselves? I have pondered this long, Catherine, as when I dreamed of empire still I believed that the governors of my Calernian empire must be villains. It was imperative that I understand how to keep them from turning on each other as well as myself."

I drummed my fingers against the table absent-mindedly as I thought. Villains tended to be more prone to violence, broadly speaking. They also tended to just be worse people than heroes, but that was a weak argument. Most people on Calernia were worse than heroes, by the same measure, and they weren't as prone to infighting as villains. Names did tend to magnify your flaws as well as your virtues, but that was a weak argument as well. Villains weren't all cut from some universal cloth, in either personality or objectives, so the consistent infighting of their alliances couldn't really be traced back to some universal flaw we all shared.

But then that was looking at the individual, when one of my first lessons had been that the system often had the greater impact.

"Villain stories tend to reward conflict and acting decisively," I finally said. "It's an incentive. If it makes you stronger, helps you to win, most people will lean into the traits. When unchecked and become reflexive, that tendency results in poor decisions like backstabbing a nominal ally while heroes are at the gate."

"Squire to the end, I see," Akua murmured, sounding thoughtful. "An interesting answer, and not one I necessarily disagree with. Yet I arrived to a different conclusion myself. I believe that ambition is the keystone."

"Not all villains are ambitious," I pointed out. "It's not like every Black Knight eventually made a play for the Tower."

"Ambition can be a nuanced thing," she replied, leaning forward in animation. "A Black Knight's ambition could be to stand the greatest hero-killer of the age, or to lead the Empire to military victory. Rule need not be the driving force of them. Ambition is, to my eye, the seeking of excellence. The nature of that excellence varies with every Named."

There was a refrain of old Praesi pride in there, I thought. The old guard of tyrants had often claimed that they were seekers of excellence, that their philosophy was one of advancement while the Gods Above were enemy of all change. Like most philosophical arguments preached by people who practiced mass human sacrifice and casual assassination, I tended to be skeptical of their claims. If anything it was the Praesi circular circus of usurpation and civil war that was stagnant, whatever the adherents of 'iron sharpens iron' might claim. I didn't entirely disagree with her assertions, though.

"I'll agree that Named tend to be driven people," I conceded. "But I don't buy the rest of that. There's outliers, sure, like the Tyrant of the Hierarch. But someone like the Harrowed Witch isn't trying to be the best anything – she's trying to not get eaten by the brother she murdered and bound, and maybe trying to move up in the world when there's nothing more pressing."

"She improvised the spell that bound her brother's spirit, highly advanced necromancy, with few resources at hand and no margin of error or time to spare," Akua stated in reply. "One might argue that her ambition is survival in difficult times, and that she has proved highly able in pursuing it."

"Or she was already skilled, and just got desperate and inspired," I replied. "But fine, for the sake of argument let's say I agree with you. Where is this headed?"

"Conflicting excellences are the cause of strife between villains," she said. "Unlike Above's champions, who seek not excellence but a particular outcome, rivalry is natural between us. And given the rewards of violence, as you have put it, villains are more prone to disposing of rivals and obstacles than reach peaceful accords even when these might be more practical. It is why Procer can be the region that has the most villains on Calernia, by simple numbers, but alliances between them are nearly unheard of."

I took me a while to place the expression on her face. She was enjoying this, I realized. The discussion, the debates. I did not let it distract me, or allow my thoughts to meander down the path of who she might have been if she were not the Doom of Liesse.

"Without a common framework keeping us bound," Akua continued, "like the Dread Empire or a greater common ambition in the vein of the League of Rogues and the Iron Kingdoms, villains will nearly always default into competition."

Mhm. The argument somewhat held even when looked at closely, I decided. The infighting in villain alliances tended to crop up when the shared ambition was collapsing, not in the initial string of victories that most villains got to taste before their comeuppance.

"And how did your great Calernian empire propose to get around that flaw?" I asked.

It'd been idle curiosity that made me ask, but suddenly there was a weight to the tent. To this conversation. We had not often talked of the Doom of Liesse, of her plans when she had been the Diabolist. And never this explicitly. She did not openly show hesitation, but her silence and calm face made it plain to me anyway. The golden-eyed shade knew me well, these days, but that blade cut both ways.

"By making more of you," Akua eventually replied. "Client queens and kings that were genuinely invested in the rule of their province, and capable of dominating Named within their realm. So long as my fortress stood, fear of Greater Breaches being opened in retaliation to treachery would have prevented most forms of rebellion – and I believed myself capable of triumphing in the inevitable ensuing shadow wars."

"It was a shit plan," I frankly replied. "You gave yourself a single point of failure and left each of your 'clients' a powerbase to consolidate. The moment the fortress was out, your entire empire would immediately collapse."

"Which was why I intended to build several more," Akua admitted, "once I had the resources of Callow and Praes at my disposal."

I breathed out. Shit. I'd never actually considered that. Would it have worked? No, I eventually decided. The moment she got Malicia and I to surrender, Diabolist would have stood as a beacon for every hero on the continent. I'd had to bend over backwards to avoid that, and she wouldn't have been able to manage while standing atop a fucking doomsday weapon. She'd not last long enough to make a second fortress, or it'd get destroyed while still incomplete. The Diabolist would still have made a horrid mess on the way out, though, possibly afflicting several parts of Calernia with permanent Hellgates before dying. Gods, Second Liesse had been a nightmare but it was still better than... this. I forced myself to think of something else.

"A framework," I evenly said. "The Truce and Terms are one of those, arguably. As is the war against the Dead King."

"The Truce and Terms are and should be considered a construct to help to wage war against Keter," Akua said.

It was quiet, but I could hear the muted relief to her voice. Like we'd both stepped away from a ledge.

"It is the war that has gathered Named," she continued, "and in my opinion it should be considered the 'alliance' within which villains will be jostling for position."

"Jostling only to an extent," I reminded her. "I've avoided a lot of fights by having such a strong position that potential rivals didn't want to take the risk of a challenge."

More than a few villains coveted my seat as our representative under the Truce and Terms but they were also aware that I had an army, Named allies and the Kingdom of Callow's power backing me. It wasn't full-proof, of course. Some had tried to take that swing anyway, unable to deal with being the second in anything. The Red Reaver had been one, and I'd made an example of him. Others, like the Barrow Sword, had picked a fight to test my strength and then fallen in line almost amicably when I'd proven I was not to be trifled with.

"Several sources of your current influence are temporary," Akua pointed out. "Your position as representative, your queenship over Callow, your positional advantage within the Grand Alliance. They can serve as a defensive asset, prevent others from striking at you, but they should not be confused for a way to make people listen to you. If you want obedience of the villains you have gathered here, and for them to bind themselves to your Accords, you must find a way to help their own ambitions within the frame of your own greater one."

I did not immediately reply. As it happened, I was not under the illusion that my current influence among my kind would carry beyond the war against Keter. I was in a unique position at the moment but sooner or later the stars would fall out of alignment and my authority would wane. For now, though, I still had it. And I fully intended to use it as much to carry out the war as to prepare the peace that'd follow it. Akua was still thinking of this as a warlord would, though or perhaps a Dread Empress – like a centerpiece binding important assets to her by giving them what they wanted, and pairing that fulfillment to service.

But I couldn't think like that, not if I wanted my work to survive me. If I wanted villains to embrace the Liesse Accords, that meant convincing them that submitting to some rules was worth the benefits the submission would earn them.

"Turning wolves into wolfhounds," I mused.

"One piece of meat at a time," Akua Sahelian softly agreed.

—

The morning's war council yielded no surprises. The Iron Prince and I would hold command of the two offensives, and General Pallas broad authority but not actual command over the reserves. I'd wasted no time in politely requesting of Princess Beatrice of Hainaut, freshly under my command, that she 'make suggestions' about the fantassins companies that would best suit our needs. I made it clear I wasn't trying to leave Klaus Papenheim with only dregs, but that she shouldn't feel shy about taking the better cut either. She was amenable to the request, and gave the impression she amenable to my being in command period. I had hopes of a good working relationship.

Mind you, she was an Alamans of royal blood. I fully expected she'd be able to put a smile on surrendering to Malicia.

With that settled, I turned to the looming matter of the council of villains. The hill Akua had told me of turned out to be more than serviceable, and so we went ahead with using it. The firepit was cleaned and deepened, then ten high seats brought out in a broad circle – Hakram would not need one, bringing his own. Seating would be assigned, I'd decided, to avoid chaos breaking out immediately instead of eventually. I considered the known tapestry of grudges in silence, looking at the seats. The Barrow Sword and Headhunter couldn't be too close without fingers being lost so I put the fire between them, and leaving the Summoner by either the Beastmaster or the Berserker was a recipe for a snide comment preceding bloodspill so they'd have to be split up.

Hakram on my left and Indrani on my right was only to be expected, but the seat to their sides would be taken as signs of favour so I had to be careful who got them. The Rapacious Troubadour would have to get the seat by Archer, I thought. I'd left him to handle Named-finding out here with little prior warning and he'd done well, so it was owed. It would be the Berserker by Adjutant's side, though, I eventually decided. She was fresh to Hainaut, and I'd only met her the once before leaving – just long enough to send her beyond the trenches to hunt with the Silver Huntress – but during my absence she'd apparently killed a Revenant and wounded another, which merited encouragement.

That made five seats settled, and I leaned on my staff as I worried my lip and considered the rest.

"Where do you intend to place the Headhunter?" Akua asked.

I did not glance back, having known she wasn't far. I would have brought Hakram as well, but he wasn't exactly in a state to make the trip quickly. Indrani was currently sleeping, having travelled a full day and night over the last stretch to get here in time, so of my inner circle it was only the two of us here.

"Between Berserker and Beastmaster, I think," I said.

The Levantine villain wouldn't be able to easily mess with either, considering neither was a slouch up close or a stranger to violence. She nodded, eyes pensive.

"Barrow Sword by the Rapacious Troubadour?" she suggested.

I hummed. Ishaq tended to get along with people who weren't of the Blood – or whose savagery he did not consider to be damaging his own chances of becoming one of the Blood, namely the Headhunter – so I was actually wary of placing him too early. He was valuable because of that relative lack of enmities. Still, he had to sit somewhere.

"Then Concocter by him," I said.

'Cocky' was both sharp-tongued and not physically powerful, so I had to be wary of where I placed her. If she mouthed off to the Berserker she was liable to lose a few teeth, not to mention the bloody scalp the Headhunter would be after. The Concocter would likely have pockets full of poison, I further considered, so if she retaliated the escalation would be steep and immediate. Best to avoid the trouble entirely by giving her mild-mannered neighbours.

"Summoner by her," Akua said. "He will enjoy word of the Arsenal, no?"

The man was still miffed he'd been assigned as a combat sorcerer instead of a researcher, as I recalled, but he'd never hidden his continuing fascination for the Arsenal. It was a good pick. With a little luck he might even be too busy talking to her to insult anyone else for at least part of this council.

"Agreed," I grunted. "Which would leave the Harrowed Witch between Summoner and Beastmaster."

"She was in Archer's service for some time," Akua noted. "That should ensure civility of the Beastmaster."

Or encourage him to lash out at the Witch as indirect vengeance on Indrani, I thought, since her connections made her very risky to take swing at these days. It'd not escaped me that Archer's fellow pupils under the Lady of the Lake did not have the fondest memories of their time together, though Beastmaster had always struck me as indifferent where the Silver Huntress and the Concocter had been venomous. It was a measured risk, I decided. The worst the Summoner would send the Witch's way was likely to be a few snide words about hedge wizardry, and I trusted her to be able to ignore that. She'd struck me as being steady of temperament, back in the Arsenal.

"It will do," I said.

My gaze swept over the seats. It would have to. Soon enough we would be going to war, and I wanted every sac of venom emptied before we were on the march.

vernal.ancient

“ten high seats brought out in a board circle – Hakram would not need one, bringing his own.”

Ah, a fine mix of dark humor and understatement.

vernal.ancient

Also, typo: “board” there should be “broad”

308924810a

Huh, aren’t there also ten High Seats of Praes?

Liliet

Seven IIRC? Wolof, Aksum, Nok, Okoro, Thalassina, Foramen, Kahtan.

Letouriste

Probably less now. Thalassina is a pile of rubbles and several others got heavily bloodied/destroyed

Darkening

Huh, new formatting on the quotes? Interesting. Gotta admit, I really enjoy these humanizing scenes with Akua. Need to get us and Cat really invested before Cat has to brutally murder her for the second time.

Liliet

Akua is a fucking nerd.

IMHO, if you want to see who she would have been if she wasn’t a villain, look no further than Blessed Artificer. Not because they’re cousins, though that’s a nice narrative move, but the actual similarities: they both focus on building things, they both devote themselves fully to a cause they utilize that focus for, they both... well, Akua used to be about as arrogant and short-sighted without actually being stupid in any sense of the word.

I honestly want to see them in the same room / on the same team for a prolonged amount of time. That’s gotta be delicious, because I’m pretty sure Akua would in fact be actually jealous.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh past jealousy into envy here. After all, BA proved successful in getting laid with the villain she wanted to bone.

Darkening

When did akua express interest in the hunted magician?

Pethrai D'arkos

Pretty sure he's referring to Cat there.

Matthew Wells

Pretty sure Insanenoodleguy was referring to Akua's crush on a different villain, as we've been reminded over the last couple chapters.

Liliet

Oh, right.

Pretty sure BA doesn't have a crush on the guy though lmao

Insanenoodlyguy

What the others said.

Liliet

...wait, what?

Evgeny Permyakov

> before Cat has to brutally murder her for the second time.

First, it needs to be excessively cruel and elaborate, so brutal is out of question.

Second, she still can dodge the bullet on technicality. The wording Vivienne used leaves some place. Take out pieces of Akua's soul one by one and assemble again – Akua would still be snuffed out with full understanding what is taken from, but still continue existing. Could even be a repeat performance.

shikkarasu

I'm hoping for Akua to willingly sacrifice herself for someone else. It would be the destruction of her mind, soul, and her personal values. If that isn't victory over your nemesis we need to redefine terms.

agumentic

Cat is no longer Fae, there is no need to dodge oaths on technicalities. She could break it if she really wanted to – she just won't, at least in spirit, both because Vivienne matters to her and because she is a Callowan herself, her long price will come. I doubt it would be anything so crass as murder, and it might hurt Cat more than Akua, in truth, but it will happen.

Bellower

who knew villainous seating arrangements could be so fascinating.

I wouldn't be surprised if the Harrowed Witches ghost brother doesn't throw something to start a fight in hopes of getting his sister killed.

LarsBlitzer

I agree he'd likely take a swing at it, but the Summoner is right beside her and would be in a position to wrangle him back under control for practicality if nothing else. The Witch would be in his debt, and being able to showcase his power in front of his peers, to prove he's more than "just a battlemage" and therefore worthy of contributing to the research at the Arsenal. The benefit outweighs the drawback of letting her be dragged to Hell or wherever.

mamm0nn

Brother's ghost shows up and Cat just steals him with Night before any other Named can strike him down and de-Name the Witch.

Ninestrings

It's like arranging seating for a wedding. An Evil wedding.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Oh my god, the quote formatting changed!

Not sure why I'm so excited about this, just am. Time to read the chapter.

Djinn O'Cide

Go. Vote. Still in the lead, but under 200 votes right now. Never saw that before.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Xinci

I am so happy Cat and Akua finally got a talk about Villain frameworks. It makes sense if Below truly did have a bet against Above that a sufficiently constructed framework could support multiple Named for multiple functions just like Heroes serve specific functions(even if the source of them being willing to serve differs).

Javvies

Cat's right, Akua would never have been able to last long enough to establish redundant summoning installations. Even ignoring Malicia's plan to steal it from her, and there were probably contingency plans for Malicia's retaking of Liesse (and the artifact) that didn't involve Amadeus capturing it for her.

Villain seating charts. Good to see Cat is putting more thought into preparing for this meeting than Hanno did into the Hero meeting.

Liliet

To be fair, the heroes didn't fight over the seating.

Salt

Eh, let's be real, the Heroes squabble was just that – a squabble that was pretty unfitting of the title "Hero". No need to dress it up as anything but the massive disappointment that it was

It's just that, the reason the Heroes /single/ attempted coup nearly unraveled the truce and terms while no one batted an eyelash at the Villains /multiple/ attempted coups – at least one of which cat made a gruesome public example of – is because Heroes are usually rather decent people who are expected to be rather decent. Villains are generally giant assholes who are expected to be giant assholes.

The part he's wrong about is that Hanno wasn't wrong for not expecting that level of incivility out of the Heroes – the brawl was a big deal precisely because it was a thus far unprecedented case of Heroes falling so far below their namesake during the Terms.

The Villains? No one is under enough illusions to be surprised at backstabbing and general stupidity, and no one really cares as long as they're (at the end of the day) still under the heel of rather reasonable and more-or-less sane Black Queen – because what more can you really expect out of Villains?

Catherine takes those precautions because while Hanno is herding cats, she's herding cats doused in goblinfire. Her job is just more demanding in that area to begin with, and it's only smart of her to realize that she has to tailor her approach after having already ultra-violence'd her way past several attempted insurrections in the past.

Liliet

Yep, aaaaaall of that. That's why I'm pointing out that Hanno didn't take this kind of who-hates-who precaution because HE DIDN'T NEED TO. There were no foreseeable-solvable-with-seating-preparation-type problems among heroes.

Also, I don't think the heroes' brawl nearly unraveled the Terms – the tension from Hanno's POV was whether he'd need to execute Christophe over this or manage to salvage the dumbass.

Javvies

The Hero fight didn't unravel the Truce and Terms only because Mirror Knight and his faction lost outright.

If Mirror Knight had won, or even just been taken down after killing Hanno ... things would have gone to hell. If he successfully killed Hanno, he likely would have either taken it as a sign from Above of his rightness and Hanno being in the wrong, or he would have been in shock, which would likely either allow him to be taken down or kill the Hero trying to take him down as combat reflexes took over (thus confirming his rightness in his mind). That's if Mirroe Knight killed Hanno inside the meeting room.

Out in the hallways where most of the fight between the two of them took place? If Mirror Knight killed Hanno, again, he'd either see it as proof of his rightness or be in shock ... resulting him either surrendering or fighting being taken down ... and remember who Hanno saw next, immediately after beating down Mirror Knight? Cat and a bunch of soldiers ... and Mirror Knight would not surrender to Cat, which means he'd either run again (and thus need to be hunted) or he'd fight, breaking the Truce and Terms, and he'd probably only be stopped by killing him at that point. And Hanno would be dead, and unable to work to preserve things from the Hero side, and there'd probably be a Hero killed by Cat and soldiers under her command. Or worse, Mirror Knight doesn't go down (dead or unconscious) at all, or at least, not before he successfully kills or severely injures Cat with the sword.

Things would probably not have gone particularly well at that point.

Liliet

OK, yeah, Hanno just didn't take the possibility of him killing him seriously.

Mostly because he believed that unless he attacked first or drew a weapon, he'd be unwilling to.

Which brings us back to the heroes vs villains comparison.

Shveiran

... And Hanno was wrong? MK did draw his weapon and came fairly close to killing a hero, even if it wasn't Hanno. He was also ready to use the Severance to "defeat" the Wk, but that weapon is kind of like a lightsaber. It doesn't really do "non - lethal". At best, you can permanently maim someone in a way that allows them to keep living if they are immediately healed by pros.

Any assumption on heroes defaulting to keeping it nonlethal because they were Heroes was... kind of misplaced.

Liliet

True, someone else came pretty close to being killed. In which case it would be the headsman's axe for Christophe, too. Which is what Hanno was worried about.

Hanno himself was secure enough to never draw his weapon.

Mirror Night

Also its not like seating arrangements would have stopped that fight. Since Blacksmith flips the table to open the brawl. MK was not sitting next to Blacksmith, Roland or Frederic. Also Hanno used self seating to help figure out who was friends and on good terms with who. So its not like self seating didn't have it uses.

Salt

It's actually kind of an unintentional burn on the Villains that Cat actually thinks they might break out into violence, for absolutely no reason other than sitting next to each other

Liliet

Yeah lmao.

The seating, both Hanno and Catherine handled right.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I deeply empathize with Catherine's horror about being known for her old essay. I wrote a paper on purple giraffes for AP Lang in high school and I'd rather commit suicide by undead goat than have it shared.

Salt

On the other hand, it'll probably spawn tens of pretentious scholarly papers analyzing the ways that it is actually hidden genius

shikkarasu

Fortunately we know that she writes a holy book for the Drow, even if future Drow Priests consider it heretical. I give even odds that she writes it purely to distract from The Essay.

Salt

If she's actively a dick to the crows in said holy book, and the holy book is understood to be the word of the crows, does that mean that they're going to get a reputation for being self-depreciating?

Anonymous

It will be amusing if it turns out that her essay is part of the reason why Hasenbach considered Catherine a dull brute of a warlord back in the day.

mamm0nn

Obviously Pilgrim read it and that's why he was so convinced she was Triumphant returned.

Rey d`Tutto

If give even odds the Dead King has read it.

Rey d`Tutto

I'd, not If.
Required: earn autocorrect!

Rey d`Tutto

Damned. Damned autocorrect.
It but me twice.

Burlyraven

I'm wondering if the Barrow Sword might not take being denied one of the perceived seats of honor as a slight, considering he has a track record of success against the Revenants, and the Berserker seems like new blood. Hopefully he's smart enough to read that Cat's extending something akin to trust in his direction by having act as a buffer.

Salt

LMAO, that'll probably depend on whether he's a typical grug-smash type berserker or if he's a normally-chill occasionally-hulk type of berserker

Juff

Typo Thread:

occasions were > occasions where affairs this: even> affairs like this; even had to the > had the caution you to think of raising too many tyrants as a crown (maybe "caution you against thinking that raising too many tyrants is a crown")
oldfamilies > old families
"Exactly," Akua > "Exactly." Akua had had come > had come
I sighed "I (missing fullstop) could when > could do when I've head," > I've heard," Penthesand > Penthes and form Ashur > from Ashur has been even > had been even every villain do that > every villain didn't do that aswhat > as what cause collapse > cause collapses foten > often still gained > still be gained atcuually > actually is recurring > is a recurring a many a > many a interest," she > interest." She Tyrant of > Tyrant or reach peaceful > reaching peaceful
I took me > It took me to help to wage > to help wage prepare the peace > prepare for the peace fantassins companies > fantassin companies she amenable > she was amenable board circle > broad circle bloodspil > bloodspill take swing > take a swing

onedollargum

"It was a shit plan," I frankly replied. "You gave yourself a single point of failure and left each of your 'clients' a powerbase to consolidate. The moment the fortress was out, your entire empire would immediately collapse."

Barring the prequels, it feels like this is most Star Wars movies.

Finn .-. .

'She'd not last long enough to make a second fortress, or it'd get destroyed while still incomplete.'

This fits surprisingly well too.

Liliet

Pretty sure that was at least half the inspiration for the Praesi "flying fortress of doom" trope.

thearpox23

As someone who was always lukewarm on the Star Wars, it seems odd to me for it to be the originator of the "flying fortress of doom" trope. Perhaps it popularized the concept, but the thing seems too archetypal for it to have a proper origin.

Liliet

A single archetypal thing can be made out of several previously existing archetypal things.

thearpox23

Yes yes, that is obvious. Still don't see the connection to Star Wars. If anything, the concept of a flying fortress is obviously a progression on the ancient myths of flying islands/flying cities meets post-enlightenment magic system. Because magic output = expensive workhours + exotic materials the thing has got to be expensive, and once you have a flying base it seems a shame not to drop heavy exploding things from it. The other uses of your antigrav construct can come naturally once you start considering how to apply the above-mentioned post-enlightenment magic system.

The whole thing seems too natural to need inspiration from pop fiction. Of course, Erra could pop in here himself and tell me wrong, but needing to tie in every naturally occurring concept to some pop culture classic seems unnecessary to me.

Darkening

I mean, giant flying thing with a doomsday weapon attached certainly makes me think of the death star, but I'm sure there's other examples.

beleester

"Flying fortress as a mobile weapon system" is a different trope from simply "floating island where adventures happen." I think the first person to do "Drop heavy things from it" was Jonathan Swift in Gulliver's Travels.

thearpox23

You might be right on that, though I wouldn't be surprised if some Indian myths had a precursor to that. Either way, as expected of the enlightenment period writer to have to go "how would this thing function?" when making his setting.

Salt

I mean honestly, the concept of a complex anything with a single point of critical vulnerability has been considered impractical as far back as you care to look.

If you're considering modern influence and pop culture though – and story tropes are just that, writers-world pop culture as far as current common trends in writing go – the Death Star is almost certainly the first thing anyone thinks of nowadays when describing the trope of some complex monstrosity brought down by being poked in the weak spot.

So while you can't exactly consider it the originator for a set of concepts centuries old, it makes little sense to chastise people for conflating it with the concept, since it's arguably the most iconic and well-known modern example of the trope, and one that played a pretty major role in popularizing it in modern culture.

I doubt the concept of "never going to give you up" was invented by Rick Astley either, but you'd hardly criticize someone nowadays for conflating it with Rick Astley when discussing how I'm never gonna let you down.

Liliet

I agree very much with your last sentiment. I don't think a star wars type flying fortress inevitably attracting heroes to find and exploit its weak spot is all that naturally occurring a concept, but it's possible I just don't know stuff.

sivarajan

Laputa, from Gulliver's Travels?

thearpox23

I think the hypothetical question here is whether you think flying fortresses/cities would exist in fiction today if Gulliver's Travel's weren't written. To me, the thing seems natural enough that it'd get invented and popularized in fiction guaranteed, just like how Irem wasn't the only lost city to be conceived of in the ages prior.

sivarajan

I had never heard of Irem, but mention of Atlantis precedes it by a millennium (which I guess illustrates your point). However, I would caution against assuming ideas that are obvious in hindsight were so before they were invented.

caoimhinh

That trope is actually something that was popularised by Japanese videogames. Literal flying fortresses of doom are a setting we can see in the early RPGs from SNES, especially for the last stand against the main villain.

thearpox23

That... seems to have much more of a connection to what we have in the story than Star Wars. I haven't played those early SNES games, so I suppose one could make the argument that they themselves drew from those movies, but that's two degrees of separation already, so eh. Always an interesting reminder of how much of an influence on our fiction there was from those obscure niche games. I chalk it to a new medium allowing for different perspectives discovering for us new low-hanging fruit.

Jago

It was used by Japanese in anime well before the SNES games. Zambot 3 is a 1977 anime, the same year of Star Wars, and the aliens have a space fortress base. From what I recall besides deploying mechas they did orbital bombardment of Earth. Probably there are even earlier examples, I would bet than that Ming the Merciless in the Flash Gordon comics had one or tried to build one.

caoimhinh

Definitely, I'm sure there are earlier examples. It's just that those are what comes to mind for me when I think about that trope. Because "flying fortress of doom" invokes in me a sense of Fantasy rather than Sci-fi, so I imagine a dark castle flying in the sky rather than a spaceship in orbit.

caoimhinh

Yeah, when I see the term "Flying Fortress of Doom", my mind instantly goes to things like Dracula's castle from Castlevania, the Sinistrals'... well, fortress of doom, from "Lufia & the Fortress of Doom", even some floating islands and stuff from the Zelda games, Breath of Fire, and other games from that time that must have been a huge influence for the popularization of the trope in anime and manga for the coming years.

It became a popular trend that you would have to face the main villain in their castle near the end of the game, and the confrontation would commonly cause the destruction of the fortress, it is a concept that became widely popular in games and fantasy stories, especially in Japan as they are the biggest market for that.

It's come to the point that nowadays in mangas/anime it is expected that the "Demon Lord" must have some sort of dark castle or flying fortress where the Heroes must have their final clash against him.

Personally, I think that my mind goes to those types of stories rather than Star Wars because the term "Flying Fortress of Doom" invokes Fantasy for me rather than Science Fiction.

Some people will immediately think of the Death Star when the term comes up, but I seriously can't. My mind will almost immediately imagine something like Dracula's Castle coming out of a dark cloud in the night sky with a blood-red moon on the background.

Jago

In fantasy, there are thousands of examples of fortresses of doom that are destroyed by the end of the book, but generally, they aren't flying fortresses. The flying ones are more common in SF. Probably because the Journey that makes the Hero Grow is more a fantasy trope than an SF trope and journeying to a flying fortress is somewhat different.

Liliet

Ooh, huh, nice. Not familiar with that genre.

Also, may I ask about the timing?...

Jago

Interesting. Will this be the catalyzer for Cat getting her new Name?

A Name that helps her manage the Villains would be in line with her desires.

Abrakadabra

I thought that too. Queen of Villains perhaps?

Jago

The Mastermind!
Bhahahahah

But it is an extremely dangerous name.

James Felling

The Xanatos Chessmaster....

lucnation

I was thinking a more general title like Principal or Overseer, Administrator maybe

Sam

Cat, the Herder, with the obvious reordering of that.

Black Spiral Dancer

As always, a pleasure to read Akua Sahelian's dark wisdom.

Берти Вустер

So Akua is unholy trinity of Emperor Palpatine, Wilhuf Tarkin and whoever designed the Death Star in the current canon in one?

Liliet

I really like the "thesis/antithesis" format of the epigraphs.

Daniel E

Only 10 Villains? I thought there would be a lot more. Wasn't there mention of there being something like 80+ Named assembled? Cat's mention of a third here should put the Villains at least firmly above 20.

Miles

Masego won't be there so it's not all the villains.

Liliet

Most villains are assigned elsewhere. Twilight's Pass, Cleves, Arsenal, administration, hunting threats in the back, I think there were two with Kallia? they're in Mercantis etc

Daniel E

Ok, that's a fair point. Although, assuming every warm body gets pulled in for the big summer campaign, I'm hoping we'll more Villains en masse.

Liliet

Sounds like they cannot do that.

mavant

What? No, there's only nine. It's always been eight. How could you imagine there were more than seven?

Miles

It occurs to me that Akua is the Bard's villain counterpart.

They have a lot of similar qualities and even where they're different it's in a way that pairs well like the whole antihero/antivillain thing they have going on.

Miles

Villain stories tend to reward voting early and voting often.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

Oooh, this is a good one.

ByVectron!

Between Akua selecting the site, and her being part of the ordering of villains, I have a bad itch that she is up to something. Like, she is all about the long game, and I wouldn't put it past her to have figured out a way to create enough strife or the proper conditions to break out or take control or... something.

I dunno, but I want it on the record that my hackles are up. Hakram? Write that down.

Miles

Write it with your face

mavant

I like Akua, and I'll be sad if she gets Ghostbusted.

Interlude: Reprobates

"And so Dread Emperor Irritant did shout thus: 'Leave him to me!' And then he did ignore the Knight Errant, and brawled with a common soldier instead, and triumphed over him."

Extract from Volume IX of the official Imperial Chronicles

He'd been among the first few to arrive after the Black Queen and her attending pair, so the high seats were still largely empty, yet he was not disappointed in the slightest. Instead Lucien Travers, who some knew as the Rapacious Troubadour – though he personally left the epithet out of the introduction unless pressed – studied those empty seats circling the crown of the hill with great interest.

Many of his fellow Damned would not spare a look for the arrangements beyond learning where their seat had been placed, but Lucien would not make that mistake. The Rapacious Troubadour knew himself a feeble enough sort compared to many among his kind, and so it behooved him to always consider the undercurrents of the situations he involved himself in. Lucien was all too aware that his skill with the sword was no match for the likes of the Red Knight, or his dabbling in sorcery more than a pittance compared to the arcane powers of a man like the Hierophant. He'd always been a man of scattered interests, and so while his learning was broad it might be said to be comparatively shallow.

It was his eyes he'd paid for with his travels, his ability to read a room and the underpinnings of it.

Some arrangements were only to be expected. The mark of favour he'd earned through his labours in Hainaut, the seat by the Archer's own, was one such. The Black Queen was not shy in offering honours to those that served her purposes well, so long as they played by her rules as well. The rumoured red hate between the Headhunter and the Barrow Sword had led to them being split apart, and the Troubadour was amused to see that the Summoner had been neatly contained between two scholarly sorts. Dear Cedric did have a sharp tongue, it must be admitted. That his Callowan ancestry had failed to bring about favoritism at his advantage remained a frustration to the wizard.

It was the layer beyond the obvious that was interesting. Once it was grasped who their common shepherd saw as the individuals in need of containment, from their surroundings it could be deduced who she saw as reliable – the true favoured, not those merely honoured in public. The Concocter and the Harrowed Witch, it seemed. Both of which had ties to the Archer. Ah, how he admired the Black Queen's cleverness in expanding her influence: if she'd gathered attendants herself it would have had the Chosen up in arms, but who would suspect the Archer? The Beastmaster was still out of favour, which was pleasing, but the Berserker's placement was what drew his attention.

She was fresh blood, and her seat of honour not unexpected given her record against Revenants, but that was mere window dressed. She has been seated by the Adjutant, who was now a mere crippled shadow of his old self. A test of restraint, perhaps, of attitude? It would pair nicely with having given her the notoriously unpleasant Headhunter as a neighbour on the other side. The Berserker might just be undergoing an audition for greater trust and responsibility, Lucien mused. That made her someone worth keeping an eye on.

The Rapacious Troubadour strolled to the highest of seats, the Black Queen's own, approaching under the calm, cool stare of the greatest villain of the age. Two great crows were perched above her shoulders, their feathers as if woven from shadow. The slight tension at the knowledge he was occupying the full attention of the same woman who'd been the architect of both the Princes' Graveyard and the Salian Peace was delicious, for all that the fear behind it was genuine. Lucien was not a man who'd been born for dull times, for pedestrian appetites or the safety of righteous choices. What worth was life, if not lived on the razor's edge? He swept back his long hair as he offered a deep bow.

"Your Majesty," the Troubadour smiled. "It is ever a pleasure to be in your presence."

"Rapacious Troubadour," the Black Queen replied as she cocked her head to the side, her Chantant easy and lightly accented. "You seem in a pleasant mood. Finally back in familiar waters, yes?"

Seen through already? He'd been in too fine a mood, it seemed. Gods but how delicious it would be to have but the slightest taste of such a soul, barely more than a nibble really – Lucien felt the attention on him, and turned to meet the Archer's unblinking gaze. The sharp-faced woman offered him a lazy grin, all the while idly tapping the side of a knife against a finger. He doubted that grin would waver in the slightest as she slit his throat. Ah, he'd ben forgetting himself.

"Who would dare claim familiarity as such a gathering, Black Queen?" Lucien smiled. "I am simply looking forward to the night's festivities."

—

The Berserker did not know how to read. Had the servants not told her where her seat was she wouldn't have known, and she thought she saw a mocking glint in the man's eye. Her fist was already clenching when she remembered who was looking at her, that small woman on the seat with the huge dark crows and the dead wood staff. Temper, Zoe reminded herself. There would be better fights to pick tonight than some mouthy nobody. She dropped into her seat, sending for ale. The sooner they got to grievances, the sooner she could crack her knuckles on some fucker's jaw.

—

The Summoner's lips thinned in anger. He was not late, he wasn't, but everyone else had come early and so he'd been made to look in the wrong. Again. Just another injustice in the long line of them forced onto Cedric Ackland. He never got his dues, always got cheated of what was rightfully his. He gathered his robes and hastened up the hill onto the last empty seat, between a disturbingly silver-haired woman and that idiot peasant who'd cursed herself with her own brother's ghost.

"Is he always that slow?"

The Summoner turned a glare onto the person who'd spoken. Some ruffian in cuirass and cloth, with knotted brown hair freed from an ornate spiked helmet and three leathery heads hanging from their belt. The Headhunter, he realized with distaste. Their reputation preceded them.

"Silence is preferable to empty words," the Summoner sneered back. "A lesson you ought to learn."

The savage – only now did he realize the brown lines sliding down the edge of their hair were brown paint and not dirt – laughed, reaching for one of the dozen knives and hatchets at their side.

“Insult was given twice, once for lateness and once by wagging tongue,” the Headhunter said. “I will collect on your behalf, Black Queen.”

Cedric’s magic roiled at his fingertips. The things he was going to unleash to discipline that wretch would... his anger was interrupted by a slight sound, fingers being drummed on a wooden seat’s arm. The Black Queen was studying the Headhunter with a mildly bored and irritated look on her face, as if displeased by the noise someone’s dog was making.

“And who are you to me, Headhunter, to be collecting anything on my behalf?” the Queen of Callow softly asked.

The savage’s cheeks reddened and the Summoner grinned. Finally he got the support he was due by virtue of his Callowan blood. Has his own father not once been a lord under the Fairfaxes? Cedric should have a seat at her inner circle and his pick of assignments, not this mere pittance, but it was a start.

“I only meant-“

“We know exactly what you meant to do, Headhunter,” the Archer smiled. “So shut the fuck up, yeah? Before we decide it’s worth taking issue with.”

The Levantine prick rose in anger, baring a long knife and reaching for a rope.

“I will not be threatened by the likes of you,” the Headhunter barked. “A hound gone tame-“ “Sit down,” the Black Queen said.

The Headhunter turned their gaze to her and hesitated.

“Sit down,” Catherine Foundling mildly said, “before I make you sit down.”

They swallowed their pride and did.

Perhaps there had been advantages to have arrived last after all, Cedric decided as he smugly settled into his seat.

—

The Barrow Sword silently cursed.

The Headhunter hadn’t been enough of an idiot to get himself – for the shape of the face paint told Ishaq they were a him, at the moment – killed to make an example, or at least crippled, which was a damned shame. It meant the old dogs in the Majilis would still be able to point at the Headhunter and then wag their finger disapprovingly at the bloodlust of those Bestowed by Below, helpfully ignoring anything the Barrow Sword himself had ever done in favour of tossing them all in the same cauldron to boil. There just weren't enough of them that weren't head-cutting lunatics for the Blood to hesitate at crossing them, to his continuing frustration.

The Marauder was a lot more careful than her Bestowal would imply but she'd still killed an Osena – on behalf of the Bandit's Blood, she said, but it couldn't be proven – so she was easy to dismiss, and the Grave Binder was both reasonable and amenable but also... less than personable. The smell of living rot could be off-putting, not that Ishaq was one to judge for the consequences of going barrow-raiding. The closeness of the Bestowal to that of the Binder's Blood had also triggered harsh enmity from the Tanja, who considered it a desecration of sorts, but they'd not dared push the enmity too far when their young lord was so close to the Black Queen.

The Foundling Queen was known for keeping to a hard sort of honour, after all, and she was not one to lightly cross. She was also beginning to speak, so Ishaq set aside the thoughts and pricked his ear.

"There's only been a few times in the history of Calernia," the Black Queen said, "where so many of our kind have gathered. Consider that, before we begin addressing grievances. Remember that the last time so many villains were gathered around the same firepit, nations trembled."

Ishaq grinned, watching the dark-haired queen closely as she spoke. All knew that the Queen of Callow had been the one to tame the lord and the princes, to force the hand of the Peregrine and the Sword of Judgement, and so the achievement she called eyes on reflected glory onto her. You sit here fat and safe instead of hunted because of me, she was reminding them. That dangerous little bastard the Rapacious Troubadour was leaning forward on his seat to Ishaq's right, as if getting closer would let him get his paws on the soul of the villainess, but he was hardly alone in that. The Black Queen had a fine speaking voice, and a reputation that demanded attention.

"There's enough skill and power assembled here tonight to topple a kingdom," the Black Queen said, a hard smile touching her lips. "That it has been not been enough to break the Dead King over our knee should serve as a reminder of what still lies ahead of us."

"War on Keter," the Archer called out, baring her teeth.

Ishaq laughed and joined his call to hers, as did half a dozen more. The shouting would buy him time enough to figure out how to bury the Headhunter all the way to his neck instead of merely his knees.

—

The Beastmaster eyed the great shadow-crows again, biting his cheek in irritation.

Their form, the power he could feel pulsing within them, it all called to him. Yet Lysander had found that he could not Master them, not even the slightest bit. His power was no immediate yoke, taking time and skill to settle properly into the beasts of his menagerie, but when he used it there was always a... bite. Not here, though. He had heard it said that the crows were shards of drow goddesses, not true living creatures, but he'd not truly believed it until now. Wild gods sometimes touched animals with their power, remaking them into something more without fundamentally changing their essence, so he'd expected this to be case here.

Not so, it turned out, and now the shadowy things had turned their black eyes on him. Had they noticed? He could not tell, but caution was in order. This was not the Woods, where he knew the paths and dangers. Boldness had to be measured, lest it cost him more than he was willing to give. The Beastmaster drank from the ale horn the servants had passed him, wiping his mouth afterwards and listening without much interest as the parade of grievances began.

"- deferred to her even though she is fresh to the front, and I was in command," the Summoner whined. "There must be punishment for this."

Gods, Lysander thought, what a useless prick. His dislike for the man had grown stronger with every comparison between them. The Beastmaster brought servants to the fight as well, but unlike the mageling he wasn't useless if someone got to him – he fought with his menagerie, not behind it.

"Are you," the Barrow Sword said, tone slightly disbelieving, "complaining about Dominion warriors deferring to the Valiant Champion?"

The Beastmaster grunted in amusement. Ishaq had a good head and a better swordhand, a respectable man. Too close to the Black Queen's party for comfort, but without having turned into a minion.

"I held command," the Summoner insisted.

"No one who has to say that holds anything," the Headhunter dismissed.

There was a murmur of agreement around the fire. The Headhunter wasn't liked – no one wanted to ally with someone who'd stick you in the back for your head and a shadow of your power – but he wasn't wrong. Lysander glanced at the Black Queen, who was lounging on her throne and idly sipping at a cup of wine. She seemed less than impressed.

"What's your exact grievance under the Terms?" the Queen of Callow asked.

"It was disrespect," the Summoner angrily replied. "Against the Terms."

"Disrespect is not against our laws," the Black Queen said. "Were your orders disobeyed or contradicted?"

The Beastmaster chuckled under his breath, as all here knew the answer to that. The Summoner went on to bluster for a bit before it became clear the villainess patience had been exhausted. She glanced at Indrani, who cleared her throat loudly and called for the next grievance to be spoken. Lysander's eyes narrowed at the sight. He wasn't Alexis, to rage at the sight of that or even Indrani at all, but it was still hard to believe Archer had bound herself to others in such a way. The Beastmaster had long believed that Alexis might have inherited the Lady's thirst for challenges but that it was Indrani who'd learned their teacher's restlessness, her wanderlust. It was a belief difficult to pair with the reality of her serving as the Black Queen's enforced, and it had done much to unravel the respect he'd once held for Indrani.

"I have a grievance," the Concocter spoke up.

Lysander's brow rose in interest. Cocky was not one to dip her toe into these things without reason, so this ought to be interesting at last.

"Did you lose a cauldron?" the Headhunter jeered. "It's not like you know how to use anything else."

The Beastmaster's knife came down on the arm of his chair, blade biting into wood with a hard thunk, and the Levantine's own hand twitched towards his blade as he turned to match eyes. Lysander shrugged.

"My hand slipped," the Beastmaster shrugged.

Fucking Dominion shithead. Lysander wasn't some sentimental pissant, but there were lines. Cocky was a lot more useful to have around than a second-rate tracker who used an aspect to make up for lack of skill.

—

The Harrowed Witch winced.

Merciless Gods, why did all these people have to be so violent? Julien's shade muttered angrily in her ear, his half-heard imprecations rather distracting, but she focused. If this turned into a brawl, she'd throw herself backwards and flee under cover of illusion – the latter part of which would take some concentration. Although, she thought, it was not the Archer who led here but her own mistress. Unlike Lady Indrani, who enjoyed a spot of mayhem between 'comrades', the Black Queen was known for her stern disposition and sharp tongue. Perhaps she'd take this all in hand.

"Your grievance, Concocter?" the Queen of Callow asked.

That bear of a man, the Beastmaster, ceased glaring at the Headhunter and they returned the favour. Both pretended nothing had ever taken place between them. Sweet Providence but Aspasia had lucked out with her seat, having the rough woodsman between her and the Headhunter. Even Julien's shade avoided getting too close to that one.

"I have had supplies brought in from the Arsenal," the Concocter said. "And twice now the crates have been opened and inspected by Proceran soldiers before being passed on to me."

Aspasia felt it more than she saw it. Like the weight in the air before a storm, a pressure had gathered atop the hill. The fire dimmed and breaths came shorter as the Black Queen straightened from a lazy sprawl to sharp-eyed alertness. The Witch had seen it once before in the Arsenal, the subtle metamorphosis that turned a mouthy young woman into the Arch-heretic of the East. It was all in the way she held herself, in the intensity of her. The roiling power around them that had them all shuffling uncomfortably in their seats, those dark eyes – almost black, in the evening light – growing cold with displeasure at what she had heard.

"Those crates, had they been inspected and sealed in the Arsenal?" the Black Queen asked in a clipped tone.

"Yes," the Concocter replied, tone admirably steady.

"You will pass on descriptions of those soldiers to Adjutant," the dark-eyed queen said, drumming her fingers against the arm of her seat. "They will be swinging from gallows by dawn, and your supplies will never be touched again."

Aspasie shivered, for she did not doubt the other woman's word in the slightest.

—

The Rapacious Troubadour weighed his options.

While he'd be most pleased by a greater monthly supply of Binds to take from – their souls were ancient but worn, tasteless and colourless – he doubted that the Black Queen would be amenable to the request. She'd never hidden her distaste for his inclinations, and she'd been quite blunt in warning him of the costs of returning to his old practices. A restriction that he chafed under, even knowing it was only temporary. Still, Lucien was not an unreasonable man and he knew that the Terms and their looming successor, the Liesse Accords, were much to his advantage.

He thrived in society, when navigating hierarchies, and the Black Queen's ambitions would herald the creation of a society of the Damned. The sheer potential of that had him giddy, sometimes. So long as he was able to limit his predations to victims deemed acceptable under the rules, heroes would have no real call to hunt him and he'd even be able to move through the civilized world without fear of being hunted. No, the prize was well worth a few years of lean and tasteless pickings. He ate more than enough to avoid desiccation, and he'd begun to pick out the people that would be of use after the war.

Gluttony would not help him here. It'd be much more useful to earn a favour or two from his fellows, and he had just the trick for that. One need not be brilliant to realize that the Berserker was itching for a fight, and she was not so thuggish as to fail to understand when she was being helped. It'd give him an in with the Barrow Sword as well, if he played it well.

"I have a grievance as well, if we are to clear the air," Lucien drawled.

Rather obvious bait, but given the precedents...

"A bard insists on speaking," the Headhunter snorted. "There's a surprise."

Like a fish on a hook.

"This," the Troubadour airily said. "This is my issue, Black Queen. The constant pricking from the prick, so to speak. Can they not be disciplined into a semblance of politeness?"

The Foundling Queen eyed him for a moment, and Lucien felt naked. As if seen through once more. It was exhilarating, in a terrifying sort of way.

"I'm not here to hold your hands," the Black Queen acidly said. "Petty disputes are not breaches of the Terms, they are yours to resolve."

"Ha!" the Headhunter sneered, "You-"

Lucien discreetly winked at the Berserker, whose flat face and broken nose split into a brutally gleeful grin as she grasped the chance she'd just been given. A heartbeat later the Headhunter's jaw popped with a beautiful sound as the Berserker's knuckles smashed into it, the seats of the two warriors toppling as they brawled.

—

That Troubadour was a useful sort for a fucking singer, Zoe approvingly thought as she let out a hoarse shout and smashed the Headhunter's head through the seat even as they slipped a knife into her ribs. She'd remember the good turn and return it in kind. As she was thrown off by the Headhunter the Berserker felt her back begin to crack as the Haze seeped into her, shuddering into her limbs as the strength and anger hardened her muscles.

The Headhunter got to their feet again, as did she, and Zoe ripped out the knife in her side before letting out a blood-curling scream. Finally she could cut loose and just Rage.

—

The Barrow Sword turned to study the man sitting by his side, a dark-haired sort with insolent good looks and slightly crooked fingers. The cithern strapped to his back seemed as natural to him as the sword on his hip, and though the Rapacious Troubadour did not have the reputation of a great swordsman, there were many kinds of battles. The way the Berserker was spasming wildly and turning red even as the Headhunter stuck her full of knives and hatches to little avail made the point plainly enough.

"Have you ever been to the Dominion, Lucien?" Ishaq casually asked.

"I've not had the pleasure," the other man replied with a slender smile.

"You should visit, one of these days," the Barrow Sword said. "I'm sure you'd find much there to your liking."

If he could not find enough allies within Bestowed of Levant, Ishaq thought, then perhaps it was time to broaden his horizons.

—

The Summoner laughed at the brawling fools, voice high and mocking. The Headhunter had been thoroughly obnoxious and the Berserker was a rude thug, so he had no horse in this race. Let them smash each other to pieces, for all he cared. His mood significantly improved, he offered a charming smile to the silver-haired woman at his side. The Concocter, she was called. She'd taken his rightful place in the Arsenal – her or one of her colleagues – but Cedric was willing to set that aside for the sake of polite conversation.

"I am told you have spent much of your time in the Arsenal," the Summoner said.

Her eyes, he only noticed then, were not of the same colour. One was silver, the other blue. It was disturbing to behold, though he was well-bred enough not to comment on this.

"I have," the Concocter said. "And I am told you sought admission there yourself?"

He grit his teeth.

"Mere rumours," Cedric dismissed. "My talents as a war mage are too precious to squander, I've always known this."

"Are they?" the Concocter said. "I have not been told of the shape of your Gift in any detail."

Was she doubting him? Cedric scowled. A demonstration was in order, then. Hand rising, he seized the threads of his sorcery and pulled out one of his lesser summons. He might as well force apart the two brawling idiots while he was at it, and establish his skills for all to see.

"Come forth," the Summoner intoned.

—

Merde, Aspasia thought.

Magic to her right and a violent death match to her left: the Harrowed Witch had no intention of staying in the middle of this. She tipped back her seat until it fell and crouched behind it, just in time to see some sort of leonine creature in a shimmering ghostly glow leap out of blue circle hanging in the air. The summon would have tackled the Berserker – now red-veined, hulking and screaming – from the back if a sinuous thing had not suddenly struck at it in midair, sinking fangs into its flank. It shimmered out of existence. A snake, Aspasia realized. The Beastmaster had hidden the largest snake she'd ever seen under his furs, and it'd attacked the leaping summon without hesitation.

"You trifling sneak," the Summoner snarled.

The snake, striped and sinuous and looking all too smart for such a creature, retreated and loosely coiled around the Beastmaster's neck.

"Say that again," the large man challenged. "See what happens."

At the bottom of the hill, Aspasia felt creatures begin to stir. The Harrowed Witch began to weave the strands around her, ignoring the furious wails of her brother's shade even as she drew on the essence of his death to hide her existence. The two who'd begun brawling, the Headhunter and the Berserker, had almost tumbled off the edge of the hill. Though the Berserker had clearly hurt the other villain, punching in a rib, the Headhunter had sunk over a dozen blades in their opponent's flesh. Even now they were trying to tie the villainess limbs with some sort of rope, though the Berserker's strange spasms made it difficult to achieve.

Something was slithering along the grass atop the hill and for a moment Aspasia thought it was yet another snake, but in the heartbeat that followed strings of shadow shot up. They latched onto the Headhunter, who jerked in surprise and tried to rip away their hand only to find that the string moved with them. Yet it tightened, after, almost like taffy. Within heartbeats the Dominion prick was covered in shadowy strings and vainly struggling on the ground, mouth covered. The Berserker milled about uncertainly, then let out a furious scream and turned towards the nearest target: the Adjutant. The crippled orc in his wheelchair did not so much as bat an eye while on the ground under the Berserker a shimmer passed. The Witch caught a glimpse of something and the Berserker was gone. As if fallen into the ground.

Dusk had arrived, Aspasia saw. The world was dimming. And nowhere was it darker than around the Black Queen on her throne, looking bored as she rested her chin on her palm and watched them all.

"Summoner," the Black Queen idly said. "Beastmaster. The two of you appear to have left your seats, no doubt by mistake."

The magic that had been sharpening the air with the smell of ozone winked out. The creeping creatures that had been making their way up the hill froze, then withdrew. The Beastmaster offered a jerky nod and slumped back onto his seat: the snake disappeared under his furs, as if it'd never been there at all.

"Your Majesty-" the Summoner began.

There was a sound like a rope being tightened, and the Headhunter hoarsely screamed.

"I dislike," Catherine Foundling said, "repeating myself."

The Summoner sat down. The Harrowed Witch dragged her seat back up and sat down on it, hoping no one had taken notice.

—

The Black Queen had seen through him.

The thought struck the Rapacious Troubadour and would not leave him even as he studied the Headhunter's futile struggles against the shadow bindings. Her putdowns had been too smooth, too perfect. The gate beneath the Berserker had already been woven, just left dormant. She'd known Lucien was going to incite a brawl and let him, so that she might use the erupting chaos to her own purposes. What these purposes were he did not know, but he was hungry to find out. If she'd planned it all ahead this far... A dangerous woman, this orphan queen. She'd played the oldest living hero of Calernia like a fiddle, it was said, and so far they were faring no better against her wiles.

A dragonbone pipe in hand, she leaned to the side so that the Adjutant might strike a match and light it for her. Taking a deep breath, silence falling among them as she did, the Queen of Callow spat out a long stream of smoke. She flicked a wrist. A slit opened in the air to the side of the hill and the Berserker came out screaming, hitting the ground as if she'd been thrown down from a cliff instead. There was a crack of broken bones and the villainess ceased moving. Not dead, he thought, but her legs had broken even with all the power of her rage strengthening her.

"Archer," the Black Queen said, "drag that enthusiastic young woman back to her seat. I still have a use for her."

The tall villainess rose to her feet with a lazy grin.

"Nothing like two broken legs to put things into perspective, I've found," the Archer mused.

The Berserker was dragged by the crook of her neck, hair gone wild and looking in a great deal of pain but not entirely displeased with the way her evening had gone regardless. Shadow strings dragged the Headhunter back onto the wreck of their seat, and only then left withdrew. The armoured villain cast wild-eyed looks all around, as if trying to find where the strings had gone, and their breathing was unsteady. It'd escaped absolutely no one's notice that it would have been trivial for the Black Queen to snap their neck, if she'd felt like it.

"I find myself disappointed in you all," the Queen of Callow slowly said, trails of smoke curling up above her. "The information's there to be found, I made sure of it, so it must mean that not a single one of you thought to look."

The Archer leaned back in her seat, looking amused. The Adjutant remained the same mirror he always was, unreadable. Lucien watched the others, but found only puzzlement and veiled faces. No one was quite sure what she meant, then. Good, he'd not been left behind.

"How many villains have signed onto the Truce and Terms?" the Black Queen asked. "Does a single one of you know?"

Lucien hid a frown, counting silently. At least twenty, he thought, but he was uncertain of the numbers in Cleves so it was likely higher. Besides, had the First Prince not taken one of the Damned as an adviser? She had kept this quiet, but not so quiet the likes of the Troubadour could not find word of it.

"Twenty eight," the Adjutant said, his voice like rough gravel.

The Troubadour blinked in surprise. Was this true? It seemed...

"Some of you are putting it together, I see," the Black Queen thinly smiled, eyes passing over him and then to his surprise onto the Headhunter. "There are seventy-four Named who have signed onto the Terms, you see."

Less than half. Lucien would admit he was surprised. He'd expected, if not quite even halves, then at least something close to it. This was sharply imbalanced in their disfavour.

"And what is that to us, Black Queen?" the Beastmaster replied.

"Look around you," she replied. "Then think of the heroes and their own firepit. How, unlike you, they are making allies."

—

"Let them hold hands," the Headhunter dismissed. "It will not save them when the night gets dark."

The Barrow Sword almost laughed, for as usual Saidi was missing the point. All that power, all that skill, but not a bushel of wits to go with them. When the war on Keter ended, things would not return to what they had once been. That was what the Queen of Callow was telling them. How many of these Bestowed by Above would have met, if not for this war? Now they knew names and faces, had struck friendships and alliances. When the war ended, when the truce came at an end, the heroes would prowl in packs. Magelings from Ashur allied with duellists from Procer, priests from the Free Cities with the Blood of Levant. They would be fighting an enemy that had learned, that had grown, that was ready for them.

"You warn us of annihilation," Ishaq bluntly said.

—

"Petty alarmism," the Summoner said. "They cannot turn on us after we carried the war against Procer. It would be dishonourable."

The Harrowed Witch swallowed a hysterical giggle. They were going to bet their lives on honour? The man was blind. She'd not thought it before, but the Black Queen was right. They must come to terms with the Chosen, or perhaps band with a few others for protection. If they were too many to be easily slain, or perhaps hidden...

"The Grey Pilgrim would poison every single one of you and lose not a wink of sleep over it," the Barrow Sword flatly replied. "We all know what the years before the Uncivil Wars were like. The Peregrine and the Saint, picking every flower before it could bloom. They'll do the same now, only with bands and training and coin."

—

"There's no need to fight them," the Beastmaster said.

And meant it, too. Lysander saw no need to spill hero blood, or have his own spilled by them. What did they have to fight over? Let them keep their cities and their temples, his own home was far beyond their reach.

"We can keep to our places, and they to theirs," the Beastmaster said.

"And so we go back living in a fucking hovel in the woods?" Cocky said.

He blinked in surprised. Had her years in the Arsenal truly softened her so much, weakened her so much?

"They'll keep it all," the Concocter warned. "The Arsenal, the secrets and the libraries and the wonders we made. If we disperse back into the wilds, after the war, then they keep the world and we exile ourselves to the fringes."

"The Accords ensure they cannot simply hunt us," Lysander sharply reminded her.

"You depend on ink for safety, now?" Cocky replied just as sharply.

—

"The Accords don't say we can't fight," the Berserker said. "They only say how we can't. They'll come for us, Beastmaster."

Zoe would never have considered signing them, if they did. It was a pack of rules about how violence could be done, and much about magic, but the only parts that concerned her were no different from duelling rules. She could stomach that.

"She's right," the Headhunter said, to her surprise. "There are some among them who will want to hunt. They'll follow us, wait for an excuse."

"And they'll have backers in the courts," the Rapacious Troubadour added. "Nobles behind them, soldiers and safe places. We all know the Mirror Knight was in bed with the House of Langevin, and he won't be the last."

Fucking nobles, Zoe thought, anger welling up. With their tricks and their lies and their... biting into her lips, she forced herself to push down the rage. The Black Queen was likely to do more than just break her legs, next time.

—

"They know who we are, now," Ishaq said. "Don't forget that. They know our names, where we rose to power. They will know where to look for us."

That struck home with more than a few, he saw on their faces. It was a dreadful thing that'd been revealed to them, the Barrow Sword thought, but it was also an opportunity. There were some here who would make useful allies, and to who he would be of use in turn. Bargains could be had, favours traded.

"It's worse than that," the Concocter flatly said, pushing back her silver hair. "Think of the weapons the Arsenal has been able to make in just a few years. They have the numbers and the coin to keep making such things, greater ones. What do we have, a handful of forges and libraries dispersed across half the continent? How many of us even have a roof to sleep under?"

Ashen Gods, Ishaq thought. A grim truth, that. He had territory in the Brocelian, but it was only his so long as no other Bestowed came to take it from him. He looked at the three on the other side of the fire, the dark-eyed queen and her hands on each side — the fang and the steel, waiting and silent and expectant. They had known all this from the start. Where this would lead them. The Black Queen was waiting for them at the end of this road.

"You have shown us a doom, Black Queen," Ishaq said. "Will you also show us how to avert it?"

—

Lucien leaned forward, eyes alight. Now was the time for the reveal, he thought.

"After the war, under my auspices a hall will be founded in Cardinal," the Black Queen idly said. "It will have workshops and armories, libraries and artefacts. Its doors will be open to any of Below's who sign the Liesse Accords and agree to a few additional... rules of engagement."

The Summoner began to speak, but the Archer's black glare silenced him.

"This hall will also offer its services as intermediary between all who belong to it," the Queen of Callow said. "Should they seek allies within our kind, or to trade favours. It would serve as guarantor of any such deal made, naturally."

And so enable the making of alliances through the threat of the Black Queen herself taking offence at the breaking of a pact made under her auspices, the Troubadour thought. He could not resist, letting out a soft peal of laughter. This would not disappear all their troubles, but it would give them the tools to solve them by their own hands. And all it would require of them was to follow the Black Queen's rules, to heed her Accords so that they might all reap the benefits of her peace.

All hail the queen, Lucien Travers amusedly thought.

"I might be interested in such an arrangement," the Troubadour said.

—

It could be of use, the Summoner thought. Since the Arsenal was barred to him, and likely to remain so...

—

If nothing else it would make the trading of favours a more reliable thing, Lysander admitted to himself.

—

Word of who to hunt, and who to avoid, the Headhunter thought. Always the hardest of knowledge to gather. It would depend on these rules, but as things stood...

—

The Concocter would have opened a newborn for what was being offered, what were a few damned rules to her?

—

The Berserker frowned. More rules. Not pleasant to hear, but if this let her avoid being hunted by the White Knight after the war she would have to consider it.

—

It would let her find another band, the Harrowed Witch realized with a sigh of relief. Safety in numbers, with a powerful patroness behind them.

—

“Oh yes,” the Barrow Sword grinned, all sharp teeth bared. “This would be of interest to me as well.”

—

As the pieces fell into place Catherine Foundling blew out a stream of grey smoke, and smiled a devil’s smile.

caoimhinh

Hah! My wish was granted, Interludes from Villains’ POV! And with titles that contrast with those of the Heroes’ 2 chaps!

Hell yeah! This is awesome.

Zggt

Nothing like a threat of extinction and the hope of having anything permanent to motivate people to gather up and defend themselves. This is literally how nations are born. And of course Cat is the only possible queen here. Black might just shed a tear of pride at that.

RoflCat

There’s an...ideal? for the women of a certain region in another series I’ve read (it’s not translated that far yet) that sum down roughly to “Get what you want while making everyone happy while at it”

In that region, the ideal of men are the courageous knights that triumph over anything thrown at them, while the women are the cunning schemer.

Then again one of their proposal method is to literally pin down their target and ask for his conditions to accept the marriage.

Adrian V

Ok what novel is that (i am assuming is LN or WN) and can you link translation and source?

RoflCat

Ascendance of Bookworm

<https://www.novelupdates.com/series/ascendance-of-a-bookworm/>

source WN (there's LN as well)

<https://ncode.syosetu.com/n4830bu/>

Just keep in mind that given how this series mostly follow the main character, we don't get to see those madlad folks that often.

You first get to meet them early in arc 4.

Rey d`Tutto

Thank you for extending the list of "to read" webnovels.

Dome Zasrekh

Where?

caoimhinh

This chapter was utterly delicious. The Villains have much more interesting personalities and way more dynamic in their interactions than the Heroes.

It had me grinning and enjoying throughout the whole reading. The quirks of personalities, motivations, and ideologies simply flowed much smoothly and feel much more fleshed out than the Heroes, despite how much exposure we'd had to the Heroes.

This was a gathering of rogues with marked personalities and ambitions, misfits with their own agendas working together, and the resulting dynamic is much more entertaining than when we have seen the Heroes' gatherings, where they feel more like a bunch of self-righteous pricks and immature kids.

Oh, these guys would be at each other's throats and die due to falling in the mistakes of classic villainy at the drop of a hat without Cat herding them, but the reading was really way more enjoyable.

I'm really hoping for more chapters like this one. Also, reading from their POV how they have this sort of admiration-fear relationship with Cat is exquisite.

wipncrowell gorgeous chapter.

Hav3n

Beautiful, just beautiful.

Sir Nil

I would follow Irritant into battle.

Sir Nil

"Remember that the last time so many villains were gathered around the same firepit, nations trembled." Leading them from the beginning.

dadycoool

Find a path and put your feet in the prints. It's how she rolls.

shikkarasu

I would follow Irritant to battle, but I think the spectators get the best deal out of what happens in it.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Always a treat to get an external POV of Cat's shenanigans.

Derpman

You know every once in a while I feel like apgte is starting to wain a bit, but then a chapter like this comes out and just fall in love all over again

excession638

It has it's slow spots, but they're necessity.

This chapter is a masterpiece.

NerfGlaistigUaine

That poor soldier, he never signed up to brawl with the greatest Dread Emperor of all time.

erebus42

Honestly if you signed up to serve under Irritant, you really should have had a plan in place on the off chance you ever had to bash your boss's brains in in self defense.

Darkening

Honestly I was thinking an enemy soldier, but it's even more funny if it was one of his. Man, I've been a Traitorous loyalist from day 1, but irritant makes a strong case for himself.

Sir Nil

If both of them existed in the same era, it would've been entirely likely, nay, periodic that they try to dump the throne on the other while the other pursues a career in shoemaking.

Sir Nil

They will probably fight over the same shoemaking shop as well.

medailyfun

Nope, one of them would definitely betray the shop.
At least one.

nimelennar

And periodically you'd find out that the current reign of Dread Emperor Irritant was really the reign of Dread Emperor Traitorous in disguise all along, you fools!

And maybe vice versa.

Finn .-. .

I would like to point out the irony of the phrase "Traitorous Loyalist."

Sir Nil

There is no irony. As a Loyalist to Traitoourous I make sure to betray him on a biweekly basis. It's just my civic duty.

Liliet

Does biweekly mean twice a week or every other week?

Sir Nil

I tell the Dread Emperor twice a week, but in actuality, I betray him once every other week. Such lies and deception are simply the sign of a strong empire.

Liliet

An excellent solution!

Sir Nil

This is a secret but in truth, my greatest betrayal to the Dread Emperor is that I never betray him at all! Hah! He'll never suspect that it was I all along!

NerfContessa

You made my day.

And well, I still think traytorous. And irritant might have been the same person somehow.

Javvies

Heh.

Villains will buy into the Accords and then more because they realize the advantages of organizing under the Accords, for their own protection, comfort, and support.

Berserker (and Troubadour) are lucky that Cat saw this coming, and so never got close to Hakram. Cat would not have been so mild in her response if Hakram had been subject to collateral damage in the fighting.

Also, Cat prepared well. Everything in the meeting has gone more or less as she anticipated and planned for.

It's always nice to see how other people see Cat.

WeeMadCanuck

I think whoever touches Hakram isn't in for just a less mild approach. They would be launching themselves full speed into their graves.

Anomandris

Yeah, the only more surefire way of suicide in Calernia would be killing Black?

Liliet

Honestly, that one I think Cat can breathe in, breathe out and let go. Not easily, but she can. She IS aware of what he did throughout his life.

Of course, it does depend on WHO did it...

Sparsebeard

Cat probably could let it go.

Ranger though...

Liliet

...also could tbh.

I don't think she cares that much)=

Wonder

I started laughing the moment Berserker turned her attention to "the cripple" .

shikkarasu

I'm keep expecting Hakram to Stand up, missing 40% of his body or not, and open a can of Rampage on some fool.

Lox

Rampage is amped up Rage after all.

Axel Rafael

Even if Catherine didn't do a thing, they wouldn't have been able to touch Hakram... Not with his Masegoed Up wheelchair!

caoimhinh

Although, they didn't exactly realize that, Catherine had to point it out to them.

But the pieces were already there, so the moment they even considered the issue, they were all like "oh, shit. How did I not see this?"

LarsBlitzer

I think the main reason they hadn't foreseen this is because they simply hadn't had the advantage of perspective. Cat, Hakram, and Indrani have. It's been pointed out here that Peregrine, Saint and many others have made it their mission to strangle any and all of Below's nascent Chosen in the cradle, sometimes literally. Above's entirely too well-acquainted with "The ends justify the means" and "It's for the Greater Good" to excuse entire rolls of butcher's bills and atrocities by the literal boatload. It's a minor Infernal miracle that there as many as they have. Add to that being signed up to fight a war against the literal antithesis of life, and I'm not surprised they hadn't pondered the question of what happens after the Big Bad is Dead dead.

nick012000

I don't think that Hakram would have been in any danger, even if he's in a wheelchair. Remember, two of his Aspects are Stand and Rampage. If he has to fight, I expect that he'd be able to weave replacement limbs out of shadow easily enough, even if it would tire him a lot more rapidly than he would have tired had he been whole.

dadycoool

I bet if the two of them were alone and she turned to him in the midst of RAGE, he'd be like "Heh, that's cute." and then stomp on her.

Mennolt van Alten

> Stand

Oh god, I hadn't realised this yet, but that aspect until now has always been 'hold my ground in a battle' but I wouldn't be surprised if it repurposed itself / augmented itself into growing Hakram temporary legs. Until now the aspect has basically always given him magic strength and resilience to hold the line, and I wouldn't be surprised if the aspect realised 'he needs legs to do so too' and just gave them.

Agent J

He's also grown strange, ethereal claws before. I fully expect to see him get out of his wheelchair to straight up wreck shit in a fight before Book's end.

sengachi

Let's be honest, even down three and a half limbs Hakram still doesn't need Cat to fight his battles for him. The Berserker was fool enough to lose situational awareness and I'd pit Hakram's Rampage against her Rage any day.

That fight probably would have ended with Hakram's wrestling her to the ground with stumps and one working prosthetic hand, and then fastening his teeth on her throat.

Gareth Hughes

While reciting poetry. We need another poem brawl!

Anomandris

All hail the Queen!!

TeK

Like weaving a tapestry. You arrange the strings in shape, pull at a few, and a pattern is done.

Daniel E

I just got home from work and am sleepy, so I misread this as 'weaving a pastry'. Suffice to say, I am now both confused and hungry.

erebus42

A berserker in the style of Cú Chulainn and a delightful soul eating silvertongue, truly wonderful additions to the tale. The Witch and Abigail need to get a drink one of these days, I'm sure they'd get along swimmingly. The Summoner is lucky he's useful. He seems like the sort Cat would love to gut on general principle and who no one would get too upset over.

Navi-Hank

He got warp spasm from somewhere

Xinci

Well, it was once again, useful to see the palpable of the effects of having a lot of narrative weight, truly a lovely demonstration. As is her seeming to now have a bigger reason to get an enforcement branch for Cardinal. I originally suspected she might rotate in Cabals from the Drow for that, as a way for them to expand the Night in a cooperative fashion. Her goal has been for things to run on their own after all, so I am quite curious about what met methods she will use to help supply those of a darker shade.

Rapacious indeed, I am sure he is a lovely font of data on all these new developments, for the Gods, one way or another. I am honestly fascinated by how he might function and how his soul consumption works. He found older souls tasteless and colorless so he seems to desire new essence like a devil/demon. Presumably, he is adding their souls to his when he "feeds", which is quite natural but it seems that he isn't fully retaining them. Fitting for a rapacious being to have unending hunger, I wonder if Masego will ever not anything about him, he is rather similar to a devil...

I am rather curious if the Head Hunter is using those heads to bind souls or is just taking some form of copy that is bound to the heads. I do wonder if they can take on the forms of those they kill, I mean we do have a Skinwalker already but mimicking things with souls seems to vary a bit. Like Summoner may be doing something similar to the Binders, or perhaps its just Diabolism? Though the difference there seems a matter of perspective or origin of whats being summoned.

Black Spiral Dancer

I always read the Headhunter as the old movies, haven't you watched... the guys who used swords and fought battles, immortals until someone CUT THEIR NECKS and so let the other one collect their power and memories...?

Highlander, anyone?

Abrakadabra

There can be only one!

Adrian V

Ok i think this may be my new favorite chapter, the look into all the villains heads and how they see Cat was great, plus the whole thing was fun. And the clever way Cat united them was superb.

Now who was that villain Cordelia took in? I can't remember if it was that duelist (or even if he was damned) but even if so i thought he was more of a bodyguard.

erebus42

I believe he was referring to the Forgetful Librarian who appears to be take the role of the exasperated secretary to Cordelia.

Sir Nil

I believe there was also a luck manipulator, I forget their name but Cat took a few of their fingers after he tried to steal a few soldier's luck,

Earl of Purple

The Pilfering Dicer is in Cleves, I think. A pity, I wonder how he and the Rapacious Troubadour get on. Both small villains who need to blend into society rather than stand truly outside it. One steals luck, the other souls. They either get on well due to the similarities between them or hate each other as rivals.

Or both.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Great chapter for sure, but my favorite still is and likely will always be Kairos' swansong

Darkening

The Gods Below clapping for Kairos' show was a hell of a moment.

Black Spiral Dancer

I seem to remember another great one of... these kind of chapters, so to speak. The one where the Seer and the Bard kept talking to one another while in the end Cordelia rejected her name of Warden of the West but for a slightly change in timing and the possibility of choice where before wouldn't have been.

That was also a Great chapter, with capital G.

Liliet

And Yet We Stand iirc

checks

yup!

Bellow

this was a beautiful chapter. I loved seeing all these different takes on villainy and how they react to the accords and Catherine. From the stupid arrogant, The blood thirsty and the ambitious social climbers to the little witch who just wants to survive. It was a ton of fun.

Also... ALL HAIL EMPEROR IRRITANT!!!

Death Knight

Carrot and stick... Works every time.

Abrakadabra

Except when someone really don't want to do what you want, and Tell you to stick your carrot up yours. 😊

Liliet

You just need to pick the right carrot.

And if that doesn't work, the right stick 😊

Juff

Typo Thread:

his eyes he'd paid for (should this be "his eyes that had paid for") at his advantage > to his advantage he'd ben > he'd been as such a > at such a was a mildly > with a mildly

Has his own > Had his own personable.The (missing space) barrow-raiding.The (missing space) villainess patience > villainess' patience enforced > enforcer hatches > hatchets of blue circle > of a blue circle snaked > snake (occurs twice) villainess limbs > villainess' limbs spams > spasms

in surprised > in surprise to who he > to whom he silence him > silenced him

Joel ~~DELETED~~

Absolutely beautiful

dadycoool

And thus we behold the Black Queen BREAK half the Villains west of Praes and TAKE their souls for her own. As both the White Knight and Mirror Knight once prophesied, those who find themselves within her area of influence find themselves drawn to her like moths to a flame, unknowingly allowing themselves to be chained to her will until they are like dogs called to their master's heel. Even the Concoctor and Beastmaster, who see the effect she has on one of their own, the one who would never settle down with anyone, are unable to escape the allure of the Devil's Grin. Even the Berserker, an unstoppable force of RAGE, found herself reigning in her temper for fear of the Queen's displeasure.

Liliet

Reining in. Reins, like horse. Pulling on reins to call to a stop.

Not ruling a country.

dadycoool

Oops. I hadn't noticed it before. Damn context-blind spellchecker.

Liliet

Really, really glad to help.

(Thanks, tumblr post I barely remember that alerted me to several sets of words like this lol)

dadycoool

Reigning, reining, raining?

Liliet

I don't think I've ever seen raining confused with these... But free rein, rein in, phase vs faze, horde vs hoard...

Liliet

(I'm sorry, this is just SUCH a common mistake, I couldn't hold it in anymore)

Darkening

Remember when cat thought bards were all bumbling comic relief? Ah, how things change.

Black Spiral Dancer

That might have be EXACTLY the reason our steemed Author decided to create Bards surpassing such antiquated and, frankly, monochromatic view of what a Bard truly is. No matter what Order of the Stick made you believe, bards can be a soul of any team, like in Looking for Group, where there's that Minotaur bard – and I don't remember if the Elf was a bard or a ranger initially, but he COULD have been a bard. Also, the anti-team Stick has a bard for Team Leader AND the father of Stick's Bard still IS the team leader of a strong and ancient band of villains that have settled down.

Catherine seems like she's letting go of the Fighter Mantle and accept a more varied position of a True Mastermind she always was, and Bard fits her much more now – exactly for how multifaceted Bards always are (kinda like the Gemini sign, my own Moon sign, that has the same properties).

Clumsy

The hamfistedness of the virtue signalling intensifies, huh?

Matthew Wells

?

Big I

I found a lot to unpack in this chapter.

First, the Barrow Sword. If/when Cat steps aside, he's the logical replacement for leader of Team Villain. He's got the most respect and the least grudges. He also struck me, if he were Praesi, to be most likely to be Dread Emperor in a Villainous band. He forges alliances and keeps his eye on politics.

The Summoner, funnily enough, also struck me as a classic would be Tyrant. One of the useless, ineffectual ones. More Cobra Commander than Emperor Palpatine.

The Rapacious Troubadour is classic Chancellor material. I can't help but wonder what he and the Barrow Sword would be able to get up to in Levant, especially with the Grave Binder and the Maurauder (Dominion version of Warlock and Black Knight maybe?).

And finally, what stuck me most about this chapter is how Cat turned the whole "meta-narrative" of the Villain stories on its head. Now THEY'RE the ones banding together for safety, worried about the implacable, ruthless, well resourced enemy out to kill them. Now THEY'RE the underdogs. It's a total role reversal.

Oh, and it also struck me how this meeting resembled a Bond Villain meeting with their minions, e.g. Blofeld or Dr Evil. Cat even trap doors someone who displeased her! Classic.

Black Spiral Dancer

Oh yeah, thanks for your precious remarks! And I hadn't even noticed about the trap doors that makes someone fall under! Old but gold.

MarcusAurelius

Using they for singular is grammatically dubious and just plain confusing, would not "it" work better?

Sinead

Do you ever refer to someone's possessions as "their possession"?

It is usually seen as dehumanising (and is probably why drow culture uses "it".)

Context is always required when using pronouns, gendered or not. And it pays to be respectful, even if you are not dealing with a divinely empowered serial killer.

Big I

No. My understanding is that "it" is an offensive term for non-binary people IRL. The preferred pronoun is "they" (again, so far as I understand).

Sinead

Preferred pronouns vary (in Headhunter's case, note how Ishaq can read contextual clues to be specific about pronouns, while everyone else defaults to they. Interestingly, Lysander (Beastmaster) also seems to be able to pick up on the Headhunter's gender presentation. EE's yet to write anyone as a bigot when it comes to gender or sexual orientation, so Beastmaster referring to Headhunter as "he" is either a typo or a demonstration on how Lysander can read people.

RandomIntenetStranger

Imo it must be hard being a bigot about anything when a divinely empowered murderer may take offense, add to it a few hundred years of it on repeat and it would get beaten out of any culture, besides if we are to make parallels the main reason queer people get the treatment they do in our society can be reduced to the way religion (any) is ingrained in it, so again it becomes difficult to accuse anyone of being blasphemous when that person or someone like them are endorsed by the gods.

Black Spiral Dancer

True enough. And that's why religion is cracking slowly, like an Iceberg melting, and it's gonna melt down in a few centuries, max. There's just nowhere for it to grow, only to DIVIDE.

Burlyraven

Using "they" in the singular has been recognized in professional literary circles for coming on 2 years now, and been acceptable in most less than formal instances for centuries. "It" is typically used for inanimate things or as a form of derision, which is why the Drow preference for "it" is so unusual.

Erik V. Smykal

solid point.
additionally, if one needs a form of direct address that is non-binary, 'Sia' takes the place of 'Sir', or 'Ma'am'.
This is definitely one of the best chapters in the whole saga, for sure.
Beautiful.

Morgenstern

"They" has been used for centuries in real life in cases of "gender unknown" when speaking about people. Also, for mixed groups.

Never trust (old) grammar books on spoken language and gender issues. 😊

Speaking as one who has studied linguistics and done some research in this specific field: Historically, grammar books have been written by old white males, though, who can (by their own letters at the time) be PROVEN to have consciously put in terms that “will probably be offensive to women” – but who cares, as well as left out usages of centuries before them that were (and still are) very much in use when it comes to spoken language.

Morgenstern

Ugh... how I hate hitting “post” too fast and not being able to edit comments. As well as other posters’ comments being randomly hidden from view, even when they are literal days older... -.-

Morgenstern

I would so love to scratch that about ‘mixed groups’... no idea where that came from lulz I was thinking of the gender being given as “mixed”, “undefined” etc. ... Sometimes my brain does strange things.

Abrakadabra

Sadly, english has this kind of strange tendency for gendered words, which some of us WHO are not native speakers cannot get used to easily. For example in my native there is a Word for ‘it’ and there is also a Word for he/she which can be either male or female cause it is undefined.

Mental Mouse

If singular “they” was good enough for Shakespeare and Chaucer, it’s good enough for me....

Burlyraven

I’m finding myself liking the Barrow Sword more and more with each of his appearances. He’s obviously fully team Evil, but he seems more on the rebellious faction of Evil over the malicious side of Evil. Obviously he’s got a bit more darkness than the Woe if he’s willing and eager to work closely with the likes of the Rapacious Troubadour, but he’s most dangerous in the fact that he knows how and when to pick his battles, and even accept his defeats.

xGarudax

What a bunch of cowards and weaklings, deeply disheartening to see.

mamm0nn

True, though they were good character designs I was missing some notable and terrifying characters. I like Cat, but making all the other Villains come off as second-rate or greenhorns doesn't quite endear me further. Where are the Old Monsters that have been around for hundreds of years even if they are not nation-shattering, the Villains that could beat Cat or at least make her get up from her chair, the ones smart enough that a whisper can spell doom ten chapters from now? I hope there were more present than the handful we saw here who were just quiet because they knew better, or that the Villains elsewhere have a few superior specimens.

Earl of Purple

Saint of Swords spent what, seventy years running around Calernia killing any villain she could find. The ones she missed are either young, weak or excessively subtle. Or Praesi, since she left them alone. Any powerful old monsters she didn't tackle are ones that stayed hidden long enough to get missed, or Horned Lords.

Villains don't age, but they don't get to live long either. Most are slain by heroes, other villains or their own hubris long before they reach a point they would die of old age. The Calamities are an exception- pretty much the exception, at that.

mamm0nn

One hero cannot resolve everything when we've just heard that there's at least 75 Named around right now not including the ones we know aren't in the Accords like Ranger and Malicia, and there probably being another fifty Villains around on top of that. And that's at a time when all the focus is on the war with the Dead King, when I assume that new Named with their own tale are unlikely to rise because it'd simply be overshadowed. By taxes stifling opportunity and growth alone, if nothing else. More likely, right now Named either rise in relation to the war or not at all, and the war already has all its main players in place. So it's probable that there's usually actually more Named running around even if of a lesser quality.

As Pilgrim said way back, Saint was the one sent if Evil festered too long and too wide (presumably also limited to Good lands). Not necessarily if a Villain appeared at all or if they hit only one of those two conditions. She's Above's answer to either Cat or Akua riding too high and succeeding once too many or sticking around too long in the Good Callow, but not for Squire fighting her first Hero.

She seemed to have a clear and narrow Role for her foes and application, straying from it would still work by brawn but she wouldn't have Providence on her side. So her hunting Villains and her finding them without Creation's handholding are two different things, though she may stumble into a Villain from time to time the latter she probably only gets when the Villain hits her criteria.

In this, Pilgrim would've been much more devastating thanks to having a narrow Role but one that supports a great many Heroes to stack the odds in their favour in the early stages. Him, I can see a trend of Above having more champions than Below coming to be. But not by that much, as many a Named may start with a mentor or doesn't have a story where Providence notices correct danger early enough for him to step in and save the Hero in the nick of time. Providence isn't all-knowing with future-sense and Named still retain a semblance of free will, so if it sees a pattern where the Hero needs a last minute mentor a week in advance when Pilgrim is two weeks off, they have to use another mentor or see the Hero die.

All in all, I don't see 'Because Saint of Swords' or even 'Because Pilgrim' as a good example of why there would be fewer Villains. The gods Above and Below are still in a balancing act where Below too gets their Due, and Above already has a lot of advantages so they must have limitations. We haven't seen many of Below's boons because Cat hasn't gotten the chance to use them or doesn't realise them as everyone in the Interludes does, but Below gets more than just the successful first act. They'd have to, given Above's many advantages.

On your second paragraph, that's an assumption and trend, but definitely not the rule. If what you were saying is true, people wouldn't even have known of that boon until the Calamities did it, which wasn't the case. Most villains don't live for long, but that hardly means that they all do. And the very point of this boon is that the ones that survive stay at their peak and never disappear by old age.

If even just 1% of all the Villains survive long enough to really make their immortality work, and those odds are probably higher because we're still talking about Named, that still means that if there's 100 villains over 30 years one will stick around for a while. And that tends to accumulate over time, even if their average lifespan is only a century. There should be more old monsters, even if we're not talking city-busters, on Below's side than just the Dead King.

Javvies

Pilgrim probably did more of the cutting down any new Villains that arose than Saint did, at least, once he wasn't tied so tightly to Levant.

But it has been explicitly established that between the two of them, plus the other Heroes, they kept a boot firmly stomped on the neck of Villainous Named outside of Callow and Praes for the past several decades.

However, those “old monsters” you say should be around? Those are exactly the kind of people Saint would be cutting down in droves.

Also, they are far more likely to decline to become involved, even if they’re around.

Villains tend to have shorter life expectancies than Heroes, despite the Villainous immunity to aging. That is, most Villains never see any actual benefit from their immunity to aging.

Most Villains usually lose to the first Hero or Heroes that they run into, while the Hero(es) usually survive. Maybe not right away, of course, depending upon the Story(ies) they’re in.

It’s also worth keeping in mind that Villains usually only arise in the singular, while their story can contribute to spawning multiple Heroes, and is nigh guaranteed to spawn at least one Hero. While Heroes can also arise in the absence of active interaction with a Villain’s Story.

Also, as regards the balance of power between Above and Below and the Names that they empower ... the Dead King counts ... but he is usually dead weight on the side of Below.

In addition, there is the nature of each – Above can be a lot more proactive in distributing Names, even if the recipients haven’t actually done anything to warrant getting a Name, in addition to giving Names to people who earned them based on the merits of their actions. Below doesn’t just hand Names out, Below only gives out Names when somebody actively does things to warrant getting a Name.

Villains outlasting multiple Heroic entanglements is an exception, and extraordinarily rare.

Just think about how many Heroic bands took a run at Cat between the Doom of Liesse and the Crusade being declared. Five Heroic bands ... in less than a year.

Villains have to survive every encounter with a Hero in order to continue surviving. The Heroes only need to get lucky once in order to end a Villain ... and Heroes tend to get lucky in that manner. Remember, there’s Narrative weight swinging just about every Story in favor of the Heroes against the Villain – “Good always wins over Evil in the end” after all.

mamm0nn

There are a couple of misconceptions here, and the most erroneous one is that you're forgetting that Above and Below are equal and that the one intervening allows the other to intervene equally without retribution.

We see this story from Cat's perspective where she's usually on the receiving end of the stick and well out of her league, but remember that her perspective is very much unreliable when it comes to herself. We see that in every interlude that involves her. As much as she may see the deck stacked in the heroes' favour, we don't know what the balance truly is and it's quite likely not as much in the Heroes favour as she thinks it is.

But that's of course the question, and one we cannot answer ourselves. Only EE knows the answer there, while we are left with the perspective of the woman and her mentor who howl against the heavens about this very topic of unfairness.

Yet in the end, when Above does anything then Below gets its due. That's the way it works as has been explicitly stated. This already counters that there would be more Heroes than Villains, I don't even know where you got that notion from. Villains might create a Hero, but a Hero is just as likely to create Villains to oppose them.

On the Dead King, it's been explicitly stated before that one side's due isn't continuous but once paid always gained. See "Villainous interlude Cadenza": Black and Scribe ponder that the Wandering Bard might've been Heaven's due in response of Triumphant or vice versa, meaning that as far as these Name-experts know one can die while the other persists. Thus the Dead King too is a once paid all yours deal.

Which is, of course, assuming that a Named doing things themselves counts as Due to the gods at all. Though there is the due of his Name, the Dead King didn't get the power from Below rather he performed the ritual himself. He might've even not had much of a due for Above to use. Meanwhile Providence and all those hero-helping tricks are directly from the gods Above, so they accumulate and should come with an equal but opposite reaction from Below somewhere.

No telling what that balance is, but as the rules of this story have stated there has to be such a balance. More Villains but lower quality perhaps, the gods Below using more champions and see what sticks? Maybe? Or something else. No telling what that would be, though, once again only EE can know.

On the comment that Saint would've killed those Old Monsters, seems you didn't properly read what I said. Those Villains have to be both old and active, probably in Good lands too. Saint didn't go to the Underdark either, despite its many potent Evil monsters, because it's not bothering the Good lands. If such an old monster is in hiding or more subtle, she might have no providence backing her to find that Villain at all, turning things in a wild goose chase probably. And some of those old monsters may have considered what Cat is trying to do for them and came to see if it would come to fruition.

Not sure where you got your ideas about Heaven being able to dish out Names willy nilly while Below demands them to be earned. I don't recall Black and Cat earning their Names, nor Archer and Masego earned his at most earned through study and talent.

No, it's been established that being already extraordinary in what you are and can do is a big factor of getting a Name on either side, none of the things you're suggesting here.

However, that aside you should really take the most important point from this: This story is told from a heavily biased point of view in this very regard. More likely the Heroes aren't actually as overpowered when not in the context of "How will Creation screw over Cat today?", and you are adding several additional powers to them that the story never mentioned.

Things that have been properly established though:

-Cat, Black and many of our known friendly Villains are actively weaker than what they could be because they go against the grains. Black isn't a powerhouse like the previous Knights because he doesn't act the Villain, while Warlock was very potent because he very much was acting the Villain as intended. This has been explicitly stated by several people, including Black and the Wandering Bard.

Cat too works against the grain, so she too is less powerful than she should be if she were a cackling madwoman. Where she has a lot of power to slug around with and probably fits the grooves better than Black, Creation likely screws her in other departments. Meanwhile most Villains probably don't nearly have the kind of trouble she goes through, and perfect Villains like Tyrant could easily go toe to toe with a full and fully fletched band of Five still winning.

-Most of the Heroes we've seen Cat go up against are the higher class ones. Just like how the Villains introduced here are more second-tier, many a Hero will be more one-note and weaker. We just don't remember the Heroes that are easily beaten in one chapter as well, because they've only been around for one chapter before Cat moves on.

-Evil can win. If Good goes about it wrong and doesn't force one of their Stories by attrition, or if Evil is simply too powerful, then the whole 'Good wins in the end' is just a hopeful tune by the Heroes. If the Villain kills the Hero before a Story even forms, doesn't let it all come down to a pivot point, or doesn't want to play with their food, they can win. Again, we see this from the perspective of Cat who's always defending and reactionary, never from the perspective of a real Villain. For all we know, even the lesser Villains like the Headhunter can get three heroic heads on their belt before the fourth gets a Story able to make that willpower attrition schtick work against someone that hunts and goes for the kill.

Abrakadabra

You Just love your own voice aint ya?

mamm0nn

Yes, because why use arguments and words when you can just 'win' like that? Surely you just showed me, good show...

Frivolous

I found it interesting that the non-Woe villains all overlooked how dangerous Concocter was. Not one of them thought, as Cat did in the previous chapter, that Cocky is a poisoner and her poisons are instantly lethal.

I suspect that, in the end, the villains will be more powerfully organized than the heroes. The heroes have to be virtuous and respect each other and individual liberty. The villains, on the other hand, might marshal together more ably simply because violence is a respectable option among them.

For instance, Hanno couldn't have forced his companions to behave during the hero meeting the way Cat did at this villain conclave. He had to use moral suasion, at least until the brawl broke out, and then he and the other heroes lost a lot of extra-group face and intra-group respect.

The fact that there are many more heroes than villains is mostly due to Tariq and Laurence, right?

I agree with Burlyraven that Ishaq is one of the more easily liked villains. He has ambition and a clear and non-self-destructive idea of how to achieve his goals.

I'm guessing Cat's "additional rules of engagement" probably involves agreeing not to destroy Cardinal's facilities or buildings or attack anyone on its grounds.

Mental Mouse

> I'm guessing Cat's "additional rules of engagement" probably involves agreeing not to destroy Cardinal's facilities or buildings or attack anyone on its grounds.

Also something to the effect of "don't make us look bad..." – that is, an all-purpose restraint on anything that would mess with Cardinal's reputation.

Frivolous

I wonder if Cat will make one of the rules, "No honor duels. Ever."

Ishaq might balk at that, but Cat has zero liking for that Levantine practice, and she might tell Ishaq that it's one of the easiest ways for him to get himself killed, and she won't bother to help someone who won't agree not to avoid such a suicidal practice. It would make him a rotten investment of her time and energy.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, it would be « arrogant Villain challenge righteous Hero ». Even if it's a non-combined Hero, if he manage to kill him another martial one will definitely avenge him

Mental Mouse

The thing is, "no honor duels" is a tough sell exactly because honor duels are already serving to channel and limit fights that could easily involve whole families; that is, their purpose is to short-circuit vendettas.

nimelennar

Not only that, but she was the only one who thought to bring a legitimate grievance as a host-gift.

sengachi

And so does Catherine take one more step towards ensuring that the only villains who survive the new age will be those who can place nice with others.

letouriste

welp, it was fun.

" for the shape of the face paint told Ishaq they were a him, at the moment" interesting. so the headhunter could be collecting heads for changing his face?

the "at the moment" tend to say it, right?

Shveiran

It is certainly possible, though I read that as "the face paint carries gender-related implications. The Headhunter wears different face-painting depending on how he perceives himself in a given moment."

Javvies

I would tend to agree with this line of thought.

That is, I interpreted it as indicating that there are gender-identity-specific patterns and/or color combinations in the Levantine face painting practices.

Aotrs Commander

Irritant was a true genius.

Rey d`Tutto

Irritant or Traitorous?

That is the Question.

Whether it be Nobler to the mind to Subvert the slings and arrows of misfortune,

Or to Be them.

Hellspirit

Perfect.

Shveiran

You know what's better than an Interlude where we get to see how a different character perceives Cat's actions?

An Interlude where we get to see how a shitton of characters perceive Cat's actions and eachother.

Heck, it was even conveniently broken up in multiple, small sections I could read as a brief interlude (pun inintended) between the various parts of a depressing day at work.

A marvelous chapter, even more than usual.
Thank you kindly.

Frivolous

It occurred to me just now that Cat has a trove of knowledge on how the most notable living heroes think and operate.

Most people, maybe not even most heroes, don't have a clue as to the Grey Pilgrim's aspects, or how much information Behold and the Ophanim give him. But Cat does. She even knows how to block it, or at least, she can probably broker a deal between a villain and Sve Noc for that gift.

Most people don't know how Hanno of Arwad thinks. But Cat does.

Cat is also the only living villain the Choirs tread warily around. She is the only living villain to outwit and thwart angels.

Cat has basically an expertise when it comes to heroes and heroism, and also angels and their powers, and she has demonstrated she can defeat them all. This would be is a priceless survival tool for the villains after the war. And Cat will only teach those villains that she likes and trusts.

Cat can thus mold villainous behavior by offering to them yet another carrot: the carrot of information and influence over the greatest threats to their survival.

KageLupus

"The Concocter would have opened a newborn for what was being offered, what were a few damned rules to her?"

Rule number 1: Don't do that thing you just said

Frivolous

"I have the heart of an innocent baby. I keep it in a jar of preservative."

M0och123

This.

This is everything I love about this series.

Miles

"Vote," Catherine Foundling mildly said, "before I make you vote."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Black Spiral Dancer

Haven't see the link for a while... always forgot to vote. Thanks for the reminder, specially after a TASTY chapter like this. Although I'm not sure if the listing provides monetary benefits for our author or just bragging rights.

Either, she got my vote, as always.

Miles

It's mostly a way for new readers to find this story.

ironvale

This reminds me of the Unsili accords in dresden, with Kat as Mab...

Ben Serreau-Raskin

She was even a Winter Fairy Queen for a stretch.

Daniel E

This chapter is officially tied for my favorite of the entire series. Reading about the continuous shenanigans of everybody's favorite Dread Emperor just makes it all the better.

Frivolous

Some more notes:

I believe the constant mentions of Berserker's spasming is meant to allude to Cuchulainn's warp spasm.

I am skeptical and surprised that Summoner thinks that he's entitled to anything from Catherine because his father was a Callowan lord. Doesn't he talk to anyone else from Callow? Cat's famous, and surely most people by this time know that she's anti-aristocrat. How can a Callowan not know this?

Concocter talks about being shut out of the Arsenal. It brings to mind a question: If the alliance wins the war vs Keter, what happens to the Arsenal? Who gets it, who gets to keep using it?

Given Cat's tendency to make plans well in advance of needing them, and given that Masego was one of the primary people who made the Arsenal, I suspect that the Woe has a way of shutting everyone else out of the Arsenal, if there was need. I suspect that Cat would never allow the heroes or Procer or anyone else to take over the Arsenal. Cat thinks like a soldier, Masego is more brilliant than anyone else, and it's too powerful and useful a stronghold.

For all we know, Cat has a way to instantaneously evict everyone else from the Arsenal at a moment's notice.

Javvies

I'm pretty sure Arsenal is going to get rolled into or otherwise absorbed by Cardinal in the post-war/Accords era. Or, at least, that's what the plan is.

Frivolous

First, I guess it depends on how politically powerful Catherine sees herself in the Age of Order.

Concocter thinks the heroes and the nobles and the Good nations will hunt the villains. Will Cat be one of those hunted? Cat already knows Rozala said that most heroes think she won't survive the war. If she survives, the heroes might think to rectify that.

I believe Cat has planned for most obvious contingencies, including that the Good will try to drive the Evil out of the Arsenal. Having a button that will kill or evict everyone else from the Arsenal in case of treachery seems like a really obvious contingency.

Cat has to know that Procer and Cordelia won't remain very grateful once the Dead King no longer poses a threat. She remembers being threatened by Procer and Levant. She's the Arch-heretic of the East. The Liesse Accords won't prevent heroes from dueling her, or heroes or nobles using political or legal maneuvers to limit or weaken her.

I don't believe she has any trust at all in the honor of others outside the Woe.

Second, I don't believe the Arsenal can be absorbed per se. It's not even in Creation. How do you absorb a place that is so difficult to get to?

Javvies

Break the existing entrances and put a new one where Cardinal gets built.

Also, I was speaking in more of a figurative sense than a literal one. The Arsenal and its assets are almost certainly going to belong to Cardinal, once Cardinal is founded.

That said, while Proceran gratitude is notoriously shortlived, I expect that it will last more than long enough for the negotiation and establishment of the Accords and Cardinal, as long as Cordelia or someone similarly minded is in charge.

Also, Procer literally won't be able to afford anything other than rebuilding and recovery efforts for years.

And while some of the Heroes (especially if Mirror Knight survives and Tariq doesn't successfully reform him) might want to go after Cat after the war, I think more of them are going to buy into the Accords, Cardinal, and letting Cat contain the Villains in the Accords and Praes.

Also, there's the Drow to consider, most of whom would likely consider it a signal honor to hunt down and kill anyone going after the First Under the Night. And free entertainment. And free powerups.

Plus, the Dominion, judging by Yannu, is not going to approve of going after Cat, Callow, or many of the Villains who have signed on, until/unless they do something specific to warrant it after the War.

Most of the Heroes will probably accept the Accords, however grudgingly, and Cardinal because it puts fewer explicit limitations on Heroes than on Villains and the Villains that don't abide by the limitations are not protected, and nobody wants around.

Especially if the theory about the consequences of successful suppression of Villains by Tariq and the Saint of Swords for decades gets shared. If it's impossible to eradicate Villains on a lasting or prolonged basis without a major backlash, it's a helluva lot better for everyone if the Villains that exist are not the mass casualty lunatics and instead are more restrained.

Point is, Cat is planning both for the war effort and for the post-war reshaping. And as much as possible, activities to support the war effort are also designed either to directly or indirectly support or lay groundwork for the Accords, Cardinal, and the post-war era.

She also has at least some buy in in this effort by Cordelia, the Dominion, and several major Heroes.

Frivolous

We don't know what the Accords say about property. Cat seemed most concerned about issues like weapons of mass destruction and angels and demons, not theft via declarations.

Procer being poor in the post-war era only increases the chances that Cordelia will attempt to seize, whether by force or by lawsuits, the assets at the Arsenal, because those can be sold for coin.

Javvies

Cordelia isn't that stupid. Or ungrateful. Or suicidal. She knows full well that seizing the Arsenal and/or its assets for Procer would backfire horribly and end in a lot of bloodshed.

I'm certain that the Arsenal and its assets will belong to Cardinal, and I'm confident that there's an agreement to that effect, however unofficial it may be at this point, given that it is somewhat premature to be officially negotiating the Accords.

Worst case scenario is that there's an agreement that any Arsenal assets get returned to their prior possessor after the War, pending negotiations for their contribution to Cardinal.

More likely, everything stays in the Arsenal until negotiations are finished and everything gets turned over to Cardinal.

Konstantin von Karstein

Cordelia will definitely remain grateful, she's trying to stop that habit the Principate has to backstab their allies. And Rozala swore her entire line to prevent Proceran treason.

Anyway, Procer will be in no shape to attack anyone for a long time after the war. Or at least not without being spanked hard.

Frivolous

Konstantin, could you pls remind me again where Rozala swore that? I vaguely remember her doing so but not exactly when.

I really hope Javvies is correct about Cordelia being worthy of trust, and that her love of Duty won't make her rethink her priorities when Keter isn't huffing and puffing to blow her house down anymore.

Konstantin von Karstein

She swore it when Cat and Tariq came back from the TW, at the end of book 5.

Javvies

Rozala's Oath was made after the Prince's Graveyard. After Cat and company returned from the creation of Twilight.

As for Cordelia and duty ... she sees part of her duty as rehabilitating Procer's reputation. Part of that involves putting an end to the Proceran habit of backstabbing people and betraying its agreements made with other countries.

Remember, Cordelia is Lycaonese first. The Lycaonese Principalities are also known as the Proceran Callow. The Lycaonese have traditionally stayed out of Proceran politics, imperialism, and adventurism abroad. They are culturally focused on defending the against the Chain of Hunger on one border and the Dead King on the second, while keeping a cautious eye on the rest of the Proceran Principalities, specifically and especially their immediate neighbors, to watch against being stabbed in the back.

Cordelia's upbringing ensures that her priority is to maintain the defenses of Procer, and one of those defenses is not being viewed as an enemy by as much of the rest of Calernia as possible.

Betraying the rest of the Grand Alliance for the sake of seizing the Arsenal and its assets would be far more trouble than it is worth.

Sure, a lot of the materials are rare and expensive ... but there probably aren't that many places they could actually be sold. And there are only so many possible buyers ... most of whom would either be not a good idea to sell magical texts and supplies to (the Praesi) or members of the Grand Alliance/Truce and Terms/Accords. Plus, most of the Named inside the Arsenal? They would not accept Procer taking over. Actually, I don't think any of them would, even the Proceran-origin Heroes. Okay, maybe one or two of the Proceran Heroes assigned to the Arsenal wouldn't fight it much, but they wouldn't be helping a Proceran takeover either.

One of the reasons Cordelia is not happy with Mirror Knight or his girlfriend's family? It wasn't just that they were planning to depose her as First Prince of Procer, though that would be plenty on its own. It was also that they were planning on betraying the agreement made with Cat and the Drow about Drow settling in the lands north.

Cordelia knows how Yannu reacted when he found out about the plot, and the rest of the Dominion, at least most of the rest of the Dominion and the Blood, would react similarly to such behaviour. Actually seizing the Arsenal would be even worse than just plotting (but not carrying out) a betrayal of a third party – after all, part of the Arsenal's assets come from the Dominion. In addition, Cordelia knows that Sve Noc knew and informed Cat about the plot to betray the Drow. Cordelia would have to assume that the Sisterd would know and inform Cat about any plot to seize the Arsenal, unless perhaps Bard was running interference for it. Cat is reasonable, yes, but she also has an earned reputation for ruthlessness and brutality as a Villain – betraying Cat is not something that Cordelia could possibly conceive of as ending well.

No, there's no real upside and massive amounts of negatives, involved in Procer seizing the Arsenal to try to cover its debts after the war. Cordelia isn't foolish enough to try something like that, though I will grant that the dumbasses who were plotting to depose her and betray the Drow might also have tried to lay claim to the Arsenal while they were at it.

The Mirror Knight might be dumb enough to try to claim the Arsenal for Procer as well, but he'd get no help from any other Heroes, and there'd be no way for Hanno to avoid needing to execute him, assuming there was anything left to be executed. And Mirror Knight would have no sanction or political cover either.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Rereading this chapter today it strikes me as ironic, considering how last chapter Cat was specifically thinking she wasn't going to follow Akua's advice in setting herself up as Queen of the Damned.

Obviously she wants her 'hall' and it's effects to be a long term thing, to give villains an additional incentive to keep to the Accords, but also as long as she lives to manage this hall she's set herself up as arbiter for their affairs, which is basically Queen of the Damned with a different coat of paint.

In the end, Cat's story is that she ends up in charge and her followers benefit. No changes here.

Sinead

What I am wondering is if this Hall will see The Crows grow in influence outside the Drow. It would be interesting if First Under Night ends up becoming the figurehead of the Below's Coalition. How different is Cat's plan for the Villains any different to her work with the Drow (turning "the worthy take, the worthy rise" into something actually stable)

nightedge

In many ways it a blessing if she gets a Villianous Name, given that she'll then be immortal. That is if she isn't already. Means that unless she's killed or fucks off, the threat of her reprisal to a slight will always be good.

Though this does of course run counter to her intentions, I find it difficult to believe given the story that she'll accomplish her every goal in the end.

Rey d`Tutto

This is, hands down, my favorite webnovel.

mamm0nn

During the second heroic gathering:

Tariq: I've just seen the discrepancy between Heroes and Villains in the Accords realised that once this war is over, we'll have several packs of well-acquainted Heroes hunting lone Villains.

Now I wish I wouldn't have to but know I need to tell you all this; that's a terrifying prospect and it will be very bad if this comes to pass. We currently hang on a thin balance between Good and Evil where we can stop the Villains and preserve the peace and status quo, with things stacked in our favour to win most of the time. Providence and winning the third act are on our side.

But when we Heroes have such a massive advantage over the Villains for a generation, it will leave grooves that shall screw us over for centuries.

The tale of the lone Villain hunted down by a band of Five without sufficient provocation slaying them all. Of Heroes unrelated to the story being told getting slaughtered without a hint of Providence protecting them. Of the Heroes with society and numbers on their side making Villains the underdog requiring the Heroes to truly have superior strength, wits and cunning to prevail instead of just willpower. That is what I see over the horizon.

This one generation of bullying Villains shall see the scales bend to our side too much and Below rectify it with a Long Price. For that is how the game between Above and Below is played, and if we do not prevent it Below shall see the Story turn a hint further in their favour.

beleester

A villain is traditionally opposed by a band of five, so a 2-to-1 ratio of heroes to villains is actually better than historical levels. Which makes sense, since villains are currently enjoying an unprecedented amount of legal protection.

superkeaton

What a delightful Legion of Doom. I wonder if it'll take on a similar name? The Black Council has a ring to it.

Frivolous

ErraticErrata – I noticed just now that there is a discrepancy in the name of the Harrowed Witch's brother.

Here, in Reprobates, he is named Julien. In Spectral, he is referred to as Timothee.

Hope this helps you avoid further continuity errors.

Miles

Julien is the Harrowed Witch. Timothee is the brother.

Frivolous

Pardon me, but the Harrowed Witch is Aspasia. Multiple mentions confirm it.

Hakram's Dead Hand

Haha, yes! I just wanted to heap onto the pile saying that I love seeing Cat be badass from others perspective. It's so cool to see the power that we've seen her work for flexed on the other characters of the story.

Satan

Harrowed Witch is the new General Abigail

Chapter 47: Methods

"A plan of war is the inevitable victim of circumstance; methods of war are superior, for they are the mother of many a plan."

Extract from the 'Ars Tactica', famed military treatise of Dread Emperor Terribilis the First

Seventeen fantassins from three different companies hung from nooses, the wind making them swing slightly as the sun rose. Bloody fools, I thought at the sight of them, not a single speck of sympathy emerging even at this late hour. The lot of them had been from three middling companies, not one of them numbering a thousand men and each of them with several cases of corruption on their record. It'd not been difficult to track them with what the Concocter had told us, not once Adjutant put his army of helpful hands to the task. Names were obtained within the first bell, though I had to send in armed companies to make the arrests as the mercenaries were reluctant to give up their own.

Interrogations had been brisk, and hadn't even required much coercion. The idiots hadn't known they were trying to rob shipments earmarked for a Named, they'd thought they were just skimming Arsenal equipment. The part that'd infuriated me was when I'd realized that guards had been bribed for the fantassins to get access, and some of those had been mine. Two Callowan legionaries were being flogged as we spoke for trading shifts without officer permission, and the Third Army had lost a sergeant when it turned out she'd been in on it from the start. I'd let her captain handle the discipline, but I did not need to look to know she'd be hanging from our own gallows about now.

The regulations were crystal clear.

"I do not question the justice of this, Your Majesty," Princess Beatrice said, "but it will not help relations with the companies."

The Princess of Hainaut was a better rider than me, though given Zombie's undead placidity an outside observer would have found it hard to tell when we weren't moving. I'd not expected that when I first met her, as Beatrice Volignac was also very much overweight. My people did tend to look down on those wasteful enough to grow fat, but I'd since revised that first opinion of her: while I didn't share Prince Klaus' high opinion of her as a general, it couldn't be denied she was a fine lance and probably the finest cavalry commander in Hainaut. She was also my intermediary with Proceran mercenary companies, at the moment, so I'd best not ignore her warning.

"They had to hang," I bluntly said. "They broke into sealed crates, if they didn't hang the effects on discipline would be disastrous."

"I'll not argue this," the Princess of Hainaut agreeably replied, "but it plays into common fears that you intend to treat the fantassins as you would legionaries, subject to the same rules. It is a highly unpopular prospect and there has been grumbling of contract breaches."

My brow rose. If they tried to pull that it'd not go over well, since the Highest Assembly had decreed that abandoning mercenary contracts during this war would be legally considered the same as desertion, but I knew better than to ride unwilling soldiers too hard. Pressure on soldiers with good spirits got results, but it broke those who were already demoralized.

"I have limited concessions to offer them," I admitted. "I'll not compromise in ways that weaken us ahead of hard battles. Can their appointed representative in my councils not address their troubles?"

The Princess of Hainaut only smiled politely, which I took to mean she'd tried to lead me to a conclusion and I'd failed to get there on my own.

"If I might make a suggestion, Your Majesty?" Princess Beatrice asked.

Yup, I amusedly thought. Definitely missed a hint there. On the other hand it meant she was treating me much like she would Proceran royalty, which was good even if I was missing subtext that royalty would grasp. It spoke to a degree of respect, which was a good sign coming from a woman in whose hands I'd placed a lot of influence.

"Please do," I said.

"An appointed representative is a Callowan manner of approaching this," she delicately said. "Orderly and efficient, but relying on trust that is absent. Expanding the fantassin seats in your war council to two and allowing the companies to elect those who will fill them would do much to assuage fears of... overstep."

I squinted at her a moment. They could have a dozen seats and it'd give them no more influence in the decisions, we both knew, since this was very much to be my campaign. On the other hand, it would be a gesture and it'd give them a degree of power over their own situation – which the Princess of Hainaut had gently been trying to explain to me they were afraid I'd summarily strip away from them.

"Agreed," I sighed. "Though make it understood I'll not suffer foolishness even if it is elected foolishness. I expect either skill or silence."

"A reasonable request," Princess Beatrice said, inclining her head. "And if I may ask about why the corpses will not be returned to the companies?"

The Concocter had lost several ingredients through the actions of greedy idiots, which had caused her to run late on some brews. For that inconvenience I'd given her leave to harvest what she wanted from the hanged mercenaries before their corpses were burned.

"You don't really want to know the answer to that question, Your Grace," I calmly said. "Actions have consequences, let's leave it at that."

It was a grim note to start the day on, but no less true for it.

—

It would have been a lie to say that particular reunion wasn't one I'd been looking forward to.

"Ivah," I smiled, offering my arm to clasp. "It's been too long."

My Lord of Silent Steps's fingers lightly touched my forearm as I returned the gesture affectionately, and only then did it retreat a step to offer a respectful bow. Ivah had not changed a whit since I'd last seen it, still tall and slender with an ageless youth to its face under the silver and purple paint of the Losara sigil. Its soft leather shoes had not made a sound when it stepped back, and never would: the title it had gained during my days of warring against the Everdark had left its mark, which would never entirely fade.

"I am glad to return at your side, Losara Queen," it replied. "It has been too long since I warred besides you."

"Oh, I don't doubt we have plenty of that ahead of us," I drily said.

I then flicked a glance at the other drow in the tent, who returned the gesture with silver-blue eyes and a cocked hairless eyebrow.

"I see you've yet to get yourself killed," General Rumena said. "Odd, given your fondness for the opposite practice."

Rumena the Tomb-maker was still a striking sight, in these sense that it was one of the only Mighty I'd ever met who actually looked old. Standing stooped in his ringmail of obsidian, the old drow was a deep well of Night as well as one of the finest tacticians of its kind. It was also kind of a prick, and one I'd yet to get the better of through words.

"One of these days I'm going to make you into a vest," I told the bastard. "Crows know you already look like you're made of leather."

It respectfully bowed.

"It will change nothing, First Under the Night," the Tomb-maker replied. "As you have never needed an opponent to lose."

In the back of my mind, I heard Komena let out a snort of laughter. Godsdamned goddesses, I thought. They shouldn't play favourites unless that favourite was me.

"It's beneath my station to argue with a subordinate," I airily replied.

"Your skill in retreat remains unrivaled," the old drow praised.

That fucker. I flipped it off, which only got a cackle out of it.

"Enough pleasantries," I said afterwards. "I did have a reason to call on you two."

The old drow nodded.

"Sve Noc has told me of your pact with the Papenheim," General Rumena said. "The sigils are to be split between your armies when we sally out."

"I don't intend to meddle in the details of assigning the sigils," I said, "but you'll be personally leading the third that goes east with the Iron Prince."

It didn't look surprised.

"Some of the fighting to the east will be done underground, I understand," the Tomb-maker said.

"Once you get to Malmedit, yes," I agreed. "Ideally you'd collapse the tunnels the Dead King is using to keep funnelling in troops, but the decision will be left to the Prince Klaus' discretion."

I couldn't think of a decent reason why we'd not want those tunnels shut as quickly as possible, but it didn't pay to tie the hands of your commanders before they even set out. The Prince of Hannover knew his business and had been making war on Keter since before I was born, there was no need to breathe down his neck.

"That is pleasing to hear," General Rumena said. "It has been too long since we have fought beneath the Burning Lands. Do you intend a particular Mighty for command in my absence?"

"If you don't have a recommendation, I was considering Jindrich," I said.

It shook its head.

"I would take Mighty Jindrich with me," Rumena replied. "It is a skillful vanguard, and less likely to grow... unruly than it would away from my gaze."

I hummed.

"I could see that," I finally said. "You have a commander for me, then?"

"Several," the old drow replied.

"All qualified?"

"It is so," Rumena agreed. "Shall we discuss them?"

I bit my lip. I wasn't unaware that one of the reasons Sve Noc had been on board with the Firstborn serving in Cleves instead of Hainaut was that it'd let the drow grow into themselves on the surface without my meddling too much in the process. The Sisters could still call on me when there was trouble, as they had when the Langevins had been caught scheming, but it'd always been pretty clear that I was to be a herald and an advisor and not Queen of the Firstborn. Much like with Callow, part of my use would be bringing about my own uselessness.

"Let them choose their own commander," I finally said. "As they now choose their own sigil-holders."

The grey-skinned general studied me a long moment.

"You have grown, I think," the Tomb-maker thoughtfully said. "This war has done more than simply scar you."

"Don't get sentimental on me now," I teased.

It snorted, dismissing me.

"It will be as you say, Losara Queen," Rumena said.

"Good," I sharply nodded. "Ivah can keep me informed and serve as liaison."

Though my Lord of Silent Steps had remained silent as I spoke with the general, as Firstborn ways... discouraged intervening in the conversations of one's superiors, it now nodded with visible pleasure.

"It will be good to resume my duties," Ivah smiled.

—

I spoke with the White Knight at least once a day as he approached Neustal, bringing with him the last few Named who'd join the campaign as well as the latest goods from the Arsenal. Much of it was enchanted weapons and wardstones, but there were some greater prizes as well: Unravellers, tested successfully and so brought to the front by the crate, as well as a set of five pharos devices. Most of the latter would be going to the Iron Prince's host and the reserves, since they'd be of greater use there, but my own forces would get one. It was the kind of the trump card that could tip a battle our way, if used well.

Most of the conversation covered how Named should be assigned, and where. Hanno himself would be going with the Iron Prince, but there would be villains with that host as there would be heroes as part of mine. We wanted to be able to field multiple bands of five should the situation on either prong ask for it, but not all Named were field capable so in practice the numbers did not quite align even though in principle there were twenty-eight Named in Hainaut. Hagglng ensued, since some of our kind were a lot easier to place in band than others, and though on paper I won by securing sixteen Named in reality I got the bad end of the stick.

I'd gotten most the Named who could not fight and two of three transitionals, not including the one who was actually good in a fight – the Young Slayer, although apparently he might have been trouble with Aquiline so it might be for the best – so my fighting numbers were actually smaller than Hanno's in reality. Still, when it came to Named it was all about finding a use for talents. At least I'd gotten Roland as part of my lot and got the White Knight to take on the Grey Pilgrim – and so the Mirror Knight, his latest pupil – so it wasn't all bad.

Archer would be happy I'd secured the Vagrant Spear, too. I'd even managed to leverage a half-hearted effort to claim the Witch of the Woods into keeping all the heroes that'd spent time on the Hainaut front over the last few years, which meant the core of my heroic lineup would be one I was familiar with and on decent terms: the Silver Huntress, the Silent Guardian and the Sage. A shame I'd lost the Barrow Sword, but the logic that Hanno needed someone to lead his villains was hard to argue with – and got Ishaq away from the Blood, which was probably for the best.

By the time the White Knight's convoy left the Twilight Ways and began its way up the road to the stronghold, I had already begun to plan the best use for my Named. It was not one day too soon, for before long we would all be on the march.

—

As far as war councils went, I found twelve a reasonable number of people to seat. The great table Indrani was still carving for me – the latest addition being Hakram's fight with fae at the Arsenal – could handle that many, though given the amount of maps I'd had stretched over the surface of it it'd been necessary to set down smaller side tables for drinks.

That Adjutant would be seated at my side was a given, but occupying the rest of that side of the table were the foremost officers from the Army of Callow that'd hold command in the coming offensive. General Hune of the Second Army, towering above us all with those intelligent eyes set in a brutish face. General

Abigail of the Third Army, already into her second cup of wine and her third attempt to let Hune represent the entire Army of Callow contingent. Last but not least Grandmaster Brandon Talbot of the Order of Broken Bells, ever impeccably groomed and currently eyeing the fantassin part of this council with barely-veiled contempt.

For the Dominion stood the rulers of two lines of the Blood, Lord Razin Tanja and Lady Aquiline Osená, in full war paint and armour. Both of them were taking this seriously enough that they'd even ceased flirting, which was nice to see. By them sat the representative for the drow, silver-eyed and calm. My suggestion that the Firstborn elect their own representative – it was only fair, if the fantassins got to as well – had paid unexpected dividends when they'd chosen an old friend: my own Lord of Silent Steps, Ivah of the Losara Sigil. The intricate beauty of the paint on its face was a rival for that of the Dominion pair, to my quiet satisfaction.

As in most things the Procerans ended up the complicating part, for while Princess Beatrice Volignac of Hainaut held sole speaking rights for her army the fantassins companies had elected two very different people to stand for them. Lady Catalina Ferreiro, a beautiful scarred woman in her thirties, was the Captain-General of the Ligera Bandera. It was the largest of the fantassin companies, numbering two thousand and three hundred. Captain Reinald of the Folies Rouges, on the other hand, was soft-skinned nearly as fat as Princess Beatrice and his company numbered only six hundred foot. The Folies Rouges were an old and respected name, however, and their captain was known for his shrewdness.

Last of all, for the heroes, the Silver Huntress had come. Alexis had been the natural pick, even the White Knight had agreed. We'd worked together in Hainaut for more than a year without any real trouble between us, I'd entrusted her with independent commands out of my sight several times and my force's path into Hainaut would be encountering more hardened defences than the Iron Prince's – which would make her skill with a bow even more valuable. The Huntress was rather plain-faced, a tall redhead with blue eyes who kept her hair in a bun and whose nose had visibly been broke several times. She had a startlingly girlish voice, high and sweet.

Archer would be coming with me and the two of them couldn't stand each other, so I'd have to be careful to keep them apart, but aside from that little complication I was rather looking forward to having the Silver Huntress along.

The first half hour of the council was spent in idle talk, which I tacitly allowed. The Procerans lived and died by this stuff, so it'd help bring them into the fold, but there was a little more to it than that. The officers in my tent would be side by side in the field for months, and in a coalition force like mine I'd learned the hard way that if a degree of trust and amicability wasn't maintained between the leading commanders it led to blunders. I took the moment to study the officers myself, noting the ties and attitudes. Both my Dominion ducklings got along strangely well with Hune, and had for some time now, so they gravitated towards her. To my lasting amusement the two of them were also subtly intimidated by Genera Abigail's reputation, and usually avoided her. Princess Beatrice was trying to engage the woman in question in conversation, which had my fellow Callowan regularly shooting me anguished looks as if to assure me that she was not committing treason by plotting with foreign royalty.

Captain-General Ferreiro had worked with the Silver Huntress before, which I vaguely remembered hearing about, but I was surprised to hear that the heroine was also acquainted with Ivah. A few warbands out raiding under the Losara apparently pulled the Huntress' team out of bad spot when she'd gone out to Suifat to have a closer look at enemy landings – an early run-in with the Stitcher, by the sound of it – and they'd left on good terms. The other fantassin leader, Captain Reinald, approached Brandon Talbot to my surprise. The Folies Rouges, I overheard, had apparently fought at the Battle of the Camps.

The Grandmaster of the Order admitted to recognizing the banner, and visibly warmed to the conversation when the mercenary good-naturedly admitted having been whipped by Nauk's soldiers on the right flank – to his luck, he claimed, as he'd pulled out just before the Hellhound's water trap and goblinfire ate up the company that'd advanced in his stead. Reinald then adroitly manoeuvred the conversation to the respective merits of the Liessen charger and the Aisne destrier as a fighting horse, correctly betting on Callowan nobility's endless appetite for speaking of horses, and my brow rose. That man bore watching.

Hakram's wheelchair was not great in such small spaces, despite Masego's best efforts, so he was limited in speaking to the Army officers and the Blood. I put my trust in his eyes to catch anything I'd missed and went around. I traded an anecdote about shortly fighting the Stygian Spears at First Liesse with the Silver Huntress and Captain-General Ferreiro, since it turned out the Ligera Bandera had fought against Stygia when the League invaded in the run-up to the Graveyard. I commiserated about College war games with Hune to the amusement of the Blood.

Apparently Hune's tenure at the head of Tiger Company had been a mixed bag, as an early winning streak had seen her consistently targeted by rivals afterwards.

Eventually Adjutant caught my eye and I heard the unspoken signal that we'd tarried long enough, moving back to my seat at the carved table. The most socially aware among the gathering – which included all three Procerans, to my mixed amusement and exasperation – followed suit, which was enough to begin a chain of the same. Within moments most everyone was standing before their seats without my having had to say a word.

“I’ll spare us a meandering speech,” I said. “We all know why we’re here. Not all of you will be aware, however, that we’re to set out early next week.”

I flicked a glance across the lot of them, finding mostly practiced calm and the occasional sprouts of eagerness.

“I will be holding the command for our section of the Grand Alliance forces,” I said. “And so it is my responsibility to brief you as to the nature of this offensive.”

I waited a beat, then pulled my chair to sit and gesture for all others – save one – to do the same.

“I can’t and won’t claim to be the mind behind our campaign plan,” I told them. “It was crafted through the labour of many of our strategists, foremost among them Marshal Juniper of Callow and Prince Klaus Papenheim.”

“Your humility does your honour, Your Majesty,” Princess Beatrice said, “but the Iron Prince has claimed your hand to have been as much as work here as his own.”

My brow rose in genuine surprise. The old flatterer. I’d helped tinker with this some, but I’d not consider this plan to be my baby. Mostly I’d served as a bridge between him and Juniper.

“Far be it from me to contradict Old Klaus, then,” I drily said. “Especially if he was in a pleasant mood.”

That got some laughter, though most of it polite, and at least one muttered saying in Tolesian about ‘something Lycaonese tooth iron something’? My Tolesian was, well, to be honest it mostly wasn’t.

“The forces represented by the people in this room will number around seventy thousand souls,” I said, “but we are to be only a single prong of the offensive. The other will be commanded by the Prince of Hannover, while a third force will remain behind as a strategic reserve under General Pallas of Helike.”

Under was a bit of an exaggeration, since no one had really wanted to give her command over their own countrymen, but I’d left the Fourth behind with orders for General Bagram to support her within reason.

"Apologies, Your Majesty," Captain-General Ferreiro said, "but I was under the impression that the sum total of soldiery in Neustal numbered one hundred and fifty thousand?"

"One hundred and sixty," I corrected, "but yes, you've put your finger on the pulse of this. Our will be the largest force of the two setting out by a fair margin, because we're expected to be hitting the harder targets."

Also because seventy-five thousand was the apex of what we believed to be capable of feeding through our supply lines. And that was an estimate, so when the Princess of Hainaut had come to me with slightly fewer fantassins than expected – none of the smaller forces were worth the effort, in her opinion – I'd not argued against it. Best to have too many supplies than too few.

"None of you are fools," I said. "So you know what that means: we'll be going up Julianne's Highway."

There was a rippling murmur. Not of surprise, for it'd not been empty flattery when I'd gauged that a room of hardened veterans would be able to guess our path upwards, but of... consideration. Everyone was aware there would be rough battles ahead.

"Prince Klaus' force is to serve as a distraction?" General Hune asked.

I nodded at the towering ogre.

"That's part of it," I acknowledged. "He'll be taking fifty-four thousand up the old mining roads to the east, and taking his time in doing so. The reason for that is the latest scouting report from the Silver Huntress, who once more deserves our thanks."

The redhead looked awkward when all eyes turned on her, jerkily nodding back.

"I took the Sage and a war party of Osenal slayers," she said, slowing her words so her voice would sound less high-pitched, "to have a closer look at the fortress-town of Juvelun. The withdrawal of the dead towards the north was an opportunity to venture further than usual."

I offered her a sharp nod.

"The Huntress confirmed what we've been suspecting for some time: Keter has amassed a large force in Juvelun, at least a hundred thousand with several Revenants to lead them," I elaborated.

Idly I wondered where I'd put the markers we used for enemy armies, but when I turned to look Hakram was leaning over in his chair and handing me the black iron blocks. I smiled in thanks as I took, plopping one down on Juvelun. By now everyone was starting to put it together. Neustal, the stronghold where we currently stood, was more or less in the centre of the Hainaut lowlands and sat astride Julianne's Highway – which would go all the way to the capital, up north. Meanwhile our other army would go up the eastern path of the mining road, further along our defensive line, and begin a quick march up into northeastern Hainaut.

The Iron Prince's target was the small city of Malmedit, since the Dead King was using it to funnel troops into our eastern flank through old tunnels, but the road would take his army past a branch that led to the fortress-town of Juvelun slightly to the west. We were hoping that would draw the undead army there into a battle, since losing Malmedit would be a major setback for Keter. If the dead gave battle, and we expected they would, then the force there would not be able to reinforce the closest strategic location: the city of Hainaut itself, the capital that was the ultimate objective for my own push.

"We've identified four other large Keteran forces," I continued. "One is holed up out west, in Luciennerie, where it sits defensively on the blue road. We believe it's between one hundred and one hundred fifty thousand. It's also getting steady reinforcements, and we're not sure from where exactly. "

I'd simplified a bit there, I reflected as I set down the corresponding block of iron. While that army was strategically defensive, it was also the force that kept flooding the western side of our defensive line with raiders and small attacks. The only reason the Dead King hadn't pushed further was that if he did there was a risk the armies under Malanza would sally out from the town of Coudrent, to its west, and try to anchor our flanks together. It'd take a lot of pressure out of the both of us, which was why Juniper had originally wanted to split our forces in three and take a swing at Luciennerie as well.

Talks with other strategists and fresh information had since made us revise that first plan she'd suggested, but the bare bones of it were still essentially the same.

"Another large force is north of the previous and beyond the highlands, in Suifat," I continued, placing the black iron. "Though it was previously around seventy thousand, they've had a flood of reinforcements and we now believe them a match for the Luciennerie force in numbers. Thankfully for us, that army is now on the move and marching to try and retake Trifelin."

It was the Dead King's armies that would be in for a rough time there, for once. Malanza has suffered a stinging defeat there early in the war for Cleves, so when she'd finally taken back the town she'd fortified every nook and cranny of the region. Gods smile on whoever tried Rozala Malanza on those grounds, because she ready and she was angry.

"We've all been aware of the army waiting between the Hollow and the Sister for some time," I said, easily plopping down a block there. "We still believe it to be a little under a hundred thousand, and it has been keeping a purely defensive stance."

It would be our first opponent, one way or another.

"The last known force, and we believe it to be the largest, is somewhere north of the capital," I continued. "Two hundred thousand, some of the finest troops in the service of the Dead King. We last saw them around the Prisoner's Mercy, but we're not sure where they might have march since – save for one detail, we are certain they're not in the capital."

We had the Augur, the Wise Astrologer and the Enigmatic Prophet in agreement on that, aside from our own risky Named scouting through the Twilight Ways.

"The offensive's basic shape is as follows," I said. "To the west, allied forces based in Coudrent will go raiding down the blue road to pin down the army in Luciennerie, while a significant slice of the Grand Alliances forces of Cleves concentrates in Trifelin to hold it."

It'd be tight, given that Malanza had lost some forces to us, but so long as there wasn't a major offensive through the lakes – and we'd not seen the build-up for one, not for lack of looking – then she would be able to succeed at both those tasks.

"Out east, Prince Klaus will march up the mining roads and attempt to bait out the army in Juvelun," I said. "If it refuses to give battle he'll move against Malmedit itself, which will at the very least force pursuit by the Juvelun army."

Ideally he'd take the old mining city quickly and then hold it against the pursuing dead, but I doubted it'd end up that clean.

"Meanwhile, at the heart of it all, we'll be marching on Lauzon's Hollow," I continued. "We'll be doing so at the quickest pace we can manage, to threaten to take the Hollow before Keter can move its nearby army to hold it."

"That stratagem worked last year," Lady Aquiline said. "Which means the Hidden Horror will expect it now."

"That's our intent," I bluntly said. "Once that force moves to defend the Hollow, it will leave the Cigelin Sisters vulnerable. Our reserve of twenty-eight thousand will then strike out from the Twilight Ways and seize it."

"If they split their forces?" Hune asked.

"Then we force the Hollow," I shrugged. "They won't be able to bleed us with so few."

General Abigail looked at the map and frowned.

"What happens if the undead in Luciennerie ignore the raids and attack our defensive line instead?" she asked.

"The reserve defends," I said. "It only needs to hold for some time, as we have reinforcements from Callow and southern principalities already on the way. Then Keter loses Luciennerie and we pincer the attacking force between Cleven reinforcements and our own defenders."

It'd mean a very different campaign, but it was also one we were capable of fighting.

"It would still mean no reinforcements for the battle at the Hollow," Captain Reinald pointed out.

"In that situation," I replied, "we would reassess and consider if Prince Klaus' army using the Ways to attack the Sisters instead would be feasible. If it is not, our objective would change to securing the east and Juvelun in particular."

It'd give us a shot at the capital, and from there we'd be able to muster a truly brutal offensive against the Hidden Horror on three sides. A siege of Hainaut would become inevitable, it was true, but while we'd wanted to avoid that we couldn't always get what we wanted. Would that war were so polite. My gaze swept the table and found a great many questions, but no one outright disbelieving that this could be done. Good, I thought as I cracked my neck.

"All right," I said, "if you have inquiries, now is the time. We can move on to the marching order afterwards."

It was going to be a long night, but better to talk now than to bleed later.

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, so there's an extra chapter in the tab of the same name. This one is titled "Five Stories" and it's from multiple POVs.

In other news, a new map has been added in the art section that covers the principalities of Hainaut and Cleves as they are in Book VI, since things have been happening in that particular region Enjoy!

Black Spiral Dancer

Oh, nice! I was just going to scream I WANT A NEW MAP before I read your comment!

Tom

Some discrepancies between map and chapter:

> One is holed up out east, in Luciennerie,

This is west of where this chapter takes place (Neustal)

> Malanza would sally out from the town of Coudrent, to its east,

Coudrent is west of Luciennerie

ErraticErrata

Fixed.

Javvies

I'm kind of surprised that one of the Army of Callow/ex-Legion was actively involved in the theft of stores. They had to know how it would end if and when their activities were discovered.

Things never quite go as planned or expected. That they have lost track of one of the major concentrations of undead is troubling. Because it's bound to turn up where they least expect it and/or where they can least afford it to surprise them.

Shveiran

I liked that touch, honestly. It's always good to see that even Callowans can be morons, you know what I mean?

Ninestrings

General Abigail's character arc is gonna culminate with her accidentally climbing the tower.

I can just picture her giving a speech to the nobles.

Dread Empress Abigail: Someone please come and take this position from me, I am happy to abdicate, please literally anyone.

Nobles: This is definitely a trap, best behaviour everybody.

Halinn

All hail the Dread Empress Reluctant

Ninestrings

Only Dread Empress known to have died of old age.

Shveiran

I'd point out that it is impossible, but quite frankly Abigail would find a way.

Javvies

She'd probably abdicate, and try to retire to some comfortable estate/manor, and have no interest in reclaiming the position, but no one would try to replace her, both because of her own reputation, and because everybody remembers Traitorous and Irritatan. And probably because Cat is (trying to) turn Abigail into a protege, and Cat left a reputation and memories of her own – and anybody who the Black Queen personally mentored and turned into a protege is not someone to be crossed ... especially when it looks like they're putting a target on themselves, that usually just means they're setting a nasty trap for anyone taking a shot at them.

shikkarasu

'She's been living in a summer home for 7 years, delegating every decision; why don't we just take her out?'

"Fool! She must have spent every moment digging in and preparing. What's worse, she's avoided the public perception of being unassailable."

'....Preventing hopeless last stands against her. No, I see what you mean, now. She's a genius.'

NerfContessa

Oh God, erratic, 0legse write that omake.

Please?!

sengachi

The first Heroic Dread Empress.

Eleron Pfoutz

Dread Empress Reluctant, the Accidental Empress, the Utterly Assailable, First and Last of Her Name, May Gods Above and Below Keep Her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Dread Empress Abdicant: "C'mon Chancellor, take the crown. It's right in my hands. This is... a wager! Yes! A very arrogant wager I'm sure I cannot fail If you can snatch the crown from my hands, you'll be the ruler! Oh, and if you fail, no retaliation, I'm making an oath to that! Even if you try and fail, there will be no retaliation to you, o-or any of your family or loved ones or friends or.. or pets! And the same goes for everybody else in the room. Even the guards!"

Noble 1:I mean, she is Named, and she just made oath, I'm kinda thinking I should at least go up there and give it a shot.

Noble 2: *dryly) Yes. She just spoke aloud an oath that as near as I can tell, leaves her completely vulnerable to losing everything she's worked for, with no penalty to us that we can figure out. I honestly believe this time she wants us to take the crown.

Noble 1: Gods Below, of course! She's pulling an Irritant! Fuck that, whatever she see's coming she can be right there to take!

2 weeks later:

Noble 1: ... How do you think she made the demons and the Fae fight each other like that? Do we have a new Warlock?

Noble 2: They fought across the lands of the two foremost conspirators to dethrone her. The real question is how did she know they were coming at the same time?

Noble 1: If we take the crown they come for whomever wanted to take the Tower from her most. If not she makes them fight FOR her. Nobody's seen power plays like this since... OH. OHHHHHH.

Dread Empress Triumphant the 2nd: Hey why is everybody changing my name on all the stuff?

NerfContessa

You madey. Day.

Though I would go for irritant the 2nd, the oddly triumphant.

Beau Richards

I wonder if Hakram can use the spectral limbs to move around and fight like he did when he was gonna rip out scribes eyeball...

Liliet

He needs a suitably dramatic moment to unlock it first!

Zggt

I'm thinking that he will get a new Name for it. The narrative seems to be pushing Ivah towards Adjutant, which would be fascinating

roseocean2012

Hakram will murder Ivah from where he sits for considering it.

caoimhinh

Two hundred thousand of some of the finest troops in the service of the Dead King have suddenly disappeared right before the Grand Alliance's attack, eh?

Oh, Catherine, you should already know where they are going to appear... It's a classic story in horror: when you are looking at a monster and then you blink and it disappears, it is behind you now.

Konstantin von Karstein

I am afraid that it makes perfect sense🤩

doominator10

"To my lasting amusement the two of them were also subtly intimidated by Genera Abigail's reputation, and usually avoided her."

To my and all the reader's everlasting amusement too. Abigail continues to be a delight.

"which had my fellow Callowan regularly shooting me anguished looks as if to assure me that she was not committing treason by plotting with foreign royalty."

At this point I had to put the story down just to laugh for a few minutes.

Liliet

Oh my! Both Alexis AND Concocter on the same front with 'Drani? Looks like this arc is a go and BOY am I down with that!

dadycool

Time for a Girl's Squabble!

Liliet

Hey, Beastmaster's there too!

Juff

Typo Thread:

these sense > the sense
one if the > one of the his kind > its kind the trump card > trump card place in band > place in bands sastisfaction > satisfaction soft-skinned nearly > soft-skinned, nearly Beatrice and > Beatrice, and been broke > been broken
Genera Abigail > General Abigail of bad spot > of a bad spot shortly fighting (is this correct?) gesture for all > gestured for all your honour > you honour much as work > much at work
Our will > Ours will believed to be > believed we were she ready > she was ready have march since > have marched since Grand Alliances > Grand Alliance's forces of Cleves > forces in Cleves

Liliet

Luciennerie was mentioned to be to the east, while it's actually clearly to the west.

Wonder

Godsdamned goddesses, I thought. They shouldn't play favourites unless that favourite was me.

Aww, Catherine ,never change

Burlyraven

Huh, so Ivah seemingly remains the only Drow to truly like Cat. It even seems to be unusually personable to others. Ivah for next First Under the Night after Cat's inevitable abdication from that position as well? Could become something of a prophet if it does.

Liliet

I get a strong impression Rumena also likes Cat a lot.

Shveiran

Also Jindrich, remember his POV in Sarcella? Honestly, I got the impression that most drow are kind of satisfied with Cat? I mean, I'm not sure why they wouldn't. Even racism doesn't really work when your bona fide Goddesses come down (up) from the sky (from the ground) and say "I like this one; you listen to her now, kids. Or else."

I don't think they ALL like her, let alone adore her like Jindrich or Ivah, but I'd bet most at least respect her?

Burlyraven

Satisfaction is not affection. You can be extremely satisfied with a boss, but that doesn't mean you're going to be tender with them when you get back from a business trip.

Shveiran

Granted, but affection is... kind of personal.
Cat doesn't have the affect of many drows because she doesn't have a personal relationship with most.

It's not that they don't like her enough, it is that she is a religious figure and not a friend.

Burlyraven

Rumena seems fond of Cat, but I wouldn't put its fondness on the same level as Ivah's affection.

Rey d`Tutto

Thanks, again.
You write beauty.
Cat is more than proactive. She is a Story Name, soon.
Dark Herald? Blasé.
Weaver Something?
PractiGirl?
Influencer +?
Trap +?
Dagnabit. She is Claiming a Name.
What Shall it be?
Warlord.

Cap'n Smurfy

"General Abigail of the Third Army, already into her second cup of wine and her third attempt to let Hune represent the entire Army of Callow contingent."

Abigail continues to be a treat. My hope is by end of the story she'll be Named Reluctant Admiral.

dadycool

Admiral? But that's a naval position. I totally agree with the adjective, though.

vernal.ancient

Exactly: she finally gets a chance to escape her job, and takes to the seas for other lands. But on the way, the ship she's riding gets attacked by pirates, and before anyone else knows what's happening Abigail is head of a fleet of former corsairs, now known for finding and eliminating Calernia's problems before anyone else even knows about them – mostly by running as far as they can from whatever conflict is taking place at the time, and then stumbling across hidden machinations when they finally reach safety

Cap'n Smurfy

Abigail received a secret promotion back in Book 5 chapter 21. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/03/15/chapter-21-intervention/>

The Dead King stands no chance against Cat's secret weapon, for the element of surprise is with her!

dadycoool

How will she get the fleet from the Tyrian Sea, though?

Cap'n Smurfy

whispers A fleet of flying ships. Top secret. The Dead King will only learn of them when they sail over the horizon, at the moment all seems lost.

dadycoool

whispers Oh, right. /Those/ ships. I forgot about them.

dadycoool

The races from beneath the earth are my favorite. The Goblins, Dwarves, and Drow are just such a treat, as we can finally see again here. The blending of the forces was very interesting here. It's nice that everyone was able to pair up, except for Beatrice with Abigail, but that wasn't her fault.

letouriste

i'm kind of wondering why the drows and the dwarfs are not mentioned in the battle plan. It's obvious there is dead armies facing them and these armies could send reinforcement during this campaign after all. An army coming from underground would shatter the plan

Darkening

The dwarves have been mentioned to not be willing to commit to fighting Keter until it's already on the ropes, since they'd rather the surface people bleed instead of them. And the drow that aren't part of these armies are waaaaay to the north fighting Keter on a whole different front in a war that sounds like it's a whole different scale than the human side of things.

Djinn o'Cyde

2nd place. Closer to 3rd than to first. Go Vote. Here:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

"I see you've yet to vote," General Rumena said. "Odd, given your fondness for the opposite practice."

heroessucklmao

If a plan is mentioned in detail, it must fail. But if Abigail says stuff, odds are she's right because she's a big genius.

Chapter 48: Hilltop

"Faith is not an act of surrender but of conquest, for doubt lies within us all."

Daphne of the Homilies, best known for ending hereditary rule in Atalante

Arranging it had been simple, in a sense. Just a matter of timing, of sensing what people would want and how they went about getting it. When you had that, as I'd once been told it was all just... objects in motion. And it'd had to be that, because more direct manipulation would have been sniffed out in a heartbeat by the people involved. That was the trouble with trying to beat people at a game they were better at than you. I wanted answers, though, and I wanted them in a way that wouldn't scar what I wanted achieved. And so here I was, in the darkened warehouse standing before an open crate and holding an artefact in my hands.

It didn't look like much, for such a dangerous thing.

A Callowan knight's lance was usually around nine feet in length but the kataphraktoi used longer ones, closer to twelve. The unraveller I held in my hands was shorter than either, perhaps a little over six feet in height, and lighter as well. It was easy enough to see why, as unlike a lance of hardened wood the unravellers were partly hollow: at the heart of them was a tunnel that went from the top to the bottom, with a thin wire of cold iron hung up. The outside of unraveller was touched with coin-like patches of metal, mostly bronze and brass, which themselves were connected to thin metal wires within the wooden shell.

The most expensive part was the sculpted amethyst ring at the bottom of the lance-like artefact, like a pommel to the wooden handle, which even at rest hummed with magic. The rest was runic carvings in the wood to stabilize the product, and a steel tip at the end of the unraveller that was very carefully linked with the central cold iron wire without compromising the artefact's ability to, well, be used as a weapon. It needed to bite into bone or flesh before it disrupted the sorcery, which was unfortunate but couldn't feasibly be fixed.

It wasn't that we weren't capable of it, just that the materials required would multiply the cost of production by at least ten. We'd not be able to fill entire crates with unravellers, which would defeat the entire purpose of that artefact's existence: having an answer to necromantic constructs that we could mass-produce.

In the lamplight of the supply warehouse I studied the artefact closely, testing the weight and the way the grip handled. Archer would need to tinker with hers before she found a way to fire them by her bow, and likely the Silver Huntress as well – whose own silver recurve was shorter than Archer's absurdly large longbow, but only in the sense that it was the size of an actual longbow. I'd need to have half a crate set aside for them to tinker with, and maybe lend them Roland when they got to it: the Rogue Sorcerer was only a passable enchanter, but even Masego praised his artefact-handling.

"I don't get the cold iron wire," I admitted out loud. "I've done the readings you suggested, I get why the patches are there and at different metal purities: it pulls at the spell structure in different ways, makes it unsteady. But cold iron isn't supposed to be conducive to magic so why put it at the centre?"

The stuff hurt fae, because having it worked without the heat of a forge meant it didn't lose properties through the transmutation affect – which I'd been chuffed to learn even Praesi recognized had been discovered by a Callowan wizardess, Blaine Caen! – so it was still 'of Creation' in a way that forged or wrought iron just wouldn't be. But all I'd read about the stuff said it was kind of standoffish to magic, which was why people used it to make boundaries in rituals so often.

"Because the Hierophant is a singularly brilliant mage," Akua said, frank with her praise.

She'd chosen to stand at the edge of the lamplight and the shadows, where the play of light and dark on her form was almost like a veil thrown over her clothes. Tonight she'd chosen a simple sleeveless, neckless silver dress in a wavelike pattern interrupted by slightly more ornate stripes – all of it covering a base of dark cloth. A thick silver choker and a hat of silvery tinsel stripes ending in dark gauzy veil completed the ensemble, making for a striking sight. It was one of her finer picks since I'd known her, and by the occasional smirk she'd clearly noticed my appreciation.

"I'm aware Zeze is a genius," I replied, rolling my eyes. "If I could get an actual explanation, though?"

She smiled.

"Cold iron is resistant to magic, not repellant," Akua said. "And it is an unnaturally stable material, in the sense that it will take to all forms of power by the exact same proportion – Cosmas' Constant. In this case the wire serves two purposes. First it stabilizes the magic coming from varying metal purities as it is sucked into the amethyst ring, which is why the unraveller does not simply explode in a shower of shards when it is used. Secondly, it actually enhances the destabilizing effect on a necromantic construct: the iron wire's resistance to magic means more of the construct's invested magic is sucked in without it ever reaching the amethysts, and some of the runes carved ensure that 'wasted' magic does not turn to heat."

Akua paused pushing herself off the wall and more fully into the light.

"It is an inspired solution," the woman who'd once been the Diabolist admiringly said. "And not one I would have considered in his place. I've always sought the elimination of waste in artefacts and rituals, it would not have occurred to me to actively pursue it instead."

"Masego has his moments," I agreed.

I set down the unraveller atop the open crate, over the eleven remaining ones cradled in cloth and straw. The real breakthrough had been the amethyst ring though, or so Roland had implied, and that'd been a contribution of the Blessed Artificer. It was a relatively cheap precious stone, in Procer, which was why some Ashuran ship mages liked to buy them in bulk in Valencis and enchant them to hold winds. The ring structure was even an invention of her own, though it'd had to be slightly reworked since it was being used to anchor an enchantment instead of Light. While I might not get along particularly well with Adanna of Smyrna, I was not complaining that she'd ended up as one of the heroes assigned to my army.

"The Dead King will know we have these," I finally said, "or at least suspect. We've done enough field tests he can't have missed it."

It was hard to notice something the size of a beorn or a tusk get struck with a lance and then... collapse, barely a heartbeat later as the necromancy animating it shattered like glass. We'd been afraid that the Dead King's necromancers would be able to raise them right back up, but we were pretty sure by now they couldn't. The Arsenal specialists believed it might take as much as months of rituals to raise those creatures, imbuing the different parts with different spells as they were being assembled. It just wasn't something that could be done in the field and on the fly, not even with massed mages.

"You were careful to use the prototypes only sparingly," Akua pointed out. "Hiding we have these was always a fool's errand, but we can still take him by surprise with the sheer amount that can be fielded. He will be expecting these to be Named-work, not a pattern that trained mages and artisans can make on their own."

Named were still arguably the source of the labour, since they'd been the one to train these mages and artisans when it came to making these, but her point stood. By now almost a full third of the Arsenal was dedicating its time to producing stockpiles of these to send to the fronts. There'd even been talk of starting workshops in Procer, though I'd balked: the Dead King and Malicia both had spies, and if either got their hands on the plans it'd make it much easier to figure out a countermeasure. I wanted to extend our window of effectiveness with the unravellers as long as possible, especially if it coincided with the offensive for Hainaut.

Ideally, the Gigantes would then raise massive wards on the coasts that'd keep the dead out and we'd have breathing room to make a counter-countermeasure in time for the assault on Keter itself.

"We'll see," I finally said.

We'd only caught the Hidden Horror flatfooted a handful of times since we'd unveiled the pharos devices, so while I was hoping to repeat the experience I wasn't going to be relying on the hope. I cast a last look at the lances, snorting.

"Something amuses, my heart?" Akua asked.

"For all the cleverness that went into these fucking things," I said, "they still have to be stabbed into the enemy. There's something almost reassuring about that."

Even when you put all the brilliance in the world into an artefact, in the end you still had to find some thug to stick it into your foe. At least folk like me would never be entirely out of work. I felt a tug against my little finger, and I knew my patience had finally borne results. I'd traced tripwires of Night around the warehouse entrances – though no more than that, or I'd risk irritating the wards – so I knew it the moment the door opened even without needing to turn. Akua cocked a brow in my direction, her superior senses having caught the sounds without needing any such tricks. It was two people who were joining us by navigating through the darkened maze of crates, it was easy to tell when I pricked my ear.

I hoisted myself up to sit on the edge of the open crate before as they strolled into the lamplight, Akua moving to lean against the side to my left. Covering my bad leg as well as implying she was my left hand all in the same gesture, I noted. Fucking Praesi, I then added, but not without fondness.

"I'll take it as a courtesy you tripped the wire at all," I called out.

Especially given who I was addressing.

"You overpraise me," the Grey Pilgrim drily replied, stepping into the light.

"There is no point in skulking around allies," the White Knight pointedly told him before following suit.

Tariq had a way of slipping past any and all measures I wove around myself with Night. He couldn't fool the Crows, at least, but the Peregrine's habit of turning up unexpected and without warning was not abated by anything else I could call on. He'd not been anywhere this good at it back around the days of the Graveyard, but then if I could learn about heroes they could most certainly learn about me.

"Though I wonder that you saw fit to place such a measure at all, Your Majesty," Hanno said, sounding genuinely surprised.

"Named are a nosy breed, Lord White," Akua smiled. "And there are a great many of them in Neustal. As always, it is a pleasure to see you."

"Lady Sahelian," the White Knight blandly replied, inclining his head the slightest bit then turning to me. "The Adjutant pointed me here when I sought a conversation with you. Is now an agreeable time?"

Of course it was, I'd picked it.

"If you don't mind my shadow," I shrugged.

"Such sweet things you call me," Akua drolly noted.

"Could you not send her away?"

I turned a steady look on Tariq, who did not look apologetic in the slightest. And though I could have chided him, as it was rude to ask audience and then quibble over the given terms – even more so for two heroes to corner me in the dark and ask me to send away my only nearby ally – I held my tongue. I'd gone to a spot of trouble to arrange a pit fight between two of the finer speakers I knew, so I was in no hurry to spot it. Akua took my half-beat of silence as the open field it was, and took to it without any visible hesitation.

"I assure you, Peregrine, that no disease will come of addressing me directly," Akua smilingly replied.

I kept my expression blank. The danger with getting answers Akua had always been that she was a better manipulator than me – it meant I couldn't put my finger on the scale, try to guide an outcome, without her likely noticing it. But Tariq was perfectly capable of matching wits with her, and in his own way Hanno could be said to be even sharper. It'd taken me long to learn the lesson that sometimes doing nothing was the best way to get what you wanted, but I'd gotten there eventually.

"If you'd prefer," Tariq politely acknowledged, turning to face her. "I distrust you, Akua Sahelian, and do not want you to be part of this conversation. Please leave."

She hid the surprise skilfully, but I knew her well. A Praesi blind spot, this one: the Pilgrim just wasn't proud in that way that the Named of the Dread Empire were. On the contrary, in his own way he was humble enough he was perfectly willing to make a request like this without batting an eye. It made a lot of her usual social arsenal effectively useless, since he simply did not care about the hierarchal nuances she was so adept at using. Now came the interesting part, though, how the shade would deal with the challenge. Conflict was always told the tales that smooth faces hid away.

"I recall no reason for there to be distrust between us, Grey Pilgrim," Akua replied. "And your companion's silence beg the question of whether your opinion is shared."

Mhm, I thought. Better than kicking this back to me as the person who could dismissed her – not that I'd expected her to, she'd be well aware that if I'd wanted to intervene I already would have – but I wasn't entirely satisfied with the answer. The first part floated, but the second still smacked too much of trying to turn heroes on each other. But was this old habits dying hard or just social ploy to suss out where the White Knight stood? I couldn't quite tell yet.

"You are a criminal, Lady Sahelian," Hanno frankly replied, "but your sins were committed against Callow and you are in the custody of its queen. It is not my place to meddle in this. I would caution you, however, against confusing respect for your warden as tolerance for the most egregious mass-murderer of our age."

The Sword of Judgement wasn't one to pull his punches, it had to be said. But there was a reason I'd wanted him as part of this conversation: unlike the Grey Pilgrim, whose own dabbling in horror might have made more wary of bringing up the Doom of Liesse, Hanno absolutely could and would go there. That was a sting I'd wanted Akua to feel so that I might see what it brought out.

"I neither seek nor expect your esteem, Lord White," Akua said. "But I had hopes for courtesy, at least. Or is it too much to expect of a hero?"

Good, I thought. She'd not countered by going after the bloody records of heroes like the Saint or the Pilgrim, even though it was the easiest and most effective parry. Tariq would answer he'd killed to prevent suffering, the debate would get religious – for lack of a better term – and enter grounds where no one could truly win. It also meant that, deep down, Akua did not think of the Folly as something on equal footing with Tariq seeding innocents with the plague to catch Black. Or, at least, she recognized it was not an argument that could be made and be considered to hold water.

That'd be a lesser prize, but still a prize. A few years back, she wouldn't have cared that people believed her to be wrong when she was espousing Praesi – more accurately Praesi highborn – philosophies. She would have said the words anyway, and should circumstance prove her right down the line pointed to that as evidence of the Wasteland's dark but undeniable wisdom. Now she was avoiding that sort of talk even when trying to win the argument by other means. Her definition of winning, of how it could be achieved, had shifted. And not because she was being coerced or fearing punishment.

It'd sunk into her, the act. Maybe no more than the slightest drop, but that was all it took.

"It is unpleasant to talk of butchery," the White Knight calmly replied, "but it is not impolite. The burden of snuffing out a hundred thousand lives is yours to bear, Lady Sahelian, and your discomfort with the truth of that is of little import to me."

"You know very little of what you speak of," Akua quietly replied, "yet display great certainty. There are many sayings on people who behave in such a manner. What do you know of my follies, save what others have told you?"

"I know enough," Hanno simply said. "And this conversation is waste of time."

"Is it?" she mused. "The two of you have decided I am to be dismissed, and there is nothing more to be said of the matter?"

She clicked her tongue.

"Though my hands are dripping red, White Knight, and I'll not deny this or quibble over it, I have dealt fairly and openly with you and yours," Akua said. "I have no expectation of ever seeing the scales of Liesse settled, but that sin is not yours to ask answer for – so what have I done to you, to deserve this scorning?"

Ah, I thought. And there it was. I'd been right, then, this conversation had been needed. The nudge over the crest of the hill was still required so that she'd finally be able to see the slopes on both sides. Some part of her, perhaps the same that she allowed to enjoy the companions she'd made, still thought that so long as the mountainous horror that'd been the Folly remained far away and she was good and loyal and lovely she could have her warm place in the sun. She spoke the words as I'd said them to her, but it'd not really sunk in that Liesse wasn't something that could be atoned for.

That even if she saved ten lives for every one she'd taken, she would still be the same woman who'd murdered an entire city.

I couldn't be the one to lead her there, though. I couldn't deny it either – it was true, all other considerations aside – but to keep my role I could only agree to this and not be the one that brought it up. Otherwise she'd know there was a deeper game, beyond the one I'd admitted to. The long price that had yet to be paid. I couldn't be the one to blot out that hazy hope, otherwise she'd ask herself why I would do that. Why, if I was manipulating her, I'd do away with the mirrored oasis that was being genuinely one of us. And I couldn't have her ask that question, not yet.

I reached within my cloak, the gesture drawing no attention.

"I've known a great many monsters," Tariq pensively said, "but in your own way you are among the most tragic – how you were raised, how you were shaped, it robbed you of the ability to understand what you did even as you did it. But it has begun to dawn, I think. The scale of the evil in something like the Doom, the way it ripples out into the world. How ugly such a thing fundamentally is, so unlike the stories of glory and triumph."

The thing that made Tariq dangerous, I thought, was that he was being sincere. This wasn't a veiled insult or a threat or some stratagem: he was genuinely grieved by what he saw in Akua. How accurate what he saw might be remained debatable, but the way the shade's face went solid for the fraction of a moment – as if she was locking it by will – told me she'd read his sincerity and it'd struck deep. I'd been in her place before, as it happened. There'd been a reason I wanted Tariq here.

"Fair dealings and courtesy change nothing, Akua Sahelian," the Peregrine said, almost gently. "You killed a city. There is nothing to be done, in the wake of that, that will buy you trust."

She did not look at me, but I felt her attention shift my way. I forced my face into stolid blankness but just a beat too slowly – not even on purpose, it'd been simple luck.

"I believe you might even care for a few others," Tariq said. "But there is nothing redeeming in this, my dear. Even the most terrible of us can love."

"I am not your anything, Peregrine," Akua replied, tone forcefully cold.

Overcompensation, I decided. She didn't control her voice anywhere as well now that she was a shade, though she'd gained in other ways.

"Then I withdraw the address," the old man said. "It is not enough to avoid doing evil, Akua. You have to do good. Even when there is no reward. Especially when there is no reward."

I almost smiled. There went the last piece I'd been waiting for. Selflessness, the greatest of virtues in someone like the Pilgrim's eyes – a virtue he clutched most desperately, I expected, considering some of the things he'd done over the year at the behest of the Choir of Mercy. And Tariq had spoken of it just after effectively telling her that the Folly was not something she should ever expect to dig her way out of. And now, I thought as I watched Akua Sahelian, you see the view from atop the hill. One slope goes back down the way you came, into the beliefs of the Truebloods. But the other one feels just as pointless, doesn't it? Because you know there'll never be a payoff, a redemption, a settling of accounts.

But she stood atop the hill now and her eyes had been opened to the choice. She knew she'd have to make it, sooner or later.

That'd been what I needed from these two. I'd been... lenient, perhaps. I'd let us get comfortable, too used to tiptoeing around the lines while indulging in the unsaid. It would have been too easy to stay there, if the bleak light of truth hadn't been shone down on all of this again. But it didn't feel good. I'd not really grasped, when I first conceived of my revenge, that it would punish me as well. Maybe it was better this way, I decided. A long price should cost you something to, require that you put something of yourself in it. It was too easy to get drunk on the bloodletting otherwise. What I'd wanted from this has been delivered, though, so there was no need to drag this out any longer. I struck a match on the side of the crate, lighting my pipe and pulling at the mouth.

It got their attention, shaking them out of the conversation.

"You wanted to talk," I told the heroes, blowing out a ring of smoke. "So talk."

Hanno looked mildly irritated, but spoke up anyway.

"There are two major matters," the White Knight said. "The first is the missing army of two hundred thousand undead. The Iron Prince mentioned that our oracles were all in agreement that it was not in the capital, but there are ways to fool soothsaying."

"There are," I agreed.

I was hardly unaware, given that Black had run a game against the Augur for months by moving his army fast and picking his battles at the last moment. I raised an eyebrow, inviting him to elaborate.

"An army unseen is the blade of fate," the Pilgrim said. "For those Bestowed by the Heavens most of all, but any Bestowed can try that luck."

Meaning that force was bound to appear where and when it'd fuck up our plans the most. They'd come to me instead of Prince Klaus with this worry because I'd been Named, and understood the tricks of fate. The Prince of Hannover would listen to them, he was not fool, but not necessarily believe or understand in the way that I would.

"It was kept in mind when the campaign was planned," I assured them. "There's only so many places that army can be, right now, and while I agree it's probably not guarding the bridge as would be most convenient there are limits to the pull a pattern like this has. I'm not dismissing your concerns, to be clear, but you have to understand him having the wind in his sails won't work like it would with a living army."

Confusion on both their faces, which wasn't unexpected. Both of them were experienced heroes, and familiar with war, but neither had ever commanded troops.

"The d dead will get fewer supply accidents on the move and maybe good weather," I mused, "but it won't be a great uplift like it would be with a living army. Undead armies already don't tire and don't have to worry about morale, there's just less for providence to give them. Besides, to be honest the wind's more in our sails than the Dead King's."

I pulled at my pipe, then spat out a mouthful of smoke.

"We might not have a story we can ride," I elaborated, "but we've got a lot of godsdamned heroes to weigh in on our side of the scales. That counts. Believe me when I say that, because unlike everyone else here I've fought armies with that many heroes attached before."

Hanno cleared his throat.

"To be clear," he said, "you have a contingency?"

"Several," I replied.

Not the kind of stuff you talked about at a war council, but I did have pieces in place. Hasenbach had been more than willing to indulge my paranoia, considering our common opponent was the Hidden Horror.

"Then I will put my trust in that," the White Knight said.

Tariq looked less convinced.

"It is a strong story," he reminded me.

"How'd it work out for you, at the Graveyard?" I pointedly asked him.

Thousands of cavalry from all across Procer, readying for a surprise charge out of Arcadia into my forces, had instead been tossed back into Creation in a murderous tumble of panicked horses and broken bones. It was a good trick, I wasn't going to argue against that – I'd used it myself against Summer, during Five Armies and One – but it wasn't as foolproof as he was making it sound. Especially not when the other side had superior mobility, as we did against the dead.

"It took a third party to make it fail," the Peregrine said.

"There is no third party here, Catherine."

"I'm not sharing the contingencies," I bluntly told him. "Lord Yannu was brought in on the relevant ones, as the strategist sent by the Dominion to the Arsenal, but I'm not thinning the secret by further spreading it. If you can't deal with that, take it up with the appropriate authorities."

The old hero sighed.

"You are the appropriate authorities," Tariq reminded me.

"And I'm telling you it's handled, so don't worry your pretty little head about it," I replied with a winning smile.

While no general, the Pilgrim could at least recognize a lost battle when he was fighting one.

"The other matter is the one I would prefer privacy for," he said.

He didn't flick a glance at Akua, but I did. She'd been silent, her face like a mask, but those golden eyes missed little and she'd been listening closely.

"That's nice," I commented.

A beat passed and I cocked an eyebrow.

"So, what is it?"

Hanno looked mildly amused as he answered in the other hero's place.

"We followed the First Prince's suggestion and it bore the results she predicted," the White Knight said. "With a hero handling the scrying ritual and myself serving as the interlocutor, the elves finally accepted to talk."

Unlike when it'd been a hero making the ritual but someone else serving as the diplomat, which got us a beat of connection with the sorcery before it was shattered, or when Hanno had first attempted to make contact through the ritual of Arsenal mages and the elves had simply warded against the ritual. Of course the finicky little pricks wouldn't bother to answer to any less than the appointed leader of Calernia's heroes, with his busywork done by another fucking chosen of the Heavens. They might be even worse vultures than the Choir of Endurance, who'd at least not been so godsdamned pretentious about it.

"Let me guess, they're keeping the Spring crown?" I drily said.

"In essence," Hanno admitted. "They've agreed to make sure their ritual does not destroy the surroundings, or damage the fabric of Creation, but my attempt to discuss alliance against the Dead King were brusquely rebuffed."

Typical. Well, they'd had a border with the fucker for like a millennium so I supposed I shouldn't be too surprised.

"The return of the Spellblade's body was remarked upon," Hanno then told me. "It was implied that to return the courtesy no claim would be made on the crown of Autumn."

"All heart, those elves," I grunted.

Well, at least we weren't dealing with a war on one more front. That was always worth celebrating.

"Ah, and one lasting thing," the White Knight said. "They asked if the Ranger is part of the Truce and Terms, and when I informed them she is not warned us against allowing her to sign them. They would take this as an act of war."

I closed my eyes and sighed. Well, it wasn't like she'd been going to sign those anyways. They involved too much not-killing-strangers-for-fun for the Lady of the Lake, by my reckoning.

"Duly noted," I said, opening my eyes.

As expected, news about the crowns – which I'd learned there would be from Masego this morning in a private chat, hours before this lot got it going – had prompted the Pilgrim to want to expel Akua. I'd not been sure as to what the news would be, but in the end that'd not really mattered had it?

"We're done here, I believe," I said

Neither saw fit to argue the point, though by the look on the Pilgrim's face this wasn't the last I'd be hearing about contingencies. Good luck to him, since he was headed out with the eastern army and they'd be leaving in two days – before my own force set out. I suggested to Akua we return to my tent to take another crack at planning our route, which we'd taken a break from to visit this warehouse in the first place, but she begged off.

"The new wardstones for the Third require adjustment, dearest," Akua told me. "I will see to that first."

Lie, I thought. You just want to be alone. I didn't call her out on it. Why would I? My plan was working.

It brought me no joy, but my plan was working.

Dave

First?

dadycool

Yup. Looks like you were the /only/ comment for a good 15 minutes.

Adrian_V

What???!!!! This must be an end of times sign!!

letouriste

since a few chapters, i've seen more and more people going to reddit to comment instead of here.
Kind of pain me a little.

thearpox23

Reason for that?

Arctruth

The comment section here is comparatively difficult to parse. Especially on mobile, where a long comment chain is reduced to single-letter lines and a mis-tap moves your screen to open a reply.

NerfContessa

Indeed.

Still prefer it here, for the whole package feeling.

Also, can't wait for the White specter of Woe ergo akua as heroics martyr to become a thing.

Someperson

I wonder if Contrition would sponsor her...

layersr

It's probably because here you have to scroll past the obligatory plead to vote, and the 50 replies to that comment that have nothing to do with the post. Makes it such a pain to read thoughts on the chapter.

RoflCat

Easier to follow particular comment chain and being able to find popular comment quickly I guess.

thearpox23

"since a few chapters, i've seen more and more people going to reddit to comment instead of here."

"since a few chapters"

Reddit has been around for years. I get that you don't have the answer, but I was asking if something happened recently.

RoflCat

Just because it exist doesn't mean everyone is aware of it, or thought of using it initially.

People don't have to all go there for the same reason either.

Some might go there because they hate wordpress's comment system.

Some might go there because he can get notified of updates by just following the sub.

Some might go there because their friend who introduce them to the series do it via reddit.

Whatever it is.

Maybe it's not so much something happen, but just coincidence of a bunch of people switching to using reddit for keeping up with updates/comments, the OP mentioned since a few chapters ago but maybe it happened earlier or more slowly but he only just took notice then.

You know what they say, truth is stranger than fiction. If 5 random people can ends up in a Hero-Villain band, what's wrong with reality of mass of people just casually show up there.

Vlatko

Why? Reddit is the superior site to discuss this on.

thearpox23

My issues with reddit are the issues with low site-wide karma coupled with occasional admin mods overreach, where your account can be effectively shackled because of a single cancerous thread in a completely different subreddit.

I could see reddit as usable if I were to only limit myself to one or a couple niche subreddits like the PGuide, or if I had the care to make alts for every subreddit I was interested in, but it's honestly a bother for a stagnating overripe forum.

I acknowledge I the issues wordpress has, but I personally enjoy the stylistics of the UI, and that it doesn't seem to try to draw my attention away from the text with gamification like account levels or other clutter.

Matthew Wells

Terrible moderation is the bane of that site. Besides the whole volunteer mod thing, they're outright awful with how the actual mods behave. I deleted my account a few years back when the site owner nuked someone's account for disagreeing with him.

Tenthyr

Revenge always hurts, otherwise it's not revenge. Just another petty cruelty.

D. S. Oliver

Now I remember who Akua reminds me of. Vivienne of Dragon Age III. I have no idea why I didn't make the association sooner.

Black Spiral Dancer

"Tonight she'd chosen a simple sleeveless, neckless silver dress in a wavelike pattern interrupted by slightly more ornate stripes – all of it covering a base of dark cloth. A thick silver choker and a hat of silvery tinsel stripes ending in dark gauzy veil completed the ensemble, making for a striking sight."

Vivienne, is that you?!

RandomDude

Cat appears to be trying to pull a redemption in death story with akua, wherein one of the greatest villains of this age slays the greatest villain to date as an act of redemption, possibly at the cost of existence. Interesting story that.

Salt

I think it's actually not a redemption story so much as contrition. It's one of the few "atonement" stories that features no redemption style payoff at all, generally shown by old William's example where the angels were quite explicit from the start that he would never be forgiven, that he couldn't make it right, and he was heading for below-hell instead of above-heaven regardless what he did to atones.

The old "Repent. You will not be forgiven. Repent." line from when Cat herself faced off against Contrition is pretty much an exact summary of the "other side of the hill" she led Akua to understand on her own just now, by arranging the talk with Hanno and the Pilgrim.

Cat is basically putting her in a situation where every road sucks total ass. She poisoned the purity of Akua's old Praesi ideology with her own so that she wouldn't want to go back down the same side of the hill that she climbed up from, while the only other choice to be made is becoming the kind of wretch that William was, as far as mindset about her past crimes goes.

It says something about how shitty a contrition-style breaking of a person is to go through, considering even the Bard thought was "sordid" when the angels did it for (in her eyes) a worthy greater-good cause. This one isn't even about a greater good, so much as sheer Callowan spite making someone pay the long price.

Evgeny Permyakov

This kinds of choices occasionally blow up into you face when a third option is taken. And the Above is just as bad as Below, it simply has better PR. Cat knows that well herself.

Time1ock

Relevant WOE quote: "The Gods Above and Below do roughly correspond to "lower case" good and evil, as far as entities that far removed from mortals can be understood. That neither side of the equation intervenes directly means there's a lot of room for interpretation in the respective philosophies they preach, but the bare bones are there."

Evgeny Permyakov

The funny thing is, modern society is more aligned with evil than good. "Nothing personal, just business" is definitely not a part of "good". "Good" philosophy often breaks on scale beyond "small village" (or "large condo")

Tomatoking

Not to try to fit this into a trope too much but doesnt this all feel like its leading to a "both sides of the hill suck so let's stay on top forever", custodian of the Arsenal unending choice for Akua?

Liliet

Nope. Cat's specifically saying she can't stay on top forever and will have to make the choice.

She expects Akua will choose moving forward even without the eventual reward, and that will entail whatever task Catherine might have for her, Arsenal or whatnot.

naturalnuke

'You poor contrition fools break my heart every time.'

Ed

No, Cat has to teach Akua how to feel remorse before she can be punished for Liesse. There is and will be no redemption, Cat is Callowan to the core.

Frivolous

I wonder why the elves were against Hye signing the T&T. Where's the downside for them?

The elves better hope that Hye never learns that the elves threatened to declare war if she signed them. She will probably be offended, and she is so contrary that she might sign them just so she could go to war against the elves.

I liked and was amused by Catherine being high-handed and pleasantly obstinate when dealing with Hanno and Tariq. Turnabout is fair play, fuckers. I remember many many times when GP had been the same to Cat.

Eftwyr

Remember Hye is half elf, her mother was basically considered a traitor and was the one who taught Hye in order to protect herself from them if i recall the various tidbits about her past we've been fed correctly

dadycool

I think for the elves it's more that they hate Hye and everything she stands for. If she stood for the T&T, they would hate it.

LizAris

Correct me if I'm wrong—but don't they just kinda hate her because of who she is? Aka they're extraordinarily racist asshats? Cuz it's not like most of what she does is really all that...repugnant. Or even evil, considering she's one of those names that's not heroic or villainous.

dadycool

Yeah, the only thing worse for a xenophobe than a xeno is a xeno-same species hybrid. Especially one you can't kill.

Saithorthepyro

Probably not rated as evil but from what we've heard of the Sanctuary she was a terrible guardian to those Named raised there. And she's not exactly a moral saint, she mostly just goes around trying to kill stuff because she thinks it would make a good fight. But yeah the elves mostly want her dead because of who she is and because racism.

Liliet

Refuge, not Sanctuary.

Yeah, Ranger being a piece of shit is thoroughly unrelated to her being hunted by her "relatives". They couldn't do jack to actually harm her, but at least they can poison the alliance well!

naturalnuke

Ranger is like Goku. True Neutral, not a particularly good parent, and only seeks to fight stronger and stronger enemies.

Liliet

Let's be honest, she's Chaotic Neutral.

Rynjin

Really? Ranger always struck me as textbook Neutral Evil. She is defined as a character entirely by her selfishness and borderline hedonism. All that matters to her is her own pleasure, no matter who or what she needs to hurt to get it. In fact, the inflicting of pain is often the direct immediate goal of her actions.

Liliet

I'll accept Chaotic Evil too, tbh.

But I do think she's Chaotic. She hasn't been shown to see any value at all in rules and structures and patterns.

shikkarasu

I've always defined Chaotic, in DnD terms, as "views rules and laws as obstacles," whereas Lawful would "view rules and laws as tools."

I agree, Ranger sees no value in any rules other than "listen to the biggest, baddest one," AKA "Do what the Lady says." Also, as a fun aside, it's worth pointing out that she's now agreed to help Maddie tear down the Praesi government twice, but left the moment that his power base was established and stable after the Conquest. C/N or C/E.

Liliet

I can see that interpretation. Honestly, Chaotic and Lawful is an axis that is not only ambiguous based on how much weight you give to which traits, the zero point is also arbitrary, not to mention the divisions between Neutral and either.

I just think Hye fits the Chaotic Neutral archetype of going around doing random shit based on personal gratification, sometimes actually saving people if that is her whim (Indrani), mostly not caring.

The observation about government isn't entirely correct. She stuck around for 20 years of Amadeus and Alaya ruling the Empire and preparing for the Conquest. I attribute her leaving more to self-preservation – the fun was no longer worth the risk of meddling with actually important stories and politics. Praesi succession has so little weight for the world as a whole she can do whatever and survive in her own Role, toppling stable governments puts her at risk.

Javvies

I think Ranger is more of a True Neutral with some Chaotic and Evil tendencies.

Her take on life, per Amadeus (who ought to know as well as anyone), is more or less “be the best you can be; do whatever you want; kill anyone who gets in the way of that, unless you can't, in which case respect that rule”.

Mix in her age, jaded nature of having literally outlived nearly everyone she's ever met, buried almost everyone she had ever cared about, and can reasonably expect those trends to continue until her own death, and being on the shitlist of the Golden Bloom Elves for her entire life ... it's not unreasonable that she doesn't care about many people and definitely not about normal people – she literally cannot afford to care much and expect to retain mental equilibrium for very long, plus I suspect that she never really had what one could call a reasonable approximation of a normal upbringing or childhood interactions with other people.

On the other hand, she does take in students of various persuasions, even if she's not exactly the nicest teacher.

So ... I suspect that part of her wants more from life on a personal level but doesn't really know how to get it.

But I digress ... I see Ranger as more of a True Neutral because she's about self-interest, and is amoral and indifferent about how she attains those interests, not immoral.

If you obstruct her indulging her whims, sure, she'll kill you, but she's not going to bother you if you don't bother or interfere with her.

If some random person asked her for help with something specific, she'd probably ignore them, unless they were being insulting or she was in a bad mood or something, but if whatever they asked for help with was something that interested her, she'd help them – that's literally how she met Amadeus (and Wekesa) – they asked her for help getting into Callow.

However, in a way, Ranger's philosophy (according to Amadeus) makes her an atypical Villain, but really an expression of the truest form of Below's philosophy of "do whatever you want, as long as you're prepared to deal with the consequences of your actions" ... which might be a contributing factor to her strength.

LizAris

T&T would give Ranger protection and allies. (Not that she needs either of those, mind you, it's the principle of the thing.) The elves just...hate hate hate Ranger and want her to die. Declaring that she's part of the T&T would then be declaring that Calernia's new system for Named has her back, and the elves can't have that. Cue declaration of war 😊

Agent J

The obvious solution then is not to have her sign the T&T, but rather, sign the Accords instead.

Good luck bullying the continent that just kicked Nessie's teeth in, asshats.

Burlyraven

I really do wonder what's going to become of Akua. She hasn't been truly Evil for a while, but literally all she knows is being evil. Her own intentions and Cat's plans have her setting out on a more noble path, but even now that she's been shown how stalled she's been and for how long, I don't know if she has enough will left to take a step in either direction.

Additionally, she's a shade, and with too much of a debt for a clean resurrection. If she falls back into Evil, I could see her becoming a wraith of some variety, her own will the only thing holding her together. On the other hand, if she does end up moving towards Good might see a restoration of her body, but at great cost, possibly in the form of a sacrifice of her magic and other powers, which could make for a solid hero story, honestly.

Javvies

Eh ... this isn't some remnant of Akua.
It's her actual, original soul.

That pretty much has to leave more options open for her.
In theory, anyways.

She's still going to have to pay the long price, which won't end well for her.

Big I

Since we learned about Cardinal I've always assumed Akua's fate to be tied to it in some way. Ruler of the city, eternal Headmistress of the Named school, spirit bound to the city to protect it, something like that.

The implication I got from this chapter, and Pilgrim wanting her sent away before taking about the Spring Crown, is that the crown could be used to bring her back to life.

Darkening

Considering Cat got her body destroyed and got a new one made from magic when she went winter queen would be a pretty decent precedent to a soul getting a body from a fae mantle.

Frivolous

Genius loci. It would be a useful task for Akua. Waste not, want not.

Javvies

Heh.
Cat's Callowan. She was never going to forget or forgive what Akua's done. And Akua, Hanno, and Tariq all really should know that.

Tariq ... you aren't in charge. And Cat isn't a Levantine or a Hero to nigh automatically defer to your wishes and whims. She's a Callowan and leans Villain. Plus, you've broken your word to her and told her that your word is inherently unreliable. Oh, and let's not forget, you tried to throw Callow under the wheels to be ground up in order to prop up Procer at any cost. Oh, and there was that time you used a plague as a weapon on civilians and ripped Amadeus's soul out. Cat's not going to forget or forgive any of that, even if she did resurrect you that one time. Tariq, you may be a likeable fellow ... but Cat doesn't actually like you.

Javvies

Oh, right, almost forgot.

Fucking Elves.

It's not like they're going to join the Truce and Terms, so Ranger joining doesn't actually do anything with respect to them.

dadycool

Yeah, he seems to be one of those that has trouble dealing with people who don't fall over themselves trying to help/obey him. It's most likely not on purpose, but the wise tend to get used to being listened to, especially when the only ones that don't trip over themselves are either friends, equals, or opposition that you can exterminate and thereby prove yourself right because they were definitely wrong. I feel like Tariq's only real friend by the time we met him was the Saint of Swords, the only one he considered an equal was the Wandering Bard, and the opposition was basically anyone east of the mountains, villains, or targets. In Cat he finds an equal who genuinely doesn't like him, yet doesn't directly oppose him, and he doesn't seem to know what to do with her, especially after she proved herself a very capable enemy with compatible ideals.

ninegardens

I feel like there's a difference here between "I am annoyed because Cat didn't obey me" and "I am confused/frustrated because there's a manipulative mass murderer in the room and Cat seems to be chilling like it's an okay thing."

This isn't just him throwing his weight around- he has reasons to ask Akua to leave. We the readers know Cat's reasoning, but from Tariq and Hanno's point of view, it's just kinda... weird and obnoxious.

Saithorthepyro

While he has every right to feel that way, Cat can't be fully sure how the two would react to the idea of trying to give Akua a redemption and even more that she was going to rope them into it. Better to let it play out on its own, also because Cat felt when Pilgrim was deliberately trying to steer her into a redemption equals death story and probably doesn't want a situation similar where Akua catches on that he's trying to deliberately steer her towards that. Better to have it be spontaneous and occur naturally.

In reasons not related to Akua's redemption, she's Cat's advisor, Cat can choose to keep her in the room, and Cat needs to not be too conciliatory to Hero's wishes anyway, as what we see with Mirror Knight assuming Hero's friendliness with villains being them getting corrupted by said Villains, Cat has to deal with on her own side, albeit more "I'm going to help protect you and assure you that you all aren't immediately going to be righteously killed as soon as the war ends." And that needs to be made clear to Hanno and Tariq as well, just because she will act friendly doesn't mean she will share secrets or dismiss an advisor just because you ask her too. And given Hanno's distancing after the Red Axe incident it doesn't feel unjustified. Tariq is a little more complicated since he didn't try to distance himself after the Red Axe thing, but he is the one of those two who tried to kill her with a story among other things, so trust being short on relatively unimportant things makes sense.

ninegardens

Oh yeah- I totally agree that Cat has excellent reasons for not letting them in on what is going on, and that she is well within her rights to demand that "advisor Kivul" be allowed to stay. I'm not saying Cat was in the wrong here.

Just...the fact that she is within her rights, doesn't mean it is stupid or unreasonable for GP to be confused and frustrated by the situation. He wasn't exactly making demands, he just asked, twice, and then got on with his day. I was disagreeing with the idea that Tariq was trying to be "in charge."

Frivolous

I loved loved LOVED that Cat told Tariq not to worry his pretty little head over her contingencies.

That's usually said by older men to young women. To witness it happening in reverse was delightful, especially considering how fatherly Tariq tends to appear to others. -She- was patronizing -him-!

Or is it matronizing when a woman does it? I'm not sure.

Loz

Patronizing and matronizing are both father and mother words, but here we need a daughter or maybe grand-daughter word. Any ideas on that front?

Rey d`Tutto

Sororitizing. From Sorority, for daughters
Fratratizing, from Fraternity, for sons.

Mental Mouse

Correction: "Sorority" and "fraternity" refer respectively to sisters and brothers. Per the Free Dictionary, either sons or daughters would be "filial".

ninegardens

Heh.

Using white and Pilgrim as weapons against Akua. Classic. Particularly amusing because of how annoying they found it, despite the fact that she was achieving THEIR goals (running a redemption story, etc etc etc, IE, the work of the heavens).

And keeping Akua around afterwards, while rude to the two heroes was... a solid investment in terms of redemption story: the hilltop is more likely to stick if Akua feels like Cat is actually on her side.

The scheme is just even better because... how to put it. WK and GP aren't exactly lecturing Akua voluntarily. If they were it just feels pretentious. The fact that they did so because Cat FORCED them to interact with her, and Akua FORCED them to justify themselves makes it more... genuine? More sincere.

I like it. I like both Hanno and Tariq here. They make reasonable requests, and get denied for no apparent reason, and run with it anyway. Its not unfair for them to be confused and frustrated by it.

Also, Cat played them like a fiddle.

dadycoool

Genuine is a good word for it. Them giving the lectures as a reaction means it wasn't rehearsed, it was 'ask a question, get an answer' scenario. And yeah, none of it was their idea, so she can't call them out on anything because she initiated everything.

Saithorthepyro

While they have every right to be annoyed, Cat also does have the right under the terms to refuse them, and it's not like we've been shown any signs Hanno got over the Red Axe incident and has changed his attitude from right after then. And Cat has a very fair point that secrets spread around in the Guideverse are never really a good idea, and as neither really have military command or experience with military campaigns, there's no reason they should know if it's such an important secret. Hanno could maybe petition as head of the Heroes contingent, after which I imagine it would get to a vote much like at the trial?

And also while Cat doesn't mention in the narration it I wouldn't be surprised if she's keeping things secret from Tariq just in case Bard pops in with some really convincing arguments about how what she did was part of her secret plan to defeat the Dead King. Once burned twice shy.

Liliet

Nobody's saying Cat was wrong, as best I can tell. This is just a rare situation where EVERYONE is in the right and a minor conflict is peacefully settled by one side conceding.

It's beautiful, truly.

Frivolous

Tariq still has not and probably never will learn to compensate for his inability to Behold Cat's intentions.

It must frustrate him immensely that someone so powerful and influential (and obnoxious) is a blind spot in his aspect. He got too used to local omniscience.

Mental Mouse

It's a pity that she couldn't plausibly go "shields down" to reassure him that "you done good".

Djinn o'Cyde

Vote

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Juff

Typo Thread:

outside of unraveller > outside of the unraveller to stabilized > to stabilise runes carves > runes carved

Hiding we have > Hiding that we have results.I'd (missing space)

It was two people ("it was" appears twice in this sentence. might want to reword) before as (one or the other) answers Akua (missing word. i'm guessing "with") Conflict was always (is this intentional? maybe remove the "was") silence beg > silence begs could dismissed > could dismiss just social ploy > just a social ploy made more wary > made him more wary is waste of time > is a waste of time cost you something to > cost you something too has been > had been experiences heroes > experienced heroes

The d dead > The dead

MrMaturity

If feel like Cat might just be getting a little too arrogant here.
I worry that there is something catastrophic looming on the horizon because Cat thought she could manipulate the situation.

Agent J

In point of fact, Astrophic is Catherine's middle name.

Tenthyr

That's the point though— cat didn't manipulate. She just placed objects in motion in the position where they'd collide in a way she knew would form the patterns inherent to creation.

Burnsy

Okay I'm pretty sure that a) the Spring Crown can be used for resurrections (which is why Tariq didn't want Akua knowing anything more about it) and b) the elves are planning to use it to rez the Spellblade.

Then him coming charging in at an opportune moment like an incredibly racist Legolas to get some good old fashioned murdervenge on the Dead King is looking likely.

Javvies

The Elves may or may not try to resurrect the Spellblade. I am inclined to suspect that they probably won't.
For one thing, he's an Elf, not Fae, and thus an entity of Creation, where the only source for true resurrections is Above, and not having been empowered by a Fae mantle or Title in life, is not eligible for the cyclical Fae reincarnation process.
For another, the Spellblade was in the hands of the Dead King for centuries undergoing who knows what kind of trauma and mental reconditioning. Who knows what kind of traps are laid for anyone trying to resurrect him? Or where his loyalties would truly lie if resurrected? With the living? Or with his master for centuries?

The Golden Bloom Elves are, however, definitely going to try to use the Crown of Spring to break their curse of infertility (with each other) that they've been affected by ever since they genocided the ancient Deoraithe out of the Golden Bloom. Which, I expect is the top priority for the Golden Bloom Elves.

I think it's more likely that a last hour surprise assist is going to come from Larat and the rest of the former Wild Hunt who are also former Fae.

Sure, they don't owe Cat anything, anymore, but the Dead King winning is definitely the kind of thing that they wouldn't want to have happen (the undead are neither interesting nor fun). Calernia according to Cat would be a vast improvement, from their perspective, relative to Calernia according to the Dead King.

And I suspect that they wouldn't really like Bard any either.

ninegardens

I am so for the surprise return of Larat.

"Hazah... my treacherous lieutenant... ..

...

... just what we all needed?"

Frivolous

All I know for sure is even a resurrected Spellblade won't have the aspect the Saint of Swords destroyed with Sever, the aspect of Ban that Cat ripped out of him, nor the aspect she destroyed with Ban.

Reference: Pinnacle.

A Spellblade with zero aspects might as well not be Named at all.

RanVor

Okay, I'll be mighty surprised if Akua doesn't backslide into her original self after this conversation. She had one reason not to and Cat has just taken it from her in the name of whatever she thought she could achieve by this.

Shveiran

I'm not sure I see your point: Akua didn't take the chances she had to run away (the Everdark, the ritual at the Graveyard, etc) and start anew because she has become convinced that her former way of living is empty.

That it made her risk his fatehr, that it made her keep friends at arm's length, that it gave her less happyness than an evening around the fire with people that don't really like her.

She has renounced her ways because she now conider them to be empty and useless.

Now she has simply being informed that the path she is walking now doesn't lead to a place where her past deeds are forgotten. And that hurts.

But it doesn't make her suddenly see the old way as a land of milk and honey.

She has a choice before her, one she must make with open eyes. No more, no less.

RanVor

Except the choice she has is, from her perspective, meaningless. Either she goes back to being who she used to be, but knowing it won't be the same anymore because her perspective has changed, or she throws away everything that defined her in life for nothing. Both paths ultimately lead nowhere, but one of them requires significantly more effort. And if you're going to be a monster no matter how hard you try, why bother?

Geckus

That choice would be far from meaningless; with everything she's experienced since her 'death', returning to her old ways would require her to actually choose to be a monster – even the most evil people don't typically think of themselves as the bad guy. Whereas choosing the higher road, one full of challenge with no redemption at the end, would require her to choose to be better than she was before. She would bother because she's become a better person, not a worse one.

RanVor

Spoken like somebody who hasn't been raised to worship evil. Akua's values are radically different from what you'd expect in a normal person and only recently she's begun to change her outlook. Being a monster is perfectly normal to her. She doesn't have any inherent desire to be a better person – she wouldn't be totally fine with going back to what was, but it would be nothing compared to the commitment required to pick the other path. And since her only real incentive has just been taken away, she might simply not care enough to do that.

Salt

Akua can't go back to her old beliefs at this point without compromising them. Her old beliefs are a hardcore oldschool Below ideology of victory proving beliefs correct, as direct opposition to Above's idea that beliefs are inherently correct or incorrect to begin with. Praesi ideology isn't just "let's do bad things". She worships worthiness being proven through accomplishment, she worships the methods and beliefs that lead to accomplishment. She doesn't sacrifice babies just for the sake of sacrificing babies.

Which means that Catherine's victories – and especially her victory over the old Diabolist – are what makes Catherine correct instead of the old Diabolist, even in the Diabolist's own eyes. It can't be denied without fundamentally denying the core of her original ideology to begin with.

The funny thing about iron sharpens iron is that it only makes sense if there actually is a sharpening. You don't get to believe in that and avoid being sharpened, just because the end result is unpleasant on an emotional level.

RanVor

Look, all I'm saying is, when all roads lead nowhere, might as well choose the easiest one.

Ultimately, this was a test. Cat wanted to see how Akua would react to the notion of being beyond redemption. I believe she miscalculated. Denying someone hope never leads to positive change, even if the hope in question is only an illusion.

RanVor

By the way, why does everybody suddenly think the Diabolist so trustworthy? What happened to "Akua is a manipulative evil demon and can't not tell a lie if her life depended on it"?

Shveiran

Uhm... one doesn't have to trust or like Akua, of course, but it feels like your arguments stem from the assumption that people never change, and that people never embrace a different self for reasons other than personal benefit.

I wouldn't want to argue our respective view of the world, but if we are discussing the Guide that really doesn't seem how the world and characters work?

RanVor

You're 158% mistaken here (as usual). I'm calling you, the community, out on being ready to change views on characters so quickly whenever convenient. It's kind of funny how my opinion on Akua is misinterpreted to mean different, sometimes completely opposite things depending on the discussion, while in reality, it's always the same – Akua can't be trusted, but that doesn't make her points invalid. Even a hypocrite can be right, but that doesn't make them any less of a hypocrite.

...Actually, it's the same with my opinions on everything. One of the reasons I left this fandom was that I was tired of having to constantly correct people thinking I said something different than (sometimes even the opposite of) what I meant to say.

Shveiran

I really don't think we have argued often enough for you to express percentages about how wrong I am (usually or not).

I'm also unsure about how I somehow became the whole community, let alone what kind of agenda I could have that thinking something of Akua is "convenient".

But if you feel that anyone that disagrees with you shares the same (wrong) opinion, by all means keep at it. I'll be over here, not joining the discussion.

RanVor

1. Fuck the English language, it's the worst.
2. It's always the same whenever I'm arguing with anybody (and I mean literally anybody) here.
3. You don't want to talk, fine, whatever. My point stands.

ninegardens

@Ranvor:

>By the way, why does everybody suddenly think the Diabolist so trustworthy? What happened to "Akua is a manipulative evil demon and can't not tell a lie if her life depended on it"?

I mean.... that was like two books ago?
As in, she proved pretty reliable during the Everdark arc...
And then during the princes graveyard.
And then, for the past 2 years of war vs the dead king.

She's had CHANCES to betray them, and demonstrably not taken those chances.
This isn't exactly what I'm going to call "sudden"....

As for why everyone misinterprets your arguments and opinions... ummm....

<https://xkcd.com/1028/>

If you are consistently misinterpreted this might be a problem with how your presenting things.
Communication is a two way street.

And if you go around saying things like "Your 158% wrong (as usual)", people will be less inclined to assume that you are acting in good faith, and more inclined to believe you're a pain in the ass.

shrug

If you say things like that why WOULD people assume that you are taking their opinion seriously? And if not, why would they listen to yours?

It kind of looks a lot less like the fandom ganging up on you, and more like you showing up and picking a fight. (though admittedly, I only have the context of your last couple posts; you have the context of your entire post history, so feel free to disagree)

RanVor

Maybe I am a pain in the ass. What I really am, though, is a fool, because I keep coming back even though it always ever ends with me getting pissed off and leaving again. I just can't get along with you people, you're far too annoying.

I can't help but notice, though, that you keep focusing on an offhand remark I made instead of my actual point.

Salt

It can only be considered leading to nowhere if the ideal destination remains centered around self gratification to begin with.

Which is rather the point. The only denial here is of personal pride or status as achievable end goals, which is far from the denial of any end goals at all. Especially considering a massive number of major characters in the story don't hold those two as critical end goals in the first place, and since Akua has never been a character that lets difficulty affect her choice in goals.

RanVor

Care to tell me what that end goal is supposed to be, exactly?

marillius

It's called selflessness. Doing good when there is no reward, especially when there is no reward.

Cat just took away the reward.

RanVor

Ah, see, here's your mistake. You think Akua would want to be a selfless person. I have no reason to believe that to be true.

Liliet

Akua is already a selfless person.

Now, I know how this sounds, hear me out.

She never wanted – for herself, for personal gratification and enjoyment – the things she was working to achieve. Nowhere in her POV is there a single thought of “when I am the Empress of Creation, THEN the true fun will come”. Instead, we have “when I win, Praes will become strong again” and “I will prove my cause right” and “do you ever get tired of what we do”.

She was raised to view ambition as a duty, and never wavered in that until by her own philosophy she was proven wrong in the assumption that made her stronger than everyone else.

By the philosophy she followed up until her death, she is now supposed to loyally serve Catherine and help her achieve her goals.

By her personal desires – well, that's what Catherine's playing with by "not taking away the mirrored oasis".

It's the middle path that Catherine is taking away, the path of not quite committing, of expecting things to circle around to her getting what she expected to get in the first place.

Here's a more detailed analysis of what drives Akua:

marillius

Woosh And there goes the point of this chapter, right over your head.

Tenthyr

Akua knows the end of that path now, and going back to it is more miserable than choosing a better path, one of contrition.

RanVor

Nope. Cat made a point of showing that each path is exactly as miserable as the other. One is a path of endless disappointment, the other is a path of endless sacrifice. Both can wear an individual out surprisingly quickly.

In a way, it's truly a genius punishment – Akua will have to bear suffering for the rest of her existence, but it will be almost entirely self-inflicted. Catherine just isn't wary enough of the possibility of it backfiring spectacularly.

Liliet

I think Catherine is very wary, but she's also aware of the momentum Akua is giving to the forward path just through her perfectionism. Akua commits to things, even when they are proven increasingly idiotic over time. It'll take a stronger stimulus than "I won't be getting EVERYTHING I want" to make her deviate.

Akua has been proving her intent to go through with this for nearly two books now, and as she commits more and more – well, she commits more and more. It's a psychological trick that Catherine is completely shameless about – and if she was at any point wrong about it, Akua would have backed out earlier.

They're playing chicken and Catherine's not flinching. She knows the risks, but everything genuinely IS going that way.

Note how this meeting was specifically noted as a means of calibration: she had no doubts about what the trajectory was, but needed to verify how far along it Akua was.

And she was not proven wrong about any of her assumptions.

RanVor

Well, I've said pretty much everything I wanted to say and now that you're here, I guess it's my cue to back off, lest we start another flame war.

Bye, I'd say I hope we won't meet again, but I've already shown that I can't be trusted to be smart enough to avoid that.

Liliet

RIP. Hopefully we'll be able to talk without you having a bad time sometime. Have a good non-pgte-commenting-time :3

shikkarasu

Real quick, and maybe I missed something, but what the Crows are these "Pharos Devices?" They were brought up in Chapter 2 and mentioned in 47, but I can't find any mention of what they do. Only that 5ish were produced where there are crates of unravellers.

Frivolous

No explanation yet what pharos devices are.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's implied they're used to open multiple portals from the TW to make possible for more soldiers to exit them quickly.

Frivolous

I was sleeping, and as I woke up, it occurred to me that the Pharos of Alexandria was a famous lighthouse.

Light-house. It is my vague guess that the pharos devices allow wielders of Light, such as priests of the House of Light, to project that Light with intensity at great distances, to burn undead like battle-lasers, or do other things with Light. Maybe even long-range healing, or making instantaneous holy ground of battlefields to weaken all undead on that field?

Konstantin von Karstein

From chapter 2:

« It'd been our first use of a pharos device, and the proliferation of gates out of the Twilight Ways had allowed us to take the dead flatfooted. »

I suppose Pharos devices are tools to open several portals at the same time to shorten the time it takes for your soldiers to exit the TW.

Frivolous

Oh interesting. I hadn't seen that. Thank you, Konstantin.

That explains what Cat was thinking about the Alliance having better mobility than Keter. I was wondering about that, since Klaus noted that the dead don't need to rest.

Reader in The Night

People have been throwing around the word "redemption" when it comes to Akua's engineered character arc. I don't think redemption is the right word here, the right word is "revenge".

Maybe Cat wants to also make Akua useful in the process, but the primary goal here is not to atone her, it's to punish her. And if her plan goes well, Cat has done that perfectly, because she made Akua reach a place of self-flagellation for the rest of her unnatural life. Doesn't matter how long Akua lives or what she does, Cat has robbed her of the right to obtain penance.

Daniel E

Repent repent, you shall not be forgiven, etc. I wonder if Contrition's resurrection left an impression, however subtle.

Liliet

I think it really did. Catherine has been very Like That in a way she wasn't, I think, before First Llesse.

Mental Mouse

Indeed, she has been marked by each of the Choirs she's faced. The self-flagellation from Contrition has been noticed not only by commenters but by the Woe. Fortitude is perhaps a little iffy on timing, but she certainly clings to that limp now. Mercy has pushed her further towards reducing pain for everyone – not just Callow, but all of Calernia. And Judgement has strengthened her capacity to pass judgement on not just her subordinates, but the powers of the world.

Miles

"But cold iron isn't supposed to be conducive to magic so why put it at the centre?"

"Because the Hierophant voted," Akua said, frank with her praise.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Time1ock

So it seems that Akua's going to go through a contrition story.

As a side note: it does feel odd that the Choir of Contrition has the whole "Repent. You will not be forgiven. Repent" thing going on when in Christianity, contrition through Christ is regarded as the first step towards reconciliation with God. Was this an intentional choice?

Shveiran

It doesn't seem very surprising, in my opinion. The Guide is original enough that its content isn't a thin-veiled parody of the real world, but something that lives and breathes on its own merits.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Every point against Akua can (and should) be made against Cat as well. Most ironic chapter so far.

Aotrs Commander

And Pilgrim. ESPECIALLY Pilgrim. No amount of "but reasons!" changes that fact; frankly, he's worse than she is, because he beleives himself righteous on top of being a mass-murderer.

J Corwin

It's especially funny because he says there's nothing you can do in the wake of mass murder to be trustworthy, when his whole deal is "I mass murder, but for like, a good reason usually, so trust me with it."

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Hah good point.

Chapter 49: Association

"There are two ways to interpret a prophecy: the way that spells your doom and the wrong one."

– Dread Empress Dismal

I knelt, pushing down a twinge of pain, and squinted closely at the copper wire.

Obviously my quarters had been trapped, but how? The wire was of the finer kind Pickler had come up with during my time in the Everdark, but even though pushing fully open the door would definitely pull on it – and so on a contraption tied to munitions, hopefully but not necessarily College-grade instead of military – the angle was all wrong for a sharper or a brightstick. Sure, a full brightstick would shatter my eardrum from this close but I wouldn't be blinded. And I'd lose what, at most a shredded ankle to a sharper? This was amateur hour. Where was the triple-wire spring with the overhead sharper? No, I was being screwed with. This was bait.

The foundations of my house in Neustal, which I didn't actually use all that often compared to my tent, were stone raised above ground-level as was standard in areas where the Dead King might attempt assassination. It meant I had a single 'step' to take going into the house, in reality just a small extension of the foundation beyond the walls. And when I leaned closer and smelled that step, I found a familiar scent: stone dust and sapper's plaster. That little fucker had put in a weight-sensitive demolition charge after hollowing out the step, hadn't he? The copper wire had just been to draw my attention away. Narrowing my eyes, I used my staff to hoist myself back up on my feet.

I wasn't going to let this ambush pass without a bit of a rap on the knuckles, of course. It was good for my sappers to occasionally be reminded I was just as shameless as them and twice as mean.

"Special Tribune Robber," I called out. "Report."

There was a beat of silence.

"It was all Borer's idea," a voice cheerfully called out from inside. "I tried to stop him, Your Maleficence, but with his brute strength he overwhelm-"

"I asked for a report," I mildly said. "Come out and deliver it."

I pulled on Night the slightest bit, just in case. Special Tribune Robber, who'd held his rank for several years now, had visibly aged since I last saw him. That was often the way with goblins, whose lifespan was much shorter than most other races'. How old was he now? Near twenty, I imagined. Over the hill by the standards of his race, who quickly began going decrepit past thirty when they lived that long. He was distantly of a Matron line, I knew, so I held out hope that his face grown even gaunter and the pulls of skin around his yellow eyes were not warning signs.

Deftly the sapper came to stand on the stone, and offered me an offensively terrible salute paired with a smug grin of white needles. I could not help but notice the distinct lack of him exploding. Vexing.

"Reporting at your leisure, Your Wickednousness," Robber cheerfully said.

I cocked my head to the side.

"Fine-tuned it to trigger only above your weight?" I said.

"No idea what you're talking about, ma'am," he assured me. "Although, while we're at it, I'd like to report Captain Borer for wanton mutiny, assault of a superior officer-"

"How long did it even take you to hollow that thing out?" I asked, reluctantly impressed.

"Pickler made this stone-eating acid while we were up north," Robber said. "Works like a charm. Based on some Lycaonese alchemy they use to keep their ramparts clean."

There was a beat of silence.

"Is what I would say were I Captain Borer, who is obviously responsible for-"

"How strong are the munitions?" I mildly asked.

"Like the gentle caress of a breeze," he lied.

A slender tentacle of Night pierced through the fresh plaster, triggering the munitions within, and the little bastard fell into the step with little burn but large billows of a pungent black smoke. I took a sniff and almost gagged. Leftover smoker ingredients mixed with something rank, I'd guess. Robber had always been a deft hand with munitions, especially recipes that weren't on the record. Even as the goblin tumbled forward at my feet, coughing, I leaned against my staff and cocked an eyebrow.

"So what have we learned today?" I asked.

"You are an implacable foe to all goblinkind," he croaked out. "And take pleasure in persecuting your poor, innocent, loyal servants."

A grin tugged at my lips.

"I did saddle Borer with you," I conceded, "so I suppose an argument can be made for the second."

"You could offer me healing, at least," Robber complained, then faked a few fresh coughs. "Aren't you some sort of fancy priestess these days, Boss? First Into The Pie or something like that."

I knew he was full of shit, because the Sisters were actually wildly popular with the sappers and even goblins in general. It was almost like, culturally speaking, they were very comfortable with the idea of unknowable female eldritch entities of murder and theft standing above them. Go figure. I wouldn't call them converts to the Tenets, which were much too drow in nature to ever really find takers beyond the Firstborn, but these days sappers liked to mark their equipment with the Crows and the occasional rabbit or bird was bled in their name before being tossed in a cookpot. Andronike was rather charmed by the practice and had sounded me out on the subject of bestowing Night – I wasn't opposed, so long as she knew what she was in for. Komena was lukewarm at the notion of branching out too much from the drow, though, so it'd gone nowhere.

"You're right," I mused. "Silly of me to forget."

Quicker than he was able to dodge, I rapped the top of his hairless head with the side of my staff. He yelped and paddled back.

"How is that healing?" he accused.

"Well," I shrugged, "you're not thinking about the cough anymore, are you?"

A heartbeat later he was cackling, and I shared in the laughter. He darted in to clasp my arm in a legionary's salute, close but light-touched, before backing away.

"It's good to see you, Boss," Robber said.

"You too," I smilingly replied. "You malevolent little shit. Was this just a heads up you got in, or did you have a reason to seek me out?"

"Pickler wants to see you," he said. "Sent me to get your attention."

I snorted.

"Haven't been able to get more than three words out of that one in the weeks she's been here, but now she feels chatty?" I said. "Let me guess: she's finally finished her latest tinkering trip and she wants to show off."

"You're the one who named her Sapper-General," Robber shrugged. "Then you compounded that by throwing a mountain of coin and artisans at her. She'd been on a two-year tinkering binge, Boss. I had to assign someone to making sure she ate."

I winced, though I was not entirely surprised. In theory Pickler was the head of all the sappers in the Army of Callow, which had been made into a separate military order not unlike the Order of Broken Bells – I just didn't have enough sappers to use them the way the Legions did – but she was utterly uninvolved with field command. Even company assignments were largely handled by her second, Commander Waffler, with her only occasionally meddling in matters. Her efforts had been on making war engines for this new war we were fighting, and Twilight's Pass has been her both her testing and proving grounds.

"No one told me was quite that bad," I admitted, faintly apologetic.

Robber had always been sweet on his old commanding officer, in a goblin way. It was unlikely to ever go anywhere, but that didn't mean he couldn't hold a torch. We got moving as we talked, him leading the way as I limped to the side.

"She's pleased as a raider on a moonless night," Robber dismissed. "I'm not irked about that part, just that she's learned some bad habits. Nobody seems to care since she's spitting out wonders keeping to those hours, but it's not good for her health."

He looked at me from the corner of his large yellow eyes.

"She's been wildly happy since you freed her from field command and let her loose, Boss," the Special Tribune said. "And she's grateful, don't let anyone tell you otherwise. Buy you know she's always been like this."

I softly smiled. Look at him, all these years and he was still quietly cleaning up behind Pickler the same way he had back when we'd just been a bunch of kids fighting in College war games. Some things never changed, huh?

"We're all creatures of habit, in our own ways," I drily said. "I know better than to take offence, Robber. Not seeing you two for a few years won't change that."

Hells, I didn't have enough friends left alive to start getting petty with them over little things like, say, Pickler's inability to pretend she cared a whit about niceties when instead she could be attending glorious machinery. Reassured, Robber caught me up on gossip from Twilight's Pass as we walked with great relish. No doubt he was making up half the tales. I choked, though, when he mentioned the supposedly fierce debate among the northern armies about whether Prince Frederic and Prince Otto were close friends or secret lovers.

"You met the man in the Arsenal, didn't you?" Robber asked. "Did you get a read on whether he'd enjoy that sort of lance-handling?"

The goblin obscenely wiggled his hairless brows, startling a laugh out of me. I could have told him that Frederic was actually a more than decent jouster, but that was best kept quiet even among my closest.

"Alas, I only ever got to see him use a sword," I sighed. "A tragedy, Robber. You know what these pretty boys do to me."

He wrinkled his nose in disgust, not even entirely feigned.

"Humans," he sighed. "It's all fluids with you lot – and not even the fun ones, like blood or goblinfire."

I made a somewhat unkind comment about the sexual attraction the average sapper might feel towards a crate of munitions, which devolved the conversation into bickering all the rest of the way to where Pickler was holed up. A shooting range, I discovered, or at least the battered remnants of one. Targets had been blown through in ways experience allowed me to match with ballistas, but it'd been more than just stone that'd done this. The grounds and wooden targets were scorched, like they'd been set aflame. I frowned as I limped to the edge of the firing range, interested enough I didn't stop to chat with the sapper crews fielding the three ballistas on the range.

I knelt slowly, leaning on my staff, and trailed my fingers against the charred wooden remains of a target. Bringing them close to my face, I took a whiff and immediately let out a noise of surprise.

"Aha," Sapper-General Pickler of the High Ridge Tribe enthused, popping out without warning. "You get it, then. I knew you would."

She forgot to tack on even a ma'am at the end, but I was excited enough it barely registered.

"That wasn't done by sorcery," I said. "There's no ozone smell, like there would be with an enchanted stone blowing up."

Having appeared out of hole in the ground – not metaphorically, it'd been an actual hole and she'd been in it – Pickler offered me an excited grin that was like a clacking mouthful of white needles. Like Robber she'd aged, yet while like him her face had grown gaunter her frame had actually thickened. She was only a little taller than the last time we'd seen each other, but her shoulders and hips had grown broader. Her amber eyes looked even larger, now that the skin was pulled taut around them, and they shone with manic zeal.

"It's Light," she said, confirming my guess.

I let out a low whistle.

"We've been trying to get that to work for years," I said, honestly impressed. "Multiples stones were fired here, Pickler. You really managed to get several shots out without scrapping the engine?"

Stones with a Light infusion weren't new, everyone under the sun had used those at some point. They'd been a known part of Calernian arsenals since the First Crusade, when trying to take heavily warded Praesi cities with inferior mages had forced the crusading armies to find an alternative to simply dying by the dozens of thousands storming the walls. The problem with those munitions was that they tended to wreck whatever siege engine they were thrown out of, as Light was highly unstable when shoved into things. There was a reason the foremost artisan in Light of our generation was the Blessed Artificer, who'd gotten a fucking Name out of her skill at it.

Usually larger stones were more stable, so trebuchets and catapults could be relied on to toss a dozen stones before being seriously damaged. It made their use viable. The smaller the engines got, though, the more the Light in the projectiles screwed with them. Scorpions and ballistas were sometimes made unusable by as much as a single shot, the javelins and stones having bent the wood they were on. The Lycaonese, who loved ballistas as much as the Legions of Terror – even though they used dwarven models, the poor fuckers – had long been bitter about this, as they could not afford to buy replacements and lacked the mages to turn to a magical solution instead.

"We have to put a copper casing on the stones," Pickler hedged, "but once that safety is observed, yes. It had been an unequivocal success, Catherine. And the amount of Light that emanates is battle-appropriate, it has a decent shot of destroying even a construct."

"Gods Below, Pickler," I laughed out. "That..."

Changed things, to put it lightly. Most constructs were too damned quick to be threatened by something like this, and those that weren't were much too big, but the amount of Light she was talking about would utterly wreck most undead infantry. It might even finally give us a way to deal with the Grey Legion that wasn't 'soldiers praying Akua, the Witch or me got there in time'. Even Hanno had found those fuckers a hard nut to crack.

"I thought it might please," my Sapper-General said, smiling a smile as girlish as goblin teeth allowed.

It would have made a cat flinch, I suspected. And wisely so, given that goblins liked them in a stew.

"It has," I said, almost touching her shoulder before I refrained.

It, uh, was usually taken as an advance by goblins. Robber had been trained out of that by his years rubbing elbows with other races, but Pickler wasn't as social.

"Have supper with me tonight," I said. "You can tell me more about it there. But until then?"

She watched me, amber eyes alight with expectation.

"Take what you need, Sapper-General," I grinned, wolfish. "On my authority, requisition any bloody thing you need to make sure we have as many of those modified ballistas and... copperstones as we can when we march."

She didn't protest the name, improvised as it was, so it might just stick. The two of us grinned at each other again, and it felt like the day had gotten just a little bit lighter.

—

I swung by my tent, afterwards, to follow through on what I'd just promised. I doubted Pickler was going to be shy with requisitions if she was rushing things before our departure, so I'd better ensure she actually had the recognized authority to make those. Thankfully Adjutant was waiting there, seated in his wheelchair and dictating notes to three attendants in the green-and-grey livery that signified they were directly in his service. Two humans and one goblin, I noted, by the looks of it a young Soninke woman and an older Callowan man.

All three bore a discreet painted iron pin in the form of a curled skeletal hand pointing its index, the enchantment laid on it serving only to prove it was authentic. On the rolls these constantly-swelling ranks were called the adjunct secretariat, and their stated purpose was to serve as a mix of my personal bureaucracy and messengers. And while they did serve those purposes, and well, that was only the official part of their duties. In practice people had taken to calling the 'phalanges' after the pins, and they served as Hakram's eyes and hands.

Some of them had been invested with authority on my behalf, able to make inspections of Callowan and Grand Alliance property and soldiers to unearth treason and corruption, but there was also an entire armed wing that'd expanded out of the first tenth of legionaries I'd long ago put under Adjutant to ferret out Heiress' rats in the Fifteenth.

Grandmaster Talbot had approached me and expressed, in confidence, a degree of unease over 'the Adjutant's private army of soldiers, sneaks and scribes'. If he'd know that Hakram had heavily recruited from the parts of the Assassin's Guild that'd not been a good fit for the Jacks, I suspected he would have been outright worried. I'd appeased the commander of my knights by assuring him there were non-negotiable limits to the amount of coin dedicated to the adjunct secretariat, which would restrict its size permanently after a little more growth.

I got the sense Talbot had wanted some Callowan oversight over the phalanges, either through Vivienne or my Queen's Council – though the latter would have probably meant Vivienne also, given that my Council was currently in Laure and answering to Duchess Kegan – but that wasn't going to be happening. When I abdicated I'd be taking the phalanges with me to Cardinal, so I wasn't interested in giving Callow too deep a peek at their inner workings. If I wanted them to survive as a Cardinal institution, I couldn't let them slide into being just a chapter of the Jacks by another name.

The three phalanges saluted as I limped in, but I gestured for them to keep jotting down Hakram's orders as I made my way to my liquor cabinet and poured myself a celebratory finger of aragh. The copperstone munitions were worth a drink for more than me, I decided, so after a moment I poured a finger for Adjutant as well.

"- and have another look into Captain Garrick," Adjutant said. "That's twice now he's splashed coin around, we still don't know if it's inheritance or he's been taking bribes."

The goblin licked her lips, as the others nodded.

"And my own find?" she asked.

"The Jacks have been in touch, she's already one of their informants in the ranks and she warned them of the contact," Hakram said, sounding chagrined. "Start over with another company."

I sipped at my aragh, watching as he finished the last round of instructions and dismissed them. They saluted, first to me and then to him, and within moments we were left alone. I pressed the small cup into his only hand, the skeletal one Masego's father had crafted from him what felt like a lifetime ago. The orc – still so tall, even wheelchair-bound – let out an approving rumble. We clinked our glasses and drank.

“Pickler’s work proved worth all the mess?” he asked afterwards.

“And more,” I replied. “She managed to get Light-infused projectiles working for ballistas, though she has to tinker up both. Dips the stones in copper, which means they’ll be hard to make out on the campaign trail.”

Hakram’s eyes widened, his fangs clicking together thoughtfully.

“That is fine news indeed,” he said. “We only have enough goblin munitions stockpiled for one last campaign, even used sparingly, so a substitute is long overdue.”

More like two pitched battles than a whole campaign, in my opinion, and I wanted to keep a decent quantity at hand for when we moved on the capital so really more for one battle. Our initial hopes that the Confederation of the Grey Eyries would be able to push out the Matron who’d betrayed them, currently styled High Lady Wither of Foramen, out of said city had turned out to be... overly optimistic. Wither had little Legion support, but the Confederation’s armies weren’t the kind that could take a Praesi city except by surprise.

Which High Lady Wither wasn’t going to fall for, since she’d taken the city this way from both her predecessors the Banu and then the Confederation itself.

The Grey Eyries were hardly at risk of falling, since the traitor tribes couldn’t really afford to chance anything aside from a defence of their seized territories, but without control of Foramen the Confederation could no longer sell us goblin munitions. Some mountain routes had been opened but the quantities that could be taken through them were paltry and the Eyries themselves were full of creatures that preyed on goblins. We still got the occasional wagons from Callow, as much from old Legion caches as what the goblins got to us, but it wasn’t enough.

I’d forbidden use of munitions, lest attrition at the defensive line empty our stock long before a decisive battle could be fought.

“Agreed,” I said. “I ordered her to stock up as much as she can of both ballistas and copperstones, so she’ll need my seal and a Grand Alliance warrant.”

He nodded.

"It would be polite to inform the other commanders in advance, since she might requisition from them," Hakram reminded me. "No need for much, just a courtesy letter."

"I suppose," I muttered.

Might as well smooth the feathers before they ever got ruffled if it could be done. Bone fingers came to rest on the side of the wheelchair, clutching around the grip, and Adjutant wheeled himself to the side. Tried to, anyway – the left wheel got caught on a rock that'd bene pushed into the ground, and while the chair was too well-built to flip it did get stuck. Hakram grunted with effort as he tried to force it, but all it did was get the rock stuck between the wheel and the protective sheathing as earth sprayed. I stood paralyzed, wanting to help but certain he'd take it as an insult. He finally let go with a half-swallowed roar, the dead hand slamming down onto the arm of the wheelchair.

Hakram looked to the side, as if unwilling to face me.

"I can send back for secretaries," I delicately said.

Some part of me dimly suspected that my helping him instead would go over very poorly. It... wasn't how we did things. Never had been.

"No," Adjutant roughly said. "The seal and warrants are under lock, and there's none close that have the clearance to touch them."

"An exception can be made once," I tried. "While we are here."

His fingers clenched until even the enchanted wood under them creaked.

"I wrote those safety rules, Catherine," Hakram bit out. "I won't break them because of a fucking rock."

Quietly I drew on Night, wondering if I could slip a tendril near the chair and-

"Stop that," Adjutant sharply said.

Lips thinning, I released the power. I did neither of us the disservice or pretending I didn't know what he was talking about.

"It will be easier when the prosthetics come from the Arsenal," he tiredly said. "I'll be out of the chair, able to walk again. It will take longer to be able to fight but-"

"Hakram," I said.

"There are shields built for men with only one hand, Catherine," he told me. "I have looked into the matter. It will take training, but it can be done."

My heart clenched, but I couldn't just let him keep on telling himself that lie.

"Hakram," I quietly repeated, "you know it can't be like that. It's done, the old fights. Maybe in a few years you'll be able to handle soldiers, but not Named. Not for a long time, if ever again."

He'd have to make a fighting style nearly from scratch, learn to compensate for several glaring weaknesses while having few strengths to call on. It wasn't impossible, and men that had half his courage and discipline went back to fighting after losing a hand, but he'd lost a great deal more than that. Prosthetics relying on magic would make him brutally vulnerable to heroes that could wield Light, which was most of them, and a skilled mage without even a Name would be able to meddle with the enchantments on them.

"I will not be put out to pasture, Catherine," Hakram rasped out. "I won't allow it."

"I haven't stopped relying on you," I insisted. "You lost some aptitude in swinging around a stick with steel stuck onto it, that's all. If anything I'm running you too hard, considering you're recovering from severe wounds."

He studied me for a moment, dark eyes calm and all too knowing.

"You are closing the door," Adjutant said. "To my ever standing by your side in battle again."

I opened my mouth to argue, hadn't I just said that – but he raised his hand, and so I swallowed my tongue.

"Maybe not with words," Hakram said. "Or with deeds. But in the back of your head, you have."

My lips thinned. I'd never liked being told what it was that I was supposedly thinking, even coming from my closest friend in the world.

"You know my aspects," the orc tiredly said. "One felt mockery, when it sunk in what I had lost, but then I thought it might instead turn into a key."

Rampage, Find, Stand. The last must have felt like a bitter joke after losing his leg. With the way the Severance's cut had carved into his hipbone, he couldn't even try to get around on crutches – even with painkillers the pain was simply horrendous. Only surgical spells that deadened pain worked, and those could damage nerves if they were kept on for too long.

"But it hasn't," I said.

"It is fading," Hakram replied, then corrected himself. "No, perhaps not quite that drastic. Losing luster? Losing potency, certainly. As if there was no longer a call for me to use it, or a place where I would."

My stomach dropped. He was implying that I no longer thought of him as someone who'd fight by my side – and Gods, I had carefully kept the words out of my mouth but they were not untrue – so his Name, ever so bound to my service, was no longer trying to help him in that purpose. Even when he wanted it to. I drew back as if struck. It was only a theory, this, but Adjutant had good instincts. And it had that damning ring of truth to it.

"I haven't," I blurted. "I mean, I can't..."

I did not quite know what I was trying to say, and an odd shame was eating at me from the inside for it.

"I am not accusing you of malice," Adjutant spoke into my flustered silence. "Or trying to shame you. But you were not going to admit it unless told. And now that you know, perhaps if you shape your thoughts..."

I hesitantly nodded.

"I don't know if it would work," he admitted. "If it can. But what else is there but to try?"

Making peace with having lost something, I wanted to reply, but how could I? It was serving me he'd lost it, while I was getting clever playing shatranj with the Intercessor. Now I was looking at the consequences of my decision every day, and it was not a pretty thing to behold.

"You need a helper while we're out there," I forced out. "Someone who'll take care of little things for you and keep an eye out for enemies. Neshamah will come after you, he knows how important you are to the war."

And to me, which would have been enough for the Hidden Horror to aim for his head without all the other good reasons for it.

"I have my secretaries," Hakram replied. "Some of them have better grips on swords than quills."

"You need more than that," I said. "I've talked with the Silver Huntress and then with the girl herself: the Apprentice could be suborned to you for the offensive, to learn from you and lend a hand."

It'd been surreal looking at some slip of a girl from Ashur bearing Masego's Name, much less one who considered herself a heroine, but I'd managed. The Apprentice badly wanted a term of service in the Arsenal, and I'd offered it a bribe after this campaign if she accepted. She'd still get lessons from the Sage, it was the reason she was out here on the front in the first place, but the hours would have been cut while we were on war footing anyway so serving as Hakram's assistant would not be to her detriment.

It also put a skilled practitioner by his side during most of the day. The Apprentice had previously been studying with an eye to become the Silver Mage, one of the Ashuran wizardly mantles, but she'd abandoned the healing arts after most her teachers got killed during the sack of Smyrna. She'd picked up a lot of quick and cheap war magic since signing onto the Truce, and while her spellcasting was still pretty simple it was also swift and highly destructive. Nothing short of a Revenant ought to trouble her if she saw it coming.

"And what did it cost you to convince the girl?" the orc drily asked.

I shrugged. We both knew I wasn't above sweetening the pot for someone when it served my purposes. I could read him well enough to know that the offer wasn't making him happy, but he didn't refuse outright.

"I'll think about it," Hakram finally said. "That's all I can give you."

I bit my lip, tempted to push since I sensed he was leaning more towards accepting than refusing. If I gave him too much time to ponder, though, he might just talk himself out of it. I breathed out. Trust, I told myself. We weren't going to get through this intact without trust.

"Have an answer for me before we set out," I nodded. "I'll want to speak with the White Knight before making the final arrangements."

"I will," Adjutant gravelled, then hesitated.

He sagged into the seat, as if tension had drifted out of him.

"I'll take care of the warrant and seal," he said. "I only need one hand to fake your signature."

"I leave it in your hands, then," I said, then paused. "And Hakram?"

He turned darks eyes onto me.

"I love you," I said. "You know that, right?"

The orc breathed out.

"I know," he said.

I'd not asked for forgiveness and he'd not given it. It wasn't in me to ask, and he'd be insulted if I did. But it was something, to say the words. A paltry offering, I couldn't help but think as I left my tent, but what else did I have to give?

—

When the moon rose, it found me once more standing at the edge of the roof.

Summer heat had lingered even after dark, the breeze bringing the distant scent of the swamplands in the distance. Green and mud and life, all intertwined with something like sweet rot. I stood at the edge, letting the wind curl around me, and closed my eyes. I flinched in pain a moment later. Like nails driven into my temples. It wasn't an attack, I realized, but a Night-working. One I'd laid myself as a precaution two years back. I pulled back the string of it again, but left the working in place.

"The trick's not quite as good," I said, "once you know what to look for."

Her steps were quiet, but not so quiet I did not hear her deftly make her way down the tiles to stand at my side. First time I'd ever caught her out, wasn't it? My contingency must have triggered when I'd closed my eyes, prompted by a power I'd not noticed and had felt entirely like my own whim. What a dangerous aspect hers was.

"The same can be said of all tricks," the Scribe replied.

This, I suspected, was going to be an interesting talk.

Djinn o'Cyde

Go. Vote. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Alessandro Ussia

Done. Yet, I would have loved a snippet taken from the chapter. What can I say, I'm a fan of those.

Miles

I made a somewhat unkind comment about the sexual attraction the average sapper might feel towards a crate of munitions, which devolved the conversation into bickering all the rest of the way to where Pickler was holed up. A voting booth, I discovered, or at least the battered remnants of one.

NerfContessa

I wonder, praesi magic of the soul should be able to transfer hakram into another body easily.
Just get an Orc who is willing to sacrifice himself for. Honor of clan and deed, and you have Adjutant back.

Much less morally ambiguous than many a thing cat did.

ruduen

It looks like a reminder would be a good idea...

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

Targets had been blown through in ways experience allowed me to match with ballistas, but it'd been more than just stone that'd done this. The grounds and wooden targets were scorched, like they'd been set aflame. I frowned as I limped to the edge of the firing range, interested enough I didn't stop to chat with the sapper crews fielding the three ballistas on the range.

I knelt slowly, leaning on my staff, trailed my fingers against the charred wooden remains of a target. Bringing them close to my face, I clicked to vote and immediately let out a noise of surprise.

Javvies

Ooh, Scribe.
This should be interesting.

I expect we'll get an update on events in Praes from her.

I wonder what Scribe's been up to and why she's here now.

That's a very nifty breakthrough from Pickler. And badly needed. From the description, it sounds like while the copperstones aren't exactly cheap or particularly easy to make, and need quality control, they're not too complicated for mass production, insofar as mass production is a thing on Calernia.

Frivolous

Blessed Artificer will probably be furious that the copperstone was invented, not by her or any other hero, but by a goblin.

Shveiran

It seems furious is the Blessed Artificer's natural state of being.

SpeckofStardust

many effective weapons against the undead coming to work before a massive push? That's both good and bad.

Scribe ally or foe?

Death Knight

Heh imagine Scribe as one of Hakram's attendants. The sheer amount of logistical and paperwork that could be done...

Frivolous

Ugh, poor Hakram. Well, if anyone can force her own mind to change so that his Name is strengthened, nor weakened, it's Catherine. This is the same woman who as a girl mastered her fear of heights and of falling.

Also: Yay, finally the Scribe appears. Still unknown where Assassin is, though.

dadycoool

Mastered them by saying to herself "This? This thing you're doing? Stop it."

Liliet

This one is trickier than the fear of heights, I expect, because I'm not sure Catherine WANTS him to fight by her side at this point. She wants him safe. Any additional fight is one he might not come back from.

She had guilt issues already from his first crippling at Summerholm. She was able to laugh off his losing another hand because she wasn't around for it and it wasn't a result of her decisions – as a matter of fact, it could be said to be a consequence of her not being there, so she definitely wouldn't make things worse by keeping him close.

This? This is reopening old wounds. At this point Catherine might be unable to force herself to want him in fighting shape. She doesn't want to lose him.

Shveiran

You know what I find especially worrisome? That this has a tragic ending written all over it no matter what she does.

If she wills herself to see him as fightin-fit and it works, he will likely die in the fight.

If she doesn't, he will likely die all the same by a threat that the Apprentice is unable to overcome.

... I kind of want my Hakram back. This is really heart-wrenching.

KageLupus

I think that there is a middle ground to be found there. Hakram has always been equal parts admin and battle support. Cat has been mentally relegating him to just the first one since she doesn't want to see him get killed in battle.

But if she can think of him as her last-resort-support in a battle I think that could satisfy the narrative drive for his Stand aspect while not putting him in constant harm's way. Hakram would go from being Cat's shadow in a fight to being the thing you see when you know you fucked up. There would have to be some kind of resource limitation that would make fielding him all of the time impossible, but for short and specific fights he could manage.

There is even a potential narrative bump to going that route. It could give Stand a little more juice since Hakram would only use it in dire circumstances. Kind of like Cat getting a bonus against Choirs because she keeps beating them, Hakram would get some providence because the only time he joins the fight is when he has to tilt the scales. Do that enough and the scales get used to being tilted by him.

The end goal for Cat is to beat back the Dead King and then open up her Magical School for Named. As part of that she is obviously going to be relying on Hakram as her admin assistant. But there is no chance that occasionally Cat will have to put the Mantle back on and remind people why they feared the Black Queen in the first place. When she does that, being able to also temporarily empower Hakram for a single fight is going to be a huge boost. That is only going to work if the precedent is set now and the story has time to percolate and congeal.

Frivolous

I have faith in Catherine and her Callowan need for revenge.

The Bard instigated the series of events that led to the death of Nephele and the mutilation of Hakram. I don't think Catherine will allow guilt, of all things, keep her from achieving her vengeance.

And vengeance includes, in part, living well. Not just for herself but for Hakram. She'll demand that Creation gives her and her Woe a happy ending because she's so angry.

dadycoool

"Villains only get the bad endings? Well fuck you! We're going home when this is all said and done."

Liliet

Oh, I agree 😊

shikkarasu

"I have faith in Catherine and her Callowan need for revenge."

The Sisters would be proud. wipes away tear

FableWright

Komena, nooooo! We could have had the Lesser Lesser Footrest of the Night!

Wonder

I keep praying for all of Cat's old friends to get their own Names and move into Cardinal after the war.

Intercessor

oh no, Catherine's boutta get hit in the face with a fifty pound book.

(if u know the tome which im referencing specifically, thematic similarities and all, email me, ill paypal you $1500)

(fidencio.jiminez232@gmail.com)

Daniel E

Imma go out on a limb here and say "The Necronomicon Livre Des Morts".

dadycoool

Ha, we finally get back to our favorite goblins! Leave it to a goblin to figure out how to properly weaponize Light, especially the way the Legion would.

Oh, Hakram. This is actually a normal, healthy reaction to sudden loss of limbs, isn't it? It has to hurt to know in your bones that your Warlord will never call on you for battle again.

Oh, hi Scribe. Didn't even notice you there.

Frivolous

I wonder/hope that Catherine's impending Name and/or her new aspects allow her to heal or help Hakram.

I mean, aspects sometimes allow a Bestowed to blithely ignore many rules, right? Grey Pilgrim could resurrect the dead, and one time Catherine feared that Saint of Swords could cut the future. Hierarch could Mend the damage a Choir did to his body and also to the chair he sat on.

So it's not outside the realm of possibility that Catherine could develop an aspect that allows her to fix Hakram's injury and utterly negate the effect of the Severity, which was forged from the Saint's aspect. If Laurence could Sever, then maybe, hopefully, my dearest wish is that Catherine might Restore.

zenanii

I don't think this would ever happen for the same reason Catharina didn't remove the stone that was blocking Hakrams wheelchair.

Their relationship is one of master-servant, where Hakrams entire reason for existing is to enable Catharina. I don't think he would ever accept Catharina burning one of her aspects (remember, unformed aspects are trump cards for a free deus ex machina) just allow him to function again.

hakureireimu

Squire2!Cat obtained Take for a very specific purpose. That didn't prevent her from using it on other things.

Sir Nil

There is a way it could happen. Cat has been taking on the role of person who gives people the tools to fix their own problems. Drow democracy, villain alliances etc, I could see Catherine obtaining an aspect that won't fix Hakram outright, but give him the ability to do so himself.

Frivolous

Eh, Cat loves Hakram more than she loves anybody. She'd be very willing to burn an aspect to give him his missing pieces back.

Also, don't forget that Hakram isn't the only cripple in the Woe. If Cat can restore Hakram, she might be able to restore Masego, too.

Earl of Purple

Masego isn't broken. His eyes of summer and sorcery are, whilst vulnerable to tricks of Light, Night and magic are better than his old ones in many respects. He can see through his own head, in the dark, and magic.

Matthew Wells

Pretty sure Frivolous meant the damage the Dead King did to his soul that removed his natural magic supply.

Frivolous

Yep, that is indeed what I meant. And was it to Masego's soul? I thought the damage was physical, to his body.

That's one of the reasons why I believe Masego can be repaired, because the trauma was only physical. Though in the Guide-verse it seems trauma to souls can be fixed as well, since Amadeus's soul-ectomy was repaired by Akua. Still, the body should be easier to fix.

Matthew Wells

There hasn't been any mention of lasting physical damage to Masego, and we already know from Cat that corruption of the soul results in the loss of magical/Name-based powers. Also magic production is evidently not a biological process, since Undead can use it.

Frivolous

There is an episode somewhere where someone, possibly a doctor or Akua, discusses that the loss of magic is not metaphysical but a change to Masego's body.

But I can't find that damn episode. My searches aren't working.

Any help in this regard would be appreciated.

Matthew Wells

In Book 5 Chapter 55 Akua mentions that he is suffering a physical disorder as a result of losing his magic, causing him to go comatose, but she doesn't say whether the original injury from the Dead King was to his soul or his body.

Frivolous

Thanks.

But Seriously Folks

Hakram as played by Samuel L Jackson In the live action series – “I have had it with these motherf’n Break(s) on my montherf’n Name!”

Instant Emmy

Shveiran

Names can do that, but a Name fits the person.

Catherine isn’t a medic.

Whatever the Name is going to be, I doubt it helps with that. Sadly.

Frivolous

I was going to say that you, Shveiran, are correct, but then I remembered Hierarch. He has/had Mend, Receive, and Indict.

Anaxares was a diplomat and from Bellophoron, so I could understand Receive and Indict, but he wasn’t a carpenter, so I really couldn’t see the point or the relevance of Mend until the very end, when he was repairing his body and chair under the assault of the Seraphim.

Furthermore, while Cat might be resisting becoming the rival of the Intercessor, she has been the rival and dark mirror of the Grey Pilgrim. Staff wielder, leader, religious figure. And Tariq had Behold, Shine, and Forgive.

Plus Tariq has been a mentor and, by association, an educator. And Cat is going to run Cardinal, the university city of the Age of Order.

If that story and its trend continues, then Cat might get an aspect similar to Forgive.

Possible?

Matthew Wells

If she does, I’m betting on Pardon.

Shveiran

I mean, "Possible" I can grant with no difficulty. I have been surprised often enough to know my insight is very fallable.

I'd argue that it is not likely, however.

Yes, the Hierarch had mend, but he used mend to keep himself going in the face of overwhelming opposition that he still felt he should be able to face. It fit his character.

I'd have no beef with Cat getting an aspect that fixes herself after grievous harm, especially if it comes with a cost. Girl has always been a bleeder, after all.

But an aspect that fixes others? I don't see it, sorry. And besides, it's not really a thing that Villain Names do.

As for the Gray Pilgrim argument, again, it's not that you come out of nowhere but I'd say we are a bit late for that. Cat is much more than a Gray Pilgrim's mirror, these days, and grows farther from him constantly: she leads the villains and he no longer leads teh heroes, she is losing her homeland while he remains revered, he mentors while she doesn't etc.

They are similar, but that is not what defines her.

Likewise, she has been FUN for about three years now, and she is still Nameless. When she gets her Name, she won't just be a prophet, because otherwise she'd already have a Name, no? She has been Moses all this time, it's not like that is growing.

Also, again, the Night doesn't heal. The Sisters can do nearly anything, but Cat and the drows have never healed OTHERS, only themselves.

I'm not seeing it, personally.

But as I said, I could be wrong.

Frivolous

The aspect of Sacrifice might work. Cat has a history of self-mutilation. She could be willing to regrow Hakram's leg at the cost of one of her own. Even better if she can sacrifice someone else's leg.

I don't see how Cat using Night and being connected to Sve Noc has any bearing on her future Name and aspects. The two seem mostly separate to me. Cat isn't drow, and the Sisters listen to and respect Cat in part because she doesn't bow down to them or fear them.

It's true that healing is not a villainous thing, but there are known and recent exceptions. Sinister Physician, Concocter, .

burlindw

None of Cat's actions since her Name started reforming have been all that villainous. Originally, the reason she became a villain was because she was the Black Knight's Squire, but she stepped out of his shadow a while ago and her motivation has always been to help Callow. She is also currently in conflict with Below's two strongest players, Preas and Keter. Her strongest connection to Below is the Night and Sisters, but the Night was created with the intercession of the Bard, which means that it isn't impossible it was done with the tacit approval of Above (something we've seen happen with Cat's resurrection of the Pilgrim).

The difference between an anti-hero and a well-intentioned villain mostly comes down to perspective (lesser evil vs. greater good) and how successful they are. My theory is that Cat's new Name will be either neutral or anti-hero and tied to her creation of the Age of Order. If her Name is linked to order, then an aspect along the lines of Restore is likely and might be capable of healing, though likely with a steep price, since her usual way of restoring order is rather brutal.

I think her becoming a dark mirror of the Pilgrim is also likely, and doesn't conflict with her having a name tied to order. Both Cat and Tariq have done awful things but with different methods and philosophies (again, lesser evil vs. greater good). Cat will likely end up working from her seat of power in Cardinal, while the Pilgrim is a wanderer as well as the other parallels that have been mentioned so far.

On the subject of Cardinal, Cat (who is probably going to end up the de facto ruler of Cardinal regardless of what the treaties say) having a neutral name would go a long way to establishing Cardinal as a true neutral ground, which is her third largest goal behind beating Keter and protecting Callow.

Frivolous

Not likely that burlindw will ever see this, since it's almost time for an update, but:

Well said. I too think that Cat will have a neutral Name. Something like Peacemaker, or Pacifier, or Queen of War and Peace. Peace seems very likely to me to be part of her Name.

Mental Mouse

Fighting other servants of Below in no way invalidates Cat's own alignment with them! Even backstabbing the Gods Below themselves (by working with heroes and heroic tropes, and limiting the ambitions of so many villains) does that – remember that business of Sacred Betrayal?

Hierarch got Mend because by his maddened lights, the whole world around him was “broken”, with even the leaders of Bellerophon betraying their ideals on his behalf. Cat... actually could get something in similar vein. Perhaps... Build?

Mental Mouse

“) does that” -> “) doesn’t do that” (dammit WordPress)...

Zach

This isn’t going to happen because it would be bad for the story if it did (and I trust the author to not suddenly make the story bad).

Part of the reason this story is good is that it doesn’t lean into bad fan-service plot-beats (which is what Catherine being able to heal Hakram would be). There’s meaning to someone in Catherine’s inner circle having a genuine loss like this.

Frivolous

Considering Cat has come back from death twice and aspect mutilation once, I’m not sure what would be a bad fan-service plot-beat.

Or is it meaning-full only when she suffers and fixes her own genuine loss, but not the genuine loss of others she cares about?

Masego allowed Cat’s band of five to win against Neshamah and thus allowed Indrani to be resurrected, at the cost of his magic. Hakram cut off his hand to heal Vivienne’s doubts. Vivienne sacrificed her Name for Callow and to become Cat’s administrator and successor while Cat herself prosecutes the war. Indrani admitted she was in love with Masego in front of Tariq and Laurence, which convinced the two oldsters that she was the girl to save him.

Are those bad fan service plot-beats? Because it looks to me that the Woe has plenty of precedent saving each other.

Mental Mouse

Each of those involved, and in some cases resolved, a full plotline. Hakram’s crippling was itself the result of a demonic damage, which explicitly doesn’t respect plot – his survival, however, was provided by an ongoing plotline.

To restore Hakram, we're going to need a fresh plotline, probably involving growth and sacrifice from both Cat and Hakram. Inb4: The Mirror Knight is likely to be involved, learning that even crippled, Hakram remains worthy of respect.

jworks17

"It might even finally give us a way to deal with the Grey Legion that wasn't 'soldiers praying Akua, the Witch or me got there in time'. Even Hanno had found those fuckers a hard nut to crack."

So Akua is still powerful? We haven't seen her fight in quite some time and I assumed she was more of just a research mage.

Also every time Cat talks about Cardinal I get scared it isn't going to happen, it could be such an awesome story.

Konstantin von Karstein

Would Tariq not be efficient against them too?

jworks17

I would imagine, but maybe since the undead are a construct of sorcery, sorcerers can deal with them with greater effect? But then how is Cat useful? She uses Night not sorcery.

Konstantin von Karstein

Maybe it's a question of firepower? But in this case, why didn't she mentioned Tariq?

SpeckofStardust

He might not be on the front lines very often, finding Named and preventing plagues is very much a duty he'd be good at, further more he really seems to get his heroic arrivals when helping other named rather than common front line troops. And the only thing the three who did get mentioned have in common is large aoe (area of effect) which Tariq doesn't have.

Konstantin von Karstein

I agree with everything you say except the aoe. With Shine, Tariq has all the aoe he want. He destroyed the hundreds/thousands zombies attacking the Stalwart Apostle.

SpeckofStardust

When saving a hero yes, every other time its been limited, if powerful, pin-point attacks.

mamm0nn

Tariq's not on the front lines, he's been stated to walk around where the Oraphim guide him rather than fight alongside the others.

I personally think it's because active battle and enemy nations isn't his domain. He's not meant to save the young heroes and guide them when they go into the belly of the beast, only when they're still in their own camp. If the heroes wander into Praes and face a Warlock, they better not be green any more because Pilgrim won't show up there. Something that Black may have unknowingly exploited when he took Callow and turned those heroes-spawning grounds into ones where the Pilgrim didn't tread.

hakureireimu

She wouldn't be on the front line if she wasn't a war mage.

Liliet

Akua can draw on Night. Sounds like she's got a fair bit of allowance there.

And obviously if anyone can do a lot with a little, it's her.

I am in fact extremely curious of the technical details of how independent her control of Night is, whether she can hide things from Catherine, whether she can hide things from the Crows (theoretically possible if being Catherine's servant insulates her in a 'my vassal's vassal is not my vassal' way), whether Catherine can take away her powers, whether she's capable of surviving if Catherine dies, etc.

Darkening

Cat can strip drow chieftains of Night, I imagine she can do the same to Akua.

Liliet

Yeah, but can she do it automatically at any distance or can Akua sneak away / run away? Could Akua resist and stall for time?

Cap'n Smurfy

So Scribe's stealth trick is literally just making people close their eyes without realizing it? The simple brilliance of that suits her perfectly.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's not only that, it also make people (even the readers 😊) forget about her.

letouriste

i didn't tho. I wanted news about her since the start of this book

Liliet

Oh wow, that would be amazing if so.

But no, it can't be just that. First, Catherine DID notice closing her eyes, it was in her narration before the contingency triggered. There were times when Scribe went unnoticed when no such thing was happening.

Second, Scribe's influence also works in her absence, Amadeus had to snap Cat out of it that one time.

And third, remember when Loius the spymaster was literally talking to Scribe, looking at her, and couldn't remmeber anything beyond ink-stained fingers even literally WHILE looking at her?

Cap'n Smurfy

By not realizing it I mean they close their eyes without thinking they're being made it they don't notice that they've done it. Cat's contingency recognised she was being made to close her eyes when she herself didn't realise she was being artificially made to.

"My contingency must have triggered when I'd closed my eyes, prompted by a power I'd not noticed and had felt entirely like my own whim."

You have a point with Louis though. To expand on it I think Scibes ability is making people physically not observe her without realising it. Louis could only remember her hands not because she veiled it or made him forget but because he never actually looked at her face.

Burlyraven

The part of me that normally prefers heroic stories shudders at the idea of the goblins gaining access to Night, but the other parts really want to see what would happen.

Robber really needs a Name, but I think he's too submissive (in the way of goblins, anyway) for a villainous Name, and he's almost definitely not getting a heroic one. It just seems like he's too popular of a guy for him to just die of old age, even if that is quite the achievement for a male goblin.

Also adding Hakram to the list of things that could be fixed by Cat's Name coming into power. Much like a lot of things surrounding Cat, he's losing purpose and practically decaying while she can't or won't step into her Name.

Scribe showing up is interesting on multiple levels, but considering Ranger has been barred from joining the war effort in an official capacity, there seems to be a ready plot related reason for her presence.

Liliet

Neutral Roles do exist.

Robber's not enough of a specialist at any one thing to get a Name like that, so far, but in principle...

Darkening

The Saboteur lol? I dunno, he seems pretty proficient in setting traps and blowing things up, and then escaping by the skin of his teeth.

Liliet

There aren't really significant stories about him doing that though, and that's what it's all about with Names, isn't it? He seems to be an able commander more than personally able things-doer, in the grand scheme of things. He doesn't really stand out from his squad, he just leads it well.

Juff

Typo Thread:

fully open the door > the door fully open her both her > both her Buy you know > But you know a traileed > and traileed
All three bore (extra space before "All") calling the > calling them disservice or > disservice of it a bribe > it as a bribe most her > most of her darks eyes > dark eyes
Summer heat (extra space before "Summer")

TeK

Tis is way to depressive from my morning routine.

Oh, who am I kidding, it fits just right.

erebus42

Come now Komena you can't have your religion being too insular. Diversifying a bit with your followers can really only help a relatively new goddess like you and your sister. Sure you might have to give away some power but I'm sure the investment will pay itself off and then some. Just think about the terror and mayham that could be woven in your names by Night bestowed goblins! (perhaps they could be the equivalent of lay brothers and sisters). (Now I want a side story about the first non Drow clerics of Night.)

I always figured the drow and the goblins would get along as thick as thieves but now I'm curious about the other races and factions. Aside for their occasionaly malignant obsession with honor I always thought the Domion and the drow might be able to bond due to certain similarities between their cultures and mindsets.

But Seriously Folks

Infuse Hakram with Night. He could potentially become Adjutant to the Crows

308924810a

So, it occurs to me that the problem may be that they're thinking too small with these magical prostheses ideas.

Hakram doesn't need a prosthetic leg, he needs a prosthetic body. Do the same thing that happened to Black, cut his soul off, but rather than reattaching it, attach it to a different body.

The ethical conundrum is that you need to ask how Hakram stealing the body of some Orc volunteer or criminal to cure his condition is different to Killian sacrificing some criminal to cure her condition.

Maybe in that said body-donor can be switched into Hakram's crippled body? Or in the lack of the direct involvement of a sacrifice altar?

Matthew Wells

Masego could probably provide a soulless but living orc body if they give him a couple months and some casualties to study.

308924810a

Actually, new thought:

uhhh, are we sure that Masego won't betray them and take the Fae crown of godhood and invincibility for himself?

It would fulfill his core ambition, and while it would upset his friends, it's not like he could suffer any permanent personal consequence after becoming invincible , and he can patch things up with them later.

Javvies

Very.

Masego wants to earn godhood on his own ... and it seems likely that the Fae Crown of Autumn would carry limitations, and compulsions similar in nature to that of the Crown of Winter, which he studied extensively. And I expect that he isn't interested in limiting himself and his freedom of action and thought patterns in the way that taking up a Fae Crown likely would.

In addition, his interest is about learning enough about Creation in order to become a god, or the next best thing ... not just picking up a mantle of power stolen from a god.

Also, Masego isn't going to betray his friends of his own free will.

Plus, he knows that the Crown of Autumn is critical to Quartered Seasons, which is a method to permanently put an end to the Dead King. The Dead King, as you may remember, took over his body, and used his magic to kill Indrani, and then in the process of the Dead King being driven out of him, he lost his Gift. Masego probably holds a grudge about that whole series of events, and he's definitely not happy about it. And he's literally killed people over far lesser offenses.

Darkening

Yeah... remember when Masego boiled a couple people's blood for talking shit about Cat and Callow? He's killed for a lot less.

Frivolous

Masego's path to apotheosis is very clearly through increased knowledge and High Arcana, not through bothering with faerie crowns.

Not the least because it would require becoming fey.

But Seriously Folks

Maybe he will become an honorary elf...

Javvies

An honorary Elf?

You mean the ultra racist genocidal assholes?

The people who kill everyone except Heroes who come within bowshot of the Golden Bloom?

The people who only barely deigned to talk to Hanno when there was a second Hero running the magical support for the scrying conversation?

No, Masego might be interested in vivisecting an Elf, or other study, especially if he can get a good look at how they get to ignore a rule of Creation at a time. But he has no interest in becoming an honorary Elf, even if he could.

Frivolous

I hate how I keep having to remind myself that in the Guide to Practical Evil, elves and fae are not the same thing at all. Not even close.

Did we ever find out which one of them, or maybe both or neither, has the pointy ears?

Liliet

Masego could have claimed godhood for himself with a lot less trouble than that. He already knows how. This is a trick for pushing it on someone else specifically.

medailyfun

I wonder why Cat has not tried to push her soldiers into the vacant Names, like Squire or Apprentice. Should be totally doable with her experience and obvious Roles those ppl can fulfil.

Matthew Wells

Those two, at least are unavailable to her. Apprentice is already taken, and she's no longer capable of taking Black Knight, so she can't make a Squire. Probably another Knight could, but none of them are willing to accept the liability of grooming a successor before the ultimate showdown with the Dead King, for exactly the same reasons Cat didn't want to mentor the Scorched Apostate.

Shveiran

You don't need to be an apprentice to a Knight to become the Squire. Chider, the twins and the racist Taghreb were all in the run for Squire and they had no relationship to Black.

Hanno and Amadeus both didn't start off as the boy wonder of some older Knight, they did it on their own.

I'll grant that Catherine doesn't have a personal connection to the Squire Name like Amadeus did back in the day, but that doesn't mean she can't use story-fu to ease others into it or craft a situation where they are likely to pop out.

Matthew Wells

We were never told that Black didn't know Chider and the others. And Hanno and Amadeus got their names through terrible tragedies, so it would be a bad idea to replicate those circumstances, especially since the Dead King is already causing undead-slaying Names to pop up across the countryside.

Shveiran

Well, yes, we were never told he didn't know them but he certainly wasn't mentoring them? I feel like my point still stands.

As for tragedies... that's just how Names usually begin, don't they? It's not a Squire thing, it's a Named thing. I can't really recall a Named who didn't have a tragedy at the heart of its origin.

medailyfun

You don't need to be BK to lead someone towards Squire Name (just remember other claimants). All you need is the right person and right chain of events. Also mind that many Callowan Names are available atm.

Letouriste

Comments asking who is Scribe incomming! lol you know this is bound to be one somewhere.

Anyway, this chapter made me think about the sheer spread of concepts and ideas this story tackle on. Infirmary makes perfect sense in a story with as many wars but i realised most would still avoid it because of how hard this is to do right. Congratz EE, i think you nailed it 😊

Mental Mouse

I suspect that Hakram's path is not to restore the name of Adjutant, but to move onto a new name. The question is what sort of name that might be.

Shveiran

I don't know, Hakram has always been all about being Catherine's aide. Stepping into a Name that doesn't revolve around that feels forced, since his truth has not changed. Stepping into another Name that still revolves around that would feel ... cheap?

Frivolous

It's possible Adjutant is a transitional Name. Not likely, but still possible, given the lack of precedent.

But Seriously Folks

Majordomo?

Liliet

Oh hell yeah. SCRIBE SCRIBE SCRIBE SCRIBE SCRIBE!!! gleeful happy victory dance

I knew she'd be interested in working with Catherine after Amadeus kicked her out!

Oh, and the goblins are great as always ♥

What rest of the chapter?

ohJohN

> "...the Apprentice could be suborned to you for the offensive, to learn from you and lend a hand."

> We weren't going to get through this intact without trust.

> "I leave it in your hands, then."

jfc, Cat

Matthew Wells

If he hates the idea of her walking across a tent to accomodate his injuries, I'm pretty sure he doesn't want her to remove all hand-related imagery from her speech.

IDKWhoitis

Until proven otherwise, I am still under the assumption that Scribe = Assassin. Either in some sort of alter ego/name or the assassin is an entity that scribe controls through her name. It should be noted, that people close to Scribe always treated the two as separate entities, so either the 2nd hypothesis is true or Scribe kept that secret very well...

I doubt that Scribe is going to just be BFF with Cat or continue in her role of step mother to Cat. Likely this is an in-depth update of Amadeus/Praes for the next chapter.

I'm not sure how I feel about the abrupt transitions between 20 different things the past chapters have been. I know there's a lot to cover, but at the same time we don't need to know every bit...

Javvies

Assassin is male, who grew up in a cult of assassins.

Scribe is a woman who grew up in the Free Cities. And the Free Cities is where she met Amadeus.

They are two different people with two different Names. Scribe was present in Procer while Assassin was in Ashur.

Scribe's unnoticeability trick is an Aspect, and from the Viv-Thief origin, we know that Assassin has a shapeshifting/disguise Aspect.

Where the hell did this idea that Scribe and Asssassin are the same person even come from?

beleester

Because Scribe runs the Eyes of the Empire, and is known for "disappearing" problems, which sounds a lot like the job of an Assassin. And Assassin's "signature kills" are sometimes misdirection to hide his real location, so just because someone got assassinated doesn't mean it's certain that Assassin was there. And Assassin can come back after being killed, which suggests he could be a disposable summon or something.

Weighing against that, we know that Amadeus thinks that Scribe and Assassin are two different people – we've had interludes from his perspective saying as much, and it's hard to believe that his closest aide would keep that a secret from him. But even then, we've never actually seen Assassin on screen, only the results of his actions. When Amadeus gives an order to Assassin, it's not in person, it's by telling Scribe who he wants dead.

But I think the real reason people love this theory is that it just fits the character of the Calamities. Creating the persona of "The Assassin" as a diversion from the actual assassins they use, in the same way that the guys in cloaks with eye tattoos are a diversion from the actual Eyes.

Darkening

We've seen assassin twice, once in a Vivienne flashback, and once when akua stabbed him when he was being a stand in fir Black.

Matthew Wells

Correction: we've confirmed his presence twice. One time he was mostly invisible, and the other time he was under an illusion, so we've never actually SEEN him.

Javvies

It's stupid, is what it is.

Assassin usually prefers to make his kills look like accidents, often those that are improbable and that he finds entertaining.

For that matter, we have secondary confirmation from Wandering Bard that Assassin is an actual Named individual.

They've been Villains for 40+ years. That's not the kind of secret that gets kept with that many decades of Heroes and High Lords wanting to dig out information and drag them down. Especially not when Bard is poking around trying to end them.

Names only have three Aspects. Assassin has the disguise/shapeshifting Aspect and Scribe has the unnoticeability/forgettable Aspect.

If they're the same person, they'd have only one Aspect left

...

And non-Named assassins are not capable of the kinds of things that are attributed to Assassin.

We also have Scribe in Procer when Assassin is in Ashur.

Amadeus delegating sending messages to Assassin to Scribe isn't suggestive of anything, other than that it's kind of Scribe's Role. And that Scribe gets along with Assassin and/or is capable of delivering those messages a whole lot more discretely than Amadeus could in person. Remember ... Amadeus is/was the Black Knight, with who knows how many spies watching and tracking his every movement and as many of his spoken words as they could. Relaying messages to Assassin via Scribe is just good security sense. Both in terms of protecting Assassin's cover identities, and in terms of not tipping people off that Assassin has a new target who just might be them.

Anonymous

A little scary how Cat and Hakram's (emotional) relationship is resembling Malicia's and Black Knight's a little. -Skillsets reversed maybe, her the steel and him the subtle clout.

A thought that comes to mind regarding Named acceptance of standard reality in this world: "I recall Masego said something like that to you, once, and then you smashed his construct and made yourself Demigod Queen of Winter for a while instead..?"

Galileo

Well, I finally caught up after binge-reading for a month. It feels like an ending, somehow, but it looks like the best has yet to come. For stories never truly end.

On another note, it's quite interesting to see Scribe reappear just as Hakram loses his combat-related aspects and becomes a glorified scribe. One could draw conclusions.

heroessucklmao

A real villain would have made Robber sample every Proceran wine on top of his charge.

Chapter 50: Mores

"Villains often try to get clever, to stump me with philosophical questions like 'what is evil?' To which I answer 'generally, people asking me that question', which somehow they never see coming."

– Aldred Alban of Callow, the Prince Errant

The moon hung above us like a nasty grin, the drop was precipitously close and past the lights of the stronghold below there was only a dark and desolate stretch: a proper backdrop for ominous talks with a woman that was neither a friend nor an enemy. The Scribe had picked her moment and her place with care, I decided, to frame this conversation in the way she preferred. And what did we do, when an opponent expressed a preference?

"Eudokia," I warmly smiled. "How lovely to see you, it's been much too long. How have you been?"

That's right: slit open its throat and set the corpse aflame. Scribe showed no visible sign of surprise and what little I could see of her from the corner of my eye, ink-stained hands and//Gods Below and Everburning but I hated that fucking aspect. Even knowing about it the best I could do was work around the effect. Trying to remember anything about her was like clutching sand, with the same few grains left behind every time. Still, even though I might as well try to read emotion into a puff of mist the beat of silence that followed smacked of surprise to me.

"I have been well," Scribe said, then paused. "... and you?"

"Oh, you know, doing this and that," I drawled. "Been thinking about getting another pair of boots, since mine are a getting worn, but I like the leather better soft."

Befuddled silence in the face of my boot-talk – a real decision in need of making, actually, and one I'd be willing to hear her advice on – followed and I swallowed a grin. When I'd been a girl the Calamities had seemed like all powerful figures of legend, and by the time I'd learned better most of them had died. It was deeply satisfying for the kid I'd once been that the woman I now was could afford to screw with one of them like this.

"I approached you to speak on matters of grave import," Scribe said.

"It better not be the Dead King, then," I idly said. "I won't stand for puns, Eudokia. Debated making them illegal once, you know, but it was a little too Sanguinia the Second."

What a brave soul, that one. I too would outlaw being taller than me, if it wasn't certain to lead to the rebellion of an insultingly large portion of Callow. Aside from the deep satisfaction inherent to pulling the leg of someone I was on less than decent terms with, I did have a purpose to this. Scribe had spent a very long time in Black's shadow, hidden by its span but also protected. She'd been the monster in the night, or at least on its side, for so long she'd no longer be used to being toyed with.

That was going to piss her off, I was betting, and anger always made you sloppy. If she was running a game on me, why shouldn't I run one on her right back?

"Lack of discipline was always your greatest flaw," Scribe curtly replied. "I came in good faith-"

I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth.

"You came here to use me," I easily corrected. "And that's fine, so long as I also have a use for you. But don't pretend you're doing me favours, Eudokia. We both know coming here isn't your first choice."

A shot in the dark but one I was confident about. Black had decisively cut her loose from his service after learning she'd acted behind his back to ensure he would be forced to fight Malicia, and while I'd not forgotten the low he'd hit that night he wasn't one to walk back a decision so severe. At a guess, she'd tried to mend the bridge with him and been rebuffed. What interested me was what else she might have been up to in the meanwhile: it'd been two years since the Salian Peace.

If I'd been right about her relationship with my father remaining a wreck she didn't show it. With her first approach – the one lending her importance, I now grasped, making her seem if not like an equal then at least someone of power and influence – having stumbled, she smoothly pivoted to another.

"If you are not interested in the information I have to bring, then you need simply say so," Scribe said. "I can depart."

Transparent, but a ploy didn't have to be subtle to be effective. Likely she was well aware that the most I'd gotten out of the Wasteland was wild rumours and some of the ups and downs of the civil war between Malicia and Sepulchral. I was thirsting for news there, and she knew it. But she was after something too, wasn't she? Her first tack tonight had been one that leant her presence, weight, but that wasn't something she'd need if this was a simple transaction.

She wanted something from me, something that perhaps I wouldn't want to give. So she'd puffed up like a bird trying to look bigger for a predator and hoped it'd give me pause. That made it clear what my answer needed to be to her challenge.

"The closest gate is that way," I replied without hesitating, jutting a thumb west. "If you hurry you'll have enough of a head start the Pilgrim won't bother to pursue."

Tension hung in the air in the moment that followed. It'd been a tactical mistake to make a bluff I was willing to call so early in the game. Now there was no recovering her position. I turned a sharp, toothy grin onto the Scribe.

"Yeah," I murmured. "I didn't think so. So why you don't you tell me what you came here to say, only without all the empty posturing."

Anger. I could hardly even look at her, much less read her, but I felt anger wafting off Scribe's silhouette like smoke. Whether it was at me for being bluntly high-handed or at herself for the missteps I didn't know, and probably didn't matter. The gesture stiff, she reached into her robes and removed three small letters. She handed me the first and I opened the fold, scanning the contents. It was tradertalk – the eastern dialect of it, peppered with Aenian terms – excerpts with translations into Lower Miezani.

"Leo Trakas is dead and half Nicaea a ruin," I frowned. "The undead mentioned there, from Malicia's fleet?"

Originally the war fleet of Nicaea, but use of Still Waters had seen to that.

"To an extent," Scribe replied. "Supporters of Strategos Zenobia opened a gate in the night and let in her troops as well as a contingent of Helikeans under General Basilia herself. The conspirators promised them a bloodless victory, so when the wights attacked the Helikeans claimed treachery. In the chaos parts of the city were torched and sacked until Basilia restored order personally."

I hummed thoughtfully. The First Prince's diplomacy had borne fruit, then. I'd thought it drastic to condemn Leo Trakas as an ally of the Dead King, and only reluctantly voted in favour when the moment came, but Hasenbach had been right: it'd moved enough people to turn on him for the stalemate to turn in our favour without troops needing to be sent. Nicae falling wasn't only good news, though. Stygia had been quietly meddling to keep the wars within the League going, but with one of them settled the Magisterium might just come out swinging.

"So Zenobia's crowning herself a princess?" I snorted, reading the last excerpt. "That's new."

That came an intercepted Nicaean courier, so it probably reliable. It was also noted that several of the Trakas from lesser branches had escaped Zenobia's attempted purge of the family after the fall of the city, which was a Name in the making if I'd ever seen one. I found it mildly amusing that she'd discarded the title of Strategos for something more royal, but it wasn't of great import: the office had essentially ruled Nicae like a royal house for decades, and I had doubts she'd make bloodline inheritance stick. Royalty wasn't unknown in the Free Cities, Kairos himself had been king of-

I paused, then frowned.

"Basilia still hasn't crowned herself queen, has she?" I asked.

"She has not," Scribe confirmed.

Was she really that ambitious? Zenobia had been backed to the throne by General Basilia, but when she'd given herself a royal title it had only been that of princess. Why not queen, if she had royal ambitions?

"Fuck me," I murmured. "That's why Basilia doesn't care Stygia's an enemy, why she sent me all the letters making clear they're the provocative ones. She doesn't want to avoid that war at all, and she's not a queen only because she wants to be a bloody empress."

Empress Basilia the First, with her vassal Princess Zenobia of Nicae and whoever she'd end up installing as puppets after she toppled the Magisterium and finished off Penthes. I was impressed but also skeptical. She'd managed the politics of this well, since no one in the Free Cities could really ally with her enemies without siding with either Stygian aggression or Malicia's southern meddling, but the Spears of Stygia were a fine army and the Helikean host bloodied.

"If we survive Keter," I sighed, "the next great war will come out of some damned foolish thing in the Free Cities."

I took the second letter when it was offered to me. Tradertalk again, but this time towards the Ashuran end of the stick. I couldn't parse the High Tyrian any better than the Aenian, but at least I got the Mtethwa loanwords. We'd known for some time that Magon Hadast, the ruler of the Thalassocracy was dead, that was old news. Killed by Assassin, if the Augur was to be believed. Bitter disagreements had since kept Ashur from recovering from its defeats at League and Praesi hands, but the nature of those had been opaque to even Cordelia's spies abroad, the Circle of Thorns. Not so for Scribe's people, it seemed.

"So it's a glorified inheritance dispute," I bluntly said.

"The dignitaries in the two camps often divide their allegiances by provenance from Arwad or Smyrna," Scribe noted. "It speaks to a deeper divide in Ashuran society."

The Arwad committees mentioned tended to be from slightly lower tiers, I noted, and many sounded mercantile in nature. They were backing a distant relative of Magon Hadast for ascension to their highest citizenship tier by virtue of blood, since the main Hadast line had been extinguished. The man in question had married a noblewoman from Levant, though, which disqualified him in the eyes of the Smyrna crowd. They wanted instead to send a ship across the Tyrian Sea to import a ruler from Ashur's nominal overlord, the Baalite Hegemony.

So far the conflict had seen no battles, only skirmishing in streets and countryside, but by the looks of it positions were hardening on both sides. I could not help but note that by the sounds of it an awful lot of people with the last name Hadast had died not too long after good ol' Magon himself.

"Assassin's work?" I asked.

"Evidently, without orders he went... somewhat overboard," Scribe said. "He was caught and slain by the Blue Mage last year."

I rolled my eyes.

"And I'm sure this time it took," I drawled. "Pull the other one. Where is he?"

"I've not been in contact since he set out for Ashur," Scribe replied.

I eyed her skeptically but let it go. If I was to start digging at that particular secret, it wouldn't be in so haphazard a manner. Without a word I was handed the third letter. This time it was Lower Miezán, and a simple phrase 'the crown was obtained' along with a bell and day noted. I mastered my surprise, slowly folding the paper back. Fuck. I'd hoped we would keep the Eyes, if not entirely out of the Arsenal, then at least out of the most critical projects. I now had evidence otherwise.

"It went well?" I calmly said, as if this was not an unpleasant turn.

"I had no eyes at the location," Scribe said, "It was a scried report that was intercepted, and I expect it is making its way towards you as we speak. The ritual appears to have been a success and the nearby gate is still functional."

I pushed down the urge to snatch her by the throat and dangle her above the drop until I got names. It wouldn't accomplish anything, I reminded myself. Angering her was one thing, but an attack was another. I had no need to cement an enmity tonight. Not yet, anyway.

"You've made your point," I noted. "You know our allies better than we do, your people have access places where we don't and you have eyes even in the Grand Alliance's most guarded sanctum. Now that you've proved you have something to bargain with, what is it you want to bargain for?"

Scribe went silent for a moment.

"I wish to sign onto the Truce and Terms," she said.

I snorted, ignoring what I suspected was an unfriendly look my derision earned.

"There was no need for the song and dance to get that," I said. "And we both know signing won't open many doors for you."

The First Prince had not put a bounty on her head, but according to Vivienne she'd also put the matter of forbidding such a thing to the Highest Assembly and purposefully lost the vote. Both the Proceran House of Light and more than a few highborn wanted Scribe's head on a pike for the mess in Salia, and the Principate wouldn't stand for her gaining access to Grand Alliance secrets even as a signatory were I inclined to push for it. I was not.

"You picked a fight tonight aiming for something, Scribe," I continued. "So out with it."

She sighed.

"I was not picking a fight," the Webweaver replied. "I was making a bid for a position."

My brow rose and I almost laughed until I realized she was deadly serious. Gods Below, I thought, how badly had it gone with Black for her to come to me? We weren't exactly bosom friends, Eudokia and I. My reflex was to refuse her, and not politely, but I tamped down on it.

"I have questions," I mildly said.

"Understandable."

Interrogating one of the most skillful living spymistresses of Calernia would require skill and subtlety, I mused. Unfortunately I lacked those, so best swing the other way around entirely.

"What have you been doing for two years?" I bluntly asked.

"Fighting for control of the Eyes of the Empire," she frankly admitted. "I knew Ime would overtake me closer to Praes, so I concentrated on taking over the edges of the network and damaging records in the Wasteland so she wouldn't know what was lost. My agents were purged or suborned most places east of the Whitecaps, but elsewhere I have established control."

Fuck, I thought. That meant Malicia was firmly back in control of the Eyes in Callow, not exactly great news. Still, at least I'd gotten a list of imperial agents in my kingdom from Scribe as reparations during the negotiations for the Salian Peace. Duchess Kegan had sent the Watch to purge everyone on it when I'd passed it on, so at least the foothold of the Empire would be damaged. It also meant that the leader of the largest spy network on Calernia not directly in service of a crown was standing next to me. Worth a second look, that.

"If you're going to try to sell me you didn't reach out to Black, you'll need a better pitch," I noted.

I felt her breathe in even if I didn't see it.

"How casually you pick at the wounds of others," Scribe said. "Of course I sought him out, Catherine. I still have the scar from where Ranger's arrow took me. Half an inch to the side of the heart. She likes to think she's funny, you see."

I shared a moment of silent appreciation with her about just how much of an asshole the Lady of the Lake was. I suspected she didn't even have to try, it just came naturally to her.

"He was quite apologetic about the arrow," Scribe sighed. "But there would be no making amends."

I frowned. That... did not sound like Black. It was a half-done job, and he abhorred those. She was leaving things out. I said nothing, only cocking an eyebrow. Eudokia sighed again.

"He said he had done me wrong, by taking me into his service," Scribe murmured. "That his ambitions had devoured mine, and we'd both suffered for it."

I almost winced. That sounded more like my father, admittedly: genuine care, but handed out along with brutal honesty.

"He won't have left it at that," I encouraged.

"You must find your own way," Eudokia softly quoted, "your own ambition. And I hope that, when you have, one day our paths will lead us to standing side by side again."

I breathed out in surprise. That walked the fine line between kindness and cruelty. And now, having eked out as much of a victory as she could in the war for the rule of the Eyes, Scribe had come here. A colder part of me noted she'd missed Black's point entirely, if she'd come looking for another master to follow. But cold wasn't always right, was it? My Winter days had made that much exceedingly clear. And my father could preach whatever he wanted, but he wasn't the one making decisions for Scribe.

"You think we're going to head east, don't you?" I said.

I felt her smile.

"Or the east will come to you," she shrugged. "It makes no difference."

I thoughtfully hummed. I glanced down at the drop, leaning forward, and felt my stomach clench. There was a weight to the air tonight. Not a pivot, no. It wasn't enough for that. But this would... matter. Reverberate. I let the fear of the fall sink into me, clear away all idle thoughts. It was refreshing, in a way. And it made how the choice needed to be made crystal clear.

"Would you betray me to him, if the call came?" I asked.

"Probably," Scribe replied without batting an eye.

I smiled.

"Ah," I said, "but would you betray me to anyone else?"

She chuckled.

"What would they have to offer me?" the Webweaver asked.

"Good," I said.

I withdrew from the edge.

"I expect you in my tent at Morning Bell," I said. "I'll want a full report on the Praesi situation then. See Adjutant about signing onto the Terms and your assigned lodgings."

Her control wavered for a moment, overtaken by shock.

"You do not jest," Eudokia stated, sounding surprised.

I turned to her and gently smiled.

"I'm not seventeen anymore, Scribe," I said. "I'm already using people a lot more dangerous than you."

I turned my gaze back the night sky, the dismissal clear, and she quietly withdrew.

—

An hour before Morning Bell, my effective royal council these days sat around the sculpted table in my tent with steaming mugs in everyone's hands. It was early, so Indrani looked haggard even as she sipped at her Nicean blackleaf tea, liberally flavoured with honey. She'd been out drinking late, and though not hungover she was a little ragged. Hakram's own mug was filled with a fragrant gift of the First Prince – Hasenbach had noticed he enjoyed her abominably spicy brews and sent him a small coffer full of assorted leaves – and he'd deigned to share with Akua, who these days took more pleasure in scent than taste.

I'd stood on a rooftop like an ass for an hour last night, so unsurprisingly I was now drinking Masego's personal brew for pain and hoping my leg wouldn't swell too much.

"The Crows are keeping an eye out," I said, "so we can feel free to talk."

"Ominous," Indrani grunted. "What are we on about, Cat?"

"Hakram already knows some of it," I said, nodding at the orc. "Last night I was approached by Scribe."

Akua leaned back into her seat, looking interested,

"News from the Wasteland at last?" she said. "I had wondered at the continued silence from the Carrion Lord."

"Not exactly," I said.

"The Scribe has signed onto the Truce and Terms," Hakram said. "Or she would have, if I'd then passed on the parchments properly. They were mislaid."

No one here bothered to comment how unlikely it was for someone with Adjutant's quite literally supernatural organisational abilities to lose anything this important.

"You want to open her throat?" Indrani asked, sounding surprised. "Thought you were keeping a light touch with the east."

More like I couldn't afford to take a hard stance with the east, considering that most of Callow's armies were abroad and wouldn't be returning anytime soon. Vivienne and I had been clear with Kegan: there'd be no rolling over for the Tower, but neither should she go on the offensive. Considering the largest military force still in the kingdom was the Duchess of Daoine's own army, she'd not been hard to sell on that.

"Scribe requested a position under me," I informed them, though Hakram had already known. "No word was spoken of Callow in particular, and I suspect that she is a great deal more interested by my position in the Grand Alliance than my crown."

"So you want our advice on whether to accept?" Indrani mused.

Akua's golden eyes narrowed.

"She already has," dark-skinned shade said. "She is simply uncertain as to whether or not she meant it."

I raised my mug in a toast.

"In an hour, the Scribe will enter this tent to give us a report on the state of the Dread Empire," I said. "I want your opinion on, when she finishes, whether I should give her a position or slit her throat."

That got me some surprise, but I thought more at the bluntness of the statement than the morality inherent. I wasn't a fool, so there'd be no talk of keeping Scribe prisoner and extracting information out of her – she'd escape, sure as night, and be out for revenge. If I could not use her, could not employ her within the frame of the Terms, then she needed to die. Quickly, cleanly and without fuss. I let my words sink in for a moment, then glanced at Indrani with a cocked brow. She sipped at her tea a little longer, then snorted.

"Slice her," Archer frankly said. "She's too dangerous, and she'll never be loyal to you or anything you make. We can deal with that when it's a nobody villain, but she ain't one of those. She's got spies and gold and skeletons in people's closets – best she's taken off the board before you found your Cardinal. We don't really need her, anyway."

"One can never have too many spies, Indrani," Akua chided her.

"Come off it, Dressing Ghoul," Archer replied, rolling her eyes. "I'm not going to pretend the Jacks are the sharpest operation out there or that it's not awkward to rely on Procer for the goods, but what does more sneaks really do for us? It's useful, sure but it doesn't bring anything new to the table."

"According to the first reports she's fed us," Adjutant said, "she has eyes in Ashur. We yet lack those, and it is the same for the First Prince."

"Look," Indrani said, "I'm not trying to be an asshole here. I've got nothing against Scribe. But Ashur, really? When the fuck was the last time those guys mattered? It scratches our nosy itches to learn what happens there, but the poor bastards are out of the war. Who cares what goes on there? On the other hand, she's the godsdamned Scribe. You let her into something like the Terms and she'll be handling half our villains' money by the end of the year and reading the letters of the rest."

That was a fair point, I mentally noted. Scribe would take to the Terms and their intended successor, the Accords, much like a fish to water. That wasn't necessarily a good thing. Archer as underselling her value as an asset, though, in my opinion. Still, I'd decided before starting this talk that I'd hold my piece until I'd gotten the advice I asked for.

"The Carrion Lord ruled Callow for two decades without ever having a formal capital," Akua said. "I have been heiress to a High Seat and Imperial Governess, so believe me when I say that is deranged. That such a nomadic bureaucracy was even attempted is absurd, but that it worked is testament to the sheer use that can be had from someone like the Scribe."

"So she's real good at paperwork," Indrani said, sounding skeptical. "Hooray. We get us a shitty, untrustworthy Hakram. There's a coup worth the trouble, Gauzy Ghost."

"We have not yet identified through what agent the Wandering Bard managed to incite the Mirror Knight and his allies to head for the Arsenal," Akua pointed out. "The Jacks don't have the formation to attempt an investigation like this, and the heroes have produced no results on their own. That is already a use for the Scribe, and hardly the only one there is."

"She's expressed enmity for the Intercessor before," Hakram gravelled. "I'd agree we can rely on her against a common enemy, at least."

"Look," Indrani sighed, "I'm not going to argue for an hour we need to open her throat. It's starting to feel like I'm going after her, when I don't particularly want her dead. You wanted my opinion, Cat, and you got it: she's a risk, and I don't see what she brings to the table that warrants taking it."

I slowly nodded, drinking of my herbal brew, then turned an expectant gaze onto Akua.

"Killing her would be unwise," Akua said. "For one, it would have consequences: villains would hesitate to sign onto the Terms, if they knew being snuffed out was a possibility should they be judged unfit."

"The Scribe attempted to infiltrate our camp before the offensive and resisted when caught," Adjutant mildly said. "We had no choice but to kill her. In can have every written evidence otherwise burned within a quarter hour and she's only dealt in person with the adjunct secretariat. Secrecy is possible."

"Hasenbach isn't going to argue with her corpse, that's for sure," Indrani snorted. "She's dreamed of seeing it often enough. The Highest Assembly might even throw us a parade."

"The Dominion has no reason to care," Hakram added. "And even less to investigate. Praesi villainy is largely seen as our backyard, and ours to deal with as we see fit."

"The Terms are a covenant of Named, not nations," Akua replied. "Belief in it has already been undermined by the second trial of the Red Axe and the prior wave of betrayals in the Arsenal. Further fraying the fabric of it without a decent motive, which I have yet to hear, would be irresponsible."

"She has a significant portion of the Eyes, Akua," Adjutant calmly said. "And we have no real understanding of what she wants, or what loyalties she keeps. Her Name will thrive in the environment of both the Terms and the Accords – practically speaking, she represents an immediate threat because she is a way for villains to gain and consolidate power that we have no control over."

"She did not approach as a contender for influence, Hakram," Akua said. "She requested a position under Catherine. Scribe can and should be considered a potential threat, but those are thin grounds to kill on. Even more so when those very same qualities that make her a threat also make her a potential asset of great worth."

Which wasn't wrong. Unlike Akua, I'd actually ruled Callow. She significantly underestimated how difficult it had been for Black to rule the kingdom on the move, even with the imperial governors handling most local matters. It was telling that our most comprehensive record of Callowan laws and noble privileges wasn't the old Fairfax records that'd survived the Conquest but a neat set of manuscripts titled with the numbers I to VI in Scribe's personal handwriting. She'd put together the records of half a hundred families and the House of Light so well that even Kegan, who despised everything Praesi, was in favour of having the books copied and used to govern.

"Thought you'd be all about strangling the viper before it could bite, Akua, I'm not gonna lie," Archer frowned. "This isn't about how we picked you up, is it? Because that's not the same at all. Look, you were a bloody horror back in the day and our resident Callowans are still going to scrape you raw for it – but you're not like Scribe."

She leaned forward, earnest.

"We wouldn't off you like that," Indrani assured her. "It's been a few years since we got past that. Hells, I'd probably miss you some if you got your ass exorcised."

Coming from Indrani that was actually a pretty warm endorsement.

"While I am touched, Archer," Akua drily replied, "I am not so confused or sentimental."

"Refraining from killing her out of fear of it being outed is acting on sentiment," Adjutant gravelled. "If not in the sense you implied."

"So is acting to kill Scribe out fear of what she might do," she replied without batting an eye. "We do not know her desires, what of it? Few allies are so helpful as to tell us these outright, and we have other Named just as dangerous in our menagerie of the damned."

"If we come in conflict with the Carrion Lord, or he is made hostage-" Hakram began.

"- would we not act in accord with the man regardless, or seek to free him?" Akua interrupted. "Let us not pretend we seek enmity with the Carrion Lord, or that in his own way he is not a reasonable man. Was he not our candidate for the Tower, once upon a time? The scheme might have faltered, but the underpinnings of it remain unchanged."

Which was a solid point, and a reason I'd been willing to consider taking on Scribe in the first place: what did I care if she'd betray me to Black, if I never got in conflict with him? Eudokia wanted nothing to do with either the Dead King or Malicia, my two most prominent enemies, which was a major point in her favour. Unfortunately while I agreed with Akua that she was a very capable woman, that only made it worse that I also agreed with Hakram: we knew fuck all about what Scribe wanted, and with that in mind I was very wary of letting her loose into the Truce and Terms.

I wasn't worried about sabotage, if so she'd already be dead. But I was letting a fox into the henhouse, there were no two ways about it.

"Let's not pretend we can take her in and not use her," Indrani pointed out. "We take her, she's not going to be a messenger girl: it'd be dangerous to use her like that, spit on what her Name's worth. I don't think it's much, but it's definitely more than that."

"Her resources could be used in Mercantis to combat Malicia's influence," Akua said, speaking directly to me. "To hunt the Intercessor's agents, to help provide the Arsenal with exotic assets, and that is only the use of what she leads. As a Named, she can smooth essentially any task she is assigned to. Are we not ever drowning in disasters?"

Archer eyed her with surprise, as if she couldn't believe would care enough about this to speak this vehemently. I was a little surprised myself, to be honest. The Calamities had long been her enemies, and she had no reason to love Scribe,

"If she does become what was described as a threat," Akua continued, "That is, a banker and facilitator for villains, imagine how useful she would be as such a broker yet in your service! It would be wasteful to kill her, Catherine. Consider whether the Accords you envision, the Cardinal you would build, can really thrive if you are afraid of letting in talent."

That... was another good point, actually. The counter-argument came easy, that the Accords were years in the future while taking in Scribe was a risk in the present, but that last tirade should have weight on the scales. I'd heard from the other two, so my gaze moved on to Hakram. He'd already served as a goad for the other two, so he was due to actually speak his own mind.

"On purely practical grounds we should kill her," Adjutant calmly said. "Her death would leave a large segment of the Eyes leaderless and easy to pick off for the Circle of Thorns. She would undeniably be useful if properly employed, but that would involve giving her access to our inner workings while she's not been proved to be trustworthy."

I'd argue it was debatable how much access she really needed to be given, if she'd learned about some details of godsdamned Quartered Seasons on her own, but otherwise his points stood. I cocked an eyebrow, as we both knew he wasn't done.

"No one here is a saint, Cat," Hakram said. "I won't pretend we're above slitting her throat and disposing of the body, or that showing kindness will make her one of us – she already has a home, a cause. But I hear us talk, sometimes, and wonder how often our words have been spoken."

He bared a hint of fangs, teeth like white knives.

"If Dread Empresses have not sat with their Chancellors and Knights, with their Warlocks, they too deciding that someone needed to die just so they could rest a little easier," Adjutant gravelled. "Did we fight all these years, Warlord, so that we could be just another spoke in the same old wheel?"

I'd been an idealist as a girl, hadn't I? In my own way. Gods, I hardly remembered what that felt like. Too many compromises since, too many ugly choices, and I knew deep down that following principle once would mean nothing. Change nothing. But I looked at Hakram of the Howling Wolves, crippled in his wheelchair because of an ugly choice I had made, and found I could not argue with him. Not for guilt, though that would stay with me until I died, but because he was a reminder of a simple truth: this had to be about more than just winning.

If it wasn't, it would all end as I stood victorious in the ruins of the world.

And so when Scribe stood before us, come Morning Bell, I tossed her a small painted iron pin, in the shape of a curled skeletal hand pointing a finger.

"Congratulations, Scribe," I said. "You are now officially a member of the adjunct secretariat."

Slowly she nodded.

"Good," I smiled. "Now report."

Javvies

That's a terrifying level of penetration into the Arsenal. Hopefully Scribe is correct in best belief in the completeness of her control over the Eyes outside the sections still in control of the Tower.

Heh, Scribe signing onto the Truce and Terms and taking a job with Cat and Hakram is going ruffle some feathers in Salia and among the Heroes.

On the other hand ... there may be carry on effects to Hakram's Name.

And, yeah, Hakram's got a point – they started out wanting to be better, and killing Scribe over what she might do or to make things easier/more convenient for them is very much the kind of thing they* didn't want to continue.

*Meaning the Woe, maybe not Akua.

Poetically Psychotic

Also, killing a Named that came to you for reasons of convenience... could reverberate in Cat's new Name.

Liliet

I'll note Akua argued vehemently in favor of letting Scribe stay, with some of the arguments bordering on principle – "what are we even doing if we're not taking in talent".

It's very much possible that Akua feels it too, even if she's far from articulating the sentiment and standing by it.

onedollargum

It gives Akua a chance to play off of a colleague- someone under Hakram instead of Cat directly. Matching wits with the Webweaver is very much in line with "Iron sharpens Iron", and Akua might be feeling a little blunted after having the the Good Guys put her down.

Liliet

Akua has told both Cat and Ivah on separate occasions that 'iron is brittle' and 'she has grown tired of iron'.

It's up in the air how much of her old habits is covered by that, but I genuinely think that wasn't one of the motives involved here. Cat even noted she was unusually passionate about this.

naturalnuke

Fuck am I glad Cat managed to keep Hakram alive, he, the orc, is the acting conscious of the group and I love it.

ALM

Okay, was anyone else expecting Scribe to be in there the whole time while they were discussing her fate?

Konstantin von Karstein

Sve Noc herself was watching for her, so I doubt she managed it.

hakureireimu

The Crows were watching. Presumably they could have stopped that.

RoflCat

Doubtful, since Night was able to pick up her sneaking aspect and Cat was able to notice the Shiraori (I'm A Spider, So What?) power of blocking recognition.

And now we have the Sisters making sure nobody could eavesdrop on the conversation.

That said it's probably within her expectations that Cat might just kill her, and despite all that Scribe was still desperate enough to find the 'answer' to returning to Black's side to come here.

doominator10

Was not expecting that referenced here.

Christian Oaks

For those who didnt get it?

Darkening

I believe they're referring to the So I'm a spider, so what? title drop.

RoflCat

In the series mentioned, the character Shiraori, an arachne btw, weave a magic around herself that prevent people from noticing details about her and generally just think of her as 'white' (her hair/clothing color, and yes her cloth are made via her own threads)

Since it's akin to how Scribe's aspect work, I made the reference.

wabbitking

"the next great war will come out of some damned foolish thing in the Free Cities."

Paraphrasing Bismark I see, a nice surprise.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, I saw it too 😊

caoimhinh

I didn't get that reference, but that's cool.

For me, it was an echo of Catherine's conversation with Amadeus back in Procer when she was making her sales pitch for the Accords. She outright admitted to him that she expected the Grand Alliance to be at war with the Free Cities in the coming decade or two. This is just one more piece on the scales leaning towards that future.

Liliet

Definitely both 😊

ninegardens

Huh...

That was well played.
Having all the arguing about the usefulness or danger of Scribe, and then cleanly cutting it off: Her usefulness was never the point. She's a living person, killing her in cold blood would be wrong.

dadycool

Is that what Hakram was getting at? "We're not them. We need to be better."?

ninegardens

Yip. At least, according to my read, that's what he was aiming for.

'Ladi Williams

That's exactly what hakram was going for. It doesn't matter what use she can be put to. She has done us no immediate wrong and she came I supposedly good faith. It is wrong to kill her and we should be better than this.

samshadar

Yes. That's pretty much it.

Liliet

I don't think "living person" was a sufficient argument, but "a willing recruit" – yeah.

KageLupus

Close, but I do disagree. I don't think the problem is killing her in cold blood. Cat and the Woe would do that without blinking an eye if it were truly necessary. The point I think Hakram is making is that in this case it isn't truly necessary.

Killing someone because you have to to make the world a better place is Cat's MO. Killing someone because it would be slightly more convenient for you is the stuff of Dread Empresses. Cat has already decided she isn't walking that path so why go through their motions?

IDKWhoitis

For the new young bloods, hearing a Calamity signed the Truce is going to invoke one of three reactions.

1. Shit, things are getting serious
2. I wonder what I can trade for a favor...
3. Are they weakened? Can I up my cred by picking a fight?

I'm now imagining the next villain meeting. Cat at the head of the table, 'Rani on her right, Scribe to her left, and the poor villains wondering which one of the two would be the least awful to piss off... Because while Archer can beat some sense into someone, the whole prospect of getting disappeared and waking up in a casket is a different level of horror.

Liliet

Scribe isn't going to be at Catherine's left hand, she's explicitly subordinated to Hakram, that's his place.

Scribe is going to be taking notes at a separate table, and no-one will notice that.

jamesc9

Until they do something that deserves her most special attention, and then they'll notice far too late to do anything about it.

Liliet

They might never know, depending on the exact flavor of playing with her prey she decides to go for.

Salt

I don't think most Named outside of Praes even fully understand how dangerous she is, tbh. She wasn't an official member of the Calamities, and when Catherine met her for the first time she didn't even realize Scribe was Named until Black gave it away.

Most likely it'll be a small fuss, quickly followed by Scribe being mostly forgotten about, after appearing to do absolutely nothing noteworthy at all and holding no publicly visible position, especially with Hainaut looming over the horizon to distract everyone.

Most of her actual achievements will probably get attributed to Hakram, by operating as a member of the secretariat, so she can effectively act as an invisible walking sucker punch.

Letouriste

i thought Scribe didn't count as a Calamity?

dadycoool

Oh, boy. Now she's got the secretary to end all other secretaries under her authority. Technically that could be Harkram, but he'd have to find out about them first. Scribe would already know about them all.

Tolack

Thanks for the chapter. I'm glad Hakram reminded Cat that there's an idealist somewhere inside her that doesn't want to kill people on a maybe. More so when I agree that the chance of conflict with Black is so insignificant that the bonuses from recruiting Scribe will be so very worthwhile.

Konstantin von Karstein

This is a mistake, she should have kill Scribe. They know nothing about what she want, and it's the woman who would have destroy the Principate in the middle of a war against the DK.

On another subject, Ashur seems to have a Silver Mage, a Blue Mage and a Red Mage. I see a pattern there... From last chapter we know Silver is a healer, so is Blue an hydromancer?

RoflCat

I don't think it's that hard to guess though?

It's Black, or rather to return to 'the place she belongs' by his side.

Losing her place hit her HARD, even so when it was Black himself who cut the tie.

But her last talk with Black have given her...something.

On one hand, he clearly said that it's possible for them to be side by side again.

On the other hand, he's quite clear that who she is right now is NOT the one he will stand with.

But after having basically removed all her other desires, working towards the ideal 'machine' to run with his (that's likely what Black meant by his ambitions devoured hers), Scribe have no idea how to be a 'person' again, or at least one that Black will accept back.

So I think Scribe's intention of being under Catherine is probably after both Catherine and Hakram. Catherine for being the one who... 'humanized' Akua from the Praesi she was. And Hakram for being a near mirror to who she is, but clearly with his own ambitions.

ninegardens

That's also the fact that Cat stabbed Black and said "Come back when you you are a better person"
If Scribe blames Cat for this change... she may also credit her with being capable of making HER a better person in Black's eyes.

Liliet

Assuming Black told her about that.

Scribe was specifically not present for that exchange.

jamesc9

I'm not sure that there is any particular thing that I would bet on Scribe not knowing.

Liliet

Scribe didn't know a lot of things, judging by her behavior towards Catherine.

Scribe has NOT been in top ten of "characters most able at reaching their actual ultimate goals through their actions" of PGTE, I'm just saying. Not even top twenty.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I would argue that they know exactly what she wants: be with Amadeus again. And let's not forget that the mess in Salia started as a countermeasure to save Amadeus. She is a member of a Band of Named, willing to go any distance for her leader, just like Hakram would do anything for Catherine or Indrani would have caused a slaughter and ruin the Grand Alliance if Pilgrim killed Masego.

I would say that so long as Catherine doesn't act against Amadeus, they have a strong, loyal(ish) and extremely useful asset, we all know that Amadeus would rather die than go against Catherine, since he loves her as a daughter and sees his legacy on her, trusting her to make a better world than the one he was building. And Catherine won't go against Amadeus because she loves him as a father and sees him as the man that can put order in the East, the model of reasonable villains of great power, and the man who set the foundations for the new era by being a paragon of Pragmatic Villainy.

As for the Blue Mage, I was thinking of rather than a Hydromancer, more of a Final Fantasy type of Blue Mage: Sort of "spell thief" that adopts abilities from a wide range of monsters that they fight against. A Blue Mage in Final Fantasy will be able to copy the Skills of monsters/enemies either by witnessing them used or by receiving the attack. In the game, they are very useful because they can use abilities that are otherwise exclusive to enemies.

Liliet

A Hydromancer sounds very much like an Ashuran kind of Name though.

And yeah, Catherine and Amadeus are very close to the same entity politically. They have both taken turns aiming to put each other in charge of the stuff they don't want to deal with personally. Catherine is Amadeus's greatest success, and Scribe should understand that by now.

I think she does, and that is why she came.

Konstantin von Karstein

We already have 2 spell thieves with Roland and Masego, so a third would be much. Also, the Red (associated with fire) Mage was a pyromancer, so I think it's likely the Blue one is an hydromancer.

caoimhinh

It's not necessarily much, since the way their powers work are different and the way they use their magic is way different. Roland and Masego are completely different styles of practitioners, and the way they steal magic (and then re-use it) is completely different too.

The theft of power is also not exclusive to mage Named. For example, Catherine can loot Aspects from corpses through Night, could do so as Squire through Take, and implied that she could through the use of Winter as Sovereign of Moonless Nights, while both the Rapacious Troubadour and the Headhunter can steal power from their killed victims.

We also have White Knight, Black Knight, and Red Knight; but that doesn't make it too much, at least in my opinion. Blue Mage could be a Hydromancer, but we shouldn't rule out any possibility, right? I just meant that a FF-type of Blue Mage was what came to my mind when I read the Name, and I think that given the variety of abilities such a practitioner would have, it would help them to beat Assassin, who is by definition a very sneaky fellow.

Cicero

Perhaps it is a mistake, but I think it is a mistake worth making.

Miles

Hydromancer would be called Black Queen.

Blue mage copies monster abilities.

ethericsentinel

The word you're looking for is Lakeomancer.

Javvies

That's just one interpretation of "Blue Magic". And "copying monster abilities" doesn't really fit the Guideverse, IMO.

Another, equally valid one is that Blue Magic is primarily mental magics, various forms of illusions and similar magics. Which is probably more consistent with the established setting.

Or something along the lines of Magic: The Gathering's Blue Magic, which is a lot ... broader. Though would likely fit into the guideverse reasonably well.

Mental Mouse

Another metamagician would be Scary enough that he could believably have put a true end to Assassin, especially since the Calamities' banner has fallen.

Remember that the Calamities in general have run out of their common story, and both Captain and Warlock died of that. Hye evaded that by bowing out of the Calamities as soon as the Conquest was done, and Amadeus picked up an entirely new story (which Hye has signed onto).

Zach

The point Hakram was making is that it's a slippery slope once you start justifying killing people on the basis of them possibly being a threat later. It would be one thing if it were in response to Scribe being hostile to them, but that hasn't been the case since the war started.

Also, I would be willing to wager that, if they killed her, the truth of the situation would get out somehow (and be a huge threat to the Truce and Terms if it did).

Burlyraven

Honestly, as much as I'm usually in favor of giving everyone a chance in stories (if just to see what chaos follows), I was on team cutthroat, consequences be damned. Scribe was too much of a wildcard before being abandoned by her master, and now she's a wounded beast trying to get back in his graces by any means necessary.

Plus, it sets up redundancy on Hakram, putting Scribe this close to things. He's already weakened and losing half his power, so – intentionally or not – Scribe's presence is going to eat away at what's left. The fact that Hakram spoke in her defense has me wondering if he might be trying to commit suicide by story.

Tirielle

I actually wonder at the story logic here – I agree that Scribe makes Hakram rather redundant, but maybe that's what he's aiming for. His role is to be what Cat needs – if she no longer needs him as a scribe, maybe he can ride that into standing by her side in battle again.

Thorium

While they are both administrators and secretaries, Hakram's main Role was always Cat's trusted second. Scribe won't be interfering with what is at the core of his Name by being a spymistress for Cat.

Liliet

Vivienne was the spymaster, not Hakram. That was never his role.

Ratface, then Vivienne, then still Vivienne because they didn't have anyone else even though Vivienne was also the heiress.

This is Scribe filling in a convenient vacuum right under Vivi, not making a bid for anyone's place.

Cicero

It's also preparation for when Cat abdicates, as the Jacks will remain Callow's intelligence agency.

Scribe can become part of Cardinal's power structure instead.

Liliet

Oh yeah, def

ninegardens

Scribe in Cardinal? I am so hype for that.

Morgenstern

.. and if it were different bc. of Hakram's role as spymaster in Cat's future plans for Cardinal, then this plays right into what we learned about Hakram's actual own wishes only one chapter ago: He wants his Name to give him back his battle ability to STAND besides Cat, not be that spymaster he only became because she needed someone to fill that position and he just scoops up any function she needs as her Adjutant. But what he wants to be is NOT a glorified secretary, obviously, no matter how much he seems capable enough to do the job of one. He just asked Cat to stop thinking of his future with her as the man behind the desk, start thinking of him as her shield again.

Juff

Typo Thread:

are a getting > are getting presence, weight, > presence weight, That came an > That came from an it probably > it was probably said, "It > said. "It access places > access to places back the night > back to the night has," dark > has," the dark Archer as > Archer was the formation (is this correct?)
In can have > I can have believe would > believe Akua would

caoimhinh

Whether it was at me for being bluntly high-handed or at herself for the missteps I didn't know, and probably didn't matter.

Should be: Whether it was at me for being bluntly high-handed or at herself for the missteps, I didn't know and it probably didn't matter.

Liliet

I think it works.

Tom

> The man in question had married a noblewoman woman

Not to be confused with a noblewoman man

Hakram's Dead Hand

I think it would be hilarious if Assassin truly was dead this time, and both the people in the story and us keep pointing at corpses and being like "Could Assassin have done this???" When he's been dead for years.

mamm0nn

I'm still wondering "Might this be Emperor Traitorous in disguise?" with every new character we're introduced to.

sengachi

If another faceless Assassin rose up and took the mantle, would we even have any way of knowing it was a new person?

Peach

Wait, did Cat just quote Bismarck?

Liliet

HELL YEAH

This is the best reason to take her. The best tiebreaker: ultimately, it's just not what they DO, killing people after agreeing to take them in. It's not a habit they'll be getting into.

Also, she's one of the few people left that Amadeus cares about, that's also a thing. Nobody mentioned that explicitly as an argument, but Cat would feel like shit afterwards if she'd ignored that.

But that can be secondary to the tiebreaker of "let's just not".

Also, also, also.

I CALLED THIS AT THE END OF LAST BOOK.

I said coming to Catherine would be Scribe's reasonable next move, and taking her in would be Catherine's reasonable next move!

Scribe took two years to get her house in order first, and Catherine deliberated first, but ultimately, I CALLED THIS HELL YEAH I LOVE THIS

I just really love the consolidation of forces :3

Cold Cyberia

This is a perfect opportunity to strengthen the Accords. If Scribe's new "master" isn't Black or Cat, but rather the idea of the Accords along with the new world order, it would smooth out the process a lot.

Liliet

Scribe isn't really an idea kind of person. That's kind of the entire problem with her and Black.

There's potential there, though. It can be Cat at first but then if she gets into it Cat probably can eventually, in Cardinal, leave increasingly more issues to her personal discretion...

jamesc9

If Scribe is coming to Cat to be made into a better person, can that include being a person who follows an ideal, relative to following a person?

Liliet

I am pretty sure Scribe is coming to Cat as a second-rate washed out "working for Amadeus", not to be a better person. That didn't even feature in the conversation.

Zengar

"I thoughtfully hummed. I glanced down at the drop, leaning forward, and felt my stomach clench. There was a weight to the air tonight. Not a pivot, no. It wasn't enough for that. But this would... matter. Reverberate. I let the fear of the fall sink into me, clear away all idle thoughts. It was refreshing, in a way. And it made how the choice needed to be made crystal clear."

Okay, Cat's level of genre savyness is reaching some frankly terrifying levels. Admittedly, it is being honed by playing games with the Wandering Bard who is DEFINED by genre savyness, but being able to SENSE the flow of the story directly rather than having to reason it out? And being able to do it deliberately, so that she may one day be able to do it at will?

I think I need to revise where I think where I think this story is going....

dadycool

I've always been proven wrong whenever I've tried to think ahead on the story.

Mental Mouse

Remember, Cat copied Bard's genre sense out of her shadow in Arcadia – and in the Arsenal, the Doddering Sage helped her unlock it.

mamm0nn

I've mentioned old monsters in the comments of the last interlude, and it never really let me go. And now that they properly put Scribe just next to the spotlight again (we tried to beam it directly onto her but somehow she's always in the features-obscuring shadows just next to it despite her not visibly moving), I can't help but wonder how old she might be.

We know how old Black, Captain and Warlock are/were, and Assassin was always someone either from their generation or a generation or two older than that at most. But Scribe? She might've been Scribing for decades when Black was still in diapers.

So, taking all bets! Who wants to play the Guess Scribe's Age Game?

dadycool

Didn't she and Ranger have a rivalry of some sort? If so, that would have interesting implications on her age.

kinghaart

Wasn't that rivalry more about Amadeus than anything else?

James Felling

Morality and Ethics aside Cat et al made the wisest choice.

Who here doesn't believe that Scribe would not have some sort of contingency set to blow up in their face should things go badly for her, and a reasonable plan for an escape. The Scribe is not unbeatable, but in a time and place of her own choosing, even on hostile ground I for one would be fairly certain that offing her would be at best a roll of the dice, and likely leave lasting scars on her opposition. Maybe not physical scars, but she'd make them pay in blood and treasure.

ohJohN

I suspect Akua has ulterior motives for fighting this hard for Scribe – maybe related to whatever redemption story she's secretly planning for herself? – but I do agree that it would be awfully wasteful not to utilize her.

> "If she does become what was described as a threat," Akua continued, "That is, a banker and facilitator for villains, imagine how useful she would be as such a broker yet in your service!"

I get that there's the issue of trust, but if Cat had someone "handling half our villains' money [...] and reading the letters of the rest," managing her faction would be a breeze with the leverage she'd gain. She's already planning her Office of Villain Relations (or whatever) with a similar function, and Scribe could just... make that happen, quickly, quietly, and effectively, leaving Cat free to work on other problems (as a bonus, her access to ALL THE INFO would make adjudicating contracts guaranteed by the office a breeze).

jamesc9

As long as the Bard stays ineffective enough; otherwise the people who notice that the office has ALL THE INFO will create a campaign to avoid dealing with it.

Jack

>"In an hour, the Scribe will enter this tent to give us a report on the state of the Dread Empire," I said. "I want your opinion on, when she finishes, whether I should give her a position or slit her throat."

Oh? We're just going to sit here and pretend that she's not already in the room?
Cmon.

ninegardens

I mean... pretending like she isn't already in the room is kind of Scribes JAM

jamesc9

Under all normal circumstances, I'm not sure it's even jam; more like bread and butter, and the jam is using that knowledge to manipulate people into killing each other for her. That said, it has been covered in the text, so if the focus characters are wrong, then there needs to be an explanation of how they made a non-stupid mistake.

Darkening

They explicitly said the Crows were watching for Scribe, and while she is impressive at going unnoticed, I doubt she can completely conceal her presence from a pair of goddesses.

ruduen

Knowing that this is Scribe...

I fully expect a new pair of boots to be ready and waiting by the next morning.

vernal.ancient

I have a theory on how Hakram will develop from here: working alongside Scribe, he will grow more and more content operating in a purely administrative capacity with no front-line combat involved; meanwhile, the other Named will develop more and more awareness of his importance to the war effort, and respond with ever-increasing amounts of praise. Eventually, when the war is over, Hakram will take his place at Cardinal alongside Cat, and transition into a new name: Glorified Secretary.

Thank you, thank you; you're a great crowd 😊

Lox

Dead the Hand and dead the man.

TeK

Yeah, it's not a fucking confidence that now that Hakram is crippled, fate throws Catherine a discount Hakram for a price of both.

The main problem I see with it is simple. Having a Scribe will shift Hakram's Role even more away from combat, both in reality, and in the perceptions of others. And so his fears and woes will come true, nay, already has: fate itself had judged that he will not stand by the side of his Warlord in the battlefield ever again.

I expect that actually hurts him even more. How his nature shifts away slowly and inexorably from who he once was. Somehow I think that also can be a sort of a death flag. Hakram has a choice, to die in the fight as an Adjutant (with Scribe there to pick up after himself) or shift into something else.

It would be a choice between selfishness and selflessness, and we all know what he picked out time and time again between the two. So now, we will see, what choice he has to make one last time.

Cold Cyberia

Yeah, it's especially hard for Hakram because he's an orc and their culture very much values combat, strength, war, etc. Obviously the other orcs won't give him shit since he's the first Named in forever but I imagine it's very much a core part of his identity.

It suggests to me that maybe overcoming this difficulty will reflect on the orcs in general. Whereas the Reforms transformed orcs from warring tribes into disciplined soldiery proficient in war, Adjutant and Callow might transform them from soldiery into builders, administrators and poets – a cultural step bringing them closer to what they were before Miezán's enslaved them.

AbraKadabra

My take on Hakram was always that he will become Chancellor. Not in Praes tough, but in Callow.

ninegardens

Huh... that might be an interesting way to Neuter Praes; Arrange for a number of their most powerful names to be filled by people IN OTHER PLACES.

And then, presumably, force them to have names from far off lands.

Empress Basilia anyone?

jamesc9

So, fleshing that out, the High Seats can't lobby the Chancellor without travelling to Callow, which offends them enough that they won't, except at great need.

Zach

This doesn't make any sense, because Catherine wants to eliminate (or at least reduce as much as possible) the role of Named in leading nations.

I don't think there's been a single time when the comments of this story have speculated about Name transitions and it hasn't been completely wrong (which I'm thankful for, because people have a lot of really bad ideas).

Decius

Does anyone really believe that Scribe would be unaware of the movement of paperwork, or lack thereof?

Of course, nobody really believes that Scribe wasn't aware that the discussion about whether or not to murder them happened.

sengachi

Honestly it would not surprise me if Scribe had asked Assassin to impersonate her for that meeting, so that if they had decided to kill her they just would have failed to kill it instead.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

For everyone speculating here about Adjutant's eventual demise and/or retirement, when he got his Name the narration said something like "And so it ended. And so it began." I suspect this will prove to be one half of a pair of bookends, meaning that he'll end the story kneeling to her as he did that night. I'd be more confident of this if it'd be the literal starting point of the story, but it could happen.

Chapter 51: Endwise

"And so Maledicta said: 'All the world had denied us, so let it all be damned and we with it. This wasteland of our own making, it will kill us or we will kill it.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Misfortunes, thirteenth of the Secret Histories of Praes

Before the Conquest my people's maps of Praes had tended towards imprecision when it came to the interior of the Dread Empire, with only the western parts well-known to the Old Kingdom and the details of the eastern coast usually being cribbed off of Ashuran maps. I'd never dealt with that difficulty, as even before my time in the War College had given me access to standard Legion maps I'd been given the luxury of using Black's own whenever I wished – though I'd not understood quite how much of a gift he was giving me, back then.

Only when Juniper and I had gotten around to raising the Army of Callow had I realized how troublesome it was to get any good maps that weren't in noble hands or Legion-made, much less sets as good as those Black had kept for Praes and Callow. Back in the day I'd suspected the cartographers that were an official part of the Legions – under the Kachera Tribune of any legion's general staff – weren't the only reason my father's charts were so exactly precise, and now I was getting confirmation.

The leather-bound scroll that Scribe unfolded across the table was no larger than a saddle length but I openly lusted for what I saw displayed on it: a map of the Dread Empire, showing not only cities towns and villages but also the roads and typical regional weather. The last of these had been the death of many an incursion into the Wasteland, given how centuries of reckless rituals had turned it into a deathtrap of sudden storms morphing into burning heat or freezing cold on a whim. Gods but I wanted a dozen of these.

"When we're done with this, we'll be talking about your upcoming contributions to my personal map collection," I noted.

She shot me a look, a face I glimpsed to be lightly tanned giving me the impression of disconcertment. Had those been brown eyes I saw? Already my recollection was fading.

"Sometimes you do remind me of him," she admitted. "Though nowhere as much as some people like to claim."

"We've all got some of our teachers in us," I shrugged. "And he's been more than just that to me. But I interrupted, my apologies. Continue."

She nodded, then idly set down painted iron blocks – regular Army of Callow issue for our general staffs, I noted with some chagrin – on two cities: one black and over Ater, one white and over Aksum.

"On the surface, the situation in the Dead Empire is a classical Praesi civil war," she said. "Being waged between empress-claimant Sepulchral and empress-regnant Malicia."

"You even us the proper terminology," Akua said, sounding surprised yet pleased.

I snorted. Yeah, I supposed considering how often someone raised a rebel flag in the Wasteland to take a swing at claiming the Tower the Praesi would have been forced to develop a very specific vocabulary to address the situation. Would have gotten real awkward in conversation otherwise.

"I have spent longer in Praes than the Free Cities, Sahelian," Scribe chided. "Few even remember I was not born of the Wasteland. Your preconceptions aside, I was setting out the factional lay of the land. Both empresses have, naturally, gathered supporters."

A single smaller white block went on the city of Nok, where High Lord Dakarai Sahel ruled. Nok was traditionally considered the weakest of the High Seats, as the Kebdanas of Thalassina had long been kings of the sea trade and dominated overland trade towards Ater even though Nok was physically closer. That said, with Thalassina now largely vapour High Lord Dakarai now sat atop the only major remaining Praesi seaport. His support was no small thing.

"Hardly a surprise," Akua said. "Dakarai has been looking for a way to get a foothold into a reigning coalition for decades. It is a matter of pride, for him, and pride matters much to the man. He made sure to oppose Mother in public frequently simply to make plain that the Sahel origins as a branch family of the Sahelians did not mean she held influence over him."

The man had never been a friend to Malicia, I recalled, or at least not been counted among her supporters. Considering the High

Lord of Thalassina had been one of her most ardent partisans, there was little need for an explanation as to why.

"It is as tight an alliance as can be had in the Wasteland," Scribe informed us. "His daughter Hawulti is now wed to Sepulchral's appointed successor to the High Seat of Aksum, her grand-nephew Isoba."

Hawulti Sahel, I mused. I'd heard that name before, hadn't I? I glanced at Hakram in question.

"She was once one of Heiress' retinue, recalled to her father's side after First Liesse," he provided.

"You threatened to have her soul cut out by Lord Masego to coerce her father into supporting the establishment of the Ruling Council," Akua amusedly reminded me.

I had, hadn't I? It'd been a while. I could hardly recall her face, or that of her father's for that matter. I'd only spoken with the man the once. I'd also gotten a little more cavalier with souls in the following years, so the threat hadn't exactly stuck with me.

"Someone we should be worried about?" I asked.

"Ambitious but cowardly," Akua assessed. "A born follower. Her father sent her to me for hardening, as she is the only one of his children to be born with the Gift and he favours her for it."

That'd be a no, then. Probably why Sepulchral had been willing to twine their lines too, which Praesi high nobles were notoriously careful about: they hoarded the secrets of their blood most jealously.

"Malicia's support, as empress-regnant, is significantly stronger," Scribe continued.

Black blocks went down, one after another. Wolof, where Akua's cousin Sargon Sahelian ruled now that her mother was dead. Okoro under High Lord Jaheem Niri, which had been a political nonentity in Praes for most of my lifetime due to the brutal succession crisis that'd eventually put the man on the high seat. Kahtan under High Lady Takisha Muraqib, now the last High Seat in the hands of the Taghreb. The Northern Steppes, where Malicia had raised the chieftains of three southern clans to the office of Lords of the Steppes and charged them with keeping order and collecting tributes. And last of all Foramen, where the former Matron Wither now ruled as High Lady. Pickler's mother had backstabbed her fellow goblins brutally, and gotten an unprecedented title for it.

"She's also still got most of the Legions," I pointed out.

While maybe half of the former Legions-in-Exile had deserted in the wake of the dirty trick that'd brought them home, the forces that'd already been in Praes had stayed largely loyal and absorbed the soldiers that hadn't deserted. As far as military might went, even if you left noble allies out of it Malicia had a larger stick to wield. Sepulchral was relying on a kind of army Black had built the modern Legions of Terror to beat, too, which was one of the many reasons why she would be avoiding giving battle.

"And that's where it gets complicated, right?" Archer said, eyeing the map with mild interest.

Wasteland games were no real concern of hers, unless I made them to be otherwise, but Indrani did like an occasional spot of theatre and even at its worst the Dread Empire tended to deliver on that.

"Indeed," Scribe said. "The first illusion to discard before the situation in Praes can be understood is that there are only two sides in the civil war."

She set down a small red iron block on the edge of the Green Stretch, where thousands of deserters from the Legions-in-Exile had raised reportedly raised a great camp.

"Lord Amadeus' army?" Adjutant asked, dark eyes watching Scribe closely.

I watched them flick away more than once, no doubt prompted to do so by her aspect, but they always found her again. It was the obvious guess, now that I was learning more about the situation. Dread Empress Sepulchral's ability to outwit the Legions on the march, if not beat them, had led many – including me, once – to believe that my father might be behind her. The way this was being described though, made it seem much less likely. Black would have gone for the throat by now, not kept maneuvering in this empty stalemate.

"I'd presumed so as well," Scribe admitted. "But I have found no evidence of it. The leaders, General Mok and General Sacker, seem to have been acting without orders and out of a degree of genuine disgust for Malicia's actions with the control contingencies – though Sacker, at least, has sympathies in the Grey Eyries and rightfully fears being killed by Malicia or Sepulchral if she lays down arms."

It also meant that leadership of the deserters was nonhuman at the very top rung, I mused, since as I recalled General Mok was an ogre. No doubt that was making the two Soninke fighting for the right to rule over them more than a little wary.

"Lots of ogres in charge now," Indrani mused, narrowing in on the same detail. "Isn't the last Marshal one too?"

"Marshal Grem is under house arrest in Ater, not dead," Scribe corrected. "But you are correct that the commander of Malicia's armies, Marshal Nim, is an ogre as well. It is the most influential their kind has been in imperial affairs for centuries, if ever."

"But there's no black block over the Hall of Skulls," I said.

A grim name for the sole ogre city on Calernia but then they tended to be a grim people all around.

"The ogres are hedging their bets," Scribe frankly said. "As they always do. It is why no attempt was made to recall your own General Hune. It has historically been their policy as a people to have someone already lodged within every side so that they have a foot in the winning one, whichever it might be."

And I could see how that spared them crackdowns, I thought, but it'd not really paid off for them either had it? Required military service quotas under Malicia and Black had been lower than under Nefarious but they'd still existed, and there'd been no major push to increase their status as a people within the Empire like there'd been with greenskins. Part of that was numbers, since there were so few of them compared to the constituent peoples of the Dread Empire, but those alone weren't good enough an explanation. Hune had always been bluntly frank with about her people being on no one's side because they saw no one as being on their side.

"I can understand the deserters making Malicia wary of overextending," I said. "Explains why there hasn't been a serious attempt to siege Aksum yet even though it falling would end Sepulchral. But she should be winning this pretty decisively with this many supporters to call on, Scribe, so what are we missing?"

"Her coalition is fragile," Akua murmured, "and at odds with itself."

Scribe nodded in her direction.

"Kahtan eyes High Lady Wither, now the last of the Taghreb bastions, and begs off committing soldiers to Malicia's war," she said. "High Lady Takisha ponders her blood ruling both Kahtan and Foramen, and supports Malicia only because Sepulchral has no better offer to make. Wither herself is mired in war with the Confederation, while a combination of mismanagement and hatred makes the humans under her rebellious. There have been riots."

Off the map went the blocks for Kahtan and Foramen.

"Okoro backs the empress-regnant, but her freshly-raised Lords of Steppes are pulling at the leash," Scribe continued. "The Niri must keep men out on the fields, lest the Blackspears take to raiding again. Their contributions are measured, mage cabals instead of battalions. And the Clans are pushing back against these lords they did not choose – Grem's old clan, the Howling Wolves, are at war with the Graven Bones and sending envoys to other clans to assemble a coalition. The Red Shields burned the holy grounds of the Stag-Crowned, and denounce them as traitors to orckind. The warbands that were sent to serve Malicia stayed, but there are no more forthcoming."

Only a single block was removed, the one in the Steppes. Okoro was committed, if not as much as Malicia probably wished it to be.

"And so Wolof remains," Akua quietly said. "She owns Sargon, then?"

"I believe she has soulboxed him," Scribe replied.

I'd never head of the term before, so I cocked an eyebrow at Akua.

"It is much like it sounds, dearest," she told me. "His soul was severed from his body by ritual and placed in an enchanted box. It is difficult to kill through this, but by sorcery atrocious pain can be inflicted. It is tradition, however, that the box be sealed for only so many years."

She turned her gaze to Scribe, her silence an unspoken question. Wolof had taken a beating when Sargon overthrew Tasia Sahelian, Akua's mother, and it'd been the Legions of Terror under Marshal Nim that ultimately re-established order there. With Malicia's soldiers in the city the freshly-risen High Lord Sargon would not have been in a great bargaining position, so I doubted the length of time would be small.

"At least ten years," Scribe said. "Perhaps as much as three decades."

Akua sighed.

"He'll try to steal it back," she said, "but with Mother's spies in disarray the Eyes will have gutted them. Sargon will not turn on the Tower so long as she has the box."

"Wolof is still handling demonic taint from its latest contested succession," Scribe said, "and so it has offered few troops, but those it sent are elites. They have been raiding the hinterlands of Aksum with great success, stealing people as much as wealth. High Lord Sargon intends to fill his city anew."

I drummed my fingers against the table, frowning. All right, so I could see how the stalemate had come into being. Sepulchral couldn't afford a field battle against the Legions of Terror, she'd lose and her cause would die. Yet since it stood between Askum and Nok, Ater had to be garrisoned with reliable soldiers – which meant legionaries, not household troops with ever-dubious loyalties. That'd peel soldiers off of Marshal Nim's army, enough she'd be careful about sieging the rebel High Seats and all the nastiness that implied. If she lost too many soldiers storming a city, she risked being caught by Sepulchral and smashed in a war that was frankly hers to lose.

And all the while the deserters were looking on, keeping everyone from taking hard risks lest they intervene and finish off the weakened victor.

The balance of the power was in the south, I thought as I stared at the map. Foramen and Kahtan, the forges and the armies. If High Lady Takisha could be convinced to call on her many vassals and make war for Malicia, Marshal Nim would have troops to throw into the breach when attacking a High Seat. But it was not something the High Lady of Kahtan would be eager to grant the Tower when instead she could try to cement the Muraqib legacy and have her family rule the last two great cities of the south. Which led me to another question.

"How can Malicia afford to make trouble for us abroad, with all these fires in her backyard?" I frankly asked. "She should not have the time or gold to spare."

"Kahtan and Foramen still pay their taxes, fully and promptly," Scribe replied without batting an eye. "So do Okoro and Wolof, though their caravans are larger and armed. The Tower has undertaken no rebuilding of Thalassina, so Malicia's treasury is filled to the brim by taxes and decades of Callowan riches. What can she spend her wealth on, if not trouble for the Grand Alliance? There are no more mercenaries to buy, and the gold does her no good sitting in a vault."

Huh. That was one way of looking at it, I supposed. And from her perspective the Grand Alliance wouldn't stop being an enemy if it wasn't fought, it'd just have more allies and resources to spare when it finally turned its gaze on her after the war with the Dead King was done. But this did raise the veil on a situation that had largely been opaque to us so far, which was more than a little useful. If nothing else, it made it clear what the state of the opposition truly was. I shared a look of understanding with Hakram.

"Malicia's position is much weaker than it seems from the outside," Adjutant stated. "And though the military advantage is with her, so long as she cannot bring Sepulchral to battle it means nothing."

They could keep marching back and forth across the Wasteland for years and little would change. It was hard to tell whether a long stalemate would favour Sepulchral or Malicia, though I was inclined to believe it'd help neither so long as the High Lady of Kahtan kept sitting the fence. I suspected the bribes being offered to Takisha Muraqib were rising by the day, but with riots in Foramen making it clear Wither's grasp on the city was loose there would always be a greater temptation to the south.

"So where's the Carrion Lord?" Indrani bluntly asked. "It's all pretty stuff, this story, but it doesn't mean shit if he and the Lady aren't accounted for."

I glanced at her in surprise.

"You're not that flattering when speaking of him, usually," I noted.

She grimaced.

"If the Lady's stuck with him for two years, they're up to something that caught her interest," Archer said. "Her interest isn't easy to catch, Cat."

True enough, I thought. Though I'd been given to understand there was actual sentiment between them too, which was bound to weigh on the scales.

"The man does command a remarkable amount of loyalties within the Legions and the bureaucracy," Akua warily agreed. "It seems odd he has not called on them."

"I found him near Hospes, on the southern shores of the Wasaliti," Scribe said. "Without attendants or even companions save for Ranger. He was travelling south."

"And I'll believe that's all you know when it snows in Levante," I said. "Go on."

"Before Ime's purges began to seriously hamper my ability to gather information, I confirmed he's been in both Foramen and the Grey Eyries," Scribe said. "I cannot be certain as to why, however. There are also semi-reliable sightings of him much further north, to the west of Okoro."

Which meant close to the Steppes, where he was a lot more likely to find allies than at a High Lord's court. I made sense, but I wasn't buying it. Black had always been popular with greenskins, but stripped of command over his Legions it was almost predictable for him to try to raise fresh armies in the Steppes and the Eyries. My teacher was a lot of things, but predictable was rarely one of them.

"He will be using the Twilight Ways, if can move so quickly and discreetly in a war-torn land," Adjutant said.

I nodded in agreement after a moment, gauging the distances involved mentally. Yeah, there weren't a lot of other credible explanations for that. We'd been pretty sure that was how he'd left Salia, as he would have been caught riding through the Proceran countryside otherwise, but confirmation was always useful.

"As for why the two of them have been so discreet," Scribe continued, "I do have an answer. Or at least part of one."

She came forward to offer me a folded parchment, which I opened with impatience. To my surprise it was something I'd heard before: wild rumours from the Green Stretch about pale ghosts being glimpsed off the roads. A number had supposedly been put to them: ten. So it wasn't even Black and Ranger that'd been sighted. I passed the parchment to Hakram, who after a puzzled moment passed it to Akua. She looked equally bemused, and passed it to Archer absent-mindedly. It was Indrani who went still after a casual glance, cursing in what I was pretty sure was High Tyrian.

"Ten. Fuck. You're sure?" Indrani asked Scribe.

"There have been several independent sightings," Eudokia confirmed.

"Anything you'd care to share?" I mildly asked.

"There's ten Emerald Swords," Archer said. "And when the Forever King gets in a mood and decides it's time to start trying to kill the Lady again, they're who he sends. He hasn't tried anything since the dwarves told him if his people stirred up shit near a dwarven gate they'd take it as an act of war – it's why people called us a protectorate of the Kingdom Under – but she's left Refuge behind now. It makes sense they'd go for her again now that she's low on allies and the Tower can't do much but complain even if the Swords are seen."

I hummed. That rang true, considering Hanno had just passed along a reminder from the Golden Bloom that they were going to take it very badly if we let Ranger into the Truce and Terms. They'd want the old thorn in their side as isolated as possible, not under the protection of treaties binding together half of Calernia. Considering the general uselessness and unpleasantness of the elves while we'd been waging a war for survival against Keter, I found myself in the surreal position of actually rooting for Ranger a little bit.

Gods but these were strange times.

"The Carrion Lord cannot formally seize command of an army, else the Emerald Swords would converge on it looking for the Ranger," Akua lightly said, sounding mightily amused. "Ah, the fickleness of fate."

I didn't particularly share her amusement, as if my father had seized the Tower we'd have the east settled instead of this fucking mess going on for forever and a half. He could have signed onto to the Terms and brought the Legions of Terror north instead of playing hide and seek in the Wasteland while trying to get something rather nebulously defined off the ground. Mind you he'd had her father killed as she watched, so I could forgive some manner enjoyment at his expense. Akua could claim Praesi mores as the source of her indifference there all she wanted, she'd actually loved the man who'd died.

No one got over that quite as neatly as she liked to pretend she had.

"Anything you would care to add?" Adjutant asked Scribe.

"Not at the moment," she replied.

For a moment I considered dismissing her until we were done discussing Praes, then I figured there would be little point: she'd learn what was decided in here sooner or later, anyway, and we might need to call her back in if we had questions.

"Take a seat," I ordered her.

I didn't bother to check if she did, already turning towards my councillors.

"So," I thinly smiled, "the Praesi situation. Thoughts on what our response should be?"

It was not a long debate that followed, or a particularly contentious one. It wasn't for lack of opinions, though. Archer's take on what our involvement should be east of the Wasaliti was essentially a shrug, with an added suggestion that the Tower should be made aware of the presence of the Emerald Swords – whether it'd harm the elves or Malicia she cared little, since she smiled on both outcomes. Akua and Hakram were both in favour of intervention, but in different ways and seeking different outcomes.

Adjutant suggested Callow begin providing arms to the Clans fighting Malicia's appointed lords in the Steppes, noting that my kingdom had much to gain from closer ties to a victorious orc uprising: it could serve as a point of pressure against whichever empress edged out the other, and broadly speaking favoured a faction that in turn favoured Black. Hakram agreed with me that my father in the Tower was our best outcome in the Wasteland, though he wasn't as inclined to see him as an ally. If we wanted the Dread Empire at peace with Callow and willing to fight north, though, there was no denying that Black was the best choice.

Akua favoured backing Sepulchral instead, though not enough to make her win. She argued that a bolder, better armed Dread Empress Sepulchral might be tempted to give battle to the Legions of Terror – and that ensuring no one won a decisive victory there was Callow's gain, since casualties and desertions would weaken both sides. She advised leaning on Cordelia and the Dominion to have Sepulchral recognized as ruler of Praes and attempting to broker an alliance between her and the rebel orc clans in the Steppes. Her approach was cheaper on our coffers than Hakram's, but it carried other risks.

Callow couldn't afford to get dragged into fighting out east right now, we just didn't have the men to spare. And adventurism in the Wasteland was brutally unpopular a notion back home, especially now that it'd come out that Malicia's deal with the Dead King supposedly ensured his undead would not attack us so long as she lived. It was only after they'd all spoken that I turned to Scribe.

"Suggestions?" I mildly repeated.

She stayed silent a moment.

"It is my understanding that the Army of Callow is severely lacking goblin munitions?"

My brow rose.

"True," I admitted.

"Then I would suggest reaching out to High Lady Wither," Scribe said. "Who has a large stock of these she is not using, while she could use shipments of grain to quell the riots in Foramen. Rationing is one of the causes of unrest."

It also meant helping Pickler's mother, to some extent, while we were nominally allies with the Confederation of the Grey Eyries. Which she was at war with, after having betrayed them. Was I comfortable with that? Not really, but then I wasn't any more comfortable with my sappers having empty hands.

"Something to consider," I acknowledged. "Go on."

"Reach out to General Sacker," she said. "The defeats she inflicted Sepulchral are what made her desperate enough to rebel, and she is close with the same Matrons who rose against Malicia in addition to being an Amadeus loyalist. Neither empress will suffer her to live if the deserters disperse, which means she is very much in need of a patron."

My eyes narrowed. That camp was bound to be full of spies, both Eyes of the Empire and Sepulchral's own, but so long as I didn't actively support a rebellion against the Tower – which the fighting up in the Steppes was, effectively speaking – I doubted Malicia would make aggressive moves against Callow. She'd be throwing away the advantage she bought with making known the terms of her treaty with the Dead King if she did. It also opened the door to recruiting many of those soldiers if things went bad for them in the Wasteland, which they yet might.

Shit, I thought. Akua had been right, it really would have been a waste to kill the Scribe. A handful of sentences and she'd both given me a shot at steadying my munition problem and figured out a palatable alternative to being a mere watcher to the mess unfolding in Praes. I turned to look at Hakram.

"Can Duchess Kegan be trusted to negotiate with Sacker?" I asked.

It was tacitly accepting Scribe's suggestion and did not pretend otherwise. The orc's face tightened a moment, but it went away almost immediately. A spasm of pain? I'd thought his wounds under control. I'd talk to his healers tonight about the dosages in his potions.

"I am uncertain," he admitted. "She would see the use in it, but she is less than fond of both goblins and Praesi. I'd advise naming a negotiator ourselves instead and putting them under Kegan's nominal authority afterwards."

I nodded thoughtfully.

"Have five names for me by nightfall," I said. "And forward word to our contacts in the Grey Eyries: I want to broach the subject of buying up Wither's munitions to our friends the Matrons. Just sound them out for now, gauge how bad the fallout would be."

I doubted the Matrons would be all that offended by backroom dealings even with their sworn enemy – those were a proud goblin tradition – but I'd rather keep things above board so they wouldn't suspect I was softening on Malicia. Without Callow's support their situation looked much grimmer, and the Tribes had ended most their previous rebellions by cutting a deal with the Tower when things looked that way.

"Send reports to Vivienne about all of this, please," I added after a moment.

I would have liked her in the room for this, I thought with a pang of regret, but there'd been no anticipating that Scribe would suddenly come to us. And by the time word got to her, we'd be out on campaign so it would be exceedingly difficult to discuss affairs like this – outright impossible, when we got deep enough in the Dead King's territory and scrying was broken up.

"I'm sure those will make for a pleasant reading with her breakfast," Indrani drily said.

I suppressed a grimace. Without meaning to, Archer had reminded me I was slipping back into old habits – keeping Vivienne out of the loop, out of major decisions. I wasn't doing it for petty reasons this time, but I was doing it anyway.

"You're right," I told Indrani, who blinked in surprise, before turning to Hakram. "Arrange a scrying session with her tonight, I'll tell her in person. Tell her it's urgent, worth cancelling prior engagements for."

And we could discuss her suggestions, if she had any, before I handed her the reins on this. Someone was going to have to handle it while I was gone and it might as well be her. She'd be handling the fallout long after I'd abdicated.

"It'll be done," Adjutant said.

I nodded my thanks, eyes finally turning back to the still-seated Scribe.

"So let's talk maps," I smiled.

Adding another few to my growing collection would give me something to ponder about, when we began the march north.

lucnation

Make sure to go vote guys

Miles

Adding another few to my growing collection would give me something to ponder about, when we began the march north.

Miles

Oh and the link

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

would have been MUCH better without the quote

Shveiran

Come now, that was as far removed from an emotional moment as can be. It has to be ok.

Liliet

It's ok, I'm just not seeing a single thing that it adds.

Rynjin

It adds no more and no less than your constant complaining about it, to be honest.

Liliet

My complaining makes me feel better though, and given that other people's complaining makes me feel better too, I figure it's not an entirely selfish effort.

Shveiran

It bothers me, though, and other people who dislike the constant complaining, just like the vote reminders annoy you and others who are annoyed by them.

Meanwhile, the vote reminders with puns make me and others feel good, just like they annoy you and others.

If your take from this is "then I'm justified and I'll persevere", I won't argue further. We tried that, and it didn't really work. But the idea that the two things are so distinct that what you are doing is "less selfish" than your chosen opposition is, frankly speaking, weak at best.

Liliet

The "less selfish" thing was basically a joke.

I really really strongly dislike these and I don't really see a reason why I shouldn't express that if it makes me feel better.

Also I don't think your "annoyance" is the same as actual visceral feeling sick and not being able to think about the quote without the vote reminder being stuck in your head instead. But hey, it's not a fucking competition.

Frivolous

I want to thank EE for putting in this episode the answers to some questions I've raised in past comments sections, those being how full or empty Malicia's treasury is and/or how much taxes she's been collecting during the civil war, and also why the elves were so against Ranger signing the Truce and Terms.

I do wonder if EE read my questions and decided to demonstrate the answers. I'm grateful either way.

I also wonder if Hakram's spasm of pain was from Cat taking advice from Scribe, in the manner she takes advice from Hakram. He might be hurt over being supplanted. On the other hand, Hakram is notoriously without ego, a veritable Vulcan among orcs.

Cubic

Maybe not personally hurt, but his name might have trouble being redundant with the Scribe.

scottcahoon14

Vulcans aren't /controlled/ by emotions, but they still feel them. Hakram already said he feels like he's losing his place if he can't stand by her in battle. Cats response was he would still be her right hand man with a quill. Then she picks up Scribe and immediately takes her advice over everyone elses. None of this is enough to make him betray her or anything, but she IS weakening his name by doing so, which he basically said is only strong so long as she relies on him. And the weakening of her most trusted ally is never going to be a good thing. Maybe she realizes the problem in time, but it would be wasted foreshadowing to do so.

Insanenoodlyguy

Best case, which is reasonably likely since his aspect is "Stand" is that this drives him right back into being combat ready. If scribe is her woman with a quill, he's the man with a quill in one hand and an axe in the other.

Forsheen

It most definitely is.
He is losing his purpose, he can support cat the way he used.
In fact it looks like he needs her support.
Combined with the fact he feels his name change, I can only wonder how it must feel to see some more capable help cat.

benthelynx

I definitely think that's part of Hakram issue. It may also be the degree of trust Cat is implicitly putting in Scribe, alongside the competing Names and his own physical impairment preventing him from having as much to offer in other supporting aspects. Possibly even Name shenanigans depending if there was a shift in Cats unconscious view of his role.

dadycool

So, he's feeling even more obsolete in having another thing Cat depended on him so entirely for being shared with another.

impolitic

Don't forget that Hakram is having a Role crisis right now. He's normally unflappable, but not when his entire raison d'être is in question.

Cicero

I think it's more simple than that. Hakram was hoping for Callow to take a position supporting the Orcs. Cat decided that was too risky.

He probably understand why, but he was hoping for the Orcs to achieve a position where they could ally with Callow against the Praesi, something that would significantly effect Callow and the Orcs going forward.

If not for the Scribes ideas, that's probably what Cat would have done.

Liliet

Fun fact: Hakram could have proposed to ALSO help the orcs in addition to Scribe's ideas.

Like, I'm just saying.

Dsylexic Wofl

It would even be that hard, shes already entering in contact with Wither about munitions, and with The remains of the Legions. Steppes is just, right there, pull them along and you have both Orcs, Munitions and Legionaries.

Miles

Yeah but money is tight.

Maybe she can support the orcs with wheat. I'm sure they'll find an immediate use for it.

Liliet

He could still raise the notion, and then they'd discuss the budget.

Maybe Cat would pick up on it being personally important to him THEN.

Note-Taker

Part of the appeal of Scribe's plan though is that it is not supporting anyone in open opposition to the Tower. By sending aid to the openly rebelling orcs, Cat loses the fig leaf, and thereby the "the DK won't attack us" clause of his deal with Malicia.

Liliet

Nah, that clause explicitly relies on her being alive period.

Shveiran

That was my reading as well, yet I don't think we were ever given the precise details of the pact between Keter and Praes.

Thinking about it, doesn't it make sense that Malicia would have a clause that prevents Catherine from rallying Callow against her? Especially given that she knew she was reaching out to the Grand Alliance (to no effect, but still).

Liliet

Nah, too complex. She had to talk the Dead King into monitoring whatever criterion that was, after all.

And Catherine had technically already rallied Callow against her in a sense, so... yeah. I'm pretty sure the agreement is exactly what we've heard it is: conditional on Malicia's continued aliveness status.

hakureireimu

Why are the Emerald Swords a problem now, but not when Ranger was part of the Calamities?

Ninestrings

Because the Calamities would have bounced the Emerald Swords off the walls and laughed about it.

Just Amadeus and Ranger though? more tempting a target.

More fool them.

dadycool

I feel like Assassin and Captain would've killed them reflexively, to the point of forgetting about them, Black would've killed them and asked Scribe about them, she'd have shrugged, they'd both have put it out of their minds as a curiosity, and none of them would've mentioned it to/asked Ranger because they never got close enough for her to notice.

Liliet

Yeah, no.

Elves are fucking absurd.

My bet is on "elves actually had no idea Ranger was hanging out with the Calamities until Black had already won the civil war, and the Dread Empire is the kind of crazy they don't want to touch."

Mirror Night

Yeah even with their Names...Fighting 10 Elite Elves is no laughing matter. I am not even sure Assassin can fake being an Elf to try his usual tricks cause Elves aren't normal and faking it wouldn't let him speak Elvish. Antigone and Maybe Hanno are probably the only humans outside of Bard who can speak it. I am also not sure Captain's Raw Power would match up well....Black is Clever and Warlock is dangerous. Still the Elves tend to play it safe and play the long game.

Ninestrings

Warlock is probably the major deterrent there, I doubt there is any force on the planet that could have shrugged him off if he decided to go all out on a large scale, he was pretty much a fantasy nuke.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Gnomes, the Dead King and the various Choirs definitely could shrug him off.

Shveiran

I think Thalassina showed he had the potential to be in the same neighborhood as a Choir (once per lifetime), though your point stands. I don't think the Emerald Sword are that powerful? or ratehr, I don't think they are the right sort of powerful. The Revenant Elven Prince could probably survive the fallout, but I don't think the Emerald Swords are capable of surviving that level of arcane onslaught.

heroessucklmao

I agree, they don't have a country behind them now either

Letouriste

Praes is at war. There will be no response coming from the tower. I doubt these tens elves could travel so easily in peace time. When ranger was at refuge she was protected by the dwarfs and before that she was always around Black and the rest of the calamities who kept an eye on them. Scribe in particular should always have eyes there.

Dsylexic Wofl

Because the Calamities had a man that could not be killed, a woman that could not be found, a literal monster, the worlds strongest named and a man that could make fore rain from the sky. All of them under the command of the fucking Black Knight.

Sometimes we need to remember that they were a big fucking problem

Liliet

Ranger was still one of their biggest guns though, and the implication of the way Indrani worded it is that it's the same Emerald Swords there have ever been after her – she never managed to kill a single one.

Rey d`Tutto

Did she even notice them, though?

Liliet

...I mean, Hye and Amadeus appear to currently be on the run because of them, so, y'know.

Dexapocalypse

I really want to know when cats going to get her name, I'm hoping it isn't black queen because as soon as she abdicated for Vivienne she'll lose it again

Hellspirit

Back them Praes was a united (as can be at least) force, and the Calimities was at Full strength and had the full backing of Praes.

Liliet

I would say this, yeah. Elves could probably shrug off the Calamities as a band, but they could not shrug off a multitude of demon summonings in the middle of their forest or whatever else Praes is liable to pull when pressed.

Javvies

Well ... the Emerald Swords actively hunting Ranger is a pretty good reason for her and Amadeus to be discrete. And mean that there's no reason to think that Amadeus is going to solve things in Praes for Cat while she's busy in the West.

Accurate maps are important.

I'm not entirely surprised that Cat isn't supporting the Orc Clans yet. On the other hand, some support for them might well be in order, but locking in an alliance with the Legions in Exile/Black-loyalist Legions needs to be done first, to help protect Callow from Praesi retaliation.

Might need to talk to the ogres, too. If they can be convinced to commit to one side over the others, or even just to fully break with one side ... that could be significant.

Burlyraven

Would Amadeus count as a lord in exile, with Ranger taking the role of heroic protector in this situation? I'm kinda getting those vibes with their effective seclusion, and the uber-assassins, and the mystical wanderings. If so, it's highly likely to be on purpose, and they're just charging up story power until Amadeus completes the soul searching the story requires, seizes control of his former Legions, and fights a desperate but successful campaign to the tower.

My only doubt on that lie in that fact that it'd be a traditionally heroic story used to seize a villainous crown, even with pragmatic intentions. On the flip side, it'd have the main players gender swapped from our norm, so technically Amadeus would be the princess in this situation, and that mental image is making me giggle.

Ninestrings

I though Amadeus was planning to utilise a "Hijacked by ganon" sort of situation.

The only thing more villainous than hatching an evil plan is stealing another villains plan mid-plan and using it for your own purposes.

Liliet

Amadeus has been in a heroic Role from the inside Praes perspective since he was a wee teenager rising up against abusive authority.

That said, Ranger's protecting him from the threat that comes from her hanging out with him. I'm not sure there's a heroic story about that, unless you count the entire MCU.

Burnsy

Cat: "Imma zoom call Viv, you guys have anything to say to her?"
Indrani: tell her I said 'Cat has a WAP.' She'll know.

Juff

Typo Thread:

cities towns and villages > cities, towns, and villages, even us the > even used the frank with about > frank about

Askum > Aksum

sitting the fence > sitting on the fence

I made sense > It made sense onto to > onto manner enjoyment > manner of enjoyment inflicted Sepulchral > inflicted on Sepulchral and did not > and I did not

edrey

i have this question in my mind before, there is balance between good and evil, Dk and the Bard, the elves and the drow i get that there are less villains since tariq and saint make it so, but how there is balance with the smerald swords and the dwarfs?, keter, praes and the everdark is too little, and they have no Named in the everedark, so i found that evil is lacking, even "saying quality over quantity" isn't enough. especially with the esmerald swords, they dont have villains in the same league. no wonder triumphant grow so much, but now i dont see cat fighting the Forever king.

Darkening

The dwarves were mentioned to employ both heroes and villains, they're not Good but neutral. Giants are probably nominally good, but they're strictly neutral and unwilling to get involved, so they don't matter generally. The elves and Keter probably balance themselves out to a degree, given they had a vicious war at one point. There's the Chain of Hunger I suppose. Really, having the Rats come invade right now would be about the worst possible fate for the Grand Alliance, though I suppose they're behind keter's conquered territory right now. So, Everdark, Chain of Hunger, half the free cities, and Praes, balanced against Procer, Levant, half the free cities, Ashur and I guess Callow should still count as Good, despite Cat.

dadycool

I'm pretty sure the Drow have been feeding off the Chain of Hunger, which is ironic to think about.

Liliet

The drow were on the other side of the Kingdom of Dead from the rats.

Keyword being "were", lol.

Earl of Purple

I thought the Empire Ever Dark's borders were with the Golden Bloom, Keter, the Kingdom Under and the Chain of Hunger?

And that the last drow raiding party seen in the human kingdoms was a century or more ago and fought the Lycaonese?

Liliet

...I need a map.

goes to get a map

...huh, you're right. I remembered it wrong.

mamm0nn

I think the elves and drow were each other's balance, the drow too are massively powerful after all and both were isolationists with problems going on inside their borders. The dwarves meanwhile are neutral, for now.

The balance is indeed too far in Good's favour nowadays, but I think the dwarves will answer that issue when the tipping point comes. They've almost ran out of areas to expand into, only the Dead King's lands being left now. And they always need more magma veins for their bound forge lava elemental thingies, forcing continuous expansion to sustain their economy and lifestyle.

I bet that the moment that Good would tip the balance on the surface too far to their side, or defeat all Evil altogether, the Good surface will suddenly face off against a now Evil underground foe that comes up to conquer for they can no longer fully sustain themselves without the surface. And the dwarves are a whole new breed of Villains without a great many grooves for the Heroes to use.

Matthew Wells

What about the Dwarven Heroes?

mamm0nn

They seem to be more Neutral from what we've seen, like Ranger, than true Good. They're called heroes by the dwarves themselves, and dwarves liking dwarven Named isn't exactly surprising, and they don't exactly have much exchange with outsiders to counter those claims.

TeK

Poor Halram is being replaced, eh?

Shveiran

Please. Poor Hakram fears he's being replaced.

Not quite the same thing.

Cold Cyberia

I'm guessing Black could use the Emerald Swords against Praes? Maneuver in such a way that they have to cleave through a legion or two to get to Ranger. Dunno if that's feasible but they have to be taken care of at some point, and I doubt Ranger herself would be enough. Maybe if she had a story behind her.

I'm surprised Scribe is going on the campaign with the rest of them but it's probably Cat wanting to keep an eye on her for now.

Miles

Really Ranger just has to stand with the tower between her and the emerald swords. Then whenever they go one way she goes the other and keeps the tower in the middle until the ES gets sick of it and decides to just cut through. Easy peasy.

letouriste

" The orc's face tightened a moment, but it went away almost immediately."

OK, this sentence concern me greatly 🙄
As is the fact Cat misunderstood it...

Liliet

Amadeus: "Sure, it might SEEM like women always get me in trouble, but consider this: Ranger. Ranger's a valuable ally to have whenever I have her, no downside."

Hye: "So, er, about that heritage thing I have..."

Shveiran

... My god, it really is a pattern by now, isn't it? I never even noticed.

Liliet

Amadeus is like a harem protagonist, only without fetish as the purpose of the writing XD

This poor guy, I just – I just can't get over how MUCH trouble he's been gotten into by his close female acquaintances.

Only Captain kept the madness at bay, but when the world needed her most, she died...

Daniel E

Seems unlikely that Hakram will see real combat again, even after he gets his prosthetics from The Arsenal. My money is on a transition into a front & center version of Scribe. His appearance makes 'blending in' all but impossible, so he goes the other way; openly recognized as the highest level bureaucrat, a genius organizer equivalent to Juniper on the battlefield. I mean, he already is that, but now he gets a Name to further boost those talents.

JRogue

Adjutant is my absolute favorite character and I really -> REALLY<- hope that he somehow makes a return to fighting, if for no other reason than his own mental health. He is feeling like he is being pushed out and his Warlord does not need him anymore. An adjutant is a military officer who helps a commander with administrative management, and with his fighting days over, that is all he has left.

Hakram is the best and I hope he can know and feel his usefulness returned to him.

Frivolous

I feel the same way, JRogue.

Rey d`Tutto

Adjutant will wreck some $#!+ Before he is done. Quote me.
He may regrow his Name, or he may Play it.

Frivolous

I just woke up, and it occurred to me that if this were a different kind of story, Catherine could assemble a band specifically to break into Malicia's vaults and steal all of her gold.

I'd pick the Affable Burglar, of course. Rogue Sorcerer would be good, too. Of the others, I'm not as sure.

I'd call them... Foundling's Five.

Rey d`Tutto

Ocean's 5?

Shveiran

And Malicia would play an Irritant and reveal she had a insurance agreement with Mercantis the whole time.

No, with the Dwarves!

heroessucklmao

This is the most description we've had of Scribe's appearance. I wonder if it has to do with Scribe recognizing Cat a little more as a leader?

aran

First time Scribe has let Cat perceive her face... maybe she's lessening the effect now that she's officially working for Cat?

aran

"Lots of ogres in charge now," Indrani mused, narrowing in on the same detail. "Isn't the last Marshal one too?"

But Grem is an orc, not an ogre. Right? I'm not sure how to read this.

kinghaart

Nim is an ogre and would be the last Marshall if Grem wasn't still alive, that's all. Grem is indeed an orc.

aran

Very confused at how this seems to contradict what Cat did in Liesse. When she de-souled Ghassan (and threatened to do the same to Hawulti and Fasili), it was implied that this would effectively be irreversible and fatal. She promised to “destroy [the stone] ... and let [Ghassan] go to the Underworld”, implying that Ghassan’s consciousness would not be in his body, and would never return there – otherwise she would be able to hold his soul hostage, much like Malicia is now doing to Sargon.

But this “soulboxing” seems to leave Sargon still conscious and able to act, or he wouldn’t be able to try to steal his soul back. Is there a magical connection between the soulbox and his body that allows him to remote-control his body even though he’s not in it?

kinghaart

Akua separated her soul too, it seems like it’s a risk to do but doesn’t outright change the connection between it and the body.

I get the sense that the soul isn’t a conscious thing in APGtE, but rather like a pseudo-limb – either you have one or you don’t.

Chapter 52: Sortie

“Swift wars are long in the making.”

– Stygian Proverb

The army set out from Neustal on a warm, sunny morning.

I’d been up since before dawn, when our outriders had set out – the Osenia and Volignac light horse – so I was well into my day when the columns got moving. The Dominion forces of Razin and Aquiline served as our vanguard, an ‘honour’ they’d asked for and few had cared to contest. Given how light on their feet Levant infantry could be, raiders at heart that they were, my main concern had been that they’d get too far ahead of the rest of the army. To ensure otherwise I’d put General Hune and her Second Army behind them, since the lordlings were likely to curb their enthusiasm if they were leaving her in the dust.

Behind the Second I put our Alamans forces, the veteran Volignac army and the fantassin companies Princess Beatrice had picked in my name. With the Firstborn under my Lord of Silent Steps behind them, they made up the ‘centre’ of our army on the march. At night I’d let the drow loose on my enemies, but during day marches they needed to be protected. While beyond the drowsiness around dawn the Firstborn weren't harmed by daylight, it really was a waste to have them fighting by day considering how much more effective they were by night.

Our rearguard would be the Third Army under General Abigail: if there was anyone likely to see an ambush coming a mile away and leave no stone unturned looking for it, it was my sole Callowan general.

The Proceran troops were still filing out of the front gate in a semblance of good order – it looked like Princess Beatrice had spread out her own infantry between fantassin companies, using the rhythmic pace-setting of her drummers in an attempt at setting a marching beat for all Alamans soldiery – under my watchful eye when Hakram came to see me. Not in the stronghold as I'd claimed one of the watchtowers overlooking the trenches, half a mile away from Neustal, as a temporary base while the army got moving. It was a good vantage, and I'd been killing time talking with Pickler when Adjutant arrived.

There was no real way for him to come up, considering the top of the watchtower was accessible only by ladder, so I wove myself a few solid tendrils of Night. I anchored them to the edge of the tower rampart and went over the edge, guiding them to gently lower me in a landing before the orc. The sight was common enough that my escort – knights of the Broken Bells – did not even visibly react. Night was a lot less eldritch a power to their eyes, these days. People could get used to anything if it happened regularly enough.

"Catherine," Hakram greeted me. "Here are the last dispatches before we leave."

He offered me a few parchments with his skeleton hand and I took them. I noticed the Apprentice wasn't around, even though he'd ended up accepting her presence as a helper. He must have left her behind for the trip.

"Thanks," I replied, folding them open one after another.

The first was ordinary diplomacy: well wishes from Hasenbach and the Highest Assembly in our offensive. The second slightly more important, word from the Iron Prince that the dead had begun testing his army with large-scale night raids as it went up the mining roads. So far his pickets had caught them in time, but Prince Klaus believed it likely that his preparedness for a battle was being measured. That was promising, considering we quite wanted the undead army holed up in Juvelun to come out and fight him.

The last might be the most important of the three, though it was by far the least ornate. Just two sentences scribbled in a familiar handwriting: It went well, the work has begun. I am on my way. I allowed myself a thin smile. Good, that was a load off my back. I passed the parchments back to Adjutant.

"We've sent word to Papenheim we're on the move, right?" I suddenly asked.

"I handled it this morning, as soon as the first soldier walked out the gate," he agreed.

Thank the Gods he'd handled that, it'd entirely slipped my mind. Looking at him I began to speak then closed abruptly closed my mouth. My conversation with Vivienne last night had been fruitful, including her finding a candidate for talks with General Sacker – the steward I'd left to rule Marchford in my name, who was both minor nobility and fluent in Mtethwa as well as familiar with goblins from the tribe settled in my holdings – and suggesting the Jacks begin infiltrating the deserters' camp. The part that'd surprised me, though, was that she'd also been in favour of arms sales to the orc clans rebelling in the Steppes.

She'd even urged me to discuss the matter more in depth with Hakram instead of dismissing it as I had, something that'd weighed on my mind since. Vivienne might not have stated it outright, but there'd been more than politics behind that piece of advice. Was now really the time, though, just as our offensive was beginning? If I don't make the time, I'll never have it, I chided myself.

"Adjutant," I said. "When we discussed our options in the Wasteland, yesterday-"

"The decision was made," Hakram calmly cut in. "There is no need to revisit it."

"Maybe there is," I said. "Put in an hour for it tonight, in my schedule. Give me an idea what the monetary costs might be of selling or sending armaments."

His eyes narrowed.

"Vivienne is meddling," the orc gravelled.

It wasn't a question.

"She made a suggestion," I shrugged. "I found worth in it."

His face grew very hard to read for a moment.

"Pity is a poor basis for a queen's decisions," Adjutant stiffly said.

"That's not what this is," I sharply said.

"Have your reasons for choosing differently yesterday become any less true?" Adjutant said. "No. Nothing has changed, save that you spoke with Vivienne."

"I'm not saying I'll do it," I bit out, "I'm saying I might have dismissed the possibility too quickly, and I want to know more about what would be involved."

I was trying to stay calm, but it was like he was trying to put the worst interpretation possible to anything I tried. I'd had to deal with that from others, but coming from Hakram of all – I made myself breathe out. That was kind of the problem, wasn't it? I wasn't used to this from Hakram because he'd always made it easy for me. Having this conversation with someone else wouldn't have felt nearly as grating. I was not sure I liked what that said about either me or him. He studied me, face once again unreadable.

"I'll see to it," Adjutant said. "I have two subordinates in the adjunct secretariat capable of making the proposal skilfully. They can handle the matter."

The tone had gotten challenging by the end of the last sentence. The unspoken part was easy enough to parse: if this is a legitimate interest, it won't matter I'm not the one doing the talking. And if it wasn't a legitimate interest, then he wanted nothing to do with it. I forced myself to remain expressionless and nodded in agreement.

"Is there anything else?" Adjutant asked.

"No," I quietly replied. "You can go."

I shouldn't have listened to Vivienne, I thought. This path was a dead end. I couldn't use the authority of the queen to fix the troubles of the woman. I clenched my fingers as he wheeled away downslope, towards the two phalanges waiting to help him into the litter he used to get around where the chair wouldn't work. It was not a pleasant, realizing that I had no idea how to even begin to mend this. If it can be mended at all, a treacherous voice whispered in the back of my mind. No amount of gestures would grow his limbs back or change that he'd lost them in my service.

Forcing a calm expression back on my face – people were watching, people were always watching – I pulled on Night and went back up the watchtower. I still had a war to fight, and it cared nothing for my worries.

—

By Noon Bell we were all on the road and the first reports from the outriders were trickling back in.

I'd abandoned the watchtower as soon as the drow were out of Neustal, instead taking Zombie on a ride and joining the Second Army. Morale in the ranks was high, though considering the backbone of the Second had been with me since before the Tenth Crusade I'd expected as much. I traded jokes and wild boasts with soldiers as I rode at their side, a Taghreb sergeant startling a laugh out of me when he confessed he'd promised his wife a mansion in Keter after the war – his fellows jeered it was why he was still here, afraid to come home and face her displeasure at failing to deliver – but eventually moved to ride at General Hune's side.

The ogre was not one for small talk but I hardly minded. She wasn't Juniper or Aisha, I had no good old days to get misty over when it came to Hune Egelsdottir. In a way it was refreshing, the simple clarity of our relationship: queen and subordinate, nothing more or less. It was with her I entertained the first reports from the outriders. The Volignac horsemen had gone east and west, since as natives to these lands they knew the grounds better, while the Osenas had been sent straight ahead up Julianne's Highway. The benefits of the road ensured the latter came back first even if they'd gone further out.

There were few dead ahead, they'd told me. Three different warbands of maybe a hundred skeletons had been glimpsed about two hours of riding ahead, but no larger force. A band of two hundred riders under a cousin of Lady Aquiline had decided to forge further ahead to see how far he could go before encountering resistance, though only after swearing once more to obey my orders against skirmishing: he'd turn back the moment fighting became inevitable. The Beastmaster had kept going with him, so I was likely to get a good look ahead out of the venture. The Volignac scouts returned later and with uneven timing, bearing equally uneven news.

To the west the lowlands seemed empty save for small undead warbands like the Osenas outriders had seen, though there'd been half a dozen instead there instead of a mere three. The Hainaut lowlands were full of small hills and dips, though, and the Dead King a patient foe: it was a favourite trick of his to hide small bands like these and then suddenly assemble them in a larger army to hit a weak point in our defences. This time, though, the threat seemed to be coming from the east. A Volignac captain reported seeing a force of two thousand undead, mostly skeletons and Binds with a few ghouls, wandering to our northeast.

"Most likely a force meant to ambush one of our patrols," General Hune rumbled, and I agreed.

In a way that was a good sign: the detachment wouldn't be out here if Neshamah knew we were coming, as with our numbers and equipment we could easily smash it with paltry casualties. The Dead King was not so wasteful as to throw away two thousand for no gain, profligate as he was with bodies. I asked the captain if the undead had seen his riders.

"I do not believe so," the mustachioed man replied, "but the Enemy is a cunning foe, Your Majesty. I cannot be certain."

I wanted the Dead King unaware of our march as long as possible, even though it'd been impossible to hide that we were gathering troops in Neustal. Part of the reason the army under the Iron Prince had begun to march a week before us was to draw the enemy's attention, after all. The trouble was that the Hidden Horror could see through the eyes of his undead, and the moment he got a look at the army marching up Julianne's Highway he was going to send his closest army to halt our advance at the natural pass called Lauzon's Hollow.

We wanted that to happen, as if that army wasn't drawn forward our surprise strike at the Cigelin Sisters behind it would likely fail, but we wanted it to happen as late as possible. We didn't know exactly what Neshamah had in reserve, so if he had too long to prepare a response it wasn't impossible for him to fortify both Cigelin and the Hollow. That wouldn't necessarily make it impossible for us to win, but it would make that victory... costly, to say the least.

Fortunately we'd established Neshamah could only 'see' through one corpse at a time, as it required a focus of his attention. But the Arsenal – more specifically the Repentant Magister and Hunted Magician – had also proven there was a working seeded inside Binds and Revenants that allowed them to 'call' for the attention of their master if they believed it warranted. So the tightrope to walk now was how we could wipe out that force of two thousand undead to our northeast without prompting them to tattle to their master. If we sent too large a force they were sure to do so, and if our heavy hitters – Akua or myself – went out personally the result would be the same.

We couldn't just ignore it, though, since with Binds in command they were sure to scout in our direction sooner or later. A pack of zombies or bones could be counted to display staggering stupidity, but Binds could actually think. There was a reason it was standard Grand Alliance tactics to target them first if we could find them among the horde.

"If we wait after nightfall the drow can wipe them out cleanly," General Hune suggested.

"That's rolling the dice," I replied. "There's no guarantee they'll wait that long to move towards us, and half the day still lies ahead."

The undead did favour night fighting when they had the choice and Binds around to make it, since unlike humans the necromancy that allowed them to see was not particularly affected by the dark, but it was hardly a rule. So far the Dead King should not have been alerted to our advance, as riders on the distance were hardly anything new. The Grand Alliance fielded regular mounted forays into the territory he held. Yet there was always the change he'd notice that a lot of his warbands had seen quite a cumulatively large amount of outriders today. There was no way to tell if that was the case, though, so no real point in worrying about it.

"A Dominion raid, then?" Hune said.

Could work, I mused. The Osenia elites, the slayers, they were skilled at ambushes. And with one of Razin's kin having died in ambush recently, Keter might even buy this was just a vengeance raid if we added some of his warriors to the force sent out. It thinned our vanguard, though, which I didn't like even if the road ahead was supposedly bare. I had other tools to use, though.

"We've got raiders of our own," I replied. "Send for Special Tribune Robber, would you? And Sapper-General Pickler as well."

Robber's band of marauders was still a mere cohort of two hundred, though the audacity of his raids with them meant few of the goblins in it were the same as when he'd first been given the command. I wouldn't send him alone against two thousand undead, though, especially given that ghouls were just as quick on the feet as goblins and a lot meaner in a fight. It was time we gave Pickler's new copperstone ballistas a proper trial in the field – which Neshamah should buy as a reason for a raid north, if he ended up looking in – but to add a bit of muscle I'd throw in regulars backed by Levantines.

They'd get pissy about honour otherwise, so I might as well borrow a warband of two hundred Osenia slayers as well as an escort for the engines in the form of a cohort of regulars from the Army of Callow. That'd mean around nine hundred soldiers, which I was comfortable sending out considering they were drawn from several parts of my column instead of thinning out one in particular.

I spoke to my goblins first, Robber proving eager for the task and Pickler insisting on going along with her ballistas. I couldn't deny having her there would be useful when it came to assessing their performance, so I allowed it. Hune detached a cohort of regulars and briefed them herself while I went to the Levantines. Aquiline proved flattered that I would call on her elites in particular, which meant she was disinclined to argue when I requested her officers heed the instructions of the senior Army officer on the field – in theory Pickler, though in practice it'd be Robber. The forces were mustered within an hour, my Special Tribune running off ahead to pick his grounds.

Eventually the rest of the forces mobilized set out east after him and I stayed seated on Zombie, resisting to urge to ride her up in the sky and have a quick look. I had another ride with the ranks just to distract me with the urge. I missed fighting, I could admit it to myself. I'd learned to use other means, as violence had so rarely been enough to get me through the kind of messes I stumbled into, but there'd always been something viscerally satisfying about smashing your enemy personally. Instead I had to wait like a decorative lump as Noon Bell slowly crawled towards Afternoon Bell, receiving continuing outrider reports and waiting for news of the skirmish in the northeast.

Robber came back half an hour before Afternoon Bell, dusty but flushed with preening malice, and I knew it'd gone well before the little shit even opened his mouth.

"They fell for it, Boss, like Alamans told there's a wine cellar at the bottom of the well," my Special Tribune cackled.

It'd gone off without a hitch, he explained. His raiders had harassed the dead by snipping at their flanks with a few ambushes, then fled into their chosen killing grounds as the enemy ghouls pursued. The Osenia slayers hidden along the paths had scythed through the ghouls like wet parchment, then joined the flight with just enough of a delay that the commanding Binds were tempted into committing the entire force to pursuit. That brought them to flat grounds where Pickler's waiting ballistas pounded them to smoldering dust with their copperstone munitions. The regulars came forward to prevent the dead from leaving the flat grounds, hitting from the front while the slayers and goblins turned to hit the flanks.

It'd been a massacre.

Maybe two hundred skeletons led by the last Bind had fled but they were being pursued even now and bones were slower on the feet than even tired goblins. The entire affair had cost us fewer than forty casualties, making it a remarkably one-sided beating. When word spread through the ranks, I thought, it would raise morale significantly. There was nothing like an early win to make soldiers eager for further battles.

"I guess you get to eat with people instead of the horses this week, then," I mused. "Congratulations on the victory, Robber."

"I was going to what now?" the Special Tribune said, sounding alarmed.

"Don't worry about it," I winked. "I'm sure your right to eat anything other than oats is not at all contingent on bringing me more victories."

I winked again, just to piss him off, and ignored his increasingly loud attempts to question me over what he'd done to warrant this treatment. Verbally stepping on him put me in as good of a mood as the victory itself. It really was the little things in life, wasn't it? I didn't bother sending someone to ask Pickler for a report on the performance of the copperstones, as to be frank I'd be getting one whether I wanted to or not. The smile stayed with me until I got a visit from the Silver Huntress.

"There are dead on the horizon, Your Majesty," the Huntress said in that startlingly girlish voice of hers.

I cocked a brow. Like Indrani she had an aspect related to sight over long distances, but I'd kept the two of them close to the van to sniff out ambushes instead of sending them out too far. For the first day, at least, I considered that a better use. So how had she seen something no other Named – or myself – had?

"You saw them?" I asked.

"Word from Beastmaster," Alexis replied, shaking her head. "He sent a falcon."

"Ah," I hummed. "In that case, if you'd elaborate?"

She pointed a finger upwards. To the sky. Shit.

"Buzzards or vulture?" I asked.

The former weren't much of an issue, just large undead birds the Dead King liked to use as scouts. A 'vulture' was a necromantic construct, though, and though much smaller than a wyrm we'd seen a lot more of those on the Hainaut front. For their size – none was smaller than a house – they were damned quick, and hard to put down. Usually Keter used them to pick off patrols or strike behind our defensive lines, but on occasion they could serve as a sort of heavily armoured scout.

"One vulture," the Huntress said, "with a flock of buzzards around it. Headed straight towards us down Julianne's Highway, he says."

And there went my good mood. The Dead King had noticed something was up, then, and he wanted to confirm the nature of threat with eyes up in the sky. I closed my eyes and thought. Those couldn't be allowed to come too close, but at least the Huntress had warned us with time to spare. If we smashed the flock and vulture we'd still keep Keter from having direct eyes on us. Our overall campaign plan wasn't threatened, I thought. Even if the Hidden Horror knew my force was going up the highway, it wouldn't take away the strategic threat that was Prince Klaus' host taking Malmedit out east and collapsing the tunnels there.

Now that Neshamah had caught on to my own army's advance, though it was effectively impossible to beat his own force to Lauzon's Hollow. The force Keter had stationed between Cigelin and the Hollow was under a hundred thousand, we believed, but it was a mere three days' march between those two fortresses and the dead could walk through the night. It'd take them a day at most to move to one to the other from their current camp, hence why I'd wanted surprise on our side: even after today's march, our quickest possible pace on Creation would take us another six days getting to Lauzon's Hollow.

That was not truly a setback: that Keter would find my army had been a given, even if this was much quicker than I preferred. You couldn't walk seventy thousand people up a road and expect them to go unseen. By swatting the birds out of the sky we could still keep our numbers somewhat obscured, anyway. And strategically speaking my entire army was bait, in a sense, since the first blow in the offensive would actually come from our reserve sallying from the Twilight Ways and taking the Cigelin Sisters while my host drew the defensive army into Lauzon's Hollow.

Nothing had truly been lost, I knew, save that the Hidden Horror had more time to prepare his defences than I'd wanted to give him. So why did I feel so uneasy?

"Go find the Summoner," I finally said, opening my eyes. "And tell him I have need of his services: something that can fly and carry two people."

The Silver Huntress slowly nodded.

"Am I to go with him and destroy the dead?" she asked.

She seemed rather pleased at the thought of combat, if not the company.

"Not alone," I replied. "They'd see you coming from miles away and scatter."

She cocked her head to the side, waiting for me to continue speaking, and I was startled with how closely it resembled the way Archer did it.

"I'll be going as well, to weave an illusion that'll hide us," I said. "Archer will share my mount."

If the Dead King was going to learn something was headed his way no matter what, I grimly thought, I might as well give him something to really worry about.

—

All my affairs had been packed off for the road, so I had no tent to use.

I rode up to one of two wagons holding my affairs, though, and asked the phalange handling the reins to slow for a bit. I made my way inside, waking the magelight and going through my clothes. I no longer wore plate, these days, but I'd not forgotten my growing fragility: I dug out a plain steel breastplate and a helmet from a coffer. The helm was a nice bit of smithing, open-faced in the legionary manner but worked to have subtle golden inlays above my head evoking a crown. It'd also been forged to accommodate a ponytail, since I wasn't going to be fighting anyone with loose hair.

The wagon was shaky even at the reduced pace and armour was always tricky to put on alone, so I waited for Indrani join me — I'd sent for her before coming here — and instead grabbed something else from the coffer: a sword belt, with a sheathed blade on it. I slid the goblin steel out an inch, fingers tightening around the longsword's grip. Well-weighted, made especially for me. I'd refused a sword once, in Liesse-Become-Twilight, and I would not walk back that choice. But this was war, and sometimes a staff and a prayer were not enough. I slid it back into the sheath and was tightening the belt around my hips when Indrani entered.

She cocked a brow at the sight.

"So it's a fight, then," Archer grinned.

"Help me put my armour on," I replied after hesitating a beat.

I'd almost not gotten the words out. It was not her, who usually helped me with this. Perhaps sensing she was treading tender grounds, Indrani was efficient about it. The breastplate settled comfortably over my torso, and after I tightened the clasps on my helmet she made sure the ponytail went out through the proper furrow at the back of my neck.

"War boots," Indrani reminded me after.

I'd still been debating that, as it happened. I'd never been a splendid rider and I was more comfortable in the saddle without steel on my boots, but then Zombie was not a difficult mount. Might as well. I sat on a trunk and reached into the pack by the side of it, only to freeze in surprised. There were my old campaign boots there, those I'd been dragging with me since I'd emerged from the Everdark, but also another pair. New, by the look of the leather, but pressing on them with my hands it was clear they'd been broken in. Scribe, I thought. It'd been idle talk when I'd mentioned the detail to her, but details were her trade.

"Cat?" Indrani asked.

They were just boots, I told myself. And still I took the old ones.

"Give me a moment," I replied. "As soon as we've got these on, we'll gather our war party and head out."

—

The Summoner was a backbiting, entitled prick but he did have a lot of combat utility.

Masego had been fascinated by his magic — said the man had, in a sense, failed so badly at both diabolism and fae-binding that he'd ended up making something entirely different from both — but also added it'd be effectively impossible for anyone but a dedicated apprentice to learn, so the man had stayed on the front instead of heading to the Arsenal. His 'summoning' was effectively shaping creatures out of magic that had limited sentience, with those summoned repeatedly gaining greater substance and intelligence as they 'hardened'.

It didn't sound like much, until you realized that given access to enough time and magic the man could make effectively any kind of creature he could think of. We'd later learned he had limits to the quantity of magic he could actually sink into a summoning, which did set a ceiling to the possible size of the summoned creature. His bigger ones tended to be highly unstable, too, so it was often better to aim below the ceiling and end up with something of better quality. Considering the man was whiny and grasping but not particularly violent, I might have ended up halfway fond of the Summoner if he'd not also kept insisting he was Callowan. What he actually was, though, was the son of a nobleman gone into exile and a Proceran lady. He'd never even set foot in Callow.

All his hinting that as a Callowan villain he should be my favourite achieved was increasingly strain my patience. Today, though, I had good reason to cut through the stupidity without coming across as overly high-handed. His summon, a wyvern-like creature without scales and imbued of a ghostly glow, was eerily. Not one he'd used often, then. I cast a curious look at it, then at the villain who'd crafted it and the Silver Huntress by his side. I reined in Zombie by their side, Archer in the saddle behind me. She waved at the Silver Huntress, whose face tightened in reply, and I elbowed her sharply.

It didn't do shit through her mail, but the message was received anyway,

"Your Majesty," the Summoner smiled. "I am pleased that you found use in my-"

"There will be time for courtesies later, Summoner," I said. "The enemy is on the move, and we do not have the time to spare. I need you and Lady Alexis on the back of your creation, and close to me: I will weave an illusion with Night that will obscure our approach."

Indrani snickered behind me, not all that subtly, but the look on my face clearly did not brook argument. They climbed the creature, the Summoner nestling close to the neck and the Silver Huntress further back. Zombie eyed the other mount involved with disdain, horrible little snob that she was. I spurred her to get closer and she obeyed even as I began to pull heavily on the Night.

"I have tread black stone and halls grown cold, freed of restraint by the blessing of my patron," I murmured in Crepuscular, weaving the Night around us, "Though feeble, I have devoured might. Though listless, I have stolen the wind. I call on you, Andronike, to veil eyes and ears so that I might triumph in your name."

The Night pulsed with approval, and I felt a breath around the back of my neck as the eldest of the Sisters leant her touch to the blessing. The air in a wide sphere around us, at least forty feet in diameter, grew hazy and smoky. The Summoner let out a little gasp.

"Stay close and don't leave the sphere," I ordered. "It won't last forever, so let's get moving."

Zombie's wings opened with a flourish, the wyvern-thing hastily imitating her, and with a gallop she began our rise upwards into the afternoon sky.

Javvies

Well, that's unfortunate.

Trouble with the Cat/Hakram relationship. That's a problem. Send there's no good way to heal it.

Born to a Callowan expat and a Proceran noblewoman and raised in Procer does not make you a true Callowan, Summoner.

dadycoool

Depending on the circumstances of the expat's departure, Summoner's pedigree might even work against him.

NerfGlaistigUaine

He's also the son of a nobleman which is a point against him with Cat

Cicero

It's a bit unfair to the Summoner, as he at least appears to personally identify as Callowan, which ought to count for something.

Unfortunately his constant harping on that fact is a habit that is more Proceran than Callowan, and thus aggravates other Callowans, as the habit clearly comes across as foreign.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm wondering if she shouldn't be leaning in the other direction. Get impatient with Hakram. Don't be all gentle and understanding with him, get him the trainers and the legs and insist he needs to get off his ass and be back at her side. Scribe can sign paperwork now, let her bring them messages on the field. Be firm and expectant that he'll get back to it, and perhaps he'll STAND as required.

Liliet

Yeah, if Cat wanted him back in the field fighting there wouldn't BE a problem.

But Cat has always been more protective of her retinue than many of them – Hakam in particular – appreciate.

Miles

Not just an expat. Exile is worse. It means he wasn't welcome.

Given the number of times he's been mentioned and the similar metanarrative pattern to Abigail's introduction, it'll probably turn out that the reason for the exile was actually something that Cat would see as a positive thing and he'll eventually get to be in charge of some of the villains who are ok with him being in charge of them. Or he'll be a massive traitorface.

Sir Nil

The summoner was so bad at magic he created an entirely new branch of it that was only suited for him? That's actually impressive in a way. In a stupid, cartoon villain way.

Mental Mouse

That's Name shenanigans for you...

Sir Nil

I'll make my own magic! With blackjack and hookers!
– The Summoner, probably.

Miles

In fact, forget the magic!

Miles

It's kind of too bad nobody is interested in getting him an apprentice. After the techniques have been passed down once or twice this could become a whole new, Callowan, branch of magic.

One that involves just pretending there's an entire lake sitting in the air above your enemies and then everyone looks up and jey look, a lake!

Mental Mouse

No time for that now, but if he lives through the war it might happen.

Big Brother

Oh, that prayer sent shivers down my back.

"I have tread black stone and halls grown cold, freed of restraint by the blessing of my patron," I murmured in Crepuscular, weaving the Night around us, "Though feeble, I have devoured might. Though listless, I have stolen the wind. I call on you, Andronike, to veil eyes and ears so that I might triumph in your name."

I love near-blasphemous individuals able to still use (un)holy magic through prayer.

Shaerick 68

Cat being on the precipice of a new name, her dreams of falling, and her bad feeling of something about to go wrong has me thinking the next few chapters are gonna be big, especially considering the best place to fall is from the sky.

Shaerick 68

This was not meant to be a reply to you, my apologies. This website is kinda jank on mobile.

Miles

The unfallen dark priestess

Miles

I was so sure I'd see this link in there somewhere.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Burlyraven

Hakram's falling into the common problem of the newly handicapped and seeing pity in every helping hand. That's not to say that pity didn't play more of a role than it should have in Cat's decision to speak with him, but at this rate, it's very likely that his Name snaps at the strain that both he and she are putting on it. He needs to understand that he still has purpose if he wants it, and she needs to let him have that purpose.

dadycool

I wonder if his other aspects will fade like Stand did as he becomes more and more convinced of his own uselessness. Without half his body and Scribe doing a really good job as Cat's secretary, he could very well gain a new name. Maybe it'll be mated to Cat's the way Adjutant was, especially if the timing matches up again.

Cold Cyberia

Hakram uses Find to discover his new Role and purpose. It's super effective! 😊

mamm0nn

If he feels useless, it's more likely that he loses his Name like Vivienne did rather than change into a different one. If there's no conviction, the life breath of Named, then he will only lessen until there's no Name left.

dadycool

Oh, I really hope he doesn't just waste away then. It's a vicious cycle, feeling useless, which makes you less capable, which makes you feel more useless,...Something better snap him out of it, fast. Maybe Cat getting tossed off a cliff/rooftop?

Miles

The more I think about this the more convinced I am he's gonna die soon. He's slowly becoming the kind of burden that drains their friends and while none of them would willingly let him go, they'll all feel relief and guilt over that relief when he's gone. Unless he turns this around and starts being his own person again. He's not so far gone that there's no hope yet.

Burlyraven

Since this book is meant to be the climactic end to the overarching story, I place money on him having one last rally in him (even Villains get those). Whether it's a last stand or a full re-assertion of his role is a different question completely.

Alexander Knight

And to everyone who commented on the boots thing, of course we were correct

dadycoool

Heh, of course she got the boots. It does hit hard that, for basically the first time ever, she doesn't have Hakram dressing her. This Army on the March chapter was fun to read.

Djinn O'Cide

Go. Vote. <http://topwebfiction.com/?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

THIS LINK DOESN'T ACTUALLY VOTE

IT JUST SAYS YOU VOTED

Topwebfiction website design is not super good, but anyway here's the link that you NEED to visit to vote:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Black Spiral Dancer

And so it starts!

Xinci

So he basically made devils but made them of his own concepts, presumably anchored to Creation. Masego already noted that all of the building blocks are the same, so it is interesting to see someone else using them with their own rule set and seeing why certain limits may exist. So fairly similar to Cats winter summons they become more as they get exposed to more stimuli. Looks sorta like another microcosmic test, this time, the microcosm being of the hell's generation system.

Juff

Typo Thread:

second slightly > second was slightly closed abruptly closed > abruptly closed Mtethwa > Mthethwa not a pleasant > not pleasant instead there instead > there instead dips, though, (there's another though in the next sentence, so might want to remove this one) always the change > always the chance resisting to urge > resisting the urge out ambushed > out ambushes nature of threat > nature of the threat advance, though > advance, though, move to one > move one Indrani join > Indrani to join in surprised > in surprise increasingly strain > increasingly straining was eerily (missing word) around us, "Though > around us. "Though

Wonder

Why doesn't Cat craft more "a sword that isn't a sword but a prayer and more of the Night Sink she asked Akua to create in the previous book?
They turned out to be very valuable.

Scavion

Secret weapons/Trump Cards and stories don't work as well the second time. Especially in the Guideverse where they are practically guaranteed to work the first time.

Estelulu

I forget, but is it pronounced Proker or Procher?

fonne

Most likely soft c, Procer seems to be an analogue of Holy Roman Empire and their official language is Chantant, aka fantasy French.

Estelulu

Oh, I figured the name would be read in Latin, but you make a good point.

Miles

Hmm so then the R's would be soft rolled in the throat, as the Germanic languages do, and the word ends in "air"? Or I guess "aigr" since that's an r.

MrMaturity

I read it as pro-sir

Konstantin von Karstein

Same for me

Morgenstern

"pro" as in "pro-nounced" and "cer" as in "sau-cer", is what I read it as.

Abrakadabra

I go with proser myself.

ApparentlyAlvin

I think at one point (can't recall the chapter) Ivah pronounces it phonetically as "Prokker".

Alessandro Ussia

I read it Procher, but it does make more sense to read it French-like now that other have mentioned it.

Miles

I always took it as rhyming with "Bra sir."

Cold Cyberia

Chances that this is a trap? A lot of focus was put on the preparation to take off and there's Cat's premonition too. It's a bit early to get a wrench in the plan but she should've taken a fifth Named, just in case.

thearpox23

A fifth name doesn't make a party of five. You need appropriate bonds as well as roles between people for that.

And if Cat were to make her party here it wouldn't just be a one-off. She'd be giving important information to the dead king about her future capabilities for the price of a vulture and some trash mobs.

I don't know if what Cat done here is a mistake or not, but overloading on names for a minor scouting trip isn't the answer.

Big I

If Summoners “summoning” is actually creating things, why is he wasting his time with creatures? He should be making people. Warriors, servants, advisors, etc. The best minions are always the ones you make yourself.

Darkening

Because the main evolutionary advantage of humans is that they're smart, which his summons aren't. If he wanted human drones he'd be a necromancer or a mind controller. He wants big nasty monsters to tear people apart whenever he has a temper tantrum.

Big I

They get smarter the more they're summoned though (“hardened”).

vernal.ancient

True, but they start getting unstable once they come close to their hardest level, so humans or human-like creatures probably aren't worth the effort; he'd have to dismiss them right when they start getting useful. Creatures that are naturally dumber but have a lot more muscle are more useful for his circumstances

Lady Serpentine

That's not what it said. Think of it like this:

Summoner has a balloon. Creating something is like adding water to that balloon: Once you pass a certain point, the balloon gets more and more likely to burst.

Hardening is like if every time you filled the balloon to make something you've made before, you use a little bit of wine instead of some of the water. It doesn't put more stress on the balloon, it's just qualitatively distinct from pure water. Since you replace a bit more water every time, you eventually end up with nothing but wine in your balloon. Although if the upper limit for how hard something can get is sufficiently high, you might end up continuing this process for several more steps; say, going from wine to aragh and then ending up with orcish liquor in your balloon.

Matthew Wells

No, they get unstable when they use too much magic in one summoning, they harden through repeated summons.

I think it's more likely just that their maximum intelligence still isn't sapient.

vernal.ancient

Just checked back, and yep, you're right about the instability

nick012000

Counterpoint: He could totally make himself a Stand if he wanted to.

Letouriste

So his summons are not really summons but creations of his own mind? it's interesting.

i'm confident Hakram will manage to overcome this in a way

flashburn283

This seems like it is going to end up being 30 Corps advance from Market Garden

vernal.ancient

Only tangentially related, but the plan as a whole feels like a sort of reverse Market Garden. IRL, a highly mobile force was used to prepare the way for a less mobile main force; here, the less mobile main force is being used to create an opening for the more mobile force to strike. IDK, it's a bit of a stretch now I write it out

mamm0nn

Our rearguard would be the Third Army under General Abigail: if there was anyone likely to see an ambush coming a mile away and leave no stone unturned looking for it, it was my sole Callowan general.

Okay, that got a genuine laugh out of me. Especially after imagining the Dead King strategising and choosing not to attack the rear because the mysterious and unpredictable Abigail watches over it.

Daniel E

lol yes. Despite the relative downer that was the bit with Hakram, the mention of Abigail always makes me grin. That poor girl has a never-ending streak of 'wrong place, right time'.

Liliet

Oh no, Cat, Hakram)=

To Cat, this is about herself – Hakram getting crippled in her service is HER failing. The fault of her service, the fault in the system of him serving her.

To Hakram, it's the other way around: him getting crippled is HIS failing, and that it happened in Catherine's service is the only silver lining.

And they're both too far up their own asses about it – I say that lovingly, this is a pretty valid thing to be in Strong Distress over – to notice the other's position.

Shaerick 68

Cat being on the precipice of a new name, her dreams of falling, and her bad feeling of something about to go wrong has me thinking the next few chapters are gonna be big, especially considering the best place to fall is from the sky.

jckattck

Is nobody else worried that Cat's TRUSTED LIEUTENANT is becoming embittered and is having even his non-combat role appropriated by the Scribe? I believe there are a couple of Heroic Axioms that are just itching to be applied here.

Chapter 53: Joust

"War, that most glorious of horrors."

-Bastien de Hauteville, Proceran general

Keeping pace turned out to be pretty tricky.

Zombie's wings weren't actually what allowed her to fly, since they were nowhere strong enough to actually lift a horse her size – much less with two riders on her back – but Masego had never actually been able to give me a clear answer about what exactly did allow her to fly. There'd been a lot of talk about natural domains and the inherent structural differences of the fae, but the bottom line was that he couldn't really explain it. There was at least some grounding in Creational laws, though, since Zombie did use the wings to steer around and adjust her flight. It made her flight pleasing to the eye, an extraordinary thing but not unnatural to behold.

The Summoner's creature was his own work, on the other hand, and not a being stolen from Arcadia. It was his own craftsmanship on display and it hardly equal to even a lesser god's, to say nothing of Above and Below. His wyvern-thing's wings moved, but the advance of the creature itself was jerky and only tangentially related to the way they batted. If anything the sight brought to mind the way I'd used to shape footholds out of ice in fights, if said footholds had then been forcefully dragged forward by magic. The flight was largely stable, though, and the Silver Huntress had a lot more room to stand at the back than Archer did on my own mount.

I suspected frequent use of this construct would make it more 'natural', as if the repeating conflict between magic made flesh and Creation was grinding the shape down into a compromise appeasing both.

For now, though, my main concern was ensuing that when the wyvern-thing pulled forward it did not take the other two Named out of my Night-working. If they left the illusion, our enemy was likely to scatter into every direction: it'd be impossible to stop them from flying over the column then, we just didn't have the flyers for it. The sun was eating away at the illusion, slowly but surely, but I'd woven it with the personal blessing and attention of the eldest of the Sisters: it'd hold until I no longer needed it. Which promised to be soon, as the enemy's shapes grew from blots on the horizon to discernable silhouettes.

Leaning forward against Zombie's mane as Indrani's arm around my belly loosened to let me, I began to count to the smaller undead birds. The buzzards had been raised from the remains of birds, it was visibly true with each, but they'd not all been of the same size and so Keteran necromancers had expanded the frames of those who'd been too small. Made of bare bone and 'feathers' of dead wood framed with dulled copper, they were quicker and tougher than the actual dead birds the Dead King occasionally threw at us in flocks. I found thirteen, taking my time to find them all. None strayed far from the fat construct between them, the vulture.

At least a dozen feet tall, all bristling bones and thick folds of dead animal skin, the abomination watched the world with too-large wet red eyes: old blood long gone sour, made into something farsighted by ugly rituals. Its large and leathery wings beat the air, not quite hiding the rows of insect-like segmented legs under it. Each ended in a long spike of steel, which the construct could strike forcefully enough with to punch through plate – I'd seen it run straight through a knight, once, and toss her away like a ragdoll as the horse panicked. It was the 'bald' patch atop the head, where plaques of iron had been nailed into the skull to protect it from easy shattering, that'd earned the creature the sobriquet of 'vulture'. It was no wyrm, capable of tearing through an entire battalion in moments when catching it unawares, but vultures were no laughing matter.

"Thirteen buzzards," I called out. "Think you can handle that much?"

"Please," Indrani snorted into my ear. "It could be twice as many and it'd make no difference. Should I put an unraveller in the vulture just to make a point?"

"We're keeping them a surprise still," I declined.

A sharp whistle – it would not leave the sphere of my Night-working and give us away, the miracle was a very cleverly made one – drew my attention. The Silver Huntress wanted to speak, it seemed, and so I pulled at the reins to bring Zombie closer to the Summoner's creature. The wind would make it hard to understand the heroine, otherwise.

"There's something hidden on the vulture's back," the Huntress called out. "A refraction trick, I've seen it used by the dead before."

I did not ask her how she'd picked the detail out at such a distance, since it was exceedingly rude to ask another Named about their aspects.

"Does it work up close?" I called back.

"Yes," she shouted. "Needs disruption. Light works."

I frowned. There weren't a lot of things the Dead Kings would bother to hide on the back of something as visible as a vulture. Either he'd sent out mage Binds, which he was always careful about protecting, or there was a Revenant riding that thing. The first we could handle easily, the second might get... complicated. Some Revenants were no more dangerous than a necromantic construct, simple champions to use against Named, but there were some who'd kept the better part of their fangs even in death.

"Archer will handle the buzzards," I yelled. "Disperse the trick on my word, we'll attack together."

Zombie knew Indrani well and even liked her – she kept offering her oats that the godsdamned dead fae horse did not need – so there shouldn't be an issue leaving her on my mount's back. The Silver Huntress gestured to make it clear she'd heard, then retreated further on the wyvern-thing's back. Like Archer she'd come with her bow already strung and a quiver of arrows that were more or less the size of javelins. Unlike Indrani, though, she preferred a short spear to a pair of longknives. It was just as silver at the bow, and no doubt just as heavily enchanted.

I waited until we'd gotten within a hundred feet of the enemy. By then I could almost make out the trick the Huntress had mentioned: there was a... glimmer on the back of the vulture, whenever it shifted one side or the other. I leaned back towards Indrani.

"You ready?" I asked.

"Give me a moment," she said, pressing a kiss into the side of my neck for good luck.

She put a hand on my shoulder to help herself upright, standing on the saddle with a gleeful grin and nocking an arrow. Gods, I hoped she wasn't about to die a very stupid death just so she could have a better field of vision when shooting. She tapped my shoulder to tell me she was finished, and I turned to find the watchful eyes of the Silver Huntress.

"Now," I shouted.

She nocked an arrow of her own and smoothly drew, silvery Light gathering at the point like a blinding star, then casually released. My working shivered under the cold burn of her power, hollowing from the inside even as the sun attacked it from the outside, and shattered entirely even as the arrow left the confines of my illusion. In the heartbeat that followed, things happened so quickly I almost couldn't parse them – the buzzards began to scatter, Indrani loosed an arrow, the vulture tried to evade to the side and the silver arrow struck true. Two silhouettes were revealed, and neither looked like a Bind. Fuck.

I cursed in every tongue I knew. Time for a brawl, then.

I breathed out to steady myself, then threw myself to the side. Swallowing the scream that was trying to fight its way out, I forced my eyes to stay open and gauged the distances even as I drew on Night. One, two, three, four and... there. The gate into Twilight opened below me even as a second silvery arrow swatted a leaping Revenant back onto the vulture and a fourth buzzard dropped. I dropped through the warmer sky of the Twilight Ways for a heartbeat before pulling at the Night and wrenching open another gate, resuming my fall about two feet above and three feet in front of the vulture.

That repositioning trick had been a bitch to learn even with Komena helping me.

I dropped down, eyes wide open and cloak trailing behind me, and before I'd even landed atop the construct my enemies gave answer. A blackened longsword's point came at me in a thrust, exquisitely timed to go straight through my unprotected throat even as my feet touched the ground: I slammed my dead wood staff against the ground first, and the clap of Night that rippled out messed with the timing. Before the armoured Revenant – in impeccable knight's armour, I glimpsed, down to the faded heraldic swans of House Caen on the shield – could properly turn the thrust into a cut I landed in a crouch at its feet, fingers sliding down the length of my staff.

"Afternoon, Neshamah," I drawled, and rolled forward before the Revenant could bash in my head with its shield.

Right behind the first enemy the second had been waiting for me. Tattered robes and a breastplate of dull green light were all I caught before the points of the trident coming for my chest got a lot more pressing a consideration. Laughing I leaned back, earning myself half a moment – just long enough to unsheathe my own sword and slam the side of it into the blow. The dead Named pushed the lock one way and me the other, only my grunt breaking the silence. The Revenant was stronger than me, pale dead eyes staring down through a ratty hood, but Night pulsed through me and with a savage grin I slapped aside the blow – just in time to see the Dead Knight about to run me through the back most unchivalrously.

Silver light rammed into the side of its head, blowing off half the steel helm and revealing blond locks on a beautiful face.

Dead Knightess, I mentally amended, and deftly twirled my staff to smash it into the exposed flesh. Too slow, I cursed, her shield coming up and even the Night I'd slid down the staff splashing out harmlessly against it. I narrowly parried a thrust from the trident and withdrew to the side prudently – that light breastplate wasn't that of a warrior-Named by my reckoning – but not quite swiftly enough. When lightning streaked down the trident's length and lashed out at me, it caught the edge of my cloak. The Mantle frizzled the magic, but did not shatter the spell: it twisted around, answering the Revenant's will, and struck my sword-hand.

I bit down on my scream, limbs convulsing, and dropped my sword against my will.

A blow from the back hammered into my shoulder, cutting deep as the Knightess put the full weight of her strength into it. Blood spurted and I was driven to my knees, but I let out a bark of laughter through the sting: painful as that had been, it'd broken the lightning spell's hold on me. The hand freed by dropping my sword went up as I drank deep of the Night, then closed my fist. As if a dragon had breathed in the air was sucked in by the funnel I'd crafted, drawing both Revenants in, and with a hard grin I spun my staff: blackflame roared out in a wheel. Both retreated, Robes doing better than Knightess whose exposed face was caught, but their relief was short-lived.

With a furious cry, the Silver Huntress entered the fray by smashing a shining spear into the Knightess' side. Pulling at my breastplate so it'd stop digging into my wound, I rose and offered Robes a wink.

"Hey," I said, "do you want to see a magic trick?"

The Revenant stiffened for a moment. Wait, was this one of the perfectly conscious ones? They were exceedingly rare.

"No," the Dead King replied through another mouth.

In the same moment, uncaring that there were also Revenants atop it, the vulture flipped upside down. Gods, Neshamah really was such an ass even when you discounted all the horror and mass murder. The Huntress still blew part the Knightess' shield in a streak of silver, scoring deep burns into the plate behind it, but I had to trade taking a shot at Robes for crafting a tendril of Night and catching the heroine by the waist, throwing her upwards. That cost me, as Neshamah-in-Robes got off a spell before I finished crafting a veil of Night for my own defence: there was a boom of thunder that struck me like a physical blow, rattling my bones, and then my vision went white as a column of lightning erupted.

Would have caught me for sure, if a creature looking like a large ghostly pufferfish hadn't suddenly formed right in the path of the spell.

Shit, I thought, changing the veil from a defensive one form one that'd obscure my presence before I was done changing it. I might actually have to be polite to the Summoner for that. From the corner of my eye I caught one, two, three silver streaks – the Huntress had somehow taken her bow even while being thrown upwards and her arrows hammered into the Knightess mercilessly. Neshamah-in-Robes did not bat an eyes, beginning to weave a large web of lightning streaks around the lot of us – like a large, loose net. Clicking my tongue against the roof of my mouth disapprovingly, I opened a small gate into Twilight near the edge of the net and allowed it to close.

The Dead King, visibly irritated through his puppet's face, gathered the lightning streaks into a spear of spinning threads and tossed it at the Silver Huntress. I let myself keep falling, Mantle of Woe flapping around me, and pulled on the Night. I grinned as a silver arrow tore through the point of the lightning spear, hollowing out the centre, though it was an unpleasant surprise to find that the outer layers had kept shooting forward. I saw movement from the corner of my eye again, though, and kept working on my miracle with a pleased smile. Zombie glided down past the Huntress gracefully, Indrani catching her old comrade by the scruff of a neck.

They went into a dive before the spell could catch them, though the Dead King was already preparing another spell – lightning was pulsing around him, erupting from the frame of the Revenant in spikes. And still I waited, carefully shaping the Night.

The vulture swung around, one of those deadly legs catching the Knightess and slamming her onto its back before moving so that the Dead King's puppet could lightly land on the back. Just before the feet of Neshamah-in-Robes could touch the vulture they threw their spell – a ball of lightning that began to expand massively the moment it left his hands – I struck at last. Thin tendrils of Night shot out of me by the hundreds, ripping through my veil and revealing my position, but even as the Dead King turned towards me the first tendrils sunk into the flesh of the Revenant he was using. He began to cut at them with the trident, but there were too many and he was too slow.

"Here it is anyway," I smiled, and snapped my fingers.

Robes' silhouette shivered for a moment, then grew sunken as I hollowed it out from the inside with acid. Without bones and runes to anchor the necromancy, the Revenant collapsed within moments and there was simply nothing the Dead King could do about it. Which was good but I was still, unfortunately, rapidly hurting towards my death. That, uh, hadn't stopped while I was scheming. Fortunately others had noticed, and within moments the Summoner had brought around his wyvern-thing and even guided it to sweep me so I wouldn't break my legs landing on it. I gave him a thankful nod, then breathed out and opened a gate into Twilight in front of me.

A heartbeat later I stepped out of another gate onto the back of the vulture even as the Knightess turned to face me, longsword raised. She was a better swordswoman than me, I figured, and at the moment I didn't even have a sword. The Revenant reached behind her back, beneath a faded cloak, and to my surprise unsheathed another longsword. But instead of approaching me with both blades, she threw the fresh blade at my feet.

"A knight even in death, is it?" I mused out loud.

I was offered a salute, flat of the blade against her forehead, and nodded in return. I bent down to pick up the blade, shoulder wound stinging and already pulling on Night, but the expected betrayal never came. I was tempted, for a moment, to just blast her anyway. She might have been Callowan, once upon a time, but now whatever she might believe she was only a tool of the Dead King. And yet, as blood seeped down onto my breastplate and I watched this fair-haired killer standing across from me, I realized with a start that I wanted to beat her with a blade in hand. Wanted to give her that bit of dignity before oblivion took her, if I could. I spun the longsword, once and slowly, and though the weight was a little off it was no great hindrance.

"Catherine Foundling," I introduced myself. "Queen of Callow."

The pale dead face twisted into a smile.

"Aubrey Caen," she rasped. "Knight Errant, once."

I left my staff of yew standing, knowing it would not fall, and took a limping step forward. The air was crisp, this far up, and the afternoon's fading light cast us in relief as the wind howled around us. She took a step of her own, grip two-handed and pommel held above her head as she approached. I kept my guard low, knowing I'd not be faster than her to the strike – my kill lay in avoiding her blow and striking while she was extended. And beyond the cold bite of the wind, beyond the howl, I felt a warm breath against the back of my neck. A large thing looming behind me, fangs bared and eyes patient.

I smiled. Approve, do you?

The woman who'd once been the Knight Errant darted forward and struck with blinding quickness. I pivoted to the side, the same way another Knight had once taught me, and let the blow pass me – but one of her hands left the sword and she elbowed me with a steel-clad elbow. Or would have, if I'd not pressed the flat of my blade against the blow and pushed her back. She almost stumbled but turned it into a lateral swing. It found a parry waiting as I turned her blade and ripped it off her grasp. She was Named, even if dead, so she snatched it out of the air: but not before I slashed at her exposed face, drawing a deep bloodless cut across it.

I watched her, eyes unblinking, and felt something well up in me. Not Night, not power that was borrowed. It was all me, something born of Catherine Foundling and nothing else. My limbs felt limber, my hands steady, and when the Revenant struck again I knew she'd move before she did. The overhead cut was slapped aside, falling harmlessly beyond my shoulder, even as I struck her chin with the pommel and then, as she rocked back from the strength of the hit, measured my killing stroke through the neck. Or would have, had she not gone eerily still.

"I am not so helpful," Neshamah said, "as to provide you a whetstone for your Name."

The woman who had once been the Knight Errant sagged as he released her, falling to her knees, and her dead flesh began turning to flakes within her armour. She looked up, eyes almost pleading, and I breathed out.

Teeth gritted, I decapitated the Revenant.

Her head rolled and the Beast laid its head on my shoulder, its warmth approving. It was not a knight I was becoming, I thought.

My old friend had not come out for the fight, but for what it stood for: me, standing in judgement over others. Delivering it sword in hand. And it had earned weight, that the Knight Errant had once been Named. I sighed, letting the wind ruffle my hair. To my left, I found Indrani seated on Zombie's back and gesturing to catch my attention. She'd transferred the Huntress back onto the wyvern-thing, it looked like. I curtly signalled for her to ride towards the back of the vulture, then limped in that direction and snatched up my waiting staff. The construct began to spin, in attempt to throw me off, but it was too late.

Absent-mindedly I pulled at Night, weaving a gate into Twilight right in front of the construct as it sped forward, and leapt off its back.

Zombie caught me, Archer shuffling backwards to make room, and after some difficulty I sat the saddle. The longsword the dead woman had given me was not an exact fit for my scabbard, but it fit. It would have to suffice. A heartbeat later the vulture's momentum forced it to try to pass through the gate, where it suffered instead the Grey Pilgrim's burning hatred for the Dead King and all his works. Quite literally, as furious white flames devoured the necromantic construct until nothing was left but a handful of ashes scattering in the wind. I flicked my wrist, closing the gate shut, and finally allowed myself to feel pain and exhaustion.

"And now?" Archer asked.

"Now we head back," I replied. "And tell the army it's time to pick up the pace."

The Enemy knew we were coming, so the race against time had begun.

—

I clenched my jaw so I would not hiss as Senior Mage Jendayi healed the wound on my shoulder. I could have asked one of our priests to handle it instead and it would have been painless, but being healed with Light tended to screw with my ability to handle Night afterwards. Not majorly, but enough that precision work became difficult. Better to let one of my mages handle it, even if it stung as the flesh knit itself back together. Still, if nothing else the pain kept my mind focused on the here and now.

"Thank you, Senior Mage," I said, nodding my gratitude. "It was smoothly done."

Not compared to what Masego would have done, of course, but I'd been made clear to me over the years that this was a completely absurd standard to hold people to. The dark-skinned woman smiled and left the tent after requesting a check-up later tonight, leaving me to combat report turned war council unfolding around me.

"- the Black Queen personally slew the last in an honour duel, blade against blade," the Silver Huntress said.

She shot me an admiring look at that, and to my amusement so did Tazin and Aquiline. I became a little less amused when I considered how that little detail might have done months of work in trying to wean them of that practice.

"A whetstone for my Name," I dismissed. "Which slowly becomes clearer in shape."

And Gods Below, how large would the scope of it be for it to take so long to coalesce?

"Regardless," I continued, "the Dead King rode both Revenants at different times. There can be no denying that he is now aware of the existence of our column."

Even our most conservative estimates had been that we'd get two days before he caught on, so that wasn't a pleasant surprise. All those forward patrols we'd sent to sweep the lowlands in the last few months had failed to pay off, mostly out of what I'd consider bad luck. That force of two thousand that Robber and the rest had wiped out had clearly not been sent as scouts, after all. They'd not been the right make up of dead for that at all.

"Your presence will have told him this is a serious thrust," General Hune said. "Though we've kept our numbers unclear through your actions, so he won't be sure where our troops have been sent."

By which she meant he wouldn't be sure if our force, the visible one, was a distraction while another one stalked the Twilight Ways. Which was the case, but our numbers – seventy thousand men – were meant in part to dissuade him of that. Our reserve was less than half of my column, after all, and about that for the Iron Prince's army. When he got a good look at both our armies, which I intended to make him bleed to get, his conclusion should be that the numbers in the offensive meant we'd bet it all on two quick thrusts backed by Named.

"Agreed," Princess Beatrice said. "Though I'd recommend we make haste towards Lauzon's Hollow regardless. It is crucial we dictate the tempo if our surprise attack on les Soeurs Cigelin is to bear fruit."

I frowned. I was wary of hurrying forward heedlessly, as it happened. If the siege of the capital of Hainaut, our ultimate objective for this part of the campaign, was to be a success then we needed our supply lines clear up Julianne's Highway. Getting sloppy about clearing the lowlands as we advanced towards the Hollow was a good way to get sprung a nasty surprise when warbands of undead lying low united, though.

"With all due respect, ma'am, the reason we're not using the Ways to attack in the first place is that we need the highway clear for our supply lines," General Abigail quietly said. "There's no point getting to the capital if we starve while sieging it because the bread gets burned on the way."

I hid a smile. She was growing into the rank better, I decided, without my looking over her shoulder. Akua had been right about that.

"Then we split our forces," Lady Aquiline suggested. "Send out large warbands to clear the countryside of the enemy while the main column continues its advance."

"Split our forces while already outnumbered?" General Hune said. "A recipe of the enemy to roll us over piece by piece."

"We are outnumbered in principle, not in..." Ivah began then stopped, biting its lips. "These are not the correct words."

It turned to me, speaking a few sentences in Crepuscular. I nodded.

"The Lord of Silent Steps means we are outnumbered in a strategic sense, not a tactical one," I clarified. "I tend to agree. With the Twilight Ways we're quicker on the move than the dead, so we'd be able to afford sending out detachments to clear the countryside and still be assured we can concentrate the column before giving battle with the central enemy force."

At this point there was no denying that the enemy would move into the Hollow long before we were in a position to contest it. I'd be surprised if those one hundred thousand dead weren't already on the march as we spoke.

"If the Enemy fights as we want him to, and sends his soldiers to the man the Hollow," Captain Reinald pointed out. "This assessment depends on the Hidden Horror holding up in his defences instead of taking the field."

The two fantassin captains had been quiet in this council, aware that out on march their influence was not the same as in camp. Not even the snippiest of mercenaries would seriously threaten to walk in the middle of an offensive into the territory held by the Dead King. It'd be a death warrant for them, if nothing else.

"He's right," the Silver Huntress said. "We haven't gotten eyes on the enemy yet, Your Majesty. I'd like your permission to take a band out for a deep reconnaissance."

I mulled over that a moment. By a band she meant a band of five, so that was more or less a third of the Named with this army that'd be risked on this jaunt. Mind you, having actual hard information about where the enemy army was would be damned useful and sending heroes into an adventure of this sort a lot less dangerous in practice than it sounded. I eventually nodded.

"You'll take the Headhunter with you," I said. "Any preferences for the rest?"

"The Vagrant Spear," she immediately said, "and the Silent Guardian."

She paused for a moment, deep in thought.

"And the Rogue Sorcerer, if you have no other use for him?" she tentatively asked.

"Take him," I agreed. "In and out, Huntress. Don't let yourself be drawn into a scrap."

"As you say, Black Queen," she smiled, offering a quick bow.

She offered another one to the room at large, and departed with haste. My gaze returned to the rest of the war council.

"You've convinced me with the war parties, Lady Aquiline," I said. "I'll detach ten thousand drow under Lord Ivah to sweep the lowlands, as well as a fighting escort that can handle the daytime."

It couldn't be the Levantines, I decided. They were good at light warfare, I wouldn't pretend otherwise, but they were also a lot more likely to let themselves be drawn into unnecessary battles than a more discipline force. I wanted them close so I could keep an eye on them.

"I would volunteer for such a task if you'll allow it, Your Majesty," Captain-General Catalina spoke up. "My company can discharge these duties skillfully."

I glanced at Princess Beatrice, who subtly nodded. Good, she agreed this seemed like a decent idea then.

"Take your pick of the companies, no more than eight thousand total," I said. "You will be sharing command with Lord Ivah, I'll leave the details of the sweep to you."

"By your command, Your Majesty," the fantassin replied.

"Chno Sve Noc," Ivah simply said, inclining its head.

I rolled my shoulder, finding it stretched taut from the healing but no longer painful. Good work by Jendayi, that.

"As for the rest of us, we'll continue our advance at the quickest sustainable pace," I said. "Let's get to it, people – the Enemy won't dawdle, so neither should we."

Skraeling

Damn. The more that Catherine comes into her name the more excited I get. Also

My old friend had not come out for the fight, but for what it stood for: me, standing in judgement over web serials. Delivering it Vote in hand.

Liliet

...I cannot lie. this one is good

ohJohn

It helps to include a link!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

shimizubad

It's just me or her shoulder healed too quickly narrative wise? Nice chapter by the way, I was getting thirsty for some action even if I like the political and strategic side of the story.

Big Brother

Remember, even Name-incurrents get the superior effects on their bodies, though not to the level that full Named do.

lordcirth

The injury itself isn't narratively lasting; it is merely there to show that the fight was not a stomp. Once that has been achieved, it can vanish by the next scene.

Tenthyr

A name that wants her to stand judgement, and a new name of such vast scope that it's taking forever to crystallize even now, with Catherine directly aware of the presence of her Name again. Not much to go on for us, but exciting all the same.

Salt

The Judgement part has a potential narrative danger that she needs to watch out for, though. The latest conversation with the Pilgrim had him make an almost prophetic old wise-man prediction that she might eventually come into conflict with Hanno, we know Hanno believes no mortal deserves to stand in judgement over anyone.

An avoidable arrow for sure, but she needs to be wary of it so it can't be used as a wedge between allies at a bad moment. Any time you get overlapping themes in Names, you usually end up with very positive or very negative reactions (easy example are the mage Named)

caoimhinh

Well, she is not exactly the judge of Named, but pretty close.

She is already guiding the whole continent into a new era and setting the rules of engagement between the chosen of Above and Below on Calernia. She is regulating the conflicts.

Though it would be kind of cool if she had an Aspect called Judge just so she could be witty to Hanno and his whole "I do not judge" motto. Hahaha.

Although, thinking about it, Sentence seems more fitting for Catherine.

Do0d

Guiding Calernia ... What if her new name is Practical Guide, although that might be too on the nose.

caoimhinh

I'm fine with it just being the Guide.

Do0d

I've been toying with the idea for a few weeks. Mostly because in Cat's first Name-dream, she basically told below: you're doing it wrong, watch me this is how it's done.

Casey Glick

The Practical Guide

Dathrax

Warden of the East. Her nascent name surged when Catherine was alone as the counterpart of the First Prince, who is known to have refused the Name of Warden of the West. Additionally, the Doddering Sage said her name was paired with one who had refused the call, reinforcing that she is the counterpart of the Warden of the West, the Warden of the East.

RoflCat

So, just a random idea: What if her Name is about giving 'ending' to another Name? Especially ones whose Story has been disrupted.

For the Errant Knight, it was the final honorable duel that would've left her accepting of her death such that the Story weight would've made her soul broke free of Dead King's control and pass on.

Considering Wandering Bard, such a Name would be extremely relevant in permanently ending her.

eleutheriahaswon

...oh shit. That... that would actually fit Cat SO WELL. "The Ender of Stories," someone who understands stories, intuitively, magnificently – but does not love them. Someone who seeks to break them, to recraft them, to end them. The one who stands in judgement over Fate and stories and the people caught up in them and winnows the tangled web, thins the field to allow new things to grow.

I'm putting my money down on something like this.

Miles

So basically an Anti-Bard name

Crash

Bards going to be delighted, she's still relevant as opposition to Cat's name AND she gets to finally die.

(Honestly at his point I'm with her on this, just let her die folks. She wants it so bad she almost killed Hakram for it.)

Curtopolis

What was it Kairos said? That every time the angels let her get away with defying them it cements her position as someone able to get away with that shit? Which fits with the judgement over fate thing. But I'm thinking more of a breaker of dates kind of thing. Kind of an opposite side of the bards coin. Someone who sees fate forming around her and shatters the chains rather than weaving them

Derek Anderson

Denouement would be a good word, if we're not picky about languages.

rue

If Catherine gets a name which reeks of Judgement, I wonder if one aspect might be Forgive, and whether that aspect might heal physical wounds, in particular, those of Hakram.

Mental Mouse

I'm not sure the Name itself is going to be fundamentally about Judgement... But at this point, she's touched and been touched by three Choirs, each of which left their mark on her. And one of those is Judgement.

DoOd

The three Choirs she interacted with directly are, in order, Contrition, Endurance and Mercy. She was never touched by Judgement unless you count her friendship with Hanno.

Mental Mouse

She tangled with Judgement at the trial, no? When did she face Endurance?

DoOd

At the trial, she stopped Mercy from smiting everyone around along with Kairos. Judgement's attention was solely on Hierarch. Endurance is the Choir she called bottom feeders before the 10th crusade was called.

Clint

And those three choirs really are what she's all about.

Doing evil for the greater good – that's Mercy in a nutshell. What she's trying to do to Akua is Contrition. And she's always been about putting herself in harm's way to protect Callow and her people from harm – that's Endurance.

There's no way the First Under the Night could get a Hero name, is there? (As an added bonus, it would completely screw up the pre-Accords T&T, because she couldn't be the head villain representative anymore, and there's really no one she could trust to take that over.)

Javvies

Eh, unless she gets a blatantly Heroic Name and/or stays throwing Light around, she'll be assumed to have a Villain Name by just about everyone, except possibly Tariq (because of Behold/his direct line to the Ophanim), Augur (because precog/seer), and Masego (because he's the fucking Heirophant and he knows Cat).

At least, until she starts showing signs of aging. Then questions would be asked ... but it's pretty certain that she's not going to be aging at anything near mortal human standard rates for at least as long as she's First Under the Night, so there's no telling how long that might take. Plus, let's not forget that she wasn't noticeably affected by the pocket of fast aging that she killed Saint of Swords with, and eleven years would be noticeable with normal human aging.

Crash

Wouldn't it be fun if each of her aspects was choir related? I like this idea very much.

Ignae

I actually have a nagging suspicion that her name might actually be "Justice". Sorry in advance for the lightly edited, decently long ramble.

1.Many of the other people she interacts with in the plot follow Major Arcana symbolism or literally take their names; Hierophant, Empress, The Tower, Death (either as Neshamah, or literally as he's depicted as a Black Knight on a pale horse), the Hermit (the grey pilgrim), The fool (the wandering bard), the Devil (The Diabolist) the High Priestesses, etc. I could see her maybe being Judgement, as Judgement's imagery could also indicate a somehow-heaven-ordained support for Necromancy, which would be a fascinating foil to Neshamah, but Judgement is already a choir.

2. In the Major Arcana, Justice is a woman crowned, with a sword in one hand and scales in the other. Catherine's literal standard is a crown and a sword on a set of scales, with the motto "Justice only matters to the Just".

3. Her current character arc is trying to create and then enforce "equalizing" terms between Named, keeping Unnamed people as safe as possible from their shenanigans and, in effect, creating the first(?) real system for redress of grievances between people whose lives are either so dramatic or tragic that they sweep up everyone near them with them. A logical conclusion of her plans could be far fewer names as a result; a character who seeks to prevent or control even future "injustices" would be a good candidate for Justice.

4. She, at every possible move, calculates her moves and decisions along an incredibly rigorous set of criteria; she tries to do what is best, for the most people she considers to be innocent/deserving, is as merciful as she believes she can get away with without undermining her long term plans to do what is best for the most people, and also does her absolute best to honor contracts and agreements that she makes, to the point of refusing to break them even when a Hero would justify it being for the "greater good" or a Villain would simply do as they wish. She has an inner sense of righteousness that comes from layering multiple, increasingly restrictive standards of ethics over each other, not picking and choosing from many, choosing only one, or abandoning them.

5. Craving what you believe is owed to you, is at the heart of many Named narratives. What Catherine has always craved is less Named dickery in average people's lives, and overall less Named. Her Name seeks to resolve and end other name's plots; her Name dances her out of following tropes, her Name keeps her on the sidelines of a hundred other Name stories but you see her hand guiding them. I would argue this pushes her towards an absolutely massive Name; similar to "Narrator", like the Wandering Bard.

Javvies

I'm thinking Cat's Name is going to be something the lines of Arbitrator.

The Dead King knows they're coming in force and are serious about it.

That's not going to be good.

At this point if the Dead King fights the way they want him to, it would almost have to be a trap of some kind.

Elaikases

Yep. Not Black Knight.

Though "Intercessor" is a real possibility.

Klatn Yelox

I have been thinking Arbiter myself for a while.

Eleron Pfoutz

Black Arbiter.

NerfContessa

Dark Arbiter of Stories, Judge 9f endings, the Guide of calernia future. A mouthful... DAoSJoEtGoCF.

Djinn O'Cide

Go. Vote. Here: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Daniel

I predict she'll be Justice Of The Peace, and the void left by the Choir of Justice left somehow makes that name more powerful.

Good chapter! I especially like the contributions of Abigail and Ivah.

I have a feeling this will be the longest of the books by far.

Cicero

Taking some risks there Cat.

You're not a hero, so you can't be as sure of Heaven's aid as the Silver Huntress is.

Zggt

She can be sure Above will not interfere with her as long as she's fighting against the Dead King. Cat has told off choirs three times and had them obey, expects them to fall in line against the greater foes, and works around their limits regularly. At the point you are referencing, her name may very well have gained a part of it which can be as sure of aid as much as any Hero... which is exactly why the Dead King nope'd away (that "whetsone" comment).

Those risks are the ones that Cat has always taken, when it comes to both Above and Below. And it's becoming a part of her Name.

impolitic

Catherine Foundling, Preacher to the Choirs.

Daniel E

Take my vote and get out of my sight.

Salt

Pretty measured risks this time though, all in all. Going in first so providence could work through the huntress to bail out an ally in the nick of time is narratively a pretty safe move. Cat can't wield providence, but the Huntress sure can.

The duel with the Knight was also measured, and actually imo a mistake on the Dead King's part. Measured since presumably her recognition of the revenant's heraldry, it being a Knightess at all, and the Revenant's rather positive reaction to finding out she was a Queen of Callow likely means this one used to be a Callowan Named. Being ended by the current generation of Named wartime Callowan ruler is about as fitting-end as it gets. Especially since Cat started out as the Squire to one of the most skilled Named Knights on the continent, one that specifically leverages subtlety and skill to make up for lack of power.

Mistake, since this is the second time in recent memory that Cat has won a formalized duel (not just a random lvl), against an entity who is way above her weight class for brawling, purely due to a fitting story; the first one being the Fae lord during the arsenal attack.

Once is a fluke, twice is suspicious, thrice is a pattern. The Dead King doesn't actually know that this is the second time since he had no eyes in the Arsenal, and pulling back the Knight Errant after she clearly already lost the duel was far too late. I don't think he actually knows that he's only one more formal duel away from accidentally giving away a solid tool to Cat, for her narrative arsenal of stories.

caoimhinh

I don't know. This didn't seem like Catherine was rationalizing and taking measured risks (when that has happened before, the text shows us her thoughts about it). This was more Catherine jumping in headfirst to a fight against two Revenants because of a gut feeling or instinct. Sure, she knew it had to be a fight and she could dive into the fight trusting that there were people having her back, but this wasn't really a cool-headed decision. Catherine was eager for that fight. The whole time she was grinning and laughing.

ohJohn

The Knightess has both the heraldry of and surname Caen. From Chapter 51 (Twilight) of the last book:

"Before long I was hobbling down into Liesse, through the broken palace of the proud and ancient House of Caen – gone from Callow, like the city they'd once ruled."

(also Cat mentions the Knightess used to be Callowan in this chapter :P)

TalanelatElin

The White Knight was originally supposed to be Above's answer to Catherine. Maybe it's being continued here: Hanno does not judge. She is more than happy to.

softle

God damn cat is badass

It was a bit confusing tracking where the fight was happening: the back of the vulture being called "the ground" twice made it difficult, but on reread knowing that was the case it felt cleae

caoimhinh

Yeah. It also felt like the Dead King was just kind of passive during the whole fight, just letting it all happen or making decisions too slowly, not to mention without even trying to take advantage of the fact that they were who knows how many feet above the ground.

I mean, there thirteen other constructs there, but they just fled away once the battle started and the vulture didn't do anything except spinning once and then turn around after Catherine's duel with the Knight Errant was over.

ohJohN

Idk, I think Neshamah did fine with the resources available, Cat's party just outclassed his.

The buzzards immediately scattering was good tactics by DK: they're simple constructs that aren't gonna do shit against 4 Named, that's what the Revenants are for. His immediate goal was finding out the opposing force's numbers, so if even one escaped, it could continue scouting. (Also I'm pretty sure Indrani took them all out almost immediately – 4 were down before Cat even finished gating onto the vulture – so there wasn't much opportunity for them to do anything else.)

The vulture was more useful in that fight as mobility for the Revenants, and the first roll was smart, interrupting Cat's "magic trick" and letting Robes throw some lightning. But after Robes bit the dust, the (presumably short-range) Knightess would be useless without a platform, while Cat had two flying mounts available – the vulture couldn't do much without effectively sacrificing the second Revenant.

Miles

Probably dealing with some lag there. A seemingly op ability must come with some downsides to avoid too many fingers on the scale and ping woes seem appropriate for what the ability is.

Hardcore Heathen

I liked the bit about her Name wanting her to stand in judgment over people, but the way we got there frustrates me: the duel. Cat's first encounter with a Named opponent as the Squire was when the Shining Prince challenged her to a duel. The switch away from mundane pragmatism to narrative showmanship seems to clash with a lot of her history.

lordcirth

Perhaps the point is that in order to effectively lead and unite, she must sometimes put on a show? Being openly and utterly utilitarian/pragmatic tends to be bad for morale and thus not actually pragmatic.

sengachi

The thing is that her early pragmatism was also narrative showmanship, just of a different stripe. Plucky upstart doesn't give a damn about your conventions and just gets the job done was a narrative horse to ride, albeit backed by the genuine benefits of pragmatism.

Now though, Catherine is genuinely powerful enough to fight a simple Revenant solo and be sure of her victory, so she pragmatically does so for the extra benefits it provides. She puts on a show of being narratively flashy, as a pragmatic move.

Miles

Do you realize how close she is to Ranger's level now?

Cat beat 2 revenants with the help of a living distraction vs Ranger's 4 revenants solo, with similar levels of wounds at the led of the fight. She's caught up enough that we can make a coherent comparison. Holy jalapenos.

Matthew Wells

When did Ranger solo 4 revenants? I only remember 2.

Salt

I read it as a narrative win, with the details of the duel not actually mattering. Pragmatism by narrative showmanship, exactly like her rather dramatically pulling a sword from a stone against William and Akua

The revenant was alone on the end of a losing fight as a once-honorable Knight turned undead abomination against her will. Cat recognized its heraldry, it was a Knight (which Callow is known for), and it was visibly happy to find out that Cat was an anointed Queen of Callow. Meaning all in all that it was likely an old Callowan Hero, or at least close enough to fit the story.

A Named warrior queen of Callow ending the miserable unlife of an old Callowan Knight is about as fitting an end you could get, especially since Cat started out a Squire to the most prominent Knight of a generation. That fight was won the moment she announced her royal title and the Revenant reacted well. The actual swinging of metal sticks that followed was more or less just a formality.

Albert Wen

Well it was a very one-sided duel, her judgment uncontested and crushing. I think it still carries the same tone as her execution of the Shining Prince, which itself was a very dramatic moment.

I've just made this name up

Perhaps her name will be something g along the lines of The Long Price.

sengachi

Oh. OH. You just made me realize something.

Catherine's nascent name got all rumbly over her standing in judgement.

I'm betting she's going to get her name when whatever is coming to a head with Akua finally comes due, and the long price, Catherine's sentence for her crime, comes due.

hakureireimu

I think it's because Villains are all about Might makes right, so she has to triumph over the Revenant first.

shadw21

Well the Knight Errant did have her helmet on, so she got a pass on getting an arrow to the throat.

Flameburst

A new name of vast scope based on judgement. With a relatively recent vacancy left by the choir of judgement. Someone is going to fill a large narrative role.

Burlyraven

Okay, so I think Cat's Name is meant to be a break-glass-to-restore-Callow Name, because her story keeps finding weight in finding, putting down, and receiving recognition from, exalted dead Callowans. This is putting aside the whole standing in judgement thing, and any other specific aspects the Name drifts towards, and speaking entirely of the role it's seeking to fill. If/when Cat follows through on her abdication, it's very likely to establish the rule that the Name is powerful, but only ever to be worn by those clearing the ledger of the long prices, purifying corruption, reestablishing glory, etc.

What that means for later years in Cat's life, or whether the Name would be neutral or Villainous is another matter completely.

KageLupus

I disagree with Cat's name being related to Callow, actually. In my mind, those narrative beats are the trap. Those moments where something deeply Callowan and meaningful happen are an enticement, something to keep Cat playing the same game that Above and Below have been running forever. The fact that she left the old king's sword in the Twilight Ways and that she didn't actually get a Name from fighting the undead Knight errant is evidence that Cat isn't falling for it, I think.

Cat has been setup as the successor of both Black and the Grey Pilgrim, and I think that her eventual Name and role is going to be something very similar to that. She will be the wandering boogeyman that travels Calernia, hunting down Named of any alignment who go against the Accords. Originally I thought that she would stay and teach at her new Named academy, but the more I think about the more I think she will leave that role to others. Cat constantly talks about how the responsibilities of ruling chafe at her, and how she only does it because no one else can be trusted to do it right. I think that if she had the choice she would rather be a travelling enforcer than a principal.

Burlyraven

Her whole repeatedly stated life plan is to become a principal/ruler/however you wish to phrase it and spend a sizable portion of her life governing Cardinal once it is founded, acting as an arbiter. In this very chapter she talks about not being a Knight, and hints at taking on a Name at a more judicial level than an enforcer. Her beginning was as she who would restore Callow by any means necessary, and her ending will be the same (at least as far as this story is concerned).

Burlyraven

Also just realized that this is the second(?) time someone has looked gratefully at her as she freed them from suffering by death.

Clint

Merciful Executioner?

hakureireimu

Except Callow is already restored; a Name is not needed for that. Besides her ambition is much bigger than just Callow.

mamm0nn

So I think we can all agree that this whole confident "We can still salvage this." attitude of the Dead King not yet knowing all of their moves and expectations and seeking to smash their whole force underfoot is just wishful thinking on Cat's part, right?

A scout, sure, but a scout with two Named to answer their approach and knowing this two days before even their most conservative estimates means that he knows / anticipates a lot more than she gives him credit for.

Oshi

Contingencies.

The_Piman

I think it might be to ensure providence is on their side, actually. If the first step succeeds, they are in a really good position strategically. If it fails, they know they aren't following a villainous story, and so providence will probably help them out later. Especially since General Abigail is involved.

Matthew Wells

Come to think of it, I could absolutely see the Reluctant General clawing her way out of an ambush.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Zombie's wings (extra space in front) it hardly equal > it was hardly equal scatter into every > scatter in every count to the > count the Dead Kings > Dead King
as silver at > as silver as me me > me touched the ground (this is on the back of the construct) against the ground first (^) Laughing I > Laughing, I blond locks (should be blonde if she's female) doing being > doing better from a defensive one form (something's wrong here)

I'd been made > it'd been made to combat report > to the combat report recipe of the > recipe for the were are > we are the man the > man the
"He's right," (extra space in front) sort a lot > sort was a lot discipline force > disciplined force

kmucha31

From what we've seen so far my guess for Cat's upcoming name is the Arbiter or something like it. I doubt it's a name about rule as she plans to abdicate the throne and once she does so it doesn't really end her story. Not with how she's going to move to Cardinal.

Mental Mouse

I'm still rooting for her to become the Practical Guide. The ultimate title drop.

KageLupus

Cat's last line reminds me of my favorite bit of Magic the Gathering flavor text:
"Death never stops to rest. Neither can we."

That goes from being really defiant when said by a Battlefield Medic, to really ominous when Cat is talking about the Dead King and his hordes of monsters.

Dillon

Weirdly enough, Arbiter is what I immediately thought as well.

Per our late Tyrant, Cat wants peace more than anything. She wants order, and her Callowan blood calls her to make others answer for their slights.

Tie that in with Cardinal and it seems like her Name will have to do with being a judge and enforcer of other Names.

Some Smartass

Wait, why is she still riding Zombie, the most obvious sleeper agent in this entire crusade?

shadw21

Nah, that goes to Stealth Goat, lurking stealthily in the background since the end of book 1.

Liliet

Zombie is more of a summoned spirit than an undead.

Do0d

I'd say that Zombie is a fae playing the role of an undead horse

Liliet

An undead horse fae, I would say. It's not like there's anything more to the fae than the role they play.

Theodor Belaire

Honestly I was 100% expecting the sword to explode as soon as Cat picked it up.

Dsylexic Wofl

Harbinger. Quite literally a Named with that name would be the End pf Something or someone. For the bard and Neshamah it would be fitting

Black Spiral Dancer

"All this took time to describe but was actually done in minutes" is what a Wuxia would say.

Donut

At first I thought Occam's Razor will apply, and Catherine's Name will simply be Black Queen. However, she's showing quite the combat proficiency with these duels, which is not what one expects from a royal Name, considering Malicia's apparent Aspects.

My next thought is that she'll be the new Black Knight; after all, she made the comment about having to settle the East "the hard way", causing her Beast to stir.

Continuing down this road, she will remain a priestess of Sve Noc, AND have combat prowess, so perhaps she will become Black Paladin, thereby blending her fighting skills with her divine blessings.

Daniel E

With the Choir of Judgement still on holiday, I'm throwing in my hat with the 'Intercessor' crowd. Cat's name would be a much more literal interpretation than the pseudo-insult attributed to The Wandering Bard. The textbook definition is "a person who intervenes on behalf of another, especially by prayer."

dadycoool

Gotta say, Neshama was very rude this chapter. First he refuses to watch Cat's magic trick, then he interferes in the duel between Queen and Knight.

Praetorian

Cathrine foundling- Black subjugator
The name can have a more or less profound context depending on how hard she pushes the narrative.

Mental Mouse

> "I am not so helpful," Neshamah said, "as to provide you a whetstone for your Name."

Too late.

Andrey Kravchuk

Maybe it's a common knowledge already, but if you can gate a vulture so easily, why not make it BEFORE all these honor duels?

Chapter 54: King's Fianchetto

"That there is little reason to war should be no surprise, for war is never the choice of reasonable men."

– Basileus Stavros Trakas of Nicae

It wouldn't be cheap.

The pair from the adjunct secretariat had been dismissed, leaving me with a pile of papers where the words 'maybe' and 'should' came up uncomfortably often. While the phalanges who'd spoken to me – an orc and a Callowan, nice touch that – had been well-versed in the details, looking at the plans I recognized the careful method that lay behind them. This was Hakram's proposal, and not one he'd begun working on recently. Too much groundwork had been laid, and some of those numbers would have taken months to get. I was honestly astonished he'd managed to get his hands on estimated fighting strength for the greatest of the Clans, as the Jacks were completely blind in the Steppes.

As far as proposals meant it was well-crafted, and made it clear that not only was propping up an orc state in the Steppes achievable but it would benefit Callow in several practical ways. Establishing treaties with orc leadership and trading ties with western clans would ensure that raiding of my kingdom did not resume down the line, while a mutual defence pact would mean that if the Dread Empire turned on us both Wolof and Okoro would be knocked out of the war before the first sword was drawn. The Clans weren't rich in much besides amber and fur, but trading those goods south in Mercantis would mean steep profits for Callowan traders given the demand for both.

There'd be no need for actual Callowan military involvement either, as simply arming the Red Shields and the Howling Wolves up to Army of Callow standards would allow them to sweep through Malicia's allies in the Clans and become a thorn in the Tower's side in northern Praes. From there different manners of support could be offered, grain and cattle and craft goods, while the Clans stabilized as an independent polity and pressured the Wasteland with their raiders.

But there were... issues. For one, orcs didn't have a great record when it came to keeping to treaties – especially treaties binding multiple clans, considering the independent bent of their chiefs. The trade outlined would become profitable in the long term, yes, but in the short one it was a drain on the already strained treasury of Callow. It'd also represent an escalation of our current manner of war with the Tower, struggles abroad through intermediaries, to something significantly more aggressive. There was a difference between backing rival parts of the League and arming rebels in Malicia's backyard. This would prompt retaliation, one that Callow was currently ill-equipped to handle.

And the truth was that, in the end, I couldn't be sure the orcs even would stay an independent nation for long. If Black claimed the Tower then given his popularity up north he shouldn't find it overly difficult to bring the Clans back into the fold. Meaning I would have pissed away gold, political capital – it was going to be a difficult sell in Laure to arm greenskins largely at our expense, to say the least – and risked retaliation all to strengthen soon-to-be Tower loyalists. Sure they'd be a pain in Malicia's neck for a while, but was that small a gain really worth such a significant investment? Much as I would have preferred for the answer to be a different one, deep down I knew it was not. I sighed and leaned back into my seat, the lights of the camp around me dimly visible through the entrance flaps of my tent.

I poured myself a finger of brandy, and tried to think of a reason for me to back this that wasn't just making Hakram happy. He'd been good, for a very long time, about never putting me in a position like this – having to choose between him and duty. So damned good I'd allowed myself to forget he wanted things at all. That was a dangerous thing to ignore in my right hand, the keeper of so many of my secrets. But I couldn't just empty my kingdom's coffers just to please him, could I? Gods I rather wanted to, if only so things between us could go back to normal, but it wouldn't be that simple would it?

No, I suspected that if anything accepting when I had so many qualms would only make things worse.

I cast a baleful look at a sheet of parchment detailing the costs and benefits of arming orcs in Callowan steel instead of sending them shipments of dwarven armaments bought in Mercantis, passing a hand through my hair. I'd refrained from calling on Akua when considering this, wanting no contrary opinion tainting my thoughts, and forced myself not to send for Scribe – even though she'd likely have better force estimates for the Clans than anything my people had been able to dig up, on top of the lay of the more recent politics.

"I can't accept this," I admitted to myself quietly.

It was a stark enough admission that I punctuated it by guzzling down the brandy, the burn in my throat and belly distracting from the unpleasantness. I wiped my lips afterwards, reaching for a quill and inkwell, and pawed around until I found a sheath of parchment I could use. I couldn't accept this, I thought but I could at least make it clear why I couldn't accept it. It was better than just refusing, and letting silence have the day. The words came easy, when I got into it, and I found further reasons to hesitate even as I wrote.

For one, the Clans were currently dependent on Praes for many goods and the northernmost Soninke holdings much closer than Callow – how could I be assured the Steppes wouldn't just be pulled back into an eastern alliance down the line by simple dint of needing what the Wasteland could provide quicker than my people could provide it? Callowans were not known as great merchants, and there was no port up the Wasiliti for our river barges to land that wasn't in Praesi hands. I needed answer to more than a dozen questions just as crucial, and so I asked them all. I cannot in good conscience commit to this proposal at is stands, I added at the end. I would, however, be willing to entertain a revised one addressing my concerns.

I bit my lip, a few drops of ink dripping down as my hand hesitated. I look forward to seeing your work, I began, then crossed it out. I expect I will soon see... No, I thought, and crossed it out again. I hope that, crossed. I believe that there is merit to this, I finally allowed, and look forward to the improvements.

The queen would not allow the woman to say sorry, so this was as close as I'd ever get to saying the word to Hakram.

—

I slept uneasily and woke up already tired.

Though we both knew he'd read my answer, Adjutant did not speak a word of it as we ate breakfast and I did not press the matter. While I'd slept the campaign had continued, the ten thousand Firstborn still with my army hunting down nearby wandering bands of undead in the lowlands and wiping them out under moonlight. They'd retreated back to camp before dawn and were now sleeping through it as the remainder of our column prepared to resume the march. I'd be leaving the Third under General Abigail to protect them while our march picked up again, the Levantines once more serving as vanguard.

I'd pulled at the leash yesterday and gone out to fight, but I'd not get such an opportunity again anytime soon. There was no Juniper for me to hand command to as I went hunting for trouble, much to my displeasure – it was my command, for better or worse. The detachments of fantassins and drow we'd sent out yesterday had dug in through dawn but would begin sweeping the region clear of undead soon enough: I got regular reports from both Ivah and Captain-General Catalina about their progress. It looked to be slim pickings, with the enemy force holed up in Luciennerie having sent no raiders down the blue road that we could find.

That worried me.

Why was the Dead King not reacting to our advance? There were three forces that were in position to prove a threat for the offensive. First was the hundred thousand army ahead of my column, no doubt well on its way to Lauzon's Hollow by now. Another of at least one hundred thousand was holding Juvelun to the east, but we were trying to bait it out with Prince Klaus' army. A force at least as large as the others was in Luciennerie, though, and while Princess Rozala was supposed to send raiders out to worry it the absence of reaction from there was raising my hackles.

Luciennerie was a fortress, it wouldn't be easy for raiders to take even if a few dozen thousand dead were sent down to march on our defensive lines north of Arbusans. It was what I would have done, in the Dead King's place: mounted a large enough assault on that defence that my column was forced to strip away detachments to reinforce. It'd weaken us before the clash at the Hollow, and in the worst possible case the Dead King would break through the fort and force our arriving reinforcements from Callow and Procer to face him in a costly field battle before his marauders were driven back.

So why was there only silence from the northwest?

My Lord of Silent Steps had correctly estimated that east of Julianne's Highway was the region I wanted cleared most thoroughly, and it had acted consequently: the Firstborn had gone out there in force overnight and savaged the enemy warbands in the area thoroughly. They'd also paid particular attention to keeping the connection between the mining roads of the east and the Highway clear, which I send a commendation for. So long as that road remained open, the Iron Prince could keep sending us messengers even when he got into territories where scrying broke down. My column's advance went uncontested through the rest of the day, the field ours in every direction according to the reports of my scout. Some of my commanders came to believe we'd caught the Hidden Horror by surprise with our advance, that our timing had been apt.

He might have been focusing his attentions on the offensive against Cleves, they said, the one headed towards Trifelin. Our two-pronged offensive might have caught him with his forces deployed in the wrong places. Some of General Hune's staff argued for us to increase the speed of our offensive because of this theory, and the notion was popular with Princess Beatrice and her army. They were eager to reclaim their capital from Keter, it was a point of pride for them. I stamped down on their ardour, as unless their guesswork was confirmed I saw no reason to change our campaign plan. Just because we could not see the Dead King's preparations did not mean they weren't waiting for us.

On the third day of the march, early in the morning, I got word from Prince Klaus. When he'd sent his messenger his army had just passed Juvelun, where to his dismay the enemy army had refused to engage even when he'd skirmished provocatively. Our early hopes that the raids on his army were the prelude to a greater attack seemed in vain. With the hope of baiting the enemy into a field battle easily gone, he'd followed our contingency plan and begun a forced march towards Malmedit. That would force the enemy army to either follow or risk losing the tunnels there, but noted it would not be difficult for him to keep in contact with my army from now on.

He wished me luck, and in silence I wished him the same. It was not without risks, marching on Malmedit: it left his supply lines open for the enemy to raid, or to block entirely if they decided to leave Juvelun and advance against his back.

It was only half a bell before sundown that I finally got an explanation as to why Luciennerie had gone silent. Princess Rozala sent word by scrying that not only had Keter begun the expected offensive against Trifelin, where she'd fought a field battle and was now suffering a siege, but that there seemed to be another attack afoot. The raiding detachments she'd sent to harass the army in Luciennerie had been ambushed and driven back, but not before catching sight of a Keteran host marching towards the fortress they'd come from. The same one anchoring her eastern flank, Coudrent. My fingers clenched until the knuckles went white when I heard the news.

If the fortress fell, Cleves was in trouble. The dead would have access to the soft underbelly of the principality, and not only would they be able to cut the supply lines of the far-flung capital of Cleves but they'd also be able to strike at the besieged army in Trifelin from behind. It'd be a crippling blow. One that could potentially turn our currently steadiest front into a howling disaster over the span of a bare few months. There were Named in Coudrent, though, and a significant defensive force. The fortress would not fall easily. Still, it now looked like the Dead King had decided to gamble on breaking Cleves before we could retake Hainaut.

He must have realized that we'd weakened the defences there to strengthen our offensive here, in troops and Named. It was a bold strategy from an opponent usually more inclined towards patience, but then he could afford the losses better than we could: every battle refilled his ranks while ours dwindled. It would have been a mistake to hide this from my highest officers, so on the same evening I called another war council. It was taken with equanimity on the surface, but it was only skin deep.

"It might be best to end the offensive for now," Razin Tanja reluctantly said, "and instead reinforce Coudrent through the Twilight Ways."

I cocked an eyebrow, almost impressed. It'd be a strategic blunder to do that, in my opinion, but it showed forethought on his part that'd been entirely absent back when we'd tangled at Sarcella. He could recognize, at least, that losing Cleves would be a greater loss than winning Hainaut would be a gain.

"The Hidden Horror could be baiting us," Aquiline reminded him. "We do not know much of what happened out west for certain."

"If anything this reinforces the need to advance swiftly," Grandmaster Talbot argued. "If we smash our way up the Highway, the enemy might be forced to withdraw the forces they sent out or face losing Hainaut largely uncontested."

"Beg your pardon, lord, but it's only uncontested if the army in Juvelun does what we want and chases the Iron Prince," General

Abigail said. "Might be we could take that for granted before, but I'm not so sure we can now."

"Agreed," Princess Beatrice said, startling my general. "Though I would suggest that is even more of a reason to push forward quickly. Unless we become a serious threat on the Enemy's hold of Hainaut, he has no reason to reconsider his offensives. The army in the Hollow needs to be shattered, and soon."

I stayed silence, wanting all here to air their thoughts, but I tended to side with Beatrice Volignac in this. There were still four days of marching between us and the Hollow, if we stayed on Creation, which was starting to look like too long. The Dead King wouldn't have made a move against Coudrent if he didn't believe he could take the fortress, Named or not, and to be honest I was starting to suspect the attack on Trifelin was not to take the place – Rozala Malanza had made it into a butcher's yard for anyone trying to take it – but instead to pin down the Princess of Aquitan's army so it couldn't relieve Coudrent.

"We can't fight a battle with our column spread out as it currently is," General Hune pointed out. "We'll need to recall the drow and the mercenaries first and that'll take at least a day."

A generous estimate. The distances involved were not small, there were no real roads to speak of out there and the forces in question were significantly spread out. Even if we sent the order in an hour, I doubted we'd gather everyone here by tomorrow. I'd bet the morning after, the dawn of our campaign's fifth day, if we were lucky and the fantassins ran themselves ragged.

"It will slow us down to wait for them," Aquiline pointed out.

"Attacking an entrenched force with superior numbers without our full strength would be foolish," Hune bluntly replied.

"We don't need to launch an assault outright," I noted. "We can set up camp facing the Hollow and prepare for battle, and order the detachments to catch up to us there."

It'd have the benefit of having those detachments sweep through the upper lowlands on both sides as they joined us, flushing out undead warbands still in hiding.

"And if the enemy comes out to fight?" Princess Beatrice asked.

"Gods, if only," I wolfishly smiled.

General Abigail let out a small trilling laugh, which sounded either keen or terrified. Her fear aside, I strongly believed that in a field battle we'd smash right through the force the Dead King had sent to hold the Hollow. It was one thing to assault a strong position, another to face bones and Binds on the plains – where our cavalry could come into play and we could force them to come to us as our engines pounded at them.

“Send out the recall orders, we’re to gather directly before Lauzon’s Hollow,” I ordered Hune, then turned my gaze to the rest. “As for our column, prepare your forces for a march through the Twilight Ways. Morning Bell tomorrow is the timeline for beginning to open the portals.”

Which meant we’d probably start moving around Noon Bell, realistically. Even the simplest of things became incredibly complicated to achieve, when out campaigning, and time was always the first casualty. My tone was firm and there was no argument, the war council dispersing to see to their orders. We could all feel it, I thought, how much more had come to rest on our shoulders with the latest news. If we failed and Cleves fell, then the Principate would follow. Maybe not the same year, but it would all be downhill from there.

“So we don’t fail,” I murmured.

The words were cold comfort as I went to sleep.

—

Noon Bell turned out to have been wildly optimistic. For once it wasn’t even the fantassins that ended up being a pain in my ass, it was the drow. With Ivah gone their discipline had thinned and they dragged their legs when it came to getting their supply carts in order. Which in turn slowed down the Third Army, which was meant to march into the Twilight Wats after them, and when it became clear that halfway to Noon Bell we were still far from marching the armies that’d gathered had to be released – we couldn’t just make the soldiers stand in the sun for hours like scarecrows, hundreds would get heatstroke and discipline would break down.

The upside was that when the Silver Huntress and her party returned from their jaunt into enemy territory, just a little after Noon Bell, I was still there to take their report. Haranguing sigil-holders had stopped being a productive use of my time about two hours ago, so I’d sat down for lunch and had covers set for the Named so they could join me as they gave their account. Unsurprisingly, the tore at even such plain fare with great enthusiasm. I waited until they’d filled their stomachs some before nudging the Silver Huntress into starting to talk.

“We got close to the Hollow,” Alexis the Argent said. “It was swarming with soldiers, so even sneaking near the road wasn’t an option, but we went up into the hills to the east so we could have a look from there.”

She paused, swallowing a piece of jerky and washing it down with a mug of ale.

"The Headhunter was the one who found the goat path that allow us to," the Huntress conceded. "She did good work."

The villain in question only grinned at me, showing crooked but white teeth.

"The rise we found overlooked the army, Your Majesty," the Vagrant Spear said. "The dead are raising fortifications, making ready for us."

Bad news, but not unexpected ones. The dead tended to do as much when they had the time and expected to fight a defensive battles. Unlike the Army of Callow, though, Neshamah's undead hordes did not usually have dedicated engineers or artisans that could serve the same purpose. Sometimes Binds with know-how managed something a little more elaborate than raising palisades and digging ditches, but it was rare.

"Anything to worry about?" I asked.

"Ditches and walls, the usual," Roland told me. "They are concentrating on where Julianne's High passes, but there were several layers being dug when we had our look."

All the more reason to move on them soon, I thought. Even without giving actual battle, when we got close I'd be able to send raiders to disrupt their preparations. I glanced at the Silent Guardian, but though she was clearly paying attention she had nothing to add by gesture. There'd be no talk out of her, of course. Her Name was not an exaggeration – she'd been born mute, way I heard it.

"The Grey Legion was there," the Headhunter said.

She grinned at me again, as surprise appeared on the face of her companions. Evidently, she'd not informed them.

"You saw them?" I asked.

She shook her head.

"I have a Mark on two different soldiers of it," the Headhunter said. "Both were in range."

I nodded. She'd always been vague about what her range actually was with the aspect, or how many of those marks she could have simultaneously, but I'd gathered it was at least several miles.

"You never said a word," the Vagrant Spear indignantly said.

"I'm not your mother, Bloodlet," the Headhunter sneered. "I won't hold you by the hand when you fail."

I whistled sharply, which interrupted before that lovely little spat could escalate.

"You can wait until I have my report to tussle," I bluntly said. "Do you have numbers for me?"

"Around ninety thousand infantry," the Silver Huntress said. "Mostly skeletons, though there was a large contingent of ghouls and we won't have seen them all."

"Constructs?" I asked.

"Two wyrms," she grimaced. "And the usual for a frontline force: beorns and tusks, a few vultures and irregular horrors. At least a hundred total, and more they'll have kept hidden in reserve."

Not as bad as I'd expected, although the wyrms would be a problem and the Grey Legion was going to complicate everything just by being there. Either Akua or myself would have to be kept in reserve and fresh for when they came out, else that was going to be a damned costly battle. There just wasn't anything our infantry could do against those things, not even my legionaries.

"Anything else come to mind?" I pressed.

"There were Revenants there," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "At least ten. And there was a shape in the distance, behind the Hollow, that I believe might have been a Crab."

That got my attention, since we'd ever only had unverifiable reports about those existing.

"How sure are you?"

The Headhunter snorted contemptuously.

"Not sure enough to want to risk venturing too far," the villain said.

"Our orders were to avoid combat," the Silver Huntress sharply said. "And we obeyed them. As to the Crab, Your Majesty, it was impossible to tell if it truly was one from so far. There was magical interference as well, we believe."

A 'Crab' was what we'd called the method the Dead King used to keep his armies halfway functional out in the field, when he had no cities to support them. It was a massive skittering necromantic construct, but not one meant to fight: the inside of its armoured shells was supposedly filled with forges, workshops and warehouses. A small moving city meant to allow repair, the creation of fresh constructs and safely carrying necessary goods.

Masego believed they were also one of the methods the Dead King used to scramble scrying, as a sort of moving ritual site. We'd never gotten a close look at a Crab, though, as they tended to be kept relatively far behind enemy lines and jealously guarded.

It'd be a significant blow to the Dead King's ability to wage war in Hainaut if we destroyed one, though. There wouldn't be a swift replacement either: Given how expensive and difficult making a construct the size of a small city would be, we were pretty sure there were no more than ten of them in existence. My eyes moved to Roland.

"You didn't answer the question," I noted.

He hesitated.

"I strongly believe it was one," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "The spell I used is essentially a Baalite eye made through sorcery, and though it doesn't show much at great distances what it does show is reliable."

I nodded in acknowledgement, drumming my fingers against the table. I tended to put trust in Roland's judgement, cagey and tricky bastard that he was. While bagging the Crab wouldn't be a greater priority than, well, actually beating the enemy army ahead of us I'd keep its existence in mind. It'd be quite the prize to destroy one of those.

"Noted," I said, then changed the subject. "Our approach to the Hollow has changed, we'll be moving out through the Ways as soon as possible and leaving our detachments to catch up to us near the enemy. That makes planning our answer to the Revenants and the enemy's trump cards – the Grey Legion and the wyrms – all the more important."

"There could be more Revenants," the Silver Huntress reminded me. "We cannot be sure."

"That's war," I shrugged. "You can never be sure. But we can plan for what we do know. I'll want a more detailed report on the Revenants you saw once you're done eating, and I'll be calling an assembly of all Named with the column tonight."

That got their attention, considering they were all included in that.

"We'll be discussing match ups for the Revenants," I told them, "and how we might best deal with the constructs you've identified."

Much as I'd prefer not to, we might have to reveal the unravellers to deal with the wyrms if we couldn't get a clean kill otherwise. I'd not get soldiers killed to keep the element of surprise – in other situations I might be willing to make that trade, but not when preserving our strength was so important. The battle ahead of us wasn't the last we'd fight this campaign, and likely not even the hardest. I'd intended on hearing our suggestions from them ahead of the assembly, but it was not to be: before I could prod of them into giving an opinion, Adjutant wheeled his way into the tent.

I caught his eyes, and he indicated for us to move outside.

"You all did good work," I told the seated Named, rising to my feet. "And brought back knowledge that might be the key to victory in the coming battle. The Grand Alliance thanks you all, and you will be commended at the assembly tonight."

It was easy enough to take my leave, since even the most polite among them were hungry and in front of a meal, so I left them to it and joined Hakram as he wheeled his way out.

"Word from Neustal," he said. "Fresh from a runner. The Gigantes wardsmiths have arrived."

Finally, I thought. The Titanomachy had been slow in coughing those out, at least when it came to the Hainaut front. Those who'd gone to Cleves had arrived almost a month ago.

"Good new," I said.

"Their leader sent word to ask whether they should follow behind the column or stay in Neustal until sent for," Hakram told me.

I mulled on that a moment. Was it worth the risk? Honestly, yes. I'd probably be able to squeeze a few things out of them if they were there when we attacked the capital, and until then they'd be useful in repairing and fine-tuning the artefacts they'd already sent us.

"How many of them are there?" I finally asked.

"Twenty-two," Adjutant replied.

I let out a low whistle. That was more than I'd expected, at least the Titanomachy wasn't being stingy with manpower – which, if what Hanno had told them about them was true, was the single they prized the most. There honestly was no way that our troops had missed anything numerous or powerful enough to threaten twenty-two Gigantes when sweeping through the lowlands here, so there went my last qualms.

"Send them up," I said. "Though with warnings that this is still a war zone, if one we believe secure. If they want to wait until the next supply convoy so they can share the escort, they should feel free to."

They'd still get to the city of Hainaut around the same time we did, by my reckoning.

"I'll see to it," Adjutant replied.

I opened my mouth, to ask about my answer to the proposal, then closed it. I'd already made things worse by pressing too hard once, I thought, it might best let him set the terms of engagement going from here.

"I'll see you later then," I simply replied.

It ended up being near godsdamned Afternoon Bell that the last of our soldiers entered the Twilight Ways, which was the final nail in the coffin of my optimism for this campaign.

caoimhinh

Ohh, we are back to the Chess-themed chapter titles, nice. Last time it didn't end that well for Amadeus, let's hope that this time it turns out well for Catherine.

For those wondering what Fianchetto is: In chess, a fianchetto is the development of a bishop by moving it one square to a long diagonal; specifically, a set of opening moves where a bishop is developed to the second rank of the adjacent knight file. It's an opening that serves to gain control of the major diagonals and serves as preparation for future moves. It serves to delay a direct occupation of the center with the plan of undermining and destroying the opponent's central outpost, but it carries risks: for example, if the fianchettoed bishop is taken (or exchanged), the diagonal that the bishop was formerly protecting will become weak those squares will become holes in the defense, and can form the basis of an attack by the opponent.

So basically, the chapter title is saying "This is a cool, modern move that is the basis of a large strategy, but if this goes wrong, shit will go down."

Konstantin von Karstein

Thanks for the explanation:) I hoped that I would be the first to comment, but you were faster 😊

Miles

"So we don't fail," I murmured.

The words were cold comfort as I went to sleep.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

Darn it that was supposed to be not a reply

onedollargum

Everyone liked that.

Miles

So we don't fail," I murmured.

The words were cold comfort as I went to sleep.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

caoimhinh

I thought it would be "The words were cold comfort as I went to vote"

Liliet

Definitely better as is than your version. Please no.

Miles

The best ones are when you don't have to change a thing.

hue hue

Shit is going to hit the fan, and it's going hard. Bet that in the next 10 chaps a Allied Named will die

Javvies

Interesting.

This is going to be complicated.

On the one hand, things are no longer going smoothly. On the other, I wouldn't stop worrying about the other shoe dropping yet, because it doesn't feel like things have gone significantly far off plan or badly enough for The Inevitable Unexpected Setback to count as having happened, which means it's still waiting to be triggered.

Oh, please don't let the Gigantes get jumped on their way up. That would be all kinds of bad.

M0och123

That's why I am feeling rather uneasy about the current situation!

The other shoe has yet to drop, DK is probably trying to slowly mount pressure onto the Alliance until when the Shoe does come down, it completely dooms Procer.

Not that it won't be stopped by timely Named intervention.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, 22 undead Gigantes would be bad enough, but if the DK can make bonds of them he could have access to their warding schemes. And use them. Imagine trying to invade a Keter that's surrounded by a thing like the Red Snake Wall.

Crash

Imagine having the Titanomachy mad at half of calernia for getting twenty two of their people immediately killed.

Juff

Typo Thread:

even would stay > would even stay too choose > to choose needed answer > needed answers hundred thousand army (sounds odd) area thoroughly (might want to reword, as thoroughly appears twice in this sentence)
I send a > I sent a reports of my scout. > reports of my scouts.
army form now on > army from now on the tore at > they tore at unexpected ones > unexpected
I'd be a significant > It'd be a significant will commended > will be commended
"Good new," > "Good news," told them about them > told us about them the single they > the single thing they might best let > might be best to let

Burlyraven

In before one of the Revenants is revealed to have the Name of Giantslayer.

Also, that Crab feels like bait. It could possibly be the reveal of Cat's Name, taking it down, but that feels like a costly path, with a lot of death and sacrifice.

beleester

It's the size of a small city. It's too expensive to be bait.

I bet it has some sort of nasty secret weapon inside it. You don't need something the size of a city to keep a zombie army supplied. They don't need food or water, and it's not like armor and weapons wear out that quickly. And they said it was also a mobile ritual site. It's gotta be some sort of magic weapon system.

RoflCat

It might be expensive, but the point is Dead King CAN create more of them, seeing as they expect he has multiple of these already.

Multiple Gigantes Revenants on the other hand...

sengachi

Armies absolutely do go through armor, weapons, and munitions that quickly. And if they're also constructing new constructs that's no small logistical undertaking.

Though also a small city by Calernia's standards is probably only a few thousand people, something that to us would barely be a town. It might not be that big.

Salt

They have no choice but to kill it, it's a giant enemy crab

It's mandatory to attack a giant enemy crab's weak point for massive damage.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

This guy/gal/nonbinary pal gets it.

Liliet

Well, Catherine has established a channel of communication with Hakram! Here's hope that goes well.

And the stakes have officially been raised. The structure I'm seeing is that the tension will keep mounting and it'll be a Evil Only Has To Win Once situation – minor skirmishes can and will be lost, but no big setback can be allowed lest everything be lost, and it's the threat of those setbacks that will be The Inevitable Bad Thing.

mamm0nn

It's a bit sad that I don't really find ten Revenants as threatening as they should be. They've been little but Named fodder till now, at least on the field, despite them supposedly being in limited supply. But they never really won anything or truly challenged anyone that we saw. Those Cat fought at the beginning were capable, terrifying and top tier, but we would've heard if someone of that calibre would show up again.

Which begs to wonder what happened to our Horned Lord oracle, a guy like that should've and could've wrecked whole cities after finding regions where Named are temporarily absent when they attack. Or perhaps the Dead King is now using him to predict Cat's side of the battlefield and be one step ahead?

Earl of Purple

He has a limited supply in that each is unique and can't be replaced. But he's spent thousands of years collecting them from every war he's fought, including five or so Crusades. They might only have two of their three Aspects, but they are the two most useful for the Dead King. Also, they were Named, and can slice through normal infantry as easily as a living Named, and often have tricks they developed when alive or unusual magical equipment or abilities.

shikkarasu

Also lets not forget that a pair of Revenants once made Ranger go all out. I think that, like Named, Revenants come in varying degrees of useful and DK keeps his best as his Personal Guards. We are seeing him throw everything below his top 10% at the enemy with the expectation that either 1: he will just make replacements out of the Named under the Truce and Terms once the War is won or 2: He will just weather a few more crusades after this to build up his numbers again.

mamm0nn

People already knew of the existence of Revenants before he began his invasion, meaning DK ought've used them during his 'regular' city-kidnapping skirmishes too. We're not seeing millennia of accumulated horrors, because he could (and to feasibly take down Heroes and Villains on those skirmishes probably also should) send those on the regular outings as well.

Meaning that we're seeing the same at most equal exchange of Revenants for new Named which right now feels more like he's bleeding two for each he kills, or DK killed weak Heroes to add to his collection very, very sparsely in those millennia he had till now.

Yes, Ranger fought two without curbstomping them, but I'd hardly say that she went all-out when only using aspects that are always active anyway. Cat fought a few capable ones in the prime of their elements, and those I had been hoping for. But right now they feel more like notable generals and henchmen that are slightly more difficult than the average but feel no more dangerous or significant than the Beorns, wyrms and Grey Legion. Only DK is dangerous, and he's a looming threat on the horizon.

I mean, if DK had been farming Horned Lords and other Villains that are powerful but not protected by Story to prevail over Named-collecting undead constructs more often than not, then sure. He could've gathered a bunch. But with the way Heroes are pesky to stay alive and win after wiping their bloody lip, as we've seen throughout this entire story, I just don't see them being the most common kind Named in his arsenal when his average Revenants have yet to show great ability take down even the B-list Named.

Jarl Zarl

Didn't the Skein die (again) at Third Llesse or am I misremembering that?

Mental Mouse

Yes, and explicitly turned to dust.

M0och123

As is commonly the case with plot devices like Revenants, when we first encounter them they seem much scarier. Then, when the protagonist has started to deal with them (relatively) easily and regularly they become extra padding onto forces meant to represent a threat.

Also, pretty sure they destroyed the horned lord during the scramble to reach Masego. I distinctly remember the Tyrant's insanity being the perfect counter for The Horned Lord's seeing ability.

mamm0nn

Very true about the diminishing value of elements we've already seen given time. It's just that the Dead King already has constructs very capable of serving that purpose, so I was hoping for Revenants to be more rare and sparsely seen but the Oh shit factor that the Dead King himself can't be out on the field. Yet.

This undead horror of endless numbers just doesn't feel that threatening, despite the good worldbuilding of economic and military number collapse, when he doesn't have a true cudgel in his toolbox to prevail when he really wants to. But now his odds to win against Heroes feels more like 1/10 at best. He won against Named once, and not thanks to Revenants, while the Heroes are regularly winning battles against him. Meanwhile the Named value of bolstering morale and seeing to battles won doesn't apply either to the morale-less undead armies DK employs.

Salt

I wouldn't be worried at all about the Dead King being not scary enough tbh. The thing about Necromancer-type BBEGs is that there's usually a really obvious-in-hindsight twist involved, even after the undead are all down:

Cornering a BBEG like the dead king is asking for a pithy line about the nature of power or how the Protagonists aren't the only ones smart enough to have contingencies, before he instagibs half the party with whatever hidden horror the BBEG used to kill Spellblade or Skein level Named in the first place, when they were alive and in their prime.

You thought still waters was bad? The Calamities figured that out over their few short decades of life. Neshamah is the literal greatest sorcerer in the history of the continent, and had millennia longer to prepare contingencies that would make second llesse look like a minor mugging in comparison.

Personally my theory is that one contingency is baked into High Arcana to begin with, since he's the original Archmage Trismegistus who invented Trismegistan sorcery and was / generous/ enough to share it with the rest of the continent.

The other is that all those third (and usually the most powerful) aspects he ripped out of his revenants were never thrown away or destroyed. Just kept in his back pocket, as a last resort if a particularly bad rainy day ever showed up on his doorstep.

Ever wonder what kind of insanely dangerous aspects could beat the Skein's Spool and the Spellblade's Ban for the coveted title of third and final aspect? We'll find out, when the Dead King kills Hanno and half the Woe with them.

caoimhinh

You know when the real ultimate mess will be?
When they reach the Serenity and find thousands of innocent and good people who genuinely love and worship Neshamah as a god and benevolent ruler.
That's when the Heroes will be unable to advance and the Villains will have to dirty their hands, that's when the limits of this alliance will be tested.

Even the Augur found it worse when trying to peer at the Dead King around the faith of his people.

Extract from Interlude And Yet We Stand:

"she was already touching the limits of what she could do: trying to peer around the edges of the darkness that shrouded the Dead King was a thing of horror, the endless chorus of screams and crazed laughter. Or even worse, deeper in, the chilling serenity of the voices worshipping him as a god."

Who knows how much power he has in that realm, considering that his first reaction when walking into Creation was "enjoying the pressure of a word he could not simply shape as he wished".

Abrakadabra

Actually, I fully expect the Dead King will use living troops to Access the twilight ways.

caoimhinh

The Skein was destroyed by the Dead King to send back the information about the Wandering Bard, it turned into ashes.

Apparently, the more terrifying of the battles happened during the 2-years timeskip.

We are supposedly in a lull of the conflict (for whatever reason), where Catherine felt confident enough to stroll the countryside along with Razin and Aquiline (and their respective thousands of soldiers), leaving the frontlines and going to visit the Arsenal; the lull in the conflict is apparently big enough that a huge number of combatant Named simply left their positions in what was supposed to be a war without breaks to go to the Arsenal, which is what enabled the previous arc's conflict.

Catherine mentioned in one of the early info dumps of this book (which were an unfortunate necessity to catch us up on the developments during the 2 years of constant warfare and active plot) that the Grand Alliance is actually losing, and barely holding the lines now. There were battles where thousands of their soldiers got massacred. Grey Legion and Revenants that easily pushed back the Named and the armies, even one time where the Witch of the Woods had to destroy the fortress where they were fighting just so that the main force could escape from the hordes of the dead. They are in a state where losing one battle would mean the loss of the war.

Then, of course, all those horrifying battles happened out of screen during the 2-years timeskip and aren't happening anymore (except for the Drow side) because... reasons. Thanks to this lull in the dead offensive, the Grand Alliance can begin their counterattack, which we are seeing now.

That's why you are feeling that the Revenants aren't as threatening as they should be, because we haven't actually seen them doing the damage that they have done, it all happened during the timeskip, and the few that have appeared now have been dealt with relatively easily. Hanno one-hit-KOed a Revenant in the Winter extra chapters, the Drow General destroyed a Revenant (Stitcher, I think) that had fought many times against the Grand Alliance and was apparently very hard to kill, and now Catherine beat two Revenants (one even directly possessed by the Dead King) with relative ease and little support from the others.

Then again, the hard battles are supposed to happen again once this offensive sets off. Keep in mind that so far these were just battles in the occupied lands of Procer, not yet a proper assault on Keter nor the Serenity.

I don't think it would be good for the story if all of a sudden the GA started to be massacred again just to show us that the Dead King is fucking dangerous, because we already know that. What's necessary now is for the GA to win, but showing us that they are winning because they have the preparation for it, not simply a clash of forces where the dead are overrun by the living. We need to see those dangerous and OP Revenants being defeated, but displaying how powerful they are, how much of a threat they represent, without actually letting them do their potential damage.

It's a delicate balance, but I believe EE can do it.

The timeskip is supposed to be the justification for all the new artifacts, weapons, tactics, powers, techniques, and such that the Grand Alliance and Named are going to show now in the coming battles. That's the key to this.

mamm0nn

Ah, I remembered the Skein getting away from the battle with Cat, Saint and Tyrant so I thought he lived. I forgot about what happened afterwards.

With the two years, I agree and understand. I love that this story actually goes into the more 'mundane' things like politics and economics that don't just go away during a war, where so many others muddle in the whatever is convenient and important only. And I know that the last two years have been rough.

It's just, it hasn't been narratively rough, in that we feel the severe pressure against them. Those two years were off-screen and we know little to nothing about when and how DK killed a bunch of Named including the Fortunate Fool. Just that it happened. The only times we've seen Revenants out on the field in the Extra Chapters and lately they've been more push-overs losing against the Heroes because of course they do because Story, than precious rooks and bishops played by a being that knows Name lore and how to circumvent or avoid it.

Granted, the importance of the living Named has waned as well now that there are so many, it's a given because there's a finite amount of attention to go around, but right now it feels like the Grand Alliance is bleeding men and coin but not Named. That those don't have to be placed as cautiously and in groups because the DK would kill them if used recklessly. That there's an ever-looming blade above the neck of the Named that they can fall and be turned against their former alliance if the strategists make the wrong move or strategically sacrifice a Named for a victory or other Named to survive. Named right now feel like they're with plot armour of not falling or being truly threatened along with everyone else, until they meet the real opposition in the form of DK himself.

Liliet

I mean, that's kind of... how being Named works. Plot armor is the first perk of the position.

Plot armor that Revenants straight up don't have, and that's why Named tend to curbstomp them if there isn't an absurd disparity of power like with Spellblade and Skein.

The Revenants are minions, story-wise, in the way they weren't before the big war. Inverse Ninja Law is a bitch for the side with the numbers – it was for the Grand Alliance against Catherine, and now it is for the Dead King against the Grand Alliance.

Like, that's a known and acknowledged thing in-universe.

It's also worth noting that Catherine isn't functioning as a field commander of Named right now. Presumably there's a lot of careful planning and desperate struggles for people in charge of the specific squads of Named. Catherine herself is too powerful to be worried about that when she is around, the problem is what happens where she isn't – and, well, it's her POV we're following.

Loin

I think part of it is that DK has to be much more careful about playing his best cards on the Procer front than he does in Keter or elsewhere, in order to avoid getting caught up in an unfavorable story. I'd imagine that the really nasty Revenants, like all the other super nasty stuff, is currently going towards keeping the Drow occupied.

Ninestrings

Dead King: Hey man remember when we talked about making giant mobile crab bases, you were high as shit but I thought it had some merit

Aide: I ... think that was my grandfather Lord.

Dead King: Shit was it? Oh probably anyway there's a giant necromantic Crab out there the size of a city I need you to outfit with war stuff.

Aide:

Dead King: I'm not getting rid of it.

laguz24

So they are going to be fighting a giant enemy crab that is not a crab, sounds ominous.

Matthew Wells

Something that big and mobile must have severe structural compromises in it's armor.

STRIKE ITS WEAK POINT FOR MASSIVE DAMAGE!

Clint

If an Unraveller can destroy one (1) undead construct (some stabbing required)... does a city-sized crab count as one?

I think we really need a party-of-five interlude with heroes jockeying to get the most kills so that Silver Huntress can shoot the city-sized crab thing with an Unraveller and have the Troubador or the Barrow Sword call out, "That still only counts as one!"

M0och123

Excellent chapter name!

A slightly unexpected move on DKs side. Though a mid game chess strategy would probably be more appropriate instead of an opening.

For some reason I am feeling a slight feeling of unease about Cat's army. Can't quite put my finger on it but I feel much more uneasy than the foreshadowing so far should be giving me.

Regardless, great chapter!

M0och123

Another thing to bring up is the possibility of Malicia betraying DK at some crucial juncture to try to get into the Alliances good graces.

It would be very unlikely to work but if the right opportunity comes, who knows?

Miles

Holy it it makes sense.

Ranger can't join, as her ally Black can't join either.

If Bard plants a seed to convince Malicia to try and join that could cause some severe headaches for Cat.

Clint

I'm not sure Malicia can join. She signed a soul-bound contract with the DK. And even to sign on to the T&T or Liesse Accords, wouldn't she have to abdicate her throne – and risk losing the name? (I say risk because of Dread Emperor Irritant's several abdications... If she were a more out-of-the-box genre-savvy thinker, she might actually try something like that.)

Nordvegr

Watch, we'll be seeing the KIA. As of today, considered suboptimal by most masters.

Cayle

Nuke or pressure the elves and the orc and Callow alliance works. Otherwise Black just needs to pull his head out and deal with it.

Daniel E

Good thing Cat already has a counter from her College days; Operation Feinting Goat is a go.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I give this pun an A for Adjutant. It is a prince among jokes.

sengachi

I kind of love how even though the threat of the Revenants feels like it has dimmed somewhat (though oh, I am expecting to get that flipped on me), the tension of logistics and operationally competent enemies has not. Getting your supply line messed with or your enemy having free excess to your vulnerable countryside is still exactly as much of an existential threat as it was back in the beginning. Moreso, if anything, now that the story has built up Cat and our's understanding of how critical logistics is.

This chapter also gives me a better appreciation for how Amadeus took Callow. He just did this, exactly what the Dead King is doing. He constructed a war engine with so much power and logistical flexibility that he could force terms of engagement and then capitalize on his opponent's decisions with moves which targeted failure points which can't be countered with heroism. It just doesn't matter how much Named oomph you've got if the capital lynchpinning your local defenses can't be fed in the face of enemy action.

Which, uh, concerns me. I am not happy about seeing Amadeus parallels in the Dead King's strategy. That is ominous.

Liliet

Amadeus and the Dead King always had narrative parallels. Neshamah was always the unsaid counterargument to Amadeus's "I just want Evil to win once". Neshamah was always the person who actually did what Amadeus professed to do – use people and story tropes to his advantage coldly, without actually caring a whit. Neshamah was always the ur-Practical Evil.

That he and Amadeus do the same clever thing in the same circumstances is not IMHO a narrative sign of bad times to come, any more than we already knew they were coming. It's just an inevitable conclusion from their other similarities.

Miles

Amadeus probably got many of his ideas from Neshamah's playbook. After all, there's the villain who came closest to winning against Good in all of recorded history. Heck, Amadeus might have joined Neshamah if not for the whole needing to die first thing, or the inevitable conflict of interest thing.

Liliet

I, uh, really don't think Amadeus would have joined Neshamah. They do not have interests in common.

Abrakadabra

So the Dead King has mobile factories? Damn.

Chapter 55: Queen's Pawn

"Let there be no talk of mercy after the ram has touched the gate."

– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

Of all the gifts the Sisters had given me, the peculiar sense I had for the coming of dawn and dusk remained one of the most useful. It would be a little under a bell before sundown, in Creation. Not so here, of course, for the Twilight Ways knew no such change. The timing of this undertaking had been chosen very precisely, as it was no longer a few warbands hitting our dug-in positions that we'd be facing: we were about to come out swinging in front of a field army of the Kingdom of the Dead, the Hidden Horror's host forewarned and prepared for our coming. It was going to be an ugly fight, before we got our defences up.

Spread out on the green and sloping hills of the Twilight Ways, the warriors mustered to take the van in the coming battle were tightening their ranks as the gate-mages finished the last few syllables of their spells. Masego's formula was the one being used, universally so even if it wasn't necessarily the best formula possible for each mage. It was however, the one formula that more than seven in ten of the sufficiently powerful mages of the Grand Alliance were able to use. Numbers had a strength of their own, especially when it came to war. The pharos devices wouldn't work anywhere as well with disparate formulas, anyway, I idly thought. Not that we'd be using our only one tonight, if I had my way.

The evening air grew thick with sorcery and silence spread as the mages each finished their incantation and shaped their sorcery before withholding the last syllable – a guttural sound in the mage tongue that echoed of something like krakh. It would only be spoken when I gave my command, painted the night sky with my signal to begin the crossing. Mounted on Zombie and perched atop a hill I held good vantage, and so allowed myself to sweep the assembled forces with my gaze one last time. It was an unfamiliar sight. Our strength had been mustered not in the shape of an army ready for battle, but according to the new rules that warfare through the Ways demanded.

Standing in bands among the hills, near the gates-to-be, the painted warriors of Malaga and Tartessos were waiting to serve as the tip of the spear. Led by Blood and backed by four Named – Vagrant Spear, Headhunter, Sage and Silent Guardian – they would seize the grounds we needed as our first wave. If they got through in the time they'd been given, anyway. Behind them the Second Army stood in good order, ranks of red painted shield and polished helms glinting in the twilight. General Hune's hulking silhouette towered above the ranks, a siege tower made woman.

I'd lead the first rank personally, when we sallied out.

The holding action would be ours.

To the left and right of the Second Army our horse was milling about, one wing led by Grandmaster Talbot and the other by Princess Beatrice. A few mages with them ensured we'd have some measure of flexibility in the coming engagement, though only within limits. Our fantassin companies, under the consolidated command of Captain Reinald, were waiting behind the Second and intermixed with Volignac infantry. It was the Third that'd serve as our reserve: I was counting on Abigail of Summerholm's knack for calculated risks. She'd commit if and when it was needed, but not a moment before. At the back of everyone else stood the drow, a sea of sigils that was not so much a reserve as another force entirely. Their time would come, but they would not share this battle with us. It would have been too much of a waste.

"Into the breach, dearest?" Akua Sahelian idly asked.

I glanced at her. No dress tonight, no silks or velour. The shade had taken the appearance of a daughter of Wolof gone to war, beautiful lamellar plate in red and gold beneath a curved helmet and an aventail of mail that could be fastened with a piece shaped like a black swan. I was in no mood for banter, tonight, and did not pretend otherwise.

"Find your mages and waste no time," I said. "Your hands will decide how much the butcher's due tonight."

"Then luck in battle, my heart," Akua smiled.

"Luck's for the other side," I replied. "We make due with plans."

And as she melted into the shadows, I raised my staff and pulled at the Night as I unleashed a great spurt of power. The bright light that bloomed in the sky exploded in silent streaks of colour, and with that unmissable sight the battle began. Mages finished their incantations, magic held back at last unleashed: the Twilight Ways shivered and seventy-two different gates into Creation opened. Most weren't even large enough for two people, with a mere twenty of proper size to let carts and engines through, but that was why we were sending the Levantines out first. They were quick on their feet and used to fighting without formations.

Clamour in Levantine tongues went up, war cries filling the air as the warriors boldly went forth through the gates. Honour to the Blood, they clamoured. Honour to Levant, honour in strife. I'd found a thick shield and a knack for ducking more useful than honour, as a rule, but I would not deny their ways when they lit a fire in their bellies. I kept my eyes on the bands filing through, counting down as the warriors passed. The Enemy was slow, tonight, or we got lucky: it was thirty one heartbeats before Keter gave its answer. More than half the gates – but not the large ones, thank the Gods – flickered, shredding whatever flesh and metal had been going through in a red spray.

So that was to be the first beat of our dance tonight, huh. Thirty one heartbeats. The Dead King's mages were getting sloppy, if it'd taken them this long to disturb our gates with their counter-rituals. Banners were raised by the gates and drums brought to the fore, so that through their beating the rhythm could be kept. For thirty beats Levantines continued to cross, then halted. The gates rippled again, taking the leg of some screaming young warrior who'd been foolhardy enough to try the odds. It wouldn't be the last time today it happened. The bleeding man was dragged through and the crossings resumed.

For now I was not needed. The first hour belonged to the Dominion of Levant, tasked to clear the grounds in front of us so that when the Second Army began its crossing we had room enough to set down wards and protections undisturbed. Depending on what the enemy had waiting on the other side, that hour would either be a pleasant moonlit walk or a bloody horror of screams. The lagging counter-rituals gave me hope for the former, but hope would not serve me well in a battle with Keter. I'd learned that the hard way. Time dragged forward as the warriors passed through the gates in a trickle – hundreds, then thousands – but I watched in silence. My escort dared not disturb me. It was only when I sensed the time nearing that I headed out, spurring Zombie forward. An escort of twenty knights from the Order of the Broken Bells behind me, I headed towards the Second Army at a brisk trot.

Soldiers under half a hundred different banners cheered sparsely as I went by, for even though few of them were mine I was known as a good woman to have on your side when the steel came out. Though later I would fight on the front, for now I went to Hune. Looking down at me, the ogre gave a brisk salute.

"First reports?" I asked.

"The enemy was already mobilized," General Hune said. "We'll be doing it the hard way: ghouls were already afoot so it was contested from the start. Keter has pulled in every patrol in a radius of miles to slow us down. We're looking at thousands, not hundreds."

My lips thinned. I'd known that Keter would be expecting us to pop out soon, but not anticipated large enemy forces this far out: our beachhead was at least ten miles away from Lauzon's Hollow!

"If it were an easy war, we would already have won it," I said. "Watch your back, general."

"Good hunting, Your Majesty," Hune replied.

Dismounting Zombie and handing her reins over to my knightly escort, I went to stand with the front rank of the Second. The company was under the command of a Captain Bolah, a dark-skinned veteran who'd once served in the Legions, but it was her young Callowan lieutenant – Alfred of Ankou, he eagerly introduced himself as – who stood closest to me. Before long the two Named that were to serve as my retinue for the fight made their appearance, having been lingering nearby but away from my troops.

"I don't believe we've ever shared a battle before," Roland noted, coming to stand at my left.

He'd prudently added a helmet to the mail and longcoat he refused to set aside.

"Not on the same side, at least," I acknowledged.

The Beastmaster, on my right was not inclined to idle talk. His eyes stayed on the banners near the gates.

"Time will run out soon," Lysander grunted.

I nodded in agreement. It was unfortunate, but it didn't look like the Dominion would be able to get all their warriors across in the time we'd allotted for it. Before long trumpets sounded, signifying the warriors of Levant were to move to the sides and clear the gates, which got... contentious. None of that proud lot wanted to be denied the opportunity to battle because they'd been a little too slow, and some gates had to be forcefully cleared of Levantines trying to force their way in. Behind us the Second Army raised its banners, horns were sounded and the advance began.

Unlike the Dominion forces, my Army of Callow had standard company sizes and officers ensuring order so instead of a mess of warbands it was neatly filed lines matched to gate sizes that approached specific gates. My own company, Captain Bolah's, was bound for one of the larger gates – part of the reason I'd picked it – and before long we were standing in front of the transparent veil, the mage maintaining it standing to the side with closed eyes and two assistants. On the other flank the drummer kept pace, while a Proceran held the banner telling us the number of the gate and a young woman by his side shouted at us hurry.

A heartbeat later we were through and the cool evening air of the Hainaut lowlands washed over my face. Shit, I immediately thought, even as Beastmaster contorted and a veritable flock of birds erupted from his furs to fly above. I could now see why the Dominion had found it hard to get people through, and it wasn't just inferior discipline. The gates has all been opened along the same axis, though the line itself was wavy from imprecisions, and near the left side of that axis bands of Dominion were being hard-pressed by a surprisingly large number ghouls. There just hadn't been much room for more people to pour through, even when there'd been time.

Streaks of Light told me the Lanterns were in the thick of it, as was their wont, but their tricks weren't the ones I'd been looking for.

"Beastmaster," I said, limping forward as the legionaries advanced behind me. "Where's the Vagrant Spear?"

She should be handling that flank along with the Headhunter, but I saw no sign of her. The other villain's steps slowed a heartbeat as he saw through the eyes of one the birds in flight, then he pointed to the left.

"There," he said. "Pulling one of your lordlings out of trouble, looks like. Osen. Wounded. I see blood."

I swallowed a curse. Already? No, that was unfair. Likely the dead had gone specifically after her, knowing her death would brutalize Dominion morale. The issue was that there would only be Lanterns near and that lot couldn't heal. The Forsworn Healer was on his way, but he was with the third wave of Named near the back of the Second Army.

"Roland," I tightly said. "Go patch her up."

"On it," the Rogue Sorcerer nodded.

He was gone in a moment, stride near a run as his long coat swirled behind him. Gods, if only I could have a dozen more of him.

"With me, Beastmaster," I said. "And I want a warning when the first tide gets close."

"I see it approaching already," the man murmured. "Hurry, Black Queen."

A quick look behind me told me all of Captain Bolah's company had crossed and it was now in good order, waiting for my instructions even as another company began to emerge behind it.

"With me," I yelled. "We'll set the boundary."

I got a roar back. Good, they'd need the spirit before this was over. Much as I would have liked to head to the left flank and stabilize our lines there, I had other duties. Besides, we had a contingency that should take care of it before long. A messenger should have gone through the dedicated gate by now. A hundred legionaries in tight formation behind me, I limped to the front. The Dominion had formed up into three large clumps of warriors after crossing— shield walls that'd suffered under ghoul assaults, most likely — with the two more or less to the right having held well and only the one to the left having gotten mauled by the dead.

Out of the seventeen thousand Dominion warriors maybe ten thousand had gotten through in the half hour they'd had, a testament to their light-footedness given the situation. There couldn't have been more than three thousand ghouls and maybe half that in skeletons out here right now, all spread out, but up close ghouls were bloody and hard to kill even. We'd be winning this fight, for sure, but it would cost us precious time and keep us from seizing the territory we wanted before the first tide hit. I grit my teeth, in a black mood, and led my company three hundred feet out before calling a halt.

"Here," I shouted. "Form up."

Maybe twenty feet ahead of us the Tanja forces were cleaning up the last of their undead. Among the ranks I glimpsed the Sage and the Silent Guardian, whose assigned flank this was. On the other left side four large gates opened and our first surprise of the night came out at a gallop: Grandmaster Talbot led out the Order and some Dominion light horse in wedges, smoothly coming around to hit the ghouls that'd been chewing up the Osenia in the back. Long lances skewered the creatures and Levantines butchered them after they were pinned, leaving the Order free to peel off the engagement quickly and with few casualties.

They retreated the Twilight Ways without wasting time, as the last thing we wanted was to risk them out here for too long. Cavalry was not easily replaced, and the Dead King was always hungry to steal it for his own armies. With the pressure taken off of them, the Levantines on the left flank pushed forward at last. I worried my lip, eyes on the moving soldiers. Using my location as the yardstick the Second Army had begun taking position in a broad hollow square, but the left third of that square was noticeably lagging behind the rest. It wouldn't be ready in time, would it?

"Beastmaster?" I asked.

"You'll start seeing them in a moment," he replied. "And hearing them not long after."

"Fuck," I snarled. "They'll hit us long before the cabals are in position."

Much less the wards, whose raising would be further delayed. Akua was good, and I'd glimpsed her crossing through with mages and wardstones, but she couldn't conjure up a stable array out of thin air. She needed room that she just wouldn't have.

Beastmaster's warning proved true moments later: in the distance I saw what I might have taken as a swarm of insects, were it not too far out for their size to be reasonable. Birds, they were birds. Not buzzards, which were specially-crafted dead, but just any bird the Dead King had been able to get his hands on. His forces slaughtered and poisoned all wildlife wherever they went so that they could use this very tactic: throwing massive flocks and herds of them at us as skirmishers.

Like a tidal wave filling the sky, they came.

"I'll handle it myself," I finally said.

There went one of the two large workings I'd be able to throw around in daylight.

Striding forward with more anger to my stride than I'd care to admit, I left behind my legionaries after a curt gesture signifying they shouldn't follow. Beastmaster kept pace with me, looking oddly at ease in the middle of mayhem. The warriors from Malaga had been thorough about putting down the dead, but sloppy with clean up: with my staff I shoved aside a painted warrior before the back of her knee could be stabbed by a crawling half-broken skeleton, my boot going through its skull with a wet crunch. I ignored whatever she said to me in Ceseo and kept limping ahead. The Levantines split for me, almost respectfully.

By the time I got to the front, stepping away from my armies with no one but Beastmaster at my side, the tide of undead birds was closer. Close enough no one could miss them, close enough that the beat of their wings and their ceaseless screeching hit our ears like a drumbeat. One coming ever closer as dead things filled the horizon. The birds would only be the first tide, I knew. They were just the quickest to make their way to our lines. Behind us I felt the Dominion warriors shrink. I'd seen some of those same people leap into a siege tower on fire without batting an eye, face Revenants with gleeful whoops, but this breed of horror always hit them hard: what honour could there be in being shredded by dead birds?

Neshamah had made of study of us, of what got into our heads and put lead in our legs.

"You have means to deal with them?" the Beastmaster asked.

"Sure," I replied with a hard smile, "it's called force."

To my surprise, that startled a laugh out of the usually humorless man.

"Don't let me get into your way then, Black Queen," Lysander said.

A snort was my only answer. As if. I took another few limping steps forward, loosening my shoulders under the cuirass and taking a good look at the advancing tide. Hadn't rained in a while, had it? I knelt down, leaning my staff, and traced the ground with a few fingers. Dry. I hoisted myself back up with a grunt.

"You never taught me a prayer for this," I said in Crepuscular. "An invocation. I imagine there isn't one."

I smiled at doom coming on darkened wings.

"Shall we make one together?"

On my shoulders I felt sharp talons dig into the skin, almost enough to draw blood. I had their attention and, closing my eyes, I breathed out and sunk into the Night. I pulled it deep into me until it was writhing in my veins like serpents of smoke.

"I have come a long way, through winding paths," I murmured, and cocked my head to the side to better hear them.

It was neither a murmur nor the beat of wings, and somehow both.

"Yet behold," I said, Andronike's cool disregard given voice, "this barren realm, this crown of ruin!"

And her sister was not far behind, leaning close to hisper into my ear – every syllable a caw, a greedy call of carrion.

"Let me match horror with horror, might with might," I said, Komena's poisonous pride made verdict. "And know no master in this."

The Night roiled, the sea boiling out of me in dusky vapour, and I almost smiled. They had left me the honour of the last touch.

"So let the sun weep and the Crows have their due," I spoke in a rasping laugh. "For in the end, all will be Night."

I felt the Sisters smile against the sides of my neck. This one, they whispered, would be known as mine. Catherine's Tears. Above the tide of carrion birds the sky howled with gales as the Night left me, leaving me buckling down to my knees and hollowed out. My vision swam, but not so much I did not see my work: the power forming into a great sun of black flames, pulsing and screeching almost as loud as the undead. And the tide moved to split around it, but it wouldn't be enough. I pushed myself up with my staff, and raised a trembling hand.

I snapped a finger and all the Hells went loose.

The black sun blew up in a wave of heat, long streaks of dark flame lashing out and carving streaks of ash through the undead. Like black comets seething strokes shot out, burning as they went and smashing into the plains below with enough might to have the ground shivering even where I stood. Droplets of black fire fell like rain, igniting the carrion dead, and I watched with a cold smile as entire swaths of the enemy burned. Soon the smell of burning bone and flesh would come to us with the wind, but for now I turned around and began my limp back to my lines. The Beastmaster's followed, face gone blank.

A sky-shaking roar came as the Dominion and the Second Army gave their approval to my work, but no smile touched my face. I'd dug deeper than I'd planned to – my legs still shook and my arms felt numb – so I could not guarantee I'd be able to pull something on the same scale again. Not anytime soon, anyway.

It'd not been enough to blot out the birds, but it'd slow them down. The undead things had scattered every which way, so they'd take time to regroup, and I could generously be said to have at most destroyed half of the lot. It'd be long enough for the Dominion left to have put itself in position, hopefully, because otherwise there was going to be an awful lot of blood on the floor and soon. My face grew grimmer as I got closer to our formations and saw we were still behind. The Second Army wasn't entirely on the field yet, and that meant we'd be understrength when it came to priests – the kind that could make shields, anyways.

While I could have gone to the command node of the Second, all I'd do there was get in Hune's way. She already knew the damned plan, she'd helped make it. Getting too close to Akua's work would be a risk as well, since I was pretty much a moving mass of Night even when not actively using it, so the frontline was the best place for me. The Second Army had moved into cohorts, with furrows behind them, and as I got back to Captain Bolah's company the first trumpets sounded. The Dominion moved down the furrows to stand behind the Army of Callow formations, with some relief I fancied.

The winged undead were already beginning to gather in great swarms. As soon as the Dominion was behind them, the Second Army's standards were raised and horns sounded: the lines closed and shields went up, a solid wall of steel becoming the frontline as mage cabals got into position. Ahead of us, the tide had entirely formed anew. It was closer now, and the cacophony of screeches was once more deafening. Four hundred feet, I thought, watching. Three hundred feet. Around me legionaries shifted uneasily.

"Steady," I called out. "Trust in your officers. We're ready for them."

That got a few shouts back, and swords were hammered against shields. Two hundred feet. The shrill screeches washed over us like a physical wave. Screams erupted behind us, not of fear or dismay but battle cries as the House Insurgent slashed out with Light. Callow, some simply shouted. Cries of For the Kingdom or Gods Unforgiving with them, and even a few Only to the Just. Like a volley of arrows javelins of Light went flying, prayers to Above brightening the air. One hundred feet. One, two, three volley followed and then at fifty feet, when the noise was like a rolling thunder in our faces, transparent panes of sorcery bloomed in front of us. Like a sorcerous tortoise formation, the rectangular angled shields came down as armour and muted the cacophony.

It was not airtight. Some birds went through, and with a tired hand I drew my sword to hack at a rotting blue jay as its talons clawed pointlessly at my cuirass, but those few were a pittance compared to the angry tide hammering at the magical defence. In some places the shields flickered or outright broke under the pressure, but we had mage reserves and the House Insurgent had been tasked with purging breaches.

Captain Bolah's company was untroubled, so I clapped her young lieutenant's shoulder and called for Beastmaster to follow me. We would be most useful plugging breaches for now. The Second Army finished ferrying across its numbers early, but still too late: by then the second tide had struck. Insects, come on smaller wings. Flies and hornets, until larger things like beetles and stingers and butterflies came up. Unlike the birds, they were capable of digging under the rim of the shields and going up. Twice I torched a stretch when swarms became large enough they devoured soldiers alive, Roland coming back to my side for the grim business after having healed Aquiline Osená.

Sappers came forward and burned the insects out with torches and pitch, but it wasn't enough. We had to pull mages from shielding to defend against the insects, and it shrank our defences. More panes began failing when our intricate patterns began losing strength, dozens of soldiers dying to every breach before the House Insurgents and the Lanterns, come to reinforce them, could purge the invaders. The third tide hit just as the first Procerans began crossing through, and to my relief Juniper – Hune, I caught myself, it was not the Hellhound in the deeps with me this time – had called for priests to cross first.

When vermin and wild animals began to hammer at the shields and wriggle under them, less numerous than birds or insects but much stronger, we finally got to dismiss entire sections of the defence and remake them anew in pale yellow Light. It burned the dead when they touched them, though not as much as more concentrated amounts would have. We focused our defenses anew, breaches becoming rarer as the work became more distributed, and in some places our people even began to lower panels to bait the dead into deadly Light volleys.

“It’s turning in our favour,” Roland told me, panting and sweat-soaked.

“For now,” I grunted back. “Still an hour and half before sundown”

“They’ll pull away before that,” the Rogue Sorcerer said. “They have to.”

He might be right, I thought. The Dead King had to know we had Firstborn with us, and on weak undead like this roving packs of Mighty would be pure butchery. But the assault from the hordes wasn’t slacking and that boded ill. He had at least one last nasty trick left for us, and I could hazard a good guess at what it might be.

“Send for our sword,” I told Roland. “I expect we’re about to have an unpleasant turn.”

It didn’t make me a prophet to predict hard times when fighting Keter, but I felt a sliver of dark satisfaction anyway when the hammer blow did come. With so much magic and Light out in the air, it’d been damned impossible for even Named to smell it when a force had approached us under the Dead King’s favourite hiding enchantments: we didn’t realize a thing until a wave of skeletons broke through a weaker section of the shields and hit the Army of Callow’s shield wall. The swarms poured in with them, a potential catastrophe, but Hune responded as swiftly and ruthlessly as she’d been taught in the War College.

The entire beachhead was purged in a wave of fire and Light, including at least half a company of our own soldiers. We would have lost a lot more, I told myself, if the gap had spread.

I’d not intervened yet because I didn’t believe that was the last blow, and once more I was proved right: an entire section of our defences shattered a heartbeat later as half a dozen vultures with Revenants on their backs broke through the 'ceiling'. I wasn't close to enough to help much, to my irritation: I only got off a few shots of flame from a distance, and by the time Zombie came to my side the Revenants were already on the ground. I'd had a band of five waiting for this, our sword. Archer and the Silver Huntress were among them, but while they went through the vultures like butter the Revenants were another story.

They didn't stay and fight the Named, they just killed.

The dead Named butchered their way through the Levantines and my soldiers, each heading out towards a different part of the shielding even as masses of birds poured through the gaping hole they'd made in the ceiling. The sorcery and Light that shot up in answer wasn't enough, like someone trying to stop a river with a spear stroke. I almost reached for Night again, I was recovered enough to do something, but breathed out in relief when massive spinning blades of Light erupted just above our troops and began shooting upwards.

The Blessed Artificer had come through the gate, arriving with the third wave of Named.

Enough dead had flown through already that dozens more soldiers died before the carrion could be destroyed, and we did not catch a single fucking Revenant as they fought their way out – and, even worse, opened breaches as they did. Fuck, and we'd barely learned anything about what they could do too. I secured two breaches with my escorts as the shielded ceiling was painstakingly restored, and a moment later Creation shivered. I grinned tiredly: Akua had finally anchored the wards, thank the Gods. Unlike the first few times the Dead King wouldn't do us the favour of grinding his expendables to dust on our defences, so to the ragged cheering of the army the swarms went still and then began to retreat.

Half an hour left until sundown.

Still on Zombie's back, my face was grim as I looked around us. Though the battle had gone well, better than we'd expected even – there'd been no need to commit the Procerans or even the Third to very risky flanking actions – we'd still lost more than a thousand, at a glance. At least half over that in wounded too, though the priests would see to that some. As night began to fall and the hard work of building the camp into a defensive position was undertaken under torchlight and magelights, I found myself approached by a silent ring of thin silhouettes with painted faces. The sigil-holders of the Firstborn bowed when I turned to them, and I offered a hard smile.

"Prepare your sigils," I said. "We raid, Mighty."

The answering smiles were fearsomethings, for these were a fearsome lot.

It was our turn, now.

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, that means an extra chapter in the tab of the same name. This one is titled "Malanza", from the POV of Rozala Malanza at various points in the series.

Insanenoodlyguy

"You have means to deal with them?" the Beastmaster asked.

"Sure," I replied with a hard smile, "it's called votes."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Djinn O'Cide

Go. Vote. Here. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

Ouch.

Sending squads of Revenants out to kill their individual ways through regular troops while avoiding the Named concentrated to deal with them? That's going to be brutally effective when the Alliance can't prevent it.

Zggt

I think that the Dead King has contingencies for when only Named will be of import in the confrontation. Catherine's legacy, in as much as she wants to build it, is that humanity can create a change where Named can't, and that it is stronger. Whittling down the army while letting the Named survive removes that life-long narrative from Catherine, which as a villain would be her downfall (her unbelievable hubris, and so on).

RoflCat

And yet out of those 1000+ dead she confirmed (and more wounded), how many were done by the Revenants compare to the rest of his forces?

It's also saying something that both DK and Catherine focus more on damaging the non-Named forces than the Named (Catherine dropping her big Night bomb on the bird swarm, DK have his Revenants deal as much damage to the line as it can then get out)

Frivolous

It impresses and horrifies me that Catherine and the Levantines knew that many would die when the gates were countered, and yet the Levantines went through anyway.

Catherine's Tears. Nice name for a destructive evocation spell.

I really hope that in the next episode, we'll get a look at Mighty harvesting Night from Keter undead. We've had no actual depiction of such yet, which is unfortunate.

Liliet

Not the first nor the last time. Fights against fae were much uglier, as the vanguard was practically guaranteed to all die to the fire and shit. And people went anyway.

Someperson

For all intents and purposes it seems she just invented the meteor swarm spell.

Burlyraven

Heh, once more Catherine's lasting legacy will be a thing of fire.

I wonder how used to the harsh calls everyone in the alliance is at this point? Obviously all the soldiers on the frontlines know they're likely going to die in any combat, but I wonder if the mages and priests hesitate any when the call for a purge comes, or if even the bloodiest of hearts therein has calcified. It's kill a dozen to save a thousand, but that's still quite the burden on the average will.

RoflCat

The first time you hesitate over a guy and get to see dozens more died, you'd probably learn that lesson fast.

Or just hear stories from those who were there.

dadycool

Catherine's Tears, a rain of black fire. Beautiful.

caoimhin

A hard start, but it's a win with relatively low losses of lives.

It would be so, so awesome to read the Drow's Night Raid from the Drow's POV. But Catherine tends to get poetic when describing them, so I guess that's fine too.

Cheers for a cool chapter!

Darkening

Seeing Jindrich's pov of Cat was spectacular. I'd love more of that lol.

letouriste delightful as always:)

Juff

Typo Thread:

twenty knights form > twenty knights from the ogre have > the ogre did aknowledged > acknowledged at us hurry > at us to hurry gates has all > gates had all number ghouls > number of ghouls retreated the > retreated into the to hisper > to whisper dedly > deadly fearsomethings > fearsome things

TeK

Well finally someone uses necromancy right. It always annoyed me how, despite it's catastrophic destructive potential, nobody tried to get creative with it. You can do just so much, undead insects, chemical warfare, psychological pressure, it always disappointed me, how most writers never explore these delicious opportunities. So my hat's off for EE, yet again.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, I liked Cat musing about the fact that some of the most important wards defending the camp were those against vermin. Probably because it would poison food and water supplies.

Liliet

Also because you cannot sleep because short of solid stone nothing can actually prevent them from coming after you when you are.

Well, I guess sleeping in shifts would be possible, depending on the amount of vermin.

Adrian V

In the defense of the many authors out there sometimes the very rules of magic of their setting prevent those uses, at least in a big manner, even here DK can do it because he has experience and raw power behind him and liek we justs aw it can be countered. Also in other setting they have the means to oppose such tactics, here their danger was the number but they were individually pretty fragile, i can see another world were such attack are rendered useless by a simple (but big) cloud of acid or even just gas ignited by a spark.

Hellrage

Wasn't it mentioned explicitly that it carries the risk of the DK having some connection to it still? So they were very wary of harvesting from the undead.

Big I

So is the Sage no longer Doddering? Or is this someone else?

Frivolous

Someone else. There appear to be numerous Names of Sage. We've seen Doddering Sage, Sage of the West (only a Revenant, and then destroyed by Ranger), and now Sage, period.

ninegardens

>It was the Third that'd serve as our reserve: I was counting on Abigail of Summerholm's knack for calculated risks. She'd commit if and when it was needed, but not a moment before.

Hehehehe... Gotta love that casual assumption of Abigail's hypercompetance... that the poor girl herself does not believe in.

Finn ...

Um, wrong chapter?

Liliet

Right chapter, it's the quote from above.

Liliet

I really, really want to see Abigail's POV again. Catherine's seeing what's really there and we could already see it in Abigail's book 4-5 fights, but does Abigail herself? XD

Abrakadabra

Ab, ab, ab-Abigail hero of the imperium!

Black Spiral Dancer

Love Abigail getting her recognition of perfect dutiful coward

Tohron

Way back in the Battle of Three Hills, the size of Catherine's entire force was less than double the death toll of this single engagement. Quite the perspective shift.

Crash

First chapter after having caught up with the series! I seem to always catch up when battle is about to begin haha

I appreciate the little mentions to Abigail and how her tiny appearances can make a lot of waves just because we've been in her PoV before. I know this isn't exactly a big deal currently but I appreciate these minor story beats paying off.

nightup

"If your Grand Alliance makes accord with me, Princess of Aquitan," I softly said, "oh, what howling ruin I will visit upon the King of Death. I have dooms in my arsenal that the world will shake of them."

mamm0nn

Hm, I wonder why, even after 5 years, they are still using Rozalia's Light and sorcerous panes from the Battle of the Camps instead of permeable but softly burning ones. Rozalia used them well at the time because she was fighting humans (and orcs and goblins) with ranged and artillery, and her solid panes were particularly potent for the battle.

But against the Dead King's waves of Carrion I'd assume panes of continuous damage, even if it would take minutes for it to bite through skeletons enough to 'kill' them, would be preferable and long since developed. Something that in game-terms would be an area of 1 fire damage / second to all that enter it.

Those insects are the most troublesome with the birds a close second, the larger the creatures the less troublesome they are for they are more numerous and spear-vulnerable they are. So let the dogs and deer run through those panes barely singed, the bugs all burn and the birds are rendered flightless by scorched wings.

mamm0nn

*the larger the creatures less troublesome for they are LESS numerous and more spear-vulnerable.

Liliet

Because the main point is to stop these from killing their army? Being bitten by a poisonous insect that is also on fire is not preferable to just being bitten by a poisonous insect.

the insects are DK's disposables. Catherine's soldiers are very much not. So defense >>>> offense here.

Black Spiral Dancer

There's no option of a Wall of Fire that is also a Wall of Force.

Chapter 56: Repertoires

"There is no such thing as an unusable army, only armies that are not properly used."

– Aretha the Raven, Nicaean general

We did not come as an army, not the kind I'd raised and led and fought against. The Firstborn followed in my wake like a trail of colourful armed gangs, advancing without formation and answering to no single general. Ten thousand of the Firstborn had come raiding with me, the eerie grace of their stride belying the disorder of their advance. Few of their sigils resembled each other, be it in looks or composition. My old servant Lord Soln now led hardened elites in steel and obsidian, its circular sigil of grey and red painted over faces and mail, while the numerous sigil of Mighty Kuresnik eschewed armour entirely in favour of long barbed spears and dyed green hair like their sigil-holder.

Through the winding hills of the Twilight Ways they followed me in silence, my dead mount's gallop keeping me ahead of even the quickest among them. Of the sigils that had answered my call, the greatest Mighty were Soln – once a lord in my short-lived Peerage, and still instinctively deferential to me even when it preferred otherwise – and Sudone, who back during the Iserran campaign had once challenged me and since been taught better. Three days stripped of all Night had humbled it, but though fear had given way to insolence it loved me not. No matter. When it came to commanding loyalty among the drow, fear was more than enough. They would both serve as my captains when the time came.

And it would come soon, for our departure had been swift. It had left all the work that inevitably followed the end of a battle in the hands of General Hune and the Blood, but that'd not been a choice born of shirking but of a pragmatic consideration: so long as we took the Twilight Ways, we'd reach the enemy's camp before the Revenants could return. Stripped of their vulture mounts by Archer and Huntress doing, they'd have to make their way back on foot and stuck on Creation. Less than an hour had since been spent treading the paths of Twilight, but already I could feel we were reaching the end of our journey. Just a few more hills and we'd be there, which meant it was time to appoint my captains.

I stroked Zombie's mane, silently instructing her to slow her gait, and shortly closed my eyes. In a twist of will I pulled at Lord Soln and Mighty Sudone through the Night, as if tugging a bridle, and before long tendrils of shadow trailed Zombie's hooves along the ground. The Mighty smoothly leapt of the darkness, each landing at a full run and never breaking stride. But a heartbeat later we were atop a hill overlooking a small vale where I could sense our crossing awaited, so bade Zombie to halt and the drow smoothly mirrored her. With them no longer moving, I got a better look at the pair I'd summoned.

Soln's sigil, a ring of swords with an open mouth at the centre, had been enameled into the side of a helmet of clear Proceran make. It hid its eyes from sight, if not the long pale hair that went down its back. Beneath that affectation it wore ornate ringmail under its obsidian cuirass, going down into knee-length mail skirt ending in obsidian greaves covering leather boots. Soln had a martial look to it and bore both sword and spear, two of the three traditional arms of the Firstborn. Like most of those who had once been in my Peerage, my once Lord of Shallow Graves had thrived in the war against Keter: taking Night and loot from the dead had allowed it to slowly turn its sigil into a hardened and finely equipped warband. Its sigil-oath, I'd been told, related to the sharing and obtaining of such equipment: even dzulu were promised mail and steel weapons. It was not a grand oath like Rumena had made, but it had made the Soln an attractive sigil for many in this time of war.

Sudone's appearance was rather more lavish. Its sigil was woven into many tresses as small coloured stones that made the wavelike blue and green patterns look like they were following some eldritch tide, almost hypnotic to look at. Its 'armour' was a decorative breastplate of dyed leather so heavily encrusted with lapis lazuli as to be useless even if it didn't inexplicably have a neckline. Beneath it were only long gauzy robes in shades of blue and green, though there were enough layers its body could not really be made up beneath – but the different colours made it look as if it were rippling, likely the intent.

It was impressive and unique, as had often been the way with sigil-holders in the Everdark.

Sudone's only weapon was a long obsidian-tipped glaive and like many traditionalists it disdained the 'new ways' learned in the Burning Lands, mocking armour and 'dressing up dzulu' as being some kind of perverted fixation for Mighty grown feeble in the head. The Sudone and other traditionalist sigils often took harder losses in battle, but the old-fashioned way they distributed Night also tended to mean they had more powerful Mighty. Those two were, in a way, emblematic of the currents that were beginning to pull Firstborn society two very different ways.

Mind you, the traditionalist here did not have the better reputation of the two. Sudone was taller than Soln in body, and perhaps stronger in the Night, but it was also what the drow called radhular. It translated roughly to 'glad-joiner', and was an insult some Firstborn used for Mighty who preferred to act through cabals and alliances instead of picking an honest fight. The connotation was that drow like Sudone only fought when the odds were on their side, something most Firstborn would be quite offended to be told. The essence of the Tenets of Night, after all, was to rise in power by taking it from others.

I'd been silent for too long, I realized, lost in my thoughts as I'd been. Both were looking at me without hiding their wariness.

"Watch closely," I said, "as neither of you were with the host when we took Lauzon's Hollow last summer."

Lightly tapping the dewy grass of the hill, I let Night ripple out and shaped it as the broad strokes of what the location we'd be raiding would look like. Julianne's Highway, going from south to north, would furrow between steep-sloped and tightly nestled hills.

"The Silver Huntress and her cabal tell us that the entrance has been fortified by the enemy," I said.

My staff traced ditches and walls not only in the furrow between the hills, but also in a broad half-circle in front of them. Keter had not spared work in preparing for us, though these defences were not yet finished.

"Deeper in, we approach the Hollow proper," I continued.

Night continued to slowly ripple forward, depicting the way the furrow would continue into the hills until it reached a bowl-like valley, its surrounding slopes so eroded by rain as to be nearly vertical walls.

"There was once a village there, Lauzon, for which the hollow was named," I said. "Some structures should still stand, and the enemy is likely to be using them as warehouses. There will be many undead here, and perhaps even Revenants."

In fact the village was named for a folk heroine named Lauzon who'd supposedly beaten back a great army of bandits here and then founded a village when the prince gave her the land as a reward, but I saw no need to needlessly confuse the matter. Night continued to crawl, shaping the latter end of the pass: a wavy, hilly road with several large alcoves that eventually led back to open grounds.

"There will be enemies on the road," I continued, "but the larger part of the enemy's camp is out in the open beyond the pass."

There just wasn't enough room to cram a hundred thousand people in the pass itself, even if Keteran armies didn't have to deal with the usual disease outbreaks that came from cramming soldiers tightly together for long times. The two Mighty were watching closely, and not only because I'd ordered. There were no sigil-holders alive who were not practiced raiders, aware of the importance of knowing the lay of the land.

"We will split our force in three," I said. "So that we might make the most of this night."

"Wise," Mighty Sudone muttered. "We will not find a soft belly twice."

I nodded, then turned my gaze to the other sigi-holder.

"Lord Soln," I said, and watched the title ripple through its frame. "You will take to a third of our force and strike at the enemy's fortifications."

The bottom of my staff tapped the entrance of the pass, in particular the walls and ditches nestled between the hills. Pickler's engines would be able to reduce fortifications out in the open, but further in it'd get tricky. Best take care of that potential bottleneck now, as no one did attrition warfare like Keter.

"Leave no wall standing and sweep all in your way," I ordered.

"It will be as you say, Losara Queen," the drow that had once been my Lord of Shallow Graves replied, pressing hand over heart. "The dead will die once more."

My gaze moved to Sudone, whose silver-blue eyes watched me unblinkingly.

"You will lead one third of our force as well, Mighty Sudone," I said, and tapped the northern edge of the pass.

Near the open grounds where the camp lay, but not too far out.

"Your duty is hunt down the Enemy's ritual-makers and destroy them," I bluntly said. "Sow ruin where you may, but it is those skulls above all others I require of you."

It was a fantasy for the raid to be able to rid us of Neshamah's mages, but we could at least hamper his ability to hammer away at us with rituals. It was always Binds who were capable of magic, never the lesser undead we called Bones, so great concentrations of their kind were usually knots of sorcerers – when they served as officers for his armies, the Dead King used them rather more sparingly. Made sense, considering he had a limited stock of Binds and massive hordes of Bones. Just because Keter's logistics were different than ours didn't mean his armies were entirely without them.

"Your word is that of Sve Noc, First Under the Night," Sudone replied, mirroring Soln's own salute. "Their will be done."

It would do. Sudone was a better match for the mage-hunt, given that Soln was a great deal more prone to... blunt approaches. It was no Jindrich, mind you, but Sudone was a lot less likely to end up overreaching when it hit the edge of the enemy camp.

"I will lead the last third myself," I said. "You may pick whatever sigils you like to assemble your war party, but I claim three for myself: Brezlej, Randebog and Kuresnik."

A pair of eyes, a shield and a swift spear. Those three, as much the Mighty as the sigils they had shaped, were at the heart of my plan for my part of the raid. Neither of the three were considered among the greatest Mighty of the host, either, so it wasn't even like I'd be stepping on the toes of my two captains by claiming them.

"And should we both seek the same sigil?" Sudone asked.

I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth.

"I would expect the matter to be settled in concord between you two," I said. "I have no patience for foolishness tonight."

"As you say, First Under the Night," Mighty Sudone murmured in reply.

Not convinced, that one. It would have preferred a fight. Sudone's sigil had grown smaller in the years since the giving of sigil-oaths had become a law of the Firstborn, for its rule was particularly brutal to dzulu. Yet those that remained, and those that had since joined, were hard-nosed traditionalists. That lesser Mighty and even dzulu would be willing to become Sudone knowing they'd be treated like expendable things had startled me, but then the Everdark's traditions were not something easily set aside even when those traditions were at your expense.

"Might this one ask what deeds you will seek tonight?" Lord Soln delicately asked.

Flattery and not genuine deference this time, I gauged. Not that it made any difference.

"Havoc," I replied, baring my teeth as my staff came to rest on the valley that had given the pass its name. "Havoc is my business tonight, Lord of Shallow Graves."

While they went about their sabotage, I was going to return to my roots: I'd make enough of a bloody ruckus that Keter would not dare to look elsewhere.

"Is it not always, Losara Queen?" Mighty Sudone laughed.

It bowed to me, allowing the gesture to end its presence as it dissolved into shadow.

"Our deeds will be worthy," Lord Soln promised me, "of an empire ever dark."

It followed suit, though not quite as smoothly. As for me, I closed my eyes and let Zombie guide me towards the last of the distance to the needle-hole that would take us out of the Twilight Ways and into the heart of the enemy camp. Letting the Night flow through my veins, I listened through the sea of thoughts and emotions as my two captains picked their sigils. They went swiftly, the unspoken competition having hurried them as I had wished, and when the last of the sigil-holders, a Mighty Finarok, went over to Sudone I leaned forward with a smile. The darkness came eagerly when called.

"You ride with me," I murmured.

It carried through the Night, like a whisper into the ears of my raiders. Fear and excitement bloomed, along with an undercurrent of hunger. Oh yes, I mused, these would do nicely. The sigil-holders among them I pulled to me as my mount slowed and then stopped before the very stretch of grass where we would cross. First those I had wanted most: wary Brezlej, grizzled Randebog and bold Kuresnik. But the others as well, the whole throng of them, with only the most eye-catching standing distinguished from the rest. One-armed Vudaga bedecked in jewels, Darissim with the bone-white tattoos and its ebony spear, even bloody Ogoviz – smaller than me, almost childlike, and having never worn paint not made of Mighty's blood.

Even the least of them had been around for a century, and there some here who had been blooding their spears for longer than anyone save elves could live.

"Sudone has been made a hunter of hunters," I told them. "And Soln will destroy the works of the Enemy. Ours is to be the hour of the sword, Mighty. Bare and bloody."

I swept the sigil-holders with my gaze, holding them there long enough for them to look away.

"We will war in the manner I have arranged," I said. "Listen close now, for you will bring those words to your sigils."

Nothing too sophisticated would work with Firstborn. They weren't trained soldiers, and though by now they were veterans one and all it would be decades before a proper dwarf war doctrine could be made – just adapting the Legion one to Firstborn peculiarities was bound to fail, and spectacularly. So it was tactics in broad strokes I presented them with. Skirmishers out front, the sigils heavy on them taking the vanguard when we crossed. After the first few exchanges armoured sigils would strike in the thick of the enemy, and those few small sigils that were heavy on Mighty were to hunt constructs and Revenants at the exclusion of all else.

The tactics were not new to them, and I trusted they would be carried out skillfully. The dismissal was swift, save for three I held back. Brezlej, Randebog, Kuresnik. I met their eyes, sensing their unease in the Night.

"I have a particular use for you," I smiled.

They listened, and when I was certain they'd understood I dismissed them as well. Not a moment too early, either. Our way out was just before us, and the forces of Soln and Sudone were nearing their own ways out. Orders trickling down from sigil-holders to sigil, my third of the forces gracefully repositioned into the rough order of battle I'd outlined and resumed its advance. We would be the first into the fire, to draw the most attention.

Within moments crossed, and the hour of the sword began.

—

Two hundred of us, Mighty and dzulu, slipped into Creation.

By the time feet had touched solid ground, the first volley had already been thrown. Keter did not field many bowmen – bows required too much upkeep – but that hardly meant the armies of the Dead King were without ranged weapons: iron-tipped javelins came down as a rain. Two dzulu were unlucky enough to take a sharp tip through the chest before they could liquefy into shadows, but they were the only casualties from the first round. Drow skirmishers were damnably hard to kill. I batted aside the sole javelin chunked at me – it would have punched through my shoulder, by the angle – with my staff and took an assessing look around.

I almost let out an impressed whistle as a second wave of drow came into Creation, for Keter had been busy. All around us the dead turned to match the threat. Already a second volley of javelins was in flight even as drow began to emerge from the shadow tendrils closer to the enemy, but the sigil-holder for the Serbanad howled as it unleashed Night and the javelins froze in mid-air, momentum stolen from them. They clattered to the ground a moment later, even as I pulled Night to my eyes and tried to figure out the lay of the enemy's fresh works. The abandoned village of Lauzon had been rebuilt into fortified stone warehouses, but that wasn't unexpected.

The surprise was the scaffolding going up the eastern and western sides of the hollow, intricate sets of stairs and even pulley-lifts. In the darkness I glimpsed hulking shapes atop the hills where the scaffolding led, not constructs but instead engines of war. My brow rose, as those were rare – Neshamah usually preferred his horrors, as they could be used in more ways than simple engines. Which meant, I grimly thought, that these were unlikely to be simple engines at all.

We had maybe half an hour to spare before this got too dangerous to continue, so there was no time to waste. My skirmishers were already on their fourth wave through and they'd closed the distance with the dead, going up close with the skeletons in mismatched armour the Dead King had crammed here. More threatening were the warbands of heavy infantry near the entrance to the hollow: tall skeletons in heavy armour, wielding long spears and greatshields. If my vanguard got in close with those it'd be slaughter, so I breathed out and let Night flood through my veins. A few javelins were thrown at me, but two ispe in Volvich paint had stayed as guard dogs and they shredded the projectiles with howling bursts of air.

I struck the ground with my staff, letting Night crawl out in thin tendrils like spiderwebs along the ground. With every heartbeat more of the hollow was covered, until the crisscrossing covered the full grounds. Firstborn stepped on the darkness without consequences, which had been the tricky part, but where the undead made contact they found the working stuck to them like glue. Much less exhausting than a destructive miracle, and almost as effective: given the size of the heavy infantry and their lack of finesse, most of them were caught within moments. Those that weren't found their fellows served as the wall they were meant to be, only this time to Keter's detriment.

"Slayers, begin," I called out in Crepuscular.

Acknowledged bloomed in the Night as the last of my skirmishers hurried through and armoured drow began sidling into Creation. All around me the hollow had become a nightmare made melee, deft drow dancing around clumsy corpses – many stuck to my miracle – and reaping death as they moved with fluid grace, slipping into shadows and striking with unnatural strength. I waited until two sigil-holders I'd decided on earlier came through, then finally set out.

"Krakovich, Prosij, with me," I ordered.

I limped towards the old village of Lauzon, the two of them trailing behind me without a thought to disobedience.

"Mighty Krakovich, I am told you know the Secret of Great Gales?"

"It is so, mighty one," the sigil-holder acknowledged.

"And you, Prosij, are reputed to hold the full suite of the Secrets of Ruin," I noted.

"A feat long in the making, Losara Queen," it proudly replied

Good. The Ruin Secrets were on the subtle side, compared to most Secrets, but I'd found them very useful – the trick that'd killed the Saint of Swords was derived from the Secret of Marching Ruin – against most conventional defences. There just wasn't a lot of sorcery using similar means, so most wards and enchantments didn't account for them.

"Good," I smiled. "Mighty Prosij, I want you to use the Secret of Ruinous Downfall on those stone houses."

I pointed at the warehouses Keter had raised from the old village, sidestepping a skeleton swinging a sword as I did and leaving Krakovich to absent-mindedly slap its head off. Its fingers trailed down the bare spine after, and there was a soft touch of power as Night was stolen from the corpse and added to its own. Prosij looked pained, as if it wanted to contradict me but did not dare.

"There are too many, Losara Queen, and the sum is too large," Prosij finally hazarded. "It will not be a success."

"It's not meant to," I grunted. "Krakovich, be ready to call on the Gales soon."

Mighty Prosij, either reassured or wary of arguing further, heeded my command. Biting deep into its own thumb it drew intricate patterns on its bare arm, the Night shivering in them, and only then did it begin to call on the Secret – a stabilizer, the patterns, as the Ruinous Downfall was particularly difficult to maintain. It was based on the principle of entropy, like most Secrets of Ruin, but this particular one had a vicious bent: it went for the weakest part of what it meant to unmake and poured the curse there. In people, that usually meant bursting eyes or the brain, but anyone with Night could fight the curse off so it was usually used on artefacts or structures instead.

When it got unleashed on a dozen stone warehouses instead, it proved thin. Weakened. Which didn't matter because I'd never meant for the Secret to actually break the stone: what it did, what I'd wanted it to do, was find the weak parts of the buildings and then attack them. Sorcery immediately flared as the defensive wards laid into the stonework by Keteran mages protected the structure, neatly informing me of both the strength of the enemy's defences and where the weak points were. Masego much admired the Dead King's wardwork, as it was reactive instead of uniform – it concentrated power where the strike was made instead of leaving it spread out.

This once, though, for someone who could smell out the sorcery it was like shining a light on the weaknesses.

"Keep it going," I ordered, and let loose the Night.

Veins writhing with power, I grit my teeth and went about it methodically. Shaping a great spike of Night, angrily roiling power, I rammed the strike straight into the weakness of the ward. The warehouse blew as if struck by the hand of an angry god, clouds of a disgusting green miasma erupting as a plume.

"Krakovich," I snarled, already shaping a second spike.

The Secret of Great Gales were meant to shred entire warbands approaching through tunnels, but it wasn't the force I'd been after when I'd chosen someone who could use it – it was the size. Correctly divining my intent, Mighty Krakovich drew the cloud of poison that would have spread across the hollow and guided it up into the sky where it could not massacre my entire raiding force. The Dead King did like his poisons, and he would have made sure to keep those both close to the front and under a roof, where the containers would not be damaged by the elements. We went about it in good order, smashing one warehouse after another.

By the last one Krakovich was panting heavily and Prosij looked about to pass out, but we'd left only rubble and poisoned sky where Keter's poisonous munitions had been held. That alone would make the raid worth it.

"Well done," I said. "Retreat to your sigils. This is about to get a great deal more unpleasant."

How many dead had there been in the hollow when we'd first come? A thousand, I figured, maybe two. Not as much as could have been placed here, even though it was a significant amount. By now most the last waves of my raiders were almost done coming through and we'd effectively taken the hollow, though of course trying to keep it would have been madness. We were a cork on a river, not a dam, and Firstborn were not good defensive fighters. The last few holdouts of the dead were heavies, pockets of a few dozens being taken apart by lesser Mighty and drained of Night, but I knew better than to think this a victory. There had been no constructs here, no Revenants. We'd not been contested, and though the poison had been a loss for Keter it wasn't a major one – if they truly had a Crab close, then not only would they have replacements but they could likely make more. It'd been bait.

Lauzon's Hollow was defending itself too poorly. Mighty Soln would be hitting the positions ahead of us by now and Mighty Sudone be sowing chaos near the enemy camp, but that wasn't enough to excuse the poor performance of Keter tonight. It'd all make sense if we had taken them by surprise, but they had to have known a retaliatory strike by the Firstborn after dusk was a possibility. Were this the first year of the war, I might have been on the enemy miscalculating and believing that Ivah's ten thousand out in the lowlands were all the drow there were on our side. I knew better by now, though.

When Neshamah made mistakes – and he did, like everybody else, for brilliance was not omniscience – it didn't look like this. This was a trap. One I'd caught in advance and entered willingly, with an eye to the escape, but it would have been a dangerous delusion to believe we actually had the upper hand right now. Making my way back towards the heart of the hollow, where Julianne's Highway passed, I idly flicked a hand over my shoulder. The western scaffolding went up in black flames, and with a sharp twist of will I subjected the eastern to the same. Petty vandalism, but sometimes it was the little things that made life sufferable.

"Spread out," I called out. "Prepare for assaults from the front and back."

Skirmishers took the front on both sides, heavier sigils setting up behind them, but I did not supervise – with Firstborn, doing so was often more harmful than helpful. I pulled at Mighty Ogoviz and Darissim through the Night, called them to me. I did not waste time with courtesies when they rose from shadow.

"There are engines of war up on the hills to the east and the west," I said. "Go there, and learn of them. Destroy the Enemy's work if you can."

I dismissed them curtly, and in silence they melded back into the shadows. I doubted the Dead King would leave those as unprotected as they looked, but it was worth a try. And if it went bad, as I suspected it might, those two sigils were known as being rather quick on their feet. Unlike with humans, the drow conception of honour in no way precluded running away when the opposition was stronger than expected. Safely at the heart of the milling sigils, I wove myself a few protective workings in Night – an illusion, a sharpening of my senses and a trip ward – and straightened my back. It wouldn't be long now, I figured.

Above, on the hills, the two sigils I'd sent ran into what sounded like entrenched defences. There was fire and light, sorcery as well as clash of arms. And still I waited, almost with baited breath. Ogoviz retreated from the western heights, going down the heights as shadow strands with most of the force it had taken up there, when finally Keter closed its trap. With a bone-shaking hum, wards went up over all of us. Idly, already knowing the outcome, I tried to open a gate into the Twilight Ways and found a lock had been placed over the area.

"The first part," I mildly said. "Now for the second, King of Death."

As if called forth by my words, two hulking shapes rose from where they had been lying among the hills. With horrid roars, the great undead dragon creatures we called wyrms spread their wings as their eyes glowed with eerie power. There was a great clamour as the drow who had gone up to the other heights fled in disarray, a tall silhouette in armour standing over the edge and bringing up a bloody head. Mighty Darissim, I recognized. Revenant. I cracked my neck to the side and grinned. Good, Keter had finally played its hand.

Now the fun could begin.

devildragon777

Cat is in her element, tonight. Also fun to see more of the various Drow sigils.

Voting: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

James, Mostly Harmless

Top Web Fiction reset their vote counts recently, so Kat only has 70 votes for the week and five votes for the last 24 hours!

matrixm

Mighty Darissim noooooooooo!

Frivolous

Yeeesss!!! Finally, a solid example and depiction of drow draining Night from Keter undead.

– The last few holdouts of the dead were heavies, pockets of a few dozens being taken apart by lesser Mighty and drained of Night, but I knew better than to think this a victory.

Scary that Cat and Neshie have learned to anticipate each other. I wonder if they find their mutual emulation of each other's thought processes to be alarming.

Liliet

Neshamah probably greatly enjoys it. Stimulating, entertaining etc

Frivolous

I can't help but wonder if there is some kind of side effect from learning to think like an or another immortal.

Reading the Kabbalis Book of the Dead is supposed to allow Neshie to possess you. Learning to anticipate Cat's strategic thinking might have a similar effect on Neshie, and vice versa.

Crash

In Masego's words "the godhead is a trick of perspective".

But that's a difference in thinking in a massive scale. It's not like villains and heroes haven't fought from the other's perspective before, they're not so much ascending in thought as slightly shifting their morals and wants for 10 minutes of tactical planning.

The Kabbalis is another beast entirely, it was written to be an artifact of possession. It's entirely possible the Dead King left a bit of his soul there specifically for this purpose. These things aren't quite equivalent.

That said... it's interesting, Cat's POV in this chapter. I can't quite put my finger on it but it's different. I would enjoy seeing more.

TeK

You can't leave a bit of your soul inside a piece of information, unlike a material thing. After all, Kabbalis something-something in Praes is not necessarily an original book, especially considering that Mdego never touched the original or copied book – he picked the secrets out of Neshamah's head.

Miles

Nah there's probably just an attunement ritual hidden in the cadence of the words or something, which makes the caster/reader susceptible to someone who knows the right formula.

Frivolous

On the contrary, I think the Kabbalis Book of the Dead was more like a contagious meme or an information virus. It teaches you how to think so much like Neshie that Contagion and Sympathy occur and he occupies your head.

Being able to predict Neshie's actions or Catherine's actions therefore might have a similar effect on the anticipator. Neshie is a god and Catherine may be approaching that level, though I believe the latter is a low probability.

Masego's axiom of Godhead is a trick of perspective may have a corollary: Thinking too much like a god lets the god into you.

Liliet

I think the process is more... natural. Like what Kairos commented on for Cordelia learning from Malicia.

When you're learning against another opponent, they become your context. If something is "better than what they do" then that's your reference point, even if it might still be worse than you would have ever entertained otherwise. Or something that seems "barely living up to their standards" would be absolutely unthinkable for everyone else. You anticipate their reactions rather than reactions everyone else would have, etc. Just context and being used to things.

We don't know about the Kabbalis Book of Darkness thing, but I'd guess it's not just learning what Neshamah knew that has the effect talked about. Note how Neshamah's memories might have taken Masego over as an independent entity, but didn't change him as a person (beyond the mundane effects of trauma / learning new things).

And learning to anticipate Cat's strategic thinking might well have had an effect on Akua (again, context and what you have to pay attention to: can't ignore what happens to civilians if your opponent's actions are decided by that), but Neshamah... no.

devildragon777

...So you're saying that it tickles his funny bone?

Liliet

Yes.

Nilsen

Woop woop

TeK

Still waiting for a Mighty named Kowalski.

dadycoool

He'll be the strategist when they finally start getting the hang of real strategy.

Halinn

Knowing the Secret of Analysis, perhaps?

TeK

Yeah. Now that I think about it, any mind-enhancing Secrets would be both the most overpowered and the most obscure. Unlike some flashy Night bombs and such, you wouldn't really know that the Mighty knew that Secret and you would be even less willing to announce it's existence.

Which makes it pretty likely that they actually exist.

zebano

I may be misremembering, but isn't this part of why Ranger is so powerful?

grzecho2222

I wonder how many people here know that name from somewhere aside of Madagascar

Salt

Is that an undead dragon knight? Has to be, right? You can't just make a dramatic solo entrance flanked by a pair of dragons and not be a dragon knight. Especially since it's tall and visibly armored

Javvies

Heh. That's a nifty combo to trash the toxin stockpiles without letting them out to contaminate everything.

And, yeah, trap. I wonder what Cat's plan for countering the trap is, though presumably it involves the Mighty and Sigils that she explicitly laid claim to before the raid started.

darkening

She probably has a couple unravelers here to kill the wyrm and the drow are gonna ambush it.

caoimhinh

"I idly flicked a hand over my shoulder. The western scaffolding went up in black flames, and with a sharp twist of will, I subjected the eastern to the same. Petty vandalism, but sometimes it was the little things that made life sufferable."

She just couldn't resist setting stuff on fire, could she?
Hahahaha

Crash

Pyromaniac is her true Name, the fact it's taking so long to form isn't evidence of it's scope but that she is actively fighting it into being something else!

But we know. We all know in our hearts, the Pyromaniac Vandal bane of all that is flammable or inflammable alike!

dadycool

I love reading about the Drow raiding. I also adore how she's able to just pluck Mighty from wherever they are and use their specific talents like grabbing tools from a belt. I also love how her favorite command is essentially "Cry HAVOC! And unleash the... well...ME!"

Also caoimhinh is right. She really couldn't resist setting something on fire, even though she had just rained it down that afternoon.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

New Name: Dog (or Cat?) of War.

Not a robot

Why not just John while we're at it

Burlyraven

So the drow are coming from a despot based tribal anarchy with a unifying religion, and are rapidly becoming a theological empire divided into tribes as a part of that religion, complete with factional divides on interpretations of scripture. Neat.

Crash

It's also super neat that due to how the Firstborn think this is actually likely to work just fine where in a human society they'd have walked out of Keter to wage holy war on themselves.

Would absolutely read 5 books about the minutiae of Drow society re-forming itself.

10/10 world building

beleester

It's not really a theological dispute, more of a tactical one, seeing as the theology in question is basically "you keep whatever you can take." They disagree on the best way to gain power – whether it's by beefing up your Mighty so you have an unbeatable trump, or to beef up your dzulu so that you have a more useful army.

In the Underdark, the former was the clear winner – the Mighty are ridiculously powerful and an army of cannon fodder doesn't do much besides slow them down. But in the war against Keter, an army that can deal with hordes is a powerful asset, and it'll also bring in lots of Night that can raise them up even more.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Archer and Huntress doing > Archer and Huntress's doing foot and stuck on > foot, and stuck on leapt of > leapt off halt and > halt, and made up beneath > made out beneath society two > society in two take to a third > take a third hamper is ability > hamper his ability
"You word > "Your word
there some here > there were some here there look enough > there long enough down form > down from Within moments crossed > Within moments we crossed sidling (should this be sliding) sorcery it was > sorcery, it was most the last > most of the last Sudone be sowing > Sudone sowing baited breath > bated breath

Mental Mouse

> though fear had given way to insolence >
From context, should be the other way around.

James, Mostly Harmless

I suspect that insolence gave way to fear, which gave way to insolence again ...

Sinead

A more subtle note that someone made on Reddit, but Soln's oath has changed from the original oath.

"...Mighty Soln's pledge to found a cabal with any other sigil willing to help raise another Tvarigu in the heart of the Burning Lands ..."

TeK

Yeah, but frankly, by this point I don't remember it either.

Sinead

True, but from a continuity perspective of publishing this series it is a detail that would be a) really confusing b) hard to catch in general editing process (considering some other books I have read, editors are not always good at catching such details).

This has to be a way for the author to help revise the full series, otherwise it is brutally nitpicky to have this after every chapter.

miles

Were this the first year of the war, I might have been on the enemy miscalculating and believing that Ivah's ten thousand out in the lowlands were all the drow there were on our side.

Bet?

Rohkan

Soln had a different oath in book 5 chp 63. Tbh I sort of liked the old one better.

"Mighty Soln's pledge to found a cabal with any other sigil willing to help raise another Tvarigu in the heart of the Burning Lands had the crowd rippling in approval and a few feet stomping down,”

KageLupus

I think my favorite part of this chapter is how it shows the subtle shift in mood Cat seems to get when interacting with her Drow. The whole chapter Cat was much more poetic and formal, even just in her internal dialogue. She gets a little more in line with her normal tone once the fighting kicks up, but the whole first half of the chapter feels like Cat putting on her First Under the Night hat and really leaning into that role.

Cayle

So someone has to ask the real questions.

What happens when you drain the Night from an undead dragon?

darkening

Y’know, it’s a real shame general disaster went back to praes. A dragon would be a fun asset in the war against Keter.

sengachi

See, that kind of thinking is how Keter gets undead dragons.

Darkening

I fail to see the issue. Awesomeness ensues either way.

Juneau

Wait.. what?

Where is the next button?

Dont tell me I have finally caught up? Been reading on and off for the last year, a book here, a book there.

Urghhh. Now I have to wait. What’s the release schedule like I’ve honestly not been paying attention.

Matthew Wells

Tuesday and Friday. Bonus chapters at the start of the month.

Juneau

Awesome. Thank you. One tomorrow.

Side note if the author ever sees this. Abigail is totally the best side character ever, I hope she gets more time.

Chapter 57: Battery

"Fear not defeat, for defeat is the mother of learning. Many a time will you be asked this question: are you worthy? Many a time will you have to deny it, until at last you do not."

– Extract from the Tenets Under the Night, Book of Losara

Mighty Brezlej, I spoke into the Night, begin.

Brezlej Hundred-Eyes was an oddity by Firstborn standards. Most sigil-holders prioritized obtaining fighting Secrets, but Brezlej had instead begun picking up sight-related suites as far back as when it'd been ispe. It had since survived not by being slaying all its rivals but by dint of the unnaturally good timing those Secrets leant it. Its sigil had been shaped in the same image, sharp but fragile and relying heavily on its keen perception. What I wanted from Brezlej was not one its more famous tricks, like the Farsight or the Nine Pridnis Foretelling, but instead one that'd been considered near useless back in the Everdark. The Source-Finder, it was called, and up in the Burning Lands it had found a use at last.

Mighty Brezlej signaled agreement and submission, and I dismissed the matter from my mind. It would reach out to me when it had results and the other two sigil holders I'd hand-picked would hang back until the preliminaries were done. Now, stuck under ward with our backs to the wall, was the time to make asplash.

"SA VREDE?" I asked in a roar.

Are you worthy? The gospel I had first passed on to the Firstborn under twilight glow, long grown into something greater than the sum of my words. It might have been my lips that spoke it then, spoke it now, but the words did not belong to me. They belonged to the grey-skinned silhouettes standing in the dark of Lauzon's Hollow, those fresh faces bedecked with ancient glories come to wage a war against Death tonight. And they answered, for I'd given them the first half of the prayer but the second was of their making.

"CERA AINE!"

The nuances bloomed in the Night: shame, fond amusement, hard-toothed pride and grim determination.

Are you worthy? I had asked them.

Ask tomorrow, they replied.

An oath, a threat, a boast. They were not yet worthy, but the night was young. I did not often like them, these strange and vicious souls that cruel goddesses had placed in my hands, but there were times where I could not help but love them. How could I not, when I had spent my life taking in lost souls and broken things as my own? Perhaps it was that the Crows had seen in me when they stole me back from the brink, that I would not be able to use them without coming to care for them. Even the worst of Firstborn was beautiful in its own way, and when time came for another to stand as first under the Night I would not part with the mantle embittered from my years under it.

The drow had screamed their defiance into the starlit sky but it could not answer. The Hidden Horror did, with fury and crawling madness.

With a deafening crack the sides of the hills broke open in showers of stone, horrors crawling out with ear-splitting shrieks. Above us the stars were blotted out by great wings as the wyrms roared, spewing out clouds of poison onto my raiders as the great war engines atop the hills began to ponderously turn towards us. Over the edges tides of undead were unleashed, leaping down into the hollow – ghouls and skeletons and mages lit in ghostly green, spells already aflight. Among them a handful of silhouettes stood tall, Revenants clad in faded things and awaiting to unleash old horrors. The head of Mighty Darissim was thrown into the throng, leering in death, even as the first strike of the drum was heard.

Deep, slow and unrelenting it shivered through the air. Sorcery flared. Doom, the faraway drum promised. Doom. And through the sound fear and fatigue slipped into the ears of all who heard, sorcery just as poisonous as what boiled within the belly of the wyrms. Sve Noc stirred in the distance, ever jealous of the souls of their flock.

"You'll have to do better than that, King of Death," I laughed, Night gathering to me like rivers to the sea. "Let me remind you which of us it was, old bones, who once reigned over the night."

I had no use for subtlety, not when I was making a point, so it was an arrow of screaming Night that shot up towards that insolently-close wyrm above me – it spun as it shot up, siphoning ever more Night from my veins as Komana's harsh glee howled against my ear, and the abomination screamed when it pierced its belly. The Night did not fade after, staying a solid length rising straight from the tip of my staff to dozens of feet above the dead thing. Poison oozed down the length of the spike as I shifted my footing, grunting with effort even as a second hand came on my staff and Night surged through my limbs.

With a savage whoop, I slammed the dead dragon into one of the western engine turning towards us.

The belly burst open, unleashing a tide of steaming poison, and though the thing was not destroyed I had shredded its wings and body with the fall. I let go of the Night, gasping, and watched as pillars of wind turned back the cloud of death that'd come for my raiders. Eagerly, a whirling storm of obsidian and steel met the walking dead. I glimpsed only parts of the maddened melee, the nightmare suddenly turned real. Rylleh and sigil-holders split apart Tusks even as they trampled dzulu with impunity, ispe flickered from shadow to shadow as they danced the blades with sharp-fanged ghouls, javelins ripped through ornate breastplates as sorcery and Night traded deadly volleys.

Night had fallen, but there was light enough one would have been forgiven for believing otherwise.

There would be no gate into Twilight to take me up to the heights above, but then I had other ways. I whistled, with a flick of the wrist unleashing a rolling ball of blackflame that tore a hole through a tightly-packed shieldwall of armoured dead giving trouble to the Vuraga dzulu, and lightened the pain on my leg so that I might leap when Zombie passed by my side at a gallop and took flight again. Settling into the saddle I unsheathed my sword and savoured the ring of well-crafted goblin steel. With my knees alone I led her to take me to the eastern heights, where the Revenant that'd slain Mighty Darissim still stood, and my mount's long wings flapped as she hoisted us upwards in a spiral. Striking at the wyrm had dispersed my protective illusion, but it was not with surprise that I greeted the enemy's first volley. I'd been well aware it was coming.

Ghostly green flames flew at me in winding streaks, following even as Zombie dipped and twirled, while javelins and arrows came in swarms. Were I tired, were I spent, these could have been a threat. I was neither, for the night was yet young, and so I crushed them head on. Their dead flame I drowned out with my own, and no arrow was so well-crafted that it would not turn to ash when swallowed by blackflame. We came down on the enemy in a storm of fire, my mount whinnying with glee at the sight of the mayhem, and as her hooves touched the rock a circle of dead-become-ash burned around us.

"Come out, Revenant," I idly called out. "That won't have been enough to destroy you."

The noise was soft, under the roar of flames, but not so soft I did not catch it – eyes flicking to the side, I saw the spinning throwing axe about to bury itself in my chest. Swallowing a curse I leaned back and swatted at it with my staff, narrowly landing the blow. But I was looking the wrong way, as a flicker at the edge of my field of vision told me: the Revenant was coming from the other side. Zombie kicked at the enemy but I saw an axe come down and go straight through her leg. Shit, I thought, throwing myself down so she could flee. The Revenant was quicker than her. I glimpsed a blur of pale plate and then a large two-handed axe as it went down her back, splitting her in two.

“No,” I screamed, Night already at my fingertips.

I lashed out with darts of shadow but the Revenant met my eyes for a heartbeat – a pale brown, somehow sympathetic – and stomped down into the ash. The erupting cloud covered his retreat, leaving me with the horrible sight of Zombie cleaved in half. The pieces fell, after a moment, with sickening lurch. Destroyed beyond repair, whatever light there’d been in her eyes gone from a single stroke. Swallowing the grief I’d not expected to come, I laid a hand on her flesh and dragged the remains into the Night. I could dispose of the flesh properly, at least. There was no time for more, as another muted woosh tipped me off the enemy was after me again.

This time I ducked below the throwing axe, sharpening my senses further so I might hear from where the Revenant would come. Left, I thought, and lashed out with Night. A ghoul went up in black flames, then I caught sound from the right and burned up another. I was being toyed with. It was only luck that let me catch a glimpse of moonlight on steel and realize that, utterly silent, the Revenant had somehow gotten behind my back and was leaping towards me. A working would be too slow, I thought. Night burned in my arm as I twisted around and met that great axe with my sword and staff, being forced back as pain burned white-hot in my bad leg.

The Revenant withdrew his axe and I struck, sword flicking out, but even with Night along the edge the steel found no purchase in the plate. It’d been bait, and when I blocked the following blow with my staff – spell-forged steel or not, the Revenant’s blade bit not a whisper into the dead yew I’d been gifted in the depths of Liesse – I gave under his strength, stuck on the defensive long enough for him to take off a hand and sock me in the stomach. I spat out blood as a rib broke with a sharp snap, giving ground as I fled backward and flicked off the Night on the edge of my sword at the Revenant in the form of black flame. That white plate, though, was not so much as darkened by the heat of it. Dangerously well-crafted.

“Who were you?” I gasped out.

"Adehard Barthen," the Revenant replied in stilted Chantant, his voice deep and pleasant. "Once the White Knight, now a hound to the Enemy. Run while you still can, Callowan."

A White Knight using an axe? Hells, an Alamans using an axe? He must have been quite the odd duck.

"Not in the cards," I rasped.

The hand taken off the great axe reach behind his back. Another throwing axe, I decided, and threw up a quick gale of wind. But there was a flare of sorcery and it was another great axe that was revealed, one in each hand as he sped towards me. I shaped a tendril of Night and sunk it into the ground right before him, then detonated. He leapt up, just in time for my staff to smash his armoured stomach and forced him back to the ground. I swallowed a scream, my broken rib digging deeper into my flesh.

I struck out with my sword, looking for a weak point closer to the knee – if I found flesh, I could burn him inside out while avoiding the enchanted plate...

An axe came down to force aside my blade, goblin steel stubbornly matching Keteran spellcraft, and he swiftly pivoted on himself with his axe spinning with him and aimed for my throat. Gods but he was quick for a man his size. I formed a tendril of Night, curling around my own abdomen and had it drag me out of the axe's swing faster than I could move, then hammered his helmeted head with the tip of my staff: Night blew up in a heated detonation, but while the helm shook from the impact Sve Noc's power did not bite into the steel as it should have. Fuck me, but this one was a hard nut to crack. I stole the pain out of my rib, as it was getting too much to bear.

Completion sounded a clarion call into the Night: Mighty Brezlej was done. And it had answers for me.

Though I itched to continue the fight with this strange White Knight who'd already cost me too much, I'd not come here for revenge or a pissing match. My staff struck the ground in front of me, smoke billowing out, and even as a great axe went spinning through where I'd been a heartbeat earlier I weaved an illusion around myself. Lesser undead came flooding the edge of the broken hill, as if answering the Revenant's call, but I was just one limping step ahead. I skipped off the edge, calling Night to myself. Tendrils of darkness rose from the ground, forming into a flat bar I landed on and then stairs I strolled down as the workings of Mighty covered my back from the shots of the undead.

Mighty Brezlej knelt as I approached, so unusually short and stout for one of the Firstborn – I'd not seen many who could be called fat, though Brezlej fell well short of that – and its gaudy golden trinkets dangled on their strings.

"We have found three sources, Losara Queen," Brezlej said. "I offer these sights to you."

It offered up its palm, a small sphere of Night atop it. With a nod of thanks I took the sphere in hand and crushed it. My vision wavered as the memories I'd been given settled into my mind. It took me a few heartbeats to place the three ward anchors Mighty Brezlej and its sigil had found. One in the enemy's camp proper, beyond the pass – I sunk that memory into the Night and passed it to Mighty Sudone, along with the curt order of destroy – and another closer to the front, close to where Lord Soln was fighting. Its raiders were actually in the memory, getting the worse end of a tumble with ghouls and beorns. I passed along an order to break that anchor as well, Soln replying with a sense of acknowledgement.

"You believe the third anchor is the key one," I noted.

"It is the source of sources," Mighty Brezlej agreed.

And it was the one closest to me: not far beyond the hollow, into the winding pass and tucked away behind secondary wards obscuring what defended the anchor. It had trap written all over it, but it needed to be sprung anyway. Fortunately, I'd already handpicked –

"No you fucking don't," I snarled.

The wyrm I'd downed had been patched together by necromancers just enough to start moving around again, and now instead of massacring anything daring to climb its hilltop it was getting back on its feet and preparing to bound down into the hollow. There its weight alone would kill hundreds if not thousands of my warriors before it was itself ripped apart by the Mighty. Above us the other wyrm made a pass, spewing clouds of poison and tying up Mighty with defending against them. Too many for comfort, every one of those wasn't handling more mundane javelin volleys killing the dzulu.

The poison will win, in the long term, the cold voice in the back of my head assessed as Night raced through my veins. The gales were not dispersing the clouds, just pushing them higher. Already a dome of death was beginning to form above the hollow. The thoughts had flickered as my will shaped Night, weaving it into a cable stronger than steel. Without asking I snatched a javelin from Brezlej's back and bound the working to it before sheathing my sword and leaving my staff to stand unnaturally still. The downed wyrm was not a difficult target, so strength without skill was enough to have the barbed javelin sink into its side.

The cable went from before me to the wyrm, protruding from a rippling sphere of Night, but I wasn't intending for a repeat of the last time. I ripped out the other end of the cable from the sphere, spinning it out and adding a hook to the end. The downed wyrm leapt, after having batted ineffectually at the cable and found it would bend but not break, but I was swifter still: the other wyrm was making it pass and the hook clipped its belly. Both wyrms roared with dismay as the cable pulled taut, forcing the flying dragon into a fall and snatching the leaping one before it could land atop my warriors.

They both fell on hillsides out of sight, writhing angrily, and without batting an eye I wove a fresh cable and tied it halfway through their shared binding. The other side of that fresh cable I tied to a javelin – offered up solemnly by Brezlej – and with a snap threw it at the hulking shape of Keter's untouched siege engine on the eastern heights. A hard smile stretched my lips as I felt the steel bite into something solid and the Night sink roots, just in time for the wyrms to try to peel away: one went back up in the air, the other circled west to return to the hollow. Both pulled at the second circle with massive strength. With a thunderous crack the engine was pulled up, and it was with pleased chuckle I saw that the base of the platform had been fused into the rock. The wyrms cracked the hill open like an egg, undead falling below as part of a rain of rock.

That ought to slow the enemy down some.

A tide of dust washed over us and I pulled my hood down, calling Mighty Randebog and Mighty Kuresnik to my side. In the distance I felt an anchor break. Mighty Sudone's work, and not its only doing by the rising columns of smoke in the distance. The ward cutting us off from the Ways thinned, especially around where the anchor had been, but it did not break. Most likely it wouldn't until the main anchor lay shattered.

"Brezlej," I mildly said. "You have tactical command until I return. Aim the Mighty to keep back the poison-cloud and make the wyrms trash everything you can."

"Chno Sve Noc," Mighty Brezlej fervently swore.

Randebog was a stately one, wearing a black cloth mask going down to its lips. The yellow cape on its back somehow accentuated the tall silhouette bedecked in boiled leather painted black, and it bore a long curved sword at its hip. Kuresnik was the opposite, if anything: though just as tall, save for its dyed green hair it wore not a thing above the waist. It'd similarly eschewed boots and wore only a skirt of long metal-tipped leather strips as clothing. It had a wild look to it and its vivid green sigil was tattooed on its face, mixing with intricate tattoos of the same hue covering most of its grey-skinned body.

"Open your minds," I ordered.

With restraint but not gently, I pushed into them the sight Brezlej had shared with me: the main anchor, nestled in the pass and awaiting our destruction. Both drow shivered as the sensation, as the Night that I wielded came straight from Sve Noc and apparently felt... purer than most. Raw.

"Kuresnik?" I asked.

It clenched its jaw, as if straining.

"I can take us close, Losara Queen," Mighty Kuresnik eventually agreed. "But not there directly. There is a boundary."

Around us their sigils had been gathering, still fresh and eager from having been kept in reserve all this time. Maybe seven hundred in total, most of them Kuresnik – their sigil was one of the most numerous in my army – though their lot was admittedly thinner on Mighty. The Randebog had never been many and their chosen specialty had not learnt itself well to thriving in the war, but their core of twenty one Mighty were what I'd been after all along.

"Do it," I bluntly ordered.

Mighty Kuresnik slammed the butt of its long barbed spear into the ground, Night rippling out, and a heartbeat later its sigil followed suit. Kuresnik, that bold soul, had taken to the new ways with great relish: it was the first of my sigil-holders to have ever taken a Secret it owned and taught it to its own, spreading it around until its entire sigil could use the Secret of Long Strides. Not all Kuresnik were able to use it properly, but enough minds had pondered the matter that while trying to make the Secret easier to use they'd ended up making another entirely. The Secret of the Shadow Road, as they called it, was more or less a communal version of the Long Strides – one that could, with sufficient numbers, be extended to cover people who did not know either Secret.

To my eye it looked like a mirror made of darkness was opened in front of me, and after a wary glance I limped through. A tunnel, I thought, one in which I stood alone. The dark silently roiled around me, swallowing up all sound, but I could glimpse a patch of night at the end of the tunnel that was lighter in shade. It felt like I'd walked for an hour when I strode through the waiting dark mirror at the end, but my sixth sense told me that dawn was barely any closer – mere moments had passed. And still I now stood among a throng of drow, mostly Kuresnik, while ghostly fire rained down from above and sorcery crackled angrily in the air.

"Forward," I bellowed in Crepuscular.

"Cera aine," they shouted back.

The Dead King had known we were coming, and so made this place into a killing ground. The bend in the pass had been turned into a bastion, eight sets of increasingly tall and thick ramparts with the last reaching the height of the surrounding hills. Ghouls screeched as they leapt into the charging Kuresnik, claws and barbed spears tangling savagely, and knots of Bind mages scorched the air with their eerie flames from behind the safety of skeletons so heavily armoured they boasted more steel than bone. Lizards, rare among constructs, lay on their bellies atop the ramparts and spat goutts of flame and poisonous smoke. It was a tide of death, but it was met with vicious valour.

Shaping Night into a great spike, I hammered at the ramparts even as the Randebog began to emerge from the Shadow Road. The walls shook, but they had been warded up to the gills: I turned undead to ash but did not shatter stone. We'd have to do this the hard way. This was an ambush in more ways than one, of course. My Firstborn had emerged just outside the bend, scything through the few dead on the road and immediately turned against the heavily fortified bastion, but Julianne's Highway continued towards the enemy camp. Reinforcements poured in so swiftly they couldn't even be called that.

A wedge of Tusks, those great boar-like abominations with bellies full of stone, took the vanguard but behind them a flood of Binds and Bones was coming at a run. On the heights above, to the east, I caught sight of a silhouette in pale plate. Mounted atop a horse entirely of bone, now, but there was no mistaking that great axe. The Revenant who had once been the White Knight bellowed no war cry as he led his mount to skip off the edge of the hills, lesser undead trailing it his wake.

"You again," I coldly said.

This might have been trouble, were I a fool. Mighty Randebog answered my summons, having been close and waiting.

"Randebog," I hissed, "now."

It nodded, its Mighty gathering around it to lend power.

"I am the curate of forgery," Mighty Randebog prayed, voice clear and beautiful. "I bear empty sacraments and offer neither rise nor fall, only the bitter deception of the road winding ever round. Hallow me, Sve Noc, and so permit me to share your gloom with all the world."

The dead knight raised his axe, sensing the power, but it was too late. Before the hooves could touch the ground, darkness billowed out from Mighty Randebog in a great ring. It swallowed whole the Revenant and the tip of the coming reinforcements, before coming at a sudden halt. Within the ring, only my force and the enemy bastion could be seen. No one else would intervene so long as the Secret of the Lesser Gloom held sway over these grounds: round and round our enemies would go, finding nothing but where they had come from. Now, I thought, all that's left is smashing that fucking bastion to pieces.

I felt triumph in the Night and the wards shivered: Lord Soln had destroyed its own anchor. All on us, then.

Some mageling tossed a fireball at me, curving it past my warriors, and I casually swatted it aside as I took in the sight of the assault unfolding. Normally I'd consider sending light foot into a dug-in position to be throwing away lives stupidly, but the Kuresnik were a different story – nimble as wasps, they flitted from place to place in no way impeded by the heights and the walls. Already they'd swarmed through the first two walls, but looking at the meat grinder that ensued I wondered if that might not be by design: the third rampart was further back than the others, giving a clear line of sight, and the dead took full advantage of that.

With heavies out in the front and some sort of ward stunning the drow when they went up as shadows, the third rampart was proving the cliff to the sea of the Kuresnik. They won footholds, but did not keep them long. How many had died already? A third of the force at least. Lucky for them I'd come along.

"Randebog dzulu, with me," I shouted.

Even as I limped to the front of the offensive, drow parting smoothly for me, the enemy began to focus their fire on me. Ghostflame and curses, javelins and arrows and stones. I raised my staff, pointing it forward, and wove Night as a vortex of wind sucking in the deadly rain. Within moments the winds were howling with fire and steel, burning bright, and with a grunt of exertion I shaped the wind into a sphere and smashed it down on the third rampart. Sorcery and hot steel erupted, carving a hole in the enemy's defences, while I dragged myself up to the first rampart with Night tendrils and the dzulu followed with nimble leaps.

The dark filled with nightmarish visions that came almost too quick for me to react. A ghoul fell on me from above and I unsheathed my sword just in time to carve through it, staff coming forward to send a streak of blackflame into some Bind's leering skull before it could tighten a curse of decay around my throat. The Kuresnik surged forward in the hole I'd blown from them, one even smashing the wardstone that'd been giving them trouble, just in time for the enemy to toss down great pillars of rock. I would have laughed at the absurd mundanity of that tactic, but Neshamah didn't do mundane.

To the utter surprise of the Firstborn, Night wavered around the pillars – now shining with runes – and those that tried to escape into shadow instead of dodging were crushed. The third rampart, not even fully taken, became yet another killing floor.

Tentatively I chucked a spear of blackflame at the fifth rampart and found it became unstable just before hitting the enemy javelinmen perched there, though it still torched a few. There were more, then, and direct workings were doomed. I'd have to pull something heavy and risk the vulnerability. I called Mighty Kuresnik itself to me, signifying I was in need of a bodyguard, and let the Night roar inside the back of my head. I'd drawn heavily on my well, tonight, and though it was not empty – could not empty, not when the Sisters smiled on me as they did tonight – I was beginning to near the limit of what my body could tolerate using. It was time to wrap up this raid.

As if sensing my intent, Keter pulled out all the stops. Stones shifted and a terrible screech filled the air, swarms of insects emerging from the sixth rampart like a tide and descending. Distantly, I heard Kuresnik fending off arrows and worse. Swallowing a curse I adjusted the working I'd begun to weave on the fly, forced to adapt as the first ranks of dzulu were devoured alive and the Mighty began to torch swarms and drow alike with black flames of their own. A dark shape, vaguely rectangular, began to shimmer into being above the enemy. Sweat beaded my brow. A headache was already pounding at my temples: Merciless Gods but I hated shoving imperative properties into things.

I only had the barest understanding of them through my patronesses, so pulling on one of them always had that horrid bleed. Back when I'd been smoke and mirrors I was able to shrug that off, but these days I was at a risk of my brain beginning to boil if I trifled too much with things beyond my understanding.

It worked, though. I'd pretty shamelessly stolen a favourite trick of Radhoste the Dreamer, the Sixth General, but with my own twist on it. Rhadoste like to make large miracles with magnetic properties, since it could foresee the enemy's approach and arm its own forces appropriately, but simple imitation wouldn't help me with the swarms. So instead of a simple magnet, I'd leaned on the Sisters to allow to 'understand' a nameless property. It was, essentially, 'bodies with Night and bodies without Night'. As my miracle flared, the dead – ghouls, swarms, skeletons – were slammed against their own ramparts as a great force repelling all bodies without Night exerted its strength against them.

"Quick," I gasped. "Clear the ramparts, I won't last long."

It was all butcher's work after that, killing enemies that mostly couldn't fight back. The pillars that troubled Night were tossed aside with simple strength and the ways cleared as Mighty took the time to get inventive now that they were no longer being shot at. Acid and fire and curses that turned bone to dust lashed out, clearing one rampart after another as the dzulu advanced. I released my working as soon as we began storming the last bastion, spent and covered in sweat, and though there were a few last nasty surprises one of the Kuresnik eventually shattered the last anchor with a well-placed blow. The invisible weight went off our shoulders and I breathed out in relief. We'd lingered long enough, the swarms and Revenants couldn't be far by now. Retreat, I spoke into the Night, putting an end to our raid.

Bodies were picked up where we could, and within thirty breaths of my order there was not a living soul left in Lauzon's Hollow.

Puckstop101

Zombie 🙄

Gibborim

Keter must pay for this transgression.

NerfContessa

Indeed.

Does she still have the goat Kairos kept?
It's the only remotely worthy replacement.

Though fugldge, zombie the... 3rd?

caoimhinh

F

Cold Cyberia

And so, the title of best unholy abomination is passed to Robber.

shikkarasu

From Footrest to Steed, or How I Stabbed My Way to Being the Boss's Best and Baddest
By Robber of The Rock Breaker tribe The Fifteenth Legion of Terror Juniper's S List Callow

mamm0nn

You just know that Robber will publish that first draft with the crossed out parts included, only for scholars a hundred years from now seeing many deeper literary meanings leading to tons of academic debate in his laziness and provocative publishing of a haphazardly unfinished work.

Sir Nil

Will I vote?

Cera aine.

TeK

Will I clean my room?

Cera aine.

Will I finish the project?

Cera aine.

When we will get our payment?

Cera aine.

I mean, it's badass and stuff, but, uh, easily exploitable.

caoimhinh

The Tenet of Procrastination.

caoimhinh

I found it weird and funny that when Catherine shouted "Forward!" they actually replied "Cera Aine".

I was like: Did they just... respond "ask tomorrow" to the order? LMAO.

Adrian V

That is kind of the joke, that she managed to introduce her sass into the culture xD

Cap'n Smurfy

Given that one of the most popular Drow pastimes is insulting rap battles and the existence of Mighty Rumena, I believe the Drow were already sassier than Cat. She merely adopted the Sass. They were born in it, molded by it.

deciusbrutus

Given that she was a barmaid and a pit fighter before she was Squire, I would say that the Sass adopted her.

Crash

Rumena, the magnificent old bat has been in this world for thousands of sassy, sassy years.
May it last a thousand more.

Half-deb

Super Impressive work as always.

shimizubad

Aww. Poor Zombie. What's gonna be Cat's next mount? It has to be something more epic than an undead carnivore flying fae horse.

blrbly

Undead flying suicide bomber demon goat

shadw21

Stealth Goat's time to shine.

That Other Guy

That poops goblin fire

boballab

She already has the replacement (Zombie V) even though it is still alive atm. She got it when she confiscated the horses of the Helikean Cataphract and rode her when Zombie III was punished for destroying Zombie IV back in Book 6 Chapter 21. The question is will she use the still living horse or make a Zombie VI.

caoimhinh

An undead carnivore flying fae horse resurrected by the dark miracles of Night.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Neshamah himself.

Burnsy

Hakram's new Role revealed?

Clint

Obviously, she's going to have to steal control of a Wyrms from the Dead King, because who doesn't want to ride into battle on a dragon-shaped abomination constructed from the bones of a hundred brainwashed willing sacrifices?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I odn't. I want an ethereal one made of their souls.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Not sure how I managed to misspell "don't," but okay. It'd be nice to be able to edit these.

Matthew

I love a good action chapter, I was hoping for a shiver of Name to come through though.

Ed

Names require a story and a struggle, this the whole way through was not a struggle and the story was one of the Drow not Cat's story.

sengachi

It definitely tells us about the character of her name though. A simple minor skirmish was enough to rouse it when standing judgement over a Named was involved. But a full blown raid from hell with her throwing around the full of her power didn't stir a whisper.

Frivolous

Hmm. I wonder what the strategic and ulterior objectives were in this raid. I thought the real objective might have been to kill Revenants, but apparently not.

Could someone please explain what it was they were trying to do?

nick012000

Well, now they know the identity of one of the Revenants they're fighting and have some idea of its tricks – and if they're able to scry the White Knight, he might be able to give them intel on him by using Recall.

Also, they destroyed some of the strategic resources of the Dead King's armies in this area, like the poison, the siege engines, and the Wyrms.

dadycool

Also the ward anchors that acted as a barricade, as well as the other fortified positions there.

Matthew

I think they wanted to wreck the defenses there before the main army arrived. The other ulterior motive was to get the Dead King to close a trap with insufficient preparation

Frivolous

Thanks, Matthew.

KingJulius

The goal of the raid was to weaken the defenses of the Hallow for the main army to follow up and take it. Hitting with the Drow here allowed them to attack the defenses with a few days less prep time and without their full defensive force because some of it was still retreating from the attack on the main army during the day. The Drow were able to take out 2 Wyrms without revealing the Unravellers, destroy the siege engines, get rid of the poison storage, and destroy many of the outer barricades and defenses for the Hallow.

Frivolous

Thanks, KingJulius.

onedollargum

That's some pretty good crowd control for an improvised miracle.

Liliet

Absence of evidence is probably evidence of absence here: raids are not, in fact, what Cat's new Name is going to care about.

No wonder, that – her combat role has been deeply secondary for her entire career. Even as a Squire the POINT was her being a leader of armies and nations, eventually.

shikkarasu

I would go a step further and say that her role has been to be the Biggest and Baddest.

Cat has always been infuriated at her own weakness (Watching Captain and Black spar, being Spoken to) and she consistently uses her abilities/reputation to bully people (forced draw against Juniper). She hates dealing from a position of weakness and isn't good at actual compromise(RIP CatXKillian).

As for her abilities, she had a superior foil by way of Willie for a while, but eventually killed him. Then she met Archer, who was even better, but proceeded to become Duchess of Moonless Nights almost in response to Archer joining the proto-Woe. From then on she barrelled through her challenges, even later being recognised by Neshie as a third peer - something he does not even call Ranger.

Compare to Black who was quite at home being 2nd best (willingly served Malicia for decades, physically weaker than Captain, less skilled than Ranger, less destructive than Warlock, and overall less impressive than the previous Black Knight).

Cat has either been peerless or been sprinting toward peerlessness her entire journey. She may be the Leader of her Band of Five, but she takes great delight in being the Big Strong Guy of her personal Story. The death of the Dead Kind and Wandering Bard will be the final nail(s) as she loses the last of those who could truly challenge her.

Liliet

Ouch, NOT what I was trying to reply to.

Liliet

Oh no, Zombie)=

CERA AINE is excellen and the best

Burlyraven

And now Cat has had a victory and a draw against the Dead King's armies on this campaign. Considering she has yet to fully come into her Name, I'd say my prediction that she gains her Name amidst the corpses of her army has a bit more backing than before.

agumentic

I am getting really tired of people ascribing literally everything to the patterns of three.

Burlyraven

It's a rule of the universe for big Names and major stories of even the mundane. Saying you're tired of rules of three is like saying you're tired of major plot points.

agumentic

That must be why most of the so-called patterns of three drawn out in the comments came to nothing. Things can happen outside of them, you know.

panic

That is silly. Rule of Three has ever only been applicable in story about Three or so times. The constant nagging that literally Everything is a rule of three is really annoying when it starts to get to the Point that every new chapter is a different rule of three.

beleester

Rule of Three as an in-universe force is specifically about rivals. Cat vs Lone Swordsman – two conflicting visions for the future of Callow. Or Grey Pilgrim vs Cat – two staff-wielding miracle workers with opposing visions of “the greater good.” Or Black vs Hanno – the White and Black Knight (although Hanno’s “fated victory” there only killed a puppet).

Other things do come in threes – Liesse, for instance, or Cat’s three resurrections – but those don’t have an exploitable pattern, they’re just “something significant happens three times.”

Lordy

Nope the war has been going on for 2 years in the time skip.

Burlyraven

And? There have been multiple campaigns in this war. This one has produced a victory and a draw with obvious story weight.

Liliet

“Being shown onscreen” is not the criterion for story weight in universe.

You know what’s had story weight? Cat taking Masego away from the DK. And yet it’s been two years and no story has shown up in the meantime.

Black could tell he and Hanno weren’t going to be rivals after a pattern of three failed to form after their FIRST encounter. That’s how it works: it either forms immediately after the first person gets a victory, or IT DOES NOT, PERIOD, FULL STOP.

IF the Role of one of the people involved changes significantly, like with Cat the Priestess of Night, then the countdown can reset, yes. But Cat and DK are fighting the same war they have been fighting the entire time. There’s nothing now that would let Cat claim the role of his rival any more than she could two years ago.

It’s. Not. Happening.

Vlatko

I'm not convinced. They've been warring for years, and this doesn't seem like a skirmish any different from what could have happened previously. Besides, as far as I remember, don't patterns of three happen between two rival Named? The Dead King is too smart to let himself fall into a role like this, which is why he's so detached from the war itself. In addition, there's zero chance we'll notice some kind of pattern that Cat won't.

vernal.ancient

Yeah, no, this isn't a draw. Cat accomplished her goal of destroying/damaging the enemy fortifications before her main army arrived, then got her Drow back to safety before Nessie was able to wipe them out. That's a victory for her by any reasonable standard. You could argue last fight was a draw, since Nessie found out the army was coming at the expense of two revenants and all the constructs he sent, but A: Rule of three doesn't go 'draw, victory, loss" and B: considering that Cat's entire schtick is being ridiculously good at spotting and manipulating narratives, if she hasn't seen and called out something as basic and predictable as the Rule of Three then it's a safe bet that the rule isn't taking effect

Darkening

Hard to call this a draw honestly, sure she has some casualties, but she trashed Keter's reserves of poison, his siege engines, and his wards, and the other drow contingents probably achieved at least part of their goals. They even stole some bodies at the end so they can drain night to make up for the losses they took. We'll have to see just how bad the casualties got before we can really declare anything, but Cat did achieve a number of her objectives.

Miles

No she hasn't.

She's had a conversation and a raid.
She won both inasmuch either thing can be won.

TeK

Ooh, I love getting all metaphysical and shaping the fabric of reality.

Juff

Typo Thread:

being slaying > slaying
one its more > one of its more asplash > a splash would not able > would not be able worst of Firstborn > worst of the Firstborn western engine > western engines sickening lurch > a sickening lurch reach behind > reached behind then detonated > then detonated it pleased chuckle > a pleased chuckle as the sensation > at the sensation purer than most > purer than most butt its > butt of its they third > the third Rhadoste like > Rhadoste liked to allow to > to allow me to

dadycool

No! Not Zombie! I hope that Alamans Zero runs in circles for eternity.

Ingenuity in a race like the Drow is dangerous, especially since they basically made a Night Way simply by considering how to work together.

Raved Thrad

Alas poor Zombie. You will be missed.

Javvies

But Zombie!

That's going to hurt. Both emotionally, and in more practical terms. Not only has Cat had Zombie for years, Zombie was awesome. Maybe Masego can do something to restore Zombie, but I don't have much hope for that.

And Keter has viable mage-based countering/suppression wards targeted against Night based abilities. That's not going to be good. Especially on the actual Drow battlefield.

Sinead

I wonder if The Summoner will play a role in the return of Zombie in some form.

To me at least, there is something comparable to what Cat described Zombie as and the Summoner's own work. It would work well as part of Cat's "I now need to be nice to the Summoner?!" comment.

Liliet

We've seen the anti-Night wards in the glimpse Sve Noc had shown, actually.

kinghaart

Would also be interesting to see if Cat can imbue sentence onto Summoner's creatures.

I am still waiting for her to try and wrest the dead from the DK... Though that could be a bad pattern to follow too if the wrong story gets attached.

Either way, with her affinity for Necromancy being shown with the Red Axe, Dead Queen could be a contender...

Liliet

Cat cannot imbue sentience into anything since she fed Winter to the crows. It was a fae ability, she's back to regular necromancy now.

mamm0nn

Yeah! Now this Revenant was awesome, he actually had some weight and danger to him unlike the previous batch. This is what Revenants should be: Named-shadows that can check Named and wear them out while the undead armies win the regular battles against no longer morale-up'd soldiers, if not defeating Named entirely when they're not the freaking Black Queen.

Liliet

Keep in mind Cat can thrash most Named on her side with both hands tied behind her back. The other Revenants she's fought could probably very much check someone like the Barrow Sword or Silver Huntress.

kinghaart

Revenants lack a third aspect. Seems that's part of story-fu in a way, as used well they can force out a living names third aspect on themselves instead of on a construct or other asset of the DKs. Like a decoy card.

But yeah, makes sense that a stronger Named like the White Knight would become a stronger Revenant too.

Cap'n Smurfy

Hey, remember when Cat had to half kill herself to beat a baby Named with sword?

Mental Mouse

Half? She was dead! The Once And Future Squire!

Cap'n Smurfy

No no, you're thinking of the Third fight. I was talking about their first fight where Cat was only nearly dead after winning.

LM

Kuresnik? You definitely took inspiration from the joker for him yeah? Pretty cool

Xinci

Well not too surprising after that last revanant that Cat got beaten a bit by a older deadlier Revanant. That staff still has pretty interesting properties I must admit, still curious if it being similar to miracles is akin to having its own domain with its own rules.

I feel zombie could have been repaired if Cat acted quick enough, since we already know the Night can hold souls, and possibly as a result, may recreate a body from what becomes a part of it. So theoretically it could hold a facsimile of Zombies soul/essence and put it into a body similar to the one she had before. Cat was busy and still isnt that good at magic though, so it is what it is.

When it comes to swarm like tactics(that is to say disorderly looking orderly dynamic improvisation on a tactical and strategic scale), I feel the Night gives the Drow a huge advantage in its ability to transmit thought and emotion through itself. Just the information speed alone is a very big deal if you wanted to give them a proper doctrine.

Also great to see more of the laws/properties of reality that the Night may subsume. I wonder when they will make a catalogue to aid them in dealing with Light or foreign "viruses" from greedy sorcerers.

miles

Zombie doesn't have a soul and can't die. It's a fae horse.

Miles

This is not who I was replyingto you bloody liar of a website.

Miles

No actually it was. Gaah

Daniel E

The death of Zombie the Third was so incredibly arbitrary that I can't even work myself up to be mad about it. This felt like a Game of Thrones or Walking Dead bit; just 'oh hey, this beloved character is dead now, with absolutely no rhyme or reason, sucks to be you'. Hopefully her spirit will return to Arcadia, maybe then she & Cat can be reunited.

Mental Mouse

Shush you, better Zombie III than some actual character. Especially since Z3 was a construct anyway, Cat can probably remake him....

Daniel E

Z3 is (was 😞) absolutely a real character. And technically speaking, not a construct. She was a Fae horse, but still flesh & blood (or whatever their equivalent is). She could no more be dismissed via sorcery than any of the other Fae.

Mental Mouse

> or whatever their equivalent is Well, that's the point. Z3 was a former Fae creature layered with necromantic power. It's entirely possible it could be re-made, perhaps with an extra layer of Night, if Cat can get some time to experiment.

Matthew Wells

Plus we just got introduced to a new character that specializes in this sort of thing.

Liliet

Her.

Tom

Cera Aine could be an Irish person.

Clint

>"Adehard Barthen," the Revenant replied in stilted Chantant, his voice deep and pleasant. "Once the White Knight, now a hound to the Enemy. Run while you still can, Callowan."

Finally we've got a Named Revenant surviving to fight another day.

He doesn't seem like a proper mirror for Cat, so I wouldn't expect a Pattern of Three or anything like that, but he did just kill Best Zombie Evah (aka Winged Zombie) so there's a need for payback – that most Callowan of all vices.

Sounds like Name bait to me.

Miles

Definitely expecting her to cast judgement on that former white knight at some point.

irritantseraphim

Noooooooooooo.

Not Zombie, everyone's favourite undead horsebomination!

beleester

Chess lingo note: A "battery" is two rooks on the same file (or other pieces that can attack on the same line, like queen+bishop on a diagonal). Like a gun battery, it aims all your "firepower" at the same spot, typically the enemy king. Setting up a battery can let you set up favorable trades and smash open the enemy lines.

Chapter 58: Prophylaxis

"One can no more win a battle than one can 'win' a hurricane or a house fire. It can, at best, be a disaster withstood better than some others also suffering it."

– Dread Empress Sanguinara, the Shrewd

The blades had gone back to the sheaths, so as always the generals were left to the grim business of counting the corpses.

With the protective wards set down the rest of our army had crossed into Creation and a camp begun being built, but even so General Hune had prepared casualty reports by the time I returned. A little over nine hundred dead for the fight taking the beachhead, more from the Dominion than the Army of Callow. Significantly more wounded, but we weren't low on priests so that ought to be a temporary measure in most cases. Given that there was sure to be fighting tomorrow, our standard orders that mages would not currently offer advanced healing stood. Not too unexpectedly, the raid I'd led into Lauzon's Hollow had turned out more costly than the first battle of the day.

Almost twelve hundred drow had died on those grounds, Lord Soln's battle claiming the largest share of dead – it'd run into heavily entrenched positions and waiting Revenants. A costly affair, losing more than a tenth of our current force of Firstborn on the first stroke, but the payoff had been worth it. We couldn't be sure of the enemy's casualty numbers but around six thousand at the hands of my raiders was a conservative estimate, and that was without taking into consideration the targeted objectives we'd gone after.

On wyrm was destroyed entirely, stormed by a hunting pack of Mighty while I'd been gone, and one of the siege engines made essentially unusable. Soln had devastated the enemy's fortifications in the front and one of its sigil-holders slain a Revenant, while Sudone had done more damage than the two of us put together. Three ritual sites had gone up in flame along with the mages manning them before it found a fourth too well-fortified to assault and turned instead to setting fire to every structure in sight. It'd even collapsed the mouth of the pass leading out of the Hollow on its way out, which if nothing else ought to slow down the enemy's repairs overnight.

I sat down with Senior Mage Dastardly from the Third to get my rib seen to as I heard Hune's assessment of the situation in camp. We were building quickly but too fragile for her tastes, not that there was much of a choice. While Dominion folk and Procerans – the Volignac soldiers and the fantassins drew lots – could be put to work digging ditches, most couldn't be trusted to raise palisades or assemble watchtowers. It just wasn't the way either of their peoples waged war, they had no training in it. I called a war council after thanking Dastardly for his work, first to reiterate the watch arrangements – goblins and drow would take the first few shifts, but as soon as we had enough torches and magelights up the forces that'd not fought today would begin sending watchmen – but secondly to share what I'd learned during the raid.

"The surrounding hills have been hollowed out," I told them. "To what extent I can't be sure, but at the very least the valley where the village once lay is significantly larger now."

Meaning the enemy would be able to cram a lot more soldiers into it when we tried to break through.

"More worrying is this," I continued, pulling at Night.

I drew out the silhouette of the two siege engines I'd never quite gotten a look at.

"Larger than even goblin works, much less those of the dwarves," Princess Beatrice observed.

Spoken like someone who'd never seen an actual dwarven army on the march, I thought. The stuff they peddled up here was the dregs of their arsenals.

"What does it do?" Lady Aquiline more bluntly asked.

"I don't know," I admitted. "Neither fired, and they were slow in turning towards us. I'd wager they were being pointed at the grounds in front ahead of the Hollow and that the machines are slow to turn."

"Not surprising, given the size," General Abigail muttered. "Old Bones doesn't usually use this stuff either, Your Majesty, it's all monsters and spells. I don't like the looks of it at all."

Several people leaned forward as the Callowan general, famed for her sharp military instincts, expressing such wariness. They'd not been taking it all that seriously until now.

"Do we have a way to silence it before the assault?" Lord Razin asked.

"We can't take horses up those hills," Grandmaster Talbot said. "Gods know we tried, last year. We never found any proper paths for soldiers to go up, either."

"I intend to send Special Tribune Robber into the hills to see if there are paths to use," I said. "But I'll not pin great hopes on the attempt. The area will be swarming with undead, regardless: even Mighty in the fullness of night were unable to seize those positions."

I hadn't been able either, and lost Zombie in the process, but I wouldn't admit to that in front of these people. The myth of my unconquered strength was much too useful to begin chipping at now.

"It might be worth trying a second raid with the full strength of the Firstborn when the detachments return," Captain Reinald suggested.

"Playing the same trick on Keter twice always ends the same way," Razin Tanja firmly said.

Good boy, I thought. He was learning, our Lord of Malaga.

"The detachments will begin arriving tomorrow afternoon at the earliest," General Hune said. "And it would be ill-advised to attack before the following morning. We still have time to consider other methods."

"The Dead King won't wait until then to begin attacking," I said. "Don't rely entirely on the common watch, you should all keep your own as well. Tomorrow we'll begin bombardment of the entrance to prevent fortifications from being raised again, but in essence our position remains defensive. We are preparing for a decisive thrust, not spending our strength."

The trouble would be figuring out how to make our thrust decisive, I'd already gleaned. The Dead King had struck with all his might against Cleves in the west, betting that he could break through there before we could reclaim Hainaut, so he wouldn't be looking to outright win the battle here: just delaying us for too long would be victory enough. It was hard to dislodge a skilled enemy waiting you out in a fortified position like the Hollow even when they weren't outnumbering you, and attempting to force the pass would be bloody business. There would be a need for some cleverness here.

The only good news so far was that there was no hint our enemy had caught on to our reserve using the Twilight Ways to strike directly at the Cigelin Sisters, behind our current tussle. I was actually tempted to just trade artillery shots with the undead here until the Sisters were seized, actually, since their fall might force the enemy to move from the Hollow. That was just me getting squeamish about casualties, though, I suspected. At the moment time was more precious to us than soldiers, ugly as the truth was. I called the war council to an end shortly after, exhausted but not yet done with my duties.

I held back Princess Beatrice, since I had a question for her.

"Ever heard of a Chosen named Adehard Barthen?" I asked. "He would have been a White Knight."

"I have not, Your Majesty," Beatrice Volignac admitted. "Though history was never my strong suit. The name sounds northwestern but that might not mean much: the Principate is not a small realm."

"It was worth a try," I sighed. "Kindly ask around if you know anyone of such scholarly incline."

Might be worth sending word back to Neustal to see if Salia or the Arsenal could dig up anything for me. It'd been a while since I'd lost a fight that badly, and this White Revenant wasn't even supposed to be the main threat here: that would be the Prince of Bones and his Grey Legion, neither of which had yet made an appearance. Which was worrying me. The Headhunter had not been able to confirm their marks were still there, as I'd not risked Named too close to the enemy defences yet. The last fucking thing I needed was a fresh Revenant with knowledge of my war plans.

Hakram was in not long after, the Apprentice trailing his shadow as agreed. The Ashuran was young, and her face of a cast too hard for people to call it pretty. I sympathized, having been there myself at her age – only without magical powers to make up for it, unless you counted compulsive mouthing off as one. Adjutant came with a mug of hot tea – sweetened with honey – and reports I'd been wanting. I drank of the first, enjoying the warmth seeping into my bruised lips, while gesturing for him to summarize the second.

"Start with the Rapacious Troubadour," I said.

"As ordered, the Vagrant Spear preserved a Bind and delivered it into our custody," Hakram gravelled. "The Troubadour then interrogated it in his particular manner."

"He means the Troubadour ate the soul and went sifting through its memories," I idly told the Apprentice.

"That is revolting," she said, wrinkling her nose.

I hummed in agreement.

"Damned useful, though," I said. "So, what did her get?"

"Confirmation that the Grey Legion and the Prince of Bones are here," Adjutant. "Eyes on at least twelve Revenants. He also believes, from the movement of troops glimpsed, that the Dead King has been waiting for our offensive."

I grimaced. Much as I hated to hear that, it fit what we'd seen: the strikes to the west into Cleves had come too quickly after the beginning of our offensive for it to be a coincidence. He'd waited until our armies were committed elsewhere to attack.

"Speaking of Revenants," I said, "I want you to look into a name: Adehard Barthen. White Knight, possibly from the northeast."

"I'll see what I can dig up," Hakram gravelled. "Difficult foe?"

"Couldn't crack him before I withdrew," I admitted. "And Zombie's gone."

He let out a soft noise of sadness.

"I'd begun to think that malevolent old thing was unkillable," Hakram said.

"So had I," I murmured.

I shook it off, sipping at my tea. This was no time to get sorry over a dead horse dying again, there was a war on.

"Firing platforms?" I asked.

"Pickler says they'll be ready by morning," Adjutant replied. "Our artillery will be in place by Early Bell at the latest, though come daylight she maintains her request for Named spotters."

"I'll think about it," I grunted.

I hated to use any Named like that, as it felt like using a magic wand as an arrow, but some of our less combat-ready contingent might be gainfully used that way. I wasn't going to be sending the Page out into the fray anytime soon, for example, so an argument could be made there.

"The trouble, sir," Apprentice reminded him.

"I had not forgotten," Adjutant replied, sounding somewhat amused.

He was in a much better mood than when I'd last seen him, I noticed, and I didn't even know why.

"The Blessed Artificer went to have a look at our wards," Hakram said. "Or tried to. Akua sent her packing, in her own polite way."

"The Artificer has threatened to lodge a complaint under the Terms," the Apprentice said. "It's been the talk of the Named in camp."

"Akua Sahelian is not Named, which makes that threat utterly meaningless," I replied, rolling my eyes. "And if the Artificer wanted a look at our wards, she should have sought permission from the appropriate officers first. This isn't the Arsenal."

"Don't I know it," Apprentice muttered under her breath.

I smothered my amusement. Evidently, while pragmatic about trading the assignment as Hakram's bodyguard and assistant for my backing in being reassigned to the Arsenal afterwards she wasn't quite as sanguine about the trade as she'd been pretending. I hardly minded, if anything it'd keep her motivated to ensure Adjutant made it through this in one piece. After downing the rest of my tea and dismissing the two of them, I crawled into my cot and tumbled straight into a mercifully dreamless sleep.

I woke up much too soon, one of the Night-workings I habitually lay around my tent having been tripped. When an attendant came into my tent moments later and I slipped back my knife under the pillow, it took his announcing of Scribe as the courtesy it was: the villainess would have been perfectly capable of coming in without tripping a damned thing, or being seen by my guards. The nights were cool enough I'd gone to bed in a shirt, which cut down on dressing time, but I'd not washed before sleeping so I was unlikely to be smelling of roses. Eh, she'd deal.

"I" generously assume you woke me for good reason," I bluntly said, sliding into a seat.

"News from the west," Scribe replied. "From Princess Rozala."

I grimaced. Yeah, that was well shaving an hour off my bedrest for.

"Hit me," I sighed.

"You might recall that the diversionary force Princess Rozala sent out of Coudrent to pin the enemy army at Luciennerie was routed," Scribe said.

"Not before seeing the Dead King was on the march, though," I said. "I take it the siege of Coudrent has begun?"

"It has not," Scribe calmly corrected. "In fact, the last reports from outriders insist there is no trace at all of an offensive against Coudrent."

I blinked in surprise. Wait, what? It wasn't that a feint was impossible there – I could think of half a dozen ways it could be done without even using magic – but rather that if that one hundred and fifty thousand strong army wasn't headed west, where the Hells was it?

"Is it coming down the blue road instead?" I asked.

Vivienne was in for a ride, if that was the case. We had a stronghold straddling the blue road, north of Arbusans, but even with reinforcements holding it against such numbers was going to be rough. I frowned before Scribe even replied, already suspecting what the answer would be.

"There have been warbands, but no sign of an army," Eudokia said.

Less than three bells ago, I'd been convinced that the Dead King's plan had been to strike hard into Cleves while delaying us in Hainaut so that whatever gains we might make were made worthless by an entire front collapsing to our west. But that only makes sense if he attacks along both lines, I thought. Even if Trifelin fell right now – and it was by far a harder fortress to force than Coudrent at the moment, to boot – Cleves would be able to rally and mount a defence.

Which meant I had been gravely, utterly wrong about what Neshamah's campaign plan was.

"Fuck," I cursed. "We were had. I don't know how yet, but we were had."

Dragged into full wakefulness by dread, I turned a hard eye to Scribe.

"Wake up Adjutant," I said. "I want my full war council up and here within the hour."

The Scribe nodded, but did not immediately depart. My brow cocked with impatience, as I probably needed to get some pants on if I was going to be entertaining royalty. I had fond memories of doing otherwise, admittedly, but it was best left as a one-off.

"I hear you have been asking about an Adehard Barthen," Scribe said.

I gestured curtly for her to go on, since it was a rhetorical question we both knew the answer to.

"Though I cannot speak to this Adehard in particular, the House of Barthen is ancient Proceran royalty," Eudokia said.

"Unless I missed a name when I made myself memorize the Highest Assembly – and I did not – you mean ancient in a very literal sense," I noted.

"Relatively so," Scribe hedged. "It preceded the House of Goethal on the throne of Brus, but collapsed after the death of nearly all adults of the line in the Sixth Crusade. In the short-lived civil war that ensued, the Goethals seized power while having essentially no real claim to the throne save force."

Well, I thought, that was something.

"Anything related to them and a greataxe?" I asked.

It was an unusual enough weapon for an Alamans noble it was worth asking. She stilled a moment, as if deep in thought.

"The heraldry of House Barthen was a white axeman on green, wearing armour," Scribe finally said. "And their words translated roughly to 'None May Mar'."

My eyes narrowed. I'd not scored so much a single wound on the dead White Knight, had I? And my inability to damage his plate – mar it, so might say – might have a deeper source than simple sorcery.

"Talk with Hakram," I said. "Look into it together. Artefacts like a set of pale plate and a greataxe would be details of interest to me."

If I was going to be fighting this one again, I wanted all the knowledge I could on my side. Scribe took my words like the dismissal they were, leaving me to limp around looking for a clean pair of trousers and quickly wash myself of the worst of the dried sweat from the night's fighting. My hair went into a loose ponytail and I went looking through my desk's drawers for nuts and dried raisins, which while far from a meal would have to suffice until something more filling could be arranged. I unrolled my maps of Hainaut on the carved table, setting down painted iron blocks for the forces once more.

I wasn't seeing the solution, and it was like an itch I couldn't scratch. I honestly couldn't make sense out of the Dead King's campaign plan here. The army here in Lauzon's Hollow to stop us made sense, no arguing with that, but the rest wasn't adding up. There were too many little details going against the grain. Like Prince Klaus' best efforts to bait out the army holed up in Juvelun failing even though at first his advance had been harassed quite aggressively, for one. The way that attack on Trifelin, which Princess Rozala had turned into a bloody fortress, had been obvious enough in coming we'd known it would for weeks if not months.

And not the supposed march on Coudrent turning out to have been a feint, which made some sort of sense, but less so that there'd apparently been no follow-through. Where had the army in Luciennerie gone? It should be hurrying down the blue road at breakneck pace right now, in an attempt to move quickly enough even through the Twilight Ways we'd be too late to reinforced. Instead an army of hundred and fifty thousand had disappeared. In principle, going into the countryside and off the roads it was possible to cut through the hills and reach Cigelin or the capital from Luciennerie.

In practice, that same lack of roads meant that the journey would be so slow that if my army broke through Lauzon's Hollow in the next three days we'd still get to the capital ahead of the Luciennerie reinforcements, and with time to spare. My host was capable of beating such a force on the field, especially from a fortified position like the walls of Hainaut. Would the army in Juvelun move to the Cigelin Sisters and try to slow us down there instead? But that'd be throwing away another army, I thought. Neshamah had bones to spare, but he wasn't exactly in a position to be pissing away armies like this either.

Honestly, even just taking Hainaut back up to the Cigelin Sisters while sealing the Malmedit tunnels out east and investing Luciennerie to the west would be a major victory for us. It wouldn't deal with the bridge up north, which would still need to be destroyed, but that could be attempted from our new fortified lines – which would include, for the first time since the beginning of the war, a shared frontline between Hainaut and Cleves through Luciennerie. That'd be bad fucking news for the Dead King, and this entire gamble did not seem like his kind of stratagem at all. Which meant I was still missing something.

It had to be about that force of two hundred thousand, the one still missing. It'd last been seen north of the capital, and obviously it wouldn't be able to move quickly when it was so large a force, but maybe it'd gone west? It might hit Trifelin, still being besieged, as a second wave. Hells, it might even try to attack the shore elsewhere entirely by going through the bottom of the lake. I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. No, I decided. That wasn't it. There'd be sense in that strategy – the Luciennerie army would then finally attack our defence lines after having delayed, forcing us to commit there and not reinforce Malanza – but that was, as the Intercessor had reproached me, still thinking like a general. Neshamah wasn't trying to win a war, not like we would.

He was trying to exterminate vermin.

Battles and strategic victories meant little to him, it was only the destruction of our forces that mattered. And he wasn't going to get that out west in Cleves, not when so many of the prominent Named and our finest armies were here in Hainaut and taking risks. The killing blow would come here, on this front. I could feel it in my bones, even if I still could not discern the shape of the doom to come. My war council filed in just as warm meals and steaming mugs of tea were brought in for everyone – Hakram's eye for detail had not failed me – and I filled them in as everyone dug in. Not everyone understood the trouble we were in, unfortunately.

"I'll not complain at fighting fewer enemies," Captain Reinald said. "Let the Princess of Aequitan turn them back from her nice, cozy fortresses."

"The dead will not grow wings, Black Queen," Lord Razin said. "We'll find this missing army sooner or later."

I eyed him with displeasure.

"Or they'll find us, Tanja," Lady Aquiline flatly said. "This is grim news."

Good girl, I fondly thought. She was learning, our Lady of Tartessos.

"In the worst case scenario," General Hune said, "the force that routed the raiders from Coudrent could have been a simple large detachment – fifteen or twenty thousand, enough for a full-scale assault to be inferred by scouts – while the rest was already marching east. They could already be closing in on the capital, or even the Cigelin Sisters."

I hadn't even considered that, in truth. I nodded appreciatively at the ogre, even though she'd made it plain we might be in more trouble than I'd thought.

"Word should be sent to the Iron Prince," Princess Beatrice suggested.

"It will be," I said, "but there's no guarantee the messengers will make it there, much less back to us with an answer. He'll be north of Juvelun and approaching Malmedit by now."

Meaning his back would be very much exposed, and the roads about as safe as having a drink in the Tower.

"No point in talking much about it, is there?" General Abigail shrugged. "Only one thing left to do."

I suppressed a grin at the sight of every eye in the room turning towards her. See, the thing about that little jewel of a find was that while she was deeply paranoid – a healthy survival trait, in the Army of Callow – and just a little on the side of cowardly, she was also a significantly better commander than she believed she was. Her trouble was, in essence that her points of comparison were the finest generals of our time. She had the stuff, though, the spark that meant you had the potential to be one of those. The War College couldn't teach you that, and while today Hune might be the better commander in every regard a decade from now I'd bet on Abigail of Summerholm nine times out of ten. Something like anguish struck the other woman's face when she realized that her conclusion had not, in fact, been obvious to everyone else in the room.

"Proceed, General Abigail," I drily said.

"If we can't figure out what the Dead King's up to, then we have to punch through as quick as possible," she hesitantly said. "Doesn't matter what his plan is, if we throw a sharper in the middle of it."

She'd put her finger to the pulse of it. Tempting as it might be not to act until we'd figured out what Neshamah was up to, it was too late for that. The armies were already marching, the bets had been put down. Now the only way out was through.

"My thoughts exactly," I agreed. "It has now become imperative to break through even before the reserve strikes at the Cigelin Sisters."

It'd allow us to secure the lands between the Hollow and the Sisters swiftly, and make sure the army holding Lauzon's Hollow was annihilated instead of dispersed. I had no intention of allowing chunks of it to break off after we won the field and cut our supply lines after we moved on. We'd bottle them up in the lands between the two armies and eradicate them before moving on the capital together.

"Prepare for battle," I ordered my war council. "As soon as the artillery is ready to begin firing, we will begin probing for a weakness to assault."

There was no arguing with that, so as soon as the meals were finished they returned to prepare their men. I'd been blunt with my commanders mostly for the sake of clarity, as hurried or not I did not intend to throw soldiers into the meat grinder of a straightforward assault of the Hollow. It had become undeniable, however, that we no longer had the time to be too sly about forcing out the enemy. I was left to rely on the possibility that my first leanings might have paid off, so when a bone-tired Robber returned to camp an hour after dawn I had him brought to me directly. Dusty and bloodied, he still came in with a swagger. It did not hold for long when I asked for a report, though.

"I've got something," Special Tribune Robber admitted. "But I'm not sure you'll like it, Boss."

"It beats the nothing I currently have on the table," I frankly replied. "Talk."

"There's no goat paths left," the goblin told me. "Keter got clever about it, broke up anything that might serve as a road soldiers could use coming from the outside. Went over the hills by climbing, but the place is full of ghouls and mages. I lost most of a line to some pretty well-hidden wards."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"Blew up the dead," he said. "Keter'll get no word out of my lot, even in death. It was the sharpers that let us find out what we did, actually. You mentioned the hills were hollowed out some, Boss, but it's a lot more than that. They made the sides of the pass into a massive cavern camp, I reckon."

I grimaced. I'd not thought that the Dead King would have invested so long in building up the Hollow, or that we would have missed it. Hells, with work of the scale he was mentioning the dead must have been at work even before we seized the pass last year. They'd hidden their tracks well, if even heroes had missed them.

"You can get in there?" I asked.

"Sure," Robber of the Rock Breaker Tribe grinned. "We know a thing or two about digging, goblins."

He elaborated further under my questioning. Having assessed that trying the hilltops any further would just get more of his people killed to no gain, he'd instead spent most of the night getting a sense of the lay of the structures under the hills. The malevolent imp had three points of ingress for me and a sketch of what he believed the lay of the artificial caverns might look like – a copy of which was already in Pickler's hands. Good, that'd spare me sending him to do that afterwards.

"Taking those would get real messy, Boss," Robber told me.
"Legions don't do well on grounds like those, not against things like Tusks and Beorns. We need an open field for our mages to handle their like."

"I'm aware," I mused. "But if you're right, the enemy will have hidden a significant part of its army under the hills."

Waiting to surprise us after we'd taken the hollow, I decided. First they'd bleed us taking the entrance, and after we pushed the dead back beyond the old village they would have sprung the trap. The raid of last night paired with my favourite marauders had sniffed out the jaws, though, so we might be able to turn this on them. I drummed my fingers against the table, closing my eyes and forcing myself to think. The Dead King's army had a superior position, superior numbers and it'd been preparing for this fight for long enough it'd still have a few nasty surprises up its sleeves. What did my army have that could overturn all those advantages?

"Maybe they'll turn around and walk home, if we're lucky," Robber mused. "Stranger things have happened."

My eyes opened. That was an answer, yes. Luck and goblins.

Didn't sound like much, but you could do a lot of damage if you used those right.

SpeckofStardust

Collapse the caverns.
First literal thought.

dadycool

That's exactly what I thought, too.

Ninestrings

Everything in there is very physically resilient and doesn't need to breathe.

Probably would barely slow them down.

Sulo

Sure, if the literal tons of stone crushing them was spread thin enough. shrugs

hakureireimu

Flood it; my second thought.

Ninestrings

That would accomplish literally nothing except make the undead harder to attack and maybe ruin some munitions.

TeK

Yeah, but as the only general to ever defeat Theodosius once said: "The best move in the war is the one your enemy does not expect, therefore the good plan should always surprise the general himself.

Eduardo Diaz Torres

so, himself?

Lox

So dump goblinfire pouches in the caverns along with the flooding water. Add self detonating timers to the pouches, and leave enough air in the pouches to let them float.

sengachi

Ah, but we've seen Named bless entire lakes before. And these are no fey undead.

mamm0nn

Not if we flood it with holy water. Can priests baptise a river, Castlevania style?

Abnaxis

I think you're all missing the real issue: if they flood or collapse the caverns, how will Cat set then on fire? She's running out of goblinfire...

Dresden 67

Goblinfire burns stone and water fine, just slower.

Frivolous

Flood it with holy water.

WuseMajor

Holy Lakeomancy.

I like this plan.

origamiflame

With goblin fire

irritantseraphim

With Goblinfire

boballab

Use the last of her goblin fire inside the Caverns was my first thought since this is Cat thinking about goblins and it has been too long since she really let her inner pyromaniac loose.

dadycool

Hmm, I wonder if Freddy will get the chance to take out his predecessor, which sounds like he started the line, Levantine style, if their coat of arms is essentially him.

It's nice to see Hakram more cheerful.

Lol, Abigail is comparing the tower she's building to the moon while everyone else is using it as a space elevator.

ninegardens

Soo... undead bomber goats in a cave?

boballab

I was thinking along those lines myself since we had a sequence in an earlier chapter where Cat refrained from using her Goblin munitions incase something important came up.

TeK

No. Using undead against the Dead King is a folly. Instead, through careful surgery, alive suicide bomber goats should be used.

Ninestrings

blinkingman.gif

nick012000

So, the enemy has built a network of underground tunnels? Sounds like an ideal fighting arena for the drow, while the rest of Cat's forces draw off the above-ground undead. They'd spent thousands of years living and fighting underground, after all.

TeK

Blowing up caverns seems like a bit of a too obvious choice. Especially given Catherine. Seems like a bait. Neshamah might've as well built a town and left a crate of goblin fire near it with a sign "Please don't burn".

Mental Mouse

And about that chapter stinger... how could Cat get them to "turn around and walk home"? Maybe change the objectives on him? She probably can't send the Named away elsewhere, but how else could she convince him to turn his attentions elsewhere?

TeK

Honestly this cliffhanger seems like that part from House M.D. when someone says that they'd like to be dominated by a BBC and he figures out that the patient is sick with cryptococcus.

therealgridlock

It was the mouse bites keeping him alive! Now he needs to drink this bleach!

Liliet

Hell yeah Cat's thoughts on Abigail ♥

And I love Robber's way of talking and the way it meshes with Cat's random association thought process ♥ ♥ ♥

Fucking RIP campaign plan, but hey, surviving first contact with the enemy etc

Dead King's plan ain't surviving this either

caoimhinh

I love how the chapter is called "Prophylaxis", which most people will associate with preventive medicine, but that word has another meaning:

In Chess, "prophylaxis" is a move or strategy that frustrates an opponent's plan or tactic. It's a move that stops the opponent from taking action in a certain area for fear of some type of reprisal. Not only does it improve one's position, but it must also prevent the opponent from improving theirs.

The title was telling us "Hey, you know those cool campaign plans? Well, RIP."

Liliet

R I P

Crash

Absolutely living for General Abigail continuing to gain ground. She best survive this bullshit, all that paranoia has to hae some use!

panic

Ahem. I suggest the following. Portal. Portal in the Cave. Portal in the Cave with the other end leading to a lake. Portal in the Cave with the other end leading to a lake of lava.FIN

shikkarasu

♪Ho, ro the rattlin' cave♪
♪The cave in down in Lauzon's Hollow♪
♪Damn cave, the rattlin' cave♪
♪The cave down in Lauzon's Hollow♪

♪Well in the cave there were undead♪
♪The damn dead and Rattlin bones♪ ♪Dead in the cave♪
♪The cave down in Lauzon's Hollow♪

– Some verses later –

♪The Payer in the Ward♪
♪And the Ward in the lava♪
♪And the lava in the lake♪
♪And the lake in the Ways♪
♪And the Ways in the Gate♪
♪And the Gate in the cave♪
♪And the cave down in Lauzon's Hollow♪

♪Damn cave, the rattlin' cave♪
♪The cave down in Lauzon's Holloooooow♪

Bonus points if the Mages who make this possible are Duni-descendant.

Belenos42

That...was fucking inspired.

Lox

That was awesome 👍👉 I need context for why Duni?

shikkarasu

The Duni in PGtE are very clearly Irish-inspired. "Duni" is even an old Irish word for "People," if I remember correctly. The Irish Descendants did one of the more famous versions of Rattlin' Bog.

Finn .-. .

Wasn't that the Duchy of Daione, not the Duni?

Cheetah724

No, Daione are Native American racially, Scottish/Celtic culturally.

Juff

Typo Thread:

a camp begun being built > begun building a camp temporary measure (measure doesn't really fit. setback?)

On wurm > One wurm

sigil-holders slain > sigil-holders had slain fragile > fragilely war, they > war; they expressing such wariness > expressed such wariness her get? > he get?

believes, form the > believes, from the it took his announcing > I took his announcing

"I" > "I

well shaving > well worth shaving much a single > much as a single so might say > some might say enough even through > enough that even through to reinforced > to reinforce out of then > out of ten what we did > what they did they'd bleed > they'd have bled

Miles

This was no time to get sorry over a dead horse dying again, there was a war on.

"Gonna vote?" I asked.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

The Coudrent force is digging a tunnel under the fortifications, isn't it? Pretty much the same plan Cat had, just lower tech. Who needs interdimensional tunnels when a good old fashioned tunnel in dirt will accomplish the same thing?

Javvies

Well ... those are some unpleasant surprises.

This is going to get messy.

Hah, Abigail is forced to recommend aggressive action because she knows that letting Keter's plans unfold unhindered is even worse for her personal survival.

On the other hand, the Dead King is going to have contingencies set up, and let's be honest – attacking quickly to try to disrupt his plans is a fairly obvious possibility.

mamm0nn

Alright, who here didn't know that the 150000 undead that suddenly disappeared are headed to Hammer and Anvil Cat's army when she commits to an aggressive assault and that her planning around DK's plans merely saw her know that he knew she knows but her not knowing that she knew that he knew that she knew?

This is going to be a bloodbath, because in the end it doesn't matter to DK whether he wins. Just like she said it wouldn't. All that matters is that he takes out her army, Named and commanders just so that the Alliance no longer has those. If even one army goes away, the defensive lines grow so thin that the dead can flood into the heartlands and increase their numbers like crazy, starting the death spiral that will see the war become a slaughter.

beleester

Goblins are obvious, but how can Catherine rely on luck? She must be talking about heroes, who quite literally have luck on their side. Do we have a band of five that would be suited for tunnel fighting?

Eleron Pfoutz

Goblin Named.

styn

LOL I would lose my shit if Robber pulled a hero name somehow this late in the tale.

Halinn

Maybe he stole one earlier, been keeping it for a rainy day. Or maybe Robber is the Name.

Luxuria Tenebris

So taking a look at the map. If the missing army didn't go west, it didn't go south and north is the sea so it can only be going east towards Cats army. I can see the caverns being large tunnels that will allow the missing army to show up behind Cat, with means that army can target the Giants then swing around to hit Cat with their new giant servants.

Bellaco

I really really hope that luck is an euphemism for “exploding goats”.

Entrerist

Can't the dead king also use Acadia? He just opens up a gate into Acadia and hits Callows capital.

D

Assuming you flood it with water. What front is the Concocter on these days?

Daniel E

Here's a thought; what if DK's missing elite army managed to sneak Southeast and use the Whitecaps passage to threaten Callow? Unrelated, but I'm also curious what the heck the Dwarves have been up to all this time.

dadycoool

Presumably exactly what they were intending to do waaaaaaay back when Cat met them: surround Keter from below and attack the city's base.

hoser2

The situation with Scribe seems awkward. Whether Cat likes or trusts Scribe or not, treating her with respect and giving her information seem like the basics for a working relationship. Black was polite with Scribe, IIRC.

Storm

Bruh I thought there was the missing undead under the hill last chapter. Smh I thought you were better at seeing story shapes, Cat.

Interlude: Old Dogs

“I fear our tyrant in the east, but dread I reserve alone for what staying on our knees would make of us.”

– Queen Eleanor Fairfax, founder of the Fairfax dynasty

General Abigail looked into the Baalite eye again, wishing generals didn't have to be on horses.

It made her stand out, and people who stood out did have that unfortunate tendency to get shot. She couldn't even use the damned thing to run away, because it made her stand out so people would bloody well notice. It was the sixth time since the Third Army had begun to mobilize that she was having a look at the enemy positions, but repetition wasn't improving her prospects any. The drow had done good work, smashing up the enemy's walls and collapsing their ditches, but the corpses had worked tirelessly overnight. The walls had been rebuilt into little more than stacked stones, more like a cattle-fence than a fortification, but the nice thing about cattle was that it wasn't usually trying to stab you.

Somehow she doubted the undead would be so congenial.

"At least they're low on bowmen," General Abigail muttered. "Javelins aren't as bad when it gets down to it."

They did a number even on plate and they could scrap a shield, sure, but the range was lesser and you couldn't carry anywhere as many of them.

"I don't understand why Keter fields so few," Staff Tribune Krolem gravelled at her side. "With their numbers, mass volleys would be near impossible to deal with."

Except with them mage shields, of course, but those would be needed for the more exotic stuff the enemy had up its sleeves.

"Their dead are too dumb," Abigail absent-mindedly told him. "The Binds, the one with souls still nailed to the corpse, they're as clever as people. But the Bones? They can't maintain gear for shit, certainly not something as finicky as a good bow. Javelins are simpler, and easier to make too."

She glanced at her right hand, the tall orc looking like he was spoiling for a fight. It wasn't his fault, Abigail reminded herself. Orcs were just born that way, with more teeth to compensate for the absence of the part where good sense went. Besides she'd probably like fighting more if she got to eat the losers afterwards, she figured. Tavern rates these days were basically robbery, so greenskins were definitely coming out ahead there.

"We'll wait until the Sapper-General finishes her bombardment to advance," she told Krolem. "And send our bloodhounds out, would you? I want this field cleaned up before our shield wall starts advancing."

"On it," the Staff Tribune saluted.

Good man. Some would have called Abigail paranoid for the precaution, but they couldn't. Largely on account of them all being fucking dead while she was not. A nice empty field all the way to Lauzon's Hollow, after Keter was allowed time to work its wickedness? Yeah, she wasn't falling for that one. Her 'bloodhounds' were a suggestion she'd made to the Black Queen last year that got approved, to her surprise: mixed crews of regulars, priests and lesser magical talents that could sniff out the kind of hidden devilries the Dead King liked to leave lying around before her people walked into them. Leaving them to do their work properly would slow the advance, but Abigail didn't exactly mind. She looked into the Baalite eye again, silently bemoaning her fate.

While it'd been a relief to learn that the Black Queen's battle plan wouldn't require the Third to charge at the mouth of Lauzon's Hollow under enemy fire, she'd still ended up stuck leading the vanguard. Her inexplicably enthusiastic soldiers might think it was an honour to serve as the foremost meat shields – Dauntless, they'd all cheered, like the word meant they were no longer the people standing closest to swords trying to kill them – but General Abigail was not fooled. When you tangled with Keter, the front was the last damned place you wanted to be. Nowhere near was her own preferred locale, but she'd not had a great deal of success getting there.

Gloomily, the general leaned back on horse as the wings of the assault assembled to the east and west. The Second Army under General Hune would stay behind her and serve as both the reserve and the escort for the siege engines, while to the left the Procerans had assembled under Princess Beatrice and to the right the two leading members of the Blood had been granted a shared command. It made the west the weak flank, not as steady or numerous, but the Black Queen had sent most of the alliance's horse there to prop them up. It would be some time yet before they had to advance, General Abigail knew, and when they did she'd at least have Named with her.

It was still with despair that she realized they'd somehow got her again.

She'd had a plan, a solid one. It was too late to back out of this whole general business now, as a pragmatic soul she'd been forced to recognize as much. Besides, Abigail of Summerholm hadn't stuck out this bloody nightmare of a war to not retire with a full general's pension: when she got home, she fully intended to never lift a finger again for the rest of her days and maybe drink herself into an early grave. It was her godsdamned godsgiven right to do so. So the plan had been adjusted. Abigail was going to make herself just enough of an embarrassment that they'd reassign her back home where she couldn't make the Black Queen look bad in front of all the fancy nobles by being a lout.

It would be a delicate line to walk, being embarrassing enough to be sent away but not enough to be demoted, yet as the daughter of a long and storied line of loutish drunks Abigail had trusted in her blood to get her through this. It, uh, hadn't panned out quite how she'd expected. People kept laughing when she said terrible things like 'sure the Dead King horrid, but in his defence he's been stuck living next to Procer for centuries' and 'makes sense the lake by the Dominion is from a hole in the ground, that's pretty much the rest of the country too' and instead of being made of pariah the amount of invitation to parties had tripled.

She'd dug deeper into loutishness, trying things like saying 'you people' and repeating the filthiest stories you could hear living in Summerholm as a brewer's daughter, but it turned out these fancy Procer folk were shocking hard to, well, shock.

The only upside had been that these days Abigail might have to worry about nooses and the Black Queen eating her soul, but at least she didn't often have to worry about being stabbed! Best thing about being a general was that when you got to a nice safe spot away from the frontlines, you got to call it strategizing. Very fond of strategizing, Abigail was. She did as much of it as was humanly possible. But now, as the Third Army spread out on the plains before Lauzon's Hollow, the dark-haired woman finally understood the final treachery of her rank: even if she stood at the back of her army, that army could still be made to stand at the front of the coalition. She'd been had again.

The general looked into the Baalite eye again and sighed. It really was a shame about the horse, she thought. They might not have noticed her slipping away otherwise.

—

Though Robber had been told that his assignment was to serve as Pickler's bodyguard, he suspected that what he'd actually been sent here to do was make sure that the Sapper-General of Callow did not end up murdering her assigned spotter: the honourable young lord Gaetan Rocroy of Cantal, also known as the Page. Robber admired the young man in a deep and sincere manner, which he'd not hid in the slightest. It'd taken him years of work to be able to get under the skin of everyone he met, while the boy was pushing through on natural talent alone. It was a wonder to behold, really.

"Praesi measurements are quite inadequate," the Page blithely said. "Outdated, even. It is the Salian paume that should be used, not the—"

Sergeant Snorer, who had been a sapper for more than decade, twitched so violently he snapped the thin copper wire he'd been adjusting. Crows, but the boy was an artist. The talent could not be suppressed, Robber would not allow it. It had to be encouraged, nay, cultivated! It would be a loss for Creation otherwise.

"Fire," Pickler coldly ordered.

The Page had not quite got out of the way, so when the trebuchet's counterweight came down he had to hurriedly hop to the side.

"Eyes on the stone, lordling," Robber called out.

The hero glared at him for the presumption before doing what he was supposed to and serving as a good little spotter for the sappers of the Army of Callow. The boy's eyes narrowed after the stone hit the side of a steep-sloped hill to the left of the hollow's entrance.

"It shook," the Page said. "Stone shattered on the surface. No large crack, though, you'll need to get closer."

There was a shared sigh by everyone here who'd studied ballistics. Eight hundred feet was well into the range of an imperial trebuchet, which was the model the Army of Callow used. If the stones weren't enough to crack open the hills at this range, then ballistas – which shot further, but with significantly smaller projectiles – would do next to nothing if deployed. The choice left was either to keep hammering away with the trebuchets for hours or start pulling out more interesting ammunition. The Boss had made it clear that she wanted those hills torn open for her plan, and she hadn't looked like she was in mood for an argument as to the practicalities involved.

"Iron framework inside, do you think?" Robber asked Pickler.

She licked her chops thoughtfully, chewing on the thought.

"If your assessment of how hollow the hills are is even remotely correct," Pickler said, "then it is the most sensible theory. It could be wards, I suppose."

"Boss mentioned when one of the siege engines they've got was ripped away, the top of the hill came clean off with it," Robber noted. "She thought the platform was sculpted from the stone, but maybe..."

"It was simply anchored in metal beams that crisscross the summit of those caverns," Pickler approvingly said. "It would be metal strengthened with spellcraft, to have had this particular effect, so more likely steel than iron."

Long, spindly fingers – she had sapper's hands, Pickler, delicate and deadly – drummed the side of the closest trebuchet thoughtfully.

"We'll keep hammering away at the eastern hills," the Sapper-General decided. "Nothing we have will crack the western ones right now. I dislike relying on sabotage, but it seems necessary this once."

Without even a need to be ordered, the sappers around them heeded her words: the nine trebuchets were prepared for concentrated fire, pivoted on their platforms. Like a swarm of ants, the goblins to work. The Page looked quite discomfited, staring at them uneasily, so Robber decided to lend his help. Sidling up to the boy, he offered a wide and fanged grin.

"Do tell me about these paumes, good sir," Robber asked. "Unlike my ignorant and hidebound colleagues, I am always open to heeding superior Proceran learning."

The boy's face lit up with enthusiasm, and from the corner of his eye Special Tribune Robber caught sight of a lieutenant kicking a trebuchet stone in fury.

Would Catherine be open to permanently assigning the boy to him, he wondered?

—

Roland de Beaumarais suspected that many would have envied the surface of his current situation – namely, walking forward slowly as four beautiful women were pressed up against him. The whole part about it also involving a tricky illusion spell and being surrounded by undead desiring to kill them all might have been considered something of a drag, mind you, and sadly he wouldn't even be able to remember the experience fondly. Not when Sidonia kept elbowing him, as the Levantine heroine just had the most horridly bony elbows, or when the Silent Guardian was not stepping on his feet for the eight time.

Gods that plate armour was heavy, aside from the fact that the Guardian herself was in no way a small woman.

"My foot," the Rogue Sorcerer croaked out in a whisper. "Please be careful."

To the Silent Guardian's credit, she looked somewhat apologetic and tapped his shoulder in apology. That already put her ahead of Sidonia, who'd just snickered when told she kept elbowing him.

"Stop whining," the Blessed Artificer said. "You'll give us away."

That Adanna of Smyrna spoke the reproach without so much as a hint of irony to her voice was, in its own way, impressive. Roland made himself count to five so he would not indulge in a retort and then they resumed their slow advance. The paths that Catherine's worrying goblin lieutenant had found proved true eventually, the third attempt allowing them to slip into a crevice that led into the great caverns below the hills. There'd been difficulties on the way, of course, but between Roland's knack for ward-breaking and the Silver Huntress' keen senses they'd managed to avoid giving themselves away.

It was inside they'd been forced to stay under illusion, as the place was crawling with undead. Even in the rare hallways Binds were always patrolling, and Roland pressed close to the wall as the other Chosen did the same to once more avoid the edge of his illusion being touched by a patrol of thirty undead soldiers in pristine armour. The caverns were shaking from the pounding of the Army of Callow's engines was giving the surface, but while sometimes stones were loosened the place seemed in no danger of collapse. He could understand why Catherine had taken the risk to send them here, now.

Only a band of Chosen would be able to see this through halfway quietly, or without everyone involved dying in the process.

"We're close," the Silver Huntress murmured. "Only one level left. Adanna, you're sure you can't do it from here?"

The device the Blessed Artificer had prepared ought to be able to collapse the cavern's ceiling, but she'd insisted it ought to be triggered as close to it as possible. There were hallway rings going up the sides, fortunately, and four nerve-racking levels up the five of them now stood close to the highest they'd be able to stand. There was a fifth level, but it seemed narrowed than the others.

"I could have done it from the bottom," the Artificer peevishly replied, "but that would be rolling dice. I can only guarantee results from the level above us."

"Then we go," the Huntress sighed. "Steady and careful, all."

The illusion Roland was currently using covered sound, so long as it was of sufficiently low pitch. It was why he'd picked something otherwise so unstable and finicky among his repertoire. Which was why when a great axe sunk into the wall just above his head, a tall Revenant in pale plate smiling mirthlessly as the spell shattered, he was rather surprised.

Halfway quietly was out, the Rogue Sorcerer mused. Time to see if 'without everyone involved dying' could still be salvaged,

There was a moment of silence as a massive lance of Light tore through the hilltops on the left side of Lauzon's Hollow, spinning up in the sky like some behemoth's spit until it thinned and vanished into a shower of motes. Trails of smoke followed behind, the heat from the priestly power having set small fires and scorched rock.

"You know," Robber said, looking at the rising smoke, "when the Boss told me there would be sabotage, I figured it would be something a little more..."

"Subtle?" Pickler suggested.

"Yeah," he faintly replied. "That works."

Was that from the woman that looked like Wasteland get? Gobbler knew it couldn't be the Vagrant Spear or the Silver Huntress – the former would have had Archer bragging up a storm, while the latter would instead probably have tried to kill Archer by now. The Rogue Sorcerer was a skillful meddler but no user of Light, and the Silent Guardian was by reputation a solid warrior but not particularly powerful. That left only the woman with the Ashuran accent and those golden highborn eyes that had Robber feeling wary every time he saw them. People with them were usually quite dangerous, when they got to live up to the Blessed Artificer's age.

"It will do the trick, regardless," Pickler shrugged. "Shame they didn't get the enemy engine, but I supposed it will have to do."

In front of them, the trebuchets snapped into motion. One after another they pounded at the hillside, until finally the thunderous crack the sappers had been working at for an entire bell finally resounded. The Page excitedly informed them there was a large fissure now. Another seven stones and finally the side of the hill collapsed. The iron bones that'd held it up were could still be glimpsed in the rubble, twisted and bent but rarely broken. The sight matched that on the eastern slopes, which had been smashed a more than half a bell ago.

"Hold fire," the Sapper-General ordered. "The trebuchets are done. Begin advancing the copperstone ballistas as soon as the Third advances."

Ignoring the Page who was asking whether he could finally leave, Robber picked out one of the trebuchets and began to climb his way up the beams. Unlike his fellows, he had an inkling of what was coming and he wanted as fine a seat to witness it as he could. Deftly raising himself atop one of the legs supporting the pivot, he watched as a great wyvern took to the sky from near the frontlines. Not a real beast that one, it didn't move quite right, but his sharp eyes caught sight of two silhouettes on its back. The Summoner would be one, he knew, but he wasn't sure for the second.

Archer ought to be with the Third, since it'd serve as vanguard, but you never knew with the Boss. Not like she was low on Named these days, anyway. The speculation served to entertain him as the wyvern flew forward, swarms and a wyrm rising to meet it in the distance. A death warrant for the two Named gone out, if it'd been meant to be anything except a distraction. It wasn't, though, and with a pleasurable shiver Robber felt the air begin to thicken. He gulped down his breaths as if struggling against an unwilling Creation, the sheer powerbeing gathered always surprising him. It was good for this army to be reminded exactly what the Black Queen was now and then, the Special Tribune felt.

Cat played nicer, these days, so sometimes the westerners forgot who it was exactly that'd won the Tenth Crusade.

A large circular gate winked open in the sky above Lauzon's Hollow, and to Robber's delighted surprise a heartbeat later a second one did. Sahelian was finally earning her keep, then. The hollowed out hills on both sides of the pass had been torn open at the top and smashed in the front, so now all that was left was using that broadened field of engagement and giving a pitched battle – or so conventional wisdom would have suggested. That wasn't the Boss' way, though, not at all. She rarely settled for a single knife in the kidney, it was one of the more charming things about her.

So it was with utter glee that Robber began cackling when he realized that the gates in the sky weren't connected to the Twilight Ways at all. The way water began pouring out of them was something of a hint.

—

Roland pulled deep on one his strongest offensive magics, forming fire and turning it dense and liquid before tossing a hundred droplets of it at the mass of skeletons coming after them. The Vagrant Spear, pulling the unconscious Adanna closer to her, turned just long enough to send a blast of Light at the armoured Revenant still pursuing them, cursing angrily in Ceseo when the dead hero shrugged it off like he had everything else they'd thrown at him. Nothing made a dent: not steel, not sorcery, not even Light. The Silent Guardian had managed to throw him off the ledge earlier, the most success they'd had, but he'd been back before long.

With more Revenants, of course, for the Gods despise Roland deeply and wanted him to die screaming.

Alexis put a seventh arrow in the shield-bearing titan of a woman coming after them with a halberd, that Revenant's unsettling laugh echoing across the cavern even through the cacophony of an entire army mobilizing to kill them. Arrows clattered against the wall as they passed by a pillar, just a second too slow to catch any of them, but already they were being charged at by armored skeletons ahead and javelins were in flight from somewhere he'd not even looked at yet! Swallowing bile, already feeling the raw sting of his aspects being leaned on too harshly, Roland conjured a shield to take care of the javelins.

The Silent Guardian plowed into the skeletons a heartbeat later, smashing everything aside like a bull in a house of glass, but deep down the Rogue Sorcerer knew it wouldn't enough. It was still two levels down before they'd get to the crevice they'd squeezed in through and there was simply no way they were going to last that long : opposition was hardening the further down they got. The Guardian screamed when a great barbed arrow punched through her mail, shot by some distant Revenant with a black iron bow, and though the Silver Huntress managed to turn aside a blow of the Revenant in pale plate and throw him off the ledge again, it was a temporary relief at best. Already the one with the halberd was coming at her, and now that the Silent Guardian was wounded and was going to start struggling with their front it would all be-

A wall of water came down from the sky, smashing through the holed that'd been melted through the ceiling of the cavern. The halberd Revenant was caught by a stream and smashed into the wall as the Huntress danced away just in time.

"That also works," Roland admitted.

Mind you, if they didn't figure a way out of this soon they were just going to drown instead. Still, this was already a distinct improvement. Thank you Catherine, he mused. Very timely of you. Screaming at each other so they could hear over the roar of the falling waters, the Rogue Sorcerer and the Silver Huntress agreed on a plan. If you could call an agreement to get the Hells out of here as quick as possible that. Water was beginning to gush down with them, and to their horror it was already filling the crevice they'd used to come in. They'd need another way out. Thankfully, even as they were wondered what in the Merciful Heavens that would be, scaffolding on the level above them collapsed.

A large flat piece of wood, one that must have served as a work platform, bounced down and rolled slightly downhill until the wounded and white-faced Guardian caught it with a hand. It was large enough for all of them, Roland noted, and quite likely to float. He met Alexis' eyes, then shrugged.

"Do you have a better idea?" he asked.

She didn't.

—

General Abigail shivered.

It was not the first time she'd seen this horror unleashed. Even if her memory had allowed her to forget the first day of the Battle of the Camps, her nightmares would not have. The gates did not look the same, now sleek rinks of darkness rather than the thin slices into Creation the Black Queen had once wielded, but then as now the sky had opened and wept. Abigail remembered the hate that'd simmered under the fear, back in those days where it'd been the Principate they'd fought. The way she'd known that their queen was a monster but she was not a monster who had sought this war, that it had been forced on all of them by a handful of rapacious princes in their palaces across the Whitecaps.

But not even then had she believed the invaders deserved that cold, brutal and senseless end.

Not the sky wept again, two gates torn into the fabric of the world high above, and like jugs being filled the hills that'd been ripped open by siege engines received the deluge. Even stone shattered, when the water came from so high, and before long the hordes the Dead King had hidden within his caverns began pouring out on the tide half-smashed. The water rushed out of the broken hills, taking with it rocks and corpses and steel, and began to spread into the plains below. In the sky above Named skirmished with horrors and Revenants, Light streaking bright as the flood gates were protected from disruption. It wouldn't last forever, Abigail thought, but it wouldn't have to. That'd never been the plan.

Water stormed out of the pass itself now, having overrun the hills themselves and swept into the hollow between them, the tide bowling over the undead and smashing the fortifications at the mouth of Lauzon's Hollow. The mud would make for unpleasant fighting grounds, Abigail thought, but it would hinder the undead as well. And it was the cost for something almost priceless: right now, as the waters kept hurling down from the gates, the Dead King's waiting army had been essentially dispersed. All preparations, positions and traps and been unmade by the brute force of thousands of tons of water coming down from the sky. It would not win them the battle by itself, but as far as first strokes went it was a masterful one.

Let it not be said the Black Queen had come by her reputation dishonestly.

It was not even half an hour before the first enemy got through and took a swing at a gate, making it stutter, and within moments both gates had winked out of existence. Water kept pouring from a blue a cloudless sky, jarring to behold, but General Abigail knew what was required of her now.

"Krolem," she said. "Have the advance sounded."

"Ma'am," the orc saluted.

Water still flowed but the plains were large and it had not rained in days: the earth would drink the tide in full, and it would not take so long as one might think. Abigail would not waste the advantage she had been given.

"Good, you're not dragging your feet."

The dark-haired woman almost fell down her horse, utterly startled, and froze in a different kind of fear when she saw exactly who it was that'd addressed her. The absurdly large bow would have been answer enough, even if the dark linen scarf and long coat had not been just as telling a sign. The Archer was not an uncommon sight around the camps of the Army of Callow, though Abigail preferred to avoid Named like the plague when she could.

"Pardon?" General Abigail got out.

"You're attacking," the ochre-skinned villainess said, smiling pleasantly. "Like Catherine wanted you to. Don't be afraid to press your luck in the assault, general, we're not done with surprises for the day."

"I, uh, of course," Abigail stammered. "You are to be the Named that comes with the Third, then?"

"Something like that," Archer grinned. "Don't worry your pretty little head about it."

Abigail noted that her horse was looking at the villainess with fear-tinged distrust as well. A wise animal than she'd believed, she conceded.

"I'll see you around, general," the Archer winked. "Don't go disappointing me, now."

"I wouldn't dare," Abigail replied, a lot more honestly than she'd meant to.

Luck was on her side, and so the Named drifted away as she laughed. The general took the time to gather herself, straightening her back and breathing out. She had a battle to get through. In the distance in front of her, horns sounded as the Third Army's ranks tightened into a shield wall and it began to advance. Noting its unease, General Abigail patted her horse's neck and mercifully ignored the attempt to bite her fingers she received in return.

"If you get through this, Boots, I might take you with me when I retire," Abigail of Summerholm muttered. "If you're unhappy about being in this mess, that already makes you the second smartest animal in this bloody army."

Onwards they went anyway, to swift death and graves shallow.

ruduen

Aaaah, she still has the same horse.

Also, vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Someguy

I am surprised the horse survived so long. Abigail must have really kept away from battles a lot.

Liliet

The Legions doctrine says generals stay back, IIRC Istrid used to get into fights with Grem One-Eye about it. Abigail would never go against the doctrine!

shikkarasu

"I wouldn't dare," Abigail replied, a lot more honestly than she'd meant to.

Liliet

Precisely!

vernal.ancient

Ahem.

It is called strategizing.

She does as much of it as she can. 😊

danh3107

>Boots

I see you Erratic, I see you

Sir Nil

I just had a thought, what if that disappeared undead army was trying to get the giants? 22 giants would be a hard nut to crack but if even 1 undead giant showed up from behind...

Liliet

That Would Be Bad

Javvies

Yeah, that would be a pretty bad scenario. And you're not the first to be concerned about the possibility.

On the other hand, while 22 of the Gigantes plus whatever escort they have would be a tough nut to crack ... I don't think they're anywhere near 200k undead tough. Which means the Dead King could have split his missing army group to go after the Gigantes and another target simultaneously.

Vortex

I was under the impression that the whole reason gigantes magic was scary was because they burned their enormous life force to enact wonders. Would undead giants have any life to spend? Wouldn't they just burn themselves out before dying?

Sir Nil

DK might not be able to use it outright, but he is one of the greater mages in existence. Just from the fact he's developed countermeasures against Night so quickly, and the fact that he can't use Night, but he can quickly detonate it and waste it if the holder dies, makes me suspect that he probably has ways to use the Giants magic.

Cpt. Obvious

Regarding DK not being able to use Night, is that because it's a power granted by Sve Noc? I know Catherine has a pool of night to draw on, but for the big stuff she serves as a conduit for the night the goddess's provide. Given that they currently isn't on speaking terms with DK I can see how they would frown on DK and his minion trying to use the power of Night.

sengachi

That's a good point, but on the other hand the Dead King literally wrote the book on sorcery as usurpation. If he can't do something horrible with the undead corpses of giants once filled with unfathomably dense magical life force I would be shocked.

Mental Mouse

That giant frame could also allow DK to pack more unlife-power in there. The Skein didn't seem to have any problems.

boballab

Abigail really needs more POV time.

Zggt

Lakeomancy to the rescue!

erebus42

Hey it's hard to argue against it's effectiveness.

RoflCat

Lakeomancy:

When you want the literal pouring of cold water on your enemies instead of figuratively.

Someperson

The old Foundling gambit never fails.

erebus42

Abigail is hilarious and relatable as always. Honestly her POVs always give me a Terry Pratchett vibe.

Burlyraven

Oh... no... Robber, don't corrupt the young Proceran hero... anything but that...

doominator10

Robber is Page's sith lord.

doominator10

People kept laughing when she said terrible things like 'sure the Dead King horrid, but in his defence he's been stuck living next to Procer for centuries'

And she wonders why people keep inviting her to parties...

LarsBlitzer

"Yesssss, feel the sarcasm flow through you. GIVE YOURSELF TO THE SNARK SIDE!"

MrRigger

This was everything I wanted. Abigail being Abigail and continuing to fail her way into success with her plan to be sent away. Robber being Robber and the hilarious image of him using the Page to torment everyone around him. Roland being Roland and showing the kind of Providence a Band of Five can get against the Dead King with the convenient platform literally falling into their hands.

And of course the other old dog, the return of lakeomancy. Screw your fortifications, we're just not going to bother with them. And now you've got to fight in the mud. Your feet bones are gonna get suctioned off!

Liliet

To be fair, while the sheer convenience of it was definitely Providence, there would have been a lot of wood floating around – they'd have been able to salvage something for themselves even on regular probability rules.

Story just greased the gears a little, there.

Dome Zasrekh

And That Is Funny.

aeoncor

Doctrine of the black queen:

Step 1: create chaos

Step 2: no I mean really, put your back into it, not just chaos, but !!!CHAOS!!!

Step 3:..

Step 4: lose less than the other guy

Big I

Now I really hope Robber gets to keep his Proceran side kick.

FableWright

Robber has an apprentice now.

Let that sink in.

sniff this is the most beautiful thing I've ever seen.

Hellspirit

A future Lesser Lesser Footrest maybe? If he can live up to his masters renown.

doominator10

Dauntless— The army most likely to be the first one in and last one out. Proud, near insane fighting maniacs.

Their general: Abigail. The one guaranteed to do everything in her power to get that pension check... but she has to be alive to do that, might as well keep her troops alive too.

Actually a perfect match.

Big Brother

Abigail, “cowardly” Commander of the Dauntless.

caoimhinh

Perfectly balanced, as all things should be.

dadycoool

Oh, I love this chapter. Poor Abigail, forever destined to be a good commander, no matter how much she tries to avoid it. Robber’s pride should shame Page, if he weren’t as bad/worse than Masego ever was at reading the room. Lol, the water.

Liliet

Robber + Page BroTP

I’m so sorry about your sense of propriety Abigail ;u; no wonder Cat finds her as entertaining as she does l m a o

The heroes deliver, as always ♥ Adanna continues to be a stone in the boot of everyone she ever meets which is glorious and best luv Abigail's reaction (and memory of previous reaction) to the lakeomancy

LUV THE RETURN OF LAKEOMANCY

NerfGlaistigUaine

I’ve had some seriously shitty days recently so this chapter is a nice reprieve. Always great to have Abigail’s POV. It’s nice that even in the middle of the apocalypse, Abigail is still Abigail.

Also nice to see that the new Page is a buffoon. That’s two for two with that Name.

Liliet

Tavros and Jake:)=

NerfGlaistigUaine

Google tells me that's a Homestuck reference but I don't know how it's applicable here, so care to clarify?

Liliet

Homestuck has a 'class' system for characters; Tavros and Jake are both Pages.

They're also both, uh, easily bullied, at one point by the same character. Now Guide is bullying them too)=

Darkening

I recall Jake was the Page of Hope or something like that, so those characters probably had a similar dynamic to robber/page, but it's been so long since I looked at homestuck I couldn't possibly tell you for sure.

Liliet

The Robber was if anyone Vriska, who's more like Akua Sahelian, which is not a coincidence because Robber mentions her one time this chapter and because nothing is ever a coincidence.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I understood that reference! 😊

God that was a wild ride, one awesome day of reading and even though I saw the twist coming from a mile away, it still hit me right in the feels.

Liliet

I know, right?!

(I did not see the twist coming... TOO UPSETTING
)=)=)=)

NerfGlaistigUaine

I suspected since the prophecy, was convinced once Simeon's theory came out, and was absolutely certain by the failure at Yakutsk. On another note, I just reread the story b/c of this comment and loved it all over again. Really bad time to do so considering how ridiculously busy and stressed I am, but still loved it.

Unsong also has the #1 most badass boast/threat/statement I've ever read, "I will recarve God without that facet"

LarsBlitzer

The first Page wasn't so much a buffoon as she had a severe case of "Notice me Sempai! <3" dressed up in Duty and Honor and Other Stupid Ideas That Will Get You Killed. She, along with White Knight-sempai at least served as an excellent example of what not to do. The new Page is just a twit.

As for Abigail, she's quickly becoming one of my favourites. But then, I'm a fan of Blackadder, Caiaphas Cain, and Flashman.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Well the definition of buffoon is "a ridiculous but amusing person." I don't know about you, but a person with "a severe case of "Notice me Sempai! <3" dressed up in Duty and Honor and Other Stupid Ideas That Will Get You Killed" definitely fits in my book.

LarsBlitzer

I stand corrected. I only remember him for being the twit to deliver an impassioned speech to Cat's army only to eat a crossbow bolt, which is why it's always a good idea to wear a helmet, and to not get caught monologueing.

Earl of Purple

The Exiled Prince, Kairos' nephew, ate a crossbow bolt after his Armour of Arrow Deflection deflected it from a non-lethal area. Page was the androgynous girl in love with him, who fought with a rapier and whom Cat defeated in the melee after she'd had (I think) Nauk shoot the Exiled Prince.

Darkening

She worked for the exiled prince, not the white knight. But yeah, the point stands. And I agree, Abigail is a great character in the Caiaphas Cain archetype.

shikkarasu

Abigail has strong "Rincewind with a military Rank" energy.

Juff

leaned back on horse > leaned back on her horse Dead King horrid > Dead King's horrid made of pariah > made a pariah invitation > invitations shocking hard > shockingly hard theback > the back pivoted > pivoting

goblins to work > goblins got to work semmed narrowed > seemed narrower no used > no user
I supposed > I suppose were could > could a more than > more than witness is > witness it powerbeing > power being one his > one of his Gods despise > Gods despised wouldn't enough > wouldn't be enough long : > long;
holed that'd > hole that'd
Not the sky > Now the sky traps and been > traps had been a blue a > a blue
A wise animal > A wiser animal

Juff

Typo Thread ^

Javvies

Ah, Abigail, you're doomed to not be getting out of your job. Cat has plans for you, after all.
Plus, as Cat once noted, hating on Procerans unifies just about everybody in Calernia – even a lot of Procerans (because they headcanon your insults about all Procerans to be about the other Proceran groups).

Heh, Roland is not having the best time.
And, damn, that White Knight Revenant is going to be a problem, even the Heroes couldn't scratch his armor, albeit in unfavourable circumstances.

Wait, just Lakeomancy? I mean, it's good, but the best part about using Lakeomancy against the undead is that you can turn the water onto Holy Water.

Liliet

The best part about all this is that Abigail genuinely thought racist jokes would be disagreeable in polite company.

She's just too precious.

Frivolous

I don't think the White Knight Revenant is actually that much of a problem. They just have to attack the parts of him that aren't covered by his indestructible armor.

Mental Mouse

More likely, this is Mirror Knight's eventual target.

pagesbe

Except it's not easy. He's probably wearing fullplate that basically covers everything, and moreover he's highly skilled so he's unlikely to just let someone slip a knife in a joint or something. If he was as easy to beat as you say, at least one of the 5 heroes pounding on him would have done something.

sengachi

Unfortunately a proper expensive set of plate mail can have very little in the way of gaps, on top of which this is a trained professional Named who spent a lifetime fighting enemies who knew their only hopes were those few gaps.

He's also undead now, so little pokes through gaps in the mail are unlikely to do the trick anyway. Against a high class revenant specializing in tanking, I'd be shocked if anything short of total dismemberment or the like is enough, and for that his armor needs to be cracked.

hoser2

I think that White Knight Revenant will indeed be trouble. I see uses for that armor, though. Put it on Fredric of Brus and give him Severance? Seems better than dealing with the Mirror Knight.

Javvies

Assuming the Revenant can be taken down without trashing the armor, that the armor would fit Frederic(no auto resizing/adjusting), that the armor isn't trapped or something, and that the armor would be as effective for Frederic ... and that the failure points.

That said ... Frederic would definitely be preferable to Mirror Knight, IMO, along he could safely wield the sword. Or Hanno. Or pretty much anyone other than Mirror Knight.

AceOfSpade

Abigail rising in the world through a mix of fearful self-preservation, pettiness, and plain luck will never stop being entertaining.

"Some people would call me paranoid but most of those are DEAD and I'm NOT." is pretty legit a bragging rights go.

Someguy

And then one day the Dead King acknowledges her personally through a Revanent after she won the field.

Frivolous

I guess blessing the water and making it holy was not a thing that could be done instantaneously. Maybe take a minute or two? Because otherwise Cat would have ordered the priests to do it, or had one of the heroes in Roland's group do it, destroying all undead the water touched.

Or maybe Adanna the Blessed Artificer was the only one in the group with the command or capacity of Light needed for the deed.

And yeah, enjoyed the viewpoints of Abigail and Robber. Always funny.

I think Abigail is going about it all wrong, by the way. To really get demoted, she should be doing something more venal, like a little mild embezzling, or offering incompetent people promotions in exchange for favors, or causing dissension in the ranks by sleeping with multiple violently jealous people at the same time. Not enough of a sin to get her hanged, but too much to trust her with command.

I guess it says much about Abi's virtue and personality that it doesn't occur to her to use her position to enrich herself that way.

I also find it interesting that Cat assigned a weak Named like the Page to the artillery unit simply to use his Named senses as a spotter. Very Boring But Practical.

Frivolous

Not demoted, my mistake. Reassigned is what I should have written.

Maybe openly masturbating during staff meetings might work. Or eating lots of beans and passing wind a lot during meetings. What do you think?

Darkening

I mean, last time we saw a reference to blessing large bodies of water was at the battle of camps, and they were basically right on the shore, might be they can't do it from a couple miles away like they are right now.

Liliet

Abigail also thought that MILDLY RACIST COMMENTS were utterly unacceptable in polite company and would make her enough of an embarrassment that the Black Queen would have her reassigned.

She's a ridiculously pure cinnamon bun and must be protected.

Liliet

(that said, embezzling and promoting incompetents is how (Abigail assumes) people get hanged in the Army of Callow, not reassigned)

Niteman

Back in Summerholm we saw the Bumbling Conjuror with an absurd amount of luck, I wonder if Abigail is on the road to becoming the Bumbling General...

Frivolous

Abi isn't Bumbling, exactly. Simeon the Bumbling Conjuror succeeded by accident, but Abi doesn't make that many mistakes. Her choices are reasoned and reasonable.

If she did acquire a Name, I believe it would be more like Timid Conqueror or Hapless Victor.

I suggest Hapless deliberately. Hapless means unfortunate, and Abi certainly considers herself accursed.

Emily

It's got to be the Reluctant General. (Not advocating her getting a name but if she does that's it)

Valkyria

Since Cat's going back to using the classics, and Archer said they got more surprises... Undead goats would be a bad idea against DK... but ... it wouldn't be that far fetched to expect some... arson next, right? A nice little spot of Goblinfire... Come on Cat, we all know you want it too!

boballab

I'm waiting for the crossbow shot kill of the monologue idiot as well as something being set on fire.

KageLupus

From the end of the last chapter;

"My eyes opened. That was an answer, yes. Luck and goblins.

Didn't sound like much, but you could do a lot of damage if you used those right."

Cat used Goblin siegework to crack open one hill, and the Providence from a band of five to crack the second.

Clint

Oh, an Abigail interlude!

And Robber!!

And Roland!!!

And Axe-White-Knight-Revenant and the return of lakeomancy.

So many favorite things. And it's not even my birthday, yet.

Thank you, EE!

Frivolous

Ongoing trend with Catherine:

She is infamous for both arson and lakeomancy – fire and water.

She is a warlord whose Wish is for peace.

She is the Queen of Lost and Found.

Therefore I believe her Name will be about Concordant Opposition. And maybe the reason why Cat's Name is taking so godsdamned long to surface is because it is so difficult to mix fire with water, unite war and peace.

Liliet

Note: Lost and Found is just a drow translation of her last name.

She's just Queen Foundling, which is a much funnier point in the first place.

nimelennar

Silly Abigail.

She's going to retire with a Legate's pension, not a General's.

Liliet

You mean Marshal's?

Valkyria

If Abigail wrote a book it probably would be:

A practical guide to an early General's pension – How to fail with success

SaveOurSquirrels

She hasn't been very lucky with it so far

Razorfloss razor

I imagine it will by her standards be a tell all bitching about her life as a general but ironically have great insights on what it takes to be a good commander making it mandatory reading for all up and coming commanders.

SaveOurSquirrels

10/10 would read

ereshkigala

Only 800 ft range for that artillery? The goblins must be slacking. Longest catapult shot IRL is over 3600 feet.

Kinda surprised Nussy isn't using his numerous airforce as artillery too. Remember how eagles kill turtles by dropping them from a mile high IRL? Those undead vultures and buzzards could drop rocks bigger than turtles and a house-sized boulder dropped by a Wurm could kill everything within 100 feet as it shattered or break a castle.

No need for them to engage the ground forces in melee at all; they could stay beyond non-Named spell range and pummel them.

Mental Mouse

Our heroes and villains both have amply demonstrated the ability to take down DK's flyers. The downside of getting above it all is people shooting at you.

ereshkigala

And? Nussy will have reduced the fight to just a few Named vs all his air-force. The big anti-air blast ate half of Cat's reserves a few chapters back, so if Nussy divides his air-force into 100 dispersed groups and staggers their attack runs every half a minute, the Named casters will be exhausted after negligible damage. That will leave ranged attacks and flying/teleporting Named, which will take forever to chew through sky-blotting numbers of flyers.

In the meantime, the terminal velocity of a dropped 20-lb rock is over 300 m/s, multiple times greater than the velocity of the same rock launched from trebuchets. Each of them will hit like an early cannonball, even its impact fragments slicing through infantry armor and producing casualties. An army formation hit by a few hundred such projectiles is gonna break. A medieval fortress is gonna fare about as well as those hollowed hills.

And the kicker? Just replace half the rocks with casks of that airborne poison. Suddenly the coalition needs to beat every single attack without them dropping their bombs, because even Cat's powers with Night can't do more than hold the poison back for a short time. Definitely not long enough to evacuate the whole army via gate.

PS:

With a flight speed of 40 mph (pretty average for large birds), Nessy could send them on bombing runs on every city and town in half of Procer in a day. Just one cask of that airborne poison is gonna seriously mess up any crowded area, or poison a field. And a bucket of magical plague is gonna be way worse.

Noldo

Presumably only Binds would be capable to perform such raids and those are not to be wasted so the mass attacks are just remnants of dead birds in their natural form. Quick and easy to make, but lack precision.

dadycool

My answer to this argument is: WB said he's not actually trying yet and included a logical argument. Thus far, he's been fighting an attrition war, which is a category he has a monopoly on. If he were to do a Hard-And-Fast blitzkrieg, there would be Consequences. If he dominates even a single battle without giving the other side a fighting chance, even a long shot, there would be similar, lesser Consequences. He's not new to the game. Don't cite the deep magic to him, he was there when it was written.

Ben

Do we know if Hanno can use his aspect to call up the memories/skills of Revenants made of heroes—at least from prior to their death? Because that could be a pretty handy tool in this war...

Darkening

I believe he can, but scrying doesn't work in the territory the Dead King controls, presumably something to do with the Crab construct workshops or something. So Cat can't call him up to ask about this White Knight.

flashburn283

Poor Abigail, she is turning into Caiphas Cain at this rate, every time she tries to avoid her reputation, it just grows stronger.

Juneau

Exactly this and it's why I love her so much.

I've used this comparison before.

Best character

Abrakadabra

She is also adorable and definitely hates being useful.

Also Ab, Ab, Ab-Abigail, hero of the imperium!

Daniel E

Oh man, a PoV from Abigail, Robber, and Roland together? This chapter is now a close contender for my favorite Interlude.

Noldo

Are we going to get another Interlude titled "New tricks" describing how Cat unleashes the cards she has not yet shown?

ninegardens

Nope- We're gonna finally get the interlude "Flow", to commemorate Cat's latest Lakeomancy.

"New Tricks" will be delayed for 20 chapters time.

Detton

I want abigail to get a Name soooo badly hah

Graeme Dochylo

I'd sort of like to see this water having come from Lake Hengest. Y'know, the one mentioned to be so affected by the angel corpse in it that the water was nearly holy water?

Sounds like the exact sort of water to use against the undead.

Darkening

Considering that lake is (sorta) in Creation, she'd have to open a gate from creation to arcadia/TW, then drop the water from that portal into another portal to get it to her destination. Also, that lake isn't a mile deep like the arcadian one, so you'd lose out on a lot of the physical impact. Though yeah, holy water would make up for that a fair amount. Still, dunno how many uses you'd get out of the lake before you basically emptied it even if you could get past the logistical issues of dropping it through multiple portals.

DocSumac

I do love me some Abigail. Touches of Flashheart, Blackadder, Caiphas Cain. Nothing like the pragmatic cynic to add some salt to the meal.

Juneau

Absolutely love Abigails character. I would read her books any day!

Aotrs Commander

We once again cut to the future, where Supreme God-Empress Abigail, ruler of the Everything, sits on her grand Combined Throne of Calernia, Above And Below.

Countless thousands below await her proclaiptions of wisdom, for it and her wit are beyond legend.

"No, but seriously; why the actual FUCK does this keep happening to me?!" She wails...

Interlude: New Tricks

"Surprise is not a fixed quality. Yesterday's coup is tomorrow's blunder."

– Theodosius the Unconquered, Tyrant of Helike

Princess Beatrice Volignac of Hainaut believed in being honest with herself even when it was painful to do so.

Particularly when it was painful. Even when back when she'd only been the sister of the ruler of Hainaut, she had known that there would be great dangers in refusing to look the realities of Creation in the eye. It was why she did not bother to pretend that she was anything but fat, even when her high birth meant that flatterers offered up sweet lies insisting otherwise by the basketful. She was fat and she would not slim up. It was the way of things, something she did not like but would have to live with. Allowing herself to indulge in a fantasy world at the expense of reality was just being childish, and childishness in a woman of her rank was the road to an early grave.

And now she was not a mere princess' sister anymore, she was the Volignac. Julianne had gone off and chased a death worthy of song, leaving Beatrice with two grieving nephews as well as a crown she'd never expected she would have to wear. This was Procer and here blood mattered – especially when it was as old as that of the House of Volignac – so Beatrice was still being treated as royalty, but she had no illusions about what she truly was: the leader of a large armed gang, dependent on the charity of the high throne and foreign powers for her survival. She was royalty only so long as no one cared to challenge it, and should the army she'd salvaged from ruin perish it would be the end of Hainaut as a realm. There could be no return when one's rule extended only to ashes and refugees.

And so Beatrice had thought herself cleverer than those Langevin whoresons in Cleves, at least, whose smidgeon of safety had deluded into thinking that they could afford to plot when the very end times were at their doorstep. The staggering stupidity of Gaspard Langevin's manoeuvring still surprised her – had the man truly forgot that more than half the forces defending his lands were foreign, that some of the very same Firstborn he wanted to slight had bled for Cleven grounds? It'd been a comfort, cradling that knowledge. And yet now, as Beatrice Volignac's fingers tightened around her lance, she was forced to acknowledge that in some ways she had been a fool as well.

Queen Catherine Foundling of Callow was an easy-going woman. That temper was legend, true, but it was not easily provoked and when in a good mood the young queen was both amiable and impulsively generous. She was free with honours others in her position would have clutched tight. The Queen of Callow's obvious lack of schooling in the mores of one of high birth was an occasional figure of fun in Proceran circles, for she was cunning in the way that a peasant or a tradesman was cunning – without polish, without elegance. Beatrice was not fool enough to consider the Black Queen of Callow a mere savage, but between the cordiality and the lowbrow habit she'd come to forget who it was that she was dealing with.

Then hills were cracked open, the sky opened and an army was smashed by celestial deluge all in the span of an hour.

Beatrice remembered the stories, then, of the Battle of the Camps. Of the Doom of Liesse, of what Callowan veterans fondly called the 'Arcadian Campaign' – as if it were not utter howling madness, to have invaded the realm of the fae – and at last of the Princes' Graveyard, where sport had been made of her kind as none had dared since Theodosius the Unconquered. The Black Queen did not bother with the proper courtesies, Princess Beatrice remembered, because after the Graveyard there was not a living ruler left who could demand them of her. The Princess of Hainaut let that sink truth sink into her bones, breathed deep of it. It would not be forgot again, she swore.

Princess Beatrice let the fear settle down, reminding herself that this once the horror was on her side, and turned her gaze to the enemy. Already the Third Army under its canny fox of a general was advancing at a brisk pace, red-painted shields locked tight in a shield wall. The waters had not yet finished flowing, but they'd slowed and would soon die out. Behind them would be left muddy grounds and a roiling mass of undead, an unprotected and hindered formation that the Army of Callow was already punishing with sustained artillery fire. The rumoured 'copperstones' fired by the Sapper-General's ballistae burned with bright Light where they hit, incinerating bone and unmaking necromancy.

The battle plan, as it currently stood, dictated that the flanks of the coalition army would wait a span before advancing as well. Beatrice understood the purpose, for she had made some study of war: it was hoped that the enemy reinforcements already pouring out from deeper in the pass could be drawn back into the water-emptied caverns by the Third Army's hasty advance, in an attempt by Keter to pincer that force as it pulled ahead of the rest of the coalition army. This was a risk, on the surface, but in truth it was the Black Queen's attempt to limit casualties on their side as much as possible. She wanted, in Beatrice's opinion, to draw the dead into fighting her at the mouth of the pass.

There, where Keter's number could not be brought to bear as they would in a broader field, the Queen of Callow wanted to eat up an army of one hundred thousand one bite at a time. The battle lines would stabilize once the flanks caught up to the Third Army, and when they were the artillery could be brought to bear on the massed undead facing the coalition. In a very real sense, the Grand Alliance soldiers would not be the executioner's axe but the chopping block: their purpose would be drawing out the enemy and keeping them in the artillery's killing field, not necessarily to do a great deal of damage themselves. The young queen's art of war was not famed without reason, though the Princess of Hainaut did not believe it would be quite so simple.

It never was, with Keter.

Yet blind worries were no reason to stand paralyzed, so when Princess Beatrice Volignac received the word from their supreme commander she passed down the order to her captains. Trumpets sounded, a bright clarion call, and the drumrolls began as the last army of Hainaut began its advance intermixed with companies of fantassins. To the east the Levantines mirrored her advance, and just as the Third Army reached the edge of where the waters had touched – where the dead had been swept up – the march of the flanks finally began. The Queen of Callow's plans were proceeding nicely so far, Beatrice saw. A stream of reinforcements had hurried out of the deeper pass to prevent the Third from just sweeping through, and when finally it made contact with the shield wall of the Third Army both forces slowed in the morass of mud and steel that the water had made. The undead did not have sharp enough teeth to smash a Callowan shield wall, though, so the stream split.

The caverns, torn open for al to peer into them, were beginning to fill with undead attempting to go around the enemy's shield wall. Instead of just fighting in front, the dead were trying to bring their numbers to bear by attacking on the flanks as well – for now only splashing harmless at the sides of that stout eastern square formation, but the undead were gathering numbers to mount more serious assaults. The enemy was moving too quickly, Beatrice thought as she watched with narrowed eyes. Light skeletons, without armour and barely armed, had been sent out first and en masse as they were not so prone to getting stuck in the mire.

The Princess of Hainaut sent for one of her captains and ordered that the roll of the drums be quickened, setting a quicker march. If she waited too long, she feared that the Third Army might be entirely surrounded before reinforcements arrived. That would be a disaster, especially should the well-armed Callowan soldiers rise in the service of Keter. No wonder Callow was bereft of all beauty, she sometimes thought when looking at the pristine armaments of the Army of Callow. All the wealth there had gone into war. Would that Julianne and their father before her had practiced that same folly, which in these dark times was no folly at all. The House of Volignac had more use for plate than palaces these days.

The Princess' eyes drifted to the hills in the distance, beyond the fighting, where she had been told that a great siege engine still awaited. It had yet to fire a single shot, but as far as she knew the Chosen had not destroyed it. What was Keter waiting for, then?

—

"We're through with the easy part now, ducklings," Sergeant Hadda growled. "Shields steady and mind your right. Don't get smart, it doesn't pay off against the skellies."

Edgar breathed out, feeling the usual tremor of fear going down his spine. He'd be all right when the shield wall made contact with the enemy, but until then he knew from experiences the nerves would stay with him. Orders had come from above for the fourth cohort – of which Captain Pickering's company was the second company – to move to from the back to the left flank, to prevent the enemy outflanking the army. Felt odd to be turning his back to the dead in front of them, coming out of the Hollow, but then Edgar was just turning to look other undead in the face wasn't he?

"Liked it better when we were just smashing the downed bones," Edith muttered at his side. "Like a dangerous chore, but still better than the fucking shield wall."

Edgar snorted. A dangerous chore had been a good word for it. The Black Queen had called forth the tides to smash the enemy's hidden army, and when it'd washed up in a sea of mud and roiling undeath the front ranks of the Third Army had sent forth the priests of the House Insurgent. Streaks of blinding Light had hit the struggling skeletons and ghouls, carving smoking furrows into the mud, but it'd been the task of the legionaries following behind them to shatter any bones they saw sprouting out. Not harmless work, this, for sometimes skeletons played deader than they were and nasty surprises of mud and steel came at you from below. But like Edith – surprisingly sensible, for a Liessen girl – had said, still a damned sight better than the shield wall.

There, sometimes luck just meant you didn't get back up in the Enemy's service when you died.

The company moved into place as smoothly as was possible on muddy ground, a line of twenty moving to the front. Edgar's own line made up the second rank, which meant they'd see fighting before long. Over the shoulder of a shorter soldier, he saw pale bare skeletons with only spears in hand deftly going through the mud. Companies filled in to the side of Edgar's own, broadening the shield wall before the enemy could sweep around it, and he breathed out quietly. If he'd been in the first rank, he wouldn't have dared to take his eyes off the enemy even when he caught movement above. In the second, though, he risked a glance.

It wasn't the Summoner and another Named engaging vultures up in the sky, as now that the flood gates had closed they'd fled. Too low, anyway, and too quick. It was with quicksilver surprise that Edgar realized he was looking at artillery fire. Some sort of enormous spear had been fired, or perhaps a pillar? Whatever the truth of it, a great length of dark stone fell into the back ranks of the Third Army, killing a dozen with the impact. Edgars' fingers tightened with fear at the tight, for the black stone was glowing with runes. A heartbeat later, there was a crackling sound and a burst of sorcery followed by screams, half a company dying in a heartbeat in a mess of lightning.

Another pulse, and the dead rose.

The companies in the back of the Third turned to face the fresh threat – and while another pillar was shot at them, it burst in midair as if artillery fire of their own had somehow caught it – but the pulses kept coming. Always the same two, lightning and necromancy, but it was a potent combination and the streaks of Light and sorcery thrown at the pillar did nothing. Edgar of Laure breathed out and looked away. Fear ran in his veins as the distant sound of great drums began to thrum, but he could no longer afford to look anywhere but forward. The first wave of skeletons charged forward in utter silence.

"Dauntless," Sergeant Hadda screamed.

"Dauntless," they howled back, and for a moment the boast chased away the gloom.

—

Gods, Indrani grimly thought. That's a new one.

What the Hells was that pillar? She recognized the stone from their trip into the Crown of the Dead a few years back – she'd never seen that exact tone of black anywhere but in the deepest reaches of the Dead King's fortress – but it was the first time she'd ever seen this particular breed of nastiness. It was a pretty simple setup, but the alternating pulses had already chewed through two companies and all attempts to handle the situation ended up turning into oil tossed at the flame. Not that she could afford to spare much time looking. The enemy's siege engine was still firing the damn pillars, and there were only so many heavy arrows in her quiver – three, actually, and she was already on her last. That would mean three pillars swatted out of their trajectory, at least, but somehow she doubted Keter would be running out of ammunition the same time she did.

Nocking the last heavy arrow, Archer suppressed a grimace as she saw another blackstone pillar let loose. She breathed out, steadied her aim, then drew and released. Indrani didn't even bother to watch if she'd hit, already knowing she would. Normally she'd have a few more heavy arrows, but today Cat had sent her out to handle constructs so it was unravellers she'd loaded up with. Useful things, those, but unlikely to dent a pillar. Pickler's copperstone ballistas were still chewing up the undead coming out of the pass so the Third wasn't in danger of collapsing anytime soon, but casualties were already mounting and that slippery eel General Abigail had left Archer behind at some point.

Glancing ahead, Indrani found that beorns were massing in the pass. House-sized abominations resembling bears, damned hard to put down and surprisingly agile for their size. They also carried bellyfuls of undead soldiers, which made them a bloody plague for regulars: it was like a living battering ram spewing out soldiers. Archer bit her lip. She couldn't do anything more about the pillars, it'd have to be one of Catherine's contingencies that handled it. She could begin hammering away at the constructs, though, so even as another pillar was shot in the distance Indrani reached for an unraveller and nocked it.

In that, at least, she could tip the scales.

—

You have no assignment, the Black Queen had told him. Follow providence where it leads you.

Balzer, who men now knew as the Sage, had done so without qualms. Even the Peregrine had been burned by that villainess' wiles and he would not gainsay them when they stood on the same side. So the Sage had retreated into himself, closing all shutters so that nothing might obscure the sensation of the slight nudges of Fate. And Fate had led him not to stand with the Dominion's warriors, with whom he shared blood, or the Procerans he had sworn to protect from the Enemy's attentions. It was with this strange Third Army that his steps had taken him. Not even to fight on the front, though Balzer knew many secrets of destruction beyond those of his fists, but to stand at the back.

He understood why only when black stone fell from the sky as a pillar and death bloomed around it.

Balzer had learned many secrets, for which some called him wise and others had decreed him a sage – even Sage, in time. But enlightenment was not a shared road, it was the struggle within: lonely, endless, forever reaching for unattainable perfection. So he was not surprised when the priests of the House Insurgent molded their faith bright and threw it against the black stone to no avail. No candle could light up the ink-black sea. And what could sorcery do, be it flame or thunder? Only a fool sought to beat a devil at devils' tricks. In this, though, he could lend aid. The Sage waded through the fresh undead, smashing skulls through helmets as he glided through their ranks, and before long beheld the pillar from up close.

"What a malevolent thing you are," the Sage murmured, eyes narrowing.

Kill, the black stone sang. Take. Kill. Take. Its insistence washed over him like morning mist, even the touch of lightning – the Light within him was greater than what the Enemy's work could bring to bear. Balzer pressed his palm against the stone, disliking its feverish warmth but not lingering on such ephemeral things. Like the river, he must flow and never cease. It was the opposite with this thing of stone and dread, for it was a shell hosting pulsing hate and greed and nothing more. Shells always had weaknesses, and the Sage found this one's before long. Undead grasped at his back, but he was swift and his oneness with Light blinded their eyes.

"Begone," Balzer ordered, and struck.

In his right hand he held the power to Destroy, learned from years of studying the lingering wisps divine wrath had left behind on this world, and it was this he unleashed against the work of Trismegitus. The black stone shattered under his fist, revealing a howling sorcerous heart, and this he snatched and snuffed out. For a moment, when it died, he thought he had heard a word. Not enough to Divine anything from it, but perhaps with meditation... The sky above spewed out another pillar of black stone, falling among soldiers to deliver thundering death. Ah, opportunity. The Sage smiled.

Today was a good day, he decided, and sought the next pillar of black stone.

—

Lord Razin Tanja of the Binder's Blood threw down his shield, for the javelin might not have punched through but it'd made it good as useless anyway. That was the third shield he'd gone through since the battle began, and he'd already had two horses killed under him: Keter was in fine form today. His sworn swords, which had served as the vanguard, were holding steady ahead of him. Malaga was upholding its honour today, though it was Aquiline who was adding deeds to the Rolls for her Blood — she'd taken a few slayers and Lanterns to kill a Tusk that'd passed by the Archer's punitive barrage, giving the killing blow herself.

It ought to put her in a better mood, wiping away the disgrace that'd been getting wounded on the first real day of fighting of the campaign.

The dead were holding firm under the assault of the Dominion, the Lord of Malaga found when he scrutinized the battle lines. The warriors of Levant weren't making enough of a dent to push back the enemy, though they were themselves in no danger of losing ground. Much as Razin would have preferred a more glorious bent to the battle, he could not deny that the Black Queen's plan was working: the copperstone ballistas of the Army of Callow were tearing through entire companies of the enemy as they poured out of the pass to reinforce, focusing on the centre in front of the Third Army.

It was not a great honour for his warriors and Aquiline's to be used as mere hooks keeping the metaphorical fish from wriggling out of the ballistas' reach, Razin Tanja thought, but if it led to victory he would make his peace with it. The Procerans had been tasked with the same on their wing, anyhow, so there was hardly a surfeit of honour to go around — only Abigail the Fox, that ruthless and cunning general who'd bled his binders so starkly at the Graveyard, had claimed any by being given the pivotal role of the day. Still, there was no reason for the Dominion not to try to seize a better position. Razin sent for his captains and ordered a push at the very edge of the right flank, led by Lanterns and axemen. One of his sworn swords brought him his fourth shield of the day, and the Lord of Malaga pondered whether he should rejoin the ranks. The men fought better when he fought with them.

The decision was stolen from him when Keter acted first. From the broken ceiling of the caverns a great cacophony came as a devilry kept back was suddenly unleashed: the surviving swarms from the first day, birds and bats and insects, flowed out like a tide with ear-breaking shrieks. The Lord of Malaga swallowed a curse. Of all the armies of men, the Dominion struggled with these horrors the most.

"BINDERS," Razin Tanja screamed. "BINDERS, ON THE SWARMS."

—

The Summoner snorted derisively when he saw those Dominion savages fumble around with their so-called sorcery. Half-baked diabolism was what it was, this use of souls as anchors for bodies made of their surroundings – in this case, largely mud and stone. Not all the binders could forge flying creatures, either, further proof of their fundamental incompetence. Cedric reminded himself that not all could equal his own mastery, but it was a half-hearted thought and almost more a boast than a commiseration.

"You are certain your creature is capable?" the Concocter asked.

Beneath them, his summoned wyvern batter of her wings as she sped towards the undead swarms. The Summoner cast his colleague a scornful look.

"A little late for asking, yes?" Cedric sneered.

She rolled her eyes, the insolent wretch. Gods, but the Black Queen simply did not recognize his worth – always she used him as a horse-handler for some inferior Named, when he could have done it all on his own.

"My concoctions will work as promised," the Concocter flatly said. "The only possible point of failure here is your work."

The Summoner scoffed.

"My works is always beyond reproach," he said. "It is why I have been judged too valuable to send to the Arsenal, unlike some others."

She probably would have argue with this self-evident truth, so Cedric ordered his summon to bank hard upwards and leaned closer to its neck. The containers the Concocter had loaded its belly with made the construct less manoeuvrable, but he'd learned to compensate. It would not matter, anyway, he thought. Unlike what his colleague believed, the containers would not simply be spat out. Cedric manipulated his summon to constrict its 'stomach' when they neared the edge of the swarms, breaking a container even as it opened its mouth. Like the old dragons of legend, his summon breathed out a gout of something – though it was a gas instead of fire, rather lessening the effect.

The gas did its work, the Summoner was forced to admit even as he began leading the wyvern into making a long pass through the mass of undead creatures, spewing out clouds all the while. The brew attacked the necromantic constructs almost as holy water would have, eating at them and disrupting the spell holding them together – it was particularly lethal on insects, but even the birds collapsed after a heartbeat of exposure.

Yet another victory to be laid at his feet, the Summoner thought with smug satisfaction.

—

General Abigail figured this must be a little like how a chicken would feel, if it were still alive when you put it on a spit to roast.

Just enough movement to give you the illusion that you might make it out, when in fact you were just spinning around so that you could be roasted more evenly. Sadly still on her horse, the general hid another wince as she watched another pack of ghouls leap over the shield wall at the front and land atop the shield panels of the mage cabals, then wiggle through a weakness in them. The Third Army was being made to stand and take the bloody hits to the Sapper-General of Callow could pound the enemy into dust with her ballistas, a strategy that Abigail would admit to herself she would have been very fond of if it didn't involve her standing so close to the killing field.

Boots, that bloody horse, seemed to have grasped that they were in it together at least until the end of the battle – it was cooperating, and had not tried to bite her in at least an hour. From that unfortunately dangerous vantage point, General Abigail watched the field. It'd been hours since the battle began, long enough that some of the mud was beginning to dry, but for all the efforts on both sides it remained a stalemate. Revenants had tried to smash the front lines a few times, but Named had met them head on and gotten the better of them. Most the time, anyway. Some devil in pale plate had killed a villain and only retreated when the band under the Silver Huntress reappeared to force him back.

It'd be a while still until sundown, Abigail figured, but there would be no clear winner today. The trouble was that even with rotations he people were getting damned tired, and the Procerans likely had it worse on their flank: half of them were mercenaries, and unlike the Dominion on the right they didn't have the numbers to be able to keep back a reserve. It might all turn nasty, if they weren't careful, and even with the Second Army still being held in reserve a lot of damage might happen very quickly if the left flank went sour. The trouble was that, when it came to what she could actually do to help prop up the left flank, General Abigail saw only the one option and she wasn't exactly eager to take it.

"Might not be as bad as what happens if we wait, though," she muttered at her horse.

She considered the risks. Gods, much as she hated to admit it doing nothing might be the more dangerous of the two. The Volignac soldiers were a hardy lot, but the mercenaries didn't have the same stomach for the right. If some started running... Abigail still held back on doing anything until she saw the first fantassin company break, cursing and giving orders to her general staff even if the mercenary company managed to rally and return into position. It was only going to get worse the longer she waited, and with Abigail's luck everyone up here was going to pull a runner except her own damned army.

After dismounting she gathered as many companies of heavies as she dared to pull to her and arranged for a wedge. She sent for the Third Army's standard, picked some poor bastard to carry it into battle and waited for the orders she'd given to trickle down to the House Insurgent and the mage cabals. The change was noticeable, when it happened: from defensive to offensive. The priests struck out with mass volleys as shields winked out and were replaced by great spears of flame either.

"Gods," Abigail faintly muttered. "How bad could it really have been, being a tanner?"

Too late to back out now, she knew. After pulling all those heavy companies to her, if she gave the command to someone else they'd turn on her for cowardice. Ah, she realized with a start, but there was a way to avoid fighting. She found the poor bastard she'd given the army standard too and sent him back to the ranks with a smile, taking it up herself. See, with that thing in hand she wouldn't be able to use a sword so no one could expect her to – shit, Abigail, realized, she could no longer use a sword. And Keter might go after the standard to hurt morale. She'd made herself a target again.

"Are you ready, general?" Krolem asked.

They were all looking at her, Abigail saw, waiting for her order. She swallowed a whimper, which came out sound a little like a giggle. Some of her officers looked impressed.

"Forward," General Abigail ordered. "Into the breach, Dauntless."

For once, she was lucky: the answering roar of approval drowned out how shrilly terrified her voice had really been.

Big I

Hahaha, Abigail the Fox. Sounds like she's got a song in her future.

Just remember Abigail, you'd have had to marry one your cousins if you were a tanner, and they all look like ferrets.

Liliet

Abigail the really, really fucking scared fox.

Scared animals are the dangerous ones :3

shikkarasu

Didn't Cat narrowly avoid a Fox related Name that WB was trying to force on her? Wonder if that Name will settle somewhere nearby.... Y'know, with someone who has a similar reputation to Cat and with whom Cat occasionally commiserates/teaches.

Liliet

Not how Names work!

stevenneiman

Cornered Fox, maybe?

Liliet

y e s

Halinn

"Gods," she muttered, "ferrets can't be too bad, can they?"

Juneau

I'm going to say this everytime she has a bit in the book.

She needs her own books.

Best character ever. And yes, I love the Ciaphus Cain books

Anomandris

Abigail is a treasure....Ciaphas Cain would be proud....

Dome Zasrekh

Why did it take me so long to find a comment like this?!
Also yes, mood kindred indeed!
We need more of her!

Wen Yang

Mood kindred! Indeed, Ciaphas would be proud.

boballab

There really needs to be more Adventures of Abigail of Summerholm! I'm also going to predict she will accidentally kill that one pesky revenant using the standard.

Gibborim

No, that Revenant is the final whetstone for Cat's Name.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

And after she stands in judgement over it and readies herself for the killing blow, Abigail the Fox, seeing an opportunity to finally flee, will in her panic go in the wrong direction, and she'll trip on a corpse and bash the Revenant's head in with her standard.

flashburn283

And she will have truly become Caiphas Cain

Tenthyr

Its impossible not to adore Abigail and Cats malicious delight in using her.

Burlyraven

I honestly believe there's at least one god for both Above and Below just waiting for that one little bit of something extra to give Abigail a Name. I'm also pretty sure if that did finally happen, Abigail would cry (out of despair, but everyone would interpret it as happiness or pride), and eventually accidentally become the most potent Named to ever live.

mamm0nn

Doubt it. Though she may be lucky and even fate-guided, Named are inevitably about willpower which she lacks. Combine that with her being a little Catherine when the big one is still alive and others like Robber also not getting a Name despite all the shit he manages to pull, and a Name becomes unlikely. EE doesn't hand those out like candy, especially not to characters already known.

Burlyraven

I acknowledged that. She's lacking that extra something (which is different for Above and Below), but with all of the wild success she has, some higher power is having fun.

Liliet

Named aren't inevitably about willpower. Sabah was born to hers, not a lot of willpower in a newborn baby. Willpower is a common component to stories, but not a necessary one.

That said, yeah I don't think Abigail's getting one.

mamm0nn

Please, we all know Sabah came out fo the womb with JoJo face, scaring her parent with her menacing aura. Plus, as both naturally born with some extra and a culture that would nigh certainly see her pray to Below, she actually had patrons where Abigail wouldn't make a champion for either side.

thearpox23

Sabah was Cursed, a Name driven to cause misery and destruction by a long-dead sorcerer. And pretty much every circumstance I can think of where the bestowal of a name isn't dependent on willpower of the receiver is some sort of a curse, (ahem Sleeping Princess,) or at most a 'blessing' of being the chosen one because of blood ties or something.

To me at least, mamm0nn's argument seems entirely valid.

Liliet

I mean no-one's saying Abigai's Name isn't going to be a curse equivalent?

thearpox23

Ah yes, The Reticent General, with aspects such as "Be misunderstood unless I am talking to Catherine," and a slight luck/providence bonus to not get sniped off a horse. I am sure that in a different story, perhaps with a more comedic bent and some fourth-wall breaking shenanigans that could be a thing. Unfortunately, we are reading this story, and a curse that can be broken by a resignation letter and a quiet discharge the moment there is a break in a campaign isn't a thing. (Because let's be honest, Catherine isn't going to execute Abigail if Abigail snaps. She'd want to keep everything hush hush to prevent riots and present this as an illness or a secret mission.)

I ask the same question again: What would a name change for Abigail. What would it help her accomplish?

Because she isn't gonna get a name that would make her a melee powerhouse, or one to make her sword shoot lasers into the sky. And she doesn't need a Name to command her troops, no more than other general. The only things left are her absurd luck and charisma, but she's been benefiting from them now for years because she fills a role and so is favored by providence, things which we have learned are often confused with but not dependent on being Named.

Crash

(:

Sir Nil

It's obvious she's going to be the new Fortunate Fool.

Sir Nil

Oh nvm someone already made that joke.

Eleron Pfoutz

Her First Aspect is DEFLECT, a passive aspect that makes her immune to being sniped if she's wearing a complete set of armor.

Liliet

A Name DOESN'T categorically change things about a person, actually. It amplifies what's already there, and for heroes, provides convenient tools for them to not fail at the story that should be theirs for embarrassing reasons (Hanno's lack of mount as a Knight, Tariq's complete inability to read people etc).

That said, I do agree Abigail isn't going to be Named. It's fun to speculate about specific factors that go into it though.

thearpox23

>I ask the same question again: What would a name change for Abigail.

>A Name DOESN'T categorically change things about a person

I wasn't referring to it changing her as a person, but what tools what it provide for her. Thief desperately needed a way to Stash her loot, both Tariq and Kairos to see the truth of people, and even Poisoner wanted excel in her craft.

By comparison, every advantage I can think of that Abigail would be handed from a name is something she's already got and have had for years. It'd be like Kairos receiving his name AFTER uniting the Free Cities and leading his army through the Whispering Woods.

Liliet

Do you mean why it would happen in-universe or why it would Erratic do it?

Because neither of those depend on "what advantage would it give the character" necessarily.

It's only about whether it will make a more interesting story. And, well, I think it's "no" to either, but it's still not about what Abigail gets out of it.

thearpox23

In-universe rules.

>Because neither of those depend on "what advantage would it give the character" necessarily.

I struggle to grasp what reasoning led you to believe this. Names exist to give people advantages. Aspects exist to give people advantages. When people don't need the advantages of a name, they don't get it. When they have a different source of power (hi WinterCat) they can also skimp on it.

Hell, it's pretty much explicitly stated that heroic Named generally have that shore up their weaknesses while villainous Named have ones that let them fulfill their ambitions.

Oh, and

>It's only about whether it will make a more interesting story.

Even if you weren't confusing the intent behind the creation of the system with the system itself, a power-up actually being relevant is something of a necessity for a power-up scene to make it into a good story.

Liliet

> Names exist to give people advantages. Aspects exist to give people advantages. When people don't need the advantages of a name, they don't get it.

...Especially Cursed?

Names don't exist for a purpose, except maybe entertaining Gods. They're a "why", not a "what for".

And yes, they GENERALLY help. That's a consequence, not a prerequisite.

You are absolutely correct about relevance being required, but "relevant" and "helpful" are not necessarily synonymous 😊
(why yes, I'm evil. All writers are, didn't you know?)

thearpox23

generally have ASPECTS that maybe next decade wordpress will allow me to edit my posts.

Liliet

we all dream

thearpox23

>> Names exist to give people advantages. Aspects exist to give people advantages. When people don't need the advantages of a name, they don't get it.
>...Especially Cursed?

Are you being pedantic on purpose? Because if I didn't know you any better I'd think you were trolling me.

Yes, exceptions exist. There are curses, ancient prophecies, gods, et cetera. In cases of a curse the advantage is given not to the receiver of the Name but to the giver of the curse, even if that 'advantage' is petty cruelty.

>Names don't exist for a purpose, except maybe entertaining Gods. They're a "why", not a "what for".

No, stories exist to entertain gods. Names exist to give mortals/some immortals a leg up, so that they don't get crushed, and can generate stories. They prop up when a community encounters something they can't handle by mundane means. Notice how Mercantis doesn't get (many?) villainous Named because mundane business cut-throaty is enough to get the job done. How Procer was noted to get by without Named for the most part even when grappling with Praes or Callow. How the drow don't have conventional Named because they are already so inundated with the Night that any advantages from a Name would just get overshadowed.

Ergo, if you can get by fine without a power boost, you're probably not gonna get it.

>And yes, they GENERALLY help. That's a consequence, not a prerequisite.

No, it is a prerequisite. The only question is WHOM they help.

>You are absolutely correct about relevance being required, but "relevant" and "helpful" are not necessarily synonymous

I know, and I made the word choice deliberately, something which would have had more of an effect if I want in the habit of skipping words and then being unable to edit.

Helpful is something that improves the chances of the designee. (+3 longsword to upgrade from my +2! Yay!) Relevant is something that doesn't get overshadowed by other advantages. (Catherine not immediately getting a name because anything common would get overshadowed by her position as the First Under The Night.)

>(why yes, I'm evil. All writers are, didn't you know?)

No, you are randomly pedantic, and are skilled at misinterpretation. The only writer I recognize as evil is Herman Melville. He promised me a book of sea adventures, and instead I got a wikia on early 19th century whaling. The famous confrontation between Captain Ahab and the Whale was just Melville getting bored because he ran out of things to catalog, and not wanting to spend any more effort on the narrative.

Liliet

> No, stories exist to entertain gods.
I'd say what entertains the Gods Above and Gods Below is opposite enough they would not set up for each other's fun. No, stories exist for a purpose they actually share – which is to say, settling the wager. They amplify the effects of mortals' actions and choices, making it easier to track whether Evil or Good is doing better at... whatever metric they use to measure all of this.

You can't just say the Name of Cursed is a grand exception. Hierarch wanted the exact opposite of his Name, too, and Dread Emp has been described as curse-like on many occasions, notably by the claimant theme song.

> In cases of a curse the advantage is given not to the receiver of the Name but to the giver of the curse, even if that 'advantage' is petty cruelty.

I'd say this is tortured logic. In that case, Abigail getting a Name that won't help her with anything is an advantage to Catherine who is always looking for more Named to join her cause and wanted to badass Abigail up in the first place. Dilemma resolved!

> Helpful is something that improves the chances of the designee.

Chances at what? Villains are notorious for not outliving average human lifespan despite being technically immortal in the ageless sense. All Below's Names function a little like curses, increasing the bearer's propensity for violence through a chain of Pavlovian incentives.

By "writers are evil" I was referencing the basic premise of "no good story without conflict", and the frequently-following conclusion that it means needing to throw your protagonist into ever more danger. And that IS how Names function – most heroes don't live to be elderly, and I've already talked about villains. Names are a monkey's paw, a double edged sword, and those who seek them out accept the tradeoff, but that doesn't mean their PURPOSE is helpfulness. I'd argued against the premise you offered at the very start because it rings wrong to me, but to the degree that it's true (which is certainly some) – yeah, Named are basically scapegoats/sacrifices.

(Writers are evil because they drink the tears of the audience, as is well known. Among writers, at least)

Insanenoodlyguy

Robber was Named when we met him. His Name is Robber.

Liliet

We have WoG that is not the case.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

On a serious level I respect that, but I still like my absurd theory (which I may or may not have shared in the past) that all goblins are Named and the reason they age is that they're secretly all heroes rather than villains. Also I think Robber should be the next Dread Emperor, which of course was never a thing that could happen.

Liliet

Ooooooh. I like that one too, with the "all heroes" addition it crosses the line into VERY HIGH-QUALITY actually.

Crash

Honestly the only name that makes sense for her is Fortunate Fool or whatever that weird dude in the Vales campaign name was.

But no, our girl is 100% normal human and absolutely unwilling, the magnificent character that she is.

Honestly she's a lot like the non-bender characters in Avatar, and that's great.

Liliet

Sokka was a Named non-bender :thinkyface:

Crash

I don't think he'd be, to be honest. Someone like Ty Lee sure, but Sokka is about a 1:1 on Abigail on buffoonery made heroic/competent.

He did have dreams of grandeur though

Abrakadabra

The fearful charger, or The reluctant achiever or something that can convey that she somehow fails to fail. Unintentional Victor.

Liliet

I mean... he's one of the main characters? Sokka 100% had a Role in the events, come on.

Crash

I don't know, man. I just like the idea of people having Roles but not Names.

Call me a contrarian, but I like it when ordinary folk are competent as fuck and completely mundane in a world where a random extremely powerful thing exists (Names, bending, etc).

Liliet

Yeah, that's what the Badass Normal trope is about.

Unfortunately, since Guide's Name system is meta, it gives out power proportional to narrative importance + badassery. All tropes are Roles, and Badass Normal is no exception.

I feel you, I really feel you. Sokka just isn't it. You want unnamed engineers who made cool shit in the Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom, maybe?

(Having a significant Role and no Name is a situation that comes from there being no folk hero cultural archetype corresponding to what you're doing. Sokka is in no way NOT a folk hero)

Liliet

The Bumbling role type, and the fact that there are roles for the non-Gifted, come together to show that Sokka is very much an example of a Named. He's Badass Normal – and sure, his setting is geared further towards that being an exception than Guideverse, but he's absolutely a typical Named. He's part of a Band of Five for fuck's sake – it might not have been exactly five people, but the number being that precise is a guideverse gimmick anyway, the Gaang is exactly that trope at its core.

Crash

Yeh, I see your point haha.

I was kinda trying to shoehorn him into a Vivienne type situation, where she is a part of the band but also mundane. (Though she was Named in the past.)

I'm using Sokka as a substitute for Abigail in this and I really, really don't want her to be Named so I went with Sokka being un-Named as well, even though he is actually very much a great fit for it.

Liliet

Guide's meta-ness really messes with readers' instincts on this, doesn't it? In another setting Amadeus would have been a Sokka-type Badass Normal...

Liliet

(Abigail is different because she is a SIDE CHARACTER)

WuseMajor

She needs to meet the Grizzled Veteran and go out for drinks together.

Miles

What she lacks is a desire for power. Regardless of which side, they both always pick someone who wants the power. Abigail always just wants to leave and let someone else handle it.

Liliet

> Regardless of which side, they both always pick someone who wants the power.

Newborn baby Sabah.

Frivolous

Poor Abigail. Slippery eel, Archer thinks of her, which is astonishing given how Indrani is Named and not one to compliment much. Abigail the Fox, Razin Tanja calls her, which is also astonishing given he's a Lord of the Dominion and she's a Callowan commoner. I'm amazed he's giving her a complimentary epithet like that.

She's famous no matter what, and that's a really bad thing if you want a quiet life. The possibility of her gaining a Name increases, I think.

Also, Cedric remains a complete jerk. His only virtue seems to be that his jerkiness is merely social, not physical much, and that will end once he gets even a smidgeon of authority.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure "slippery eel" is high key NOT meant as a compliment, and Indrani is actually one of the people who sees exactly how much of a coward she is (and unlike Cat, doesn't have absolute certainty that she'll stay loyal and do her job regardless).

Frivolous

I don't think Indrani could have possibly lost the Third Army, of which Abigail is the very visible General, since she's the one on the horse.

I think Abi somehow just managed to sidle away from Indrani when Indrani was distracted. Yes, while Abi was on a horse and Indrani being Archer, with the enhanced senses Named have. Which is a bit scary, really.

Abi wasn't a slippery eel because she slipped away from the battle. She just didn't want to be near Archer, because Archer scares her.

Liliet

I mean Indrani evaluates Abigail's entire personality as "slippery eel" regardless of context. That's the feeling I got.

ruduen

Well, Abigail's overall plan seems to be working. I know my morale's been improved.

Frivolous

I wonder which villain had been killed by the White Knight Revenant. It doesn't have to be one of the attendees at the hill meeting, right? That was a while ago and far away.

I do hope the deceased is not one of the more interesting and engaging villains. I'm okay with Headhunter or Red Knight or Summoner dying. I'd prefer that Beastmaster and Barrow Sword and Harrowed Witch live at least a little longer.

hakureireimu

I think all the Villains in both armies were in that meeting. We just don't know who went with whom yet.

Adrian_V

Just don't let be Barrow Sword, i like him xD

Maybe Headhunter or the one that tastes souls?

hakureireimu

It can't be Barrow Sword, since he went with Hanno.

AceOfSpade

I don't think the Rapacious Troubadour is much of a frontline combattant. If I had to hazard a guess I'd say the most likely victim is the hulk-style villain... I think she was called the Berserker?

Dexapocalypse

I dunno, circumstance can force a name on someone so Abigail could get something like The Unwilling General – a leader by necessity and skill rather than ambition or desire, analogues would be the farm boy who ends up leading an army, the retired campaigner brought out to lead a revolution, or in this case the assistant left alive and forced to take on the leading role

Thanatoss

Great chapter as always!

Which villain died damn, I hope noone fun. I bet on Berserker, she was that kind of stupid.

Also this Revenant White Knight, I can see it being big stepping stone for Cat, however no idea if it will be big grand duel or she will somehow trick him and "casually" slay him, both of this results would propagate her "undefeated" legend. Hmmm interesting

Frivolous

Noticed just now that Abigail is referred to as a fox by not just Razin but also Beatrice.

That kind of acclaim tends to lead to a Name. Look at how Akua became Diabolist by repeatedly using devils and demons, and letting others know about it. What Akua did deliberately may be happening to Abigail by accident.

LarsBlitzer

Not as "accidentally" as it may appear. Cat's been quick to recognize Abigail's talents if nothing else and has been "rewarding" her appropriately: with greater authority and opportunities to test them in the field. I'm not nearly so sure she'll get a Name as easily as we seem to think. None of the other Legion generals or marshals have them. It would have to be something spectacularly amazing, foolhardy, or heroic/villainous to get the attention of Above or Below. This is the right time for it though.

Oshi

Akua already had a name and shaped the story. This is more mundane. Names need more than acclaim. Every named no matter the person behind it has one thing in common. They seek to shape the world. Abigail does not.

Frivolous

I think I disagree about the seeking to shape the world part.

Augur didn't. Adjutant didn't. Grizzled Fantassin didn't. Poisoner didn't. I seriously doubt Concocter wanted to shape the world, either.

I think it's enough that a person be exceptionally good at her Role, that the Role be important somehow, and that she be well known for it. Even the well known part might be negotiable; Agnes Hasenbach was a wallflower before and after she became Augur.

Velrix

Adjutant want to give a better place to Orcs in creation. He's the founder of a chess game where you steel bricks to build your tower. And said that he isn't a player but a follower because Cat's the best bet to see the world that he want.

If Catherine die, he will become the Warlord.

thearpox23

Both Poisoner and the Grizzled Fantassin were local names with little reason to act internationally before the war with the Dead King. "Shaping the world" in their case concerned their own little corner that they were very passionate about.

Abigail, for her part, doesn't have any ambition or her main point of interest seems to be her retirement fund. Even if you were to grant her a name, I struggle to think of one that would fit her, any aspects she would actually find useful. Everything she does she already accomplishes fine without a name, with no aspiration waiting to be kindled by a pivot.

Myatt

Isn't it obvious though she's gonna be the dauntless general

Halinn

The Reticent General, while she's desperately hoping to change it to the Retired General

Liliet

> Both Poisoner and the Grizzled Fantassin were local names with little reason to act internationally before the war with the Dead King. "Shaping the world" in their case concerned their own little corner that they were very passionate about.

Newborn baby Sabah.

AbraKadabra

What about something that would Tell the tale of the general WHO wants nothing more, Than retire, retreat, but instead continually advance Both in battle and the ranks? The unwilling advancer. 😊

Liliet

That's what we're getting, and it's fun for us, but it's not an in-universe meme.

Liliet

> Every named no matter the person behind it has one thing in common. They seek to shape the world.

Ah yes, especially Berserker, Concocter, and my favorite counterexample to any "all Named" claim, newborn baby Sabah.

Names need a story. They need a story that's well-known and considered a thing as such, and that is actually true about the person. It doesn't necessarily need to be known that it's true about the person – no-one but Vivienne knew she was the thief when she got the Name for it, and she didn't realize she was about to become Named either. It just has to match up, pattern match.

Is there a culturally significant story on Calernia about a hypercompetent coward becoming known as a brave soldier despite their efforts otherwise? I don't get that impression, because 1) more people would have caught on to what Abigail's like by now, 2) Cat would have commented on it.

That said, it's possible Abigail can match some kind of "shrewd war leader who can weasel themselves and their army out of any kind of shit through trickery and risky moves” story out there with her cowardice being irrelevant to it – and she genuinely is cunning. The “Fox” moniker is a good point, as it is a good match there.

Either-or. I lean towards “not”, but it’s not impossible.

Javvies

IIRC there’s past precedent for that kind of Name being viable in the pre-Imperial Taghreb Names. And I think at least one of those Names involved “Fox”.

More recently? We haven’t seen or heard of any such Name, but I wouldn’t be surprised if there were such Names. Although, to be fair, there might well be cultural variations that support or degrade the chances of such a Name arising.

Cat might or might not be arranging things to improve Abigail’s chances of getting a Name ... but either way, I’m pretty sure Cat sees that Abigail gets results, even when things go badly, and a story could be being built around that, and, if nothing else, it’s a theme that is worth encouraging and supporting.

Liliet

Yeah.

I just feel like there’s not just quantitative but also qualitative aspect to getting Names – there can be different degrees of matching the pattern, and there can be different degrees to the weight of the story. If the weight of the story is high but your pattern is not very well-matched you might still get the Name; if the weight is low but your pattern fits one to one you might still get the Name; but if the weight is low AND your pattern fits only vaguely? You’re not getting it.

(I figure it’s multiplicative, not additive – you can’t skirt by on just one if the other just THAT low, they both have to be at least mediocre)

Javvies

True, though the “clever general/war-leader/battlefield commander that pulls success from the jaws of defeat” is a relatively broad concept, and is relatively culture neutral.

So while Abigail may be less directly aligned with any one specific cultural Name, it’s likely that the combination of a lot of people from multiple cultures seeing her as roughly aligned with their clever warleader concept is something that can add up and compensate for the lack of an exact match. And/or contribute to the development of a new, less culturally specific Name aligned with the concept. Especially if Cat is encouraging it, either for the purpose of encouraging Abigail to get a Name, or just because it's a good theme for a general to have and for the troops to believe in.

Liliet

> clever general/war-leader/battlefield commander that pulls success from the jaws of defeat" is a relatively broad concept

Ah, but that's the problem: being non-specific means it gets less concentrated story weight that'd birth a Name.

Crash

Which is interesting because Cat matches Bardic Names on that "they're harder to kill than cockroaches and have an understanding of the way Creation works Archmages can barely grasp at" but it still doesn't feel quite right with her "justifications matter only to the just" and standing in judgement over creation, fighting for her peace.

Liliet

Cat is a DnD bard, I've been standing on that position for a while. Performance (Stage magic).

(Amadeus's is Performance (Oratory))

Liliet

* not just qualitative but also quantitative. Why are these opposite words so similar

JoshuaS

I agree. It's like everyone's just straight forgotten that we've literally seen a hero whose entire shtick was being a lucky idiot: the Bumbling Conjuror. Not too much of a leap to have a lucky coward as a story concept. (Tbf, it was an easy character to forget).

Hell it's the kind of post modern, ironic trope that the world seems heading towards, what with the Tyrant "killing an age" and all that. She'd fit right in from my metatextual understanding.

But I don't think it's likely either, if for a different reason that she doesn't really have an character arc. She's the same character now as she was in the beginning, character wise. So if she is going to get a name based on that personality, she would have already gotten it at this point.

So not really all that likely barring some major character motivation shift, in which case would she still be the fun character who only cares about survival then? And if not, then what is the point of her specifically getting a name?

Crash

It's like everyone just straight up forgot you can say NO TO A GODDAMN NAME.

I would love to know what the fuck y'all are reading when Abigail is literally going off about how much she hates the very concept of being necessary for anything important at all, ever, in her life.

Which part of that sounds like someone who wants to be Named? In the middle of a war were they're very Important and with the Accords looming over the corner no less.

If she has a Story to fit into or not, that doesn't even matter. She would never make the Choice. A Name isn't exactly something that can be forced on someone, outside of very specific scenarios like being literally born Cursed. I don't see how Cowardly General or whatever would fit that.

JoshuaS

In the extremely unlikely chance it does happen, EE will probably just pull a bait and switch, kinda like with the standard bearing in this chapter.

Like a "I'm about to die, I need this name to survive, oh wait shit I wasn't actually in danger and now I'm stuck being an important character" thing. lame and predictable, but explicable.

Liliet

One can absolutely be forced into a Name.

A Name does not depend on the person's One Big Choice To Have It, that's not a thing. A Name depends on a sequence of a person's choices on how they act in a particular situation, and if that sequence matches the Role (or if other people's actions match the Role, with the Hierarchy), bam, you're it, no additional question on top asked.

Vivienne didn't realize she was Named until way into it. Tariq was actively against being Named but changing it would require no longer doing the thing that was making him be Named (listening to angels and going where he was needed to help people) and he wasn't willing to do that.

Cordelia would not have been given a chance to say no to her Name if Agnes hadn't fought the Bard for control of the story to give her the convenient pivot where 1) she had time to notice what was going on, 2) saying no didn't mean her death or the death of her entire country or anything else she wouldn't have been willing to trade.

Crash

I understand this, and probably should've worded my comment better it's just that this literally does not apply to Abigail. At all.

Cat is directing her in a sort of hands off way towards climbing up the ranks but this is mostly due to Abigail's own skills and not in the very pointed way in which Kairos guided and strong armed both Anaxares and the other rulers of the Free Cities into electing him.

There's no pre-made role to be filled here, Cat isn't wink wink nudge nudge Abigail into some kind of Role. She's trying to get a Callowan, a talented one, to a position of power on the Army of Callow. If this, later on becomes the groove for a Name? I'd find that very believable. But it's not the point of it right now.

I see your point about how, if given the opportunity for a Name, she might not be able to refuse and I raise you the following:

I do not believe there will be an opportunity at all, because there is no one shoving her up into a Role, currently, and she doesn't have a vested interest in forcing one onto existence.

One might argue for something that just happens due to enough repetition, i.e. Grizzled Fantassin, but if so, she's not quite there yet either.

Let the non-bender character be awesome on her own.

Abrakadabra

I think there is a case that a general is generally seen as incompetent but quite good, the only one WHO defeated theodosius the unconquered. I dont remember the exact name, something the Mad?

Liliet

Isabella the Mad?

You didn't finish the sentence though.

(If you're comparing her to Abigail, I'll note that Abigail's entire thing is that she is actually exceedingly competent. Her luck is in surviving stuff outside of her control and in catching Catherine's eye in doing so, the rest is just her complaining)

Mental Mouse

I will note that Abigail is not in fact cowardly. She's often afraid, but quite reasonably so given the dangers she's facing.

Bravery is not about never feeling afraid – it's about feeling afraid, and going ahead anyway. And that is exactly what Abigail does. In this very chapter, she's all "damn, that gonna be dangerous, but it looks like not doing it will be worse". That's not cowardice, that's thinking under pressure!

Liliet

YUP.

Abigail is a paladin, immune to fear effects. No-one appears to have ever told her that people sometimes panic, she seems unfamiliar with the concept.

An absolutely delightful character in every single way ♥ ♥
♥

mamm0nn

Akua was also one of the foremost experts on the subject aided by centuries of collected contracts and names, and she had a transitional Name. Her being involved with devils and demons helped a bit but was hardly a deciding factor.

Don't assume that people get a Name just because they get a bit of help from fate or are awesome, Robber would've been Named if that were the case. Abigail is already doing what she does without a Name so it's unlikely for Below to grant her one while Above is unlikely to grant one to the Black Queen's get when she's both a mirroring of Cat and unlikely to rebel against her to seize Callow back. The soldiers wouldn't even follow her, either.

Liliet

Akua being involved with demons and devils and known for being such WAS the deciding factor according to her – at the very least, it was fuel to the fire and last straw on the camel.

That said, Names aren't an exact science, and it's more lots of factors piling in until the pile's high enough than strict requirements.

That said, Above and Below don't personally pick who gets Names based on deep strategic plans, Providence is blind and automatic. Names go to whoever's pile's high enough, and the criteria for what constitutes high enough come from the culture they're in, not directly from the Gods.

mamm0nn

A certain swordsman who's preferably all alone disagrees with the idea that all Names are automatically granted by a non-sentient Providence. In fact we haven't seen much proof of Providence having much pull in granting Names at all. Perhaps in enabling those with a claim or opportunity to survive or get it more dramatically, but nothing like what you suggest. And considering there's multiple accounts and versions in-story that actively contradict this claim, I have to completely disregard this theory of yours.

It's been all but explicitly stated by herself, though indeed that may not be an absolute truth, that the Wandering Bard is at least indirectly responsible for picking and shaping Named. Only certain exceptional cases like the Hierarch come into being without her say-so, though it's unknown how much her "You're not one of mine." comment suggests that she is at least partly responsible for creating or endorsing all other Named. She has suggested a bit of that at other times including her conversation with imprisoned Black too. Thus the idea that Names are granted by Providence or automatically is folly.

But even if that wouldn't be the case, what you're saying about piles is not something I've read even remotely suggested in the story itself. We have heard from various Name-experts including Pilgrim, Cat and the sisters that Above and Below are actively plotting and intervening with the other getting an equal reaction when they do, and that has never been said to not apply to making Named.

In fact, Black has been stated to be one of the foremost experts in Named lore of this century, so when he had a conversation with Malicia about the Wandering Bard perhaps being Above's counter-Name to Triumphant, that means that at least as far as highly influential and intelligent practitioners and historians of a wealthy nation are concerned, the Gods are in fact responsible for making and choosing Named and likely with active scheming and consideration granting Names to more than 'the one with the biggest pile'.

Moodprint

How do we explain neutral named then? Do we have neutral gods?

Javvies

"Neutral" Names are really just Names that aren't exclusive to one side.

They are Names that can be empowered by Above or by Below, depending on the particular iteration of that Name and the person who has it at any given time.

Transitional Names are very often such Names.

"Thief", "Ranger", "Archer", "Hunter", "Squire", "Apprentice", e.t.c.

As opposed to "White Knight", "Black Knight", e.t.c.

Plus, I'm pretty sure it's a term that originated with the fanbase, not something that was used in the story.

mamm0nn

There might be. If the Choir of Contrition can just grant a Name, then it's likely other lesser gods are equally capable of it. The sisters, the Dead King and Arcadia are probably able of it too, though of course not creating the tier of Named of Cat's (opposition and allies) rank at, that's only for the big ones Above and Below. There probably are also neutral lesser gods.

That said, I'm not saying that the Gods are solely and directly responsible for granting Names with intelligent intent. I was contradicting Liliet's claim that Named are always granted by Providence in an automatic and non-intelligent system that 'can easily be gamed'. There are going to be a few that come to be by grooves or acts, but that's not the only way or even norm.

Liliet

Being chosen by particular entities – like Choirs – grants you a Name through narrative mechanics, because that’s a significant Role. It can also work with regular mortals – election as a Hierarch grants it as a Name, through the same mechanic. If being chosen for something already constitutes a strong start of a story, then it gets you a Role, and a strong enough Role generates a Name automatically. It doesn’t mean that whoever’s doing the choosing has admin privileges, it means they found the right button to press on the vending machine.

(Like Black with Cat)

Liliet

(or, not “found” the right button to press but “were given” as is likely the case with Choirs. I’m going to stop nitpicking my metaphor now)

Liliet

“Providence” is just a word for narrative force. The thing that made sure Black bumped into Cat in that valley, the thing that powers Aspects, the thing that let Cat snatch a resurrection from the Choir of Contrition, the thing that forbade Praes from digging its way out of the hole they found themselves in.

It’s also the thing that automatically “balances the scales” whenever one side (either one!) gets an advantage. That’s what “counter-Names” are about: they’re generated automatically, not in some sort of chess game.

The one time Kairos gave as a chess metaphor, it was about how Gods cannot actually control what happens on the board. And if they could bestow Names selectively, they as good as could: just pick the guy who will only do what you want him to do, what control issues?

Yes, characters keep talking AS IF Above and Below intercede directly. Pilgrim also talks as if he knows exactly how afterlife works, even though we have specific WoG that no-one actually knows that and it’s all faith/speculation.

Hanno specifically pointed out that Above never actually communicates with their church. To the point that there’s been a fucking war before our own eyes on the page where both sides had priests capable of doing miracles. Like, fucking what? If the Gods don’t even do that much, what do they ever do?

(The answer we have is "direct the Bard to do things". That's the one lever they are stated to have and use, and they are stated to have and use it to counteract the unpredictability of the rest of the mechanics.)

The one time a resident expert was convinced was the Gods' direct intervention on-page – Thalassina – again has WoG explicitly stating that's not exactly the case.

The Wandering Bard can pick and shape Named, and frequently does. So can any other character – Black did it with Cat, Kairos did it with Anaxares. People's stories can be influenced and directed if you have the leverage for it, and Bard has made it her thing to make sure she has a finger in every pie. That's not an inherent thing to the mechanics, it's just what they allow for.

There are specific mechanistically known ways to get a Name. For them to work you don't need to know what the Gods are plotting, and never once in the history we know of did Gods go "okay yeah this claimant to Dread Emperor won the war but they're not who we want so they don't get the Name, this other claimant over there does". Warlock, Dread Emperor, Black Knight, Chancellor. Dread Emps APPOINT Chancellors for fuck's sake.

Oh, and we have WoG that the reason the Name Grey Knight does not exist on Calernia is the lack of cultural impetus for it. Not the Gods not wanting it to, but the MECHANISTIC SYSTEM not having the prerequisites.

mamm0nn

Yet nothing of this properly supports your claim that Named are automatically generated by Providence, generated without any intelligent design to it at all, or that the one most likely would get the Name. You're making a claim but I see nothing that makes it stick.

Providence is not 'balancing the scales'. The Gods Above and Below can exert a lot of influence but then the other get a similar reaction of equal power. Very explicitly Good and Evil of the divine kind, not Providence or balance.

We've been told this many times including by the Sisters after ascension, so even if we just go with your "Oh those people don't know what they're talking about." on my previous argument which is honestly not a strong counter, then in this case absolute nope that the Sisters too would be ill-informed. Providence is not evening the scales, the Gods Above and Below have been stated very explicitly to invest power and intent themselves.

And you're seeing what you want to see in Kairos's words. That can go both ways, here's his chess analogy to support my claim just as strongly and with just as much assumption as yours: What he said is that free will and people's petty desires are troublesome for the Gods to understand, predict and work with. It needs someone who gets them to use them. Ergo, he directly contradicts your point that something automatic like Providence would be a solution to this.

With the Wandering Bard, we've seen her directly speak for the gods and complain to the gods for not letting her finally die when Hierophant killed her. The latter they may not have been listening or caring, but what we've been shown makes a strong case that she was made by the Gods rather than Providence.

Plus, she's a bard. Where Book 1 Cat may have thought they were cute but weak because they only know stories, it's probably their Role to know and influence stories. She's not just the Intercessor, it's likely part of her Name and Role to have more power and influence over Stories than others of martial or magical roots.

That needs not be Providence, though. You are making a presumption that the Named power pools and powers are the same as Providence. That this would be one big pool that isn't the Gods as its centre. That following the groove of the Knight choosing a Squire or a Hierarch being elected by all Free Cities willingly, just means that Providence did a thing and granting power and weight to the biggest pile. As if those could be repeated or followed textbook. No, grooves make the trick more rigidly exploitable, but not absolute.

Yes, there are some grooves so deep that they become pretty absolute. That's not at all a point in your favour or contradicting mine, as it perfectly follows Below's mantra: Might makes Right. No Dread Emperor was ever a push-over, they got their Right by Might. Or they got replaced quickly by someone who was worthy. And that the Councillor was always Named even when they only kept office for a few months is an assumption, not an established fact. It's quite possible that assigning someone incapable and spineless would yield just a councillor. The Gods' philosophy supports the Tower's Named, and there are no equivalents on the Good side of just earning a Name by having a position.

Meanwhile the orcs are a great counter-argument. If we're talking about the biggest pile like you said, or that it's just Providence so there has to be some kind of control to be gamed by for example having an entire steppe of orcs to make new stories and legends or still believe in THE Warlord, then there should've been orc Named. But when we're adding the Gods Below choosing the Named and the orcs being a cowed and beaten race not having the Might to give them Right, then no orcs reappearing until they're independent and proud and worthy of a Named is supported.

Now let's take a look at your argument which you're not supporting: That counter-Named just pop up as a guarantee and that Named are therefore created by Providence.

Have we seen or heard it explicitly stated that this happens? No. Is there any proof that it is Providence rather than the Gods that do this? No. Have we seen cases that are actively the opposite? Yes.

Where's the equal reaction Named against the Dead King in his lore? By your argument his careful plans should've still yielded Names to counter him when it was explicitly stated that he craftily avoided this.

What Named would Cordelia's ascension be a reaction to in the moment she came to be? Oh wait, there were none in Salia and there are already better counter-balances in place against DK while we saw no repeat attempt in the last five years if another leader Named was deemed necessary to balance the scales.

Was the plague that birthed Pilgrim a Damned?

Are there tons of anti-dwarves Named popping up to counter the dwarven Named, unchallenged superiority and secrecy of their civilisation?

Did a new equally powerful Hero show up to stop Winter Cat, or very powerful Villains to deal with Saint and Pilgrim a decade past?

Liliet

> Yet nothing of this properly supports your claim that Named are automatically generated by Providence, generated without any intelligent design to it at all, or that the one most likely would get the Name. You're making a claim but I see nothing that makes it stick.

...The fact it's abusable by Kairos?

Liliet

(Also Kairos's claim that Gods cannot control the board is weak evidence, as I described above)

(Also the fact that Catherine and Amadeus are villainous Named is imho weak evidence, but that's a different question entirely)

Liliet

Also the fact gaining certain Names by killing the previous holder reliably works in Praes???

Also the fact we have WoG that a particular Name cannot come into being because there isn't a cultural impetus for it???

This is making my head hurt. How are these not strong evidence?

mamm0nn

Because you're going around not saying it's your opinion. You pretty directly reacted to several comments with 'You are wrong, I am right there is no argument about me being correct in this.' only for you to then not have strong closers. Nothing you gave as an argument is a case closer nor did you manage to prop up your argument or debase mine with anything but adjacent and only possibly related instances and precedents. Nothing sticks.

Remember, because you are going around telling others that your argument isn't an opinion but fact, YOU need to make a very strong case. This is not an equal playing ground, unless you rephrase your initial comment to reflect it's an opinion, you need to come with a lot more than what you've got now. I mean, you even made it a song as if the other is stupid for not understanding this 'fact' meaning you don't act as if it's an opinion you hold.

None of the WoG are on this topic specifically, and all your precedents are open to interpretation. Right now, you are peddling an opinion but chastising others as if you are proclaiming an in-universe established fact.

Liliet

Can you remind me again what is NOT the in-universe established fact? That people can gain Names deliberately and reliably by following a particular strategy they can either carft themselves or copy from others? That people can give OTHER PEOPLE Names by this method?

Or are you disagreeing that it follows from the above that the Gods do not deliberately pick each Name individually?

It's just that, I really do consider my case entirely closed and proven. I'm having trouble understanding what, exactly, is the part you disagree with.

Liliet

> Providence is not 'balancing the scales'. The Gods Above and Below can exert a lot of influence but then the other get a similar reaction of equal power. Very explicitly Good and Evil of the divine kind, not Providence or balance.

We've been told this many times including by the Sisters after ascension, so even if we just go with your "Oh those people don't know what they're talking about." on my previous argument which is honestly not a strong counter, then in this case absolute nope that the Sisters too would be ill-informed. Providence is not evening the scales, the Gods Above and Below have been stated very explicitly to invest power and intent themselves.

WoG that even the flashy intervention at Thalassina was not what everyone in-universe thought it was?

Why would the Sisters be any more better informed? We've seen them rise to their current station from mortals. It did not involve, uh, insights.

> Meanwhile the orcs are a great counter-argument. If we're talking about the biggest pile like you said, or that it's just Providence so there has to be some kind of control to be gamed by for example having an entire steppe of orcs to make new stories and legends or still believe in THE Warlord, then there should've been orc Named.

No, actually, orcs are an illustration of how it works mechanistically. No orcs managed to actually be important enough to step into the shoes of any story that the whole orchood, let alone people outside of the Steppes, would have cared about.

> That counter-Named just pop up as a guarantee and that Named are therefore created by Providence.

No, they sometimes pop up when that's what the story is. Not literally every single time, I never claimed that.

mamm0nn

It has quite literally and directly been stated that the Sisters now have an understanding beyond mortals that Cat cannot hope to learn or match, and that they grant her this understanding during her miracle-weaving. This is not an opinion but hard stated by EE that the Sisters are now of understandings and insights beyond mortals. See several chapters of the beginning of Book 4 in Iserre.

For the rest, you are peddling your opinion as if it's fact. There's no point to that. See my other comment, either rephrase your initial comments or realise that others don't consider your opinion a fact just because you do.

Liliet

"Understanding beyond mortals" and "understanding of the Gods Above and Below" are not, uh, necessary synonyms. "Not mortals" encompasses a wide reference class consisting of lesser deities, of which the Sisters are one, Neshamah is another, that orc god Sabah killed that one time is one, the Deoraithe gestalt is one as well.

There is a difference between atmospheric flight and space flight.

And nothing about "maybe hypothetically the Sisters might know things" is a strong enough argument to stand against the evidence of Names working via locally predictable and mechanistic patterns?

Liliet

...sorry for the multi-reply, but I'm thinking:

Are you postulating that the Gods Below determine directly which candidate wins among Black Knight / Warlock / Dread Emperor claimants? How would you describe the process for these particular Names, in your view?

mamm0nn

They don't. Why would they care which ant wins, the one that stabs the others the best earns the Name. As by their creed; Might makes Right.

Liliet

So, uh. You're agreeing with me.

Liliet

Also: no, Providence is not a “solution” to the problem of free will. It’s actually an extension of the problem, willingly made by the Gods to be such: it amplifies free will’s effects if anything, making people’s thoughts and desires matter a lot more than they would in a non-narrative-driven world.

> You are making a presumption that the Named power pools and powers are the same as Providence. That this would be one big pool that isn’t the Gods as its centre. That following the groove of the Knight choosing a Squire or a Hierarch being elected by all Free Cities willingly, just means that Providence did a thing and granting power and weight to the biggest pile. As if those could be repeated or followed textbook.

Yes, I’m making that presumption. One source of this is Akua’s explanation of Catherine’s trick at Liesse: “It’s not the Names that matter. It’s the Roles”. That’s actually the biggest exposition/speculation dump on how Roles and Names work that we have, and a recent Q&A had EE straight up tell the readers to refer to it for what Roles are.

Here: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/04/19/villainous-interlude-chiaroscuro/>

In that interlude, Akua talks about Cat’s narrative-based trick at Liesse, which was Cat using the fact that the system is mechanistic and predictable to get a result the Gods would presumably not have intended – getting a resurrection as a villain, and ties it with her own effort to get the Name she wanted, Diabolist, as working on the same basis. The mechanistic, predictable basis, that can be analyzed as people doing things wrong or right, which she does right there and then for the Empire’s current rulers. Her analysis is missing a lot of factual points, but the basis of it? Again, EE has pointed to it as reference material for theorists instead of answering questions in the Q&A because it’s all there.

(Without WoG in play, we the audience can still infer Akua got the basic mechanics right because she DID get the Name she was aiming for by the method she was using)

(And yes, it could be repeated or followed textbook. We’ve had PLENTY of people use that textbook, and when they criticize each other, it’s for using the textbook wrong, not for thinking there was a textbook at all. When the Pilgrim was considering the effects of Cat's surrender on his Aspect at the Princes' Graveyard, divine will did not enter his thoughts – he asked the angels on how things would work and what's the right thing to do, but never once did he think "oh Gods will reach in and make sure everything works according to their will". He needed to use the textbook, and the textbook was not getting overruled by divine entities not matter how much he wanted it to)

mamm0nn

Except Akua is a transitional Name who's literally bound to either get a better Name or die trying. Not the same as saying that Providence gives all Names to normies, or even that Providence is related to this instance.

And with the Pilgrim, in the end it's still a matter of many overlapping rules, chaos, free will and the gods Below countering the influence of the gods Above if they feel like it. Saying that it all comes down to a textbook system as you suggest it isn't what they say in the chapter you linked. That's just your interpretation of it.

Liliet

No, they don't say it, they just present the textbook. Show, don't tell?

Abrakadabra

And what if, the Dead King stops pulling his punches, and becomes an even bigger threat? If that were to happen, it reasonably can be expected, that a whole smattering of names áill crop up, to balance the scale, I think.

Frivolous

re: Robber not having a Name: Species is a factor.

It's possible that the Good and Evil for some reason don't want to extend Names to goblins, just as they didn't to orcs for a long time, until Hakram met Cat.

In contrast, Abigail is human, a species often Bestowed.

I do concur that Abigail is unlikely to get a Name if her Role is viewed as being too similar to that of Cat. But I'm not sure she and Cat have that much in common, really. Both are Callowan female humans. Abigail is considered ruthless and canny and foxy and a great general. Cat is viewed differently. She's a terrifying monster queen with magic. Also Abi is scared of Cat.

In Praesi terms, Abi is more like the Black Knight to Cat's Dread Empress.

Liliet

> It's possible that the Good and Evil for some reason don't want to extend Names to goblins

Doesn't work that way~

Gods don't personally pick~

The process is mechanistic and hackable~

It's also culture dependent and we know fuckall about goblin culture but Black hypothesized they had secret Names.

(Sorry for the song. I'm, uh... composing one for this very common and very obviously mis- conception)

mamm0nn

This right here. This comment is why YOU need to put stronger arguments than the ones you've been given when you're going around telling people the 'facts' when what you really have are your opinions. Nothing you've said would be considered hard evidence by a neutral third party, just your take on it.

Liliet

What exactly constitutes "hard evidence" in your book?

mamm0nn

They both have a loyal orc lieutenant, they are both considered cunning and talented by everyone else while continuously considering themselves cornered and outclassed, and when we saw Abigail from a different perspective she came off as crass and confident. I mean, the only sentence I've heard her say that wasn't from her perspective or her talking to Cat was:

"Double wages for whomever puts an arrow in the shiny fucker!"

-Abigail the Fox during the Battle of the Camps.

beleester

Abigail is getting more than “a bit of help” from fate. Sure, she’s got some real tactical skills, but it’s been sheer luck that she’s been the only person available to take command on three separate occasions, not to mention that bit where she requested a bunch of knights (not expecting the request to be granted) and then they turned out to be exactly what she needed.

Liliet

I don’t think that requires “help from fate”. Statistically it’s very improbable for any one person, but with the sheer number of people – the entire army – it was actually perfectly plausible for it to happen to one person. And the fact it’s the person we’ve been following the PoV of is in no way, shape or form a coincidence any more than the fact we get PoVs from all the other plot important characters too. PoVs aren’t chosen by a lottery.

Abigail genuinely just HAPPENS TO BE the person who got rapidly field-promoted to the top end, through being competent when she had the opportunity.

Granted, there’s the part where two of her promotions were through events large enough to have Cat’s personal attention, which is less probable, but it’s still way short of implausible. Abigail was with the Third Army in position to take command BECAUSE of the first occurrence, and Cat remembered who she was for the same reason.

Mental Mouse

Probability plays second-fiddle in a world where narrative has actual power.

Liliet

Yeah, but that doesn’t mean there’s no merit to measuring how big an impact narrative actually had as opposed to a hypothetical where the situation developed by our world’s rules.

onedollargum

Abigail continues to fall upwards.

Cicero

Swamp Fox, Swamp Fox, tail on her hat
Nobody knows where the Swamp Fox ‘s at Swamp Fox, Swamp Fox, hiding in the glen
She runs away to fight again

Didn't Callow actually have a Name in the past that had something to do with a fox?

Liliet

Just a nickname for one of their Kings, Alistair the Fox.
Nicknames are proto-Names though.

Not sure Abigail will get one, that said.

LarsBlitzer

A nickname with a folk song, a local legend, and a Story that the Intercessor was trying to guide Cat towards so she'd be more predictable. That says a potential Name to me.

Liliet

Just because it also gets the label after an animal, doesn't mean it's remotely close to the same story.

nimelennar

Abigail: Whoever is carrying the standard is "some poor bastard."

Abigail, thirty seconds later: Hey, I know! I'll carry the standard myself!

Abigail, ten seconds after that: Waitamminute... Aw, crap.

dadycool

Abby, babe, you're killing me here. I need to breathe at some point. I very much look forward to the perspectives and reactions to this latest stunt of hers.

I very much like the perspectives we got this chapter, too.

Adrian_V

OMG the final part with Abigail killed me, is the middle of the night and i woke up everyone with my crazy laughter xD

Who do you people think was the villain killed here? Or if it was even killed. Could be a fake out or aspect its waiting to strike back.....

LaNuup

As I am not sure anymore, why does Keter even fight this war? It was the Dead King that declared war on everyone and started this thing. What does he hope to gain from this?

mamm0nn

We haven't been told yet, his true motives remain yet a mystery. What we do know is that these numbers he's throwing away is inevitably just expendable bones and binds to him of little value. Even in the numbers used here. He's not losing that much to this war, and stands to gain much. Though said much is still muddled in unknown.

If it's about land however, he already gobbled up several principalities so if he can hold on to even half of those by the war's end then he would've gained much.

Liliet

The analysis in-universe has been that as the rest of Calernia continues to develop and interconnect, it's going to outpace his capacity for storing tricks. The longer he waits to war on them, the worse his chances, and if he waits long enough, they'll come to him – Bard has made sure of that.

So he wants to wipe out the living on the continent, or at least their capacity to wage war – and to organize to wage war in the future, too. Presumably the living on other continents are expected to ignore that much like the living on Calernia seemed to ignore the destruction of Sephirah.

So he needs this war just to survive, whatever other long-term objectives he might or might not have.

mavant

I am somewhat inclined to wonder why keter really needs to be an enemy of the living.

Consider the gnomes: they destroy anyone who researches agricultural technologies that might eventually lead to an industrial revolution, but don't seem to mind magical agriculture.

Couldn't skeleton-based agriculture then be the way out of the population trap?

If the skeleton donors consent, it doesn't even feel ethically suspect to employ necromancy. And it could dramatically change the standard of living for the living.

Liliet

Oh, Keter doesn't NEED it for anything. It's Bard's little gift.

May or may not be based on DK's eventual long-term plans being hazardous to the world in general (he tried to take over a second Hell that one time).

sengachi

At the very least Keter needs to war with the living every once in a while to remain 'narratively relevant'. He needs to be the threat, the unkillable annihilator that threatens life on Calernia itself. Being so threatening and destructive that people just know how unkillable he is is a protection against some half-baked Heroic Name narrative killing him automatically.

Also so long as most of the battles he engages in are ones where he can recover the corpses of his troops, he can even grow in strength by doing so, growing measurably stronger each time until finally numbers give him the weight to eat all of Calernia.

And this time, he's planning something. We're not told exactly what, but there's some win condition he thinks he can achieve here. The Wandering Bard seems to have been trying to sell him on the idea that this time he'll take some land permanently, but really he has some plan beyond that he thinks is going to earn him a more permanent victory.

mamm0nn

While the narrative can aid, it's hardly an absolute. The old rule that the world bends to your will when you're powerful enough should still apply even in the nascent Age of Wonders.

A Hero with one Aspect can best a Villain with one Aspect when it's the third act because it's the third act, or prevail because they get a new Aspect at the best possible moment to turn the tides. But if that one Aspect Hero goes up against a fully fledged Warlock on the field of Steges then it's quite likely that the Warlock just zaps them dead in one shot because of overwhelming might. Even if the Hero would have some narrative means of prevailing.

The Dead King doesn't need to worry too much about going out of fashion so much that some half-baked hero just smites him while out on a stroll. He still has massive amounts of power, assets and tricks, and the narrative can only do so much. Similar to how being the penultimate Evil of Calernia doesn't mean that the strongest Heroes can just slay him because there's no other height left, his life is not one to be

Oh, and it's possible that the Dead King is actually immune/ no longer beholden to Providence and the narrative. While Heroes may get a little boost, he shouldn't be dulled by the same effects.

"The existence of death is the first lie we are taught. There is little difference between a corpse and a man, save the journey of the soul. They who learn to slip this noose find the threshold of apotheosis, for in the denial of passing they have taken themselves beyond the yoke of fate.”

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King. Chapter 27

mamm0nn

*his life is not one to be snuffed out on a whim.

sengachi

The point is thought that his life is not one to be snuffed out on a whim only so long as he periodically reminds Creation of that fact.

There is a big difference between being the entity responsible for the devastation of every family tree in Northern Procer just a few generations out of living memory, and being the old ancient evil driven off of Calernia that no one even remembers properly.

Whether the Dead King can survive Providence and Fate being turned against him, that's no excuse not to get them on his side. Regularly proving he is the existential unkillable threat makes it harder for Heroes to kill him, as they're pushing against the Narrative every single Proceran (and everyone else to a lesser extent) teaches their children. That you do not fight the Dead King with any hope of lasting victory. You pray to survive him.

mamm0nn

Him coming back in force to remind the people will indeed aid his legend and reputation to bolster his side of the Story, sure, but my point is that the opposite side of that spectrum as you suggested isn't true. If DK were to fade from memory it would do nothing to decrease his power and would only make it less likely that powerful heroes were to stumble upon him. Especially since he doesn't seem to be getting much of said power from his Name pool rather than by sorcery and the old ritual.

The Narrative isn't everything. It can give you a boost, but it cannot win the fight for you. It still needs a powerful, cunning and proper Named to win their tale, the Story can only provide the opportunity and slight boost to prevail. To quote:

“We're Named,” Archer said. “That makes it different.”

But it doesn't, I thought. We've seen it, you and I. That when all there is holding up the choice is a story and the prediction of victory, the story fails. Because if all you do is pretend, go through the motions, then you've already lost what could have made it a victory in the first place."

-Chapter 17; Cloaks

A Story can help but will not see to a victory by itself. Pilgrim doesn't always need to lose first and the Order of the Hand and the Blessed Isle didn't always fall to Praes because first act, and Villains don't always lose in the end.

Black should've lost several times in several battles, because he denies the Villain's boons and plans against the Heroes' gains. If it were up to the Story alone, he would've died several times. They even rubbed it in that by continuously winning, Providence was stacking his own victories into a Story that he was undefeated and thus undefeatable (as in, the bad kind for Villains). And yet he survived. And remember when Warlock killed the Hedge Mage despite him being the one that Wandering Bard wanted to die from her ploy? Raw power can beat even a Story woven by WB.

Now imagine if you take a Black who has power far beyond yours, no blocs and politics and limits to force his hands, an entire country to turn into his bastion and the knowledge how to kill Named even when the Story favours them. That's the Dead King. Even if he were to lie still for a thousand years, a few heroes just strolling into the undead lands will die to him. No matter the Story, his might isn't to be just negated by lack of recognition.

Liliet

Black was rolling the dice against every single hero he fought, and his odds got worse every time. No matter how skilled you are, there's no cure against "the hero gets randomly teleported from Arcadia into your tent with a sword raised above you and already swinging down", which is not even the worst one's luck can get in principle.

DK aims to live forever, Black didn't. He was willing to accept eventually losing if he built everything the wanted first – as a matter of fact he was specifically AIMING to get killed by his successor after a certain point, because it made the story work out in favor of his plans.

DK wants to take the bad kind of unbeatable and make it work.

Moodprint

I think it has been implied, that as long as the Dead King sits in his kingdom, being the greatest evil alive, he runs the risk of a "Hero with the right story" emerging. Eventually Above will find a way to end him. And the Wandering Bard is looking for that story, so the Dead King wants to be proactive when he can. He has seen an opening, and is trying to seize Calernia, thus limiting the possibilities of new heroes. Just like Black did in Callow, but on a way larger scale

mamm0nn

Being a special kind of undead, having avoided any and all Named counters when he was still alive and being the opposite of the Wandering Bard, it may also be possible that the Dead King is actually un beholden to Story. That no Hero destined to defeat him can rise because he's an absence by having done some questionable things with his life and soul.

"The existence of death is the first lie we are taught. There is little difference between a corpse and a man, save the journey of the soul. They who learn to slip this noose find the threshold of apotheosis, for in the denial of passing they have taken themselves beyond the yoke of fate."

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King. Chapter 27

That might be literal. As a Villain he would've had eternal life anyway, but the Dead King became undead because it means that for all that Heroes may still get a narrative boost he will not grow foolish and weaker as well. And that, if it weren't for the Wandering Bard plotting, he wouldn't even attract any Heroes and Stories at all.

Liliet

Nobody is un beholden to the Story period, but it's entirely possible DK did not in fact have A story laying in wait for his defeat when he first won, and Bard had to make one from scratch!

mamm0nn

Even if it has been stated that Providence is absolute in every regard, which it hasn't, I think that someone sacrificing their entire kingdom to become an undead god can be an exception. You and I, we both don't know whether this is the ace up DK's sleeve, because the story hasn't gotten that far yet. Until then, I can have this opinion, as I've clearly stated to be one rather than hard fact, and you may have the opinion that I'm wrong.

Liliet

I'm a little confused about what you are stating here. If DK was un beholden to the Story, he wouldn't need an ace up his sleeve – he has a sleeveful already and everyone knows that, the Story is the only reason he cannot use them. Devils, demons, etc, it's just been discussed – he is forced to hold back because too rapid an escalation of force leads to a Story blowback.

That's what I meant? Unless you disagree with the assertion that THAT is an established fact by now?

Oh, also we SAW DK lose to a Story – you know, back when Masego got snapped out of his mind control by Indrani's self-sacrifice?

Or do you think that wasn't a Story thing?... And DK has another reason to be massively holding back in this war?... I'm kind of curious to hear another theory on this.

Liliet

P.S. I think you might have failed to notice I was basically agreeing with your idea while nitpicking the phrasing. I believe the terminology is correctly used in a different way, but the basic premise you've stated – that DK did not have a story of his defeat baked into the story of his rise and had Bard not interfered he might well have avoided any flak from Providence/Stories/Narrative period, setting up his eternal kingdom of undead or whatever his complete objective is without any interference unless he managed to generate new defeat-inviting stories along the way (like, say, mind controlling someone who has a Named sweetheart willing to fight for them).

dcarter8419

She's gonna find herself with a name that buffs her soldiers of she keeps it up. Hmm the General, the tactician, ...Mary Tzu?

mavant

Wow, maybe the secret to godhood in the Nameverse is to make Mary Sue stories popular enough for that to become a Name...

Juff

Typo Thread:

when back when > back when deluded into > deluded them into sink truth sink > truth sink this once the horror > this horror for al to > for all to splashing harmless > splashing harmlessly to move to > to move played deaded > played deader couldn't anything > couldn't do anything batter of her > batted her works is always > work is always have argue > have argued bloody hits to the > bloody hits so the rotations he people > rotations her people for the right > for the fight

The swallowed > She swallowed

Crowley

fingers tightened with fear at the tight> fingers tightened with fear at the sight

doominator10

Would an epilog of just Abigail be too much to ask for when the story's finally over?

Sugar Roll

To avoid the battlefield, she takes on a job in Cardinal teaching the next generation of military talents. Training the suckers for battle so she doesn't have to.

sengachi

Watch her end up organizing the defense of Cardinal from the front lines when someone attacks it.

Javvies

Heh. It's always nice to see how other people view Cat.

Abigail, never change. You're not gonna get out of your job – especially since you like living.

That's a nasty weapon the Dead King just demonstrated. Fortunately the Sage is available to deal with it.

Crash

Got the impression he is less dealing with it and more learning from it, for now.

Hitogami

Callowean soldiers: that was back in the Arcadian campaign...
Everyone else: ... You mean when the Fae invaded you?
Callowean soldiers: no, after that, when we invaded the Fae.
Everyone else: ... Are you CRAZY?! Why would you do that?
Callowean soldiers: Cat said it would be fun

mavant

And it WAS fun, dear reader. It was.

Except for Nauk.

Practicality

"Small slights long spites"

Not only counter-invading the embodiment of war, but permanently ending them sounds pretty spiteful.

Frivolous

Levantines in general and Aquiline in particular are absolutely crazy.

Aquiline feels DISGRACED by getting wounded on the first day of battle. By what impossible Gigeresque reasoning does she travel from injury to disgrace?

And then, even worse, instead of doing the relatively logical thing of avoiding getting wounded again, she decides that to undo the disgrace she has to attack and kill a Beorn. A deed very likely to get her wounded again, if not killed outright.

The chance of her and Tanja surviving the war, to marry and have even one kid seem extremely low to me at this point.

Xinci

Simple enough reasoning on the injury=disgrace. In a honor culture who live in a supremely dangerous environment like the Levantines, honor serves as a dictation of competency and thus trust. It is a disgrace as it shows her to potentially be incompetent and thus less likely to be trustworthy as someone to fight beside. Remember those hunting bands that Tariq found? Getting injured showed that you wouldn't do well in one of those for example and may get your teammates killed. This is especially evident in their style of troop management, where their captains may decide how worthy they are to follow.

Crash

You summed it up yourself, Levantines are madder than sappers.

They're gonna survive out of sheer improbability, to be honest. Like "couldn't possibly lose" in reverse.

That or one of them dies and the other one immediately goes berserk and gets a Name in spectacular game breaking fashion. Probably Osená.

Daniel E

After the untimely demise of Z3 (really hoping we get a Fae BS resurrection there, b/c Cat on a Spring/Autumn horse would be amazing), I am now actively rooting for Boots.

mavant

Abigail is really growing on me. Or has already grown, I suppose.

I know the next step after General is usually Marshal, but can we upgrade her to HERO OF THE IMPERIUM?

Xinci

Hm, I wonder if those pillars have been instilled with devil or demonic essence. Given DK had control over his hell and we only really heard of devils and such being in the screaming pyramid, it would fit that area being the place for such experiments. I suppose he could have tainted the material or it could already have held such properties, that he then instilled with sorcery.

The Summoners perspective on Binding is interestingg. I still wonder if the first Binder usurped part of how Light works/ figured out the method by observing priest, since Light holds what it means to be of Creation.

So by taking parts of Creation they can make a construct that can hold a soul. It seems like the Binders and Summoner got at it from opposite ends, Summoner basically makes a spirit thats domain gradually gets shaped by Creation, while the Binders shape Creation to summon a spirit in a form that doesnt dissipate. It might be why not all Binders can have spirits that fly since those souls arent encoded with any such properties. While the Summoners summons can "learn" to do so, since they dont inherit any such limits upon being created.

Liliet

The Summoner has been noted to be exceedingly, improbably incompetent at both summoning and diabolism. I don't think he's trustworthy on this lmao

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Yeah, he failed upwards by being so bad at it his shoddy techniques became their own separate thing.

Crash

I fucking love Abigail.

Fun to see Edgar is still kicking about too! Callowan soldiers trying their best haha

Daniel E

I knew I recognized that name, but can't for the life of me remember where.

Liliet

His first PoV was at Sarcella during the two interludes, and I don't remember if he had PoV again but Cat borrowed his helmet randomly before she stopped Rozala's cavalry charge by standing in front of it and drawing a line on the ground.

jworks17

Is the Sage the hero Robber was talking to last chapter? I have a feeling he might end up being a top tier character.

Liliet

Are you confusing Sage and Page, or did Robber talk to someone else too?

benthelynx

General Abigail is best girl. And I'd say Cat should totally pretend to hit on her, but that might be too much with the chain of command. Maybe Archer should instead.

benthelynx

Damm double posting mobiles

Chapter 59: Materialism

"Victory in war comes by three parts: fighting, diplomacy and strategy. No single third is sufficient to bring victory alone, and each is neglected at great peril."

– Extract from the 'Ars Tactica', famed military treatise of Dread Emperor Terribilis the First

It was a nice afternoon, if you discounted all the dying.

As the opening strokes of the second battle for Lauzon's Hollow fought under my command began to reverberate, I sat on high chair and watched as I absent-mindedly tore into a late midday meal. A meat pie, still warm with the juices splattering on my armour when I bit deep. The prelude had, to my mixed pleasure and wariness, unfolded largely as I'd planned. The band of five under the Silver Huntress had blown open a hole on the top of the western hilltops, allowing for both gates opened into Arcadia to hit the armies hidden beneath the hollow hills directly. Pickler had cracked open the hills beforehand, of course, since I wasn't in the market for just making cavern lakes: the entire point had been to wash out the enemy army.

"How many inside, do you think?" Akua said. "At least twenty thousand by my count."

The shade stood upright at my side, in an intricate gold-accented dark dress and veil whose occasional flickering betrayed the gate had taken a lot more out of her than she liked to admit. It'd taken even more out of me, of course, since Akua drew Night through my own connection to it. She could manipulate outside stocks of it just fine, as she had at the Princes' Graveyard when she'd called the eclipse, but otherwise she was also limited by what my body could stomach. Which was, at the moment, essentially nothing. Two large gates, precisely aligned to parts of Arcadia and for some time? And in broad daylight, to boot. No, I was effectively out of the fight until sundown and that meant so was she.

"Between that and twenty-five," I replied. "They weren't making full use of the caverns as a tactical asset otherwise, it would have been a waste."

"I wonder what general it is that faces us today," Akua mused. "Not Trismegistus himself, surely. He rarely takes the lead in such a direct manner."

Not that the Hidden Horror's consciousness wouldn't be flitting around the battlefield all day, anyway, along with his will. But Akua was right, Neshamah didn't usually serve as his own general – with good reason, since he was not a particularly outstanding one. Undead did not truly learn, after all, and he'd not been a military man while alive. His tactics were all imitations, something he was aware of and meant he usually used Binds or Revenants as generals instead. It was typical of his brutal streak of pragmatism that the Dead King would raise anew the commanders that'd been most troublesome to him and bind them to his service. I did not doubt he was the overall strategist of the Kingdom of the Dead's campaigns, mind you.

On the grand scale, the one beyond tactics, there really wasn't a thing in existence that could think the way the King of Death could.

"The Prince of Hannover mentioned the Princes of Bones usually commands all local undead as well as his own Grey Legion," I noted. "But I've seen no sign of him. It might be the Pale Knight, though admittedly he seemed more a champion than a general to me."

Or it could be a hundred other unseen trembling souls, none of which we'd even slightly sniffed out. We'd not yet dug so deep in the reserves of Keter that the Dead King had to be stingy with generals, to my enduring displeasure. I kept tearing into the meat pie as the battle began in earnest, the Third Army under General Abigail sounding the horns and beginning to advance. By now the tide of water flowing out of the caverns and the hollow was beginning to die out, swallowed by the thirsty ground and turning it to mud.

"Maybe ten thousand scrapped by the water," I said, sharpening my eyes with Night as I studied the field. "I'd hoped for more."

"The remainder are buried in mud, in disarray and often weaponless," Akua replied. "Your hunting hound in the Third will make good sport of them."

"She's meant to a lot more than that," I muttered.

Mind you, I didn't expect the Third to wipe out all those downed undead. The Third Army only made up the centre of my host's formation, with the Procerans under Beatrice Volignac making up the left wing and the Levantines under their Blood making up the right. I expected she'd bite off a hard chunk while advancing, falling upon it while it was not yet recovered, but she'd have to spread out the Third to get them all and that was the last thing either she or I wanted. After all, in the end the Third Army was bait.

"I was not brought into the full battle plan," the shade idly said, "but it seems to me that you are taking great risks with the array of your forces. The Third is pulling heavily ahead, and your left wing is... undermanned."

She wasn't wrong. Black would have blanched at this kind of battle array, which was a stark departure from the traditional Legion doctrine. My centre was a steady ten thousand legionaries and my right wing a wildly overstrength seventeen thousand Levantines, while my left wing was a mere six thousand Procerans. Mostly Volignac soldiers, principality troops, with some fantassins. The rest of the Proceran troops had been sent out to clear the lowlands with the drow under Ivah, after all, and had yet to return to the field. But then the three minds behind the modern Legions, Black and Grem One-Eye and Ranker, had built that model to smash mortal armies.

Fighting the Kingdom of the Dead was a different kind of war. One where the enemy did not tire, where being outnumbered at every turn was a near certainty and the enemy's arsenal bore a few more nasty surprises tailored to undermine your strength with every passing battle. I'd adapted to this war, though. Learned how to wage it.

"We came to Lauzon's Hollow to achieve two things," I said. "Seizing the pass itself and destroying the army defending it."

We couldn't just do one, unfortunately. Even we forced out the army and took the Hollow, we needed to destroy the enemy's fighting force here: even if it retreated weakened, we couldn't afford to have it at our back while we moved on the capital. It'd be child's play to cut our supply lines if even just a few thousand raiders stayed loose around the Hollow, and we were already outnumbered by the enemy so I was reluctantly to shake loose a garrison force to leave behind.

"The single worst way to achieve those objectives is assaulting Lauzon's Hollow," I said. "Taking fortifications is a war of attrition, and the moment the battle ends up in the narrow pass this becomes a slugging match that Keter will win nine times out of ten."

I'd seen battles turn that way before. The Dead King and his generals just began throwing corpses at us, well aware that even if the battle itself was lost they'd still win the war by effectively destroying our army in the trade-off. No, fighting in the pass was something I wanted to absolutely avoid – it was why our original campaign plan had called for the forces under General Pallas to strike at the Cigelin Sisters further north tomorrow and then swing south to pincer the enemy here as soon as they'd secured the fortress. That plan had obviously gone out the window since, but the underlying reasons for making it remained.

"Yet you are, in fact, assaulting Lauzon's Hollow," Akua drily pointed out.

"No, I'm not," I grunted. "We cracked open the hills, Akua, so now instead of fighting just at the mouth of the pass the battlefield got extended. These are proper grounds for classic Legion warfare, they just happen to be at the front of a pass."

"Which the opposing general will notice," the golden-eyed shade said. "Why prevents from retreating deeper in, where the pass narrows and your advantages evaporate?"

"Bait," I grimly smiled, "set out in two parts."

I finished the last of the meat pie, scarfing it down and licking the warm juices off my fingers. I pretended not to see the disapproving look thrown my way under the gauzy veil. In the distance, as the Third Army began plowing through the dead washed up by the waters, reinforcements began pouring out of the pass. Skeletons, yes, but also constructs. It'd be a hard fight. And as the dead who'd washed up on the flanks of the Third clawed their way out of the mud, still a disorganized horde, the enemy general did exactly what I'd wanted them to do: they sent out the horde in waves, trying to flank and even envelop the Third Army before the reinforcing wings could arrive. The enemy had committed.

The enemy's siege engine atop the hills began unleashing some deadly surprise, pillars of black stone, but Archer was with the Third and I'd left heroes floating: one of them would nip this in the bud before it turned too bad, providence good as ensured it.

"You seem pleased, which implies this dawning rout is exactly what you intended," Akua noted. "Which fits better with my appraisal of Abigail of Summerholm than that of the overeager general who struck out too far ahead I am currently looking at."

I shrugged.

"It holds up, you know, for someone who's looked into our armies," I said. "If someone else had rushed too far it might be a trap, but the Third? I named them Dauntless personally, they've served as my vanguard in half a dozen war and they're commanded by a rising star among my commanders – but a young one, who never went to the War College. Malicia will have records of that, which means the Dead King has them as well. If this were Hune rushing it'd be suspicious, but this?"

I grinned.

"Why, Akua, this isn't a trap," I said, "it's an opportunity. One Keter has seized quite eagerly."

So the dead had come out swinging from the pass in the distance, pouring reinforcements and trying to swallow up the Third before the seemingly feet-dragging Procerans and Levantines caught up and handled the flanks. From an outside eye, that tortured formation – one wing too storn, the other too wing – would have been forced on me by politics and a fear of trouble in a shared command structure, not more tactical considerations. I'd split the wings by nation of birth and was now paying the prince for it, neither Levantines nor Procerans too eager to follow the lead of a reckless Callowan general.

But the Third held, because the Third always held, and so the jaws of the trap closed.

"So now you hurt them," Akua said.

As if bid by the hand of fate, the ballistas of the Army of Callow began to sing. I saw the understanding dawn in Akua's eyes, for though she was not exactly a veteran commander she was clever and well learned in matters of warfare. The enemy had to reinforce through the pass, its entrance now stripped of all fortifications by the thorough work of Lord Soln, which meant my sappers knew exactly where the killing fields ought to be set up. The copperstone ballistas pounded the enemy into dust, again and again and again, as the flanks caught up to the Third and tore through the still ill-prepared undead brought there by the waters.

And so the enemy general slowly came to realize it had been baited into filling a box – the once-caverns, the mouth of the pass – where its numbers were being made into a disadvantage. The fighting with blades, after all, only happened between the first ranks of the dead and the living. The fire of my siege engines burned swaths behind this, and would cost Keter easily fivefold the casualties the rest of my army would cause it. Akua stayed silent for a long moment, taking it in.

"I sometimes forget how deeply unpleasant a general you are to face," Akua mildly said.

I snorted. We'd never faced each other as commanders of armies, actually, as she'd been the general of her forces at neither the Dead Dawn or the Doom.

"An inspired trick," she continued after a moment.

Such direct praise was rare, coming from her, and I allowed myself a sliver of enjoyment before setting it aside.

"I'm hardly the first to use it," I dismissed. "Jehan the Wise did the same with the banks of the Wasaliti at the Battle of the Sparrows, and Terribilis to the Third Crusade at the Danse Macabre."

"Both being famously unskilled generals, of course," Akua amusedly replied. "What terrible company you keep."

"Battle's far from over," I grunted. "Bit early for boasting."

My eyes returned to the field as time inched forward torturously. By now, I thought as the lines held on both sides and the copperstones burned bright, the enemy general would be realizing this was not a sustainable position for them. I still hadn't sent out my reserves, the entire Second Army and nine thousand drow, and there was no sign of my running out of copperstones. On their side the horrible siege engine atop the hills did not have an angle to fire down on my troops, and if the fighting continued until after dark – which it seemed like it might – then I'd have nine thousand Firstborn to send after them.

The obvious answer would be to retreat deeper into the pass, since it restored the reason why the enemy army was at Lauzon's Hollow in the first place: being able to hold us off with the pass. I'd turned it around on them by baiting them to fight at the mouth of the pass, but they could write off what they'd committed and retreat, resuming the defence deeper in.

"Why aren't they retreating?" Akua said, putting her finger on the pulse of the question.

"Can they afford to?" I replied with a hard smile. "Count the corpses, Akua Sahelian."

The enemy had outnumbered us one hundred thousand to seventy thousand, when the campaign began. After the first day of fighting at the Hollow, we'd lost a little over two thousand and the dead a minimum of six thousand along with a significant portion of their swarms. Now throw in the ten thousand or so they would have lost to the water, then maybe another ten thousand lost in the killing box over the early afternoon. Meanwhile, I'd count maybe another two to three thousand dead on our side over those same hours, which meant we'd be down to around sixty five thousand while the enemy had been brutally dragged down to mid seventy thousands. If my opponent wrote off the troops holding the mouth of the Hollow and retreated, my side might have numerical superiority when the assault continued deeper in.

"They overcommitted," Akua breathed out. "If they retreat now, they might no longer have the numbers to hold the Hollow against us regardless."

I turned to glance at her and caught her eye, reading there an expectation of agreement.

"Gotcha," I said. "You just lost the battle."

I enjoyed the surprise that flickered through before she suppressed it more than I had the praise earlier, so at least there was that.

"That's the deeper trap," I said. "That instinct not to sacrifice those troops anyway. I want the enemy in that killing box as long as I can possibly keep them there, Akua. It's the absolute best exchange rate of casualties I'll be able to get on this field."

Her lips thinned.

"I am used to considering troops valuable," she said. "The source of my mistake, perhaps. It will not be shared by the commander of the dead."

"Probably not," I admitted. "I expect they'll hesitate but come to the same conclusion soon enough. Which is why I told you, earlier, that my bait is in two parts."

What would convince my opposing general it was worth sticking it out in there? It'd have to be a prize worth those mounting casualties. Just the losses involved in the lizard cutting off its tail to escape wouldn't be enough to dissuade a Keteran general for long, so I'd set out fresh bait for them to bite: my left wing, the Procerans. Under Princess Beatrice's command stood only six thousand souls, fewer by now. Hardy Volignac foot, mostly, but that only counted so much in a fight like this. A wing undermanned, as Akua had earlier said. Fragile. Foolish, and I did not have a reputation for that, so even counting on the impression that this was a political decision instead of a tactical one I'd also gilded the bait by putting my entire horse contingent behind Princess Beatrice's wing.

As if expecting a breach, expecting to need buying time for my reserve the Second Army to come prop up that failing flank.

"Come on," I murmured, looking at the ranks of the dead. "Bite, my friend. You know you want to."

And I laughed, laughed until my throat hurt, when Keter fell for it again. Reinforcements kept pouring out of the pass and into my killing box, scores dying to every copperstone, and the undead sent their full wrath against the left flank.

"Akua," I said. "Pass a message for me. I want these two to prop up the left wing: Headhunter and Forsworn Healer."

"As you say, my heart," the golden-eyed shade replied, bowing.

I barely spared her a glance, my own gaze still on the battlefield. Those three should be able to prevent the Revenants I suspected the enemy was about to send from shattering the left flank. That was the bet of my opposing general, after all: that it could break the left wing and manage to collapse the increasingly exhausted Third by overwhelming its flank and back in a massive sweep rightwards. Even if I sent out my cavalry, at that point, the battle would be lost. Keter's game afterwards turn to trying to inflict as many casualties as possible while my army fled back to camp, a particular specialty of the Dead King's army. I was not unaware this could still turn south on me, though I trusted the lines would hold. If it got rough, I still had some cards to play.

Beastmaster had already gone to reinforce Archer, a deadly combination that'd allow her to kill constructs even beyond her sight, and now that the Summoner was back I was keeping him in reserve with the brew I'd had Concocter working on. The remaining swarms had yet to be unleashed: most likely my opponent was keeping them back, since they'd be brutally efficient at turning a break in my lines into a rout if they were properly employed. When Hakram wheeled his way to my side, I held in a wince. Not because I was unhappy to see him, but because if he'd come to deliver the news personally they wouldn't be good.

"Beastmaster's dead," Adjutant told me, blunt and to the point. "The Pale Knight slid behind the lines."

My fingers clenched.

"Indrani?"

"Broken army, already fixed," Hakram said. "The Silver Huntress' band reappeared just in time to drive him away, no further Named casualties."

"Fuck," I murmured. "Too close."

"Orders for the Huntress?" he asked.

"None," I said. "She's free to follow providence and judgement as she pleases."

That was the main reason I'd sent out a band of five heroes, after all. Some villains would have better rounded out their band, but it would have diluted the effect of providence. Best to have an imperfect force at the perfect time and place than the opposite. Hakram stayed at my side afterwards, letting his helping hands carry the rest. We stayed silent, but not uncomfortably so. We both had our minds on the field in the distance. Not long after, to my surprise the Dominion began pushing into the undead lines ahead of them. They were fresher than either my Third or the Procerans, admittedly, and significantly more numerous. I'd genuinely not expected they would, though, so I was unprepared when the enemy general decided to set them back with a decisive stroke.

The swarms came loose from the broke ceiling of the caverns, coming down as screeching tide as the binders did their best to keep them at bay.

"Summoner and Concocter," I curtly ordered Hakram.

The messenger was moving before I was even done speaking. I'd positioned them closer to the left flank, expecting the strike would come there, so my fingers were raking the arms of my seat while the two silhouettes on wyvernback went up from too far away as the first ranks of the Dominion were engulfed and shredded. It got handled, in the end, but not quickly enough. The dead pushed hard into the Malaga section of the shield wall simultaneously to the swarm assault and it would have turned into a rout without what I suspected to be Named intervention.

Couldn't be sure at this distance, not with armies so large and the constant streaks of Light and sorcery.

The next helping hand that came to report to Hakram was Scribe, which told me there were grimmer news yet.

"The Sage stabilized the break in the Levantine line," Scribe told us.

"And?" Adjutant gravelled.

"The moment after the shield wall closed up, he was sniped by an archer Revenant," Scribe told us. "I believe he might have used his three aspects over the afternoon's fighting, and become vulnerable as a result."

"Tell me they recovered the corpse," I said.

"Lady Aquiline Osenia saw to it personally," Eudokia said.

I blew out a breath. It could have been worse. There weren't clean victories outside the stories, I reminded myself, and stuck the course. When the Proceran flank began wavering despite the best efforts of Beatrice Volignac and the desperately fighting Named there – the Headhunter slew two Revenants and claimed their heads, according to the reports Hakram received – I did not panic or send orders to my cavalry. Instead I smiled and sent for Senior Mage Jendayi, Hune's senior spellcaster.

"Send word to Lady Catalina to prepare for the crossing," I ordered. "We are nearing our moment."

This very afternoon, after all, was when the detachments we'd sent out were due to return. Instead of letting them come openly across the plains, I'd instead requested for Ivah and the fantassins under Lady Catalina to take the Twilight Ways – I could, that way, unleash them as a surprise when the time came. Keter would have accounted for our own mages, there was no hiding them, but not for those that'd left with our detachments. I could, because of this, bet on surprise with good odds. It'd help with Proceran morale as well to be pulled out of the fire not by foreigners but by their own kind. After the battering they'd take today, it would do them some good.

When the first fantassin company on the left flank broke, I immediately gave the order for the reinforcements to begin crossing into Creation. I jolted in surprise, though, when the Third Army's shields winked out and they began shaping offensive magics instead. Wait, had General Abigail guessed my plan? I studied the Third's movements carefully, noting the massing of heavy companies around the standard, and decided that she hadn't. The gates were just now beginning to open, after all, to the cheering of the Procerans behind them. More likely she'd been worried about the left flank collapsing on her and acted to cut off the threat at the source. I chuckled.

Regardless of her intentions, the timing for that charge was actually perfect: I'd gotten what I could out of my soldiers for the day, it was time to wrap this up.

"Send word to Summoner to pull back from the right flank and help with the charge instead," I told Hakram.

"Cut loose Apprentice as well," he suggested. "She'll thank you for it."

I mulled over that a moment then nodded. He was by my side and deep behind our lines, and while there might not be such a thing as safe when fighting Keter he was not at so great a risk he could not spare his bodyguard and assistant for a bit. I settled back into my seat, watching the last few exchanges of the day unfold. It went better than I'd dared hope, in truth. The enemy centre, while steadily reinforced over the afternoon, had also steadily been culled by hours of copperstone bombardment. I'd not anticipated that would mean it was thin on Binds – they'd need more Light to be destroyed, if anything – but that was the only explanation that came to mind as to why the undead centre shattered like a rotten egg when the Third charged into it.

I watched the enemy ranks break apart under weight of the heavy companies and almost asked Jendayi to send a signal for General Abigail to pull back, for she was getting too far ahead, but she stopped on her own anyway. Good, I thought. I'd kept the Grey Legion out of this so far by making the ground muddy and so effectively making it impossible for infantry that heavy to accomplish anything save get stuck in a mire, but there were drier grounds further in. I had a lot of faith in the Third Army, but there was a reason the standard order for mundane troops encountering the Grey Legion was 'retreat'. General Hune, sensing like me that the battle was coming to a close, came my way. She made her courtesies to myself and Hakram, then got into why she'd come here.

"Congratulations are in order, Your Majesty," the ogre said. "Another victory to your name."

I didn't disagree, even though there was still fighting on the field. With the Third having claimed the head of the narrowing in the pass, enemy reinforcements were cut off so the left and right wings were just pushing up pockets of undead against the walls of the caverns and systematically exterminating them. It'd take a while, and the Third would have to hold until they were done, but with the amount of Named we had on the field we should be able to deal with any nasty surprise the enemy had left to unleash. All that was left was for someone to sabotage the enemy's siege engine on the hills before we could retreat, which I was already mulling sending word to the Silver Huntress' band to do.

A moment later there was a great burst of Light in the distance atop the hills, followed by pillars of flame, and I was once more reminded that the Heavens had a sharp sense of humour.

"It's only half the battle," I finally replied. "We still don't hold the Hollow itself."

"Given Keter's casualties today, and the raiding the Firstborn will no doubt undertake tonight, there can be no question of the dead still holding the pass by tomorrow afternoon," General Hune said. "The last swordstroke has not been granted, but it is a victory all the same."

We'd be out raiding in force overnight, and with the full strength of the drow: nearly twenty thousand, including several hard-hitting Mighty. I fully intended on savaging the enemy army as brutally as I could before dawn came and the fighting resumed tomorrow.

"We'll see it if pans out that neatly," I replied, "but I take the congratulations in the spirit they were meant, regardless. Thank you, General Hune."

She didn't linger after that, leaving us to our thoughts. I watched the last gasps of the battle far away without truly looking at them. Hakram cleared his throat.

"You look worried," he said.

"I am," I admitted. "Something about this smells off to me."

"It was a hard-fought battle, even if it went well for us," Adjutant said. "It is not always a trap, Catherine."

"Then where has the Grey Legion been?" I quietly asked. "The mud kept them out, but halfway into the battle Keter should have spit out a ritual that steadied the ground so they could fight."

Mighty Sudone had slaughtered a great many of Keter's magelings, but not so many that they would not have been able to deliver that particular 'surprise'. I'd had an answer waiting for it, admittedly, but with no certainty it'd work. They'd never come out at all, though, which had my fingers clenching and unclenching.

"Has anyone seen the Prince of Bones?" I suddenly asked. "We've seen the Grey Legion yes, but the Prince himself?"

Hakram paused a moment.

"I'll find out," he promised.

"Do," I muttered.

I closed my eyes. I was missing something, I could feel it. Roland had reported seeing a Crab, a while back, I suddenly recalled. Something to do with that, perhaps? I couldn't see any obvious links, though.

"It's not that I don't think this isn't a victory," I said. "But there will be more to this, Hakram. We're not dealing an amateur, Neshamah plans for both outcomes. He'll have gotten something out of even a defeat."

He had no answer to that, and so I left him to his work. By sundown I had estimated casualties for both sides of the battle, rough as they were. My armies had around eight thousand dead and maybe another thousand crippled beyond the current ability of our priests and mages to repair. That took us to an army fifty nine thousand strong, perhaps even a little lower. The enemy, though? Keter had begun holding Lauzon's Hollow with an army of one hundred thousand, and now it had barely half that: fifty to fifty five thousand left, we believed, though the Grey Legion counted among them. My soldiers had, without even our full army being on the field, fought like lions and won the day. A heroic victory, some would call it.

Now we just needed to win another hundred, and never lose.

Welcome to war with Keter.

ruduen

Vote! Err... Boost? Top Web Fiction seems to be doing something different now, so it's hard to say.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Sulo

Oh no, it's ugly... :c

Jernik

Wow, PGtE is only 3k votes from passing Worm as the all time high

Big Brother

Aw, Beastmaster and Sage are gone. I liked them. 2-1 odds Sage learned that secret in the obelisks and somehow uses that to come back.

JoshuaS

I'll take those odds. He already had three aspects, and I don't think normal sorcery can resurrect people, so it would have to be aspect based. I think he's pretty dead unless someone else comes with the save, but then that's not the sage using any secrets.

naturalnuke

You just brought up what Keter pulled from this battle at least in part: key parts of the force are beginning to be picked off. Weep for the crusading armies that have been bled on the march to Keter.

Sir Nil

Oof. Beastmaster was a Named you didn't want to lose. Direct combat Names are dime a dozen but one that has non-magical scouting and info gathering? We didn't see much of Sage but he also had an aspect for info gathering, but at least we can hope his death grants the mentor death power up to someone.

Also, is Pale Knight the revenant White Knight from before? It would make sense since he's supposedly ancient and foreign, so mistranslating his Name to current tongue could happen, but it seems a bit off for something so important. Oh well, not a large deviation either way.

Vallalla

In the last few chapters, the undead White Knight has been mostly identified by his "pale plate," so I'm guessing Pale Knight is a nickname/alternate name to avoid confusion. They know his official title is White Knight, but Hanno has dibs on that one

mamm0nn

They call him pale knight because he wears a pale armour that cannot be marred. Multiple White Knights would only be confusing.

Henry

Do you mean the 6th "Callowan white knight who died to Keter" Or the 9th?

mamm0nn

Wait, do we count the Squire who ascended to White Knight a day before getting slaughtered in that headcount? Because if so, we're talking the 8th.

Liliet

Oh no, Beastmaster)= Indrani's sib!

caoimhinh

Yeah, F for Beastmaster, didn't expect he would die so early, but EE holds his tradition of killing characters off-screen. I liked the Sage, I found him pretty interesting. His Divine aspect seemed to be one of those aspects that had endless potential for growth, like Mirror Knight's Dawn and Ranger's Learn, Perfect, Transcend combo.

Yeah, the Pale Knight refers to that OP axe-wielding former White Knight.

It was explained in previous chapters that the Grand Alliance makes up titles/names for each Revenant regardless of what was their Name when alive, makes it easier to identify and individualize.

Point Point

I think that Divine was the verb sense of the word, i.e. to "discover (something) by guesswork or intuition" (New Oxford American Dictionary).

caoimhinh

Yes, I know. All aspects are active verbs, so that's the sense of the word in this case.

Which is why that aspect seems to me like it had endless potential.

From every encounter, he would grow. Especially if the thing he encounters is powerful or mysterious, like strong opponents, a interesting magical phenomenon, or a sorcerous artefact. He would keep improving. Because he would always gain insight from those encounters.

Frivolous

Damn. Lost Beastmaster and Sage. I actually liked Beastmaster.

I wonder how many Revenants that Keter has available. Obviously there must be many more Revenants than living Bestowed, and most of them probably heroes because they're dead Crusaders, but how many exactly?

Probable discrepancy – “Akua,” I said. “Pass a message for me. I want these three to prop up the left wing: Headhunter and Forsworn Healer.”

Only two are named – Headhunter and Forsworn Healer. Who is the third?

Darkening

I mean, sure, Keter’s smashed plenty of crusades, but I have to imagine those crusades were able to kill some Revenants in the process too, so I doubt he’s got that big a numerical advantage with them, especially with Ranger murdering a few every once in a while. Honestly, having them be mostly heroes is probably a detriment for the dead king, since I expect any aspect that relies on Light like Hanno’s Ride would just be completely nonfunctional. Maybe that’s the reason one of the Spellword’s aspects was nonfunctional when Cat went digging.

caoimhinh

The easy answer is “as many as the plot requires and the author wants”.

We will probably never have an exact number of the total, but back when Catherine visited Keter, Neshamah showed 50 Revenants and used them as an honor guard to welcome her.

So yeah, he really has that big of a numerical advantage with them.

The only reason they aren’t sent out en masse is because of the Law of Conservation of Ninjutsu

Crash

He also sends people from the Serenity out into the world quite often, I’m sure they’d be up for some light grave robbing of known Named.

It’s not like the legion burial is a widespread practice. Though I’m hard pressed to understand WHY you wouldn’t burn all corpses when the Dead King exists in your continent.

sengachi

I mean the answer is that you really really should burn all the corpses on Calernia, but in practice most people have never fought the Dead King, or can name an ancestor who did, or lives somewhere where the immediate threat of fighting the Dead King hangs over their heads.

Like, not to yank this too hard into modern politics, but take a look at how some people have reacted to simple masks in the face of a present pandemic. Compare that to dictating the method by which people deal with their dead loved ones, over a threat centuries in the past and potentially centuries in the future? I'd imagine resistance would be fierce, and enforcement impossible.

Crash

This is actually a very good comparison and a reasonable explanation.

The stupidity and bull-headedness of people at the smallest personal inconvenience can never be underestimated.

Still, in the face of several Crusades you'd think they'd take it more seriously.

Liliet

Akua herself, maybe?

Shveiran

Unlikely, IMO. Cat comments earlier in the chapter that Akua uses Night through her or from an external source – and that she is therefore spent for the remainder of the day after the double watergates they made.

My two cents are that it is just a typo, EE starting to write thinking three would be sent, then recounting and figuring out everyone but FH and HH was already accounted for.

dadycool

Abigail doing exactly what she's supposed to, even though she's just flying by the seat of her pants. That's the kind of content I live for.

Ah, so it was Beastmaster. Oh well. I wonder how Archer will feel, losing essentially a brother right next to her. And Sage, too? Didn't we just meet him last chapter?

Also, love how Cat's just sitting on a hill eating lunch while her forces are advancing.

onedollargum

We met the Sage and shortly thereafter he seemed to find some kind of insight. Either he overreached and is simply dead or we're going to see something interesting down the line.

NerfContessa

Let's hope for interesting.

A Sage wraith to akua's night wraith would be useful, especially with his aspects. Destroy and divine, oh boy.

Liliet

...meawhile, the Levantines are doing what the Levantines do: take casualties because of overreaching.

caoimhinh

Lol, yeah. Those guys never learn.

Fun fact: this chapter's title, Materialism, refers in Chess to a style of playing where one aims to win pieces and pawns on the board (a.k.a "material") at the expense of positional considerations.

This applies both to the Levantines being so overeager for Honor and kills that they overcommit and overextend their lines, and to the reason why the undead lost this battle as their objective was to kill as many as possible of the Grand Alliance troops but were baited into giving up their advantageous terrain due to that, resulting in losing half their troops.

Liliet

oooooooooooo

I don't know any of these things and I love that there's someone actually explaining them ♥

LD77

Except it is incorrect. There is no such thing as "style of play called materialism" in chess. Source: I am a chess player.

caoimhinh

You do realize that anyone here can verify that what I said is true, simply by using Google, don't you?

The fact that you don't know the term does not mean that it doesn't exist.

PGTE chapters are thematic during each arc. In this case, every single chapter since King's Fianchetto has had a title that references something in Chess.

Source: I am a chess player.

Actually verifiable and peer-reviewable sources:

<http://www.wachusettchess.org/ChessGlossary.pdf> page 15
<http://www.glossaria.net/en/chess/materialism>

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Glossary_of_chess#M
<https://www.peoriachess.com/Glossary.html#M>

That Guy

You are incorrect. Source: the Wikipedia article "Glossary of chess", which includes the term.

Miles

The proof is just a google search away. No wikipedia entry, just all kinds of forum discussion and blog posts about the relative virtues materialism vs other styles.

hakureireimu

materialism

origamiflame

A simple Google search turns up quite a few results, but I suppose you've delved into every aspect and nuance of chess, having played it.

Liliet

maybe it's a regional thing that you havent encountered??? goddammit i have to google it now

...well, it definitely gave a lot of hits at least.
<http://chessskill.blogspot.com/2014/08/materialism.html>
<https://www.chess.com/clubs/forum/view/what-do-you-think-is-better-strategic-or-materialistic-chess>

It certainly seems like existing terminology!

Ah, found a definition:

> Materialism

Playstyle characterised by a willingness to win material at the expense of positional considerations. Chess computers are often materialistic.

source: <https://en.mimi.hu/chess/materialism.html>

Welp, there you go.

Crash

I appreciate you educating us in how the titles relate to chess.

Thanks for always doing this, it always shines an interesting light on the chapter overall

Shveiran

Very interesting!

...Though I do worry that it could also refer to Cat bleeding Keter for corpses and then worrying what Keter strategy is with the Prince of Bones.

Do0d

I thought he was the Doddering Sage Cat met at the Arsenal.

dadycool

I wondered about that, but not only did he seem like someone who shouldn't be anywhere near the front lines, he didn't seem like the kind that would have aggressive Aspects. We may have even heard one of them, but I can't remember. It was so long ago and this series has so much material that I'd spend a solid month reading through it, not counting all the other things I spend time on the computer doing. Maybe when the series ends.

Do0d

In his POV he mentioned blocking out the outside world to better sense the nudges of providence.
Also, Cat met him on a bad day at the Arsenal so our first impression of him may not be all that accurate.

Juff

Typo Thread:

on high chair > on a high chair still warm with the > still warm, the Princes of Bones > Prince of Bones Even we forced > Even if we forced even it retreated > if it retreated Why prevents from > What prevents them from a dozen war > a dozen wars other too wing > other too weak the prince for it > the price for it hand of gate > hand of fate my reserve the Second Army > my reserve Second Army these three to prop up the left wing: Headhunter and Forsworn Healer." (who is the third?) afterwards turn > afterwards would turn news personally they > news personally it Broken army > Broken arm carry the rest. > carry out the rest.
broke ceiling > broken ceiling as screeching > as a screeching shield wall simultaneously to (extra space) there were grimmer > there was grimmer dealing an amateur > dealing with an amateur

Crowley

I was reluctantly to shake loose a garrison-> I was reluctant to shake loose a garrison one wing too strong-> one wing too strong see it if pans out-> see if it pans out

jworks17

Wow beast master dead already? I thought for sure the Headhunter was going to be the first to go.

mamm0nn

He She is the most annoying and generally loathed Villain in the audience's eyes, therefore they will have much power and exposure yet. The annoying ones rarely die off before cramming themselves into the people's approval by brute force.

onedollargum

It felt really weird to see Cat sitting there eating pie, totally vulnerable. I entirely expected Keter to capitalize on it with a Revenant raid only for Cat reveal that she was, in fact, the third piece of bait and close the trap.

Liliet

Vulnerable to what? She's behind the frontline, and unlike her forces, Neshamah's don't have a convenient fourth-dimensional shortcut to anywhere they please. Any Revenant raid would need to get past the army first.

Clint

A big swarm of undead birds, perhaps?

Liliet

One swarm already tried to do something on this battlefield.
Didn't go so well, did it?

Again, any group of enemies has to get to Cat's physical position in 3D space first. Be it by air or through the ground, they do have to move there – and I don't get the impression the middle of their encampment is easily assailable from any direction, by this point.

Liliet

(Also, pretty sure even spent Cat could dive into the Twilight Ways in a moment, speaking of things Neshamah doesn't have access to. This isn't an equal fight, Cat is cheating badly, as she do ♥)

Miles

I agree it's weird. She's just having a picnic and sorta spectating.

Burlyraven

Honestly, Beastmaster dying makes a lot of sense as far as the whole Named life-meter goes, considering he's not the type of Name one sends to the front lines (or anywhere close to them, really), typically. I'm kind of puzzled as to why he was even as far forward as he was.

Sage dying feels weird, though, and I can't tell if it's because he's a senior fully developed Name that died casually, or if he's not actually defeated and the part about him grabbing the resurrection secrets from the obelisks was a hint that he's coming back.

(Also, this one was pretty rough on typos. I know there's normally a no editing policy, but some plot points might have even been muddled.)

mamm0nn

Beastmaster wasn't at the front, he was at the back granting his sight to Archer so her range was even greater. That means he was very very very far away from the front, though not as far as Cat probably. Pale knight slipped past the line to kill him. Sage on the other hand was on the front lines for some reason.

Burlyraven

Sage was hunting obelisks. He wasn't so much on the front, as making sure the back didn't become the front. And it was a sniper that got him.

mamm0nn

Though he was dealing with the Obilisks, it seems that he died a bit afterwards.

““The Sage stabilized the break in the Levantine line,” Scribe told us.

“And?” Adjutant gravelled.

"The moment after the shield wall closed up, he was sniped by an archer Revenant," Scribe told us. "I believe he might have used his three aspects over the afternoon's fighting, and become vulnerable as a result.""

It's unlikely that the Levantines had a random shield wall in the middle of their army, though now that I think of it there may have been a few circle shield walls around the obilisks which may have been raising dead? I think they only killed people, not also raise them, but they may have made a front line not on the front line.

That said, the comment of recovering the body as well as how it's written here suggest that the Sage died an hour or so after the Obilisks were dealt with and he went to aid another issue elsewhere.

dadycoool

The shield wall may have been the force field thing that they've been using this war.

Stereotype

It was mentioned that Archer could shoot farther than she could see and that she was with Beastmaster. We can assume it was with the help of Beastmaster using his information gathering.

Zee

I am convinced the thing that Cat is feeling and not seeing has something to do with Sage. He was one of the Blood, Princess of Aquitan saw to his corpse personally, plus the fact that he felt something from the dark pillars that he could not Devine screams like a plot by DK. The Destroy aspect of Sage also feels like it is meant to have a purpose down the line.

I am still hoping to see some theories who the third is that was sent on the left flank. The author mentioned "those three" twice so it is not a typo.

Zee

Correction: Aquiline saw personally to the corpse of Sage.

Liliet

Akua, maybe? The third, I mean. She did depart permanently, it was Hakram at Cat's side from that point on.

mamm0nn

Hune: Congratulations with your victory, Black Queen.

Cat: Damn it Hune, did you just red flag this battle? I expect as much from some, but you read Black's books on what to never say when. I expected better from you.

Adrian V

My favorite part is when she started laughing, she managed to take the maniacal laugh and turn into a version that doesn't spell doom or stupid crazy evil, the crazy part may still be in effect but still xD.

And man Beastmaster is down, he was with Archer and like we saw in some parts those 4? have a bond from growing up together, so who wants to bet there is story in how he died (story as in he maybe sacrificed himself or put himself in danger due to Archer).

The Sage is obvious why he had to die: DK noticed he was close to a discovering and due to the mention of divining a word i bet he either was close to or already had discovered an aspect used to make those pillars and got a huge mark on his head.

Liliet

I'm totally expecting Lysander's death to spell out some kind of development in the Refugee arc ^^

mamm0nn

Oddball theory: DK hid his book of ascension, the one that can make capable practitioners into new DK bodies, in the obelisks. Either Providence or DK killed the Sage, and if it's the latter then DK will rise in the camp causing mayhem.

Adrian V

Nah, with Zeze around they must know about that possibility and make a practice to burn or secure named corpses, or mages, plus the general burning, i think is more probably DK knew about the sage or a named like him and baited him with the pillars and then dropped the hammer once he knew Sage used his 3 aspects.

Captain Amazing

Anyone else notice how Providence sent Huntress and co. immediately -after- Beastmaster died? I suppose Archer was sufficiently neutral to save. It reminds me of how demons seem to prefer killing heroes when placed alongside equally vulnerable villains.

Daniel E

Right, but then Above lost the Sage to even the scales.

Javvies

Things went more or less exactly as Cat planned them to.
This is concerning. Especially since major elements of the Dead King's forces are missing.

Good battle plan, but everything working out more or less exactly as expected/intended? That has to be tripping Cat's warning signs.

The loss of several Named is a problem, and might actually be the Dead King's real targets – mundane troops aren't a real threat to him the way Named are.

mavant

>these three

>Lists two names

Demon of Absence got 'em.

Matthew Wells

Nah, Scribe's just trying out some new melee stuff.

JJR

They do say that the pen is mightier than the sword.

Clint

Does Grey Pilgrim still have that resurrection ability, or was that permanently lost at Prince's Graveyard?

beleester

Permanently lost. Catherine's ability tears out an aspect and makes it into a single-use item.

Daniel E

Permanently lost. In the chapter where he & Cat return to creation, there is mention about losing an Aspect. He now only has the sight and star.

Noldo

I wonder if Cat's ability to extract an aspect to be used as a single use item could allow Cat to extract one of Sage's aspect and the information Sage managed to extract from the obelisks.

Aurelian Ungureanu

The author corrected the first mention into "these two", so my expectations for a mysterious theory about the third have dropped. Still, Akua being the third sent to help doesn't add up since she cannot use Night anymore due to Cat's body being at its limits, so likely not much help to the left flank? Also, she might not be popular with the Proceran army if the rumour about her identity has spread outside of P. royalty. I am still giving this some thought ... for a bit longer.

Daniel E

After rereading this chapter in more leisure, I'm still betting that Dead King's elite army is attempting the mother of all end-runs; going right around the entire Alliance to strike at Callow either through the White Caps passage or the the Red Flower Vales.

Frivolous

Headhunter is more powerful than I expected. I thought them just a Named serial killer, a rogue type, but to kill 2 Revenants in a battle means they're a fighter, too.

Abigail anticipating Cat's orders and moves, without knowing Cat's reasoning, is very suspicious to me. How often does a commander do the right thing tactically without knowing the supreme commander's strategy? It stinks of Providence.

dadycool

Cat is Chaotic in general, moreso when she's planning wars and battles. Abigail is trying to be as chaotic as possible, trying to get thrown out of the army.

Cat: I'm gonna make up the craziest, most insane, suicidal plan I can come up with and hope my understanding of Reality is correct enough to grant a positive outcome.

Abigail: I'm gonna make up the craziest, most insane, suicidal plan I can come up with and hope my antics convince everyone, especially my supreme commander and queen, who certainly wouldn't try and come up with a plan this bad, that I'm unfit for duty.

Cat: That was perfect! Exactly what I was hoping for! Keep doing that!

Abigail, crying: WHY ME?!?!?!?

agumentic

It's not that mysterious – both Abigail and Cat saw the same tactical situation and both capitalized on it with the tools available on hand.

shimizubad

Damn, it would be a bad idea, but imagine Cat as a revenant under the Dead King. It would be terrifying.

Miles

She'd just give up her revenant powers along with his control, and then immediately come back to life.

RoflCat

The sisters would likely bring her back under Night first.

Or even if it become a pulling match for her soul and DK won, the sisters will likely cut her off from Night, thus leaving DK with one mouthy undead (because I doubt even DK can force her to not be snarky) who have no super power besides good knowledge of Stories.....actually that might makes her a very terrifying strategist under him.

shimizubad

Exactly

IDKWhoitis

Well RIP Papenhiem, I think the Iron Prince is about to eat a bad loss...

Armies not being where they are supposed to be, Keters elite troops not being present, Nesh not showing up at all, an offensive that's going too well, and a Keterian counterattack that stopped before it began.

I'm already sure the 2nd pincer with Papenhiem or the Twilight Ways Force were exterminated or savaged at the least.

Everyone has taken the sanctity of the Twilight ways too liberally, and I think Nesh is clever and bastardly enough to find a loop hole or bait a mistake.

Past this line only lies random speculation and raving rambling madness.

The elves have betrayed the crusaders, or Malica has brought an army (Black's former loyalists), or most likely, there is a bastardly form of "Non-Necromancy magic that can be flung into Twilight ways to create casualties and other issues..."

JJR

No undead allowed in the Twilight Ways. But Dead King has an entire hell filled with living people to turn into an army.

ruduen

Huh. Just remembered – wasn't the Apprentice being taught by the Sage? Right now, that seems like the right pieces brewing for a

'take up the mantle' or an 'avenge the mentor' story. I wonder if the Sage's role as a mentor figure was strong enough to qualify there.

Kel the Seer

Did the Gigantes ever catch up safely? I know that there were forced clearing out diving bands, and the Gugantes wanted to wait until that was done to move up, but Cat ordered them to move in anyway. I have this sneaking suspicion that the Prince of Bones has some of his groups Nick g out waiting to capitalize on something like that.

It would give DK a way to learn about Gigantes warding methods, which will be invaluable since they were going to drop wards to protect proclaimed territory, and screw Cat's political capital that is helping keep the coalition forces together.

laguz24

Nessie doesn't know about the gigantes yet. He knows about the army but not the giants, hopefully. But if he does know, then it would be a complete asspull by ee. So I don't think that it would be that.

sengachi

No he definitely knows about them. It's actually mentioned at one point that the Gigantes would have to move through some of that land dotted with undead raiding parties, and Cat was considering sending a detachment to clear the way for them. She decided against it, judging that so many Gigantes could handle just about anything.

But the Gigantes have definitely encountered undead so far, so the Dead King knows their location.

Furthermore Keter has living spies born in Serenity, some of the best scrying magics out there, countless undead vermin spies, etc, etc. It would be a surprising coup but not a Diabolos Ex Machina if the Hidden Horror knew about the Gigantes before the armies started marching and planned around them.

Graeme Dochylo

So a thought, It's been revealed that users of Night are especially ineffective against Demons, and the Dead King has been holding his Demons in reserve.

What I'd like to see happen is that the Dead King has been waiting for the most devastating moment to deploy them(possibly something around the timing of Cat being about to get a Name that is specifically focused around manipulating Night, with the intention of breaking the one he sees as his primary rival in the story of the war), and that he's about to give the Drow an offer they cannot refuse, where evil turns on evil, the goddesses lose faith in their priest, and the Drow break alliance and move en masse through the Twilight Ways to attack Levante or southern Procer.

Then Cat has to figure out how to pick up the pieces from there with a lot of her plan having fallen apart.

Rey d`Tutto

That last line...

Onos

Gods Below and Everburning, I fucking love the battle scenes in the Guide.

Nice to see Hakram's still in a good mood, the prick.

Chapter 60: Zwischenschach

"In war and politics, we are all as men sharing the same dark cave and stumbling along blindly. The keys to victory in either matter are patience and seeing just a little further ahead than your opponents."

– Luc Monseiller, thirty-second First Prince of Procer, largely remembered for the Great War that followed his assassination

A brawl. The last blows of the battle not even an hour past, and now they were brawling.

Sometimes I sympathized with Cordelia Hasenbach, for though I had fought her tooth and nail to keep the Truce and Terms from being beyond the reach of temporal laws I didn't entirely disagree with her when it came down to it. I bent the rules for Named all the time, didn't I? I'd made them beyond the authority of all but two of their own kind, allowed them to wield power over others and invested them with weighty responsibilities. But sometimes, Gods sometimes, they just went and did something that made it feel like I was biting down on a mouthful of embers. I knew the names and the Names, could discern the source of this stupidity, but to understand was not to excuse.

If they'd been soldiers under my command, this would end with a flogging and a demotion. If it had been allied officers, even nobles, I would have had them removed from command and sent away. But Names were rarer than noble blood, the power they gave more highly prized than titles in these days where the end times were howling at our door, so instead I would have to be lenient. To chide and discipline, as if dealing with children instead of hardened killers empowered by Creation. What hope was there for the Liesse Accords, when not even the Dead King at our gates was enough to force reason onto us?

I wrestled my mounting fury down as I limped through the dusty grounds of our camp, knowing calm would serve me better. It was exhaustion and anger talking, I told myself. There would be good days and bad ones in the era to come and no treaty could change that. It'd never been their purpose to fix the world, for that was too ambitious a charge for anything made by my hand. The Accords would do what they were meant to, and Calernia would muddle along with a few less atrocities splattered across the pages of its history. That alone would already be a better legacy than I had any right to claim, some would say.

In the distance, as I turned a corner, I heard cheering. The Night boiled in my veins, answering the livid streak of anger that seized me, and the closest legionaries shivered. I'd sent for a full company of armed soldiers, phalanges one and all, to accompany me. They were to serve as either escort or mailed fist, depending on my orders, and my mood was feeling more and more like clenching fingers. The cheering itself wasn't bad, it was what it meant: that Named had decided to fucking brawl in public in front of any soldier that cared to watch. On the same day as a bruising battle with the Kingdom of the Dead, our corpses not even all burned. My fingers clenched.

Well, at least one was going to be one of mine so maybe flogging wasn't off the table yet.

It was with that hard stomp particular to soldiers meaning business that my company entered the picture. A large crowd of soldiers – a few hundred, a thousand? – had gathered in a great ring. By their looks and armour they were from half a dozen different armies and oaths, a clean slice of our coalition shouting hoarsely as five Named brawled and coin changed hands. A quiet fell in the immediate surroundings of the phalanges, soldiers paling and hastily getting out of the way of authority having come to call. There was just enough of a quiet I finally made out one particular thread from the cacophony. An old ditty I'd learned as kid in Laure, beautifully sung by a cold-blooded monster.

"Maiden Mary, fair and merry

Your tears make poets sigh

But for a smile given sweetly

Tall banners will kiss the sky."

The Rapacious Troubadour had a nasty sense of humour, it seemed. 'Maiden Mary' was a children's song, but it dated back to the War of the Cousins – the civil war that'd put on the throne the same branch of House Fairfax that my father had later ended – and the Mary in question was Mary the Claimant. Queen Mary the Third, most scholars called her, as her Eastern Bells had won over the Southern Bells just long enough for her toddler son to die a crowned king and another cousin succeed him. I would have been impressed about the Troubadour knowing the song at all, if he'd not also been the same shit playing a song about civil war while Named fought in front of a crowd of rowdy soldiers.

There was blood on the floor, I saw, but at least no one was dead yet. Archer and the Silver Huntress were both bleeding, and I knew the look in Indrani's eyes – she'd take a killing stroke without hesitation if she got the opportunity. The Silent Guardian and the Headhunter were both in better shape, the Guardian having nothing but marks on her plate while the Headhunter had suffered only a small cut on their cheek. The only voice of sanity in there was Roland, even now trying to force everyone apart and largely failing.

"- settles nothing," I caught the Rogue Sorcerer saying. "You are only making it worse for-"

"Do it to 'em, Lady Archer," someone with a heavy Liessen accent shouted. "Callow! The Sword and Crown!"

"Huntress," an Alamans accent shouted back. "For grace and Heavens, Silver Huntress!"

The crowd roared, the crowd cheered, and the Rapacious Troubadour was still playing that fucking song.

"Maiden Mary, bright and lovely

What groom did you embrace?

Hand in hand, wooing roughly

Your troth is kingdom's grace."

Enough was enough. The mood might still be more joyous than bloody at the moment, but crowds were mercurial beasts – this could turn sour very, very quickly. I was still damned winded from the gates Akua and I had opened, but not so spent I couldn't muster a resounding thunderclap when I struck the ground with the butt of my staff. The clap rolled across the ring, drowning out even the cheers, and I limped forward as the phalanges roughly shoved aside the few onlookers and gambled still in my way.

"Disperse," I said, voice cold as steel. "Now, and I will not bother with arrests."

A shiver went through the crowd, though my eye was on the fighting Named – which had ceased actively trying to stab each other, but were still close and holding weapons – and the mood was doused rather comprehensively. I'd half-expected someone to protest and to have to make an example, but instead already the edges of the crowd were fraying as people made quiet escapes. Like a crumbling stone, the whole ring would fall apart before long. There was a flicker of remembrance, just as the edge of my mind, as I recalled when I'd been a slip of a girl in Laure and I'd watched Black empty a hall's worth of lords with but a handful of words. I'd sworn, that evening, that one day I'd have that power too.

It had taken years, but I'd gotten there. I wondered, though, what that wary wild girl from the orphanage would think of the woman I'd grown into. I thinly smiled, knowing that she might well have added me to the list of monsters in need of killing.

"Queen Catherine," Roland started, "this is–"

"Utter stupidity," I mildly said. "But your role in it was minor and well-meant. Walk back to your tent, Rogue Sorcerer."

He caught my eyes, for a moment, and whatever it was he saw there it told him not to argue. My gaze lingered long enough to acknowledge his bow, then moved to the four remaining Named. I couldn't see the Silent Guardian's face under her helmet, but her stance was sheepish. As for the Headhunter, they – no, he if I understood the face paint correctly – looked rather unapologetic and entirely unembarrassed. He had an excuse for butting in, then, I decided. Which left the two who would have been the spark for the entire mess. Archer and the Silver Huntress.

"Who struck first?" I asked.

"She did," the Huntress said, her high-pitched voice grown shrill with anger.

"I scored first blood," Indrani dismissed. "You swung at me first, Alexis."

"That is true," the Headhunter jeered. "On both counts. And the Guardian couldn't resist backing up her friend, could she? Hardly sporting, two on one."

My gaze returned to Silent Guardian, who took off her helm and revealed a tanned and dark-haired head. While she looked like she rather wanted to smash in the Headhunter's skull, to me she bowed in apology.

"You only intervened after blood was drawn?" I clarified.

She nodded. I hummed, eyeing the Headhunter.

"And you intervened out of your abiding love for fairness, I take it?" I mused.

"You have me pegged," the Headhunter grinned.

"You tried to stab me in the back, you-"

The word the Huntress used was in tradertalk, but by the tone it wasn't a compliment.

"You're both dismissed," I said, ignoring the Huntress. "For having participated in a brawl, you're both docked pay for five months and you'll be assigned menial work under an officer of my choosing."

The Headhunter glared at me, opening his mouth, but his gaze dipped to my side – where my fingers, without my notice, had taken to clenching and unclenching. His mouth closed.

"Dismissed," I coldly repeated.

The Silent Guardian offered a bow first, which I returned with a nod. The Headhunter did not go quite as politely, elbowing some of the last remaining soldiers in his way as he went. Of the Rapacious Troubadour there was no sign, I noted. The clever little shit had made good on his escape before I could rap his knuckles. Indrani and the Huntress were still facing each other weapons in hand, long knives for Archer and the spear for her old acquaintance. I cocked an eyebrow.

"Is there a particular reason you two are still holding weapons?" I mildly asked.

I saw Indrani suppress a wince. She knew better than the Huntress that particular tone of voice did not herald a good mood on my part.

"If she puts away her blades," the Silver Huntress began, "I will-"

"If I must make it an order, Alexis the Argent," I lightly interrupted, "I might just lose my temper and fucking drum the two of you of this army before the eyes of gods and men."

With a quiet sliding sound, Indrani's long knives went back into the sheaths. I turned a dark eye on her: she'd timed that, I knew, just so that the Huntress would look like a recalcitrant malcontent and she the obedient subordinate. Unlucky for her, I wasn't buying it. The Silver Huntress blinked in discomfort, then reluctantly stabbed her spear into the ground. She folded her arms over her chest, looking rather defensive.

"I'm going to ask you two questions," I said. "You will reply to them calmly and concisely, without interrupting each other."

I got nod. Indrani's almost playful, as if it were set in stone she'd get out of this without losing any feathers. My irritation spiked.

"Huntress, why did you attack an ally?" I bluntly asked.

She grimaced, though I'd wager more from the phrasing than remembrance of the punch thrown. The Lady of the Lake had not raised those girls to shame easily.

"She got Lysander killed," Alexis the Argent harshly said. "Same old story: Indrani has a lark and one of us bleeds for it. Only this time it didn't stop with bleeding."

The anger in her voice was a hard, cold thing. I found the hate threaded in it unsettling, as it was too strong to be a fresh – this was an old poison, just brought to the fore with a fresh wound.

"I assigned her to the Third Army myself," I evenly said. "And by the reports I've read, she fulfilled her duties admirably. As for the death of Beastmaster, I understand she fought and had an arm broken trying to prevent it."

The Silver Huntress' eyes hardened, turning to Archer.

"Ranger, Black Queen, it makes no difference," Alexis bitterly said. "You'll always find skirts to hide behind, won't you?"

"Say that again," Indrani hissed, hand going for a knife.

"Watch your tongue, Huntress," I sharply said. "And Archer, I ordered you not to interrupt. Don't make me repeat myself again."

She looked mulish but did not argue. She'd been more interested in protecting her pride than my 'honour' there, I thought, so my sympathy was limited. I felt a faint breeze against my neck, gone in a moment, but did not let it distract me.

"Archer," I said. "You were struck with a fist. Why did you answer it with a knife?"

Indrani's lips thinned.

"I was insulted beyond reasonable expectation of restraint," she said.

"You lying-" Huntress began.

My anger, never far, burned cold and sharp as once more an order I'd given within my rights was disobeyed. This, this I was done tolerating. The breeze came back, but it'd never been a breeze at all: it was a breath. Warm, coming through an open maw.

"Be silent," I Spoke.

The Silver Huntress fought it. But as the Beast leaned over my shoulder, hacking out a laugh, even as she struggled her mouth snapped shut. I felt a vicious twinge of satisfaction that I did not indulge, but did not ignore. Archer's face was slack with surprise.

"The two of you are damned disgraces," I said. "On the same day where thousands fought and died turning back the Enemy, you attacked each other like drunken bulls before we'd even finished burning the corpses. Shame on you both."

Indrani reared back like I'd slapped her. With a twist of will, I peeled back the order I'd Spoken at the Huntress. Her lips parted and she breathed out in pants.

"Huntress, you are no longer commander for the heroes in this army," I said. "The Rogue Sorcerer, who tried to put an end to this bout of idiocy, will take your place. The White Knight will handle the rest of your disciplining. I offer him this as a courtesy, but should you break the Truce again I will have no choice but to cease being polite."

My eyes moved to the other offender.

"Your pay is docked for this entire campaign," I told Archer. "You are not to speak with any hero outside of official duties without the explicit permission of the Rogue Sorcerer or myself. If you draw a blade on an ally again, I'll send you south like the child you insist on acting as."

Her hands clenched, but she stayed silent.

"You've also lost the right to refuse assignments for six months," I finally said. "You'll be accompanying the Firstborn on the raid tonight, so return to your tent and prepare."

Both of them glared at me sullenly, in that heartbeat eerily resembling each other for all their starkly different appearances. Grief was a bitter brew, I knew that better than most, and they were both fresh off the death of someone they'd cared for in a very complicated way. I understood why it'd come to this, I really did. But I was also a high officer of the Grand Alliance, sworn to enforce the Truce and Terms – which they had just broken in a spectacularly public and untimely manner. My duty was clear, and my anger not faked in the slightest. I stared them both down until they left, not bothering with a proper dismissal. The moment they left the Beast brushed against my shoulder, almost affectionately, and without a single lingering wisp it was gone.

I could Speak again, I knew. It hadn't been a fluke. I could feel the way my will once more struck against Creation like a queen's decree. One step closer, I thought, and breathed out. To what I did not yet know, but the shape I was beginning to discern was not unpleasant to my eye.

—

"Bleed them," I ordered the Firstborn. "Under this moon, your only mandate is the reaping of deaths."

With nightfall had come our opportunity to savage the Dead King's forces badly enough that tomorrow's fighting would be the final stroke of annihilation. The Twilight Ways would allow the drow to harass the enemy's camp on the other side of the pass from every direction, all the while staying out of the jaws of the trap that'd been sprung on us the previous night: here would be no wards to keep us penned in, this time. Only skirmishes in the manner that'd been the lifeblood of the Everdark for a millennium, perhaps the only manner of war in which the Firstborn could be said to be the most accomplished of all Calernian peoples. And out the sigils went, under the command of Ivah and its subordinate sigil-holders.

We went with them, a band of Named under my own lead. Archer, naturally, for I meant to keep her out of trouble and the camp for a span. To some a place in such a raid was considered a prize and so I awarded it accordingly: the Vagrant Spear came with us and the Headhunter as well. Roland I'd dragged along mostly on account of his expertise in breaking magics, knowing it was never wise to bet on Keter not having that one last trick up its sleeve. The choices had also been a balancing act, which naturally some noticed.

"I'm sure it's just a coincidence," Archer sardonically murmured, "that your picks are even on both sides of the fence. Ever the diplomat, eh?"

It was not an approving tone. Even the band was a good one, well-fitted, I suspected that in her eyes politics having had a say in making it tainted it irremediably.

"Are you complaining I'm calming waters you helped unsettle?" I replied.

"I didn't pick that fight," Indrani told me flatly.

"You still fought it," I said. "You could have taken the lump, walked away."

Her face tightened with genuine anger.

"I don't owe you that," she said. "I don't owe anyone that."

"Then spare me the comments," I curtly replied. "I'll take shit for you, Indrani, but I won't take it from you as well. If you want to talk of things owed, best remember that."

Not the most pleasant exchanges to precede going into battle, though only Roland seemed to notice the tension between us as we sidled through the Twilight Ways. He did not ask, that very Alamans instinct for discerning when a question would not be well-received sparing me the irritation of having to offer even a cursory explanation. Before long we were back in Creation, anyhow, and the raid claimed everyone's full attention. I'd left the command in Ivah's hand, knowing my Lord of Silent Steps was perfectly capable of leading sigils in war without my breathing down its neck, so I had the freedom to pick where I wanted to meddle. I had some thoughts already.

I rather itched to get rid of the Pale Knight, if it could be done without paying a ruinous price.

That plan went the way of dust, though, the moment we emerged from the Ways and found that the enemy was retreating. The pass was still in the hands of undead forces, and if anything the northern end of the passage was more heavily defended than before, but we'd come out to the north of the enemy's camp – in the flat plains between Lauzon's Hollow and the Cigelin Sisters – so it was impossible to miss that there were departing columns. I sharpened my eyes with Night, seeking numbers. Maybe ten to twenty thousand massed to hold the pass in case we struck overnight, but the rest were mobilizing to leave. Hells, there were already scouting detachments north of us in the distance.

"Leaving?" the Headhunter sneered. "Fools. We'll catch up through the Ways."

She – it was she, tonight – would have been right if our soldiers were things of stone instead of flesh and blood, but it wasn't the case.

"I'm not sure we can," the Rogue Sorcerer replied. "Not after today's battle."

One of these days, I was going to have to ask Roland exactly what kind of an upbringing had forged a man like him. He was surprisingly well learned in a variety of subjects, including quite a few that mages in the Praesi mold would have considered beneath their notice.

"He's right," I said. "Our army's fit to battle, tomorrow, but not to march."

Practically speaking parts of the army would be – the Second Army and the Proceran detachments freshly returned, as well as a healthy chunk of the Dominion's warriors – but it'd be risky to engage in pursuit with low numbers and it'd leave the force behind us very vulnerable. Unlike us, though, the Dead King did not have to give a shit about wounded or exhaustion or supplies. He could just order the march. There were three days between the Sisters and Lauzon's Hollow, so if we took a day to recuperate and immediately marched maybe we'd arrive at the Sisters before he did. Maybe. But it'd be risky. If the Cigelin Sisters had been reinforced, we might end up walking into a positional disaster.

"Then what is to be our purpose this night, Black Queen?" the Vagrant Spear asked.

I chewed on my lip. I wasn't comfortable risking a night battle with Keter, even assuming I could muster enough of my army to wage one alongside the Firstborn. That left only one logical move.

"We'll not be hunting Revenants, after all," I said. "Damage is our purpose. We thin their numbers as much as we can – Binds over Bones, constructs over anything else. We avoid Revenants unless they're alone and keep close as a band. Understood?"

Archer, even after our terse exchange, remained entirely dependable.

"Understood," Indrani replied, stringing her bow.

"We hunt," the Vagrant Spear agreed.

Roland sighed, offering a nod, and the Headhunter rolled her eyes.

"I'll take a kill if it's offered," she insisted.

"By all means," I mildly replied. "Though if you disobey my order I will, naturally, discipline you accordingly."

The Levantine villain met my eyes and I smiled thinly. I'd killed harder women than her, and without too much trouble. After a moment she nodded.

"Good," I said. "Let's get to it, then."

It'd be a stretch to say that what followed was boring – the danger might be limited, but it still existed – but it did get... repetitive. And it was dull from the start. Moving on foot we struck hard at the enemy's columns, targeting Binds and the occasional constructs or supplies before retreating back into the Twilight ways and popping out elsewhere. We were quick enough no Revenants came even close to approaching us, though part of that must have been from the Firstborn being a larger and significantly more damaging threat. We saw, maybe two hours in, that things were actually turning starkly in favour of the drow.

Mighty were burning entire swaths of the enemy with impunity and casualties were mounting among the dead with only paltry costs to the Firstborn. Some of the sigils got too bold, though, it cost them. Revenants, at first, but the struck sigil doubled down and called allies – only for the Grey Legion finally to make an appearance. It was a major enough development that I parted ways from my band temporarily and called a sigil-holder to me for a report. Lord Soln bowed deep, but talked briskly. It wanted to return to the fray.

“The ironclads unmake the Night, Losara Queen, much as the carved pillars did during our previous raid,” Lord Soln said. “It appears they have also been invested with a ward that prevents access to the Twilight Ways. That surprise was... costly. Between them and the Revenants, we were forced to pull back.”

“Give me a look,” I ordered, extending a hand.

The sphere of Night was promptly offered and my damning suspicions were confirmed. I’d seen the Grey Legion before, those hulking dead encased in armour so thick it more of a rampart. Those armours had been well-maintained and quite distinctive, so it was easy to tell that the Grey Legion had been quite recently refitted. So that’s what you got out of this, Neshamah, I thought. You tested the pillars and wards on our Firstborn, and when they proved effective you used that Crab lurking around somewhere to refit your Grey Legion into drow-killers. It wouldn’t matter much here, where we could harass away from their ranks and avoid them, but there would come a time in this campaign when the drow would have to stand and fight.

And when they did, the Prince of Bones and his legion tailored to kill Firstborn would be waiting for them.

“Go,” I told Soln. “Return to the fight. Pass my order that the Grey Legion is to be avoided, lest we allow the enemy to further refine ways to kill us.”

It was worse than those troops just being a hard counter to drow, I knew. It also meant that two of the three assets we had at hand that could possibly deal with the Grey Legion without horrendous casualties – namely Akua and myself – had just been made equally obsolete. Some tricks would work to a limited extent, like flood gates, but I wasn’t confident in smashing them by myself anymore. And our last answer to their kind, the Blessed Artificer, worked exclusively in Light. I was not so confident that the Dead King did not have something to counteract that as well, considering how much he'd invested in building up this army. Fuck.

Unpleasant as the revelation was, there was nothing to do but to continue our raiding. I returned to my band and we resumed our attacks, continuing to inflict bloody noses wherever we went until around Early Bell. We were all beginning to slow, close calls were getting closer and victories getting sloppier, so I called it at an end. The Firstborn remained until a full hour before dawn, only then retreating into the Twilight Ways. I slept for as long as I dared, which wasn't much, and woke all too soon to be presented with corpses. Named and Revenants, this time. I took two aspects from the Beastmaster before it grew unfeasible to do more, but unfortunately I did not have the rights to the Sage's body.

The way the Headhunter took heads from the foes they defeated fucked with my ability to steal aspects, I discovered with displeasure after a very frustrating hour pawing at Revenants fruitlessly, but I still got two out of the kill the Vagrant Spear had made. Disappointingly weak, those two, but I was never one to sneer at having another artefact up my sleeve. When the war council held session afterwards, once more with the full roster, there was no real disagreement over the decisions to be made. The morning's scouting parties and found Lauzon's Hollow abandoned, so we'd send out Named to smell out the traps no doubt left behind and after them a forward force to hold the end of the pass.

The full army would only begin moving tomorrow at dawn, when we took to the Twilight Ways in an attempt to catch up to the enemy. If we were lucky, our surprise strike would seize the Cigelin Sisters before the enemy arrived and we'd be able to pincer the Dead King between the fortress and our field army. If not, we'd have to get... inventive. There were still too many unknowns for a proper battle plan to be made, unfortunately.

There was a bit of a commotion before Noon Bell when the Gigantes delegation finally caught up to us, but the giants were polite and it did wonders for morale. I was sent a polite yet firm reminder that the Gigantes would not fight unless attacked, and could not be used as war casters by my order, but I had no qualms with that. Just as ward-makers they'd be worth a dozen times their weight in gold, which would be no small sum. The Gigantes, though, had been largely expected. I'd known they were coming from the messages received from Neustal. When there was once more a commotion at a sudden appearance though, it came as a genuine surprise to me. I figured it might have been an early supply convoy, at first, but Hakram swiftly send a phalange to inform me otherwise.

It was Scribe herself who escorted the surprise arrival into my tent, helping him into the chair with surprising gentleness. I dismissed her with a look afterwards – Hakam I'd trust with such a conversation, but she was not Hakram.

"Catherine," the Grey Pilgrim greeted me tiredly.

Tariq looked a month past exhausted and all too frail even for a man of his age, which did not bode well. He was also supposed to be with Prince Klaus' army, which boded significantly worse.

"Tariq," I quietly replied. "Can I offer you a drink?"

I did not bother to ask if something had gone wrong, for he'd not be here otherwise. To my surprise, he took me up on my offer.

"Something stiff," Tariq Fleetfoot asked. "It will keep me awake long enough to get through this conversation, at least. I've not slept in weeks."

I silently revised my estimate of the trouble from 'pretty bad' to 'fuck' as I poured him a full glass of brandy and pressed it into his hand. He drank deep and offered thanks.

"We finally learned why the army in Juvelun did not chase us when we marched past it towards Malmedit," the Grey Pilgrim told me.

"Did you," I said, already grimacing.

"We also found that missing army of two hundred thousand," the Peregrine mirthlessly smiled. "It was, after all, waiting for us in the latter city."

ruduen

Vote/Boost! Er, voost? Bote? Neither of those really work.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Sir Nil

Oh, dear. If Cat's Name is taking up the form of authority over Named. Then such butting heads will be inevitable, even among her friends. I just hope this isn't the middle slow fall from her relationship with her friends to her Name. Vivienne, then Adjutant, now Archer...

Anomandris

I don't know whether it's the POV, but to be fair to Cat, it seems like the Woe are being a bit more standoffish socially with her than usual. Harkram doesn't want sympathy from a close friend, Archer is just being childish in public, and Viv is more down to distance.

dcarter8419

Can't be a queen and have friends

NerfContessa

Sure you can.

8f your friends are kings, queens and such as well 😊

But you can't be both their queen and their friend, one will have to go.

As for her name, I am still going for Queen of Named, at worst judge of them.

Big I

I've noticed, over this book, that Cat is being deliberately isolated. She has a nice conversation with a fresh made Villain, looks like she might become his mentor? He's dead the next chapter. Relationship with the Repentant Magister seems to be on the cards? She dies too. The only member of the Woe she's not bickering with yet is Masego; she's even at odds with Hakram. Akua's being set up by Cat herself for whatever her payback is going to be. I think the story's setting her up to be alone when all's said and done. Something like the Lonely Wanderer perhaps?

Itarion

Lonely Wanderer neglects the law aspect of the nascent Name. The most recent stirrings have been from the just execution of a traitor to Callow (sort of) in the aerial fight against the Revenants, and the delivery of summary judgement to soldiers under her command. There is law there, and authority, that no mere wanderer would have.

caoimhinh

Yeah, her new Name is about judging and overseeing Named.

naturalnuke

Lone Arbitrator

KageLupus

Close, but I am leaning more towards Arbiter.

Arbitration implies being a middle man, hearing both sides and making a decisions. There is a judicial feeling to it that I think would fit someone more like Hanno than Cat.

An Arbiter is very similar, but also has an extra connotation of power and finality to it. The Arbiter has the final say in a dispute. They make a decision and are fully equipped to enforce it.

From the very first chapters of the story, Cat has been someone who's principles are so firm that she would change the whole world rather than compromise on them. She is pragmatic enough to accept things she doesn't like, but she never actually stops believing that her way is correct. All of that makes me think that if Cat's name were to involve judging in any way it would also have to reflect the fact that her judgement is final and based on personal beliefs rather than set laws.

onedollargum

Warden of the East, as it were?

Rey d`Tutto

Wicked Warden

Practicality

I think she's going to pull a "monkey's paw" by making her a dread empress. If she does, it will likely be the cruelest reward she can give, and she'll do it knowingly.

Remember how Akua was rather introspective after Kat invited her to a celebration, she was shocked that the people were genuinely laughing etc. she muttered something along the lines of "that she could have had this years ago" and then she thought back to sending her only friend to die. That chapter Kat's political advisor (cannot recall atm) asked her if she intended to make Akua a Dread Empress, and if not then she made a mistake:

Like Abigail, Kat is a pragmatic soul at heart, and like Abigail, Akua will get foisted into a role that benefits the Black Queen. Unlike the canny general, Akua will end up alone, years of service rewarded by a tower of solitude. A tower that she had always wished for, but no longer wanted.

Small slights, long spites.

Rudy Samuel \(@RushArt\)

Combining Lonely Swordsman and Wandering Bard? How edgy can Cat go?

Crash

To be fair bard is trying her best to set Cat up haha

Not that it will work, cat has enough Bardy-ness going on all by herself but her... Let's call it strong arming, of people and laws to achieve her goals is much more important to her character.

Whether they be gods or kings and all the armies in creation is not for the meek after all.

I like the suggestion of Arbiter, further up. Something that implies neutrality but, more importantly, authority.

As for the situation with Indrani, this is very much unfortunate timing. She might be grieving in her own way and then somebody she doesn't get on with picks a fight? Unfortunate. But THEN, Cat has to go and order her around like that? This is practically handmade to piss Indrani off. It's expected she'd be prickly.

Give her a little time and some alcohol, she'll show up and very pointedly not apologize to Cat but show her she's sorry anyway.

Daniel

Cat is similar to Eleanor Fairfax in major ways, namely in ruling Callow and in uniting the continent against Evil. She is also extremely prominent, arguably the most important person in Callowan history. That's the closest match Cat's culture has to who is now is. And we learned back in Book 1 that a name usually comes from the originating society's culture, although that's been muddled since.

Eleanor Fairfax was the Rebel Knight first and got a new Name later, which has not been revealed. I guess Cat will get that one, or some twisted dark variant of it.

Callowan aristocratic rulers were also the judiciary, so a Callowan royalty name fits the judgement-related hints we have.

Shveiran

I don't want to rain on your parade, but even if all you say has merit... isn't it likely that Eleanor was the first Good Queen?

After all, she founded the dynasty and we have been told that the Callowan monarch usually had that very Name.

caoimhinh

I think she was Queen of Blades, no?

Liliet

Elizabeth Albam was Queen of Blades

AbraKadabra

So, does that make Cat the Bad Queen?

Shveiran

I mean, to be fair, she kind of IS.

Albert Wen

The Black Queen, in every way.

Anonymous

White Knight was recently alienated too.

Morgenstern

Well, they'll have to be, I'd guess, if the Accords are going anywhere. The supervisors over all the Named on either side cannot be friends with those they should supervise/judge, can they?

Zach

This chapter basically confirmed a suspicion I've had for a while that Cat is gradually having her relationships with the Woe weaken. Vivienne could be considered just a circumstance of them being geographically separated, and Hakram could be considered an individual incident, but this situation with Archer is just too conspicuous (and particularly the direct link drawn between that situation and the development of her Name). Like you seem to be mentioning, it seems like this might be tied to her developing a Name which somehow involved authority over other Named (and is thus inherently incompatible with being part of a band of Named like the Woe).

Frivolous

Damn shit damn. Catherine can Speak again, already, and her Name hasn't even coalesced yet. Which is very bizarre, I think we'll all agree. Like reversed causality, cart before horse, effect before cause.

I'm pretty sure that means one of her aspects will be Rule. It almost has to be, right?

I find it interesting that Catherine felt schadenfreude and pleasure at commanding Alexis. I wonder what it means. Maybe that pleasure is common for all Named who have Rule.

Also I think Prince Klaus is dead and has been turned into a Bind. Which is very very bad, since he's one of the best generals in the Alliance.

Could it be, though, that Tariq foresaw Klaus's fate and decided to kill Klaus first and destroy his body? That would be a Mercy indeed; Klaus would have hated serving Keter.

Miles

Judge, I'd say. She probably can't Speak on a whim yet, just when she's particularly immersed in her Role

Aston Whiteman

+1

Frivolous

Judge implies a Role that mainly deals with Named, yes? Or am I misinterpreting?

I think Command is more likely, if Rule is off the table, because Cat is famous as a brilliant military commander, and the setting and context of her Speaking are military. She wasn't just Judging other Named; she was reprimanding a lesser officer in her chain of Command.

I think Command or Rule are also more likely because Cat's Role involves much dealing with regular folks. Her Role won't be limited to dealing with other Named. She won't be like the Intercessor that way.

The Intercessor is a shadow, almost unknown save by the Named until very recently. Cat will be a very public figure, leader, general, diplomat, and administrator, Ruling over people of all kinds.

Raivshard

An Arbiter can deal with anyone and render Judgement as they see fit. I see no implication that it should only deal with Named. That said, having explicit power over Named even more than others is certainly one of the things she's been working towards.

What I find interesting is how everyone seems to assume that it will be a Name solely from Below, as that doesn't really fit with the narrative she's crafting. I think the Name will be neutral in that respect.

I'll toss up a theory while I'm here:

Considering how strong her ability to Speak is before her Name has fully coalesced, I think that one of her aspects will allow her to remove or suspend their abilities; to judge them fit or unfit ... Or Worthy, as it were.

Frivolous

Yeah, I think it is very possible Cat becomes a hero or neutral, given that her natural tendency is to Above, not Below, as Kairos noted.

Which would cause all kinds of problems for the Truce and Terms, because she heads the villains.

Governing the abilities of other Named is possible, yes. It meshes well with the apparent power and significance of her imminent Name.

Still don't believe Arbiter is very likely, though. It lacks any kind of military or governing connotation. It would be a narrow Name, whereas Cat's Name seems likely to be vast and almost divine, in the vein of Living Goddess or She Who Must Be Obeyed or Great One.

Raivshard

The Queen of Names

SpaceDorf

The Dreaded Judge

Tenthyr

Considering Cathrines whole life is based about bossing people around and her prior experience with Speaking, I'm not surprised that the moment she found herself aligned with her forming Name she was able to do it- she had the power that moment and knew precisely how it could be used. If black is a claimant he might be able to do the same.

caoimhinh

She must have really missed that power, hahaha.

Also, wasn't Catherine's ability to loot Aspects limited to only one? Now she can loot two out of the same body.

Also, considering that it seems to be standard practice to give the Black Queen any body of villains and all bodies of Revenants that are killed in the battle, I wonder how many artifact-aspects Catherine has stored.

Must be quite a few, considering she got half a dozen just from this battle.

Oshi

I don't remember there being a limit just that the dead king burned out some aspects and in the Pilgrims place she only took one to prevent weakening him beyond where he was.

caoimhinh

There was an established limit of only one, that was shown every single time she did it.

It went to the point where she had to choose which one to pick, because she could not take both of the available ones from Revenants. She was limited to one at a time when she had Take as an aspect, then she was limited to only one artifact-aspect lootable from a corpse when she became Sovereign of Moonless Nights.

This was shown as First Under the Night, when she took aspects from the Spellblade and from the Thief of Stars, it was explicitly and clearly stated that Catherine had to choose one aspect. And the text showed us Catherine analyzing what she felt from each one and trying to guess their uses before picking because she could not take both and thus needed to choose the one that would be more useful.

Also, the Dead King only destroys one aspect.

This is the first time we see Catherine looting more than one aspect from a corpse.

Either she got able to do that during the 2-years timeskip or she just got able to do that right now thanks to being closer to her new Name and thus being stronger.

Shveiran

Small correction: I think the Dead King destroys aspects that may lead you to free yourself from his control (allegedly). I don't think there is an hard limit on how many aspects he can do that with out of the three a Revenant has.

caoimhinh

Hmm, but that's an assumption. And I doubt it considering that one of the aspects the Thief of Stars had in her was about freeing oneself and escaping. Plus, it's unlikely that every single Revenant so far had an aspect that would have let them escape Neshamah's control. A more likely explanation is that one of the aspects is sacrificed in the process of raising them as Revenants.

But in the end it's all speculation on our part. We currently don't know exactly why or how he destroys one of the aspects.

And I didn't say that the Dead King cannot destroy more than one, just that he only destroys one in each Revenant, not two as Oshi implied in their reply.

Zach

You might be thinking of her old Aspect, but what she's doing now uses the Night.

Basically Catherine gets high flexibility of use of stolen Aspects in exchange for only getting to use them (I think) once.

caoimhinh

No, I specifically cited examples of her aspect, her time as Sovereign of Moonless Nights and as First Under the Night

. In every single case, she can only loot one aspect from a person.

There is an established limit of exactly one, and that was reinforced by having to choose which one to take to make the artifact, as there's no point in debating which one to loot if you can take both.

This is the first time we have ever seen her loot 2 aspects from the same corpse.

Miles

Noun

zwischenbach (plural zwischenbachs)

(chess, rare) A zwischenzug that is a check.

Noun

zwischenzug (plural zwischenzugs)

(chess) A tactical move which interrupts the execution of the current plan.

caoimhinh

When I read the chapter's title, I knew what was going to happen would either be something very good, or something very bad.

I'll try to offer a larger explanation about the term.

Ok, so do you guys recall those interludes in volume 5 when Amadeus was burning bits of Procer and the Grand Alliance chased after him, while Vivienne was in Laure getting depressed thinking she was not important, and losing her Name, and Hakram had to chop off his hand so Vivi would get a self-esteem boost and snap out of it?

Good.

Back then, there were two chapters called "Zugzwang" which means "compulsion to move" in German. A Zugzwang is basically forcing your opponent to make a move at a time when any move will put them at a disadvantage. This can be done in several ways, either by simply putting them in check or by positioning the pieces so that all the options available to the opponent are bad ones that will either cost them a piece or make them lose a good position.

This is somewhat related. It's similar, yet different.

In Chess, a "Zwischenzug", (meaning in-between move or intermediate move in German), is a chess tactic in which instead of playing the expected move (commonly a "recapture", which is taking an enemy's piece that has just taken one of your pieces), the player first interposes another move which often (but not always) causes either a greater or more immediate threat to which the opponent must answer, and only plays the expected move after the opponent has moved to handle that threat.

Now a Zwischenschach (which means "in-between check") is when instead of moving what was expected, you first play a surprising check that the opponent did not consider when plotting a sequence of moves, thus forcing them to respond to the check first (an obligation in chess), and then you play the move that you were meant to do before anyway, but now you got more out of that exchange, either in materials or positioning.

Basically, a Zwischenschach it's a Zwischenzug done through a check.

This was the Grand Alliance's plan, attacking these places so the Dead King would be forced to respond and weaken his defense of the Capital of Hainaut which the GA troops would then attack, but Neshamah played his Zwischenschach first.

That's how it relates to the end of the chapter, the objectives of the campaign on both sides are still largely the same, and the end goals remain, the originally intended targets still need to be attacked... but now there's a more immediate threat that needs to be taken care of.

It also relates to the Epigraph, which talks about the importance of seeing further ahead if one wants to win. A zwischenschach won't happen to you if you are attentive and able to anticipate your opponent. Though of course that's easier said than done.

Sorry if the explanation was too long.

P.S: I totally called it, that mysteriously missing army of two hundred thousand undead was gonna bite them in the ass. Story logic practically demanded it.

Navi-Hank

Story logic? Regular logic called that

Liliet

Im pretty sure the chapters back then were Zwischenzug, not Zugzwang

caoimhinh

Weird. I may be under a Mandela's Effect, as I clearly recall it as Zugzwang.

I can't even claim that the title was changed afterwards, since there are comments calling it zwischenzug right there in 2018.

An alternative explanation is that I jumped to a different timeline where the only difference is the title of those interludes. But that seems unlikely.

Liliet

More or less unlikely than a typo in Berenstein Bears? XD

Burlyraven

It's been known that Cat's Name would be inclined towards rule and supreme authority, but it's interesting that she seems to have so much power over others, without even having an established Name.

Archer's always been wild, and expecting her to be eternally loyal to Cat is foolish (especially seeing as it would go against the roles carved by the Calamity), but something about how pouty she's being in this chapter doesn't sit right. She may be wild, but she knows Cat's an authoritarian; this kind of interaction should have been expected, no matter how close they are.

Also, this "sudden" turn of events isn't that shocking. It was kind of obvious. I legitimately thought Cat even recognized it as likely in-story. The only major problem I can think of is the Dead King managed to capture Klaus, and now he has a new Bind with high level knowledge of the campaign.

caoimhinh

Maybe, but not necessarily. Cat's new Name seems to be about overseeing Named, keeping order, administering judgment, delivering justice, and punishment for their actions. Now that might sound like a Hero, but let's not forget that Catherine is one of Below's because of her methods, not because of her end goals.

About Archer, this was not about her being loyal to Cat. You can have discussions and fights with the people you love and trust, and this isn't even the worst disagreement Cat and Indrani had ever had.

The reason she is angry is because:

A) one of the people who could be considered her siblings died, so she is grieving.

B) another of those "siblings" is blaming her for Lysander's death, and accusing her of not caring at all.

Of course she is pissed off. She might even be feeling horribly responsible about it, as she was there and failed to save him.

This goes a long way into Indrani's past and her relationship with the pseudo band of five that Ranger raised. They resent her because they think she doesn't care about them, and she found a Band of Five outside of her "family", they want the place that the Woe have in Indrani's heart.

Also, Indrani was forthcoming to Cat and probably the rest of the Woe that she is going to eventually leave to follow her wanderlust, her pursuit of the Horizon is the core wish within her. That does not mean she isn't loyal to Catherine, and being snippy at her now that she is angry doesn't mean much either.

And yeah, Cat should have known that army was going to appear, but then again she really couldn't do anything about it, since they failed to find that army despite their best efforts and couldn't just wait for it to appear.

Shveiran

Pretty much, yeah. Spot on.

What I'm very interested in, is why Silver is blaming Indrani.

I mean, yeah, there is a lot of baggae there - "you tied me in a sack filled with vermins I was afraid of" kind of baggae - but the Huntress struck me as rather clear sighted so far. Hanno would not have chosen her as leader of the contingent's Heroes otherwise, after all.

So I can buy her overreacting, but I'm assuming that she had a clue to start from, whether or not she misinterpreted it. I believe her Band of Five arrived on the scene momentarily? So she might have seen something?

zaddek

Really? I didn't think it was out of character for Silver to blame her or that there was any sort of clue that Archer was responsible.

The story goes out of it's way to mention that Silver and Archer almost always fight whenever they are around each other. Her dislike of Archer is mentioned constantly in other's POV when she is brought up. That kind of baggage and that Archer was there when he died? Of course Silver made a snide comment about Archer getting him killed and Archer reacted violently. That's who they've been show (or really told since I don't think we've really seen them together in a chapter) to be.

People usually tend to act like they used to around old friends/family instead of how they currently are. Current day Silver might be clear headed, but around Archer she's going to revert (somewhat) to her mindset from back in her days studying under Ranger. Archer will too. We saw something similar with Concoctor and Archer back in Stronghold.

Shveiran

Well, sure, you are right. I agree on pretty much all counts.

I just feel that what has been described is MORE than what we saw so far, and wonder if there was an additional ingredient in the brew.

Like, this is not just a snide comment.

Silver got on the scene, witnessing an undead abomination stepping over the corpse of one of her acquaintances to cleave off the arm of another of her former bully, and then decided Archer was so much to blame for what happened to punch her in the face. That sounds to me like she actually believed, on some level, that she caused it; that Archer didn't just fail to kill the unstoppable Revenant before their companion fell.

I mean, sure, she was grieving and all that, so maybe I'm reading too much into it.

But it strikes me as the Huntress needing a catalyst to get so far so quickly.

Then again, maybe that catalyst is simply her grief over Beastmaster? it could be.

Crash

Your timeline makes no sense with the Interludes in mind. Beastmaster would have died before the band left the cave system.

That said, you're jumping at shadows in this. This makes perfect sense with the knowledge we have, a bad relationship (in which some extreme bullying, honestly even torture, you could argue, in the incident with the insects, figures heavily), some very real danger in her mission to the caves, where several revenants came after her and she only really escaped because Cat and Akua intervened, and then she comes out of that into a heavy battle where some nasty surprises came out.

Then, when it's all over, she finds out one of the people she grew up with is dead AND he was assigned with Indrani? Heck, if Indrani passed by, going about her own business, and didn't look like she was bawling her eyes out about Beastmaster's death?

There's no way the Silver Huntress didn't jump on that, to take out some of her grief as anger at a very clear target.

The knowledge we have very easily explains all this. What I would like to know is why the hells you think Indrani would be out there trying to get folks killed in the middle of this war. That is a much more pressing question.

Liliet

Don't forget John also died while on an outing with Archer. The sheer history here overrides any evidence. Archer might have been shielding him with her life right before Silver's eyes, and she'd still accuse her of being at fault, because emotions this strong and old override reason like SNAP

Morgenstern

The Troubadour was instigating, once again. I have been vaguely disappointed ever since the last chapter that Cat did not immediately go after him to make that stop, NOW, at least now that it should have become clearer what kind of threat his always instigating strife (for whatever reason; another part of his "rapaciousness"?) is. He has been doing this before (she accounted for it during the meeting of the Villains), it seems a bad idea to not keep a closer eye on him and prevent such things, even more so in the current situation.

Shveiran

This is true. It might be the simple answer.

And I agree, I hope we are treated to a "Cat disciplines the Troubador" scene in the coming chapters.

edrey

well, cat's name would be queen something, not black queen i believe, not with the new age coming but really, the curiosity is killing me.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Lately Queen.

Crash

I hope you have an absolutely amazing week, mate.

Aston Whiteman

The whole purpose of the war imo seems to be to provide Cat with a Name and push the Bard out of the way.

Then the Dead King has access to a good/evil Named balancer who won't keep interfering.

I'm sure Cat becomes the new Bard.

I mean Cat is basically a weapon against the gods.

Adrian_V

Ok i will opine more of the chapter later when i am more awake but there is 1 big question i have: how? i mean did he move that army without anyone knowing or seeing it? I hope they Pilgrim knows how he did it.

Anomandris

Underground? Dangerous tactic doing that for human armies long distance, but not that risky for the Dead...

Matthew

I kind of hope they did...

Because the Dwarves are at war with the Dead King as well.
Cat got the Drow out of the way and essentially ceded the entire Calernian underground to the dwarves...

The Dead King made no such treaty and the Dwarves have no desire for the Dead King to win.

mamm0nn

But the dwarves don't control the shallow underground, you can dig for a bit before you dig into their territory.

Adrian V

Is mostly that they are pragmatist, so long as you neither touch a tunnel from them or find something shinny they are happy to look the other way

Djinn O'Cide

A Zwischenzug (literally an "in-between move") is a tactical move (usually a check or an attack which can't be ignored), which breaks up the expected sequence of moves, with the result of a gained tempo for the player who makes it.

For example, if you take your opponent's queen with your queen, expecting that he'll recapture your queen on his turn, he may instead check you—and then after you reply to the check, recapture your queen. In this case, the check was a zwischenzug.

dadycoool

The Name begins to take shape, and the Queen SPEAKS a Decree upon Creation.

Juff

Typo Thread:

learned as kid > learned as a kid gambled > gamblers
as the edge > at the edge
Silber > Silver
I got nod > I got nods
to be a fresh > to be fresh the drow the > the drow to night: here > night: there
Even the band > Even though the band might be limited > might have been limited Twilight ways and > Twilight Ways and though, it cost > though, and it cost ways form my > ways from my parties and found > parties had found

There was a bit (extra space in the front)
Hakam > Hakram

Javvies

I'm pretty sure that the potential Cat Name stuff is more evidence for a Name along the lines of Arbitrator (with or without descriptors).

Troubadour is suspicious. I suspect that he was helping cause trouble for personal entertainment.

Gigantes have safely arrived – that's a good thing.

On the other hand, it seems like the unexpected army gutted, or at least mauled, and effectively stopped the other army from advancing further.

And the Dead King has a tested and proven hard counter to Night. That's going to be a major problem for the Drow battlefield. In addition to the problems it causes for Cat and Akua and the drow in Procer.

Morgenstern

I wouldn't put it past them to do it for politicking as well, not just personal entertainment (though that as well, likely as not). Make way for his ambitions by shining a bad light on 'higher-ups' in the Named hierarchy. Maybe, just maybe it's even a drive to let things get so bad he might be allowed to eat a Named's soul eventually, or at least that there might be so much chaos his doing so might somehow get overlooked? (Not that this would have to work out, but he might still be speculating on it. He might be brilliant or at least sly in other ways, but he's still rapacious, after all. Probably it blinds him to seeing the hurt in his actions.)

Morgenstern

... past him .. damn you wordpress, implement an option to edit posts already.

caoimhinh

WordPress really is weird. Not only there's not an option to edit posts, but I think it needs to be customized to each site.

I have seen WordPress implemented differently on different sites, some in horrible fashion.

PGTE has the best one I have seen so far, here all comments remain neat and the thread of replies is long.

In the Wandering Inn site for example, after 2 replies on a thread, the words of the comments will start to pile up vertically, until the point where there's only a single line of letters. Urgh. Shivers

Matthew Wells

That still happens here on mobile.

Sinead

I wonder where Mirror Knight is?

Konstantin von Karstein

Maybe he staid behind to help Klaus's army? Or he's somewhere else in the camp?

Anomandris

Or maybe he is the one that got turned rather than Klaus as people are suspecting....

Shveiran

Damn. So soon after the mentoring started? Now I'm really worried.

mamm0nn

Aw yeah. My odd-ball theory from last chapter remains feasible; Sage may have grasped DK's knowledge of ascension and is now another DK body to be used. The body has not been burned.

Also, DK has brute-forced the Grey Legion into their old groove again. The unbeatable force appearing at the worst time to check or break armies, rather than a single revenant to check a single Named. Guess that the Alliance having three or more means to counter the Grey Legion appearing really didn't sit well with him. I hope Cat makes sure to warn the Sisters that the Grey Legion may march to their front now.

Morgenstern

One would assume that the bodies have been burned, as stated as standard method before? The important bit after that statement seems to have been a) that all the bodies of the freshly dead Named HAVE been collected (wasn't sure for Beastmaster) and b) that Cat got to rip out aspects (before the heavily implied burning afterwards, even though it was not outright stated again in this chapter that they would do this, after having been described in the one before), but only from Revenants and Villains, not the Heroes.

What a waste, really. One would think that in such an all-or-nothing war, moral conundrums about ripping out aspects would be trumped by pragmatism _for the time being_. Too afraid to create a precedent?

mamm0nn

If Cat has no authority to gain the body but the writing suggest it hasn't been burned yet, then it may not have been burned yet. Also Pilgrim just showed up so Providence or coincidence may have seen to them not burning the Sage yet.

panic

She spoke. She Spoooooooookkeee. Aahhhhhhhhhhhh

thearpox23

"So that's what you got out of this, Neshamah, I thought. You tested the pillars and wards on our Firstborn, and when they proved effective you used that Crab lurking around somewhere to refit your Grey Legion into drow-killers."

What absolute bull. And I do mean that. More often than not this story takes me with its good sense and structure, but there are other times like this where an obvious play is written like some sort of dramatic reveal that's supposed to shed light on Neshamah's past tactics.

The guy has an entire front to try out his tricks on the Firstborn on. And barring that, Rumena's raids over the past two years, or even random drow detachments that might be plastered in off places across the front.

Tactically speaking, testing new designs against the same army you're going to be using them against later is the absolute worst decision one could make. What if there's an imperfection and the enemy finds a way to exploit? In fact, it's missing the whole point of having a disembodied intelligence that can possess any creature under its control; the ability to have such tests to be carried out several thousands of miles away and without waiting for the opposing army to arrive.

Instead, he loses a bunch fortifications and has his elite troops twiddle their thumbs during what appears to be a last minute equipment retrofitting.

alele

Would you risk your Elite Troops with untested tech? This particular scenario made him able to test his anti-drow counter-measure against Cat. If anyone had a counter it would be her. Since no counter-stroke came he can now be assured of its current efficiency – and that it will take time for counter-measures to appear. So for now his Grey Legion will ALWAYS beat the drow on equal engagements. The same way the alliance only recently started to use the Unravellers in big engagements recently, since they want their edge to last longer (until it gets inevitably countered) so they saved their big new reveal for this campaign only.

thearpox23

Cat is no less likely to get a counter ready within a couple days of encountering the issue than she was to have it ready from the get go. And she is only NOW seeing the thing as a serious issue. So if I want my troops to achieve anything worth a damn with my shiny new toy, then yes, I'd want it revealed where it can make a difference.

All that said, I'd like to retract my objections on account that Cat is dumb. As in, her inner thoughts elevate her own importance and miss the elephant in the room. Sage is dead. He was the one capable of countering Grey Legion's new enhancements, and Neshamah can only now commit that he is out of the way. When thinking about the tactics and strategies involved, the whole thing makes sense if Cat's monologue is off 100%.

mamm0nn

Why would she know of Sage? Named are notoriously cagey about their Aspects and don't just summarise themselves by their Role when introducing. Even if she already knows the guy, then she needs not know his specialisation.

Practicality

Honestly I think he's just intending to grind them down while luring 'em in deeper into his territory, you need to remember he is frightened enough of the WB that he for the most part stays cooped up in his territory till she loosened his leash and removed the sword from his neck, he knows Kats track record and that she has beaten the intercessors plots before so it would make sense for him to be wary while he pokes and probes her and her army for strength and weaknesses.

IIRC he also has a story driven need to be this ancient enduring evil, that suffers just enough minor setbacks to stop the gods above from sending some provenance guided prick from wiping him off the face of the planet.

If the only endgame was to stop if not kill this expedition I'd assume that he or one of his proxies would have torched (if not spread a plague to) the fields and cattle, hell he could've just send some groups of revenants aided by a flock of flying critters to intercept the supply trains.

After all Tactics win battles, logistics win wars.

Quite possibly a cat

Or Cat got the ordering wrong. DK had some antinight stuff on the drow front. Presumably this is a more refined version

Shveiran

Wouldn't the Sisters have informed her though, if that was the case?

thearpox23

Sister's can't inform Cat of jack if all your stuff is dead. And if your counters are to actually be effective and the drow overextends they should be.

That said, I'd like to repeat (because I can't edit my main post,) that all my annoyance was entirely misdirected. Cat is dumb, the reason Neshamah made the reveal now was because he managed to snipe Sage. That's why the timing is awkward, not because of the testing nonsense.

Shveiran

I was replying to Quite possibly a Cat; I meant, if a counter to the Night was displayed on the drow front, I'm pretty sure the Sisters would notice whether or not the army involved got wiped, and pass that knowledge to the remaining Generals and their Prophet.

We have been shown that they can commune with her directly and periodically do, so why wouldn't they?

caoimhinh

Well, didn't we see the previous version of this stuff in the visions that the Sisters showed Catherine back in Chapter 12: Contest?

Honestly, there were already statements on the Dead King evolving his tactics and adapting, I don't know why she and everyone insist that Neshamah "can't learn, not really" when he has shown time and time again that he is constantly learning. At most he is simply stuck in the same personality and thought patterns that he had in life or the beginnings of his undeath.

He is not a mere undead, he is the freaking god of the undead.

The visions that Sve Noc passed Catherine showed:

A) The Dead King is able to slip past the Drow scouts with entire armies now.

B) He has adapted his armies to fight in the different fronts and use different tactics against each host. Even having specialized units.

C) The tactics change over time, and using a trick against him repeatedly doesn't work, which means Neshamah continues to learn.

D) The Dead King has adapted to fight Night and units that previously disrupted magic but not Night, now are capable of disrupting Night.

E) He has created artifacts that can direct Night away from the Drow down into the earth, thus rendering them unable to use the Secrets and their resurrection tricks.

So yeah, Catherine knew that the Dead King was making advances in creating Anti-Drow tactics and Anti-Night artifacts. This is simply the latest version, and it is allocated to elite troops instead of the mooks that held artifacts of similar effect in the Drow Front.

mamm0nn

What you said is pretty much correct: "At most he is simply stuck in the same personality and thought patterns that he had in life or the beginnings of his undeath." Neshamah can gain new information and think, obviously, same for Binds and Revenants. Just being able to remember Cat's name proves that much.

Your issues lie with you taking the statement too literally. Neshamah cannot learn, as in what he wasn't already able of or prone to do in life, he cannot do now. He can never make the same mistake twice and prepare for tricks pulled before, because he already knew that before ascension. He can create new magical spells (by Trismedeus theory only, probably.) to counteract Night.

But if it were him that Cat offered peace and her Winter to instead of the still alive Sisters, then she would've failed. That would be something completely new to him that he cannot learn, not even to escape WB's grasp, because it's something he wouldn't have done or known in life. And it's quite likely that his words upon introduction that he won't hold a grudge no matter what Cat does to him are true, because he never learned how to hold a grudge while alive.

Neshamah prepared for his apotheosis for a long time, it's quite likely that he knew this known undead limitations and learned all the skills he knew he'd need in the afterdeath. He can still gain and interpret information, that's not necessarily learning as they meant it.

mamm0nn

Better example: The Winter King chewed off his own foot to break the eternal cycle. This kind of unprecedented plan is something that Dead King couldn't do, because it would be something that goes against what he was when he was first created.

DK is more like the other fey: As much as he can learn and interpret and interact, he cannot truly change certain inherent and stubborn traits that lay at the heart of him. His are more subtle and less meant to be exploited, but they're there somewhere, camouflaged by his personality and mystique.

Salt

That doesn't make any sense. At all.

You have to test it on Drow wielding Night to see if his counter magic works, before relying on it in a critical situation. If he tests it on any Mighty anywhere in the world, no matter how secretively, the Sisters will know about it because the ARE Night itself, this was explicitly mentioned. He can't hide the existence of the damned things from the Sisters seeing through Mighty eyes any more than Cat can hide weapons from him seeing through Revenant eyes.

And as for whether or not the Dead King knows the Night works this way? Of course he does. He's literally the original mortal that went through Apotheosis as a minor god that sees through the eyes of their minions. He'd have to be an absolute idiot to not suspect that the exact same applies to the sisters who went through the same kind of Apotheosis. He'd all but know for a certainty after the first time a tactic he tried on one battlefield was suddenly made public knowledge to all Drow on every battlefield, and you bet your sweet ass that in a protracted war this has happened at least once.

At which point the question is, will the Sisters tell their literal high priestess who is actively fighting a war against the Dead King about his newly developed weapons? Well, yeah. Of course they will. So why in the world would the Dead King bother wasting fruitless effort trying to hide it?

IDKWhoitis

Can't be too happy about calling it...

Well that leaves which brand of fuckery is Nesh going to try to block off Twilight tactics. And the actual damage report of the other army. I'm betting on them having faced 50% casualties. Nesh wouldn't destroy the army, as that would spawn heroes and give too much weight to Above, but he would savage it to the point of being a heavy cost.

beleester

I had to go back and reread the chapter with the battle plan (Chapter 47), because I'd completely forgotten what those cities were and what Klaus was supposed to be doing with them.

Short recap: Malmedit controls the network of tunnels that the Dead King is using to send in reinforcements. Juvelun is a nearby fortress-town that holds a big army. Klaus's job was to bait out the force at Juvelun by threatening Malmedit. Ideally he'd take the city, collapse the tunnels, and then turn around to destroy the Juvelun army, but he's mostly a distraction – so long as he's out there, he's stopping the armies from reinforcing Hainaut.

So Klaus found himself sandwiched between an army of 100k (big, but something he expected to defeat), and a new army of 200k (probably too big). Not great, but remember, he was the distraction – if Klaus retreats in good shape, then he's still keeping 300k dead soldiers busy. And the main thrust is still going to threaten the capital on schedule. And "What if this missing army moves to stop one of the prongs of our assault?" had to be at the top of the list in contingency planning, so I'm pretty confident Klaus's army can handle itself.

No, my question is, why was it there to begin with? Did the DK just pick one of the three prongs and decide to smash it as hard as he could? Or is there something big in Malmedit that he was looking to protect?

Shveiran

I was going to say that Neshamah could smash the army with that kind of numerical superiority and that he could chase it with the tireless undeads.

Then I remembered that if it looks like they are getting sandwiched, Klaus can retreat to the Twilight Ways.

caoimhinh

I'm sure they will be some reason why they can't just do that. At least not without taking many casualties. Cat's current Field Army was able to open 72 gates, which is a damnably low number when your army numbers hundreds of thousands. Besides, it was said that "most weren't even large enough for two people, with a mere twenty of proper size to let carts and engines through". and undead mages can mess with them if they are nearby.

So as an evacuation measure, the Twilight Ways are only really usable for the Drow as they all have Night and thus are able to get in the Twilight Ways easier than other species. Back in chapter 57: Battery, it only took them "30 breaths" to evacuate a host of close to ten thousand. If the human armies wanted to evacuate while under attack, they would need to open the gates and evacuate while large parts of them are keeping the attacking undead at bay, and once the undead army gets close the gates would get disrupted.

That said, the Twilight Ways are still horribly underused.

Just opening a gate under a Revenant would be enough to destroy it as the whole realm would violently burn them. And this should be a weaponized method for Catherine as she can simply will it for gates to be made around her. She barely needs a flick of the wrist to open one. The Drow too should have developed techniques to do similar things. Like, when the dead are breaching the Gloom, open a gate to Twilight right in front of that breach, it would at the very least buy some time and at best it would be like an artillery blast that would destroy any undead nearby.

And I still strongly object to having the supply lines going through Creation instead of through the Twilight Ways. It seems horribly inefficient and also an unnecessary risk.

Daniel E

Oof, in every sense of the word. Even going on the assumption that Klau's forces escaped through Twilight, I'm betting they got whooped hard; half dead or crippled. This sounds like a move that could only come from DK's star General, The Prince of Bones, which would explain why he wasn't with the Grey Legion. On a lighter note, Cat starting to get her Name powers back is very cool. I'm still thinking that her Name will formally be 'Intercessor', since Wandering Bard only has it attributed as a nickname / insult.

Crash

Something completely unimportant but have we heard of the Early Bell before? I can't remember it.

Morning bell is most likely 8am so would this be 4am?

(Sidenote: what kind of absolute bastard rings a bell at 4 am, the real monster.)

caoimhinh

No, this is the first time "Early Bell" was mentioned. It seems to be equivalent to "First Bell" which was mentioned before.

Although it has never been properly explained, it was intuited that each Bell is 4 hours, and yeah First Bell corresponds to 4 a.m.

There are 6 Bells:

First Bell -or Early Bell in this chapter- (4 a.m), Morning Bell (8 a.m), Noon Bell (12 m), Afternoon Bell (4 p.m), Evening Bell (8 p.m), and Midnight Bell (12 a.m).

P.S: many people have to wake up at 4 a.m to get ready for the day's work, even in our modern world. From personal experience, I know this is true for farmers and ranchers, but many other professions, especially those of low and mid socioeconomic stratum, also wake up at those ungodly hours.

Crash

I'm aware, I was one of those people for a while. Ringing a bell at that time tho? Heck no bud. Wake up the whole town for funsies.

Also yeah, that checks out with the bells I knew (tough I didn't remember first bell either haha)

tigerquoll

Typos

The Silber Huntress blinked in discomfort, then reluctantly stabbed her spear into the ground. -> the Silver Huntress

I got nod. -> I got nods?

Even the band was a good one, well-fitted, I suspected that in her eyes ... -> Even if the band?

I'd seen the Grey Legion before, those hulking dead encased in armour so thick it more of a rampart. -> it was more a rampant?

Liliet

Rampart is right, it's fortification

Frivolous

I believe the heroes of the Alliance will soon become (even more) terrified of Catherine, once word gets out that she can Speak.

The information leak will probably be through Alexis, once she reports on the occurrence to Hanno. Hanno will of course warn his heroes that Catherine can Speak, and that they should avoid provoking her into Speaking at them.

I think it will be really really good (or bad, depending) for Cat's reputation that she can Speak to heroes, and that the first person she Spoke to was a hero. She can now tell Valiant Champion to screw herself and Rafaella would be forced to do it. And Cat has a very good reason to bully Rafaella.

I wonder if the Truce and Terms have any clause that mentions exactly what kind of punishments can be given to heroes by the rep for the villains.

Hell, Cat could now Speak to Hanno. What does it mean for the Truce and Terms when the rep for the villains can Speak to the rep for the heroes? What are the limits of Speaking? Can Cat now tell Hanno to give orders to heroes, without giving away that he's operating under her command?

Could Cat duplicate Malicia's trick of implanting subliminal commands?

In other news: I wonder what Klaus knows about the Alliance's overall strategy. What military and political secrets could Klaus the Bind give over to Keter? It's horrifying to think of.

Can Klaus fight the Dead King's power over him even temporarily? That is a really important question now.

Abrakadabra

Nah, you are overselling speaking.

caoimhinh

- 1) You are overthinking stuff
- 2) The kind of punishments that can be given to heroes by the rep for the villains is exactly NONE. Hanno is the only one who can punish heroes and Cat is the only one who can punish Villains. Unless extraordinary circumstances arise, like self-defense or preventing the death of an ally.
- 3) Speaking is not that powerful, and not that easy to use. Many Named can Speak, but not all make a great thing out of it. There's a reason only Malicia is so dangerous with it.
- 4) We don't know if Klaus is dead yet. Nor if the army under Klaus is gone. Odds are that the situation is dire, but it's not yet unsalvageable.

Frivolous

You must have missed how Cat was able to dock the pay of the Silver Huntress in this very chapter. So she can definitely punish heroes. Unless you think that docking someone's pay is not a punishment? I'm truly uncertain how much heroes value things like money.

Therefore it's only the extent to which Cat can punish heroes that is uncertain.

I think you must also have forgotten that Black was able to Speak to Akua and make her stab herself with her own knife.

If self-injury is on the table, making Rafaella do something dishonorable could also be possible.

Cat was strong in Speaking even when she had the transitional Name of Squire. When she has a mature Name, I suspect she'll be Malicia's equal. And she's more subtle and crafty than she once was.

To explain why I think Cat will be able to match Malicia – Remember that her Name started to arise when she declared to Tariq and Hanno that she would put the East, meaning Praes, in order. To defeat Malicia, she must in some way be Malicia's equal.

Thinking Klaus is still alive seems very optimistic to me, but I grant that maybe the worst was indeed avoided. I really hope so, actually. I quite like and admire Klaus.

Mental Mouse

Cat can dock the Huntress' pay and alter assignments, because Cat is her commander – she could do the same for any other person under her command, Named or otherwise.

Isaac Martinez

Cat is a thresher.

She doesn't judge in base of morality, or wills. She jugdes the Act, not the Conviction. So, I don't think Justice have anything to do here.

She is a fervor believer in consequences and is a woman of her word.

She looks for peace, but is not afraid of looking the hard way.

She is the daughter of the Carrion Lord, looking for trinkets between the dead. And is a good friend of Crows.

Creepcluster

Would it not be funny if Cat became "Dread Empress of Callow" and Amadeus became "Good King of Praes".

Just had the thought

Frivolous

That would be funny, yes.

Chapter 61: Adouber

"Fear is the prerequisite to any genuine learning; anything that can be learnt without questioning the foundations of your world is essentially decorative."

– Dread Emperor Sorcerous

It was easy to forget that the Grey Pilgrim was, for all the power of his Name and the favour of the Ophanim, very much mortal. An old man with an old man's frailties, whose relentless march towards my camp had brought to the brink of collapse. His loose grey robes looked half made of dust and even drabber than usual, his rheumy blue were clouded with exhaustion. It made me uncomfortable to look at, someone of that strength so openly at the end of their rope. His brandy was sipped at carefully and he declined my offer of sending for a warm meal, claiming that exhausted as he was he'd probably retch it right out. After gathering his bearings some, the Peregrine needed no prompting to begin speaking.

"The campaign went well, at first," Tariq said. "The Enemy's raids were heavy and sustained, but we held strong through the days and the nights belonged to the Firstborn."

I'd poured myself a cup of brandy as well before dropping back into my seat. I had a feeling I was going to need a stiff drink before this conversation came to an end, and maybe second when it had.

"The last messenger I got from your column told me the army was preparing to pass Juvelun," I said.

The Iron Prince's part of the campaign plan had been relatively straightforward, when it came down to it. His smaller column – fifty-four thousand to my seventy – had left days earlier than mine from one of our defensive strongholds to the east of Neustal, just north of the town of Cassain. It'd then quickly advanced north along the old mining roads. Our intention had been for Prince Klaus' army to draw the undead army at the town of Juvelun into battle, as the town sat over a passage through the hills towards the central valley where the capital lay, the army holding it also being the undead force closest to said capital.

Unfortunately the army in question had refused to leave Juvelun, instead remaining in a dug-in and defensible position that it would be difficult for Prince Klaus' numerically inferior army to invest. We'd anticipated that was a possibility, though, and planned accordingly. To the north, further up the mining road, lay the city of Malmedit. To the Dead King it was a place of some strategic importance, as the mine shafts surrounding the city had been connected to tunnels he'd had dug through the northern hills and he now used Malmedit as a major staging area to pour warbands into the lowlands of Hainaut.

If the Iron Prince made it to Malmedit he could collapse the tunnels, which would be a significant setback for Keter. Knowing that, our working assumption had been that if Prince Klaus' army kept marching north towards the city the undead army in Juvelun would have to engage him: the Dead King would just be pissing away his eastern road into Hainaut otherwise. Yet we had, it seemed, made a grievous mistake along the way.

"The plan seemed a success for the first few days of the march on Malmedit," the Peregrine said. "Raiding parties began harassing our supply lines, and though young Hanno kept them open sword in hand our generals believed this to be the prelude to an enemy attack against our back."

The old man paused, pressing down an errant tuft of white hair from the sparse crown around his head and sipping at his brandy.

"Yet the days passed," the Grey Pilgrim said, "and that attack failed to take place."

I grimaced. That'd be the point where I would have smelled a trap, so I refused to believe that a commander as experienced as the Prince of Hannover had not.

"I'm guessing he ordered a heavy war party forward as reconnaissance," I said.

Suspicious as he would be, Prince Klaus wouldn't have turned back at the first suspicion. The Dead King could have been bluffing, or simply writing off Malmedit as a lost cause while focusing his attention elsewhere. In his place I would have encamped relatively close to the force I knew I could handle in a pitched battle – the Juvelun army – and sent out a strong contingent to probe the enemy's defenses ahead.

"Six thousand horse," Tariq agreed. "With the Witch of the Woods as magical muscle and two champions to escort her. One day shy of Malmedit itself they ran into the enemy's own vanguard."

I drank from my cup, fingers tight around the silver. With horses and that calibre of sorcery on their side, they would have gotten away mostly clean. It was the strategic situation being described that had me aghast. The Grey Pilgrim had earlier intimated that the army two hundred thousand we'd thought in the far north of the principality had been the one waiting for our eastern column in Malmedit, which meant pressing an attack forward against it would have been suicide. The Iron Prince would suddenly have found himself stuck between a massive force to the north and a smaller one to the southwest, the latter even being able to cut his supply lines if it was willing to bleed for it – and when was Keter ever unwilling to bleed?

“How bad was it?” I grimly asked.

“Even using the Twilight Ways, the war party only returned quickly enough to give us two days of forewarning,” the old man said.

Which sounded like a lot, if you’d never commanded an army. But I had and so I knew they were ungainly, lumbering things. Especially when being made to turn around.

“You retreated, I assume,” I slowly said.

“That was our intent,” Tariq said. “Until the Young Slayer and the Harrowed Witch found an enemy raiding party to our south yet strangely heading away from the army, further south. They followed it down and-”

My eyes narrowed. The pieces were falling into place.

“- found the dead dismantling the mining road,” I finished quietly.

The old man nodded. So that’d been Neshamah’s game: by ripping up the road, he was making sure that even if the Iron Prince’s army tried to march back to our defensive lines it’d be slowed enough that his large ambush army marching south from Malmedit would be able to catch up to it. That left only the Twilight Ways as a way out, but even that was... risky. Not on a tactical level, I meant. With two days of warning, an evacuation would be quite possible: so long as he wasn’t under attack, with a pharos device Prince Klaus should be able to shift his entire army into the Ways in a few hours. On a strategic level, though, his disappearance could lead to a disaster.

If the Iron Prince bailed on the eastern theatre of our campaign entirely, there would be nothing standing between a massive army of two hundred thousand – maybe even three hundred thousand, if the army in Juvelun joined forces when it passed near – and our dangerously bare defensive lines. Our reserve was already marching on the Cigelin Sisters, meaning all that was left there was the reinforcements from Daoine under Vivienne and a fresh wave of Proceran conscripts. Klaus could instead take his army back to our defensive lines, but if he did then he was leaving my column out to hang: all enemy armies would converge on my army and even with the Ways there was no possible way for him to reinforce me in time.

He read us like a book, I admitted to myself. The Dead King had seen us coming and now we were being made to bleed for it. I couldn't even claim that at least that fucking surprise army in Malmedit had flushed out Keter's hidden hand: we'd found that missing force, sure, but only after the other force of one hundred and fifty thousand in Luciennerie had vanished into thin air. The wily old monster had managed to keep the story of his 'hidden threat' going even after revealing another hidden threat – he'd baked a second cake while eating the first one, so he quite literally got to eat his cake and have it too. Gods but I hated fighting the fucking Dead King.

Tariq had kept silently sipping at his drink, letting me wrestle my thoughts into place, but when he saw my attention fully return to him he set the cup down.

"And after?" I simply asked.

I'd been able to make decent guesses as to what the Iron Prince would have done until then, with the benefit of multiple sources of information and insight, but now we were out in the wilds. I'd never fought the old prince on the field, and records of his campaigns against the ratlings and the dead were near nonexistent – Lycaonese marked only victories, defeats and tallies of the dead. Anything else was considered pettily boastful. And while the Iron Prince's victories during the Great War were much better known, they'd been won waging a very different sort of war. I wasn't sure what I would have done in his place, much less what would have gone through the Prince of Hannover's mind at that crossroads.

"A war council was called," Tariq said. "And after some debate, it was agreed on that the wisest course would be to attack the enemy army in Juvelun to break through."

My brow rose and I forced myself to think. I could see the sense in it, squinting a bit, from his point of view. Assuming my column broke through with swift victories at the Cigelin Sisters and Lauzon's Hollow, seizing Juvelun would allow us to link our armies in the central valley of Hainaut. The undead army from Malmedit would still be able to march south on our defences, but at that point our unified force could answer by leaving a strong garrison at Cigelin and then outmarch that army of the dead through the Ways. A neat trick, turning the destruction of the mining road against those who'd done it. Sure he'd take losses taking Juvelun from pushing out the dead, an uncomfortable amount of them, but it would salvage the strategic situation.

The problem was that Klaus Papenheim didn't know that the army in Luciennerie had disappeared: I'd tried to send messengers, but I very much doubted they'd made it through the gauntlet the Grey Pilgrim had described. Another army had vanished into thin air, and rubies to piglets that it was going to reappear near the capital around the time we finally took the Sisters. You know, right between a bloodied Papenheim and my own forces as the even larger Malmedit army marched on the Iron Prince's back. That was going to turn into a bloody, ruinous mess.

"You were there for the battle?" I asked.

"I left before," Tariq said. "Of all our Bestowed it was agreed I had the best chance of making it to you unharmed and in good time, so the duty fell to me. The battle for Juvelun will have taken place by now, but the outcome is known to neither myself nor the Ophanim."

I slowly nodded.

"You arrived in time," I admitted. "What you just told me will influence our pace quite a bit: I can no longer afford to take my time wiping out the remains of the enemy here and reducing the Sisters if the other column is in danger of a wipeout. We'll have to hurry forward."

Which was compounding risks with risk, I grimly thought. Already the Iron Prince had rolled the dice on taking Juvelun, and now I was going to have to rush taking Cigelin or his efforts might be in vain. The illusion of control we'd had when this campaign had begun, that bold armada of plans and schemes, was now dead and buried. We'd gained tactical victories but we were headed towards a strategic disaster. The only way to salvage this now was to push forward and through. If we don't, all that's left is measuring the scale of the losses we'll incur. I drained the rest of my cup, letting the warmth pour down my throat, and set the silver down.

Gods, silver. Who would have thought I'd end up drinking in that one day, when I'd first started sneaking sips of beer at the- I froze. Oh, oh. Fuck me, I'd had the clues all along hadn't I? I knew the movements, I even knew how the enemy thought of us. I'd just not put them together, taken that last step.

"It's a rat trap," I murmured.

Limpid blue eyes narrowed at me, the exhausted old man turning back into the Peregrine in a heartbeat. The marks of bone-deep weariness were still there, but the flame had lit again.

"Explain," Tariq demanded.

"Back when I worked in a tavern," I said, "the owner would make these little rectangular boxes with the front almost open and bread at the end. It'd have a 'door' angled like this-"

I formed a roof with one palm, and angled another palm inwards to represent the door.

"- so that the rats would go after the bread and push the door up a bit. Only when they were inside the box-"

"They found the 'door' couldn't be pushed to let them out, as the wood only bent one way," the Grey Pilgrim quietly interrupted. "I've seen their like before, they are used in Levant as well."

"That bridge up north is our bread," I said. "It's not fake, I wouldn't think. If it does get built we're in a load of trouble, and we might actually lose this war the regular way. But that's not why the Dead King built it."

"He wanted us to enter the trap," Tariq said.

He wasn't getting it, though, I could hear it in his voice. A trap was a trap, to him, and it'd never been in doubt we'd fallen for one. I spelled it out more bluntly for him.

"You don't make a rat trap to protect the bread, Pilgrim," I said. "You make it to kill the rat."

The old man frowned.

"He means to destroy our armies," the Grey Pilgrim slowly said. "The battles, the bridge, even the capital – none of it means anything to him. Even if he loses all of Hainaut, so long as our armies are destroyed he doesn't care."

"It's all expendable," I agreed. "The army that disappeared from Luciennerie could be assaulting our defence lines around now, with an even larger army headed down the mining road to attack the eastern strongholds – with our own armies so far, and kept in the dark by lack of scrying, he might actually have had a shot at breaking through and into Brabant. But he didn't even try, because what he wants is to trap us in the central valley and annihilate us. Not in one big battle where the odds are so utterly stacked against him-"

Which we'd probably win, given the amount of heroes in our ranks.

"- but in smaller engagements that will bleed us dry, be they victories or defeats," Tariq muttered.

He didn't disagree with my assessment, finger circling the rim of his cup.

"But why the sudden obsession with the armies in Hainaut?" he finally asked. "What changed?"

I'd been wondering the same thing.

"The Gigantes came up on our side," I tried.

"Not in force," Tariq said. "They commit to help, not alliance."

"He might not know that," I said.

"Might is a thin foundation to build on," the Peregrine said.
"Perhaps the Hierophant's work in the Arsenal?"

"It might spook him into coming after us this hard," I admitted.
"Masego knows a lot more about him than can be comfortable for the likes of the Dead King. But the secrecy around Quartered Seasons was well-kept, Tariq. We were paranoid, and there's been breaches but I don't believe Malicia got through and so he should still be largely blind."

The Peregrine smiled sadly.

"You fight the Bard, Catherine," he said. "Neither walls nor locks nor oaths are enough to keep her from learning secrets if she wishes to know them."

I blinked.

"You think she sold us out to the Dead King?" I skeptically said.
"If there's one person I'd buy she wouldn't sell us out to, it'd be him. What would she even-"

I froze the dreadful thought that came all too soon. The Grey Pilgrim sighed.

"So he comes after us with his entire hateful might," Tariq said.
"So we suffer a stinging defeat at his hands and, like children in the dark, we pray for deliverance by our own guardian angel."

I rose to pour myself a second goddamn drink, and when the Pilgrim silently extended his own empty cup I filled it without qualms.

"I thought you trusted her," I finally said.

"I did," Tariq tiredly said. "And now I don't. If you live long enough, Catherine, you will find that time warps even the bonds you believed unshakable. And that we are never so wise as we think, even when we believe ourselves to be fools."

I held my tongue, even though it would have been pretty easy to stick a dagger or two in him now considering how badly we'd butted heads over the Intercessor over the years. It'd been a rough year for everyone, and there was no need for allies to make it worse.

"I got the shivers when you said that," I finally said, "and it makes me sick to even consider. So I'd tend to think you read this right. But he's not coming at us with his full might, Tariq. I've seen the battles up north he wages against the drow, and they're..."

I blew out a breath. In the back of my mind old words came to me as a harsh refrain. Where are the devils, Catherine? the Intercessor had once asked me. Where are the hosts that darken the skies, and the demons he has kept leashed for centuries? Where are the rituals that poison the land and the sorceries never before seen?

"Well, he's pulling out tricks there we haven't seen down here," I said. "And I know he has more: we haven't seen either devils or demons yet, for one, and he's perfectly capable of calling on both."

The old man shook his head.

"He cannot use either," Tariq said. "It would represent too steep an increase in strength on his side of the scales, Catherine. Providence would allow us to bridge the gap, and the last thing the Dead King wants is a war of equals with such power in play: it would put his forces at a genuine risk of annihilation."

The Grey Pilgrim leaned back into his seat.

"He has been most careful to limit his efforts to grinding us into dust by attrition for good reason," Tariq continued. "It is a method of victory that involves very little risk for him and has proved difficult to handle."

I frowned. That... held up somewhat, I supposed. I honestly wasn't sure what providence would be able to spit out to even the odds, but arguably that was rather the point. I'd known for a long time there was a risk to villains winning by too large or obvious a margin – invincibility as a prelude to failure, my father had once phrase it – but I'd not considered that on the scale the Pilgrim had. It was the crusading mindset, I supposed. It was not only battles and Named that had a story, but the crusade itself. It was what I knew of the Dead King's rise to power that had me inclined to believe the Peregrine: carefulness had always been his priority back then, even if it meant slowing his advance.

He'd always preferred giving his enemies no opening to swift victories.

"This changes things," I finally said.

He wetted his lips, sipping at the brandy.

"Does it?" the Peregrine asked. "Retreating serves no purpose. We are committed to war, even knowing his intentions are different than we'd expected."

I went rifling through my pockets for my pipe, the long shaft of dragonbone that Masego had gifted me years ago comforting to the touch. A packet of wakeleaf, still from the White Knight's gift, was carefully stuffed and I lit the leaf by tapping a finger against the rim and letting black flames slither in. I breathed in deep, the acrid smoke filling my lungs before I breathed out a long stream of it upwards.

"If it's our armies that are in his sights, it means he's gotten sloppy elsewhere," I said. "His resources aren't unlimited, and while it might seem like this trap has been years in the making I'd wager it's a lot more hastily assembled than that."

"The Intercessor would not have wanted him to win cleanly, that is true," the Pilgrim mused. "The more costly the victory to him the better, in her eyes, and that means a warning as late as she could feasibly give it."

I grunted in agreement, pulling at my pipe and blowing out a ring of smoke.

"We thought he'd guard that bridge up north like it was his own baby," I said, "but I'd wager it's been stripped clean. Sure we still can't account for the Luciennerie army, but it can't teleport – there's no way it could have gone all the way up there so quickly."

"You're suggesting a raid," Tariq said, sounding genuinely surprised.

"I am," I replied. "First we'll need to reunite with Prince Klaus' army, but when do I believe we need to send at least one band of five up north to demolish that bridge. We won't get that opportunity twice."

"You suggest sending away five Bestowed, and they would have to be among our most powerful to have a real chance of succeeding, before a series of battle that promise to be the decisive clash of this war," the Pilgrim slowly said. "That is... bold."

Which meant he'd wanted to say foolish, I amusedly thought, but my favourable record against him had earned a more diplomatic phrasing.

"We can argue the point later," I dismissed, "but I'd be a mistake to find out at this late hour we lack the stomach to take opportunities when they are afforded us. Regardless, we now need to move forward as quickly as we can and link with Prince Klaus' column. If you rest through the rest of the day, will you be fighting fit tomorrow?"

"A few hours will have me back on my feet," Tariq hesitatingly said. "I have never needed much sleep, and less so after I was blessed with the friendship of the Ophanim."

He kept hesitating, so I cocked an eyebrow at him. It finally moved him to speak.

"You seem... invigorated," the Grey Pilgrim said, and raised a hand as if to ward off a protest. "I mean no ill by it, only that a conversation that would have set others to despair seems instead to have lit a fire in you."

Had it? I pulled at my pipe, considering it, then ultimately shrugged.

"This is the most confident I've felt about this campaign since it started," I admitted.

The old man started in surprise.

"I take it you're not making sport of me," Tariq said.

I nodded and, to my own surprise, he snorted.

"Ashen Gods, why?" he asked. "I do not believe this will end in tears, though many will be shed along the way, but little of the news I brought you strike me as sources of confidence. The Enemy has fooled us and led us into great peril."

"It was always going to get ugly," I frankly said. "But now we knew the forces in motion, Pilgrim. We know – or have a good guess, at the very least – why the Dead King is acting now, what it is he is after and where all those things sit in the greater tapestry of the war. For the first time since our armies went marching north, we are no longer blind. We can finally find a way to win, and I mean properly win. Not just survive by the skin of our teeth or settle for a bloody draw."

My fingers were already itching for ink and paper as well as a quiet place to think. Oh, we were in the pit for sure. I was pretty sure the Iron Prince was about to get stuck between two large armies while I caught up, and if either of us made a mistake then this could turn into the single worst military defeat the Grand Alliance had suffered since the beginning of the war. Hells, it could turn into the kind of defeat it was simply impossible to recover from by sheer dint of lives and resources lost. But this pit, it was an old friend. I'd been here before, through my own mistakes and the machinations of others, and the feeling of the bottom of the barrel under my feet did not scare me.

I grinned at the Grey Pilgrim, baring my teeth ferally.

"It's the eleventh hour, Peregrine," I said. "Midnight Bell is on the verge, and when it rings we'll all have to pay our dues, but the song isn't over. Not yet."

"You have a plan, then?" Tariq Fleetfoot asked.

Blue eyes in a tanned face met my gaze, and in there I found a light that was not Light – no, that one was entirely his own. It was cold and patient and ruthless in a way that even some of my kind would blanch at, qualities that a lifetime of service to the Choir of Mercy had sharpened into a razor's edge. There wasn't a lot a man like the Grey Pilgrim wouldn't do, for the sake of the world. Looking into those eyes, I wondered if there was really anything at all.

"I have the bare bones of one," I said. "It begins by taking back the initiative."

"There are still enemies ahead of you," Tariq said. "The remnant of the army that held Lauzon's Hollow, as I understand it, now heading towards the Cigelin Sisters."

"And that force needs to be destroyed," I agreed, "but I don't need our entire army to do that. Not when our reserve under General Pallas will be joining the fray as well."

"You would split your host in two," the Pilgrim said. "And then take half to relieve the Iron Prince?"

"We're going to do better than that, Tariq," I said, rising to my feet.

I went looking through my desk, opening drawers until I found what I wanted: a small scroll, inked by Scribe's own hand. It was a neat, lovely map of the Principality of Hainaut whose accuracy meant it was probably worth as much a herd of horses. I unfolded it across the table, gesturing for the Pilgrim to come closer as I set down a bottle on one corner to keep it down and an empty inkwell on the other.

"If Prince Klaus won the battle for Juvelun," I said, tapping the town with a finger, "then right now he's marching into the central valley of Hainaut, what the locals call the highlands."

"And you believe an enemy army, the one that was once in Luciennerie, will have travelled unseen to strike him by surprise there," the Pilgrim said.

"I do," I said. "But I also think that the Dead King believes us more conservative in our attack than we actually have been: there's nothing about the way his troops are moving that even hints at his being aware that the Cigelin Sisters are about to be attacked by General Pallas. So from his point of view, even if a hero like you manages to bring word about what happened to the Prince Klaus' column I'll still be stuck here clearing out the dead heading towards the Sisters."

It actually shed some light on why the army defending Lauzon's Hollow had been so willing to retreat, even considering the bloody nose I'd given it. At this point holding the Hollow was no longer a strategic priority for him, it was a lot more important to tie down my army for a few more days while he finished mopping up Klaus Papenheim's column. And the worse was that the Dead King wasn't even wrong about my needing to clear out the dead ahead of us. It wasn't a force that I could afford leaving at my back while taking the Ways to reinforce the Iron Prince. If I did, I would then be stuck with a massive army behind enemy lines and with no supply lines. Hells, at that point he would barely even need to fight: he could just keep harassing us and let starvation do the work for him.

Fortunately, General Pallas was still in the wind and about to make her bite felt.

"I'll be leaving behind the Third Army and half the Firstborn along with some of the Proceran fantassins, but most of my army will be headed..."

I trailed off, leaning forward and squinting at the map before finally laying a finger at the height of halfway up the stretch of Julianne's Highway connecting the Sisters to the capital, but a little to the east.

"There," I finished.

The old man's gaze followed my finger, taking in the map as he considered it all in silence.

"And what is it that you intend to do in the middle of nowhere?" the Grey Pilgrim finally asked.

I breathed in deep of the wakeleaf, enjoying the burn and taking my time before spewing out a stream of grey smoke. I smiled coldly at the Peregrine.

"Why, Tariq, but we're going to ambush the force about to ambush the Iron Prince."

Djinn O'Cide

"Adouber" quite probably continues the chess motif, although it's not used in this particular form very often. In tournament chess, if you touch a piece, you need to move that piece. If you just want to put a piece back in the center of it's square, you need to alert your opponent of that intention by saying (before you touch the piece) "J'adoube", which is French for "I adjust". Adouber would be the infinitive form of that verb, and thus mean "to adjust".

Liliet

NICE

NerfGlaistigUaine

Huh. In the chess tournaments I played in we just said "Touch." Admittedly they were all amateur but "J'adoube" sounds a bit tacky.

Daniel

Tacky? No, it is stylish, perhaps flamboyant. Proverbs, even.

Crash

Aspect confirmed.

stevenneiman

I used to go to chess tournaments, and I remember that rule but we would just say "adjust" in English.

sengachi

Oh that is a hell of a chapter name.

Esharro

Adouber does not mean to adjust in french. It means to confirm, to validate. It was the name of the ceremony to knight someone.

Javvies

Fucking Bard.

Hah! Finally, Cat's not working blind – she knows enough to figure out what's going on. And now she's can properly plot and plan.

Heh. Ambush the would be ambushers. That's going to be quite useful. After all, it's said that the only thing worse than getting ambushed is thinking you're doing the ambushing when the other guys know you're there.

Sparsebeard

We are once again reminded of the true antagonist. Sure Cat is fighting the Dead King, but it's the Bard she's playing against... and the king is but an important piece.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The fact that the true antagonist's plan revolves around careful deployment of a king meshes so well with the recent chess motif. No doubt part of why EE went with said motif to begin with.

Gippart

Even more fitting if you consider the sides at play as Cat vs. Cat's enemies. You have a king whose movement is heavily restricted, whose death will result in the loss of every other piece on the board. And a queen who can appear and disappear nearly anywhere following certain rules, solely holding more power than any other piece could dream.

Fits both Cordelia/Cat and DK/WB as the king/queen motif. More complicated than that when you add in all of the details, but it's a good likeness.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

It's things like this that make this my by far most favorite web serial, and puts it into my total top 10 books as a whole.

Well done once more, EE!

miles

Heck the dead king isn't even a king in this game. He's more of a rook.

Useful to leave in the starting position until the late game, ready for a defensive surprise, but mostly just devastating once the board is sufficiently cleared.

vernal.ancient

"...we are never so wise as we think, even when we believe ourselves to be fools."
Wise words.

How is the strategizing before the fight consistently just as interesting as the fight itself in this series? I love it

Levi Kalden

More interesting

TeK

At some point this became too smart for me. On the other hand: more interludes!

Mennolt van Alten

This is meant to show the genius of the greatest commander of this age, so it makes sense if we cannot completely follow why Cat thinks things are the way she thinks they are or replicate her reasoning. But most individual points make sense to me, like how she cannot leave her back open, the move of the dead king to pincer the Iron Prince, and the idea that if Cat knows where the ambush is (which is probably what she was thinking about while looking at the map and deciding where to go) she can counter-ambush it.

Liliet

Casey Glick

Will the Gigantes' warding prevent the Dead from crossing the Tomb at the point of the bridge? If so, wouldn't it make more sense to keep the bridge as the warding goes up, pinning the Dead Armies against the water? Or perhaps the warding could only go up once the dead were gone?

Mental Mouse

More generally, what options does Cat gain from the Gigantes?

Liliet

What do you mean?

It won't prevent the dead from crossing the bridge. To pin them against the water, on either side, the bridge needs to go down.

Cat's side literally doesn't need it – their armies can teleport.

Yes, I'm still reveling in the sheer absurdity of this logistical advantage. Go go ill-advised fae bargains!

Frivolous

Yes! Klaus didn't get killed and raised as a Bind after all. Yes!

Forum Solipsist

Captain is gone, but it was a name.

Black Knight and White Knight are often looked to as leaders of their respective sides.

At one point Warlord seemed like a potential Name for Cat, but this is so much bigger and longer in the making. Able to command both sides and bend them to her will, forming alliances and making the whole world dance to her tune with no pretensions to ruling afterwards.

I think we are witnessing the birth of a "General" and possibly a neutral name at that.

Shveiran

She has the skill and the requisites, but not the aspiration: her dream is one of peace and regulations imposed on the great game of the gods.

That is where her story is headed, and that story's protagonist will not be called General.

I do not know what she'll be called. But it will not be a purely militaristic Name; of that I'm quite certain.

Crash

The military names are becoming the new -insert adjective-Knight

I'm gonna join in, Cat's new Name is Squire (Redux)!

Ninestrings

Verb. adouber. to dub (bestow the title of knight upon) to name (a minister, successor etc.) to adjust a piece in a board game, such as chess or backgammon.

All definitions work, wild.

Burlyraven

Okay, so the Grey Pilgrim was just playing messenger. The story could still go either way on Klaus' army being annihilated at this point, but they were still kicking when Grey left.

This is going to get really chaotic, really quickly. If Cat's rapidly approaching Name was planning on providing an aspect related to commanding multiple forces across vast distances, now would be the time.

LarsBlitzer

Agreed on Cat's Name being very martial. She's on the cusp of it becoming, and at her choice as well. Remember her card game with the intercessor; she was being guided onto the story grooves of something like Outlaw Queen, a Robin Hood trope according to the song that came to her time and time again leading up to it. She staved it off differently than the First Prince. Instead of outright refusal she feigned ignorance and acted contrary to type. I'm calling the ambush of the ambushers to be when she gets the full whammy.

Itarion

It's not a general's Name, it's a magister's. We've seen the name stir while she has been passing judgement. It's a Name that follows from the Terms, and especially the intention of the Accords. Cat intends to make new Laws, Laws that have dominion over the Named of a whole continent. If Akua is right and it's ambition that grants villainous Names, there's very little more ambitious than that.

With that as her ambition, her Name will follow from that. Not from military might or strategic acumen, but a desire to rewrite the Laws of Creation and pass Judgment on those who break that Law.

nick012000

Cat's gonna get her Name when she stands in judgement over the Dead King, isn't she? Calling it now.

Raved Thrad

With a little luck, her new name will be Judicator, and she can call down Arbiters to warp her troops in and cloak them.
😏

John

Twilight Ways already allow some degree of stealth and strategic teleportation.

Raved Thrad

But not time travel. 😏

Liliet

MORE BARD IS TIME-TRAVELING CAT FORESHADOWING

Raved Thrad

"Do you seek knowledge of time travel?"
"Eh, been there, done that, drank the rotgut."

Daniel E

Only flaw I see there is if that were true, then Bard would not have been surprised about needing to do things the hard way following her card game with Cat & Masego.

Liliet

The only flaw I see is that EE keeps insisting the series ends this book, not giving us space for an additional ten books of epic explanation of alternate timelines that make it all fit together.

Cpt. Obvious

My take on that was that the Bard wasn't surprised as much as slightly disappointed that she woke up again in yet another body. She doesn't really care who wins this war. All it's intended to do is to force the coalition to use the doomsday device they dredged from the bottom of the tomb. She's ready to sacrifice all of Calernia to achieve what Cat and Masego couldn't. She wants to die for real and she's tried so many times over millenia that she no longer cares if it takes an entire continent or even the annihilation of Creation to achieve that.

Remember just a millenia or two back, when she talked to Nessie? Back then she was well dressed with well kept hair. Her lute was a beautiful instrument and her flask a expensive piece of gold or silver working containing good quality spirits or wine.

Now she's a drunken Bard with a piece of shit lute and a banged up flask of rottgut. She's tired of running around and straightening up Creation after Named and the Gods has screwed up. She's also tired of always losing anyone she cares about by them or her dying. She just want it to stop.

miles

The bard can time travel but only one way.

Mental Mouse

As can we all.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, that all but ensured their survival. There was important information the general of the armies absolutely needed to know or all was lost. The army had to stay and fight, but one man went to deliver the message while the rest fightt for their survival, without one of their most powerful to stand amongst them.

As pointed out in this chapter, Campaigns have their own narrative weight. The Grey Pilgrim marched himself to near death to deliver the message, just in the nick of time. Unless that army is dead and there is no hope. Then everything he did is pointless. So Klaus' army has survived. Bloodied no doubt, but enough to matter will show up so that it all had meaning.

Miles

Shooting the shaggy dog has its own narrative weight. Dead weight, sure, but it's there.

Captain, prepare for a Tvtropes deep dive in 3... 2... 1...

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/ShootTheShaggyDog>

ruduen

It's good to have all of the cards on the table now. Previously, story-wise, we all knew there had to be some type of hiccup coming along the way – things were going far too smoothly at the strategic level to leave things up as is. Things have to go downhill before the story gives a lift later on.

Also, do the thing!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Black Spiral Dancer

Awesome part of the story, as always. In fact, it makes me irk to play Tactical Games now, although their campaigns are never so brilliantly laid as this novel's.

pirateddesigns

Typo thread:

his rheumy blue were clouded : rheumy blues were and maybe second when : maybe a second But now we knew the forces : we know the and in there I found : in them I a hero likes you manages : hero like you happened to the Prince Klaus' column : happened to Prince Klaus' column
And the worse was that : the worst was fbi open up his rheumy blue were clouded-> rheumy blue eyes were but when do I believe we need to-> but then i believe we need to before a series of battle-> before a series of battles now we knew the forces in motion-> now we know

And the worse was that-> Even worse was that/ And the worst of it was that

Liliet

or perhaps rheumy blue eyes

Adrian V

"he'd baked a second cake while eating the first one, so he quite literally got to eat his cake and have it too. "

Who else imagined old Nessi with chef apron and hat baking a pair of mountrously giant cakes (those you sometime see on tv competitions)? xD

I smell interlude coming soon, also who do you think will be part of that Band, and would it be heroes only or mixed?

caoimhinh

Definitely mixed, I think Pilgrim would be part of it. There are just too many possibilities to be sure, but I can make a few guesses.

Cat is likely to stay with the army as she needs to remain in command of the host and keep the menagerie of Named under control, plus she is needed to pull through her bold strategy of ambushing the ambushers that are about to hit Klaus's army. And she is going to leave Abigail to lead the other forces, so Cat is not gonna be part of the Band of Five.

Roland seems the most used Named mage in Cat's army right now, so I think he is bound to be part of it, probably the Blessed Artificer too, considering they are about to go destroying a huge undead construct, so her Light will be very useful, the others would have to include villains of the fighting type, which would mean probably the Headhunter or the Troubadour, and maybe the Berserker since they might need her brute strength to bring down stuff that Neshamah has built over there.

Maybe throw in a sixth member to reinforce them through Providence?

Liliet

Blessed Artificer is the only one left who can possibly stand against the Grey Legion atm. She'll be staying where THAT is most necessary, and my wild guess would be "not with a detached band of Named"

caoimhinh

How so?

She is not a fighter, and her constructs can cause large damage to structures as we saw during the interlude Old Dogs, that's exactly what's needed to bring down the bridge that the undead are building.

Her use of Light would be a huge asset there.

Why do you say she can stand against the Grey Legion? More so, the only one.

Liliet

Catherine has talked about it. The Grey Legion now has anti-Night inscribed armor, meaning that where previously huge workings of Night from Cat and Akua the hard hitters could dismantle them where necessary, Blessed Artificer is now the only one who can do it. Presumably they had anti-sorcery protections already.

mamm0nn

Troubadour is a bard, so I'd skip him if we're talking damage-dealing Names. Though he would probably be a good addition for Story-molding purposes.

Shveiran

He's also, you know, highly unreliable and has an hard-on for harvesting Named souls.

He really, really doesn't strike me as a good fit for an high-risk mission. The chances of him nudging things so that he gets to collect the soul of a "tragically" fallen comrade are not low.

mamm0nn

Yeah, but he's also a Bard. Their Role is probably standard to influence the Story to their favour and make Providence forcing a win more likely.

Mental Mouse

"In Keter, cake eats you!"

dadycool

She's so energized because she's found a pit to Struggle in. She can see the walls, the opponent, the blood on the sand, and the audience. Her situation is hopeless, to the point where if she plays it right, she can't lose.

Silverking

Minor spoilers for Worm

There is a scene where Taylor ends up being caught flatfooted in her civilian identity by the heroes. No preparation, no allies, no escape route, and any direct retaliation can (and is, in fact, intended to) escalate the heroes' response from "capture" to "justifiable homicide". It seems almost surreal to some that this is the villain who has been causing them trouble for so long.

And then she smiles. And one of the heroes starts freaking out because that is the moment it sinks in that this thin teenage slip of a girl is indeed the Warlord of Brockton Bay, and in defiance of all logic and reason, she's about to win.

That is the feeling I imagine Tariq has when his news to Cat brings not despair, but a sort of peace through understanding. To paraphrase Sun Tzu, she now knows her enemy's plan, she knows the status of her remaining allies, and she will win a thousand battles.

RoflCat

To quote some lines from Aplomb (book 2, ch 17):

"Ah," Nauk grunted with a distinct undertone of satisfaction. "Looks like we're going to win this one."

"She's doing the face, warlock's get," Nauk continued, "Doesn't matter what they throw at us now – we're going to eat them alive."

"You do that thing where you almost smile and you show a little teeth," Juniper told me frankly. "It looks really creepy on a human."

Or as I tried to imagine 'the face': She's doing the Grinch evil smile.

edrey

that is a mess, but cat's battles are always like that. also that memory of her job in the tavern looked just like providence, just enough to give her a spark of inspiration to connect all points, i think that fit the story of cat, the saint of impossible victories, just like Hanno said in the arsenal.

Liliet

Honestly, I think it was a "Newton's Apple" thing. Cat's brain was working in overdrive, she was on the verge of figuring it out, and just a little nudge brought it over the edge.

It's not like she saw a rat trap or anything else blatantly hint-y. No, it was the taste of beer, which she was drinking because it's a common thing, that completed the association chain.

Providence made sure Tariq Fleetfoot got there in one piece and in time, and that Catherine was not too busy/tired/distracted for this conversation. The fact she figured it out from there?

Was basically inevitable 😊

Liliet

whoops, not the taste of beer, the fact the goblet was made of silver and the contrast of it with her beginnings which is frankly a straight line of Cat taking a step back and considering the context

ohJohN

Her sentence cut off immediately before the words “Rat’s Nest”, which I think was the actual connection.

Liliet

Yeah. It was random, but I think that’s because the idea of a rat trap could be arrived at by a thousand possible paths, this was just the one that happened to be taken.

Miles

Well obviously Good will blatantly cheat to maintain a perfect “winning” streak but they’re facing Cat now. Their usual pigeon chess strategy just does not work no matter how many pigeons they use. The only way they’ll win there is to claim her first.

Juff

Typo Thread:

rheumy blue were > rheumy blue eyes me uncomfortable to look at > me uncomfortable to look at him (or him uncomfortable to look at) maybe second > maybe a second army two hundred > army of two hundred should be able > should have been able once phrase it > once phrased it series of battle > series of battles I’d be a mistake > it’d be a mistake now we knew > now we know

ninegardens

Huh...

Tariq Fleetfoot indeed.

... Gawd I love that guy. Even if he’s not the hero they need here and now, he is kinda fabulous... even when just acting as a worn out messenger.

Onos

I don't suppose we could get some tactical maps of the campaign EE? Even rough sketches would be great, understandable if it's a bit much on top of the writing though.

Liliet

There IS a new map

<https://ibb.co/ThHXPCg>

Let's see what I can do with marking stuff on it...

Mennolt van Alten

Someone sent this in the reddit thread as a response to such a question Onos: <https://i.ibb.co/0JfNYwG/Lakeside-Fronts.png>

That should allow plotting out the tracks: Klaus up the right across the mining roads, Cat up the middle and the Highway, and I forgot the commander but another army went up the blue road to Lucifierenne. I think the dotted line with the diamonds represents the original defenses.

Klaus is currently breaking out of his entrapment on the last part of the mining roads, then moving to a point between Laurons Hollow and the Mining Roads, Cat thinks the missing army of Lucifierenne (lost since the very start) has been moving crosscountry past Cigelin Sisters to take position in that area to crush the exhausted army of Klaus. Cat is now going to move crosscountry to ambush the ambush.

Liliet

Luciennerie, Lucifer wasn't around XD

<https://imgur.com/dBXDxi4>

Does this look right to you?

Liliet

<https://imgur.com/Y30Nu74>

Here we go!

The black line is the defensive line, including the mountains showing where an army CANNOT pass (aka effectively part of the defensive line)
(the defensive line is marked on the map, but it's not big and not obvious)

The white crosses mark expected battles

The rest is labeled

beleester

The defensive line should go through Coudrent and Trifelin rather than Luciennerie, I think, as that's where Rozala's armies are based. The plan called for her to send a raid against Luciennerie, which is how they found out that the army had gone missing, but she didn't actually siege the city.

(That means that the Luciennerie army has been moving very fast – about as far as Klaus's army despite not having roads or the Ways – but that's the way I'm reading it)

Liliet

Thank you!

grogna

<https://ibb.co/ThHXPCg>

This is in Art, Maps and other.

scottcahoon14

Hopefully pilgrims comments about bonds turning sour isn't a premonition about Adjutant....

Adrian

I... Do believe you might just be a God of Writing

spencer

What does Bard hope to gain? Death?

RoflCat

That's what we speculate due to the last bit after Arsenal.

More precisely, she want out of this whole Bard thing. That she setup the Arsenal to make herself as 'mastermind who got outplayed' thinking that with Catherine as the new, better 'story expert' she'll be replaced. But then she still got revived, and basically shouted at the Gods that she's going to use some extreme options (more than the whole Arsenal stuffs), and whatever shit happen it's all their fault (for not letting her die)

I think she's on the mindset that until Dead King is dealt with (since she has a hand in his rise) she's not allowed to quit.

JRogue

Yes. Bard is Tired. Capital "T" Tired.

She is Tired of the game, she is Tired of the maneuvering, she is Tired of the endlessness. If she could have a fourth Aspect, it would probably be Tired.

She has been around thousands of years and is ready for it to end, but the gods won't let her go. She even set it up so that people with the power and the story to end her had a shot, and the gods still noped her out of it.

The last time we saw her, she said the gloves were going to come off. I think she is, at least in part, responsible for Cat's new Name, and what it will do to her. If a new Name emerges that can hold sway or judgment over other Names it gives her another chance to be ended. Bard is a Name like any other, even if old and powerful. If Cat's Name develops like it is looking like, then she gets domain over Bard as well. That new Name may not be able to abide by someone like Bard to continue to exist. Which, once again, might be part of Bard's plan.

Bard does not care if the Dead King, or Cat, or anyone else wins. She cares that she ends, and is using all of her vast resources and intelligence to see that through.

Moodprint

Am I the only one who worries, that if Cat becomes Named, the Bard gets more power against her?
Is it not known that Bard's powers work through Named specifically?

Silverking

I think it was already established that 1) Cat's current condition was considered "close enough" for the Bard to do one of her little visits, and 2) all the Bard can really do is talk, which can be effective if you swing by at a Named's lowest point to offer them a deal (Bard was really hoping to get unrestricted access to Cordelia), but less so when the person has resolved to "reject all she peddles".

beleester

The Bard has already had two face-to-face meetings with Cat despite her not being Named, so I don't think it matters.

The Bard has said that she can only work through Named (plus some narrow exceptions that allowed her to talk to Cat), but Cat suspects that she's lying or leaving out important details. And even that limitation has loopholes – the Bard managed to set up Cordelia to claim a Name despite never personally interacting with her.

mamm0nn

The granting of Names is probably a whole different matter than directly interacting with someone. It has been suggested that she has a hand in the coming into being of all Named of Calernia, even if the results thereof may be vague to her. At least, that's how I interpreted her talk with Hierarch including "Well, you're not one of mine. Please get in line, kiddo." Her being able to influence non-Named to gain a Name is likely entirely different than her direct intercession, as she seems to be a bit of an admin of Calernia Named.

Liliet

as Silverking said, Bard's "powers" are:

- watching (which she can do regardless as long as the events are sufficiently important, Cat isn't getting out of this one)
- talking to people, which is to say:
- regular ass convince people of things (has yet to work on Cat lol)
- bullshit mind games (Cat is not Amadeus, she is a great bit more stable and besides surrounded by people who actually for real share her goals and can prop her up if she starts slipping)
- storyweaving (it's... only mild direct effect, and Cat's been pretty good at keeping out of traps when talking to her, achieving all her own story goals when talking to her last)

...and even if she couldn't already do all of the above to Cat directly just due to her narrative importance / Role, she could 100% do all of the above to her allies, which is so much nastier than directly to Cat, Cat's own Name or lack of such is a rounding error.

Moodprint

While I don't disagree with your points, I just worry a little. I don't find it unbelievable that the Bard has some hidden trick that only really works on Named, and that Cat's approaching Name is actually part of Bard's grand plan.

Liliet

Oh, Bard has plenty of hidden tricks.

It's just that it's been thoroughly established that they come in the form of connections and convincing other people to do things for her.

(or Choirs as the case may be)

A hidden trick of the sort you're referring to would be a little like Masego suddenly growing mantis legs and revealing his hidden martial arts insectoid heritage.

mamm0nn

Cat: Hey Abigail, I'm leaving with most of the army to ambush one of the Dead King's ambushes. You're in charge of the remaining forces to defeat the remnants we've defeated.

Abigail: Cold sweat You want me, the commander of the army with the most heavies still worn out from being the vanguard of your previous battle, to chase fleeing lighter and tireless foes? Maybe you should give this task to the Levantines, they would be much better suited for it.

Cat: Nope.

Abigail: Roger that... What troops will you leave me with.

Cat: Some fantassins, the ones most likely to slow us down on our march.

Abigail: Begins to shiver from stress Not just the Procerans, but the slow ones. On a chase mission against enemies that I have to catch up on but who will no doubt pounce on any haste and over-extension I'd commit to. Oh joy...

Cat: Don't worry, I'll also leave some Firstborn behind. About half-ish.

Abigail: Th-

Cat: Jindrich will be their leader, I'll tell him to listen to you.

Abigail: Shivering turns to vibrating J-Jindrich? The berserker prone to rush into battle without thinking?

Cat: Oh, and I'll also be sending out our five strongest Named on a new mission while taking most of the leftover ones with me.

Abigail: Flatlines

beleester

To be fair, Abigail might have made that decision herself, given the alternatives...

Cat: I'm going to take half the army and go fight an army of 150,000 without most of my heaviest hitters.

Abigail: I volunteer to lead the other half!

Liliet

BEST COMMENT CHAIN YET

Weapon of Mass Guesswork

If Cat gains a neutral, judgy name, it could be trouble, politically.

Right now, the Truce and Terms work because Cat has been rigidly yet fairly enforcing them for her side. Her position as Below's representative is maintained under the assumption that even without a Name, she is still essentially a Villain. If she gains a Neutral Name, one of Below's could claim that they don't feel comfortable being represented by someone who isn't even a Villain, calling for a new Representative to be named (I'm looking specifically at Troubador, here). Since this would be fair and lawful under the Truce&Terms, Cat couldn't strongarm them into not using their rights without crippling her own Name. She's made no friends enforcing her position so far, so the Damned could actually vote her out, and since everyone knows how invested Cat is on the T&T working, whoever runs against her/ replaces her could fairly easily hold leverage over Cat just by threatening not to enforce the T&T as well as they should.

Cat hasn't even considered the possibility that she could awaken to a Neutral or even Heroic name, but considering Above has offered her power twice (once at Liesse, and again at the Twillight Ways), She really should. This would be the third time, marking a Pattern, and she seriously might not be able to reject the offer this time, given how much she needs the power-up. This could actually be a trap by the Bard, since Cat has gradually been isolating herself and pushing away others since the beginning of the Book, under the assumption that her current position means she can afford it (and possibly, needs to do it). If she suddenly gets her political power undercut, while also getting a serious identity crisis to go with it, and Cat's support system under someone else's nominal authority that Cat nevertheless can't overrule without destroying her own dream, it could legitimately get her out of the game for a while. Her so-awaited Name turning out to be a curse, rather than a blessing.

As to the nature of the name itself, I could see it having the prefix [The Just...], both to bring her motto of "Justifications matter only to the Just" full circle, and to make it fairly obvious she's no longer just a Villain.

Javvies

The so-called "Neutral" Names are actually just Names that can be empowered by Above or by Below, depending on the incarnation of the Name. They're Names that can switch between sides and are not intrinsically linked to Above or Below. They may also have some measure of variation depending on the Story they were gained through, and might be able to switch power sources if borne through enough side specific Roles in enough Stories that an alignment change happens without changing Names, assuming the Aspects aren't relying on Alignment specific powers (ie, Light).

Like Squire – it can be a Heroic Name and lead into White Knight (and probably also Paladin variations) or be a Villain Name and lead into Black Knight. Squire is a Neutral Name and a Transitional Name. Same with Apprentice. Probably most Transitional Names have similar potential. Ranger is probably technically, or at least originally, a Name that can be either, as is Archer.

Any Name Cat gets will be assumed to be empowered by Below, unless she tosses Light or other Above-exclusive powers around. Or she starts showing signs of aging despite being Named ... but that's not likely to happen anytime soon even without a Villain Name's immunity to aging.

Liliet

I disagree with Javvies on the fundamental nature of Names and won't be addressing that directly right now.

That said, Neutral Names don't come with labels saying "STRICTLY NEUTRAL" on them. The only way for Cat's Name to contradict her categorization as a villain at this point is for it to allow her to wield Light, and while I believe that would be absolutely hilarious and the best, a Neutral Name would not do it.

A Neutral Name means the Named is free to be a villain or hero, contextually. Catherine is contextually very much a villain. That would not change.

Miles

To summarize the other 2, a Name can be neutral. A Named can not.

edrey

Well, there is other way for the Bard to call that angel, if the titanic ward of the gigants protect them from the Light and not only the dead, and call it on trifelin, keter is done, i am sure sve noc can copy the ward too.

Barrendur

@Weapon of Mass Guesswork

Great observations; well reasoned and thought through. I think you also take into consideration the author's style, which often tends towards ironic wish-fulfillment; i.e. be careful what you wish for. Cat has been so focussed on the punishment she is preparing for Diabolist, she may just blunder into the long-deserved one waiting for HER. After all, Cat is not a hero... but I think she sometimes forgets that as a villain, she is due a "comeuppance" – and the Name may end up being just that.

I LIKE your post, but the system won't let me use the "like" button, so I had to settle for a "reply".

Liliet

The punchline being that the reply function didn't work either?

ChillyPepper

I wonder, if the Bard is meant to be some kind of maestro to the Named – would Cat's new name be some sort of Critic role. making and unmaking and judging everyone in that play.

Daniel E

I can't predict how Abigail will get the tail-end of the plan this time, but I'm looking forward to it.

Miles

She could just nope out of there. It would be just like her to turn around and squash the DK's forces by doing so.

Mental Mouse

Ahem – please notice that for all her scaredy-cat mumbling to herself, Abigail has never actually routed or turned tail. As I've said before, she thinks she's a coward, but she's no such thing.

sengachi

I love this chapter. It feels so perfect that after all she's been through, all Cat needs to make the Dead King hurt is to know everything that's in play.

Frivolous

I thought this episode was going to reveal that the army under Prince Klaus was a near-complete wipe, with Tariq being one of the few hapless survivors, come to Cat to tell her of the disaster.

So glad that was not the case.

And yeah, I'm one of those who, like LarsBlitzer, thinks that the ambush on the ambush is when Cat finally receives her Name, especially if the Revenant of Albrecht Papenheim is there.

Crash

Honestly the fact that Tariq is even surprised is proof he just doesn't get Cat.

This is her thing. The mess, the horrible odds. The chaos.

It's where she shines.

Good luck, Dead King.

Liliet

Tariq's still in denial that Amadeus is him but a few degrees south, what do you expect of him? XD

Onos

Endless Hells, the stragety scenes might be even better than the battles! Do you wargame this stuff out before writing or something EE?

Chapter 62: Adjournment

"Empires die to wars, emperors to knives."

– Free Cities saying

General Abigail of Summerholm, I'd noticed, always entered a tent like she expected it was going to be filled with a pack of hungry wolves. Or maybe just mine, I mused. She'd never quite managed to hide that she was rather terrified of me, which made toying with her something of a guilty pleasure – kind of like ringing bell near a particularly twitchy rabbit. With the seemingly permanently sunburnt cheek and watery blue eyes, the first Callowan general since the Conquest didn't look like much. That delicate little nose made her look almost dainty, and the messy hair was seemingly match with dark rings around her eyes that over the years I'd seen thin but never entirely go away.

She was also one of the sharper field commanders in the Army of Callow, though I doubted she'd agree if asked. I'd not bet on her against Hune, not for a few years yet, but General Bagram of the Fourth had some bad habits from his Legion days – too prone to being defensive, too fond of using his heavies as a hammer to smash everything – to match the experience those years had given him, so that fight would be a much closer one. Mind you, it had to be said that this was true in part because the Army was horribly thin on senior officers. Hells, it'd been thin on those even after it'd cannibalized two full legions in the wake of the Folly and we'd taken considerable losses since then.

If Juniper and I had been able to spare a few years between wars to build off a proper officer corps she'd merely be one of the finer youngbloods, marked for advancement but still needing seasoning. As things stood, though, the decision to appoint her as the head of the force that'd hit the Cigelin Sisters wasn't me playing favourites with a fellow Callowan: I was genuinely putting the person in charge I believed was the finest pick. Hune herself might have been even better, but I'd need the Second with me. Though the sapper corps was now nominally separate from the rest of the Army of Callow, in practice the largest part of it had been lodged with the Second Army for years.

General Abigail saluted, biting the inside of her cheek, and approached my personal desk. At my side I felt Hakram shift in his wheelchair, trying to hide his amusement at the sight. The phalanges regularly seeded flattering rumours about Abigail to facilitate my long-term intentions for her – I'd need someone with an unimpeachable reputation and absolutely no ambition to hold the Army of Callow for Vivienne, when she became queen – and I knew for a fact that he'd indulged some of his gossip tendencies by crafting a few himself. I was pretty sure that delightful yarn about the good general having impaled a Revenant with the standard of the Third was his work, for one.

"Your Majesty," Abigail of Summerholm said. "I came as summoned."

I leaned back into my seat, regarding her gravely, and drummed my fingers against the desk. The general visibly wilted.

"That is cruel," Hakram said in Kharsum, tone appreciative.

"You're right, Adjutant," I somberly said, "it's best to get this over with."

The rabbit whimpered and I was a bad, bad woman. I wasn't going to stop, this was much too entertaining, but dues where they were due.

"Ma'am?" Abigail squeaked out.

"You know why you're here, general," I severely said.

The other woman twitched, like nervousness made into a body spasm, and out the stream came.

"I'm sorry," General Abigail stammered, "I know it's Proceran wine, and that makes me unpatriotic, but it's just so good-"

I sat back in my chair, smothering a grin.

"- I didn't even know they were loaded die, I got them from this goblin sergeant in the Second and-"

Oh Crows, she was still talking.

"- I wasn't sure if they were really flirting, I mean they're Blood and they're engaged-"

Had I broken one of my most valuable officers? Had I finally taken this too far?

"- in my defence Brotel is a very confusing name for a town, especially with Alamans pronunciation, and I didn't know he was an actual lord-"

Nah, I decided. This was just my reward for suffering through the last few weeks of soul-grinding warfare. It was like having a good smoke, only better because it came at someone else's expense. It occurred to me, after that thought, that perhaps the company I had kept over the last few years had not done wonders for my moral character. It was probably Black's fault if you went back far enough, I reassured myself. Not at all something I'd picked up all on my own.

"- I didn't really mean that we should eat all Proceran children, I mean how would we actually do that – okay, so maybe if we did like another sort of magistrate dedicated solely to baby-eating, but that would be really expensive and I don't think the House of Light would-"

Hakram cleared his throat, which silenced her in a heartbeat.

"You know what must be done now, I think," I solemnly said.

"You'll send me back home, where I will officially be a general but in reality stripped of all authority," General Abigail hopefully said.

"Even better," I said. "Adjutant?"

He wheeled up to her, passing her a folded parchment which she opened warily. Her eyes widened when she caught sight of the royal seal at the bottom.

"Congratulations, Lady Abigail," I said. "You'll have to pick a last name, now that you're a noble in the formal peerage of the Kingdom of Callow."

"What," Abigail weakly said.

"Quite right," I agreed. "It's not a landed title, mind you, but I've made my stance clear on handing those out."

I'd largely inherited a nobility with its back broken from my father, but Gods knew I would have gotten rid of even my last few northern barons if I could. I had no issue with court titles and even knighthoods, but the notion of legitimate rulers whose only talent was having the luck of being born to the right womb still rubbed me wrong. The governorships weren't a perfect system, but they were a damned sight better than the labyrinth of noble laws and privileges that'd preceded them.

"I don't understand," Abigail tried again.

"In recognition of your bold and heroic charge at the Second Battle of Lauzon's Hollow," Adjutant said, visibly enjoying every moment of this, "you have been made a noble of the Kingdom of Callow. The crown rewards exceptional service, General Abigail, and yours has not disappointed."

It also cut off any avenue of retreat if she tried to retire. Being a noble war heroine would make her one of the most eligible women in Callow after the war – she'd be dragged into the kingdom's affairs whether she wanted it or not.

"I," General Abigail hesitantly said, "thank you?"

"It was my pleasure," I grinned.

I meant every word, if not necessarily in the sense she might expect. It looked like she was trying to convince herself she was out of the woods, so immediately I hit her with the second announcement.

"It was also my pleasure to name you as the leading commander of the force that will continue with the assault on the Cigelin Sisters," I casually added.

Abigail froze.

"I don't mean to question your judgement, Your Majesty," the general delicately said.

"I don't think anyone's ever told me that without adding 'but' afterwards," I noted, and cocked an eyebrow.

She swallowed.

"However," General Abigail gallantly tried, "would General Hune not be a better fit for this appointment?"

"I've got other uses for her," I dismissed.

"It is only natural the command should fall to you, general," Hakram gravelled. "You are, after all, a member of the formal Callowan peerage."

I hid a grin behind my hand, admiring the sheer bastardry involved in that sentence. He hadn't lost his touch, evidently. General Abigail glared at the parchment that'd turned her into a noble as if the sheer depths of her hatred would be enough to set it aflame, though sadly for her Creation did not deign to indulge her.

"Surely Princess Beatrice-"

"Coming with me," I idly said, "you're getting the fantassins, though."

She paused a moment, considering the odds of my agreeing to pass overall command to mercenaries before rightfully dismissing the notion.

"Grandmaster Talbot?" she attempted, with remarkable tenacity.

I looked at her steadily and she deflated. The Summerholm girl gathered her courage though, and back into the breach she went.

"Perhaps the Dominion should-" she began.

I watched the wheels turn as she weighed whether Razin or Aquiline being in charge was more or less likely to get her killed.

"- leave a few companies of scouts behind, to compensate for the departure of the goblins," she hastily adjusted midsentence.

"Poor lordlings," Hakram amusedly said in Kharsum. "That'd sting, if they ever got wind of it."

"Quite right, Adjutant," I happily said. "She should get Firstborn instead. Ten thousand under Mighty Sudone and Lord Soln will do the trick, I would think."

She stared at me woefully.

"Thank you, Your Majesty," General Abigail said, in the tone of someone who'd just been asked to kiss the axe about to take their neck on the chopping block.

"I understand I'll be putting something a burden on you, as you'll still be commanding the Third while leading this part of the campaign," I said. "For that reason, I've assigned you an assistant you should find helpful in many regards."

With impeccable timing the guard outside my tent parted the flap to introduce the newest arrival, the young orc announcing the entrance of 'Secretary Elene'. Scribe had objected to our using her true name, if 'Eudokia' truly was that. It'd been the name she used as a Calamity, at least, which counted for something. I found it fascinating that though Scribe's aspect – Fade, she'd eventually told me, though it could be a lie – was pulsing as it always did and Abigail was in no way proof for it, the general's perpetual wariness meant she kept noticing that she wasn't noticing much about Scribe every few heartbeats.

A fascinating demonstration of the virtues of paranoia when you... oh Gods I was starting to sound like my father wasn't I? I cleared my throat, addressing both women.

"General Abigail, allow me to introduce you to Secretary Elene," I said. "She is a member of the adjunct secretariat."

Which was true, she even had a salary. I'd already ordered her pay docked twice for 'indecorous skulking', which was an official breach of regulations in the Legions of Terror because it was an institution that'd had goblins in its ranks for over two decades.

"I mean no offence, Your Majesty," General Abigail said, "but is she perhaps a magical assassin meant to kill me if I displease you?"

I choked on a startled burst of laughter. My lack of immediate denial had those sunburnt cheeks turning pale.

"For shame, general," Adjutant chided. "We don't enroll our magical assassins in the phalanges, it's the first place people would look. We're not amateurs."

"That makes sense," the dark-haired woman muttered, actually brightening some. "So this whole magical whammy I'm feeling is, uh, accidental?"

"Secretary Elene is Named," I said. "But I'm speaking for her too much already. Why don't you introduce yourself, secretary?"

"I am Secretary Elene of the adjunct secretariat," Scribe told Abigail in a tone so dry it rivalled the Hungering Sands. "Pleased to meet you."

"And you," the general replied, seemingly by reflex.

There was a pregnant pause.

"She's shy," I confided. "You might know her better as the Scribe."

General Abigail blinked in surprise.

"The old one's finally dead?" she asked.

"There's no need to be insulting," Scribe mildly said, "I assure you I am still quite spry."

"You're a Calamity?" Abigail wailed.

"Retired," Scribe noted. "I am now gainfully employed by the Kingdom of Callow. Which has my adequately remunerated loyalty."

"You conquered the Kingdom of Callow," the general said, voice gone shrill with dismay.

"It's a fair point," I admitted.

"She has you there," Adjutant agreed.

Scribe shot us a look that was deeply put-upon, though I'd met the godsdamned Calamities so if she was going to try to sell me she was used to less fucking around she was going to have to do better than that.

"I promise not to do it again," Scribe tried.

"See," I beamed, "already we're all getting along. I'm sure the two of you will both bloom from the cooperation."

Abigail twitched.

"Of course," she said. "I'm sure you're right, Your Majesty."

"I'm glad of your support for the notion," I said, "I wouldn't have forced it on you otherwise."

I'd never seen someone die a little inside before, it was quite riveting. I dismissed them both afterwards, and by the time they were walking out already Scribe was asking questions about the supply situation that the general was clearly lying her way through answering. A promising pair, I decided. Abigail of Summerholm was too used to scraping by when the danger wasn't immediate, which having Scribe keeping her on track should fix, while Scribe was too used to being the enabler of someone's grand design: it would be a genuine challenge for her to assist someone as inclined to improvisation as General Abigail.

Named liked a challenge, deep down, and I suspected that having one would do more to keep Scribe bound to us than everything else I'd done so far.

With them leaving Hakram and I were left alone, though only momentarily – within moments one of his helping hands drifted in, bringing a report. He looked through it and dismissed the man, wheeling up to the desk where I was pouring myself a finger of brandy. I raised an eyebrow questioningly and he nodded, so I rustled up a cup to pour another.

"Roland's band has killed the last creatures previously bound to Beastmaster," he said. "Casualties among the companies that accompanied them were light, mostly caused when the manticore went berserk."

The least dangerous of the creatures the man had mastered had either fled or grieved, but those who preyed on humans had instead gone violently rabid. Fortunately standing orders had been for Beastmaster to keep his menagerie far from where the Dead King could weaponize it, so it'd not turned into a costly rampage. Not that the hunts had been bloodless, for all that the Vagrant Spear had been wildly enthusiastic and the Blood had treated it like the social event of the decade.

"Burn the corpses and go through the standard measures to ensure none of it ends up in the Dead King's ranks," I said. "Anything else?"

"Archer's drinking," Hakram said. "Heavily. The Concocter joined her not long ago."

I grimaced, considering what heavily would mean when it was Indrani doing the drinking. I'd have to dip a toe there later and see if my presence was welcome. I'd not been light-handed while handing down discipline, so it might be that even though grieving she genuinely would not want to see me. Still, that she'd broken out the strong stuff before night even fell was not a good sign.

"I'll see what I can do," I said. "But it seems delicate situation to step into."

He hummed in agreement, offering up his cup. We knocked them and drank, the gesture smooth and practiced from years of repetition.

"She rarely talks about Refuge," Hakram said afterwards, "it's not shame, I think, but perhaps the absence of pride."

"She talks about Ranger all the time," I grunted.

"She mentions the Lady of the Lake," Adjutant corrected. "When does she ever speak of the woman beyond a few words? Even Vivienne shares more easily."

It had admittedly occurred to me in the past that Vivienne had been the Thief – a sneak and keep of secrets – and my enemy for years, and yet I'd still known her name before Indrani's. For someone so outwardly rambunctious Archer actually kept her card pretty close to the chest.

"It's how she is," I eventually said. "We're not all built for deep talks and scrutiny, Hakram. Some people prefer their dark corners without lights shined on them."

"I'm not sure that is truly the case," he gravelled. "Maybe a few years back, but now?"

He hesitated.

"Since the Everdark," Hakram specified. "And I don't mean because you two started sharing a bed down there."

"Great Strycht," I murmured.

Where I had died and risen again, First Under the Night. Where Archer had fought in my name against Mighty by the battalion, only to end up drowned in ice when my arrogance saw me eviscerated by the Sisters and Winter's power spill out like a sea. That near-death, one that she'd admitted she would not have been able to avoid even if she'd known it was coming, had shaken her greatly. She'd grown past it, past the fear, but it had changed her nonetheless. Sometimes just seeing what lay past the door was enough, even if you managed to close it after.

"She'd never have admitted a thing to Masego, before that," Hakram said. "She would have figured there was time enough later, and eventually that it was too late. No more, though. And I think it will be the same with Refuge, if the right person asks."

"That might not be me," I bluntly said.

The orc shook his head.

"It's different, what she has with Masego," Adjutant said. "He wouldn't judge, it's why she wouldn't mind speaking. But you're the one she confesses to, Catherine. Not me, not Vivienne, not the ties she's made since she became a captain of Named."

I leaned back, passing a hand through my hair.

"We'll see," I finally said. "I had to bring down the hammer on her yesterday, Hakram. It won't have gone over well."

The trouble was that, the way I figured, Indrani had joined the Truce and Terms largely because she was already part of the Woe and it was what we were doing. But the way I'd run the Woe wasn't the way I had to behave as an officer of the Grand Alliance, and even if it was tempting I couldn't just mark 'the Woe' as a different category within the Named I had authority over. It would undermine all I was trying to do if I treated them differently when it came to my duties. I wasn't sure, though, how much Indran actually cared about the Terms – or even the Accords, in the long view. She'd not take the lash for a cause she was indifferent to, that much I knew.

It just wasn't in her nature.

"You do her disservice, I think," Hakram thoughtfully said, "but I understand why you would. Sometimes it's more comforting to pick at a wound than have it healed."

My lips thinned in irritation. It was not a charitable interpretation of this, and it would have earned more than a scowl for anyone else.

"I'm not sure what wound you're supposed to be talking about," I said.

"That she's going to leave, eventually," Adjutant calmly said. "That she made that choice long before she made the one to love you."

I almost cursed – and not amusedly, not in poor humour. I almost cursed because that was the reflex, when something suddenly pricked you. I'd forgotten how sharp Hakram's truths had a way of being.

"Figured it all out, did you?" I said, tone a tad bitter.

It was not a pleasant part of me he'd dragged up to the light of day. There'd been a reason I'd pushed it in a corner where the day didn't reach.

"It was not insight, Catherine, but recognition," he said.

His licked his chops then stayed silent for a moment.

"I have done the same," Adjutant abruptly said. "With... this."

He gestured all around us, encompassing everything as I went still. We'd not even come to close to addressing the subject since I'd refused the proposal to support the Clans in rebellion against the Tower as it currently said.

"I'm not sure what you mean," I carefully said.

"I needed to know," Hakram quietly said, "if it was trust in principle or in truth. If you'd make a mistake simply because I asked you to, out of pity. More than anything else, that would have been intolerable."

My eyes narrowed.

"Your proposal," I said, "you botched it on purpose. It was never meant to be accepted."

"I hacked away what might make it feasible," he admitted. "And had them present you with what was left."

My fingers clenched, but I forced myself to breathe out.

"I don't think you understand how difficult the position you put me in was," I said, tone forcefully calm.

"I do," Hakram replied. "But I will not apologize for it, no more than you will apologize for barring from the battlefield and saddling me with a Named bodyguard."

"That's different," I hissed.

He bared his fangs the slightest bit, but his neck remained straight – not bent to the side, which would imply apology or submission. He was unmoved.

"You did it so you'd sleep soundly at night," Adjutant said. "So did I. And I will forgive you your shade of selfishness, if you forgive me mine."

It wasn't the same. I knew it stung, that I was keeping him away from the blades and saddling with what someone might consider a minder, but I was doing it so he wouldn't get killed. What he'd done... But he doesn't want to stay in the chair, Catherine, I reminded myself. He wants to risk the steel. And it was a decision I considered stupid and unreasonable, more a spasm of empty pride than anything with sense to it, but it wasn't mine to make. Not really. He'd bent his neck because it would help me sleep at night, and now he was asking me to do the same. It tasted like ash, but I would not deny he was not asking more of me than I had asked of him.

Perhaps less, even. That tended to be the way with us.

"It stings," I finally said. "That you didn't trust me."

He slowly nodded. I sighed and looked away.

"But maybe you're not wrong, about picking at wounds," I admitted. "Half the anger is fear that I could have failed the test."

"You didn't."

It was simply said, without frills or false promises. It did not reassure me as much as I would have thought it would, for all that.

"It's not going to be the same, is it?" I quietly asked. "Even when time passes. When it's not so fresh."

"Things change, Catherine," the orc replied. "We are not the same people we were when this all began."

Grief seized me by throat, as much for what had been done as who we'd once been. It had my eyes burning, for the first time in years.

"It's not a failure, Cat," Hakram gently said, taking my hand. "It's what we were after from the start. We can't change the world without changing with it."

"Yet it feels like a failure," I murmured, "doesn't it?"

Like I'd broken something. Those days in the Arsenal had cost us all more than I'd first understood. As all things touched by the Intercessor, they were poison in every way.

"We pay our prices," Adjutant simply said. "That's what victory is, even at its finest."

I blinked and rubbed at my eyes, parting my hand from his. My throat felt raw, like I'd swallowed glass and some had stayed lodged.

"So it is," I breathed out.

He patted my leg, then took his wheels in hand and began to make his way out of the tent. He paused, though, after a few armfuls.

"One last thing," Adjutant said, turning just enough to meet my eyes.

I waited in silence.

"If you ever speak to me of debt, Catherine," Hakram of the Howling Wolves evenly said, "I will leave and never come back."

It felt like a gut punch and I took it about as well, fingers clenching as he wheeled himself out of the tent without turning back. Gods. He'd said that and meant every word, hadn't he? The fear that flowed through my veins at that realization was almost paralyzing, and it was with trembling hands I reached for my pipe and lit up a packet of wakeleaf. Fuck. I'd known that nothing was absolute, that everything had a breaking point, but for him to just say it outright... I stayed alone on my tent, eyes closed and seeking calm that would not come.

After most of an hour passed I gave it up for the lost cause it was, and forced myself to seek out Indrani. Just because I felt like someone had yanked out the ground from under me didn't mean I could afford to stop moving.

I'd not been sure what to expect, exactly, when I entering the tent where I'd been told Indrani and the Concocter were drinking together. The two empty bottles of Creusens red abandoned on the ground were hardly a surprise, but I'd figured they would at least be seated. Instead the two women were leaning back against a flipped table, toppled chairs around them, and between the two of them a large glass bottle containing what looked like boiling water – though inexplicably the inside of the tent reeked of cherries – and half a dozen shoddily-made clay cups that were chipped from use.

Indrani, out of her armour and in a rough linen tunic with little usual scarf hanging loose around her neck, was very sloppily pouring herself some of the transparent boiling liquor and spilling more than she realized. The Concocter, on the other side of the flipped table, took a moment for me to recognize: every hair on her body was now coal black, and her eyes the darkest I had ever seen. She was seemingly a lot more invested in mocking Archer's pouring skills than noticing there was a third person in the tent, so it was Indrani who noticed me.

"Cat," she breathed out. "You're here."

She started, then scowled.

"Cocky's a villain," Indrani said. "I didn't break your rule."

"I'm not here for that," I assured her, then glanced at the other woman. "Concocter, always a pleasure."

"The very same," she replied, in the slow and careful tone of someone trying to seem less drunk than they actually were. "Would you like to sit, Your Majesty?"

"She hates nobles," Indrani confessed to her. "It's hilarious, she can never resist stepping on them even if she's the big noble now."

"Nobles are always big," Concocter solemnly replied. "Fat. Fucking Consortium pricks, they always gouge me on prices. S'why I sell them mostly poisons."

"We've been drinking, I see," I said, reluctantly amused. "Thank you, Concocter, I will."

I grabbed a chair, though instead of setting it aright I kept it on the side and pulled back my cloak as I sat down on the ground and leaned back against the legs. My leg twinged with pain, but it passed.

"See," Indrani slurred. "I told you she's not prissy."

"I never said she was," Concocter said, sounding irritated. "You always put words in my mouth."

I felt a pang of envy. Much as they seemed to genuinely rub each other wrong, there was an underlying closeness that I'd never really had the likes of. I'd made my own family, when I got older, but those two looked nothing all and yet in that moment of familiar irritation they'd seemed like sisters.

"So what are we drinking?" I asked. "Smells strong."

"Orchard Elixir," Concocter proudly said. "My own creation."

"Kickin' Cherries," Archer snickered. "You gotta call it that, I keep telling you."

"I would rather kiss John," Concocter replied.

A heartbeat passed, and then laughing drunkenly they loudly shouted 'and he's dead' together.

"Gods rest his soul," Concocter added. "So pretty. So dumb."

"Ah, Tinkles," Indrani breathed out, still laughing a bit. "At least he went out like a champion. It was a good scrap, Marchford."

"If you're going to keep laughing that loud, I'll require a glass of that elixir," I said.

I ignored Indrani's accusations of treachery and leaned forward after Concocter poured me a glass more deftly than I would have expected. When she took the clay cup in hand and began to pass it to me, though, she froze. So did Archer. They were both looking at the cup, the laughter gone.

"Fuck," Archer sighed.

"I'm missing something," I noted.

"Lysander made those," Concocter said. "We must have been what, twelve?"

"He was a little older, but yeah," Indrani sighed. "He needed help for his first shot at a pack of stryxes, so he made these little gifts for everyone."

"It's tradition when you're asking a favour, in some parts of the Free Cities," Concocter told me. "Shows goodwill. He was from there – outskirts of Atalante, he figured, but he was never sure. His family were hunters, moved around a lot."

"I got a leather bracelet with stones sowed on," Indrani said, half-smiling. "It was shittily made, like the cups, but..."

"He'd put in effort," Concocter echoed. "It was hard to say no after that. We weren't as hard with each other, back then."

"I don't have to drink from it if you don't want me to," I gently said.

"No," Concocter softly said after a moment, pressing it into my hand. "It should be used. It's what it's for."

I took it up and nodded thanks, taking an experimental sip from the transparent liquor – which was, even now, popping small bubbles like faintly boiling water – and immediately choked. The taste, Gods, the taste. It was exactly as strong as it smelled, and kicked just as strongly as aragh.

"Sisters," I cursed. "That is abominable."

They both cackled with laughter.

"I usually cut it with fruit juice," Concocter smirked. "I could always fetch something lighter if you'd prefer, Your Majesty."

"Call me Catherine," I snorted, waving dismissively. "And I've drunk worse for worse reasons, Concocter. I pretty much switched exclusively to aragh after I ate Winter, and I think it might burn even worse."

"She pretends she's all tough, but you should see her guzzle that Vale summer wine," Indrani said.

The traitorous wench. I drank from the cup again, and it wasn't as bad. Presumably the first sip had killed everything inside my mouth capable of feeling taste, so this was just flogging a dead horse.

"I should have let the Prince of Nightfall have you when we first got to Skade," I said. "It would have saved me heaps of trouble."

"I'll toast to that," Concocter drily said, raising her cup.

Even Indrani drink, because evidently it was that kind of a night. Well, afternoon anyway.

"This is our wake for Lysander," Indrani told me afterwards. "Such as it is."

"Never drank much, Beastmaster," Concocter said. "Didn't like the loss of control. He was that kind of a prick."

"I'll toast to that," Archer said, and again we drank.

I didn't actually talk that much over the following hours. I didn't need to: they were, I grasped almost eager to tell their stories to someone who'd not heard them before. I suspected that the Concocter was a lot lonelier than she seemed, for all that she proud as a cat. On occasion I used the power of being less drunk than the others to steer away from squabbles, but the two of them proved surprisingly amiable with each other. Eventually the Concocter fell into a drowse, slumping against the table, and Indrani rested her head against it as well. She closed her eyes, and I almost figured she'd fallen asleep as well until she spoke.

"I'm glad you came," Indrani quietly said.

"So am I," I replied, just as quietly. "Almost didn't."

"Why?"

"Figured you might not want me there, after yesterday," I admitted.

She snorted.

"Silly," Archer said. "Not angry about that. You were fighting for your way."

"Not yours," I said. "And I had to rap your knuckles."

"It's just what happens, in those situations," Indrani said.

The well of gratefulness I felt at her words did not quite silence the curiosity.

"Thought you'd be angry," I said. "You don't really care for the Truce and Terms."

"I don't," Archer easily said. "Don't mind them either, they're not likely to get in my way. But they're your way, Cat. Your mark, what you want to get done. I stepped on that, even if I didn't mean to. I'd do the same if it was the other way around, if clapped chains around my feet."

I slowly nodded. Hakram did have, I thought, that nasty habit of being right.

"You going to be all right?" I softly asked.

Silence followed for a long moment.

"Yeah," Archer finally said. "I just... I thought there was still time, Cat. To make something new."

She smiled bitterly.

"Stupid," Indrani said. "Should have learned better, after Great Strycht."

"I get it," I said. "Nauk wasn't what he used to be to me, not at the end, but when I heard he'd died at Sarcella..."

We shared a comfortable silence after that.

"He wouldn't have been as easy to live with as the image in my head," Indrani smiled. "I know that. Probably wouldn't even have worked. So I guess it's just having the possibility that I'm really grieving."

"It's still something, 'Drani," I replied.

"I guess it is," she murmured. "I guess it is."

After a moment her breath evened out, and I realized she'd fallen asleep. Reluctant to wake her so soon, I stayed seated even if my leg was beginning to ache and polished off the last of that atrocious Orchard Elixir. I was keeping an ear out for breathing, which was how I realized that the Concocter was no longer asleep almost immediately.

"It's a nice thing you did," Concocter whispered. "Coming here. Taking her of her."

"She's one of mine," I simply said.

"She used to be one of ours," the dark-haired villainess said, "but nice was never our game of choice. It's done well by her."

She sighed.

"You've done well by her," Concocter said. "The Woe."

"She's done well by us," I said. "Miss her?"

The other woman snorted.

"No," Concocter said. "She was fucking horrible, you know? To all of us. And we were horrible right back, but she had this need to win and..."

She shook her head.

"But it was us, at the start," she murmured. "The five of us. Other students came and went, but it was us and the Lady. It counts for something, even if we don't want it to. Lysander was a vicious shit of a man, Catherine. Selfish and brutal. But I miss it too, just like her. The... possibility."

"You weren't asleep," I said.

"Only half," she shrugged. "Drifted in and out. But I don't miss her, no. Maybe I'll see her again in the years to come, and maybe I won't. I'm not sure if I forgive her, or if there's anything to forgive. But I like..."

She softly laughed.

"I like that I have the possibility, now," Concocter said. "So thank you for that, Catherine Foundling. Because she wouldn't have gotten there alone."

"She would have," I replied, meaning every word.

"And believe that, I figure, is what made her want it in the first place," Concocter murmured.

I wasn't going to argue the point, not with a grieving woman whose history with Archer was even more complicated than my own, so I stayed silent.

"The Huntress," I said, "will she be all right?"

"Alexis never learned to cope with anything but her fists," Concocter said. "It does her no favours, when tragedy strikes. But she'll get better, if you keep them separate. They've always brought out the worst in each other."

"Thought you might go see her instead if Indrani, at first," I said.

"She's with her friends right now," the dark-haired Named shrugged, "people she actually likes. I'll look in on her tomorrow. I don't expect much to come out of it."

"I thought you two were closer," I frowned.

"You measure us all by your band," Concocter murmured. "You shouldn't. It's rare, what you have. I've seen the other side lives, Catherine, and they don't get it handed to them either. It's rare, and it's precious. Don't let it go easy."

"I won't," I quietly said.

She nodded, and made herself comfortable against the table. I waited until her breath was even again, then slowly pushed myself up to my feet. Night had fallen, and with it the time I could spend here. I would soon be needed. Still a little drunk, I limped out into the dark. The time agreed upon was soon, very soon. I wasn't surprised when a grey-clad wanderer crept out of the shade, falling in at my side as I headed to the edge of the camp.

"Do you even know why you're here?" I curiously asked.

"Not yet," the Grey Pilgrim said.

I snorted. Fucking heroes.

"You asked me what my contingencies were, once," I said. "You're about to see one."

And at the edge of the wards, the two of us stood in the dark until Creation was opened with a slice and a dark-clad man strode through the opening. He smiled at seeing me. I smiled back.

"Welcome back, Hierophant," I said.

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, that means extra chapter in the eponymous tab. This one is titled "Disjunction" and is from Vivienne's POV, shortly after the end of Book V.

Javvies

Ooh, Masego's back in play. Excellent.
Reconciliation between Cat and Archer and Cat and Hakram (kind of). Even better.

Heh. Abigail thinks she's in trouble for something and then tries to talk her way into getting fired or demoted over it and instead gets a title of nobility out of it. She's stuck – no way to get out of responsibilities now.
She's gotta be wondering what, if anything, could have gotten her into enough trouble to be removed from her position without crossing the line into treason or some other execution-warranting offence.

And we're going to see an Abigail and Scribe team up. That's going to be hilarious.

Javvies

That was supposed be on its own, not a reply.
Dammit, wordpress.

caoimhinh

A bit of a continuity error: twice in this chapter Catherine mentions that her disciplining of Archer was "today".

It wasn't, that happened yesterday in the afternoon. And then in the night, they went raiding with the Drow until close to 4 a.m.

We were then told that by midday the Gigantes arrived, and then Tariq arrived, so this is the night of the day of Tariq's arrival, which makes it well over 24 hours after Indrani's brawl with Silver Huntress.

Mental Mouse

Cat's had a really long day!

Risser

Really tho did Abigail kill a revenent with the standard?
Please let it be true

Morgenstern

Wording never said anything about killing. Just sticking it with one 😊

waffleblaster

Somehow thats even better

Javvies

Ooh, Masego's back in play. Excellent.
Reconciliation between Cat and Archer and Cat and Hakram (kind of). Even better.

Heh. Abigail thinks she's in trouble for something and then tries to talk her way into getting fired or demoted over it and instead gets a title of nobility out of it. She's stuck – no way to get out of responsibilities now.

She's gotta be wondering what, if anything, could have gotten her into enough trouble to be removed from her position without crossing the line into treason or some other execution-warranting offence.

And we're going to see an Abigail and Scribe team up. That's going to be hilarious.

doominator10

Bets on what Abigail is going to pick for her new surname? My guess it will be after an alcoholic beverage.

Abigail Vale.
Abigail Aragh.
Hmm...

nimelennar

Abigail Orchard Elixir.

doominator10

Abigail Cherries!

TeK

She will probably try picking a name that has a chance of stripping her of title. Abigail Childeater, Abigail Drunk, Abigail Wifebeater, Abigail Realqueen (although that one might get her hanging, so it's out).

I am personally more interested in what motto she'll choose. I am partial too "Not The Freckles".

Adrian V

Nahh, her coat of arms, or standard, whatever i mena her simbol every noble house/line has: i bet she will choose ferrets xD

Salt

She'll pick something controversial to lower her standing and responsibilities, have schemers interpret it as a sign of her great political ambition and try to bring her into the fold, at which point she immediately reports them to Vivienne out of a complete lack of desire to fight another war at all, let alone a civil war.

Cue this being interpreted as a selflessly loyal and extremely shrewd subject, who's willing to taint her own reputation to root out the disloyal and traitorous.

Abrakadabra

Run to the hills. Thats the perfect motto for her. 😊

Raved Thrad

Abigail Notatanner. To remind herself of why she stayed a general, and is now a noble. 😊

beleester

Family motto: "They all look like ferrets."

Raved Thrad

This means, of course, that Talbot is going to try to match Abigail with some noble-get ferret who doesn't look like a ferret...

aran

She already picked her name:

"You'll have to pick a last name, now that you're a noble in the formal peerage of the Kingdom of Callow."

Lady Abigail What.

Possibly a contraction of the longer name Lady Abigail What The Fuck Just Happened

dadycoool

First third, my stomach hurts from laughing so hard. Abigail is a blessing upon Creation.

Second third, gut punch after gut punch. The Adjutant swore to his Warlord, but even he has limits. The thought of the Woe shattering is terrifying, even if we know intellectually that it will end eventually.

Last third, catharsis and some feel-good juice. It's REALLY good that Indrani has legit siblings, with Ranger as the mother. It grounds her in a way that Cat completely misses out on.

Yay! Masego's back!

Anomandris

You know what would be dope – "Mom" coming back to wreck a bit of behind the scenes havoc on DK for this....

Cicero

Strange that Ranger and Black are two Calamities that ended up "accidentally" having children.

In a very odd way that makes Archer and Cat sisters too.

If Ranger is the abusive mother, that makes Black the emotionally distant father.

sutortyrannus

>In a very odd way that makes Archer and Cat sisters too.

"What are you doing, stepsis?"

"No chromo".

Liliet

STEP sisters.

Black, emotionally distant, yeah right. He's the guy Catherine fell into habit of greeting with hugs after knowing him for less than a year.

Mental Mouse

I think that's on Cat. Remember that she was a teenage girl...

Liliet

Yes, a very feral and suspicious of the world teenage orphan.

And he made a hugster out of her.

""""Emotionally distant""""

KingJulius

If Adjutant left for any reason Catherine would simply break. She would either become a shell of a person and retreat into a corner or she would become a monster that makes even Black warn her of going too far.

Liliet

I don't think he's going to leave any more than Cat was really going to walk away from the Grand Alliance if Bard acted against her when she told Tariq she would, back in book 5.

It's just... a setting of boundaries. Long in the coming.

Burlyraven

Hmm... I wonder if Scribe might just be the catalyst to get Abigail into Name territory, or if it's just going to be an odd couple comedy pairing? Second one seems more likely, but I'm amused at the thought of how either could go.

And at least everybody's starting to be honest and open with one another, now. Things are both more and less stable as a result.

Anomandris

The most interesting part was Abby actually shrugging off Scribe's aspect! Haven't we seen/heard of Named who failed to do that?

mamm0nn

She didn't shrug it off, she's just paranoid enough to notice it/ /paranoid enough to notice it/ /paranoid enough to notice it/ /paranoid enough to notice it, infinite loop.

Mental Mouse

Which is at least as good as what Cat manages.

hakureireimu

Abby didn't shrug off Scribe's aspect; Abby overcame it through sheer paranoia!

NerfContessa

You mean to say

Abbymon uses paranoya.
It is extremely effective.

Sir Nil

She knows she's so paranoid that even if she forgets about Scribe, she'll quickly realise that "Oh shit I haven't noticed anything about her!"

Also, I recall there was a Procerean spymaster who was able to do a similar thing, but he only realised he didn't catch anything when he was trying to think how to get info on her appearance back.

Javvies

It's not so much that she shrugged it off. It was working, but Abigail is just that twitchy and paranoid, plus she went extra paranoid because it was Cat's tent and Cat and Hakram were both right there.

It's not paranoia if they're really out to get you. And Abigail knows the universe is out to get her. Which means that the blank spot of nothingness that Scribe was standing in was enough to trip Abigail's finely honed survival sense into noticing "hey something's not right here".

Eleron Pfoutz

Why not both?

nimelennar

Wait, is Hierophant back, or is he _back_?

Raivshard

I had the same thought. Did he nail down a source of magic to claim as his own?

Javvies

Masego's the fucking Heirophant.

He doesn't need the Gift/mortal magic that you normally get born with anymore.

He can craft miracles, utilize Fae arts, all by force of will and the right knowledge. He can probably emulate Night abilities as well, or will be able to with sufficient time and examination of them.

So ... while he might not officially have the Gift anymore, I fully expect that he can emulate it.

Though, we haven't actually really seen him in action since the founding of Twilight. Just when Blessed Artificer used a Light-based artifact on him and he broke the shit out of it.

Mental Mouse

He was also working with Cat against the Bard at the Arsenal.

Q

If she keeps climbing the ranks at this rate Abigail is going to reach apotheosis before Masego!

TeK

All hail Abigail, Goddess of Why The Fuck Is This Happening To Me

NerfContessa

Sooo... Athena?

TeK

Ok, I thought I don't get strategy stuff, but this is even worse. Can somebody give me a play by play of what happened here between Hakram and Cat for a person less in touch with his emotions than Aqua Sahelian?

Itarion

A while back, Hakram gave Cat a test. A proposal for aiding/arming the orc tribes that was utterly imbalanced and thoroughly flawed. Cat's refusal showed that she would not grant him things from pity, or rather that she did not pity him.

Hakram's injuries are crippling. He's missing much of his lower body, and in a way that cannot be repaired. This nearly broke him, and for a while his Name was slipping because Cat's handling of him – to keep him alive – made him lose trust in his abilities. The proposal response was an indication that she did not pity him for his weakness, and thus that her actions were to protect him because she still needs him.

In the now, the implications of that are discussed. Hakram has made it clear that he will not be coddled, and that what he and Cat do for each other is not because it is owed, as a debt. Both have asked and recieved great and terrible prices from each other, and trying to measure that will ruin it.

aran

I understood the test part, but I'm somewhat confused by his statement that he "hacked away what might make it feasible". This implies that while he gave Cat a bad suggestion to see if she would humor him out of pity, he also had a good suggestion that for some reason he hasn't given her.

Cpt. Obvious

It could also mean that he had to really work at it to make the proposal somewhat believable. If it didn't at least require some serious thought to decline or approve Cat would have smelled rat. She knows how Hakram would put something like that together. If he'd not put all effort into it she'd known something was up.

caoimhinh

I guess you mean from the "I sent you that proposal as a test" part?

It's a bit hard to explain, and this kind of stuff can have multiple interpretations depending on who sees them, some will justify these actions while others will condemn them. If you think some of Hakram's actions made no sense, don't worry, it's because they were illogical. Emotion is what moved him rather than his usual rationality, and being crippled leaves a huge emotional wreck on any person.

Now, I am not a psychologist, but here's my take on it:

Hakram needed reassurance that Cat trusted him without being blind; and that she was keeping him with her out of more than pity and friendship. His wounded ego and stressed mind needed "another proof" that Catherine still saw him as a valuable asset. Have you heard those stories about how a girlfriend sees her friend to seduce her boyfriend because she wants to see if he would cheat? Kinda like that.

Hakram's test to Cat consisted of an unfeasible proposal that Catherine could not reasonably accept. If she had agreed to it, it would mean that she was doing it for him rather than for the actual content of the proposal, and Hakram would take that as an insult, he would take it as her feeling pity of him due to his crippled state and how her

Sounds toxic? It is. However illogical it may seem, this makes sense in context, because of the state in which Hakram is (plus his cultural background as an Orc). People who are in emotional distress tend to take wrong decisions, often do self-destructive things that they wouldn't do if they were their normal selves. Also, since Hakram was a nihilist without a motivation to move in life until he met Catherine, the notion that she might not find him useful must be terrifying to him.

Despite how calm Hakram seems to be, he is actually suffering, and he is lashing out due to his emotional state, and he needs to talk about it openly before he keeps deteriorating his friendship with the person who is the most precious to him. People tend to do such when they are in situations of extreme emotional distress, like experiencing withdrawal symptoms, grieving, or coping with trauma.

Notice how in Hakram's mind putting him away from the battlefield because he is missing an arm and a leg is an equal insult to the emotional crossroads that he made Catherine face with his little test. And he says he won't apologize for doing it because Cat won't apologize for not letting him go fight.

It's not even a matter of making mental gymnastics, it's an instinctual response of hurting others because you are feeling hurt, and giving offense because you perceive that you have been slighted.

It's something that's even seen in a conversation, when one person says something hurtful, you say something hurtful back.

Matthew Wells

Hakram thought Cat might be compromised by her grief at him being crippled. So he gave her an intentionally bad plan that she could approve as a favor to him. Since she didn't, she's still trustworthy.

Also, if she had done it out of a sense of debt, she would have impugned his honor- he took his wounds in combat, fighting for what he believed in. That's why he threatened to leave.

Liliet

tl;dr Hakram didn't REALLY give Cat a horrible awful no good proposal to support orcs because he wanted it. He just FAKED giving it to her because he wanted to make sure she wasn't doing things out of pity. I don't think he noticed how much he would have terrified her – how much he DID terrify ME over here – with the idea that he was making shitty stuff now, but I guess even if he did he wouldn't care, because of how bad it was to be him at that moment.

She had committed the grave offense of trying to keep him safe, you see. It's, like, grounds for a duel to the death among orcs, or something.

I'm just really fucking happy these idiots are chugging along.

Liliet

On second thought, uh, I think I was wrong with the "didn't realize how much he terrified her" thing.

I think that was his terror first actually.

I think he was afraid that Catherine was compromised, that her affection for him was a burden and that he might have been dragging her down for some time already without either of them noticing.

All Dogs are QUEENS

Basically, he felt he needed to know if Cat was just keeping him around because she felt she owed him/out of pity, or if she was keeping him around because she still needed him. To him the first one would be unacceptable and could have lead to him leaving on his own, he'd rather be nothing than be a burden, while the second one would mean that Cat still trusted him and had meant what she said when she told him that she still had things she needed him for even though he couldn't fight anymore.

From our perspective that's obvious, we've seen the inside of Cat's head and we know that she would both emotionally break without Hakram as a rock and that she wouldn't be able to manage a fair bit of what she's built without him; Hakram is going through a lot right now though, it makes sense that with Cat being Queen of Callow, First Under Night, and Queen of Villains he's start to wonder if after getting crippled he really had a place in her machinations. She proved that she still trusted him and that to her he still did

Frivolous

Speak to me of debt – Debt owed by Cat to Hakram? Debt owed by Hakram to Cat? I'm not certain, but I guess Hakram means it both ways, that if Cat ever tries to use debt as a reason why she does anything for or to Hakram, Hakram will leave. Because love shouldn't be about owing.

I'm not even sure if Hakram made the threat out of pride or simply because he loves Cat and won't allow her to weaken herself. The threat could have been solely prophylactic in intention, to keep Cat from thinking that way about Hakram.

I continue to hold hope for Hakram to eventually be healed or to find his own way past or through his mutilation. Though even that may not bring the old relationship with Cat back.

I do know that Hakram would rather die or lose his Name than be a figure of pity to Cat.

I quite like that Hakram tested Cat by passing her that botched proposal. And that Cat passed the test.

I love love love the part about Abigail. The babble about everything she feels Cat might execute her for was very funny, particularly the phrase "magistrate dedicated solely to baby-eating, but that would be really expensive".

I wonder what last name she'll choose. Something ordinary like Brewer, after her mother's previous occupation? Abi will try to blend in, I think.

When she gibbered about them flirting, does that not mean that a couple of Levantine nobles, engaged even, tried to get her into a threesome? How risqué if so.

I wonder exactly what indecorous skulking means, and also how goblins do it.

I'm rolling my eyes yet again over Dominion craziness that they think an eruption of monsters is wonderful. Dominion women must have lots of kids to make up for their horrible attitude towards self-preservation. Otherwise they would have died out long ago.

I like how Concocter's opinion of Cat matches Wekesa's opinion of Cat and the Woe when it comes to Indrani and Masego, respectively. Cat and the Woe have been good for them emotionally.

Matthew Wells

I'm betting not only did she nearly end up in a threesome, it was with our favorite pair of reckless young Blood.

Frivolous

Probably is Razin and Aquiline, yes. There can't be that many engaged couples in the army.

On the other hand, maybe Abigail got her wish and became pregnant, which could make her ineligible for continued military service. Wouldn't that be a plot twist, to become pregnant by Razin Tanja?

Raved Thrad

That would result in a scene with Aquiline, though, wouldn't it?

"General Abigail, I must regretfully invite you to an appointment, with knives, tomorrow at dawn. Unless you agree to permanently join the House of Tanja, then I must kill you for my honor and the honor of the Blood. I will bear Razin's heir, and no other!"

Frivolous

Definitely a possible consequence.

On the other hand, are the Blood of the Binder and the Slayer even allowed to mix together? Are they allowed to have one single kid who inherits the lands and property and allegiances of both Tanja and Osenia?

If the answer is No, then Abi's potential kid by Razin might solve that little problem.

I suspect there must be some traditional response to illegitimate kids in the Dominion. The Levantines are so hot-blooded, violent, and probably horny that it must have happened before, and often. Either they go for vendettas as per the usual, or they're completely blasé about illegitimacy.

I have no idea which is more likely.

Raved Thrad

Maybe a Trial of Bloodright, quiaff?

Morgenstern

Why can't there be "that many engaged couples in the army" when it comes to the Dominion's army, though? They obviously have no gender bias when it comes to fighting and killing, and the whole thing can (see Aquiline vs Razin) even serve as love-maker for them... it would seem to be "a wonderful pastime" for Levantine couples to go out and fight together, judging by what we've been shown of their culture so far. 😊 What with the "social event of the decade" this very chapter and all that "honor and blood" stuff.

Frivolous

I suppose there could be many engaged couples, but I'm suspecting most are either single or already married.

Engagement, after all, is usually a temporary condition.
Like being pregnant.

BringBlackBack

What he meant when he said debt is her pitying him. Remember earlier, when he made a bullshit request to give Orcs stuff and she said no? She passed his test. She put the lives of people over her friend's feelings. So, when Hakram says he doesn't want to hear anything about debt, he means that he doesn't want her to pity him and his crippled state, rather than treat him like an equal and as a man who decided to follow her and live with the consequences.

mamm0nn

Alright, it's a bit creepy how close I was with predicting Cat's conversation with Abigail last chapter. Different names, but the same sentiment. That said, Viv might have some competition for the Queenship of Callow now. At this point there are few ways to screw over Abigail with promotions left.

Daniel

Queens can abdicate. If she gets to Queen (another chess metaphor?) she can finally rest.

Although that's just the legal side of it, she might still have some other moral, emotional, magical or Name-related bonds on her that keep her even then, and I guess she probably would.

mamm0nn

Abigail: Oh shit, I can't abdicate because angry mobs will lynch me if I leave, let the government implode and also the Tower will probably try to assassinate me just to make sure I cannot make a heroic comeback to rally Callow defeated a few decades from now.

Captain Amazing

I think the Bard is trying to sever all of Catherine's close relationships. The attack on the Arsenal weakened her friendship with both Hakram and Hanno and killed the Repentant Magister. This leaves the starcrossed lover plot to the Kingfisher Prince, and that couldn't last. The mentor relationship with the Scorched Apostate was killed in the cradle. I think that fear she's feeling is left over from the demon attack as Bard had the demon target the relationship. Masego doesn't know about the effects of terror demons.

Notably, Cat's friendship with Vivienne is still intact because she doesn't have a name anymore.

Cap'n Smurfy

Damn I hadn't picked up on that at all. Plus if it wasn't for Hakram Cat would have left Archer alone after Beastmasters death, creating more distance between them. I wonder how Beastmasters actually died, considering we didn't even see his perspective but got that Monk's one. The one who also died not five minutes later...

Morgenstern

The Sage, you mean? (The Monk was one of the traitors in the Arsenal, quite a few chapters back.)

We got a very roundabout quick summary of Indrani being there with Beastmaster during the fight he died in, what with the broken arm and all that. So my second gut instinct of him getting killed when he just found vital information that will now never reach the army – right after the first of them not recovering the body and him coming back as Revenant – went right out the window, when it was confirmed that Indrani had been with him and his body recovered. Well, shucks. Simply not a really relevant death then, I think – other than as emotional plot hook for further character development.

Other than the Sage who seemingly did find vital info – just to get sniped before he could tell anybody what he found out (or make use of it himself). Sad.

Liliet

Actually Cat had a pretty bad rift with Vivienne too, until Vivienne went out of her way to try and fix it after Indrani chided Cat for it.

Jircniv

Now THAT is what I would call a roller-coaster of emotions. Thanks for a magnificent chapter EE. Well done.

Frivolous

Hmm. Now that General Abigail has become General Lady Abigail and is eligible to give herself a last name, I wonder what happens to her family, the brothers and maybe mother and the uncle and ferret-faced cousins. Do they get the last name, too, or is it only Abigail's own children?

And what if Abigail gets married to someone else with a last name? Does her last name get swallowed up by her spouse's last name, thus disappearing?

Does anyone know the historical precedents for such?

beleester

From what I can gather, a hereditary title is inherited by descendants of the original grantee, so Abigail's kids could inherit, but her existing family isn't affected. Which child exactly depends on Callow's rules of succession – typically it's the firstborn male heir, but Calernia tends to have more gender equality, so it might be firstborn of any gender.

If she marries another noble, she and her children get the man's last name – during the crusade, a Callowan noble mentions that the Procerans wanted to marry her daughter specifically so that any children would take Proceran last names. (Callow apparently allows same-sex marriage, but no word on what happens to the title then.)

I believe the noble title still exists, last name or no, but Abigail's title doesn't seem to include anything but her last name. She's not the Lady of anywhere, she's just Lady Abigail. So I think the title would disappear for most purposes, but it could pop up again if it became relevant somehow (divorce? widow? husband gets his title revoked?).

Morgenstern

Maybe that's where some double and triple titles of nobles come from, not just them owning multiple regions?

I would wager there are different rules about that in different countries, though. Some losing the name of the less relevant partner (rules for which being which might vary), others making double titles out of the two, ... there might be others yet, but I'm seemingly too tired to grasp the thought that just went by 😊

Frivolous

I think it would be a shame if Abi's new last name were lost simply because she married someone who also had a last name. I mean, new original noble last names must be pretty rare, right?

Abi is a little like the Callowan version of Lorenzo Malanza, elevated to the nobility because he was a great general. And, you know, defeated his predecessor Juan Osuna.

I wonder if old Lorenzo had Malanza as a last name before or only after he became Prince of Aquitan.

Black Spiral Dancer

Interesting chapter. Hard to mow through, but worth it.

Crowley

Poor Abigail getting the short end of the stick again. And paired with Scribe, this should be interesting. I'm looking forward to an interlude with them together, maybe even from Scribe's POV for once.

Cat and Hakram needed that talk. And just when you think they're cool, he pulls that line. Hakram, you gossipy bitch, there were enough feels around, that threat's gonna keep Cat and readers on edge.

Lysander's wake and its aftermath was all lovely in every way. Glad to see how well those three get along.

Masego at the end though, it's this kind of cliffhangers that make me curse the day i caught up.

Didn't see a typo thread, so i guess i'll start one.

hair was seemingly match-> hair was seemingly matched keep of secrets-> keeper of secrets

Indran-> Indrani

His licked his chops-> He licked barring from the battlefield-> barring me from the battlefield seized me by throat-> seized me by the throat with little usual scarf-> with the little usual scarf looked nothing all-> looked nothing alike

if clapped chains-> if you clapped chains

Taking here of her-> Taking care of her instead if Indrani->instead of Indrani

I've seen the other side lives-> I've seen how the other side lives

Valkyria

Poor Abigail, Cat unfortunately likes her.

But props to her to still believe in those early retirement plans. Being this convinced against all the odds takes some hardened resolve.

JJR

Cat is smart enough to not make the mistake of toying with her enemies. But she is still a cat, and she needs to toy with someone when she's bored; friends it is then.

Juff

Typo Thread:

ringing bell > ringing a bell match with > matched with build off > build up loaded die > loaded dice

inside before, it > inside before; it to us than everything (extra space) seems delicate > seems a delicate afterwards, "it's > afterwards. "It's her card > her cards

Indran actually > Indrani actually
His licked his chops > He licked his chops, currently said. (i'm not sure what this should be) barring from > barring me from saddling with > saddling him with alone on > alone in them a large > there were a large looked nothing at all > looked nothing at all alike sowed on > sewed on she proud > she was proud (or acted?)
if clapped chains > if it clapped chains
Taking care of her > Taking care of her
And believe that > And believing that (or your belief in that?) if Indrani > of Indrani seen the other side > seen how the other side

Shveiran

This chapter made me laugh like a fool, then it punched me in the guts, then it moved my heart, and to finish me off filled me with a sense of expectation fully worthy of a weekend cliffhanger.

Do I even need to say that this was amazing?

I suppose I will, just in case. You are a wonder, EE. Thank you truly for these amazing gifts you keep offering us.

Liliet

"“You’re a Calamity?” Abigail wailed.

“Retired,” Scribe noted. “I am now gainfully employed by the Kingdom of Callow. Which has my adequately remunerated loyalty.”

“You conquered the Kingdom of Callow,” the general said, voice gone shrill with dismay.

“It’s a fair point,” I admitted.

“She has you there,” Adjutant agreed.

Scribe shot us a look that was deeply put-upon, though I’d met the godsdamned Calamities so if she was going to try to sell me she was used to less fucking around she was going to have to do better than that.

“I promise not to do it again,” Scribe tried.”

I MISSED THIS

I MISSED THIS SO MUCH

nimelennar

Come on, Scribe, don't make promises with caveats unless you explicitly state those caveats.

Which is to say, if Black asked her to conquer Callow again, you know she'd totally do it, promise or not.

JJR

"Well you see, I only conquered 99% of Callow this time. This bit over here is still free and independent!"

-Scribe probably

Liliet

Well, it's kind of like Cat's thought process in agreeing to employ her at all. They both know he's got Callow exactly where he wants it.

Crash

Glorious.

ninegardens

So, does this mean that we'll get Hakram's actual scheme soon enough (without critical details torn out?)

LarsBlitzer

Another chapter title relating to Chess! This time it's "Adjournment." Which, in this context means to suspend the game in progress so it can be continued at another time, typically the following day. The rationale is that games often extend in duration beyond what is reasonable for a single session of play. As in chess, there is sometimes a sealed move, where the next move that would be made is sealed in an envelope, to be played out when the game resumes (normally played by the director or arbiter). This practice ensures that neither player knows what the board position will be when it is their next turn to move.

In this case, we're at a lull between battles; the war is temporarily suspended, and the "sealed move" in this context is pretty blatant: the bestowal of title to Lady Abigail Cain-Blackadder (a placemaker until she decides on a surname) and saddling her with the Scribe to keep her focused.

Daniel E

Totally called Abigail getting a raw deal from the previous chapter. I am actually in tears from laughing, even the drama afterwards can not detract from my joy. Best part is Hakram with a legendary poker face talking about their magical assassins, and Abigail actually cheers up a little as she agrees that placing them in the rank & file is too obvious. Gods be with you, Admiral Abigail.

sengachi

The Abigail scene was glorious, had me laughing the whole time.

And Idrani's scene was just as good, but in a way that left me very quiet.

Thank you for this story. It's really better than I can do justice with words.

Frivolous

I have been trying to remember what Abigail's situation reminds me of, and I realized her situation mirrors the plot of Going Postal by Terry Pratchett.

Abigail is Moist, the overly competent and very slippery criminal who flourishes under pressure. Scribe is the golem, assigned to follow Moist around and keep him in line. Cat is Vetinari, the resourcefully sadistic tyrant.

Only Abi isn't a criminal, she just really wants to go home. Scribe doesn't want to kill Abi, though Abi probably thinks differently. But Cat really is a lot like Vetinari, especially from Abi's perspective.

Abigail's reputation will probably skyrocket once it becomes known that she has been assigned not just any Named but a Calamity. Her own personal Calamity, both literally and figuratively. Or her reputation would, if Scribe were not so completely forgettable.

Crash

Think this might be my new favourite chapter.

It has everything. Abigail being mercilessly needled by Cat and Hakram. Heavy Woe interactions but also loving, in their own way and... Who am I kidding?

"I promise I won't do it again."

Absolutely broke me. Completely lost it.

I love this.

Mental Mouse

What broke me was Abigail's response to being ennobled. "What."

aran

"You'll have to pick a last name, now that you're a noble in the formal peerage of the Kingdom of Callow."

"What," Abigail weakly said.

Congratulations, Lady Abigail What.

Relai

I love how through the pure virtue of who Abigail is, she as a normal non-named person can break through one of Scribe's aspects.

Interlude: Theism

"Seventy-four: if your lover does not have martial training have a rescue plan ready and waiting, as the eventual abduction by your nemesis is essentially inevitable."

– 'Two Hundred Heroic Axioms', author unknown

Klaus breathed out, quashing all hesitation, and struck.

The axe-blade bit deep into the skull, killing Ratbiter before the horse realized what was happening. The Bremen stampfen dropped, mercifully, but the spray of blood still went high and hot. Messy thing killing a horse, even when done right. Some would have said that the Prince of Hannover should have ceded the duty to another, that the arm he'd lost in the fall of Hainaut would make a clean kill harder, but he'd refused. Klaus Papenheim had ridden that horse through death and doom too long to let someone else swing the axe. Wiping the bloodspray off his cheek, the prince knelt by his old friend's corpse and laid a hand on the unmoving flank.

"Rest, old friend," the Prince of Hannover murmured in Reitz. "And if there is a place for you on the other side, I will find you there."

Klaus Papenheim was, in the end, Lycaonese. He'd miss Ratbiter, but he would not burden the army with a lame horse. His people knew well that hesitation in the face of the dead only deepened the losses, and the virtues of pragmatism had been ground deep into their common soul. Sentiment was of no use from the grave, or from the uglier end of walking death. The old general forced himself up, feeling his knees groan under the weight. Behind him, two bodyguards and a pack of army cooks were waiting.

"Butcher and skin him," the Prince of Hannover ordered. "Throw the bones and offal in the disposal pit."

Pitch and magefire would make sure the Dead King found nothing there to use. Klaus passed the axe's handle to one of his bodyguard – Dieter, whose scarred scalp had turned white as he became just another boy aged too soon by this infernal war – and strode away. His steps took him down the slope, towards the heart of the beleaguered army's camp as his bodyguards followed in his wake. His parents would have disapproved of it, his leaving. If they'd thought they glimpsed squeamishness they would have made him watch, if not take up a skinning knife himself. A Papenheim cannot hesitate, Father had always said. A crown is a cage of hard choices, Mother had whispered, tucking him in a child.

Both had set out to burn weakness out of him so that Hannover would not perish under his watch.

The white-haired prince almost smiled. It'd been many years since he had last thought of Ludwig and Sieglinde Papenheim, neither of which were remembered fondly by many of their kin. Klaus had come to understand, as a ruler in his own right, that much of what had seemed cruelty as a child had in truth been cold pragmatism of the breed necessary to survive at Keter's gate. He'd even come to be grateful for the hard lessons, in time. Yet the passing of the years had not made him love the imperious and high-handed pair any more than he had whilst they still lived. Ironically enough, he figured neither would have minded: what did his aversion matter to them, when their ways had become his just as they had wished? Some legacies were insidious, he'd learned, and all the harder to shake for their quiet creep.

There were songs, among Klaus' people, about the love he'd borne for his late wife. How even as a man in his prime he'd never considered remarrying. The truth was not as clean as that. Part of why Klaus had never remarried after Suse's death had been his many failings as a father. He had, without even noticing, become his parents come again. No wonder Wilfried had pressed that charge too far against the ratlings: when had he ever smiled at his eldest save when the boy came back bloodied and victorious? And Gregor, his sweet secondborn he'd tried to harden for the days ahead, had hidden the sickness until it'd been much too late for even the priests.

Would he have, if he'd not been convinced his own father saw him as a weakling?

And so Klaus had decided he would not fail any more children, that legacy would die with him. Margaret had been the one to draw him out of the darkness of those days, after she gave birth to her own little daughter. His sister had been a hesitant mother, and sometimes distant, but rarely unkind: in this she had fared the best of the House of Hasenbach. All it'd taken was for Klaus to hold that bundle named Cordelia in his arms once and he'd been lost, besotted with the little blonde curls and at the laughing eyes. She'd been a merry child, his niece. Prone to gurgling at strangers and trying to eat her uncle's beard.

More than once Klaus had found his hand reaching for ink and quill, after the talk that had buried their closeness. Where the First Prince of Procer had sent him to fight and die and Hainaut, ordered him to abandon the principality – the people! – he'd sworn to defend. Always he'd drawn back at the last moment, and only official reports had left for Salia. Yet he often found himself writing that letter in his mind, when he had a spare moment. Bits and pieces of it. Sometimes, niece, you remind me of your grandfather, Klaus would write if he took the quill today. When I was a boy of nine, Prince Ludwig Papenheim ordered the town of Ebelburg burned when he heard ratling warbands were two hours away.

If he hadn't, the townsfolk would have insisted on fighting and standing their ground, the white-haired prince wrote in his mind. They would have said the children could not run quick enough, that the elderly would not survive the trip. Instead he had torches thrown, and four hundred people were saved. They did not thank him for it, Cordelia.

Klaus still remembered the soldiers talking when they returned to Hannover, the way they'd described his father. Carved in iron, they'd said, and it had been as much invective as praise. Yet they had respected him for it, he remembered. Even the townsfolk he'd burned out of their own homes and brought back to his capital even as a larger force assembled to drive back the rattlings. So I understand it, the decision, Klaus Papenheim silently penned. It's in our blood. But I am the townsfolk of my childhood, niece. I cannot thank you for having ordered the torches thrown at Hannover. The old prince knew his home would have fallen even if he'd ridden out to defend it. He'd read the maps, counted the days. Hannover had been doomed the moment this war began.

And yet Klaus Papenheim had not been there to fight for it, and this he could not forgive himself – or anybody else.

The old general found his tent nestled near the bottom of the hill, surrounded by sworn swords from Hannover. There the rest of their makeshift war council still held session, sifting through heap of troubles that the last bloody push to take the town of Juvelun from the dead had brought down on them. His second, Princess Mathilda Greensteel of Neustria, was sharing the table with Captain Nabila of Alava – a short, stout woman with a heavily painted face – as the Dominion's man and Prince Arsene of Bayeux held down his own corner as the voice for the Alamans and the fantassins.

The last two men stood for smaller forces, but in their own way crucial ones: freshly back from healing the White Knight sat with a pleasant smile as he methodically ate his way through an apple, commander of all Named with the army. For the Damned it was the Barrow Sword that had been elected to stand. Klaus counted the man a rogue and a vicious specimen of the breed, but he was also solid in a fight and a devil against Revenants – the Prince of Hannover was willing to forgive much in favour of that. The Dominion villain often clashed with Captain Nabila, but it seemed more like sparring than the venom Catherine Foundling had warned him might ensue.

The Gods only knew where General Rumena had gotten to, for it came and went as it pleased, but in its absence it had left behind a dark-skinned drow that spoke perfect Chantant and called itself Mighty Sagasbord. It was both habitually sardonic and eerily knowing, which usually made for good advice unpleasant to hear.

"- then we should split our forces and strike now, else the enemy will delay us further," Captain Nabila insisted.

"We're still uncertain how many escaped into the valley," Prince Arsene skeptically replied. "We could be headed into-"

"She's right," Klaus cut in, striding into the tent.

The splatter of blood on him got a few surprised looks as he lowered himself into a seat at the table, but nothing more. Everyone here had gotten their hands bloody taking Juvelun, and if they were to survive this trap it wouldn't be the last time.

"Dare we hope for an elaboration, Prince Klaus?" the Prince of Bayeux testily asked.

"We took the town but the dead retreated in good order," the Prince of Hannover replied. "It could be ten thousand made it out, it could be thirty thousand. Either way, every drifting warband in the central valley of Hainaut will be headed that way now. If we don't strike before the enemy musters up properly, we'll lose the battle ahead of us."

It'd taken three days and night of brutal fighting before Juvelun fell, the ditches and walls dug by the dead stormed at all too high a cost. Yet there'd been no final keep to assail, no last redoubt: instead the undead had retreated under cover of night, leaving behind a token force for the drow under General Rumena to annihilate. Though their scouts had insisted that a hundred thousand undead had been holed up in Juvelun, in practice the Prince of Hannover suspected they'd fought around seventy thousand at most. The rest had been kept back, and most likely were down in the valley preparing to prevent Klaus' army from linking up with the Black Queen's. Should the enemy succeed in that design, no one in this tent would still be drawing breath by the moon's turn. They'd make a fight of it, the Prince of Hannover knew, but it'd be a defeat engraved in stone.

"Strike hard, then keep moving," the Barrow Sword approvingly said. "A sound notion."

Dominion officers always thought like raiders, the old general deplored. It wasn't always a weakness, as there were similarities between the glorified raids that the Levantines called 'honour wars' and an offensive into enemy territory. But the distances and numbers involved meant a lot of their instincts pulled them the wrong way. It'd been too long since the Dominion of Levant had been in a real war, one that didn't end with a summer's fighting and a few promises traded between Blood.

They lost the learning, Klaus thought. The Army of Callow had gone through a bevy of rough campaigns and sharpened the skills with war schools while Procer had been given a refresher in the art by the Great War and the latest round of the Uncivil Wars, but the Dominion had nothing of the sort. All their learning was done on the field, with bloody costs for every mistake.

"We're not in fighting fit for a pitched battle," Princess Mathilda of Neustria bluntly said. "It's been a day since we took the town and the priests are still overwhelmed with wounded. We lost a dozen soldiers to infections this morning because the healers would have died if they kept drawing on Light."

"I forced the Stalwart Apostle to drink a concoction that'd make her sleep," the White Knight admitted. "She'd still be in the tents otherwise, and burned out permanently."

She was a good kid that one, Klaus thought. A little soft and with too much faith the Heavens would swoop down and fix everything, but prayer had never gone amiss when things got dark.

"Exactly," Prince Arsene said. "Are we to send forces into a battle without priests and mages, Your Grace, or consign wounded to death so that our hasty vanguard is not bare of protection?"

This is why your people lost the Great War, Prince Klaus Papenheim thought. Why none of you were able to win it, beyond the Tower's manipulations. None of you were willing to pay what it would have cost you.

"We will consign wounded to die," the Iron Prince flatly said. "If the Enemy still has swarms to spare, we would be facing a potential wipe without priests and mages to compensate."

"The Witch of the Woods-"

"- will do what she can, but cannot be relied on," Mathilda Greensteel interrupted the White Knight, nodding at Klaus. "If Revenants come after her, the protections she has to offer will not be enough."

"This is madness," Prince Arsene insisted. "We are to leave our own to die and risk it all on battle with a force we know little about?"

"Would you prefer to be besieged in this lovely ruin of a town?" the Barrow Sword drily asked.

"Yes," Prince Arsene emphatically replied. "We still have supplies for a few days – more, perhaps, considering our losses – and if we dig in the Black Queen can come relieve us as soon as she has secured the Cigelin Sisters."

"What impressive eagerness to die," Mighty Sagasbord noted, laying its chin on its palm. "Your confidence surprises, Prince of Man. We took this Juvelun from a numerically superior force, yet you now believe that should we be besieged by an enemy many times our greater we will prevail?"

"Our men are worth easily three of the dead," Prince Arsene harshly said, pride clearly stung. "Ours anyway, dark elf."

"No Firstborn will ever take your life, Prince of Man," Mighty Sagasbord smiled, without a single speck of friendliness to it.

The Alamans prince looked surprised and confused, but those more familiar with the ways of the Firstborn winced at the bald insult. The drow ate the skills and knowledge of those they slew, Klaus knew, so the Mighty had been implying that there was nothing worth taking from Arsene of Bayeux. Best to step in before this went further astray, the Prince of Hannover thought.

"We might be able to hold the down, if we can put up defences before the dead arrive," Klaus admitted. "For a few days. But they won't fight us, Prince Arsene. They will surround us and wait us out instead. The Hidden Horror is patient, he will starve us into the grave."

The army that'd come out of Malmedit like devils pouring out of a Hellgate was not far behind them. Three, four days at most. If Klaus' army stayed in Juvelun, it risked annihilation: the enemy in the valley would pen it in from the west, the great host of Malmedit from the east. If that happened, even using a pharos device to escape wouldn't be enough. The dead would strike in force the moment the gates opened, on both flanks, and the more of Klaus' soldiers made it into the Twilight Ways the higher the risk of those staying in Creation being overwhelmed by sheer numbers and horrors.

They'd ran the games, him and the Marshal of Callow. Any army trying to evacuate through the Twilight Ways while giving battle was facing at least half its number in losses, and more frequently up to two thirds. There came a tipping point early in the process that made it impossible to maintain cohesion in the ranks, and the moment panic set in a massacre was inevitable. No, Klaus Papenheim would not allow the enemy to slip that noose around his neck. Better the wounded perish today than a hundred times their number tomorrow.

"The Black Queen's column will relieve us," Prince Arsene pointed out. "With her numbers-"

"She does not have the supplies to feed us, Your Grace," the White Knight calmly said. "Her force is even larger than ours, and stretched the Grand Alliance's capacity to supply. Even if she empties all her stores, all she can accomplish is join us in our starvation after a few more days."

The Prince of Bayeux's face soured, but he argued no further. The man was overly cautious, but not a fool. He understood what a combined army of over a hundred thousand, surrounded and far behind enemy lines without any supply lines, meant in practice. The Prince of Hannover's insistence to take Juvelun had not been, contrary to what some wagging fantassin tongues insinuated, out of desire for a victory to gild his name. The other choices had all been worse: either turning back to the defensive line, and so tossing the Black Queen's army to the wolves, or allowing a massive army of two hundred thousand to march down on threadbare defensive lines.

By taking Juvelun and smashing the army holding it, Klaus had forced the Malmedit army to pursue him west into the valley. He'd bled his army achieving this, but it was better than the disaster that would be the destruction of Catherine Foundling's army or the end of Procer that the defensive lines breaking would represent.

"I have voiced my thoughts on what must be done," Captain Nabila said. "And I do not take back these words. Yet I add this: if there is no appetite for the fight, we must withdraw. Take to the Twilight Ways and leave. I will not swear the warriors of Alava to a desperate end in Juvelun."

Prince Klaus kept his face calm. That had been, however delicately put, a threat that if the army stayed in Juvelun the Levantines would take to the Twilight Ways and leave them all behind. His control over the coalition was slipping, the old general realized. Eyes turned to Prince Arsene of Bayeux, whose face had grown conflicted. The man, Klaus knew, did not enjoy being at odds with most of the table when it came to making war plans. But he saw it as his duty to speak not only for the soldiers of Bayeux and Brabant but also for the fantassins companies, which meant espousing their causes even when they were unpopular with other commanders.

"I'm not certain if an order to march towards another battle would be followed," the fair-haired prince admitted. "My men will follow me, but the Brabant conscripts have been unruly since Prince Etienne died and half the fantassins are mutinous. They were hard used with the breaches on the second day, and have not forgot it."

"Alava led the charge on the first, and the Lycaonese on the third," Captain Nabila harshly said. "What sets them apart from us, I wonder?"

The appearance of cowardice was like throwing red meat at a starving dog, for Levantines. They couldn't resist sinking their teeth in it, and they were especially quick to point those fingers when it came to Alamans.

"The hardest defences to assail were the second day's," the Iron Prince acknowledged. "And their losses were significant. I have not forgotten that."

The other prince looked relieved.

"It is not mutiny, Your Grace," Prince Arsene said. "Your command is not contested. They have simply reached their limits."

It was a mutiny, whether the other man wanted to admit it or not. It was simply not yet an open one, not that illusion would survive his giving an order. The rank and file did not understand why they were here fighting and dying, could not grasp the broader theatre of war. That was why trust between soldiers and generals was so important: they had to trust in the person commanding them to steer them right even if they could not understand what was being done and why. It now seemed like trust in Klaus Papenheim was running out. What was it that'd done him in, he wondered – the darkly comical march to and away from Malmedit, or the brutal fighting taking a heavily defended town seemingly in the middle of nowhere? Either way, the horse had grown lame from the hard riding.

"They must be made to understand what is at stake," the Iron Prince said. "Gather the officers for me, Prince Arsene. I will address them personally."

The other man looked unconvinced. Klaus did not have a reputation as much of an orator, it was true. The only vote he'd ever personally cast in the Chamber of Assembly instead of letting an assermenté do it for him had been the one that'd put his niece on the high throne. Still, Prince Arsene nodded in assent. Likely he figured that after the old general failed to sway the vacillating captains discussion of a compromise could begin in earnest.

"Let us part ways until then," Klaus said. "There is no need for further discussion."

The Prince of Bayeux took his leave, and after a lingering look Captain Nabila did the same. Mathilde slowed as she passed by his seat.

"Veitland?" the Princess of Neustria asked.

"Hauptberg," the Prince of Hannover replied.

She nodded, and strode away without another word. Nothing more needed to be said. Klaus found that the Barrow Sword was looking at them, eyes considering.

"Nabila is young to the Lord of Alava's service, did you know," the bearded Damned casually said. "Only a decade as one of his captains, most of them spent far from Yannu Marave himself. She rose to her position on merit, not closeness or years."

"She has proved a fine officer," Klaus replied, for it was true.

"There's a reason she held borders, back home, and did not stay at her lord's side," the Barrow Sword smiled. "In Levant, authority flows from either Blood or blood."

The Prince of Hannover met the other man's gaze, unblinking. It would take more than cryptic talk from a mouthy grave robber to impress him.

"I do wonder how you'd do there, Iron Prince," the Damned chuckled.

Someone, Klaus thought, ought to have beaten the smugness out of that man by now. He gave no reply to the villain, who seemed to take it as a victory and left the tent. Behind stayed only the White Knight, whose look of unruffled patience had not changed a whit.

"You have something to say?" Klaus asked.

"The Enemy breathes down our necks," the White Knight said. "I do not understand its great designs, for I am no general, but the jaws of the trap are closing on us. That much I can sense."

"We reach the turning point soon," Klaus quietly agreed. "One way or another. There is a battle taking shape in Hainaut that will decide the fate of the Principate."

"Not here in Juvelun," the White Knight mused. "It has not come together properly. And you might be surprised, Prince Klaus, by the roar of this army should it allow itself to be surrounded here. There is a... power behind such stands. Even more so when there is salvation on the way, awaiting the darkest hour to deliver dawn."

"There are not many things I would not trust the swords of the Lycaonese to prevail over, White Knight," the Iron Prince replied, "but steel cannot triumph over hunger. There can be no victory over an empty belly."

"So I've gathered," the dark-skinned Chosen amiably replied. "And so now we must prepare for the storms on the horizon and pray that the most terrible of our allies will come to our aid."

The old general stared at the other man, wondering at the tone used when speaking of the hero's equal and opposite under the Terms. He'd never put any stock in the rumours about the Black Queen and the White Knight, but like many he'd always been unsettled by the cordiality between the two of them. Often the warmth in the voices when they spoke of each other had startled him, but now he heard no hint of it in the White Knight's words. There had been a distancing there, he thought. Not enmity, but a cooling of relations. Merciful Gods, what was it that'd really happened in the Arsenal?

The rumours spread by the dozen, each wilder and more fanciful than the last, but truth was in short supply.

"We will have order," Klaus Papenheim simply said. "And we will march west, as we must."

"I expect we will," the White Knight tiredly said. "I will ready my Named for the march, Iron Prince."

The white-haired prince looked askance at the other man, almost surprise.

"That is all?" he said.

"I do not judge," Hanno of Arwad said, rising to his feet. "This has not changed, and never will."

The Chosen left the tent after offering a small bow, not speaking another word, and Klaus dragged himself upright once more. His day was far from over. The old prince attended to the army of Hannover, speaking to his captains and preparing them for what was to come, and awaited the word of the Prince of Bayeux. Yet it was not another Proceran who came for him first but something altogether more eldritch. General Rumena, the only drow in all of the army come south to bear such the title, was stooped and old in a way that Firstborn never were. It was ancient, Klaus knew, in a way that it was hard to truly understand.

The fucker was also a bastard soldier of the old breed, so Klaus Papenheim had never found him difficult to deal with. He'd yet to manage to talk the other general into no longer invading his tent whenever it felt like it, but aside from that their relationship had been rather amiable from the start.

"You have something for me?" the Prince of Hannover asked.

Complaining about the habitual intrusion would be wasted time in a day that already had too few hours.

"We went down to have a look in the valley," General Rumena agreed. "The dead gather, Hannover Prince. The valley had been stripped bare of warbands – Losara Queen's work, I wager – but the dead salvaged a host from the fall of Juvelun. Perhaps thirty thousand, though they are not yet properly mustered for battle."

Klaus grimaced at the news. He'd hoped for closer to twenty thousand, fool's hope as it had been. That much could have been handled without leaning too heavily on the Alamans to supply soldiers for the force that would sally out.

"How long do we have?"

The wrinkled and grey-skinned creature considered that a moment.

"The dusk of tomorrow," the drow finally said. "They will be ready for war then, and waiting for you. The disarray from the fall of Juvelun will last no longer than that."

Klaus stiffly nodded.

"My thanks," he said. "Will your sigils be in fighting fit tonight?"

"We always are," General Rumena smiled unpleasantly. "Chno Sve Noc."

"So your lot keep telling me," the Iron Prince grunted back. "Get ready for a strike after dark. We can't afford to linger here much longer."

"Do your people not have a saying about the weakest link?" General Rumena mused.

"A curse," Klaus corrected. "May you be the weakest link in the Chain of Hunger."

"Yes," the old drow nodded. "That is not us, Hannoven Prince. See to your own sigils, before speaking of dragging feet."

And just as boldly as it'd slipping into his tent, the Firstborn strolled out after seizing the last word. Klaus could have fought it, but what would be the point? Better to let it keep its prize and remain pacified. His pride was not so overgrown as to be unable to tolerate the occasional pointed quip from a peer. It still took half a bell after that for the Prince of Bayeux to send a messenger to him, giving word that the other royal had at last gathered the captains in need of swaying. The reason for the delay became clear when the Prince of Hannoven headed to the pavilion mention by the messenger.

That it was a pavilion and not a simple tent where the talks were to be had said much about the numbers involved.

Twenty handpicked Hannoven armsmen followed him inside, his bodyguard, but there must have been almost a hundred men and women already packed tight within. Fantassins captains, mostly, but many peasant officers from the Brabant conscripts as well. Prince Arsene himself stood to the side with a handful of bodyguards, as if to make it clear he was not one of the wavering souls. From the start Klaus found that the mood within was mutinous. He spoke clearly and concisely, avoiding frills and japes out of respect for the grim deeds he was asking for, but twice he was interrupted by a challenge from a captain and more often than that by jeers.

"To stay in Juvelun is death," the Prince of Hannoven told them. "We will be surrounded and destroyed."

"And where would we go instead, bloody Keter?" a woman called out.

"Retreat," another voice called out. "We must retreat."

"We must go west," Klaus roared, his voice rising above the din. "General Rumena has reported to me that the remnants from the defenders of Juvelun are gathering in the valley, and we must strike west to disperse them before they can mount a true threat."

The shouts of dismay were deafening, interwoven with jeers and calls for retreat or holing up in the town. There would be no convincing them, the Prince of Hannoven thought. It was Prince Arsene who called the crowd to order, in the end.

"Hauptberg," the Iron Prince spoke into the silence, "is the name of a town two days away from the Morgentor by horse."

His bodyguards had closed ranks around him when the crowd had grown wild and stayed in formation since.

"My people," Klaus Papenheim said, "know it as where the first of the Iron Kings, Alrich Fenne, was crowned ruler of all Lycaonese before smashing the ratling hordes in Twilight's Pass."

There had been seven kingdoms back then, though in time they became the four modern principalities of the north. But the first of the Iron Kings had not used to sweet words to convince the other royals to kneel to him, on that day. The truth was altogether bloodier. On the last day of the talks held at Hauptberg, none of the kings had been willing to swear to another and stand as a single force against the implacable foe coming their way.

And so Alrich Fenne had, in the dark of night, killed them all.

"Sometimes," the old general said, "someone has to order the torches thrown."

He curtly brought his hand down and the head of his bodyguards screamed out the order. Like a tide of steel, soldiers of Hannover and Neustria began pouring into the pavilion.

"Arrest those who kneel," the Iron Prince ordered. "Kill the rest."

ErraticErrata

For a general announcement I expect several of you saw coming: given the size to which Book VI has already swelled, it would end up absurdly large if I finished the series with it as originally planned. Consequently there will be a Book VII to wrap things up before I move on to my next project. The cutoff point where I split the plot actually ended up meaning we're close to the end of Book VI, which should end before Christmas if nothing goes off the rails again. There'll be a more elaborate announcement down the line, this is essentially just a heads up.

E.E.

Par

WOO!

also no one is surprised 😊

NerfContessa

Booooh, how can you force us to read another excellent book for free, you MONSTER!

Also, dang Klaus is true Iron, sharpened.

Ninestrings

Thank you!

Adrian_V

Yep that is like Robert Jordan saying "Just 1 more book" xD

LarsBlitzer

Better than the Mountain That Doesn't Write saying "One more book... eventually."

Javvies

Let's not forget that he also says that there are "only" two more books before he's done.

But the state of the various storylines suggests that there's too much yet to get through to fit into two books. Unless it ends in a hack job like the show. Or they're fucking huge.

Ed

Have you seen the size of the books and the fact they keep growing I suspect those two are more like six normal ones

stevenneiman

Is GRRM becoming the next Andrew Hussie?

boballab

David Weber told Jim Baen that the Honor Harrington series would be around 6 books, 30+ books later...

Adrian_V

Yeah and the "finished" is in between big "" xD

Mental Mouse

It didn't help when he opened up the universe to other authors...

Harrent

To be honest, seven books fits a lot more with the intended five books than six; special numbers and all.

Bcurly

And so ErraticErrata wrote seven books and one

Mental Mouse

The “and one” would be the Cardinal epilogue.

NerfContessa

You mean PROlogue, right?

^^

Mental Mouse

Well, epilogue to this story, prologue to the next.

dadycoool

It's been a nice year of Book VI. I've very much enjoyed having this as a constant through...everything.

caoimhinh

Anything you could tell us about your next project?

Like, what's the name, the synopsis, or something?

Maybe (fingers crossed) a preview of the prologue for the sake of hype?

OldSoldier

I understand that all things must come to an end, but I truly love your work. I've read the entire series countless times. It's the only literary work I've been able to re read and actually enjoy. Whatever you do, I'm sure it will be phenomenal. And I want to thank you for it, because your work has inspired me to read more.

GoodGirlJW

Oh no please don't end the series I only just found it a couple weeks ago and I've been binge-reading it every day since. D: Shoot for a maybe-ending on Book 97??

Javvies

Things are not going well for this army.

Though, as Hanno noted, they have the potential for Story/Narrative based buffs. Plus Cat is marching to relieve them “in the nick of time” and that's got a solid Story behind it too.

Klaus is hardcore.

Taking the rebellious captains probably isn't going to be a long term solution. On the other hand, Klaus knows that surviving the short term is necessary to deal with the long term.

Plus, I could be wrong about how effective the measures he's taking here will be.

IDKWhoitis

He can spend the next 8 hours and get stuck in a shitty compromise that still screws him.

Or

He takes the next 10 minutes, decapitates the mercs, and starts marching in a direction. Either the rest of the mercs and conscripts follow or they die. A decapitated mutiny doesn't mutiny in the short term, and the long term doesn't matter if they can't move now.

saiorthepyro

It's implied that part of the reason they are doing this is because they need the manpower in order to pull this off, so that could just as easily backfire.

Salt

It's effective if it does come to a pitched battle, but it also leaves a MASSIVE opening for a backfire, especially if the Dead King manages to get a read on the current state of the army.

Klaus has already lost enough trust from the fantassins for an outright mutiny, and we know for a fact that (aside from the Drow who only give a shit about the will of the Sisters), he's seeing loss of trust and doubts from the others about the necessity of his hard measures – leaving the wounded behind, abandoning the town instead of trying to hold it, etc....

His hard measures are fine and dandy if they're really about to get into a last stand-esque pitched battle like they expect, but if the Dead King simply sandbags his fights for many smaller, less decisive battles via a war of attrition? That basically guarantees a mutiny within the army. It reaffirms every notion that they could've held the town, that leaving the wounded behind wasn't necessary, that there was no need to kill many beloved fantassin leaders. It appears to justify every doubt about whether his necessary hard measures were really necessary.

Hanno isn't the only one who understands that there is a narrative power behind last stands, either. The Dead King knows it even better than Hanno, having personally survived more crusades aimed at him than any entity that ever lived in all of Creation. Catherine's instincts from the last few chapters were most likely spot on, about him planning to waging a war of attrition to slowly exterminate them rather than engaging in pitched battles that let them make full use of their Heroic narratives.

Realistically, this means Klaus might be kind of boned (no pun intended) no matter what. Nessie just has to play it patiently, without leaving any gaps for mistakes – two central qualities that quite define his entire character – for Klaus' army to turn on him on their own. Even if Catherine successfully ambushes the ambushing force to relieve them, then every hard necessary sacrifice that he made in retrospect looks like pointless sacrifices, in the eyes of enough people to make the difference.

Liliet

...You really do sound right, and that really is kind of horrifying.

Oshi

The nice thing is that Catherine is aware of this. Which means whatever plan she has to wiggle out of this will involve pushing the Dead King into a trap of her choosing. This battle will likely be where the setup for the next book comes. Keter will occupy the end.

Liliet

Anyway I also realized that Klaus is coming into a Name and will probably have an Aspect for dealing with this shit.

Shveiran

You sound rather confident. I'll admit it is certainly a possibility, but is there something in particular you noticed that makes you certain?

Liliet

The repeated moniker of Iron Prince, which fits him to a T, has been used by both of the Named this chapter to refer to him. It is also used in narration about him at the end at the climactic bit, in much the same manner as Cordelia once upon a time "signed the fucking order". Which was later confirmed to be Warden of the West foreshadowing in this exact manner: when it fits perfectly in the narrative to use that address for the person when they're doing the very Them thing, that's the kind of thing that Name is.

He also has the requisite story weight. Unlike Abigail before the armies split, he's not just one of multiple commanders: he's THE commander, the one everyone knows bears the onus of responsibility for everything that happens. And he's not just a someone, he's famous, he's THE Iron Prince to Procer entire after winning the civil war for Cordelia.

And the Role fits with the Name. Hard people making hard decisions is the whole Lycaonese narrative, and Iron Prince is the Name about that, it's what the "iron" part refers to. He's doing exactly what people telling stories generations down the line will talk about him doing, for the exact, very iconic reasons.

He's in a story, and the way he's being addressed is hinting that the Named around him see it too.

Also, the Blood/blood thing Barrow Sword was talking about might be referring to that, though I'll listen if you have an alternative interpretation.

Zim the Vixen

I believe the Barrow Sword was warning (or seeding distrust in) Papenheim about Captain Nabila's mutinous intentions. The quote is:

"There's a reason she held borders, back home, and did not stay at her lord's side," the Barrow Sword smiled. "In Levant, authority flows from either Blood or blood."

Careful Yannu keeps her away holding the borders, because he knows authority is obtained through blood, and so she would murder him to gain his authority. That's why Barrow Sword later taunts him about wanting to see how "he'd do there". At least that is my read, but I can totally see where yours comes from; Papenheim gaining authority by having blood in his hands.

Liliet

Er, Levantines don't do "succession through murder". Blood is Blood, they're descendants of heroes.

Barrow Sword was either referring to her not being allowed the honor of being at Careful Yannu's side when she wasn't either Blood or blooded, or the fact she needed to get blooded since she wasn't Blood. Which are actually the same fact with different emphasis.

Liliet

(That said, this IS a theory. I'm fairly confident in it but I won't be pretending it's confirmed or anything. We've had heavy hints and it's coming together perfectly; there's still room for a twist or for me and others saying this to be straight up wrong)

Mental Mouse

Part of the problem is that anybody Klaus leaves behind will be coming back as an enemy – with their arms and armor, to boot.

Cicero

The Pen Is Mightier Than The Sword.

But...

The Sword speaks louder at any given instant.

Klaus is a man who lives in the here and now. His army might end up killing him for this, but not until after they fight the battle he demands.

Frivolous

EE – a possible discrepancy. Does Stalwart Healer = Stalwart Apostle? If so, you need to change Healer to Apostle, or retcon Stalwart Apostle's Name to Healer.

I think Veitland must have been a code among Lycaonese that means relative mercy when dealing with mutiny. Hauptberg, of course, means total ruthlessness.

I'm surprised to learn that the reason Klaus never remarried is because he realized he was a bad father. That's surprisingly enlightened on his part. I didn't think he'd be so good at self-awareness.

I'm touched that he really really loves his niece Cordelia and has since her infancy.

TeK

No, it's that girl that isn't Scorched Apostate, she was an Apostle from the beginning.

hakureireimu

The Stalwart Apostle is also supposed to be up North, unless she had a change in itinerary:

Mental Mouse

> I didn't think he'd be so good at self-awareness.

Both of his kids died of the stuff he taught them, that's a hell of a mirror.

nimelennar

Damn. Very nice bookend here; the start of the chapter neatly foreshadowed the end and explained why it was necessary.

MrRigger

The Iron Prince lives up to his name as a hard son of a bitch.

Raved Thrad

He puts the iron in "Iron Prince." It's fascinating how people seem to have forgotten how he gained his name.

Juff

Typo Thread:

martial training have > martial training, have him in a > him in as a heap of troubles > the heap of troubles days and night > days and nights hold the down > hold the town
They'd ran > They'd run today that > today than accomplish is join > accomplish is joining not that illusion > not that the illusion of that mean > of that man it'd slipping > it'd slipped

IDKWhoitis

Fucking bad ass.

All there is to say.

Jircniv

Iron Prince indeed

Adrian_V

Mmmm there is still a problem, while they are the "leaders" of the mutiners killing them just basically leaves a group of confused angry soldiers ready to do something even more stupid, worse the fantassins do have a chain of command so they could still organize to rebel.

Apart from that i found interesting that Klaus at the begining basically said that while no way of life is perfect time can teach a person a lot, he could probably have mor eluck with 3rd son or daughter but by then he was either to old or tired. Although he aparently was really close to Cordelia so maybe it all worked out.

Also i still won't give out my Hanno x Cat ship!!! 1 or 2 fights just adds more drama to it!

Cicero

It's a temporary measure.

It won't stop a mutiny, it just delays it.

No one is going to volunteer for an immediate mutiny, since they just saw what that gets them. Instead they will begin to plot mutiny in secret.

So if Klaus gets his big battle in the next three days he'll probably get what he needs. And if they get rescued in the next week he'll probably survive, but the fantassins will basically be done for this campaign. Have to send them back to the rear guard for a year or two.

caoimhinh

Though they could just be reassigned to another column and serve under a different commander. They did try to mutiny, and that's punishable by death.

The armies are supposed to unify for the coming assault to Hainaut, so they are likely just going to keep participating in the war, just not under Klaus.

Insanenoodlyguy

It will if by the end of it, they believe he did it to save their lives. It goes into the whole narrative that might become his Name. A man "Forged from Iron." They won't thank him for it, but they won't rebel either.

burlindw

Hanno x Cat would be a weird relationship. The core of Hanno's belief is that humans aren't fit to judge each other; Cat's name is shaping up to be the judge of basically everything.

Unless Cat takes the place of the Choir of Judgement, then I don't think Hanno can be that close to Cat, and if she did, Hanno would end up as Cat's subordinate.

dadycoool

Whoa, now that was an ending! I like this grizzled old general. He's hard, yes, but that hardness comes from being tempered by necessity. Also, Mighty Sagasbord? You really have a way with words, the way Archer has a way with arrows. Drow are a delight.

Burnsy

Rumena always gets the last word in.

He'll probably live until the end of the world, just so he can get one last snarky remark in at the Gods.

Raved Thrad

"You Pale Gods suck. Chno Sve Noc! Now I can die, venting spleen at the sky!"

Miles

"My people, know it as where the first of the Iron Kings, Alrich Fenne, was crowned ruler of all Lycaonese before smashing the rattling hordes in Twilight's Pass. Sometimes, someone has to order the torches thrown. Arrests those who kneel, kill the rest."

From the perspective of the mercenary leaders this is a really strange non-sequitor. Terrible orator confirmed.

Liliet

Yup.

Cicero

Terrible orator indeed. Good thing he's depending on stabbing people with swords instead of words.

Raved Thrad

"Terrible Orator" would make a hilarious Name, though. Possibly with aspects such as Demoralize, Confuse, and Incite. 🤪 Except they'd only ever worok on allies.

vernal.ancient

I suspect Confuse would be indiscriminate in who it works on, but the other two? Definitely only allies

Shveiran

What good are orations to the dead?

General Chaos

Stalwart Healer -> Stalwart Apostle's fixed, but wasn't she supposed to be in Twilight's Pass apprenticed to the Astrologer?

Big I

After rereading parts of this chapter, it seems to me that the Barrow Sword and the White Knight know or guessed what was going to happen. Rumena as well maybe. Interesting.

Klaus reminded me of the Legions of Terror in this chapter: one sin, one grace. Couldn't help but think he'd make a good Warlord. I think if he got a Name he'd be a grizzled anti-hero, no wonder he and the Saint of Swords got on so well.

caoimhinh

Yeah, 50-50 chances of Klaus getting a Name out of this campaign.

I mean, Hanno is already saying that he feels the weight of Story in their current situation. Narratively, that weight gathers at the commander of the host, which is Klaus.

Liliet

Considering the amount of context of mentions of Iron Prince, I think the chances are a fair bit better than 50-50.

Beside the obvious climactic bit at the end which mirrored Cordelia's "signed the fucking order" Warden of the West early bird, both Named called him that.

Raved Thrad

The question is, with this set of murders to his name (or is that "Name,"), would "Iron Prince" be a heroic or villainous Name? I personally would like to see the latter, if only because of the chaos it would cause.

Also, Klaus possibly healing his arm and not dying of old age would be awesome. I can see him and Rumena on the last day of the world, trading barbs and old war stories.

Raved Thrad

Klaus somehow manifesting an iron arm as part of his being the Iron Prince would be cool as hell, too. 3:)

Javvies

It's still a Heroic Name. Probably.

After all ... you don't need to be a good person to be a Hero.

Look at the records of Lone Swordsman, Saint of Swords, and Grey Pilgrim.

Probably also some of the Named Callowan Kings/Queens of old.

Heroes who are more than willing to drop whatever bodies they think they need to (or in some cases, want to). Heroes who will readily make examples out of their foes or just those who hey in their way. Heroes who don't have a problem committing what we'd probably call atrocities and/or war crimes.

After all, the Narrative here is that he's more than willing to preemptively decapitate an attempted mutiny/mass desertion in the face of armies of the Dead King, during what is effectively Crusade. That's a grim and gritty hardcore Hero, not a Villain.

Liliet

Eh, he can be a super badass old guy without one arm, too.

And I won't lie, I'd adore either, for various reasons ♥

Liliet

Oh man.

I wonder if Hanno will eventually warm back up to Catherine, and I wonder if he will manage to win back the respect he lost from her.

I feel bad as fuck about Klaus's kids, and I hope he does manage to eventually write that letter to Cordelia. Did he notice she ordered torches thrown at Rhenia too?

I love that Klaus gets along well with Rumena. I want to see so many scenes with him and Cat, too.

As for the Book VII announcement: we are all shocked by this! Shocked, I say!

Hmm, so the three arcs this leaves in this book are: the Arsenal Bard fight, the Arsenal diplomacy and the beginning of the campaign. Not quite as clean a division as Book 4 ended up having, but still three is right I think.

(Tancred's sequence is just a Cold Open, not a full arc)

hakureireimu

Geesh are you trying to get him killed.

Liliet

Eh. He's got plot armor now.

Morgenstern

That's what I thought at first, when he thought about Cordie and those letters in his head – death flag for Klaus, weepy drama for the readers that this/those letter(s) will never get sent. =/

medailyfun

>Did he notice she ordered torches thrown at Rhenia too?

"Sometimes, niece, you remind me of your grandfather, Klaus would write if he took the quill today. When I was a boy of nine, Prince Ludwig Papenheim ordered the town of Ebelburg burned when he heard ratling warbands were two hours away."

Liliet

Yes, and he compared what she did to Hannover to that.

He didn't mention Rhenia at any point.

Insanenoodlyguy

It would be best resolved with kissing. Lots and lots of kissing.

Liliet

I'm guessing you mean Hanno and Cat?

I'm more partial to hugging, myself, but I can see what you're driving at!

TeK

Klaus had more death flags this chapter than Dead King.

Salt

Every senior Hero would be appalled if they knew Klaus was dwelling on not making amends with a loved one, just before a climactic battle. There has to be a Heroic Axiom about not doing that.

Are you intentionally trying to die tragically or something, Klaus?

caoimhinh

Nah, he is fine so far. But the Death Flags are like, hovering nearby.

He'll be fine so long as he doesn't write that letter and gives it to someone so "it can be delivered in the event of my death", and if he doesn't say "after this war is over, I am going to -something-".

vernal.ancient

I mean, he's Lycaonese, the most likely thing he'd do after the war with the Dead King is go fight some ratlings. I feel like "after this war I'm gonna go fight another" wouldn't trigger the trap. The letter certainly would though

ninegardens

I kinda love the way Hanno just instantly knows what Klaus is planning (or rather, guesses it based on two words using his history powers)... and just sits back and says "I do not judge".

... Also, a very dangerous moment for Paperheim, being in that tent with a Hero. Many others might have judged.

Liliet

Yeah, and there's a reason those others weren't in that tent.

Salt

Interestingly enough, it's many of the most powerful/influential Heroes that would be most likely to accept it under dire circumstances. Hanno does not judge, Saint would've beheaded every leader herself just to set an example, and the Pilgrim would butcher every fantassin in the army without batting an eyelash, if he was convinced it would relieve the world of suffering.

Liliet

Yup.

It's a nasty thing, but the alternative is nastier. You have to be Antoine level of green to not accept that.

mamm0nn

White Knight: I do not judge. Never have and never will.

Iron Prince: Then what do you call the change of your opinion towards the Black Queen?

White Knight: Now listen here you little shit...

Liliet

White Knight: "A cooling of relations. I never said anything about judging her did I?"

Shveiran

... which is based in an emended judgment of her character.

It's not like opinions change because the wind now blows from the west, you know? They don't just happen, they follow a mental evaluation of the subject, however instinctual.

Liliet

Hanno: "I don't judge"

Catherine: "You make judgement calls all the time?"

Hanno: "LOOK IF IT DOESNT HAVE A COURT SEAL ON IT IT DOESNT COUNT OK"

Liliet

Also: "I never said it was my OPINION of her that changed. Just our relationship 😊"

Crowley

Typo thread below. Feel free to add.

Where the First Prince of Procer had sent him to fight and die and Hainaut-> Where the First Prince of Procer, who had sent him to fight and die in/for Hainaut through heap of troubles-> through the heap/heaps of troubles today that a hundred times-> today than a hundred times bear such the title->bear such a title

Frivolous

I'm guessing there are no significant Callowan forces, and especially no significant magical Callowan forces, in the army led by Prince Klaus. If there were, they might have asked to use the mutinous fantassins in rituals of human sacrifice. That way their murders would have been constructive and useful.

On the other hand, Klaus was playing it close to his chest and wouldn't have told them. He's not learned enough in magical ways to see the opportunity. And I guess the Rapacious Troubadour is not there, either, to eat their souls.

So the best that can be done with the mutinous fantassins is to let the drow at their corpses, to harvest their Night. Which is bog standard.

On the gripping hand, if Catherine were there, I think there would have been no mutiny at all. Soldiers' belief in her as a general who never loses is too strong, stronger even than their belief in Klaus, the Iron Prince, and also most everyone is terrified of her. No ordinary person wants to piss her off.

That's the reason why I continue to believe her upcoming Name will be martial, and not limited to command over other Named.

Note that Hanno, for all that he's Catherine's opposite and equal in the Truce and Terms, couldn't have rallied everyone the way Cat does. He only commands small groups of heroes, not large armies. Cat is like an unholy combo of Klaus and Tariq and Cordelia – peerless general and dark savior and great queen.

Hey, that makes me think of Neshamah, also called Trismegistus – Thrice-Great. Could Cat's new Name be something like that, alluding to a great Three of some sort? Maybe reminiscent of the Triple Goddess, or the Norns or Fates.

Earl of Purple

Praesi war mages aren't trained in rituals. Some might be able to cast them- highborn and those trained by Masego when he was Apprentice. Most don't have that skill, and instead provide healing and massed fireball assault. They would not be able to use the deaths.

Cat has mentioned the Rapacious Troubadour, he's with her. He ate the soul of a captured Bind to interrogate it, and the Ashuran Apprentice said it was disagreeable.

Liliet

Cat's army doesn't do human sacrifices. As Earl of Purple points out, they don't have the learning, and those few who do – Hierophant disdains the method as amateurish and Akua knows better than to so much as peep in that direction right now.

So no, Callowans wouldn't. Not even if Black's Legions of Terror were with them they still wouldn't, for the same reason – War College mages aren't taught that, Black was heavily marginalizing the practice.

agumentic

Not to mention that using Trimegistan rituals powered by death in a war against the Dead King – who literally wrote this whole magical system – is asking for them to be subverted.

medailyfun

>Could Cat's new Name be something like that, alluding to a great Three of some sort?
She's next level: Quattuormegistus.

agumentic

"It is a bitter truth that in trying to escape the flaws of our parents we inevitably inherit the worst of them." – King Pater of Callow, the Unheeding

Heroic death in an ensuing battle might be one of the best ways out left for Klaus, really – no one speaks ill of those that died doing their duty, and it would make his hard measures look justified. Otherwise, he might have to literally fall on his sword to prevent riots both in his army and back at home. Ordering something like that would really fuck even Catherine up, I won't even mention Cordelia.

Burlyraven

Honestly, even if the White Knight were to judge, he'd be in the wrong to judge against Klaus. Anyone not willing to fight beside their comrades in this desperate of a situation needs to die before them so as not to die beside them. This isn't the type of war where multiple companies of soldiers can just leave.

I feel somewhat bad for the conscripts, as they had the least voice in the matter, but as peasants, they should know better than any how putting one's head down and doing one's job is the best way to survive this kind of situation.

Of course, we're all living through the evidence of just how selfish and stupid fear can make people.

Liliet

Also, a stark illustration of how Abigail is a goddamn paladin.

SpeckofStardust

na she just know that if she runs she'll be shot first, being in the center of a host is far safer if she cant run, and leading from the front to keep everyone from dying keeps her from dying too....
She is the shinning example of practical nobody, rather then Cats practical evil or Klaus's practical good.

Liliet

> na she just know that if she runs she'll be shot first > and leading from the front to keep everyone from dying keeps her from dying too

And what the fuck were these fantassin leaders counting on, how do you think?

The difference between them and Abigail is that Abigail always keeps her head.

Shveiran

Absolutely agreed.

... That said, that's your definition of paladins? 0.0

Liliet

"Immune to fear effects" is the refrance

SpeckofStardust

Did I offend you? I was comparing her to Cat and Klaus not to the fantassins, unless of course you somehow think practical nobodies include those fools who want to munity in the middle of enemy territory?

Liliet

Huh? I was comparing Abigail to the fantassin leaders. I didn't mean to sound aggressive, sorry if it happened anyway. My point is that you cannot say she "just" thought clearly under the pressure when we have a chapter detailing exactly what "commander coward" NORMALLY ends with.

Liliet

That said, "practical nobody" is a good saying, sorry for not noting that separately 😊

Mental Mouse

Abigail thinks she's cowardly. But where she's going "if I run they're gonna hang me!", a coward would just be running. (And never mind the pension!) The saying is, bravery isn't not being afraid, its about being afraid and going ahead anyway. Abigail is afraid, but she goes ahead anyway.

Wen Yang

Abigail of Summerholm is literally EE's own Ciaphas Cain, honestly.

Inb4 after thie campaign she becomes known as the HERO OF THE CALLOWANS or something similar 😊

Liliet

This lmao

Daniel E

I wonder if we'll ever get to see Rumena go 'full powerup' mode. Like, I'm having doubts that even Trismegistus in the flesh (or equivalent) could take him, given that he fought Saint to a draw without using a weapon.

Mental Mouse

Nah. Saint was powerful, but she was no goddess. Rumena is powered by a pair of goddesses, but DK is at least their peer (and IIRC older), and he's certainly made preparations to fight other deities. A direct fight between Sve Noc and DK would add badly for the Sisters and the Drow.

hakureireimu

Why wouldn't they eat the offal?

Frivolous

I've been trying to think of a logical reason not to eat the offal, and I come up with nothing.

Therefore the only reason that makes sense is sentiment or culture. Maybe the Lycaonese just don't think of offal as edible. This would be fairly odd since the Lycaonese environment is so bleak and hostile and their society so survival-oriented; you'd think they'd try to maximize their scope of edibles.

Mental Mouse

They have a lot of horses with them. Given that this is likely happening regularly to ordinary cavalry, they probably aren't short on horsemeat. Also, offal takes more effort and preparation to prepare properly, (if you just throw it in the stew, people will start waylaying the cooks down by the latrines) which is not so good for in the field.

Captain Amazing

Offal literally means the inedible parts of an animal. Mind, goblins would define that differently, but I don't think he brought any Callowans along.

Mental Mouse

In practice it includes some parts that are "dubiously edible", like intestines (tripe, sausage casings), and various organs with odd textures (heart, lungs, pancreas, etc.)

In areas where meat is scarce and people do their own butchering, people do tend to use whatever they can, but where meat is plentiful, that tends to fall by the wayside, and offal gets fed to animals or used for fertilizer.

308924810a

Either this gambit will work or it'll result in units deserting to try to make their way back to civilization through the Twilight Ways or by cutting their way cross-country as a company. Like, if this was a normal war I'd say this is hella risky, and assumes a lot about it not fracturing his army and the merc captains not fighting/trying to kill him with the advantage of numbers when arrested, on the other hand it should be clear that if the army actually fractures everyone is dead, they don't have good chances of escape from their current position, and this is a holy war, so trying to bring pressure against their commander is both foolish and impious, and this could just be viewed as the iron prince calling the mercenaries' bluff when they tried to act like they had the options to be able to have a negotiating position with him.

Mental Mouse

>units deserting to try to make their way back to civilization through the Twilight Ways

And who's going to open gates for them?

Interlude: Ietsism

"There is a natural order to the world and the peoples of the world must reflect it through law. Should all serve as ordained by the Heavens, all of Creation will be as a garden without sin."

– Extract from 'Ten Scales', by Madrubal the Wise

They were not alone out here.

Leaning against the tall rock, the White Knight reached for the coin that was never far from his hand and palmed it, deftly sliding it between his thumb and forefinger. With a satisfying twang it went spinning upwards and for a heartbeat his heart soared before he mastered it. His fear was proved true a heartbeat later, as the coin ceased spinning at the apex and simply hung there as if frozen in amber. After a few heartbeats, it simply dropped down and back onto his palm. At no point did either the laurels or the swords take primacy, as the Hierarch of the Free Cities would brook not even the shadow of a verdict to be passed while he watched. Flicking his wrist with a defeated sigh, Hanno of Arwad disappeared the coin once more.

"Stern Singers again silent, huh," Rafaella said, peering down at him from atop the stone.

"Anaxares the Diplomat is proving to be remarkably obstructive man," Hanno replied with forced calm.

And on occasion he had proved more than simply that. That over the last three months the coin had begun to occasionally be seized instead of simply inert had been worrying enough, for not even the Grey Pilgrim knew whether it meant that the Hierarch was fading with a last hurrah or gaining ground against the Seraphim. Rather more troubling had been the word that'd come to Hanno that for the first year after the Peace of Salia, the heads of Bellerophans who had broken the city's laws had taken to spontaneously exploding. Not for every infraction, but frequently enough that rumours had spread out of even the famously closed republic. The madman had succeeded at arrogating the powers of the Choir of Judgement, if only for a brief time.

"Bellerophon like bag of wet cats," the Valiant Champion sympathetically said. "Never good idea to put hand in."

"So I've been told," the White Knight mildly said.

Catherine had graciously refrained from reminding him that she'd attempt to warn him off the course of action that had seen the Choir of Judgement sealed whenever they disagreed, but Tariq had not been shy in voicing his own opinions. Evil knows Evil in ways that we cannot, the Grey Pilgrim had chided him. To refuse expertise leant in good faith is not wisdom, it is vanity. Hanno had accepted the reproach for it was: not the lesson of a would-be mentor, which he would have cared little for, but the frank assessment of a peer. Few ever cared to offer those to him, which made such talks all the more precious.

"It seems our friends are not biting today," Hanno added, changing the subject. "Any sign of the Hawk?"

"Just Wolfhound," Rafaella sighed. "And he still boring loaf."

Hanno cocked an eyebrow.

"Loafer?" he suggested. "Or perhaps oaf?"

"This too," the Valiant Champion agreed.

Rafaella turned to look downslope, among the rocky expanse leading into the valley where central Hainaut awaited, and waved her greataxe eye-catchingly.

"Hear this, Wolfhound?" she yelled. "Fight me!"

The White Knight, though mildly amused, was now forced to admit that their little incursion looked like a wash. He'd thought it possible to bait the trickiest of the Scourges now that the camp was about to look vulnerable, but the Hawk had refused to bite. Even putting out the Young Slayer as well as the Valiant Champion had not moved to Revenant to try an attack. Hanno pressed against the stone to his side with his boot, and with a heave gave himself just enough momentum he was able to leap out of the dip where he'd been waiting and join Rafaella atop the stone. Further downslope, the sculpted iron helm of the Wolfhound could be glimpsed among the rocks as the Revenant studied them unmoving.

He seemed unmoved at the notion of being alone around three Named with significant bite to them, not that Hanno was surprised. Of all the Scourges, that one had proved the hardest to put down save perhaps the Prince of Bones. Not that 'Scourges' were a formal band of any kind, mind you. They were, in essence, a loose designation for the Revenants that the heroes fighting on the lakeside fronts found to be the greatest threats. Each among the greatest of their kinds, they were considered to require either a full band of five or one of the greatest champions of the Grand Alliance to handle. Who actually counted among their number was the subject of lively campfire debate, though there were at least ten that all agreed on.

Nine now, Hanno mentally corrected, if word about the Stitcher being destroyed by the Firstborn was to be believed.

"Slayer," the White Knight called out, "return. We're done here."

There was no sign of movement until the young hero seemingly popped out between stones, stalking towards the two heroes without a sound to his steps. The Young Slayer was tall for a Levantine and unusually slender as well, but the lithe build lent a grace to his movements that was almost fluid. Armed with a slayer's arsenal, all hooked swords and darts and ropes, the dark-haired youth was among the more promising of the upcoming heroes. One of his aspects allowed him to most forms of armour as he cut, which had proved deadly against Revenants preferring close range. He was also something of a political headache, as it happened, which was why he'd been assigned to Hanno's care.

The Young Slayer came from a family rival to the Osenas, the descendants in Blood of the Silent Slayer, but had come into a Name that was widely considered to be the transitional one leading into the highly regarded Name of Silent Slayer. For the Osenas this was something of an embarrassment, and though Lady Aquiline Osenia had not proved outright hostile to the young hero she'd also made it clear there was no place with him in the ranks of the warriors of Tartessos. Hanno had promptly passed him into Rafaella's care as much for the shared heritage as the fact that the Valiant Champion had managed to remain on good terms with Lord Yannu of the Champion's Blood without being married into the Marave.

"Our hunt was fruitless, Lord White," the Young Slayer sighed as he returned to their side. "For all we know, the Hawk is-"

Providence nudged at Hanno's hand before his senses could, and he followed the current without resistance. His sword left the scabbard in a clean, crisp arc and cut through the arrow a hair's breadth beyond the arrowhead. The Young Slayer flinched, the harmless steel arrowhead falling against his leathers with a slap instead of piercing through the back of his neck.

"Hawk still there," Rafaella cheerfully noted.

"As a rule, it is unwise to tempt irony without being prepared to meet the consequences of it," Hanno calmly told the younger man. "When you have come into the fullness of your might perhaps you will find the opposite tack to your liking, as it can prompt the Enemy to move at the timing of your choice, but until then I would advise a more restrained approach."

The Young Slayer swallowed loudly.

"I understand, Lord White," he feebly said, making the Mark of Mercy against his chest.

Promising but still so very young, Hanno thought as he sheathed his sword. There was still no sign of the Hawk out there, and now even the Wolfhound had disappeared into the rocks. Fighting against the Revenant he believed had been an Archer whilst she still drew breath had made the White Knight dimly grateful for having never fought the Woe in earnest. For all that the powers of the Black Queen and the Hierophant drew the eye the most, he suspected that it was Indrani the Archer that would have been the deadliest of the lot. The Hawk – named for the feathers she liked to fletch her arrows with – had certainly proved to be among the most lethal of the Scourges.

Christophe would have died during the taking of Juvelun if the Stalwart Apostle had not been by his side, and Prince Etienne of Brabant had died. The Hawk might not be as visibly destructive as the Archmage or the Unseelie, but she'd done more damage to the army than either so far. While Antigone fought the former and Hanno the latter, the Hawk had set about methodically killing her way through the captains and commanders of the Grand Alliance's army. It was the Hawk's head that the White Knight had been hoping to take today, betting on the disorder of the camp being enough to tempt her into an attack. Yet it seemed she was not to be baited into exposing herself.

The deadly arrows would resume when they went on the march, then.

"Back to camp," the White Knight ordered. "We've lingered out here long enough. Best be gone before they bring in other Revenants and the hunt turns around on us."

It was not a long walk, but it somehow felt like it anyway.

—

While Hanno had not reddened his blade today, the same could not be said of others. The pavilion had collapsed, its drapes drenched with blood. Half a hundred men and women, several bruised and cut, knelt outside in the mud surrounded by a ring of bared swords. Behind them Lycaonese armsmen, bearing the colours of Neustria and Hannover, set to the work of dragging away the corpses with brisk efficiency. Few of the northerners had died in the ambush, having gone in fully armed and ready while most of the Alamans captains had kept swords and daggers but few bothered with even chainmail. Not a quarter hour had passed since the last of the steel was sheathed, but already the camp was like a kettle about to boil over.

Rumours had flown with swift wings, for the Iron Prince's seizure and killing of the mutinous officers had been impossible to hide. Already two fantassin companies had holed themselves up behind their carts and hollered loudly at treachery and breach of contract, but they would not be the last. Lycaonese respected ruthlessness suborned to greater purpose, and in matters of law the Prince of Hannover had been within his rights, but to southerners this was a grave overreach. Hanno had already sent the Balladeer and the Harrowed Witch, two of the more level-headed among his Named, to prevent that particular situation from spinning out of control.

Respect for the Chosen would stay hand and the Balladeer was highly popular besides, while the Witch had the means to quickly send word to him if need be. In truth, though, the White Knight did not believe that this would escalate much beyond the current trouble. The Prince of Hannover had been hard-handed but also clear-sighted. There was no real support for the would-be mutineers among the broader army: the Lycaonese remained loyal to their rulers, the Levantines seemed to approve more than not and the Firstborn were either indifferent or amused. Hanno had spoken with their General Rumena on several occasions over the last month, and found the ancient drow to be contemptuously amused with what it deemed to be 'human foibles'.

Its interest in the politics of its allies began and ended at their intersection with the interests of the Firstborn.

The Barrow Sword's footsteps were not as quiet as the man believed them to be, but Hanno did not give it away until the bearded villain was almost close enough to be struck. Rafaella had twice warned him of how dangerous this one truly was, and she was not one to hand out such praise easily. She'd also had a few unkind words about the Black Queen's protection of him, but then Hanno figured that the Barrow Sword would have had a few of the same to Catherine Foundling about his own protection of the Valiant Champion. That tended to be the way, with the Truce and Terms.

"Ishaq," the White Knight acknowledged without turning. "Come to have a look?"

"Something like that," the other man drawled. "Wasn't sure the old man had it in him, truth be told."

More the fool you, Hanno thought. The Lycaonese were a strange folk at first glance, but not so difficult to understand when studied in depth. In some ways their culture was more permissive than that of the Alamans and the Arlesites, especially when it came to privacy – though with the unspoken understanding that anything done in private could not be a danger to the community – and mores, but their land had made them a hard people. None of the northern soldiery had been affronted by the Iron Prince's ambush today because, in their eyes, it was his undeniable right to act this way. They had never taken fully to Salienta's Graces, up north, where instead it was strong rulers and hard choices that were trusted to get them through the dark.

The Iron Prince had never acted the tyrant before because he'd never seen a need to. It was as simple as that. Not all ruthless men needed to trumpet about their ruthlessness.

"It will be settled soon," Hanno said.

The Barrow Sword let out a noise of disbelief.

"There's four companies barricaded now," Ishaq said. "And there'll be more, mark my words. He only sent a few envoys there to inform them their officers had been arrested for high treason and they must set down their arms before letting them stew. He's lucky they didn't lynch any of them. Not the wildest of schemers, our Prince of Hannover."

Hanno glanced at the other man, whose neatly-trimmed beard and elegantly subdued facepaint were both twisted by a jeer as he watched the bodies being stripped naked and dragged to the disposal pits. The Levantine villain did not seem to share the enmity much of his countrymen held for Procerans, but his general callous disregard for life meant there was little difference in practice.

"Not a schemer," the White Knight agreed. "Yet not a fool. Where are the rest of the Hannover armymen, Barrow Sword, if they are neither here nor forcing the fantassins in line?"

Pale brown eyes flicked to him, narrowing in thought.

"Ah," the Barrow Sword exhaled. "The conscripts. Not a fool indeed, while I have been yapping my jaw like one instead."

Hanno bent his head in acknowledgement. The Prince of Hannover had, correctly he believed, decided that the conscripts would be easier to get in line and so focused his efforts there. It went with the way Brabantines – and many Alamans armies – appointed their officers. A prince would usually name most his relatives and closest highborn allies to a command, but when the stock of those and trusted career soldiers were exhausted it was tradition for levies and conscripts to elect their officers from their own ranks. Given the high rates of attrition and the realities of raising an army by conscription, it had in truth been mostly lowborn captains who'd been in the tent.

And so by seizing or killing the Brabantine captains in the tent, Klaus Papenheim had effectively removed all the men and women who would have had the popularity and leadership to rouse the conscripts into organized resistance against him. His actions would still breed deep resentment and involved killing trusted officers shortly before seeking a pitched battle, but for now though the conscripts were mutinous they were a disorganized sort of mutinous. The kind that could be herded into companies and forced to prepare for a march west by Lycaonese soldiers, as was currently taking place while the fantassins failed to realize they were being isolated.

It wasn't that the Iron Prince was unaware that a third of the camp now despised him, Hanno mused, but that in the old prince's eyes that mattered little if no one here was alive to hate him in a week. He was not wrong in this.

"I take it we're not going to intervene either way?" the Barrow Sword asked.

Hanno almost smiled. The man's reason for seeking him out finally became clear.

"There will not be a need," the White Knight said. "I have sent Antigone and Christophe to oversee the capitulation of the conscripts, and anything other than our visible presence would be interference beyond our mandate."

The Barrow Sword turned to study him for a long moment.

"Huh," Ishaq idly said. "Thought you'd be up in arms about all the killing, White Knight. It seemed like the kind of turn you might flip a coin over. So to speak."

Hanno turned to level a calm stare on the villain, who met it defiantly. He said nothing, simply waiting in silence until the other man looked away.

"No offence meant," the Barrow Sword said.

"Of course," the White Knight mildly replied. "A good evening to you then, Ishaq."

The bearded man balked at the implied dismissal but did not contest it. It would have been easier, Hanno suspected, if they had fought. It would have allowed the Barrow Sword to place him as the more powerful among them, and so end the incessant challenges that uncertainty in this matter drove him to attempt. Yet Hanno was a high officer of the Grand Alliance, and the Barrow Sword was not one of the Named in his charge. Duelling the villain, even if Catherine would likely end up excusing the matter, would be an act with repercussions. Gods but there were a great many of those, these days. His world had grown increasingly complicated since the inception of the Truce and Terms.

Duties had grown like weeds even as old certainties now passed like sand through his fingers. Hanno reached for the coin that was never far from his palm, though it had never been found by another, and closed his fingers around the silver. Laurels on one side, crossed swords on the other. The only verdict the Seraphim ever cared to give. Watching the corpses be dragged away in silence, the White Knight casually flipped it. It spun, a blink of silver, and landed on his open palm without anything beyond Creation's laws having moved it. A relief, almost. At least it was not a spurt of the Hierarch's madness again. It still left him feeling unpleasantly blind.

It was not that the White Knight believed himself to be unschooled in matters of law or in matters of right and wrong. He knew better. His interest in both matters – sometimes aligned, sometimes opposed – had begun early. As a boy, Hanno had once been a court scribe for the Outer Tribunal of Arwad. The courthouse of Halan District had been a minor one even among the lesser of the Thalassocracy's two tribunals, but it had often deal with foreigners and their laws, as well as possessed a surprisingly large scrollhouse that the senior scribes and archivists had been lenient in allowing a young Hanno to use.

These days, when looking back in search of the first steps taken in becoming the man he was today, the White Knight had often lingered on that alignment of coincidences as a likely source. He had learned of many laws while quite young, not only those of his native Ashur but also those of Free Cities – Nicae and Delos, mostly – as well the southernmost of the Proceran principalities. He had also seen judgement given day after day, the law measured and applied by the tribunes of the courthouse for which he had kept records. It had fostered in him an interest in justice and law long before injustice slew his father and befell his mother in the wake of that death.

He'd read the famous treatise on Ashuran law, the Ten Scales of Madrubal, as much out of curiosity as because he had nursed ambitions to one day become an archivist at the courthouse. That same abundance of knowledge had come close to leading him astray, when he had sought the Riddle of Fault and earned the attention of the Seraphim, so in a sense it was not without peril. It was all too easy to become drunk your own learning and confuse it with wisdom. Yet Hanno had continued to learn, over the years that followed, for though it was not his place to judge there was rarely virtue to be found in willful ignorance. And so he had sought knowledge of the laws of Calernia, sifting through them in search of wisdom.

He had found sense in some places, be they the graces the Principate granted to all from princes to beggars or the shrewdly even-handed way the Tower collected taxes, but always it had been... situational. Impermanent. Nothing at all like the timeless wisdom of the Choir of Judgement. And more often Hanno had found the laws twisted and turned into a tool of oppression by those who made them. The Magisterium of Stygia made property of men while calling it a godgiven right, Callowan nobles inherited the right to pass judgement along with their titles and Ashur in the same breath condemned slavery while buying foreign criminals whose sentences would be spent labouring in the Thalassocracy's mines.

Watching soldiers in mail drag butchered naked corpses away, Hanno considered justice. Law, it could not be denied, gave the right to Prince Klaus Papenheim. Yet justice was not the same thing, and it rarely nested on the side that dragged corpses into mass graves – for all that the appellation of 'disposal pits' tiptoed around that words, that was what they were in truth. No, Hanno would not put blind trust in laws. Men were flawed and that imperfection bled into all that they made it was the simple way of things. Even laws. Especially laws, perhaps. So the White Knight had observed those that he could while pursuing what he knew to be right, and ignored those that he must while doing the same.

It was a straightforward path, in a way. While he was as blind as anyone else on Creation, he'd had the light of the Choir of Judgement to heed and follow instead. That had removed uncertainty. Allowed for purity of purpose, if not always action. Hanno had been blessed enough to benefit from the wisdom of the Seraphim since his first breath as the White Knight, and in a way the coin that represented it had become as much a part of him as his hands or feet. Even when he had not called on the judgement of the Seraphim, not tossed the coin, that he still held it at all had been a reassurance. A sign that he had not lost his way, that as the instrument of Judgement he still brought good into the world.

Now all that was left was a coin more silver than miracle and the growing awareness of his own imperfections.

Hanno's hand went to trace the stumps of his missing fingers. He had not grown to question the worth of that bargain, but there had been other doubts that crept to his side under cover of night. The end of the troubles at the Arsenal had been no such thing, simply a transmutation of one form of trouble into another. And though the White Knight knew better than to linger on the attribution of fault, he had wondered much over the last months of how the parts of the blame there should be assigned. Some of it was his, but how much? Hanno had refused to bend on the principles at play because those principles simply could not be bent if the Truce and Terms were to remain worth enforcing.

But he'd not conveyed this properly to the First Prince and the Black Queen, and so they had joined hands to work around him.

It had stung. Not that they'd treated him as an obstacle, for he had absolutely been one. But rather that two women he'd held in high regard had so utterly failed to understand that the Truce and Terms were already a compromise on principle and they'd been asking him to compromise those even further. Behind all the talk of necessities and dues, what they'd wanted of him was to go back on the rights and protections promised to someone in his charge, with little more justification for it than 'the fears of the Highest Assembly require quelling'. Which, while likely true, was not a valid reason to break half the oaths that made up the foundation of the Truce and Terms.

It was as if they'd believed he was being inflexible for the pleasure of it rather than because it was the only morally potable stance to take in that position. Even from a long-term perspective, a willingness to discard any Named that became inconvenient at the first... Hanno breathed out, reached for the calm. He would not fall into the trap of the backbiting, into the inherently losing game of beginning to think of this in terms of victory and loss. Yet he'd allowed the eminent reasonableness of the foremost villain of their age to lull him into a sense of comfort, and that was an illusion that must be discarded. While the trick with the corpse of the Red Axe had been disgraceful, it had mostly served as a reminder of a simpler truth.

Catherine Foundling did not have lines in the sand that she would not cross, if she thought it necessary. It did not erase her virtues, but neither must Hanno ever allow himself to forget that all that stood between the Black Queen and atrocities was the perception of need.

It was Cordelia Hasenbach's complicity that had most troubled him. The White Knight was not an utter fool, he grasped that regardless of her character her position would make demands of her. Yet Cordelia Hasenbach had, once, been on the verge of being Named. The Heavens themselves had measured her being and not found it wanting. He'd honestly not believed, deep down, that she was someone who would put political needs over doing the right thing. He'd been wrong. The grim theatre of the desecration of young girl's corpse, a trial that was a farce going back on the Principate's own word – that Named alone would stand in judgement over Named – had proved otherwise.

Cordelia Hasenbach had and would place the preservation of the Principate of Procer above all other callings, no matter how wicked or virtuous they might be.

It had been a disappointment. One less person he could trust among a number already exceedingly small. And there were even fewer he could both trust and be challenged by. The Grey Pilgrim was one, but Tariq was deathly afraid of stepping back into the role he had as a younger man and that made him... hesitant to speak up, sometimes. And so few of the other heroes ever cared to question Hanno's actions, his reasons, save for those that questioned them badly. Or worse, for the wrong reasons as Christophe de Pavanie once had. The trust that had grown strong between the keystones of the Grand Alliance at the beginning of the war was fraying, slowly but surely. It was, Hanno had found, an unsettlingly lonely feeling.

And so now it was alone that Hanno of Arwad looked at the last of the corpses being dragged away, knowing he had tactically allowed this to happen. Veitland, Princess Mathilda of Neustria had succinctly asked. A cliffside village halfway through Twilight's Pass, where Iron King Konrad had once shamed fleeing armies into turning around and facing the enemy. Hauptberg, Klaus Papenheim had just as succinctly replied. A small dip into Recall had been enough to confirm what he'd already suspected, that there the bloody birth of the Iron Crown had begun in murderous treachery. Even the Barrow Sword had sniffed out the nature of what was coming, giving a warning about Captain Nabila being a skilled captain but green to the Dominion's bloody politics.

"It was lawful," Hanno murmured, eyes lingering on the streaks of red trailing the ground.

But was it just? His hand itched for the coin, but the coin was just that now. A coin. The White Knight why this had been done, and that some restraint had been shown. He agreed with the Iron Prince that if the army stayed here, it would most likely perish. The Dead King was too canny an opponent to give them the kind of hopeless battle that they would end up winning. Which meant they must win in the mundane, in the dirt, and that meant marching west even when thousands among this army were unwilling. Leaving the mutineers behind would not have been possible, Hanno also knew. They would have been eaten up in a day and risen as soldiers in the service of Keter. These, the dark-skinned man knew, were all good reasons.

That this had been necessary was, in truth, difficult to deny. But had it been just?

No, his heart whispered. It wasn't.

There had been better ways. If he had stepped in, involved himself regardless of authorities and restraints and how it would be seen as overstepping, there might be fewer corpses in the pit. Or none at all. And the heart was just as blind as the rest of him, but these days what else did Hanno have to follow? It would have been a mistake to step in. It had been a mistake not to step in. If he had acted, lives could have been saved. A simple answer. If he had acted, the potential ramifications might have killed rather more than fifty people. A complicated answer. Hanno knew himself to be in the right place, for he was the White Knight and doom was creeping across the land. Between it and Calernia was where he must stand

Sometimes, though, he wondered if he was there right man to be standing there.

The thought came lightly, and left just as easily, but it was not far. The White Knight eventually forced himself to look away, for soon the fantassins would be called to heel and he intended to be there to keep an eye on matters personally. Likely, he thought, the Prince of Hannoven would try to begin an early march west so that the mutinous soldiers felt like there could be no turning back. The afternoon air was chilly and so Hanno called Light to him, letting it warm his bones as he had learned from the life of a Paladin long dead.

It came slower than it used to.

ruduen

Oof. When it comes to moments like this, I think we've seen these 'last trials' result in the loss of a name more often than not. It's possible that this would lead to a transition to something other than White Knight or a re-affirmation that reconnects Hanno, but even so, now's a dangerous time for a Name to be in shaky waters.

Considering the Heroic Axioms stating that powers are more likely to return once a lesson is learned, I guess the key will be just what Hanno's learning or what he's willing to learn.

Also, do the thing!

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Matthew Wells

I think the lesson he needs to learn is that Not Judging is the same as declaring everyone innocent- there's no such thing as a neutral stance when lives are on the line.

Matthew Wells

Thinking about it now, I'm a little worried that he's going to learn his lesson by murdering Cordelia before she can use the Angel Corpse.

Liliet

I don't think that's going to be a thing anymore. It high key shouldn't be up to Chosen to stave off that outcome after Cat's intervention, and also the war will be decided in the north before Hanno would have had a chance to be anywhere near Cordelia Hasenbach again.

Shveiran

Yeah. If that catastrophe was only avoided through heroic intervention it would be rather disappointing.

shikkarasu

I'm wondering if his Name is weakening. He is doubting himself, not unlike how Thief did, and his Light is coming slower when called. He lost not an Aspect, but one of the core parts of his Name, like the Black Knight's necromancy, shadows, or Speaking. I hope he transitions, but we might get an official of the Heroes who isn't one anymore.

...What am I saying, that would be amazing. Unfortunate and heart wrenching, but so in line with the themes we've seen since Cat went into the Everdark. Sacrificing raw power in the pursuit of long term stability for the Nation/Continent/Warlord.

Mental Mouse

> He lost not an Aspect, but one of the core parts of his Name,
In fact, the Bard said explicitly that the coin was indeed an Aspect, albeit one of a rare type.

dadycoool

If you're right, then it's interesting how he's losing his Name as Cat's gaining hers.

Insanenoodlyguy

It will be even more interesting when he becomes her Black Knight. And boyfriend.

This ship will never die for me.

Mental Mouse

heh heh heh....

masterofbones

Worried? Cordelia is poison to the entire treaty, getting rid of her would be a great step.

Liliet

And what's the next step, putting Rozala in charge? She'll be eaten in two days.

Matthew Wells

Also, a Named murdering a member state's ruler before the talks are finished would be a diplomatic disaster.

TeK

I think the lesson Hano has to learn, is either that he was right all along and humans really are inherently flawed and Justice can only be found in the eyes of the divine (which would be appropriate if it was Gods Above who made the rules), withstanding the temptations of using his own petty morals to judge the world, or to be the guide for the Seraphim in the new era where rigidness of principles is not a virtue (although whether or not it is and to what point is a subject of a heated debate, brought to you live by the comment section), becoming a partner rather than a child holding hand. Exploring this new Age together, one showing the other what he cannot see, another sharing with others what They cannot comprehend (due to not being mortal). Perhaps something along the lines of "just because you are correct doesn't mean you're right" and "have a little empathy you jerks". Although now I am mixing my own bias in here.

Which is why the final lesson would probably play into the theme of the series and align according to Erratic's own moral beliefs. However, as to what they are, the judgement will probably also differ. Not like he will answer us directly.

Liliet

> Which is why the final lesson would probably play into the theme of the series and align according to Erratic's own moral beliefs. However, as to what they are, the judgement will probably also differ. Not like he will answer us directly.

Mental Mouse

I think the chapter title is a clue here (look it up on Wikipedia). It may be that the lesson Hanno needs to learn is that the Choir of Judgement is ultimately just another authority, and not necessarily right by definition. (In short, Anaxeres' lesson!)

Liliet

I don't see how that would possibly follow from any premise Hanno has to work with here tho.

I think the chapter title refers to Hanno believing that there is an Objective Justice Criterion that the Choir of Judgement can access directly and he can imperfectly approximate by thinking about things / listening to his heart. The opposite statement to "there is no justice, there is just us" and "not a single molecule of mercy in the universe".

It's an obstacle, but more of an obstacle is how he doesn't know HOW to approximate it better. He never tried, always dismissing complicated judgements as something he shouldn't even try doing and doing simpler ones easily and automatically because he's really smart actually (think gifted kid in school cruising on no effort until they hit uni and suddenly find out they have no idea how to study).

Mental Mouse

Heroism almost by definition implies deferring major morality calls to the gods (or the angels, their representatives). Hanno just had a particularly literal version of that.

But I'd say Hanno has surprising wisdom despite his frustrated dependence. Certainly his political and storyfu abilities are still strong. The question is what happens if and when he gives up hope of the Choir returning.

Liliet

> Heroism almost by definition implies deferring major morality calls to the gods (or the angels, their representatives)

Where'd you get that?

Most heroes aren't on tap with Choirs, Choirs don't provide full feedback on their decisions if any at all (William got 0 feedback), and Gods don't provide any whatsoever.

It's physically impossible for most heroes to defer ANY morality calls to gods/angels/whatever.

Mental Mouse

The Gods Above don't speak directly, but there are plenty of humans willing to speak for them, and various books purporting to recount their commands. That part works basically like our own world....

And the point is that Heroes consistently defer to at least the idea of commandments "from above". Compare that to Cat's response: "Woe on us all, but if the Gods demanded my home be ashes then the Gods will burn."

Liliet

Heroes are consistently at odds with the House of Light actually specifically because they don't respect their claim to be speaking for the Heavens.

> And the point is that Heroes consistently defer to at least the idea of commandments "from above".

Commandments?

Heroes defer to the idea of giving Heavens room to help them, possibly at the expense of taking action on their own, which pisses Cat off but actually works for them, see Providence literally guiding Hanno's hand to save another hero's life this chapter.

Commandments, they just don't receive. Not even the Choir heroes. Maybe if they did they'd defer to them, but I don't think it's reasonable to describe heroism as doing something thoroughly hypothetical at the moment "by definition".

Mental Mouse

I have phrased myself poorly, my point here is that still defer to whatever their idea is of what the Heavens want. If a hero strays from their laid-out path, they eventually stop being a hero.

When young Tariq didn't do what his Choir advised he stopped being able to hear his angels for a while... I'd originally thought that was just manipulation, but now I'm thinking it was more story-mechanical: "The Grey Pilgrim is guided by angels", so when he refused their guidance, his ability to hear them wavered – not by their action, but because he was drifting off-script. But that's still a pretty solid incentive to do as the angels "advise"!

EE made it clear that the Heroes are indeed being guided: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/06/17/chapter-12-squire/comment-page-1/#comment-106>

Liliet

> I have phrased myself poorly, my point here is that still defer to whatever their idea is of what the Heavens want.

And their idea of what the Heavens want happens to be what they want, usually, because that's how the mechanic works.

> When young Tariq didn't do what his Choir advised he stopped being able to hear his angels for a while... I'd originally thought that was just manipulation, but now I'm thinking it was more story-mechanical: "The Grey Pilgrim is guided by angels", so when he refused their guidance, his ability to hear them wavered – not by their action, but because he was drifting off-script. But that's still a pretty solid incentive to do as the angels "advise"!

>

> EE made it clear that the Heroes are indeed being guided:

This is accurate! But they aren't being guided very closely.

> Liliet The Adorable Nerd:

> How much input did William get from his Choir on... anything he did during his career?

- > EE:
- > William did not have the kind of relationship with his Choir that Tariq does with Mercy
- > Contrition is more formative than guiding

And that's a Choir hero!

Cpt. Obvious

The choires are all wearing blinders. They only care about their single aspect. Justice knows law but doesn't care if the law is just. Neither does it know, understand or care for mercy or malice. Justice applies law and Judge strictly from that. Hanno says that he doesn't judge, but at the same time he did choose when and whom Judgement would judge. Knowing that almost everyone has done something that breaks the laws of Judgement, even if it is something as simple as being born in some cases, Hanno was providing moderation to the choir of Justice.

Now he is starting to doubt that Justice is perfect, he has doubts about the laws always being just and right. And I think he's starting realize that he has effectively been passing judgement every time when he chose to throw the coin or not.

So he either is going to lose this name by losing his faith in Justice, or the realization that he's in fact very much a participant in the the process of passing Judgment instead of just being its instrument will strengthen his Name. Perhaps he will transition into the White Judge...

Liliet

Judgement does not base their judgement on any mortal law actually, and Above doesn't have laws for Judgement to follow, they really do go for actual justice as best they can.

Hanno's entire backstory is finding out that laws are not always right, that's how he CAME TO Judgement. He used to be a court scribe and then

Sir Nil

No Judgement... No White Knight.

Crash

Knight of the Free, baby! sworn sword of Bellerophon, most beautiful of the Free Cities, may she reign forever!

All Hanno has to do is murder the second bird god and say a sweet fuck you to Stygia, fuck knows they deserve it.

Time to die, and offer Redress. (Or would Retribution be more fitting in this mad situation?)

Javvies

Heh.

Blind dependence on the Choir has left Hanno increasingly adrift and indecisive.

Plus for all that he's said he doesn't judge ... he's judging people for the actions they take. It's just a different kind of judgement he's making, with different consequences than the life or death Coin Flip.

He might be drifting away from his current Name ... which could be incredibly bad.

Hanno ... you have an incredibly narrow and short sighted perspective. This is a bad thing for someone on your position.

Klaus's decapitation of the would be mutineers and deserters?

What the hell else was he supposed to do?

Besides, don't you always say you don't judge?

Your monomaniacal focus on "Justice", especially since you delegated all decisions on the matter to the Seraphim in a life or death Coin flip, leaves you blind to other factors. Especially the fact that sometimes there are no good options, only bad and worse ones, and leadership requires taking the least bad long term path.

To be fair, how Klaus's move here plays out in a slightly longer timeframe has yet to be determined, but he couldn't realistically just ignore the problem, and he had to make a decision when no good decisions existed.

You cannot let the perfect be the downfall of the good enough. Nor can you allow a perfect plan implemented tomorrow to prevent a functional plan executed now.

WuseMajor

I mean, at least he's not the Mirror Knight?

Chris would have gone in and defended people, hopefully by inspiring everyone to join together in holding this position, but he probably would have had to kill the Iron Prince to do it.

And then, right after he'd gotten everyone together and built the defense of this place...the Dead King would just sit there, everyone would starve, and Chris would likely end up running out to fight the entire army himself and eventually he'd die.

Hanno at least has considered the long term and decided that it was a choice between everyone dying or those people dying and that, since it was legal, he wouldn't stop it.

Honestly, I think the real question is, was there another way? Maybe? A sufficiently charismatic Named might have been able to convince everyone that this was the only option, but then you've got mind control allegations going on. Alternately, if you had someone who could miracle up supplies, staying for a day or two to let everyone recover might have been feasible. But if they had someone like that, they'd already have factored that in.

I feel like this is going to end up having been a bad idea on Klaus's part, somehow, but, based on everything he knows, going out to fight now is going to keep more people alive than staying behind. And, while I feel the waste of those lives, I cannot exactly disagree with him.

mamm0nn

Saying that there would be idiots that take the easiest path leading to a worse end is not a good endorsement of the actions of those less foolish. Mirror Knight already is both out of story and in the Story the designated fool that makes the shortsighted bad calls loudly, using him as a measuring stick is hardly a good means to endorse White Knight.

TeK

Regardless of anything else, it was a mass murder. Dude, come on, don't act like you can't see that Hanno perfectly understads the "necessity" and all that jazz, you are being willfully dishonest.

We see a conflict between deontology and consequentialism, and Hanno had the unfortune of having his deontological beliefs being divinely ordained. Now they aren't and he, like the rest of us mortals, has to find a different foundation for his beliefs or abandon them in entirety. I kinda wish someone introduced him to Kant's categorical imperative, I wonder what he would've thought.

On a sidenote: God, but am I glad living in the world where I have such an abundance of knowledge at the tip of my fingers. It is truly a blessing.

Also, I don't think he is casting judgement. He is stating the facts. It was a mass murder. A mass murder he could've possibly prevented. It was necessary. But it was still a mass murder.

And for him, necessity does not justify mass murder. And yet he still tacitly allowed it. And yet it was a mass murder of largely innocent, even heroic people. And yet if they didn't die, many more would've. And yet, it was a murder of a scared, lost, confused people. You can't deny all of those things. How can you say he is blind to many factors? He sees it all.

I would maintain however, that he does not judge. It is similar to late stoic philosophy. He is not ascribing good or bad to other people actions, nor to the happenings of nature. He just acts according to his own principles, consequences be damned. Because, the outside world cannot be controlled, and it's a folly to pretend that it is. What we can't control should be ignored and we should focus on what we can control. Our thoughts and our actions. While accepting the happenings of fate without judging.

He does not judge. He never called actions of Cat, or Cordelia, or Klaus as either good or bad. He does not ascribe a moral value to other people or their actions. He just tries to see the things from many possible angles. He tries too keep in mind all the facts, without ignoring or discarding the facts because they are uncomfortable to admit. He is the opposite of blind.

Javvies

Mass execution.

For those who intended to lead and organize a mutiny and/or mass desertion of their units in the face of the enemy in time of war, and who did not surrender. Possibly also of lower ranked people who were involved and didn't surrender.

There's a difference, and in this case, it's important. Armies are not democracies. They cannot function as one. They are autocracies.

Think back to Cat's footing of the Gallowborne – had she not formed the Gallowborne, each and every one of the initial membership would have been executed.

Unfortunately for Hanno "Justice" is not a concept that is fully compatible with armies fighting wars.

Officers will have to give orders knowing that following those orders will mean that at least some of their troops die, and sometimes it will be most or all of them who are expected to die. Those troops don't have much choice about following orders, even if they think those orders suck and will probably get them killed. Because not following orders is not something an army can tolerate.

None of that has anything to do with "Justice" – simply military imperatives.

There usually are not clear cut options, and it's looking a lot like Hanno is having increasing trouble coping with the shades of grey that most people, especially leaders, have to deal with on a near daily basis, rather than purely black and white situations.

Salt

I'm not sure why you're framing it like being uncomfortable with having to choose a lesser evil is a bad thing.

It SHOULD be something you're uncomfortable with, and getting numbed to it is a shitty part of reality, not something to be praised for. Any respectable person would feel like absolute shit for having to kill those people, and it's a sentiment Klaus and Hanno almost certainly share. Klaus isn't lounging on a sofa patting himself on the back for being an edgy, teenage-angsty executioner of the cowardly, the dude hated having to do it as much as Hanno hated having to stand back and let it happen.

Realistically, Hanno is being pretty sensible here. Having to put up with a shitty reality – which he did just now – is no excuse to be satisfied with only being able to put up with awful and worse for options. He's wanting to do better and find a way to not be forced to choose between awful and worse next time, which is the correct mindset.

If anything, a lot of the other characters should take a leaf from Hanno's book, not the other way around.

TeK

Hanno (and I) never denied that it's lawful. The "do not retreat" order back in WW2 was also lawful in the Soviet Union – and if not for it, perhaps many more lives would've been lost. But it is not, not even remotely, just. And yet it was necessary. Maybe. The opinions differ. But the guys who made the order thought it was necessary.

Klaus didn't exhaust every other option before resorting to this. He didn't exhaust any other option for that matter. He called them to talk and then stabbed them in the back. It might've saved the campaign and hell, I might've done the same on his place, but it does not absolve it of what it is. A cold-blooded murder of decent men, without even an attempt to reason with them first.

He treated them like animals for the slaughter and sure it's army and it's war, and it was his lawful right to do so, but it merely puts the facts into perspective, it does not erase them.

Also Hanno never stopped having a problem with the shades of grey. His is very dilemma of a ln idealist encountering a flawed world. He had a magical crutch in a face of eldritch abominations that may very well be ideal, but it was also taken away from him. And now he is faced with no choice but to live with his own imperfections, oh the folly of men.

See, the fact that Hanno needs to grow up does not somehow invalidate all his concerns. They are perfectly valid, it's just that we have no option but to live with them.

Shveiran

Minor correction: Klaus did, in fact, try to reason with them. After confirming they weren't listening, he went ahead with it.

Granted, he still acted and there may have been other things he could have tried first.

It is a small thing, but a meaningful one, I feel.

Frivolous

TeK –

I think the above argument is mistaken. I present as counter-argument these paragraphs from Theism:

====

He spoke clearly and concisely, avoiding frills and japes out of respect for the grim deeds he was asking for, but twice he was interrupted by a challenge from a captain and more often than that by jeers.

"To stay in Juvelun is death," the Prince of Hannover told them. "We will be surrounded and destroyed."

"And where would we go instead, bloody Keter?" a woman called out.

"Retreat," another voice called out. "We must retreat."

"We must go west," Klaus roared, his voice rising above the din. "General Rumena has reported to me that the remnants from the defenders of Juvelun are gathering in the valley, and we must strike west to disperse them before they can mount a true threat."

====

So Klaus did try to talk to the Brabantine captains. They wouldn't listen, and I think Klaus decided that further argument would only waste time and not change anyone's minds.

Darkening

Calling it mass murder and saying he treated them like animals feels a bit disingenuous when he gave them the option to kneel and be arrested instead of dying. Sure, it's a chaotic situation and a lot of them are probably confused, but he did have the option for them, and we do in fact see some people being dragged off afterwards with that having happened. The folks that died are implied to have drawn blades and resisted the soldiers coming to arrest them, and when people draw weapons on people trying to arrest them there tend to be consequences to that. Sure, Klaus knew going in that's how it would go and he could have done it in a way that intimidated more of them into surrender, but that doesn't strip the captains of their own free will to choose their own fate. And if he'd tried to be gentler about it, the lack of surprise might have meant more of his soldiers died facing the mutineers, which would be unfortunate in a lot of ways. I dunno, there probably was a better way to go about this, but no good ways.

Salt

Lol, I think the thing about taking "I do not judge" started out as a facetious joke and it just flew over some peoples' heads as an actual legitimate argument.

The phrase quite obviously is just a paraphrasing of his answer to the riddle of fault – it just means he doesn't consider himself worthy of wielding the authority to judge objective right or wrong.

It doesn't mean that he doesn't /have/ any opinions at all on things like whether someone is trustworthy, or if raping and killing people is wrong. It just means he thinks his flawed mortal opinion isn't good enough to be an objective measure of whether someone is Just or not, so he refuses the action of standing in Judgement over them based on those mortal opinions, as much as he can.

It's honestly kind of hilarious to see people seriously giving him shit for it, since most of the comments section from the first four or so books had a very angry circlejerk about self-righteous Heroes who considered their opinions to be made of gold or something, and treated said opinions like some sort of objective truth.

Enter a Hero who strongly believes that his own flawed opinions are unworthy of being used to stand in judgement of other people, and now "Heroes R Bad" because... he doesn't think his opinions are made of gold?

Damned if you do, damned if you don't, I guess.

TeK

I mean, Heroes are against the protagonist, so can they really be good?

Shveiran

I think the gut reaction of some of the commenters (myself included) stemmed from the fact that Hanno's perception of his own flawed ability to judge did not, in fact, stop him from trying to carve the world into a better place one bloody swing at a time.

In practice, he was still making a choice each time, and it kind of sounded like he didn't really realize it.

Salt

That's sort of the problem though.

When he doesn't do anything, he gets lambasted for being "indecisive", naïve, or shrugging off the responsibility of making a morally grey choice when forced to.

When he does do something, he's "trying to carve the world into a better place, one bloody swing at a time". It seems rather strange that even in this very thread of comments, we're seeing two mutually exclusive standards.

As for how much it makes sense to take "I do not judge" as a sign of naïveté or hypocrisy for not being literal?

I'll be honest, I think it's pretty simple to recognize a protagonist-centered bias on the side of some of the comments section there, when you consider that "justifications only matter to the just" has always been interpreted very leniently even though Catherine has cared heavily about justifications from the beginning of the story, while "I do not judge" is taken as a rather literal rule that needs to be perfectly adhered to, else be considered some large degree of dimly unaware or hypocritical.

One line catchphrases like either of those are very loose/simplified summaries of a more complex ideology, and are therefore always going to be some degree of inaccurate in a literal or technical sense. How much they make sense is going to be dependent on how intentionally lenient or harsh the reader is with the interpretation, just as much as how well it's actually followed.

Liliet

> That's sort of the problem though.

> When he doesn't do anything, he gets lambasted for being "indecisive", naive, or shrugging off the responsibility of making a morally grey choice when forced to.

> When he does do something, he's "trying to carve the world into a better place, one bloody swing at a time". It seems rather strange that even in this very thread of comments, we're seeing two mutually exclusive standards.

GOD YES. THANK YOU FOR ARTICULATING IT

Shveiran

Those standards are only mutually exclusive in a vacuum.

I cannot talk for the others, but I personally criticize Hanno, and every other character, for the faults I see in their actions. If their approach varies, it is only natural that the faults may change as well. I disagree with this "he'll be criticized no matter what he does" conclusion.

Besides (again, speaking personally here), comparing mottoes and their interpretation by the reader like that is rather unfair.

Catherine's motto is bullshit. It has always – been – bullshit. For all that she had it sown on her standard, I have a hard time coming up with a meaningful moment that started from that reasoning and not her more general "I'll do what's needed for things to stop being screwed".

I mean, for fuck's sake, MARCHFORD happened not long after the Blessed Isle.

Meanwhile, for a long time we had very little to go on about Hanno aside from his motto.

This isn't "protagonist bias", so much as "I don't know as much compared to the protagonist about this guy, but I still want to talk about Hanno because the chapter I just read was cool".

Mental Mouse

Even Catherine eventually agreed that the motto was bullshit....

Halinn

>You cannot let the perfect be the downfall of the good enough.

Isn't that more or less Cat's entire issue with heroic idealism, that Above is all about anything short of perfection being bad.

Liliet

Above itself does not express any opinions or make any judgements. We've repeatedly had comments that the church just makes things up because there's no input from Above.

So it's more the opposite problem: they accept anyone who meets some very, very minimal standards (WILLIAM OF GREENBURY) and then people try to build on that with very varying results.

Like, Cat herself has a problem with Tariq not letting perfect be the downfall of good enough by SEEDING A PLAGUE.

Crash

This is why Hanno has always rubbed me the wrong way.

"I do not judge" is my berserk button. You are fucking judging bud, whether you sugarcoat or have the cool angels telling you it's fine or hide behind their skirts and say that you are merely following order, it's a judgement all the same. Inaction is not an excuse, it is a choice.

The fact he is still allowed to pull this bullshit speaks to the wild way Heroes are allowed to do whatever the hell they want because the Heavens say so.

Imagine a villain coming out and saying they're not responsible for any of their actions, it is simply the result of orders followed. Instant band of five.

Him showing a bit of spine, excuse me, -doubt- this chapter was great.

jack

Hanno always judged. He was just in denial about it.

The man decided when to flip a coin, knowing that it might result in the death of the person he was talking to.

He was absolutely judging.

Liliet

He was deciding whether to open a court case!

And I think people who pointed out "I do not judge" was not literal are right: he was not in denial. He knew he was making decisions and he was taking responsibility for them. There was a cutoff of complexity though where he stepped back and either let it be period (bureaucracy in Delos) or asked the Choir if he considered it warranted.

ChamberJack

Have to admit WK is sounding a bit hypocritical here, even acknowledges it faintly. While still more sensible than most heroes, he still has a sense of self righteousness that being the White Knight gives.

Jason Ipswitch

Hmm. The White Knight is troubled by the absence of Judgement. The Heirophant had his native ability to work magic destroyed by the Dead King. The Grey Pilgrim is missing one of his aspects (because Catherine ripped it out of his corpse and used it to return him to life). The Black Queen's army is stalked by a Revenant whose Aspect makes him nigh-invulnerable. There's a band of extra-deadly Revenants hunting the forces of the Grand Alliance.

And Catherine is coming into a Name that is about managing Named. My prediction is that she's going to end up with an Aspect that lets her manipulate Aspects.

Shveiran

Considering that aspects are at the core of a Named' identity and soul, I certainly hope not. That strikes me like an invasive procedure a la Taylor Herbert, and I certainly hope we don't get to that kidn of scenario.

"hey Indrani, Wander is at the core of what you are, right? Well, too bad, I need someone to lead this contingent, so you are about Marching now. I'll change it back later... maybe".

No. Just... uhg, just no.

Lady Serpentine

"Manipulate" and "control" are not the same. Cat's already had an Aspect to manipulate Aspects once, it's how she spent a book and a half running around like she had Rise.

Shveiran

Oh, definitely. If she gets a way to seal up Aspects as a sanction when she judges Named, I've got no beef with that.

I thought Jason was picturing something more akin to her molding others' aspects to what she thought was necessary, and thus "solving" issues like Masego's crippling or, more importantly, Hanno's crisis of faith.

That is a much more risky territory, even when done for the greater good. It's a power I'd rather she lacked, because she tends to use what she has.

Raved Thrad

I think you have something there. Each time she's interacted with dead named, she's thought of herself as a "thief of Bestowal." I can't help but think that this is going to be part of her Name, that she'll have some sort of meta that affects Named and Aspects.

It'd also be interesting if she ends up with a Name like "Thief of (foo)". I wonder how Vivienne would react to that.

Musou Majo

There's also the whole "Queen of Lost and Found" business. She's very much been representative of making hard choices and sacrificing things to forge her own path. So very likely if it relates to Names it will involve her being an instructor of sorts. A teacher, at a school perhaps. Or, if you'll bear with me, a Guide. Something that'll let her maybe not manipulate aspects or Names, but help people fill the roles they're meant to, with a degree of control over who and how they do it according to her and her terms.

Also side note: it's very interesting how as the White Knight's Name fades with his wavering will, Cat's Name strengthens and involves judging other Names in some way.

Mental Mouse

As someone else has pointed out, "Queen of Lost and Found" is just a translation of "Queen Foundling". Admittedly, it certainly sounds cooler!

Anomandris

This is ominous.... So very ominous.

Kinda like the doubts an important character feels before upcoming clarity that either leads to an antagonistic path; or a heroic Last stand.

Burlyraven

So Hanno's power wanes as Catherine's waxes, and both are marching towards what could very possibly be the bloodiest battle of this campaign so far. Considering Cat's Name is oriented towards judgement and rule, and Hanno is desperate for guidance and losing his faith in the Heavens, there's a story of corruption brewing, methinks. It's still a few steps away from inevitable, but it's there.

David

With the Black Knight role off the board for now (as far as we know there hasn't been another claimant), and the White Knight in decline, it would be interesting to see the Black/White dicotomy end and Cat take up the mantle of the Grey Knight or something more neutral but significantly broader/further reaching.

Mental Mouse

Catherine is already well past the Knight tier. Something like Shadow Queen would be a possibility.

Darkening

Yeah, I've been eying the contrast between Hanno's 'I do not Judge' catchphrase and Cat's name seeming to be about standing in judgement with a great deal of interest. I highly doubt Hanno's going to fall to villainy or anything, but I could see him being pushed too far by one of Cat's Necessary Evils and doing something Unfortunate that leads to an ideological clash via mortal combat. It's the only way to have a proper philosophical debate based on all the anime I've ever seen lol. Honestly, it would be a hell of a thing for Cat to come into her name by putting down Hanno. Like, holy fuck.

Crash

Interesting view, especially since we keep being reminded people have opinions about how cordial they are/were with each other.

Would also be an interesting funhouse mirror to Malicia/Black in some ways.

Burnsy

Hanno's either going to go the way of Vivienne, or he's going to come to some life affirming epiphany at a climactic moment and reconnect with Judgement long enough to go out in a blaze of glory.

Also, every single background detail of the greater war going on is so interesting. I want to see Hawk and Archer in a sniper duel immediately.

Raved Thrad

I don't remember exactly, but isn't Archer able to shoot things like other arrows out of the sky with her own shots? If both she and Hawk are capable of that...

Cpt. Obvious

It seems like Archer can hit whatever she can see. And her Name makes seeing things at just about any distance easy. It was even mentioned in an earlier chapter that Beast master loaned her the sight of some of his beasts and she was able to use that to hit targets that were out of sight from where she was. So yes I think it's highly likely she can shoot arrows out of the sky.

Big I

A thoughtful, philosophical chapter. I like it. Hanno's problem is that he thinks the Heavens themselves are just. Even when using his power to Recall the actions of the first Iron King, he can't accept that all his bosses' superiors really care about is winning their bet.

Two chapters sprang to mind when thinking about this one. First, the interlude where he became White Knight; "the fault was the King's for thinking he could be just". Second, the Tyrant POV at the beginning of Hanno's trial where he used Wish, where Hanno's was "I wish to be just". The King's fault is also Hanno's and always had been.

This chapter made me think that Hanno's either going to die in this war, or transition to another name. Knight Errant maybe?

TeK

His struggle is precisely the cognitive dissonance of wishing something you believe is inherently unachievable to you. And not just a passing fancy like "I wish I could cast fireballs" but a life-defining desire like "I don't want to die". I can relate way too much.

Salt

I mean... whether the Seraphim are infallible is arguable, but it's actually pretty sensible to believe that they are pretty much the closest thing to "Just" as it's possible to get

That kind of abdication to higher expertise happens all the time. No one argues that it's silly or stupid for a random Proceran soldier to take Cordelia's word for it on matters of justice – she's more knowledgeable, experienced, and has a better understanding of context

The seraphim? They have more knowledge on the subject of justice than any being currently alive, has all the experience from being fanatically devoted to the correct judgement of justice since the dawn of Creation, and has greater context than any living being on Calernia by virtue of being able to simultaneously see every single past action, every current circumstance, and every future possibility at the same time.

So I guess the question is... what possible reason does anyone have to believe the bronze scaled birds are less correct on the subject of justice than any other character?

Darkening

Because Judgement without Mercy isn't Justice but Tyranny.

Liliet

Bronze scaled birds?

Curtopolis

Because this entire world was created by two separate factions of gods as basically a giant chessboard with mortals as pawns so they can win a bet. Justice is part of one of those two factions which makes it inherently partisan by nature.

308924810a

I think Hanno's issue with his name is that he's having trouble viewing himself as animated purely by the same sort of principle as drove him to take up his Name.

Big I

I noticed that ten is becoming a significant number in the Practiverse. Ten Scourges, ten Firstborn generals, ten Emerald Swords. Maybe signifying that Sve Noc, the Dead King and the Forever King are all on the same tier, or are similar in other ways?

TeK

Ten fingers...

Liliet

Not on Hanno though

Rey d`Tutto

Nor Hakram

amit27592

"Fifty-five: if your powers are lost, they will nearly always return greater than before so long as the appropriate moral lesson is learned. With kindness and humility comes overwhelming martial might."

-"Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

Hanno is struggling to learn the appropriate moral lesson. His name seems to be waning due to it.

Xinci

Indeed, either he will learn a manner of finding problems in the frameworks/institutions he is acting in and rectifying them or he will be replaced. So it goes on the wheel of Creation

Salt

Yeah, the other half of the axiom (left unsaid) is that if you don't learn the lesson or learn it too late? Then you, uh, die.

Black Spiral Dancer

Well, now that wouldn't feel as inspiring with such a threat behind, would it?

Mordant Moose

True, but what is the lesson to be learnt? To me it seems the very nature of his Name Ideology is so steadfast in carrying out justice based on action not outcome, any lesson learnt would be at odds with the beliefs that lead to his Naming. If he does learn a lesson and come back stronger im eager to see what the lesson EE has in mind because I actually have no idea here, does he learn that he HAS to judge because if he doesnt everyone dies to DK (which would be a 180 to his "I Do Not Judge" and would cripple his current White Knight Name)? Or is it something completely different that I just cant conceive right now?

Super keen for conclusion to the Hanno dilemma.

Xinci

It was nice feeling the narrative tropey feeling providence being close gives. Like a warm blanket instead of the freezing night that being without it can be like. Hm, justice as a concept in all truth could be broken down to finding broken parts of a system and rectifying them. Its finding a trillion little things and improving them, truly ceaseless work. The perspective of a angel might be on othe few things that could properly know when a improvement is a improvement. After all, everything does, so how do you know when deaths may end up with a better or worse result long term?

Even so, if there is a natural order to the world, even a mortals view may have similarities that may be used to bridge perspective to higher levels? Perhaps Recall may aid in this, perhaps not. Creation is a wheel ever turning and if one cannot fill their Role, they will fall off and get back on or be crushed beneath its merciless tread.

Adrian_V

This can be summed up with 2 simple words: OH SHIT!!

Unless he transitions (wich is unlikely) or this goes into a restoration of faith kind of character arc they are in deep shit, the whole thing depends too much on Hanno being a reasonable authority figure for the heroes to check in the idiots like MK or the zealouts, Pilgrim is too old for it.

308924810a

Huh, is this what the ominous foreshadowing around whatever the Bard was plotting around Cordelia and Hanno(as alluded to in their card game) was leading up to?

Hanno loses trust in Cordelia, and thus loses trust in the idea that what they're fighting to defend is Good, and thus loses his confidence that he is doing Good, and thus loses his Name?

If Hanno loses his Name there's not much to keep the Truce and Terms together from the Heroes' end, no one can replace the guy.

I think we need to start seriously thinking about what exactly would happen if the heroes lost their leader-figure and started a mutiny/started killing other Named mid-war.

That's certainly one way for heroes to foil the Villain's(Cat's) continent-spanning scheme at the last minute. Only problem is that foiling this scheme might kill all of Procer.

And all this is completely aside from my suspicion that there's an 'evil turns on evil', or a Dead King-driven 'I have a better scheme and am willing to be more monstrous' situation brewing up north, with the possibility that the Dead King might unleash his Demons into the force with a type-weakness against demons, and engage in some gunboat diplomacy, holding the possibility of their destruction by demon over the Drow to make them switch sides in the war.

Shveiran

Losing faith in the fact that he is doing good while defending life on the continent would be kind of ridiculous.

What he is losing faith in is whether or not he is still trying to uphold justice in what he does, because that's at the core of his Role.

Adrian_V

Or that he is the right person for it

308924810a

The issue is that in Hanno's mind good is indistinguishable from justice, while to the Grey pilgrim it is the prevention of as much suffering as achievable, and to Cordelia good is indistinguishable from duty.

In the worst case it might be possible for him to come around to a perspective like the Saint of Swords, where he views the structure of Procer as incompatible with justice, ceases to really care whether it exists and even wants to tear it down and rebuild, and thus feels guilt for helping to preserve its injustices even as he remains enthusiastic about bringing down the Dead King.

If he comes around to viewing Procer as primarily evil(unjust) but is locked in to defending it by his oaths and desire to protect the people, well, his Name isn't really supposed to be about defending the people or keeping to his duties, it's supposed to be about punishing injustice.

It's the classic Id, ego, superego problem, the Id is problematic because it wants what it wants immediately with no ability to learn or reassess those desires, and both useful and problematic because it can be satisfied either by getting that thing or by imagining it has gotten that thing, while even if the superego can learn to want different things, it is incapable of accepting anything less than perfection and will cause unproductive guilt at imperfections that a person has no ability to control. It sort of seems like both villains and heroes almost have to subordinate themselves to a particular Id or Superego drive to gain their power, but the problem is that the superego demands perfection, so a hero could potentially lose their power by failing to live up to the original drive(hence the whole 'lose your power until an appropriate moral lesson is learned' trope).

Shveiran

I'm not seeing it, honestly.

Sure, Hanno's core is justice, but... it doesn't really matter if your hero is about freedom, love or protecting others: if you can lend a hand in an "end of the world" scenario?

It's... kind of a give you'll do it.

No matter what Hanno may come to think of Procer, he'll not leave them out to die to the Dead King.

His problem is one of self worth and purpose.

James Halloran

I could be wrong, but I think the following is very similar to a quote from much earlier in the series about the Black Knight:

"It did not erase her virtues, but neither must Hanno ever allow himself to forget that all that stood between the Black Queen and atrocities was the perception of need."

Who knows what name Cat will come into, but damn the character growth from her time as Squire, to the Folly, to now is really great.

nimelennar

Three thoughts:

First, does Hanno know about the plague that Tariq used to take down Black Knight? If not, that might be one fewer person he'd trust, given the attitude displayed here.

Second, the point Hanno fails to grasp is that the Truce and Terms need someone alive to enforce them. Yes, compromising on them for the sake of political realities weakens them, but that same compromise, if not made, would have lost them a large chunk of the armies of Offer, and therefore the war against the Dead King, and /then/ what would have become of the T&T?

Finally, I again have to compliment EE on how the chapter is structured. Last chapter, it led off with a lesson that the character had learned, which then explained and justified the actions at the end of the chapter. This one, it does exactly the opposite: it leads off with a lesson that the Grey Pilgrim was trying to teach Hanno, and, in the end, it's the failure to truly grasp that lesson that is plaguing the White Knight. Evil knows Evil, as Tariq told him, and when all paths ahead are evil in one way or another, it will probably be a Villain who will have the best insight of which of those evils is the least. No one is arguing that it wasn't evil to desecrate the Red Axe's corpse the way they did, but every other path they could have taken would have just piled more corpses onto hers.

Sometimes, if only rarely, putting practical necessity over deontological morals /is/ the right thing to do. And while that's probably an attitude more suitable for a follower of the Choir of Mercy than Judgement, I think that, given time, Tariq will be able to hammer it through Hanno's skull. And maybe when he stops judging people for doing just that, his powers (and maybe even his Choir's) will be restored.

Liliet

> First, does Hanno know about the plague that Tariq used to take down Black Knight? If not, that might be one fewer person he'd trust, given the attitude displayed here.

I'm actually thinking that maybe realizing that Tariq matches the exact same pattern he accuses Cat of – anything in the face of sufficient necessity – might let him feel better. Like, if there's literally no-one who can match the ideal, maybe he can just... stop holding people to it, and accept imperfection. It won't be easy and it won't be painless but maybe he'll figure out a framework where he can hold onto his principles while also accepting these facts.

Shveiran

It's possible, though I personally believe that Hanno's harrowing comes from being unable to see a just path for himself to walk.
in that vein, realizing no one seems to ever find it would just be disheartening, not liberating.

Liliet

Yeah, that's a risk.

On the other hand, it might lower his standards for what a "just" path is – and while lowering standards sounds bad, standards that are too high lead to procrastination and nothing getting done to any standard at all, which is precisely Hanno's problem right now.

Shveiran

It's possible.

It would be healthy, don't get me wrong, I'm just not seeing that shape in the stroy right now. But I'm often wrong, so...:P

Liliet

you are right but there are all sorts of good options still >x>

nick012000

Hanno's powers are weakening because he's losing faith in the righteousness of Justice without the angels there to help him out. I wonder what would happen to the Truces and Terms if he winds up going full Villain, akin to Two-Face from Batman.

Liliet

No, he's losing faith in his own ability to act and make decisions. A very different song.

Crash

He has never had any ability to act and make decisions. The man had never made a choice in his life as a Named. It was either Providence or the Coin.

Now he has spent two years on his own and is having to grapple with the consequences of having to make choices that have repercussions and not having a neat and clean fallback of "the angels made me do it", he is understandably buckling under the pressure. Not helped by the fact his Name was very much tied with the concept of Justice provided by the choir of Judgement.

And that is my(very) uncharitable view on the matter.

Liliet

> The man had never made a choice in his life as a Named.

Yes, he has. Every single time he flipped the coin, he made the decision to flip it. It wasn't slipping out of his sleeve all providence-like, he chose when to throw and when not to.

Crash

He chose to avoid making a choice, leaving it in the choirs hands. You could argue this is a choice in itself, which it is; but as far as Hanno is concerned that wasn't him, it wasn't his hand, his thought, his decision. He was simply the instrument through which the Seraphim worked.

I doubt he's take responsibility for any of that, before these two years.

Liliet

No, you don't get it. He CHOSE WHEN TO ASK THE CHOIR.

And did it very rarely.

Liliet

00F.

Hanno is not having a good time, huh.

Frivolous

EE – a possible discrepancy:

"I have sent Antigone and Christophe to oversee the capitulation of the conscripts..."

" Hanno had already sent the Balladeer and the Harrowed Witch, two of the more level-headed among his Named, to prevent that particular situation from spinning out of control."

Antigone is the Witch of the Woods and the only Christophe I know of is Christophe de Pavanie, the Mirrored Knight.

The Harrowed Witch, on the other hand, is Aspasia.

So are the 2 sentences above both correct and referring to separate incidents, or are they referring to the same incident, and thus are a discrepancy?

Noldo

Don't they clearly refer to two different situations? Antigone and Christopher are with conscripts while Balladeer and Harrowed Witch are with fantasists.

Frivolous

Yeah. No change in the text, so I'm guessing they really are 2 different situations.

Evgeny Permyakov

A tin soldier starts to think a becomes a human being. I'm so glad for him, he isn't a completely lost cause I though he is.

mamm0nn

Ietsism (– "somethingism") is an unspecified belief in an undetermined transcendent reality.

Well, that doesn't sound like Hanno is just trying to grasp faith in Above but in his own special way to feel special while inevitably making all his opinions and judgements moot or flawed by trying just that.

At least other Heroes that have a faith in the good book can realise when they're wrong, very rarely but still. But when one has a faith that they haven't even determined yet cling on to as righteous and proper, then they are just setting themselves up to sneer and judge on their whims without the foundations to know when they are wrong themselves.

For all that Hanno repeats his old mantras, it seems like he's about to make some foolish judgements without good foundations the moment he leaves this state of indecisiveness.

Frivolous

Hanno is having to develop his own value system after years of having his hand held by the Cherubim. It may weaken him as far as his Name goes, and it may get him and a lot of other people killed, but this is actually growth. The Cherubim were a crutch to Hanno. I'm glad he got to learn for himself what he values while he was still alive.

I'm surprised a bit that one of the other Choirs haven't gone to figuratively knock on Judgment's door and lend a helping hand. I guess they can't interfere in each other's bailiwicks. Which seems lame, but whatever.

Also, this quote by Masdrubal the (so-called) Wise really irritates me:

"Should all serve as ordained by the Heavens, all of Creation will be as a garden without sin."

It advocates a caste system where people are nothing more than cogs in a machine. I hate it. Masdrubal was probably an authoritarian asshole.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Minor correction: Hanno's former minders are the Seraphim, not the Cherubim. That quibble aside, I think you're right.

Frivolous

Oh right. Sigh. Thanks.

Mental Mouse

The Masdrubal quote can also face a simpler retort: Everybody thinks "The world would be paradise if everybody else would just do as I say."

marillius

I'm having trouble writing my comment. Maybe this summary will get through.

The White Knight, leader of the Heroes in the Truce and Terms, is a grown man who doesn't know any wit about how Context matters when making a judgement. 'Is it right?' In a perfect world, this question matters. 'Is it the best that could be done?' This is the question that needs to be asked. The White Knight did nothing to solve any of the problems he's whining about and blaming others for, in fact caused one of them because he thought his Oath to an Oath Breaker who took his oath under false pretenses specifically to hurt the rest of those under his protection and cause millions to suffer at the behest of an immortal for funnies, and only now kind of sort of gets how mentally crippled he's made himself?

Why is he leading instead of the Grey Pilgrim? Fricking Dumbledore the Grey Pilgrim right now please and get this man child out of a position of authority. Make him your feel good customer service manager for heroes and put someone with some actual critical thinking skills at the head of one of the most powerful and important forces in the world.

Liliet

I... really don't think Tariq is a better candidate.

We're talking about the guy who well into his thirties was surprised/saddened by the idea that the same person could be good to one group of people and bad to another.

Just, please, not him. No.

marillius

Right now our only other option after those two is MK, I think.

Liliet

Well, how do I put this.

No.

marillius

That's pretty much my point right there. We got Hanno the man-child, Tariq the guy who had that same issue but who grew out of it, and MK the child-child.

Liliet

THERE ARE OTHER HEROES

LET'S RESURRECT NEPHELE I'M SURE SHE WOULD DO A GOOD JOB

Faux pas

"That this had been necessary was, in truth, difficult to deny. But had it been just?

No, his heart whispered. It wasn't."

Well, it looks like the heart of Hanno "I do not judge" of Arwad passed a judgement. Looking forward to more development on his side.

Silverking

"Catherine Foundling did not have lines in the sand that she would not cross, if she thought it necessary. It did not erase her virtues, but neither must Hanno ever allow himself to forget that all that stood between the Black Queen and atrocities was the perception of need."

Funny, that's exactly what Cat thinks of the Grey Pilgrim.

Liliet

Yup! Can't wait for Hanno to realize that.

...He's going to, right? Right??

Salt

I think this is probably the most accurate part. Hanno doesn't realize that he and Catherine have something very much in common – they're both very heavy idealists.

Being OK to suffer with the state of Creation forcing you to choose between the lesser garbage choice is the mentality of Malicia, the Saint, the old Grey Pilgrim, who were all too busy asking "what is the best we can do with what we've got", to remember to also ask "is it right for this kind of decision to be forced on us at all?"

Cat has been on what is now a six book long crusade against Creation itself after asking that question, and finding it's answer lacking.

The mistake Hanno is making is misidentifying the difference between him and Catherine. It's not that Catherine isn't an idealist or that she's less principled than he is. It's that his vision of an ideal world is one that's Just, and her vision of an ideal world is one that's Peaceful. The two are, quite often, not the same thing.

Liliet

I think the mistake he's made here is misjudging the nature of the conflict / problem with the Red Axe situation. Well, scope more than nature, but these are the same thing in context.

So he came to an erroneous conclusion from there)=

Zach

Catherine acknowledges that she's this way also, though. Post-Everdark, Catherine doesn't really have any major philosophical disagreement with Pilgrim; she understands why he felt that killing her is necessary given what he knows and has experienced, even though she obviously thought he was wrong about that.

I think that Pilgrim's goals probably align more with Catherine's at this point than most other heroes (except for maybe Roland); he's always been more of an "ends justify the means" guy, like Catherine herself.

Nvm

I wonder if Hanno is on the way to a new Name. Cat is his counter part and she's coming into a new Name herself.

Major events have changed his Role pretty significantly. Whether he doubles down on his principles or becomes a bit more grey, he might not be the White Knight anymore either way.

Frivolous

If Hanno loses his Bestowal and is no longer White Knight, or is killed for some reason related to his angst, who replaces him as leader of the heroes under the Truce and Terms?

To put the question another way, who do the heroes hate the least and is also considered tolerable by the other factions in the Alliance (villains/Catherine, Procer, Levant, drow, Callow)?

I'm guessing Roland the Rogue Sorcerer.

Shveiran

Several of the heroes don't trust him, though, for precisely that reason.

Frivolous

Yeah, but I think Mirror Knight and Blade of Mercy were the major ones. After their humiliation at the hero meeting, I doubt they'll try to speak up again.

Giggles. Maybe the heroes can have an election! Vote either in person or by scrying network.

Wouldn't that be funny?

Shveiran

I can think of worse options, though few among them have the clout to do it. Except maybe Pilgrim.
Then again, a younger hero could maybe grow into the role?

Frivolous

Is clout really an issue? I think organizational and administrative ability, coupled with inoffensiveness and the ability to convince others with logic, would be enough.

Note the hero meeting that Hanno chaired and that ended so disastrously for Blade of Mercy and Mirror Knight. Hanno had to use moral suasion the entire time when arguing. He was more a manager than a real leader.

I think Roland would be a good choice simply because he's smart enough and gregarious and inoffensive. He won't piss people off, and unlike Hanno, he isn't likely to suffer a crisis of confidence anytime soon. His Name and Role are not as rigid or as brittle as Hanno's.

Valiant Champion could do the job, actually, but Catherine hates her. It would be difficult for Rafaella to represent the heroes when her opposite number fantasizes about murdering her.

Shveiran

Hanno used logic, but he did so while also being the White Knight.

It's kind of hard to judge whether or not one without clout could deal with, say, Cristophe or the Blessed Artificer just through logic. I'm unconvinced, myself, but I'll agree it is far from certain.

I agree that Roland would be qualified, but unless they listen to him, it doesn't work.

As for Rafaella... no? Just... no. She has no ability to consider who fits where and who can't interact with whom. She just isn't leader material. I mean, in a battle? Sure, maybe, she could fit that role and grow into it. She'll never be a general, but she doesn't have to be.

But she is the Big Guy in a band, possibly the Heart in the right story, not the Smart guy or the Leader.

Mental Mouse

Roland also has a secret which the Dead King would love to exploit. Even if Roland is at peace with his past, Neshie could probably use it to sow distrust or otherwise make trouble for the Alliance.

Shveiran

>>>The afternoon air was chilly and so Hanno called Light to him, letting it warm his bones as he had learned from the life of a Paladin long dead.
It came slower than it used to.

Damn, it's Hanno starting to lose his Name? Holy shit.

Anyway, great chapter. I'm glad we got to see what's going on in Hanno's mind. I was very put out by his decisions in the Arsenal, and I'm glad we got to see what he is thinking on the subject. I mean, I still disagree with him, but I understand him a little better.

There is a part of his reasoning that really stuck with me, though.

>>>Catherine Foundling did not have lines in the sand that she would not cross, if she thought it necessary. It did not erase her virtues, but neither must Hanno ever allow himself to forget that all that stood between the Black Queen and atrocities was the perception of need.

I was like... I mean, that's true, but...

... dude, before this Bone War business, wasn't your shtick to go around and murder those the Seraphim deemed deserving of the sentence?

That's like... literally the same. You are committing an atrocity (since I'm pretty sure Hanno considers murder to be an atrocity) because you perceived it as necessary (the Seraphim deemed it necessary and you deemed it necessary that their will be done).

I mean, really... weren't you about to do the same thing just now? You deemed it necessary not to compromise your principles, and I can sort of see your reasoning, but the consequences of it would have been atrocious and you were fine with it.

I don't mean "fine" like you didn't mind, but then again I doubt you think Catherine enjoys her own atrocities?

I think you are kind of lost, pal.

Which may be the problem with your Name and the point of the chapter, of course.

Liliet

Yeah, Hanno has failed to notice multiple inconsistencies in his beliefs, here. "It's not an atrocity if it was ordained by the Choir" is a band-aid, not a complete answer.

The problem is, there are multiple ways to reconcile these inconsistencies, and some of them are uh. Worse than others. Staying inconsistent is better than some of these options.

Andrew Smith

A big difference is that any one else is mortal and flawed and so can be wrong while the seraphim will always know what is JUST aka they can't be wrong. It is basically the same trust Traig has of the choir of mercy if they tell him to kill someone that it will 100% lead to less suffering and so is clearly the right thing to do.

Shveiran

Well, yes, of course.

But if one goes with that logic, the only people allowed to make a call are those that are not in fact making it because they have a choir whispering in their ears.

That is... rather narrow? I don't think a choir can even have multiple chosen at a given time, but even if I was wrong on the subject most heroes still don't interact with them... and heroes are a subset of the rare Named subset of the population to begin with.

It's... not a good parameter to use?

Liliet

And now we wait for Hanno to realize that!

Andrew Smith

A thought I had if he thinks that since he became the white knight because of his belief in Judgment and pretty sure most of the above is the whole belief in the will of the heavens to be correct(or at least in something bigger than yourself)

Some of the ways he could come to terms is that of below(aka the I know best) and so will cost him the name of white knight

Also yeah the whole choir are the only ones qualified is a bit narrow but it pretty much comes from the exact same place as the page quote And the person who wrote that is apparently called wise

Juff

Typo Thread:

for it was > for what it was moved to Revenant > moved the Revenant heave have > heave gave them unmoving (should have comma, also unmoved is in the next line, so maybe reword) to most forms (missing verb. bypass?)

daggers but > daggers, but loudly at (maybe of? about?) stay hand > stay their hand often deal > often dealt drunk your > drunk on your corpses way > corpses away made it was > made – it was (also, maybe the simple way > simply the way)
of young > of a young
Cordelia Hasenbach had and (extra space)
Knight why > Knight knew why where he must stand (missing fullstop) was there right > was the right could be no turning (extra space)

Zee

Cat's name wants to pass judgement on Names and Hanno is losing his name.

I suspect Cat's new Name wants to make White Knight's and Black Knight's roles redundant for a while, starting the Terms and the Accords as the only handler for both Above and Below Names.

Liliet

Oof.

That would be... kind of bad, wouldn't it?

Like, that is decidedly not a long-term setup that Catherine can pass on to the next generation.

Zee

Unless her Name is a new groove for others to fill ...

Liliet

Too rare. Hierarch 2.0

superkeaton

This was a neat chapter. It reminded me of the discussion between Black and the Pilgrim. And it reflects the waxing of Cat's nascent Name with the waning of Hanno's.

jworks17

I think Cat is going to end up killing the white knight.

They are growing into archenemies, even if it isn't apparent. Cat is growing a name based on judgement and Hanno does not judge.

Hanno even makes it clear in this chapter that he thinks her judgment is wrong. What will happen when Cat comes into her name based on a Villain judging by her own accord, in the same place as the White Knight who lets the Heavens do the judgment he thinks himself unworthy to do? Nothing good.

Liliet

I disagree.

hakureireimu

Cat and Hanno being rivals would have made sense last book. This book, Cat has grown beyond the White Knight; notice how much broader her role is compared to his. Hanno no longer is big enough to be Cat's rival (only the combination of Hanno, Tariq, and Cordelia would).

Mental Mouse

Not really buying it. If only because both of them are top-tier story-wrangers, and are quite capable of telling that story to go fornicate itself.

hoser2

The Truce and Terms seem broken. The Red Axe did suicide by police to try to break it at a fissure. It seems possible for Hanno to realize that the Truce and the Terms can be fixed fairly easily.

It isn't just for imperfect rules to cause multiple countries to fall to the Dead King. The Truce and Terms as they stand contain a trap for temporal rulers. Hanno is himself somewhat responsible for not seeing and fixing it before it became a problem.

So I see solutions for Hanno to grow and the timing could have Hanno growing at a vital moment. I like that Hanno is becoming more dimensional and look forward to what EE makes of it.

Liliet

A trap?

Ernest Pereira

Usually, a PoV from the heroes or those who are otherwise nominally opposed to Cat in a given moment makes them sympathetic.

Not in Hanno's case. Not really.

Abrakadabra

Not YET. 😊

Black Spiral Dancer

Summary of all posts above mine: Idealism is stupid. Get over it.

P.s: All hail Anaxares the Hierarch!

XPMonster2121

As I was reading the comments I came to the conclusion that Hanno an argument to Hanno can be boiled down to two points.

Point 1, the choir of judgement isn't all knowing. Many commentors have said that they are so they should be the one to judge but we know they aren't. Anaxares was able to keep them occupied for a long time and according to Hanno he may even be winning ground. If judgement was all knowing this wouldn't have happened.

Point 2, judgement must be judging by something. What I mean is that to judge you must value something over something else. They seem to judge based on if something is right or wrong based on some standard that the gods above set. We don't even know what that standard is to my knowledge, so we can't come to the conclusion if it is right or wrong. What we do know is there are entities of similar standing that don't share the same values. I am not talking about the gods below or their servants because I don't believe that Hanno would accept them as a point against judgement. I am talking about Mercy, we know Mercy values the most good for the most people or the least evil. Mercy would commit an unjust action for a good end, I don't think Judgement would. I would use these two points to talk to Hanno.

laguz24

I disagree with you, judgment could see what was going on but was powerless to stop it due to their own nature and the nature of everyone involved. The hierarch would have judged the choir, Hanno would have attended the trial, and the choir of judgment would have judged. If not they wouldn't have gotten there in the first place. Also the criteria I believe that the choir of judgment uses when making a decision is, "was/is it just".

masterofbones

Sadly, Hanno doesn't see the mistake he made with Red Axe. He refused to talk. The lack of compromise wasn't the issue, it was the fact that he refused to even discuss the best course of action.

If you refuse to take part in the conversation, you are going to be left out. That's not talking behind your back, that's you plugging your ears.

nimelennar

Agreed, 100%. Had Hanno participated in the discussion with Cat, Cordelia, and the others, they may have been able to come up with a just compromise (e.g. having the Red Axe's punishment under the Truce and Terms be that she is stripped of the T&T's protection and handed over to Procer). Yes, the idea that they would only be discussing the punishment for "a hypothetical crime" would only be a fig leaf, but nothing they decided there would have bound WK to find RA guilty, or impose the sentence discussed, if the details revealed at trial turned out differently from expected. He could have participated by bending his ideals but not breaking them.

Instead, Cat and Cordelia had to find a way to make all of the various factions happy, without Hanno's input, but having to take into account what they expected his actions to be. Small wonder they came to a solution he didn't like.

masterofbones

I still don't get why they didn't just say that since Red Axe had openly admitted she signed in bad faith and broke the terms, she had no right to the protections given by the treaty.

Liliet

Because that's not how law works. A person insisting that they don't want to obey laws of the country they're currently in because they're an anarchist and all laws are unjust, won't get shot in the back of their head by police because it means laws don't apply to them then.

There's a difference between "law" and "treaty", but Hanno is locked into a maximalist view, there.

hoser2

Hanno has locked himself into various positions that don't work together, I agree. I would argue that that is his problem. But doesn't his position as judge of the "good" Named require him to exercise judgement? Is he really locked into a maximalist view?

I think there are multiple ways out, but they require him to change one of his currently fixed positions. If he figures it out, he will have grown into his promotion. If not, he will be another example of the Peter Principle.

When the treaty is based on people joining it voluntarily, is it really the same as the laws that are imposed involuntarily?

And making reference to who police kill and why is a contentious issue that I don't want to go anywhere near, but I remember the names Taylor and Floyd, just to mention a few.

Liliet

Okay yes bringing the police into it was a bad plan. I keep forgetting I don't live in a world where things work the way they should)=

Anyway, you have a point wrt treaty vs law, and Hanno should have had a discussion about Catherine about it. He should have done a lot more work in that situation period.

I've actually written up a longpost about it on reddit:

Zach

Hanno's position with the Red Axe thing isn't as unreasonable as it might seem at first glance. The main problem with "holding to principles shouldn't matter and you should only care about the outcome" is that, in reality, you can't perfectly predict the future. As a result, it sometimes makes sense to make some principles absolute, since you can always come up with some justification for doing things and will only know in hindsight whether something was truly necessary. Catherine has made this mistake often herself in the past and even acknowledges this now (for example she acknowledges that letting the Lone Swordsman go free and seeking an alliance with Keter were both wrong and completely inexcusable, and both were done out of a wrong belief that they were necessary as a means to an end).

The main thing that is wrong with Hanno's position is that he isn't appropriately weighing the evils of the alternative (and is also having the issue many Named have where they clearly value Named over regular people). People dying due to the Principate falling apart isn't somehow less evil than raising the Red Axe's corpse; it's just more abstract and not tied to a specific Named person who Hanno knows and sympathizes with. Hanno is also obviously letting his own personal judgement factor into how bad "raising the Red Axe's corpse" is; his reaction to Papenheim executing all those officers wasn't as strong because he didn't personally care about them in the same way he cared about a Named heroine.

Liliet

Yep, agreed.

IMHO,

> People dying due to the Principate falling apart is something he didn't fully clue in was something the other option was about at all. Like Catherine pieced the implication of what would happen if they refused Cordelia from Kingfisher's tirade (he did not talk to Hanno like that because of mixed allegiances, which seems like an increasingly stupid reason to me btw) and her understanding of Cordelia's personality and incentives. Hanno has no idea about Cordelia's incentives and his assessment of her personality did not account for any of this at all.

Hanno's problem is that he's, to put it bluntly, incompetent to be an equivalent to a leader of a nation (heroes are allowed equal voice in the Grand Alliance to actual nations).

Liliet

(100% accurate on your first paragraph that's just truth from start to end)

Liliet

Hanno's mistake, imho, stemmed from him not being used to / not realizing just how broad, impactful and high level his duties are.

His mindset was "Cordelia can and should fix it without involving me". This is normally accurate for heroes interacting with rulers, because heroes just don't have that much authority / influence whereas rulers do. Heroes are not normally huge political roadblocks cutting off the entire course of action.

Hanno is though, as a top-ranking officer of the Grand Alliance. And he doesn't grok that, he doesn't full understand what that means. He admitted earlier in the book that he let most of their shared duties fall to Catherine, and I don't think he realizes that what duties he kept were STILL htat high level, and that in this particular case his job wasn't JUST that of a judge, it was that of a diplomat and politician as well, and he really did need to put effort into fixing things for Cordelia. Not because it's a judge's job. He was offended at that implication, and fairly. It's not a judge's job, but judge is not his only role!

And he just.. didn't really process that.

beleester

